In 2009, one dissertation on everyday life in Soviet Belarus between 1944 and 1953 was rejected by Yakov Treshchenok, a former history teacher of President Aleksandr Lukashenka who was very influential in the history domain, because it did not present Russia as Belarus's "birth mother." In 2010, Sowietyzacja zachodniej Białorusi, 1944–1953 (Cracow: Arcana, 2010), a dissertation by Jan Szumski on the extension of Soviet Belarus to the west was published abroad.

[Source: Timothy Snyder, "In Darkest Belarus," New York Review of Books (28 October 2010).]

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

When on 24 June 2010 police officers raided the Roman Catholic Church and its commission to investigate and aid victims of sexual abuse by priests (established in 2000), they also raided the National Archives, where part of the commission records were held since September 2009. It was reportedly the first time in the history of the National Archives that judicial authorities seized records in their custody. The tombs of two cardinals were disturbed in a hunt for documents. The confiscation was sensitive because many of the victims who testified before the commission had done so after they had been promised confidentiality.

[Sources: Stephen Castle, "Belgian Raiders Went to National Archives," New York Times (30 June 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2010) 372.]

On 8 December 2010, the Brussels Civil Court delivered its first findings in a case brought by nine survivors of the Rwandan genocide against the Belgian state and three Belgian soldiers. The Court found that the Belgian state was responsible for ordering the prompt return of Belgian peacekeepers from Kigali in 1994, leaving behind an estimated 2,000 people in a school building that was under Belgian control when the peacekeepers withdrew. Many of them were killed shortly after the departure of the peacekeepers. The Court also ruled that by obeying those orders the three soldiers had engaged their own responsibility.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 78.]

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In November 2008, the government requested the extradition of former president Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada and two of his ministers to stand trial for killing at least 67 people and injuring more than 400 in anti-government protests in September and October 2003, when the army used lethal force to quell violent demonstrations in the highland city of El Alto. It did not receive a response from the United States (US) government. Sánchez de Lozada had resigned and fled to the US after the events, known in Bolivia as “Black October.” The three men, as well as other ministers who were given asylum in Peru, were declared fugitives from justice. In August 2010, the prosecutor had filed charges against three senior military officials, including a former chief commander of the armed forces, for destroying military documents, including a log believed to have recorded details of the events and the personnel who participated.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 80; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 211–212.]

In 2010, there were continued delays in bringing to justice those responsible for human rights violations committed under past military regimes and since the return to democratic rule, and in providing reparation to victims. Prosecutors attempting to access military archives as part of their investigations into enforced disappearances in 1980–1981 faced continuing obstacles, despite two Supreme Court orders to declassify the archives in April 2010. On 31 May 2010, Defense Minister Rubén Saavedra announced that the armed forces had finally agreed to declassify the archives. In late 2010 the army continued to defy the order and did not provide information to help clarify the fate of the “disappeared.” Mendoza, whom Vice-President Alvaro García Linera publicly criticized for overstepping his mandate, was taken off the case.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 80; Report 2011 (London 2011) 15, 80; Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (22 February & 3 June 2010); “Gobierno boliviano hará que desclasifiquen archivos militares” (Prensa Latina <http://www.prensa-latina.cu>); Human Rights Watch,

World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 210–211; Luis Oporto Ordoñez, “La batalla por abrir los archivos militares de la dictadura de 1980,” La época (4 July 2010).]

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 28 January 2010, the Court of Appeals in The Hague heard a civil case filed by 6,000 relatives of the victims of the 1995 genocide in Srebrenica (the “Mothers of Srebrenica”) against the Netherlands and the United Nations (UN). The applicants claimed compensation from the Dutch authorities and the UN for having failed to protect them and their families from genocide committed in Srebrenica in July 1995 by members of the Bosnian Serb Army led by General Ratko Mladić. In the first instance judgment in July 2008, the District Court in The Hague had stated that it had no jurisdiction over actions by the UN personnel. It also discharged any responsibility of the Dutch government. On 30 March 2010, the Court of Appeals in The Hague rejected the appeal in the case. The court stated that the immunity of the UN from prosecution was absolute and that it was not competent to deal with the compensation claim.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 82.]

On 11 July 2010, the remains of 775 victims of the Srebrenica massacre were buried in the Potocari area, at a ceremony marking the fifteenth anniversary of the worst atrocity in Europe since World War II. In June 2010, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) convicted Vujadin Popovic and Ljubisa Beara, two high-ranking Bosnian Serb army officials, of genocide, murder, extermination, and persecution for their roles in the massacre at Srebrenica, sentencing them to life imprisonment. A third defendant, Drago Nikolic, was convicted of aiding and abetting genocide, murder, extermination, and persecution, and sentenced to 35 years in prison. Four others were also convicted of a range of crimes committed during and following the fall of Srebrenica and Zepa.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 410–411.]

In July 2010, just before the 15th anniversary of the genocide at Srebrenica in 1995, several high-level politicians of Republika Srpska made statements glorifying the perpetrators of the genocide in Srebrenica in July 1995 and other people accused of being responsible for it, including Radovan Karadžić. Some of them denied the fact that genocide had taken place in Srebrenica.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 38, 81.]

The Trial Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) found that at least 5,336 individuals were killed in several executions following the fall of Srebrenica but noted that the final number of victims could be as high as 7,826. The proceedings against Radovan Karadžić continued before the Trial Chamber on various charges, including two counts related to genocide. The first referred to Srebrenica. The second related to the crimes committed between 31 March and 31 December 1992 in a number of municipalities in Bosnia-Herzegovina, including killings, torture and forcible transfer or deportation, and whose aim was the destruction of Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims as ethnic or religious groups. There were also five counts of crimes against humanity, including persecution, extermination, murder and deportation of non-Serbs. The indictment also contained four charges of violations of the laws or customs of war such as hostage-taking and spreading terror among the civilian population. During the proceedings Karadžić rejected all charges, claiming that both Sarajevo and Srebrenica were legitimate military targets.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 82.]

On 26 May 2011, after almost 16 years on the run, Ratko Mladić, the former Bosnian Serb army commander was arrested. The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in The Hague (ICTY) charged him with eleven counts of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, including the 43-month siege of Sarajevo and the Srebrenica genocide in July 1995. The arrest came as European countries were considering the opening of formal membership negotiations with Serbia. The European Union had stressed that Belgrade had to cooperate fully with the ICTY before talks could start. Cooperation of the Serbian government with the ICTY also included surrendering key documents and archives for ongoing and upcoming trials. Although ICTY had to complete all of its work, including appeals, by the end of 2014, it was unlikely that Mladić's trial would be completed by that date. The ICTY delivered its first genocide conviction against General Radislav Krstić in August 2001, sentencing him to 46 years in prison. Krstić was second in command to Mladić of the Bosnian Serb troops at Srebrenica. In April 2004, the ICTY Appeals Chamber, while reducing Krstić's sentence to 35 years, confirmed that genocide had occurred in Srebrenica.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, "Bosnia: Mladić Arrest Ends Reign of Impunity; UN Security Council's Ongoing Support Essential for Yugoslav Tribunal" (26 May 2011).]

Prosecution of crimes under international law continued before the domestic judiciary in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH), at a slow pace. The War Crimes Chamber (WCC) of the State Court continued to play the central role in war crimes prosecutions in BiH. At the end of September 2010, 50 war crimes trials were pending before the WCC. A further 20 cases were on trial in the Federation of BiH and 13 in the Republika Srpska. The Brcko District had 4 pending cases. Prosecution of rape and other war crimes of sexual violence continued to receive little attention. Fewer than 20 such cases had been prosecuted in total by the WCC since its creation in 2005. However, it was estimated that there was a backlog of up to 10,000 untried war crimes cases. The implementation of the State Strategy for the Work on War Crimes, which was adopted in 2008 in order to address the issue, was delayed. Witness support and protection measures in BiH remained inadequate. Despite some efforts, the authorities failed to grant access to reparation for many victims of war crimes, including survivors of sexual violence, families of those forcibly disappeared and victims of torture.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 81.]

Progress in identifying the whereabouts of victims of enforced disappearance during the 1992–1995 war was slow. Due to the inadequate response of the justice system, those responsible often enjoyed impunity. Although exhumations conducted by the Missing Persons Institute continued at various locations, the whereabouts of between 10,000 and 11,500 people remained unknown. The state authorities failed to create a database of the missing people and to open the Fund for Support to the Families of Missing Persons—both of which were envisaged by the Law on Missing Persons adopted in 2004. In June 2010, the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances visited BiH and urged the authorities to implement in full the 2004 law. It also noted with concern that many judgments of the Constitutional Court of BiH in cases involving enforced disappearances remained unimplemented. It recommended that the authorities establish a national program on reparations for relatives of victims of enforced disappearance, which should include measures such as compensation, restitution, rehabilitation, satisfaction and guarantees of non-repetition.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 83.]

See also Croatia, Montenegro.

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Brazil continued to lag behind the rest of the region in its response to grave human rights violations committed during the military era (1964–1985). In April 2010, the Supreme Federal Tribunal upheld the interpretation that crimes committed by members of the military—extrajudicial executions, torture and rape—were political or related to political acts and, therefore, covered by an amnesty law passed by the military regime in 1979; in so doing, it ruled against a challenge to interpretations of this Law. However, on 14 December 2010, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that Brazil was responsible for the enforced disappearance of at least 70 peasants and Araguaia Guerrilla activists in Pará state in 1970–1972. The court found that Brazil had violated the right to the truth by not adequately investigating the cases and withholding information, and that the amnesty law ran counter to its obligations under international law and could not be used to block prosecutions in cases of grave human rights violations. The court also stated that Brazil could not justify its failure to provide information simply on the grounds that there was no proof that the required information existed; it had to indicate all measures taken to confirm whether the information ever existed. The federal government in 2010 presented a bill creating a national truth commission to investigate dictatorship-era abuses, but in late 2010 its approval was still pending in congress.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 15–16, 87; Article 19, Ifex Alert (21 December 2010); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 219.]

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Macedonia.

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

See Guinea.

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In September 2010, President Pierra Nkurunziza committed to moving forward with the creation of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) in his inauguration speech. In November 2010, Nkurunziza received the report on the 2009 national consultations on transitional justice (held by a committee representing the government, the United Nations, and civil society). Publishing the report was a prerequisite to establishing the TRC and a Special Tribunal. Impunity persisted for serious past abuses by the National Liberation Forces (FNL), by the National Council for Defense of Democracy-Forces for Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD; the ruling party) and the former Burundian army.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 3–4, 92; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 90.]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic), Rwanda.

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In a landmark decision in July 2010, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), the United Nations-backed Khmer Rouge tribunal, convicted Kaing Guek Eav (known as Duch) for crimes against humanity and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions for his role in mass executions, torture and other crimes during the Khmer Rouge period (1975–1979). Duch was the commander of security prison S-21, where at least 14,000 people were tortured and killed. He was sentenced to 35 years' imprisonment, reduced by 16 years for time served and illegal detention. Both the prosecution and defense appealed against the sentence. In September 2010, Ieng Sary, Ieng Thirith, Khieu Samphan and Nuon Chea were charged with genocide of the Cham and Vietnamese, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and other crimes. Prime Minister Hun Sen undermined progress on two additional cases covering five individuals by warning that he would not allow further prosecutions.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 28, 92, 93; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 300.]

See also Thailand.

CAMEROON

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Myanmar, United States.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 22 November 2010, the International Criminal Court (ICC) started the trial of Jean-Pierre Bemba, former Vice-President of the Democratic Republic Congo. In October 2010, an appeals panel at the court in The Hague had rejected an appeal from his lawyers to dismiss the case, the final obstacle to starting the trial. The ICC said that Bemba would face two counts of crimes against humanity and three counts of war crimes. He was accused of leading militias in the country in 2002–2003 that killed and raped civilians.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 3, 97, 98, 126.]

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2010, the Senegalese government continued to delay judicial proceedings against former Chadian president Hissène Habré, who stands accused of crimes against humanity and torture during his 1982–1990 rule. In May 2010, the Community Court of Justice of ECOWAS declared Habré's 2009 complaint against Senegal admissible. The complaint claimed that the prosecution violated the prohibition of retroactive criminal law in the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, even though the crimes alleged were all violations of international law when they were committed. In November 2010, the ECOWAS Court ruled that Senegal could only try Habré if ad hoc or special jurisdictions were put in place. In July 2010, following a joint African Union-European Union mission, a round table was announced to finalize the financial terms of Habré's trial. The round table was held in November 2010, and European and African donors agreed to contribute to financing the trial. Meanwhile, thousands of victims of torture and killings under Habré's rule never received compensation or recognition from Chad's current government, and many of Habré's henchmen still held key positions of power, including state security jobs. In December 2010, President Abdoulaye Wade declared that he was no longer interested in pursuing the investigation and prosecution of Habré.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 3, 280–281; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 95.]

See also Sudan.

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In January 2010, the Memory Museum was opened to the public, providing a space to acknowledge human rights violations committed in 1973–1990.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 103.]

A decree signed in January 2010 by outgoing President Michelle Bachelet established a commission to allow the cases of those who had been subjected to political imprisonment, torture or enforced disappearance in 1973–1990—and who had not yet been identified by the Rettig or Valech Commissions—to be presented. Victims and their relatives were given six months to present their cases, after which the commission would review the cases and produce a list of names of those who qualified for the same benefits as those granted under the Rettig and Valech Commissions. President Sebastián Piñera provided government support for the human rights program attached to the ministry of the interior, whose lawyers helped relatives of victims pursue their cases before the courts. As of June 2010, 292 former military personnel and civilian collaborators had been convicted on charges of enforced disappearances, extrajudicial executions, and torture (of whom 210 had the verdict confirmed on final appeal). Sixty-four were serving prison sentences; 490 more were facing charges. In July 2010, Piñera announced he would exclude prisoners convicted of human rights violations from presidential clemency measures that the Catholic Church had requested to mark the 200 anniversary of Chile's founding as a republic. However, in many cases the Supreme Court routinely used its discretionary powers to reduce sentences against human rights violators in recognition of the time elapsed since the criminal act. Often the sentence finally imposed was low enough to exempt those convicted from going to prison. This practice raised concerns about Chile's fulfilment of its obligation to hold perpetrators of disappearances accountable by imposing appropriate punishment or sanctions; less than one-third of those convicted were actually serving prison time in August 2010. Victims' groups continued to present cases for prosecution. In August 2010, 438 cases were presented by a group of ex-conscripts, accusing the army of human rights violations against army recruits in 1973–1990. In October 2010, a group representing the families of those executed on political grounds announced they had presented a total of 300 cases to the judiciary.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 103–104; Human Rights Watch,

World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 224–225.]

In July 2010, Manuel Contreras, former head of the infamous Chilean National Intelligence Directorate (Dirección de Inteligencia Nacional, DINA), was sentenced to 17 years' imprisonment for his part in the killing in Argentina in 1974 of General Carlos Prats, a member of cabinet in the government of President Salvador Allende (1970–1973), and his wife. The court held these were crimes against humanity, and that Chile was bound under the Geneva Conventions to judge and punish those responsible for such crimes, regardless of the self-amnesty law that Augusto Pinochet introduced in 1978.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 15, 104; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 224–225.]

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 19 August 2010, Xie Chaoping ([1955–), a former journalist with the Procuratorial Daily (–2006) was detained by security officers of Weinan, Shaanxi, and accused of illegal publication of a book for commercial sale. In 2006, Xie had written an article about the Sanmenxia Dam, chronicling how the then Weinan government persuaded farmers to leave their homelands to allow the central government to build the dam in the 1950s. In the process, he exposed local government wrongdoing (which cheated the farmers, depriving them of land and compensation allocated to them by the central government). As the Procuratorial Daily censored the story, Xie resigned in protest and wrote a book about it, The Great Migration. He contacted four publishers of which three refused the manuscript (two cited pressure from the Weinan government, while the third requested the deletion of all names of alleged wrongdoers from the book, which Xie refused). In May 2010, Sparkle, a Beijing-based cultural magazine, agreed to publish the book, on the condition that Xie bear the cost (which he did) and signed a memorandum promising that the book was not intended for commercial sale. On 26–27 June 2010, more than 10,000 copies of the book were confiscated by the Weinan government's cultural department. Sparkle was suspended and its publisher dismissed. On 15 September 2010, the printer of the book was arrested. On 17 September 2010, Xie was released on bail for lack of evidence.

[Sources: International Federation of Journalists, “IFJ Urges Immediate Release of Illegally Detained Writer in China” (14 September 2010); International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Alert (21 September 2010); Reporters without Borders, “Author of Book about Sanmenxia Dam Freed on Bail” (7 & 20 September 2010).]

On 10 December 2010, Liu Xiaobo was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. (See NCH Annual Report 2010; see also entry about Spengler below.)

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 4/10: 182–183, 221–222; NRC Handelsblad (9 December 2010) 3; Wordt vervolgd (December 2010–January 2011) 38.]

On 27 December 2010, democracy activist and lawyer Bai Dongping was arrested in Beijing for inciting subversion after he had posted a photograph online of the 1989 Tiananmen events.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 1/11: 111–112.]

In January 2011, the Chinese authorities censored references to the protests in Egypt as some internet users drew comparisons, including historical parallels, with China. One message on the popular Baidu.com message board asked: “Will Mubarak become Deng Xiaoping?”, a reference to the crackdown on the pro-reform protests on Tiananmen Square in 1989.

[Sources: Tania Branigan, “Chinese Authorities Restrict News of Egypt Protests,” Guardian (31 January 2011); NRC Handelsblad (1 February 2011), 5.]

On 30 March 2011, German sinologist Tilman Spengler was denied a visa when he wanted to accompany German Foreign Minister Guido Westerwelle on a trip to Beijing to open the art exhibition “Kunst der Aufklärung” (Art of the Enlightenment) on 1 April 2011. In September 2010, Spengler had given a speech in honor of Liu Xiaobo when the latter was awarded the Hermann-Kesten-Medal. Spengler was called “not a friend of the Chinese people.”

[Source: Der Spiegel Online (30 March 2011).]

On 8 April 2011, the Beijing Municipal Committee of the Communist Youth League banned an inter-university debate competition on the 1911 Revolution scheduled to open one day later. The debates, held annually since 2002, were to focus on “The Three Principles of the People—nationalism, democracy, and livelihood,” the guiding political philosophy for the 1911 Revolution developed by Sun Yat-sen (1866–1925), the founding father of modern China. A total of sixteen universities were to take part in the event. The central government reportedly wanted to use the centenary in October 2011 to promote patriotism, not revolution and democracy. It monitored gatherings in public areas following recent anonymous online calls urging mainlanders to stage “jasmine” rallies every Sunday—an attempt to copy recent popular uprisings in the Middle East.

[Source: South China Morning Post (10 April 2011).]

On 26 April 2011, scholar Mao Yushi was told that he would be beaten up because the Caixin magazine website had uploaded an article of his about Mao Zedong. The article mentioned that Mao Zedong was responsible for the numerous deaths during the famine (1959–1962) and the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976). The article and its supportive messages were deleted from the website soon after the threat was made.

[Source: International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Alert; 8 May 2011.]

The new National Museum of China was reported to minimize and underexpose certain episodes of contemporary history, such as the Great Leap Forward (1958–1960), the famine (1959–1962), the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), the transition after Mao’s death, including the crisis with the Gang of Four and Deng Xiao Ping’s early years in power (1976–1980), and the Tiananmen massacre (1989).

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (30 May 2011), 14–15.]

Hong Kong

Foreign nationals denied entry to Hong Kong included Chen Weiming, sculptor of the Goddess of Democracy statue used in the 4 June 1989 Tiananmen vigil. On 29 and 30 May 2010, police arrested 13 activists and twice confiscated Goddess of Democracy statues displayed in Times Square. Following public criticism, the statues were returned before the Tiananmen vigil which attracted between 113,000 and 150,000 participants.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 105, 107.]

On 3 August 2010, a question-and-answer webpage on Hong Kong’s Chinese-language Google website was blocked in some parts of mainland China. Visitors to the forum had searched for information on sensitive topics such as the 1989 Tiananmen massacre.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 1/11: 112.]

Tibet

In September 2008, popular Tibetan singer Tashi Dhondup ([1980]–) was detained for releasing “counter-revolutionary” songs, such as “The Year of 1959” (the year of the Uprising in Lhasa and the Dalai Lama’s flight into exile) and “The Terror of 1958–2008.” He was beaten by police over a seven-day period. In February 2009, he was released. After his music was banned, he went in hiding. In October 2009, he released a new album (called “Torture Without Wounds” or “Scarred Heart”), containing also lyrics about the Dalai Lama, the last five decades of Tibetan history, and about the crackdown on Tibetans after the March 2008 protests. It sold some 5,000 copies in Qinghai Province (the Amdo area) before it was banned. On 3 December 2009, he was arrested in Xining, the capital of Qinghai, for releasing these songs branded “subversive,” “reactionary” and “splittist.” On 5 January 2010, he was sentenced to fifteen months’ “re-education through labor” and sent to his home village in Qinghai.

[Sources: Free Tibet, “Current Prisoners: Tashi Dhondup” (s.d); Index on Censorship, 3/10: 150–155, 177.]

Xinjiang

The Urumqi riots of July 2009—the most lethal episode of ethnic unrest in recent Chinese history—continued to cast a shadow over developments in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region. The government did not account for hundreds of persons detained after the riots, nor investigated serious allegations of torture and ill-treatment of detainees that surfaced in testimonies of refugees and relatives living outside China. The few publicized trials of suspected rioters were marred by restrictions on legal representation, overt politicization of the judiciary, failure to publish notification of the trials, and failure to hold genuinely open trials as mandated by law.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 313.]

A few days after ethnic riots erupted in Xinjiang on 5 July 2009, Tursunjan Hezim ([1973–]), a former high school history teacher and owner of the popular Uyghur-language website called Bilik or Orkhun (2006–2009), was arrested and held incommunicado. The website (named after the homeland of ethnic Uyghurs’ Turkic ancestors), which had published mostly scholarly articles about Uyghur culture and history, was closed down. Following a secret trial in a district court in Aksu (Xinjiang), Hezim was sentenced to seven years’ imprisonment on unknown charges in July 2010. The news of the sentence became known in March 2011 only. Hezim’s whereabouts were unknown. From 1991 to 1996, Hezim had studied in the history department of Xinjiang University. After graduation, he had returned to his hometown of Aksu where he taught history at an Uyghur-language high school. The school director, however, reportedly banned him from teaching history in 2006 and demoted him to school doorman. Hezim published several articles on Uyghur history and local regional history.

[Sources: “Uyghur Historian Given 7 Years,” Radio Free Asia (6 March 2011); Committee to Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (11 March 2011).]

See also Myanmar, Spain.

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The Justice and Peace process continued to fall short of international standards on victims' rights to truth, justice and reparation, although some truths about human rights violations did emerge. Through the process, which began in 2005, around 10 per cent of the more than 30,000 paramilitaries who supposedly demobilized qualified for reduced prison sentences in return for laying down their arms, confessing to human rights abuses and returning stolen lands. The rest received de facto amnesties. However, in November 2010, the Constitutional Court rejected a law, passed in 2009, which would have confirmed such amnesties for 19,000 of these paramilitaries, arguing that it ran counter to the right to truth, justice and reparation. In December 2010, Congress passed a law again granting de facto amnesties to these paramilitaries in return for them signing an Agreement to Contribute to the Historic Truth and Reparation. In recent years, the army was blamed for an alarming number of extrajudicial killings of civilians, including extrajudicial executions known as "false positives," when army members, pressured to show results, killed civilians and reported them as combatants killed in action. The alleged executions occurred throughout Colombia and involved multiple army brigades. The problem continued despite a significant drop in false positives since 2009. The government did not keep statistics for such cases, but as of May 2010, the Attorney General's Office was investigating 1,366 cases of alleged extrajudicial killings committed by state agents involving more than 2,300 victims. There were only convictions in 63 cases. The military justice system's resistance to transferring cases to ordinary civilian courts impeded prosecution of extrajudicial killings.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 109, Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 229–230.]

In May 2010, the Supreme Court of Justice ruled that former Congressman César Pérez García should be prosecuted in connection with a 1988 massacre in Segovia by paramilitaries in which more than 40 peasant farmers were killed. The Court argued that the massacre amounted to crimes against humanity and was, therefore, not subject to the statute of limitations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 16.]

On 8 June 2010, retired Colonel Luis Alfonso Plazas Vega was sentenced to thirty years' imprisonment for the enforced disappearance of eleven people in November 1985, after military forces stormed the Palace of Justice where people were being held hostage by members of the M-19 guerrilla group. Plazas Vega appealed against the sentence. The presiding judge left the country after the ruling following threats.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 15, 109.]

When in the summer of 2010 historian and anthropologist Diana Marcela Gómez Correal (1978–), living in the United States, temporarily returned to Colombia to do Ph.D. fieldwork among human rights activists, she received death threats.

[Source: Diana Gómez, personal communication (August 2010).]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2010, proceedings continued before the International Criminal Court (ICC) against Thomas Lubanga, charged with recruiting and using children under the age of fifteen for the armed group Union des Patriotes Congolais in Ituri. In July 2010, the trial nearly collapsed when the Prosecutor refused to comply with a ruling by ICC judges to disclose the identity of an intermediary to defense lawyers. In October 2010, the appeal chamber ruled that the trial could continue.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 126.]

On 1 October 2010, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights published its report of a human rights mapping exercise in Congo, which documented 617 incidents of serious violations of international humanitarian law between 1993 and 2003. The report described the role of the main Congolese and foreign parties responsible—including military or armed groups from Rwanda, Uganda, Burundi, and Angola—and suggested options to pursue justice for the crimes, including the proposed establishment of a mixed chamber in Congo with Congolese and international judges. It raised hopes of justice for crimes under international and national law for thousands of victims and human rights defenders. While not binding under Congolese law, it amplified the obligation of the government to investigate the violations, bring those responsible to justice, and ensure victims received effective reparation. The Congolese government welcomed the report and said it would support the option of a mixed chamber. Criticism of the report by countries including Rwanda and Uganda, named in the report as perpetrators of human rights violations, reflected unwillingness to hold those responsible to account.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 3, 126, 274; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 110.]

On 17 November 2009, the president of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), Ignace Murwanashyaka, and his deputy, Straton Musoni, were arrested in Germany by the German police for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed by FDLR troops under their command in eastern Congo. Another FDLR leader, Callixte Mbarushimana, the Rwandan executive secretary of the FDLR, was arrested in France by French police in October 2010, under an arrest warrant issued by the International Criminal Court for similar crimes. France had granted him refugee status in 2003 and French prosecuting authorities had declined to open criminal investigations into earlier allegations of his involvement in the 1994 genocide. In November 2010, his surrender to the ICC was ordered by the Paris Appeal Court. In Congo itself, the government increased military prosecutions against soldiers accused of human rights violations, including crimes of sexual violence, although the majority of those prosecuted held junior ranks. In one notable exception, following pressure from the United Nations (UN) Security Council and human rights organizations, judicial authorities in Kinshasa arrested General Jerome Kakwavu in April 2010 on 110 war crimes charges for rape and torture. Kakwavu is the first general arrested on rape charges in Congo's history.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 276; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 108, 110, 154.]

See also Central African Republic, Rwanda.

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In November 2010, the Republic of Congo withdrew a case against France that it had lodged with the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in 2002. Congo had asked the ICJ to nullify a case against President Denis Sassou-Nguesso and other senior government officials in a French court in connection with the disappearance in 1999 of more than 350 Congolese nationals after their return from the Democratic Republic of Congo. In 2005, a Congolese court had found the Congolese government responsible for many of the disappearances but acquitted all security and government officials on trial. By the end of 2010, there had been no inquiry to establish the identities of those who had ordered, carried out or condoned the disappearances.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 113.]

COSTA RICA

Last Annual Report entry: —.

See Guatemala.

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Progress prosecuting crimes committed during the 1991–1995 war continued to be slow. The political will to implement justice system reforms and tackle impunity, including for ethnic bias in prosecutions, was still largely missing. Allegations pointing to command responsibility for war crimes against several high-profile political and military leaders remained uninvestigated. The capacity of the justice system to prosecute war crimes remained low. On average, fewer than 18 cases were completed each year. Hundreds of cases, especially those in which the victims were Croatian Serbs and those allegedly responsible were members of the Croatian Army and police forces, remained unaddressed. The political will to implement justice system reforms and tackle impunity was largely missing. The authorities failed to provide victims of war crimes and their families with access to reparation. In June 2010, the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights urged the authorities to take effective measures to ensure that war crimes cases were prosecuted in an unbiased manner, independent of the alleged perpetrator's ethnic or other background and in accordance with the general prohibition of discrimination. In November 2010, the European Commission, in its progress report on Croatia, observed that impunity for war crimes remained a problem, especially when victims were ethnic Serbs and alleged perpetrators were members of the Croatian Army. In the first nine months of 2010, the authorities issued war crimes indictments against 25 individuals, 11 of whom were Serbs. But Serbs remained the majority of defendants in domestic war crimes prosecutions. Ten trials, involving 13 Serb and 5 other defendants were completed in the same period, 16 of whom were convicted. Another 17 trials involving 29 Serbs and 14 Croats were still ongoing. In absentia war crimes trials remained a problem, with 23 Serbs and 7 others not present to defend themselves.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 37–38, 116–117; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 417.]

In 2010, Prime Minister Jadranka Kosor apologized to families and victims of the Srebrenica massacres in July 1995—while falling short of referring to them as genocide.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 37.]

In September 2010, the trial of retired Generals Ante Gotovina, Ivan Čermak and Mladen Markač at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) for war crimes and crimes against humanity against Serbs concluded. They were indicted on nine counts of crimes against humanity and violations of the laws or customs of war allegedly committed against the Serb population in 14 municipalities in the southern part of Croatia during “Operation Storm” in 1995. The judgment was expected to be announced in 2011. At the request of Prime Minister Jadranka Kosor, the government created a task force in October 2009 to search for documents related to the case that the ICTY prosecutor alleged were in the government’s possession. The trial concluded without these documents. Croatian investigations into war crimes committed by members of the Croatian Armed Forces increased in 2010. In September 2010, the Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina enforced a Croatian war crimes conviction and eight-year sentence against former Croatian member of parliament Branimir Glavas, following a request from the Croatian Justice Ministry. Glavas, a Bosnian citizen, fled to Bosnia in May 2009 on the same day he was convicted in the Zagreb district court. Bosnian police arrested him after the court ruling which, barring a successful appeal, would see Glavas serve his sentence in Bosnia.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 117; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 416–417.]

See also Montenegro, Serbia.

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

From 23 to 25 February 2010, more than 100 people were arbitrarily detained across Cuba or placed under house arrest to prevent them participating in memorial services for Orlando Zapata Tamayo, a political prisoner who died that month following an 85-day hunger strike.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 234.]

In 2010, the Damas de Blanco (Ladies in White), an unofficial group of women relatives and friends of individuals who were imprisoned during a major crackdown in March 2003 against political activists, regularly became victims of threats and intimidation by Cuban security officials and government supporters, when they organized peaceful demonstrations and marches for those imprisoned and commemorations for those who died in prison. In 2010, 53 of those arrested in March 2003 continued to be detained.

[Source: Amnesty International, News and Updates (18 & 23 March, 17 August 2010).]

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Negotiations between Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot leaders continued during 2010. In November 2010, both sides agreed to intensify their contacts. The United Nations Committee on Missing Persons in Cyprus continued its work. By the end of December 2010, it had exhumed in total the remains of 767 people.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 120.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2000.

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

DJIBOUTI

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In June 2010, the Truth Commission in charge of investigating human rights violations in 1984–2008 (and created by the Rafael Correa administration) published its final report. The commission documented 118 cases, affecting 456 victims of arbitrary detention, torture, sexual violence, enforced disappearances and killings; it named 458 alleged perpetrators of abuses. According to the commission, few of those responsible for the abuses had been held accountable due to statutes of limitations, jurisdictional disputes, and procedural delays. In October 2010, a team of prosecutors appointed by the attorney general to investigate cases reported by the commission began re-interviewing suspects and witnesses. A draft law guaranteeing the right to reparation to victims of these violations was under discussion at the end of 2010.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 130; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 239.]

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 13 May 2010, submitted to the Islamic Studies Institute two copies of his book Witness to the Muslim Brotherhood, which described the history of the Brotherhood movement and its relationship with Egypt's successive presidents. In September 2010, the institute refused to approve the book at the instigation of the State Security Investigations (SSI), which alleged that it would confuse citizens.

[Source: Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, Ifex Alert (1 October 2010).]

On 28 January 2011, about ten looters broke into the Egyptian Museum in Cairo—housing the world's greatest collection of Pharaonic treasures, including the King Tutankhamen collection—smashing several statues and damaging two mummies. Thirteen display cases were shattered and several broken statues and porcelain figures lay on the floor. Eighteen objects were stolen, including eleven wooden shabti statuettes from Yuya, a statue of Nefertiti, a gilded wooden statue of Pharaoh Tutankhamun ([1341] BCE–[1323] BCE) carried by a goddess and one of his father Pharaoh Achnaton (?–1336/1334 BCE). The latter was found back in February 2011. There were also reports of looted archaeological sites across the country, including at Luxor, Sakkara, and Dakhla.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (1 February 2011), 4; (8 February 2011), 6; (14 February 2011), 6; (18 February 2011), 6; 18; Reuters (28 & 29 January 2011); Wall Street Journal (1 February 2011).]

On the evening of 5 March 2011, protesters stormed the headquarters of the State Security Investigations (SSI) in Cairo in an effort to stop the destruction of files ordered by SSI head, General Hassan Abd al-Rahman. Secret prisons, torture rooms and graveyards, files of political dissidents, lists of informants (some famous) were all captured on camera and uploaded onto the YouTube and Facebook websites. Released files exposed the repression by the Hosni Mubarak regime, including unlawful detentions, kidnappings and disappearances, systematic torture and rape, and inhuman prison conditions (formerly known as “red lines” or taboos).

[Source: Omar Ashour, “History’s Lessons: Dismantling Egypt’s Security Agency,” BBC News (9 March 2011).]

See also China, Libya.

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In January 2010, President Carlos Funes signed into law an Executive Decree creating a new National Search Commission for Disappeared Children to look for children who were forcibly disappeared during the armed conflict (1980–1992). The Decree was a response to a 2005 Inter-American Court of Human Rights’ order in the case of the Serrano Cruz sisters. The two girls were last seen in 1982, aged seven and three, when they were captured by the military. By the end of 2010, however, the new commission was still not operational and the whereabouts of hundreds of disappeared children remained unknown. The 1993 amnesty law, which obstructs efforts to bring to justice those responsible for human rights violations during the internal armed conflict, remained in place, despite public commitments by the government to take steps toward its repeal.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 16, 135.]

ERITREA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ESTONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 4 March 2010, Voice of America reported that its Amharic-language broadcasts were being jammed. On 19 March 2010, the Prime Minister declared that the radio station had been broadcasting “destabilizing propaganda” and compared it to Radio Mille Collines, a Rwandan radio station that incited ethnic hatred before and during the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 141.]

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

FINLAND

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In June 2010, François Bazaramba, a Rwandan national residing in Finland, was sentenced to life imprisonment by the District Court of Itä-Uusimaa for committing genocide in Rwanda in 1994. During the proceedings, allegations were made that several witness testimonies had been obtained directly as a result of torture by the Rwandan authorities. The court determined that, to ensure a fair trial, it would disregard the testimony of two witnesses, after finding that it was likely that their evidence had been obtained through torture or other ill-treatment. The judgment was appealed and proceedings were ongoing at the end of 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 144.]

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 5 March 2009, Karoline Postel-Vinay, specialist of Japan and senior research fellow at the Fondation nationale des sciences politiques Center for International Studies and Research, Paris, was summoned to court at the request of the “Fondation Franco-Japonaise dite Sasakawa” (FFJDS; French Sasakawa Foundation, established 1990). FFJDS sued her for libel because it alleged that five statements contained in an email with the subject line “Sasakawa, a war criminal to celebrate 150 years of Franco-Japanese Diplomacy?” and an attached memorandum entitled “Memorandum—Ryōichi Sasakawa (1899–1995), the Sasakawa Empire and the Sasakawa Foundation,” sent on 16 December 2008 to scholars, various public figures and institutions, as well as to French and foreign media organizations, constituted acts of malicious defamation. In December 2008, Postel-Vinay had joined some sixty other colleagues in signing a petition addressed to the Foreign Minister, Bernard Kouchner, asking him to withdraw his support from an event celebrating the 150th anniversary of Franco-Japanese diplomatic relations that was mainly financed by FFJDS. According to the petitioners, several historical works mentioned that Sasakawa had been a figure of Japanese fascism who in 1945 was arrested and charged with crimes against peace as a class A war criminal by the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers; he was not tried by the International Military Tribunal for the Far East although the charges were never dropped. As a result, the foreign ministry withdrew from the event. On 22 September 2010, Postel-Vinay was acquitted after examination of her good faith according to four criteria: proof that her purpose was legitimate, that it was devoid of personal animosity, that she had made a serious investigation and that she had adopted a cautious manner of expression.

[Sources: Paris District Court, Fondation Franco-Japonaise dite Sasakawa versus Karoline Postel-Vinay: Judgment (22 September 2010; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/184.pdf>); Karoline Postel-Vinay & Mark Selden, "History on Trial: French Nippon Foundation Sues Scholar for Libel to Protect the Honor of Sasakawa Ryōichi," The Asia-Pacific Journal (26 April 2010); "Pour la liberté de la recherche: Les chercheurs et enseignants-chercheurs titulaires et associés de Sciences Po expriment leur solidarité avec leur collègue Karoline Postel-Vinay" (Paris [2010]).]

In [July] 2010, Jewish history teacher ([1952–]) was suspended for four months for breaching the principles of secularism and neutrality after the education ministry concluded in a report that she was teaching "too much" about the Holocaust and spending too much time organizing trips for her students at a Nancy lyceum to Nazi death camps in Poland and the Czech Republic.

[Sources: Haaretz (1 September 2010); Libération (1 September 2010).]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic), Rwanda.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2010, none of the sides to the conflict of August 2008 between Russia and Georgia conducted comprehensive investigations, in spite of a report by an international fact-finding mission commissioned by the European Union (EU) in 2009 which confirmed that violations of international human rights and humanitarian law had been committed by Georgian, Russian and South Ossetian forces. In September 2010, the Council of Europe Human Rights Commissioner reported “serious shortcomings” by all sides in the process of clarifying the fate of people missing since the war; he called for the release of the remaining people detained in Tskhinvali, South Ossetia, during and after the conflict in South Ossetia as their health was reportedly deteriorating. The EU Monitoring Mission, the only international monitor with a conflict-related mandate, was denied access to Abkhazia and South Ossetia by the de facto authorities. The Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court—to which Georgia is a party—continued with its preliminary examination of the situation and sent delegations to Russia in March 2010 and to Georgia in June 2010 to obtain additional information on domestic proceedings. Some 20,000 ethnic Georgians from South Ossetia remain displaced.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 38, 148–149; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 439–440.]

See also Russia.

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In early September 2010, the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND; the German foreign intelligence agency overseen by Chancellor Angela Merkel’s office) handed over 2,400 of some estimated 3,400 pages on top Nazi Adolf Eichmann (1906–62; one of the main organizers of the Holocaust), with much of the information blacked out, but Gabriele Weber, a German freelance reporter based in Argentina, sued the BND for the second time (see NCH Annual Report 2010) for greater access. Critics said that important reasons for the obstruction were fear for disclosure of names of former West German politicians with a Nazi past and fear for disclosure of hitherto unknown levels of collusion between the West German government and former Nazis who after the war fled overseas to escape prosecution and often lived comfortably in exile in Argentina and other South American countries. Pressure on the BND to release its old files on Nazi fugitives had increased after the Central Intelligence Agency declassified many documents relating to Nazi war crimes in 2005 and 2006. The curators of the Topography of Terror Documentation Center in Berlin, Lisa Hauff and Ulrich Baumann, did not gain access to the files to prepare their exhibition about Eichmann (April–September 2011). In January 2011, however, a BND document obtained by the German mass-circulation daily Bild, showed that the BND knew Eichmann's location as early as 1952 (eight years before his capture in Buenos Aires by Israeli agents in 1960; Eichmann was put on trial in Israel, found guilty of crimes against humanity, and hanged in 1962). In August 2010, Weber was sent back to Buenos Aires after arriving in Washington to do research at the National Archives. A new application for a special journalism visa was rejected in January 2011; Weber's appeal was rejected on 18 March 2011.

[Sources: "Fight over Eichmann Files Back to German court" (Associated Press; 7 September 2010); Keesings Historisch Archief (2010), 552–553; Spiegel Online (11 March 2010; 3 May 2010; 10 January 2011).]

In May 2011, Silvana Koch-Mehrin (1971–), politician of the Free Democrat Party and vice-president of the European Parliament (EP), was accused of having plagiarized substantial parts of her 1998 doctoral thesis about economic history written at the University of Heidelberg and entitled "Historical Currency Union" (about the currency union between France, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland and Greece in the late nineteenth century). The Heidelberg public prosecutor's office announced that she had no legal action to fear because prosecution of copyright infringement was limited to five years. However, the university intended to investigate the matter. Koch-Mehrin resigned as EP vice-president.

[Sources: Michael Gardner, "Top Euro Politician Accused of Plagiarism," University World News (8 May 2011); NRC Handelsblad (12 May 2011).]

See also China, Congo (Democratic Republic), Indonesia, Iran, Turkey, United States.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Excessive use of force against peaceful protesters was reported during the commemorative demonstration of the second anniversary of the death of 15-year-old Alexandros Gregoropoulos on 6 December 2008. According to reports, some riot police officers beat and injured a photojournalist and a photographer covering the events.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 38, 148–149.]

See also Macedonia.

GRENADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Guatemala continued to suffer the effects of the 36-year civil war (1960–1996). In 1999, a United Nations-sponsored Commission on Historical Clarification (CEH) had estimated that as many as 200,000 people had been killed during the conflict. The CEH attributed 93 per cent of the human rights abuses it documented to state security forces and concluded that the military had carried out “acts of genocide.” Very few of those responsible for the grave human rights violations during the civil war have been held accountable. Of the 626 massacres documented by the commission, only three cases were successfully prosecuted in Guatemalan courts. Guatemala’s first conviction for the crime of enforced disappearance occurred in August 2009, when an ex-paramilitary leader was sentenced to 150 years’ imprisonment for his role in “disappearing” individuals between 1982 and 1984. The verdict was made possible by a landmark ruling by the Constitutional Court in July 2009, which established that enforced disappearance was a continuing crime not subject to a statute of limitations so long as the fate of the victims was still unknown. The July 2005 discovery of approximately 80 million documents of the disbanded National Police, including files on Guatemalans who were killed or “disappeared” during the conflict, could play a key role in prosecuting past human rights abuses. Documents in the archive led to the March 2009 arrest of two former National Police agents for their alleged participation in the 1984 “disappearance” of student leader and activist Edgar Fernando García. In September 2008, Congress passed the Law of Access to Public Information, which ordered that “in no circumstances can information related to investigations of violations of fundamental human rights or crimes against humanity” be classified as confidential or reserved. In March 2009 President Álvaro Colom created the Military Archive Declassification Commission, tasked with sorting and declassifying military documents from 1954–1996. The case against former President General Efraín Ríos Montt and other military and police leaders of the early 1980s for grave human rights violations remained stalled, however, because the Ministry of Defense failed to hand over documents, despite being ordered to do so by a court.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 155, 156; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 244–245.]

In September 2007 the United Nations (UN) secretary-general had appointed Carlos Castresana, a Spanish former prosecutor and judge, to lead the newly-founded Comisión internacional contra la impunidad en Guatemala (CICIG; International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala). The commission’s mandate allowed it to work with the Attorney General’s Office, the police, and other government agencies to investigate, prosecute, and dismantle the criminal organizations operating in Guatemala. As of September 2010, the commission undertook 56 investigations and participated in 11 prosecutions. CICIG helped to improve the witness protection program and purge 1,700 officers from the National Civilian Police. Originally set to expire in 2009, its mandate was extended by Congress for another two years until the end of 2011. However, on 7 June 2010, Castresana abruptly resigned, citing lack of cooperation from several high ranking government officials, including the then-attorney general, whom he alleged had links to organized crime. Three days later, the Constitutional Court annulled the selection process and an interim attorney general was appointed, pending a new selection process. The UN appointed Francisco Dall’Anese—Costa Rica’s former attorney general—as CICIG’s new head. The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights had maintained an office in Guatemala since 2005. In June 2010 James Anaya, UN Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of Indigenous People, visited Guatemala to investigate alleged human rights violations affecting the country’s indigenous people. He concluded that the right to previous consultation, according to which indigenous people were entitled to be consulted before any commercial enterprise occurred in their territory, was not being adequately protected.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 155; Human Rights Watch, World

Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 246–247.]

GUINEA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In December 2008, Captain Moussa Dadis Camara took power in a coup after the death of Lansana Conté, Guinea's authoritarian president for 24 years. Throughout 2009 the military violently suppressed the opposition, culminating in a large-scale massacre of some 150 demonstrators on 28 September 2009 in the capital, Conakry. In December 2009, Camara was removed following an assassination attempt against him, and his deputy, the more moderate General Sékouba Konaté, took over, committing to move the country toward democratic elections. In January 2010, Camara formally handed over power to Konaté, under considerable pressure from international actors, by way of an agreement signed in the Burkinabé capital Ouagadougou, which called for the formation of a transitional government of national unity; an ad hoc parliamentary body comprised of members of civil society, political parties, the security forces, and religious bodies; and democratic elections within six months. Despite the many problems, both domestic and international election observers concluded that the elections were generally free and fair.

In December 2009, the International Commission of Inquiry led by the United Nations delivered its report, but it had not been officially made public by the end of 2010. It confirmed the killing of at least 156 people and the rape of over 100, and concluding that the crimes perpetrated in Conakry on 28 September 2009, rose to the level of crimes against humanity. The inquiry identified several military officers, including Camara, as bearing direct individual criminal responsibility for the crimes. This contradicted the government's National Commission of Inquiry, which in its report in February 2010, which absolved Camara, laid blame solely on his then-aide de camp Lieutenant Abubakar "Toumba" Diakité and the soldiers he commanded, and set the number of dead at 63. The commission acknowledged that demonstrators had faced violent repression by members of the security forces, but blamed the "excited crowd" as well as the lack of equipment and co-ordination of security forces. It accused civil society organizations of spreading "far-fetched figures regarding the number of deaths, rapes and disappearances." Regarding sexual violence, the report noted that no female victim of rape came to testify before the commission, and that it therefore relied only on medical records. The commission named Diakité, the man who allegedly attempted to kill Camara, and his unit of "red berets," as responsible for the violence. It called for them to be tried before Guinean courts. It recommended a general amnesty for misconduct by leaders of the former opposition, now in government. It stated that political leaders, in refusing to cancel the demonstration after it had been forbidden by the authorities, shared some responsibility for the events. It also stated that demonstrators committed acts of robbery, looting, and destruction of public and private property.

In October 2009, the International Criminal Court (ICC) confirmed that Guinea was under preliminary examination and visited the country in February, May, and November 2010 to assess progress made in national investigations. In February 2010, the ICC Deputy Prosecutor said that those bearing responsibility for the crimes should not go unpunished and that the violators should be tried either by the Guinean authorities or by the ICC. She added that crimes against humanity were committed on 28 September 2009 and in its aftermath and that the ICC should continue with its preliminary investigation. The Guinean authorities took no steps to suspend or prosecute violators of human rights.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 156–157; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 127–128, 130, 132.]

In 2011, the under-exposed atrocities committed since independence (1958–2011), notably during the reign of Ahmed Sékou Touré (1958–84), were called “Guinea’s memory problem” and served as a motive to call for a truth-telling mechanism. Members of the Guinean Camp Boiro Victims’ Association noted that there was no monument to the victims, no official recognition, and no report.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “We Have Lived in Darkness”: A Human Rights Agenda for Guinea’s New Government (Washington 2011), 31–33.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: 1999.

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: 1997.

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In January 2010, seven months after a military coup ousted democratically elected President Manuel Zelaya, President Porfirio Lobo took office. The Lobo administration created a truth commission to look into the events surrounding Zelaya's ouster. But Honduras was failing to hold accountable those responsible for the widespread human rights violations committed by the de facto government of Roberto Micheletti installed after the coup (June 2009–January 2010). Following the military coup in June 2009, the de facto government suspended key civil liberties, including freedoms of the press and assembly. In the ensuing days the military occupied opposition media outlets, temporarily shutting down their transmissions. Police and military personnel responded to generally peaceful demonstrations with excessive force. This pattern of the disproportionate use of force led to several deaths, scores of injuries, and thousands of arbitrary detentions. In 2010, the human rights unit in the Attorney General's Office was investigating approximately 200 cases of alleged abuses committed by security officials since the coup, many of which involved multiple victims. In late 2010, it had filed charges in twenty cases. In eight, the defendants were acquitted, leaving many acts committed by security forces after the coup unaccounted for. Most of the others remained pending before the courts, some of them stalled because the defendants were at large. The human rights unit's progress on these cases was hindered by its limited resources and by the government's failure to allocate funds to the existing witness protection program. The unit had to rely on an investigative police force institutionally tied to the Ministry of Security, an arrangement that could affect the impartiality and thoroughness of the investigations. Security forces obstructed investigations of abuses committed after the coup. Under the de facto government, military and police personnel had systematically refused to cooperate with investigators. They had failed to turn over firearms for ballistics tests, to respond to information requests to identify officers accused of committing abuses, and to grant access to military installations. The situation improved somewhat under Lobo, but the prior lack of cooperation had a lasting impact on the investigations. In October 2010, the Honduran Congress approved an increased budget for the unit only for 2011. In November 2010, the International Criminal Court Chief Prosecutor announced that preliminary investigations would be opened into reports of widespread and systematic human rights violations under the de facto government.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 163; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 252–253.]

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In December 2010, Bence Rétvári, the parliamentary secretary at the Ministry of Public Administration and Justice, made an announcement regarding the files of the Hungarian secret police, interior ministry and state security of the Communist era (1948–1989), currently available to professional researchers at the Historical Archives of Hungarian State Security, Budapest, and regarding a separate collection of unreleased data on over 50,000 communist state security officers, encrypted on magnetic tape. He reportedly declared “A constitutional state cannot preserve personal information collected through unconstitutional means, because these are the immoral documents of an immoral regime.” A new law, to be introduced by November 2011, would allow citizens who were spied on by the secret police and government officials to remove and destroy the original documents of which they had been the subject. As copies would not be kept of these original documents, researchers and future generations would no longer have access to tens of thousands of files. The law would replace a 2003 law allowing access to and copying of documents for the persons observed.

[Sources: Christopher Adam, “Hungary Erases the Past and Whitewashes the Future,” National Post (Toronto; 13 January 2011); <http://www.ipetitions.com/petition/hungarianarchives>; Jan Petter Myklebust, “Hungary: Historians Resist Return of Spy Files” (University World News; 27 February 2011).]

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 9 July 2010, the Supreme Court refused the plea of Maharashtra government to ban Shivaji: Hindu King in Islamic India (Oxford 2003), a book about Maratha King Shivaji (1627–1980) by American scholar James Laine, professor of religious studies at Macalester College, St. Paul, Minnesota, for allegedly promoting social enmity, thereby upholding a 2007 decision of the Bombay High Court. (See NCH Annual Report 2004.)

[Source: Times of India (9 July 2010).]

The government had yet to prosecute those responsible for the mass killings of Sikhs that followed the 1984 assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by her Sikh bodyguards (itself following mob attacks on Sikh separatists at the Golden Temple in Amritsar organized with the complicity of senior members of Gandhi's then-ruling Congress party, leaving an estimated 3,000 Sikhs killed). In September 2010, the Supreme Court directed the trial of Congress Party leader Sajjan Kumar to proceed. In April 2010, the case against another former Congress Party leader, Jagdish Tytler, was closed by a Delhi court. Both men were accused of inciting their supporters to commit the 1984 mass killings of Sikhs. In January 2011, two new mass graves related to the massacre were discovered in northern Haryana state. The Haryana state government established a judicial commission to look into the graves, but successive government-appointed commissions had failed to ensure the prosecution of those responsible for instigating the 1984 riots.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 168; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 317; Human Rights Watch, "India: Bring Charges for Newly Discovered Massacre of Sikhs" (25 April 2011).]

On 30 September 2010, the Allahabad High Court ruled in a majority verdict that the disputed holy site of Ayodhya should be split between Hindus and Muslims. It said that the site was Rama's birthplace, that the Archaeological Survey of India had proved that the site had contained a massive Hindu religious structure, and that the mosque which stood on the place until December 1992, was constructed by Babur (1483–1531) against the tenets of Islam and therefore could not have the character of a mosque. The judges gave control of the main disputed section, where the mosque was torn down in 1992, to Hindus. Both parties planned to appeal the verdict. (See previous NCH Annual Reports.)

[Sources: BBC News (30 September 2010); NRC Handelsblad (30 September 2010: 6; 1 October 2010: 8).]

Gujarat

Cases against some of those responsible for the 2002 attacks against Muslim minorities in Gujarat, in which about 2,000 people were killed, made little progress. Proceedings were marred by the authorities' openly hostile attitude toward witnesses, the investigating agencies' refusal to examine crucial evidence including official telephone records, and the destruction of evidence linking key political leaders to the violence.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 168.]

On 30 March 2011, the government of Gujarat banned Great Soul: Mahatma Gandhi and His Struggle with India (New York 2010), a biography by Pulitzer-winning author Joseph Lelyveld ([1937]–), a former journalist for the New York Times. The announcement was made by Chief Minister Narendra Modi in the Assembly; the opposition Congress supported the decision. Gandhi was born in Gujarat. The book—which contained critical passages about Gandhi's racial bias toward Black Africans (during his time in South Africa), his sexual life (including a homo-erotic relationship), his political opinions (including about topics such as Muslims, untouchability, and Nazism), his social opinions (including about birth control) and his occasional interpersonal cruelty—was deemed defamatory. Modi said that it should be banned across India; he demanded a public apology from Lelyveld. The Law Ministry had reportedly been asked to suggest amendment to the Prevention of Insults to National Honour Act (1971), so as to make actions or gestures showing disrespect to Gandhi an offence. Union Law Minister Veerappa Moily declared: "We can't allow anybody to draw adverse inferences about historical figures and denigrate them. Otherwise history will not forgive us. That is why the need is being felt to amend the Act." In 2009, the Supreme Court had turned down a plea to make it mandatory for people to show respect to Gandhi.

[Sources: Hindustan Times (1 April 2011); Indian Express (31 March 2011); Andrew Roberts, "Among the Hagiographers," Wall Street Journal (26 March 2011); Times of India (30 March 2011).]

Kashmir

Impunity for past violations in Kashmir, including the disappearance of thousands of people since 1989 during the armed conflict, continued. Official inquiries into some of the violations made slow or little progress. Between June and September 2010, the police and security forces fired at protesters during pro-Independence protests demanding accountability for past violations in the Kashmir valley.

More than 100 people, mostly youths, were killed and 800 others, including media workers, were injured. An inquiry, instituted by the state authorities and covering only 17 of the 100 deaths, made little progress.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 169.]

In late October 2010, the Delhi home of Booker Prize-winning author Arundhati Roy (1961–) was surrounded by around 150 members of the Bharatiya Janata Party's (BJP) women's faction. The protestors demanded that Roy leave India or withdraw her statement done on a 24 October 2010 seminar in Delhi named Azadi: The Only Way ("azadi" means freedom). Roy had said: "Kashmir has never been an integral part of India. It is a historical fact." On 27 November 2010, a New Delhi court ordered to investigate accusations of separatism and anti-Indian statements.

[Sources: Article 19, Artist Alert (October 2010); NRC Handelsblad (29 October 2010).]

In 2011, a report suggested that the state systematically discouraged historical research at Kashmiri universities about the decades of insurgency in Kashmir (1989–), in which some 43,000 people lost their lives. Critics said that the government called such research "anti-national" as it had been embarrassed by university research papers, which had blamed the Indian army for gross human rights violations in Kashmir.

[Source: Haroon Mirani, "India: Academic Dissent Stifled in Kashmir," University World News (1 May 2011).]

Orissa

In a positive development, a legislator from the ultra-nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party was convicted in June 2010 for his role in violence against Christians in Orissa in 2008 that left at least 40 people dead and thousands displaced when a Hindu mob attacked Christians. In August 2010, 16 others were sentenced to three years in prison for their role in the violence.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 317.]

Punjab / Assam

Perpetrators of enforced disappearances, extrajudicial executions and other human rights violations in Punjab in 1984–1994, and Assam in 1998–2001, continued to evade justice.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 168.]

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Indonesia still did not credibly investigate most allegations of serious human rights abuse by security forces. Despite parliament's recommendation in September 2009, President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono failed in 2010 to authorize an ad hoc court to investigate the 1997–1998 enforced disappearances of student activists. In January 2010, he even appointed Major General Sjafrie Sjamsjoeddin, implicated in the 1997–1998 student disappearances and in serious human rights abuses in East Timor, to the position of deputy defense minister. Of 18 Kopassus (Indonesian Special Forces) personnel convicted of human rights abuse since 1999, at least 11 continue to serve in the military.

Impunity for past gross human rights violations in Aceh, Papua, Timor-Leste and elsewhere continued. The government continued to promote reconciliation with Timor-Leste at the expense of justice for crimes during the Indonesian occupation of East Timor (1975–1999). Most past human rights violations against human rights defenders, including torture, murder and enforced disappearances, remained unsolved and those responsible were not brought to justice. In 2009, Parliament recommended that an ad hoc human rights court be created to try those responsible for enforced disappearances in 1997–1998. However, the government had not acted on the recommendations by the end of 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 171.]

Yusuf Sapakoly, 52, died of kidney failure in a hospital in Ambon, Maluku province, after being refused access to adequate medical assistance by prison authorities. The father of four was arrested in 2007 for assisting a group of peaceful political activists who unfurled the “Benang Raja” flag, a symbol of South Maluku independence, in front of President Yudhoyono. In July 2010, prisoner of conscience Yusak Pakage, sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, was released following a Presidential Decree. However, Filep Karma who was arrested at the same time and sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment, remained in prison. The two men were convicted in 2005 for raising the “Morning Star” flag.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 170–171.]

From 18 until 21 January 2011, the Cultural Center Goethe Institut organized a conference about the aborted “Communist” coup of 1965 in Indonesia. It requested police protection against radical groups, including the Islam Defenders Front (FPI), after rumors that FPI members would mob the Goethe Institut building and after dozens of people who called themselves members of the Youth Islamic Movement (GPI) staged a rally in front of the building, calling for the conference to be called off. Protesters carried banner denouncing the defunct Indonesian Communist Party.

[Source: Jakarta Post (19 January 2011).]

In August 2010, Indonesian police arrested 21 individuals for planning to float pro-independence flags attached to balloons during a visit to the Moluccas by President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. Police subjected them to severe beatings.

[Sources: AI, “Indonesia: Case sheet: The Jayapura Flag-raisers” (February 2005); Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (19 November 2009); Human Rights Watch, “Hellman/Hammett Grants Honor 42 Writers for Courage Facing Political Persecution” (4 August 2010); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 321.]

On 6 August 2010, the Jakarta State Administrative Court upheld the ban, agreeing with LSF that Balibo could “reopen old wounds” and that LSF had fulfilled required administrative procedures to ban it.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (7 December 2009); Human Rights Watch, World Report 1998 (Washington 1997) 314; International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Alert (10 August 2010); Ifex Communiqué (6 & 14 February 2007); “Indonesia: Historical Books and Films Banned” (<http://www.freewordonline.com>; 2010); International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Alert (10 March 2010); Index on Censorship, 6/00: 173; 2/07: 194; 4/09: 147.]

On 13 October 2010, the Constitutional Court ruled that the 1963 law which allowed the Attorney General to ban books was unconstitutional. All requests to ban books had to be approved by a court.

[Sources: Article 19, “Indonesia: Constitutional Court Reverses Book Ban Ruling” (14 October 2010); Irwin Firdaus, “Indonesia Revokes Book-Ban Law from Suharto Days” (Associated Press, 14 October 2010).]

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 7 May 2009, Fatemeh Masjedi, a historian holding a MA in history from the University of Illinois and with a job offer for a PhD in history at the Free University Berlin, and Maryam Bidgoli were arrested. Both women—members of the One Million Signatures Campaign (also known as the Campaign for Equality), a grassroots movement launched in 2006—had peacefully collected signatures for a petition demanding an end to discrimination against women in Iran. After two weeks in detention they were released, pending further investigation. On 29 August 2010, a Revolutionary Court in Qom sentenced them to one year's imprisonment for "spreading propaganda against the system," reduced to six months by the provincial appeal court. On 29 December 2010, they were summoned to report within three days to begin serving the sentence. However, they remained free pending further legal challenges against their convictions and sentences. Among the reasons for the sentence was the fact that the two women had "signed a letter complaining about the situation of human rights in Iran, and stating that Iran's candidacy for a seat on the Commission on the Status of Women had no merit and that the presence of Iran on this Commission would be a threat to world peace and security." The verdict also referred to an interview given by Bidgoli to the opposition website Jaras, and a statement signed by 600 members of the women's movement on the occasion of 12 June (the anniversary of a demonstration against legal discrimination against women).

[Amnesty International, Urgent Action (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/CA/63.pdf>; 7 January 2011); Ulrike Freitag, personal communication (10 January 2011).]

In December 2009, after years under house arrest and government monitoring, Grand Ayatollah Hossein-Ali Montazeri died. Security forces arrested scores of mourners who attended his funeral.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 524.]

In 2010, the government initiated an aggressive campaign to "islamicize" universities, in part by forcibly retiring professors in the social sciences. The government relied on plainclothes security forces and the Basij, a state-sponsored paramilitary force, to target Shi'a clerics critical of the government.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 524.]

In [late February 2011], the University Security Unit of Payame Noor University in Mashhad requested the faculty of arts not to assign courses at the beginning of the new term to history lecturer

Seyed Hossein Javdani. Javdani declared that this de facto dismissal, of which he had not been directly informed, was connected to articles he wrote and published on various websites before and after the June 2009 presidential elections (mostly about the Green movement that staged protests after these elections) and had nothing to do with his lectureship since he never mentioned national politics in his classes. He also stated that his membership of the Central Council of Khorasan's Tahkim-e Vahdat Alumni Association (Advar) branch was not related to his lectureship. Javdani had been threatened with dismissal in the middle of last term as well. Following his dismissal, he tried to fight the decision but he was ignored by the University Security Unit, which reportedly experienced external pressure from the Intelligence Ministry. Javdani started working in different places on a project basis. As a graduate student, Javdani had been banned for his student activities at Tehran University. At the time, he had been Secretary of Tehran University's Islamic Association of Democracy-Seeking Students.

[Sources: International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran, "Faculty Member Dismissed for Publishing Articles" (7 March 2011); NEAR, "Iranian University Lecturer Banned from Teaching after Publishing Critical Articles" (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/65.pdf>; 16 March 2011).]

See also Argentina.

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

United States (US) forces in Iraq committed serious human rights violations, including killings of civilians. Thousands of classified files were published by Wikileaks. These showed, among other things, that US troops manning security roadblocks had shot dead many Iraqi civilians in previous years and that, contrary to their denials, the US military authorities had sought to keep a count of the number of Iraqi civilians killed in the conflict in Iraq. Revised estimates put the total number of civilian casualties in the conflict in Iraq in 2004–2009 at 66,081.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 178.]

The Supreme Iraqi Criminal Tribunal (SICT) continued to try former senior members of the Ba'ath party as well as military and other officials in the government of Saddam Hussain, toppled in 2003, who were accused of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other grave offences. Trials failed to meet international fair trial standards; the SICT lacked independence and was said by lawyers and judges to be influenced by political interference. In October 2010, two former government ministers—74-year-old Tareq ‘Aziz, the former Foreign Affairs Minister; and Sa’doun Shakir, former Interior Minister—as well as ‘Abed Hamoud, Saddam Hussain’s private secretary, were sentenced to death by the SICT after being convicted of participating in the elimination of Shi’a religious parties.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 178.]

See also Syria, United Kingdom, United States.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In May 2010, Miriam Eliav-Feldon, a professor of history at Tel Aviv University organized a faculty petition drawing more than 150 signatures to protest a speech given by Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, in which he had publicly denounced the academics at the university who supported an academic boycott of Israel. Eliav-Feldon reportedly received insulting e-mails from university donors for organizing the petition. Two reports by right-leaning think-tanks had reportedly accused some professors of undermining traditional Israeli historical narratives about the conflict with the Palestinians and of intimidating students who did not accept that interpretation of events.

[Source: Chronicle of Higher Education (21 August & 4 November 2010).]

On 1 October 2010, the principal of Shaar Hanegev high school, southern Israel, was summoned for a hearing by the education ministry for using an unapproved history textbook that gave the Israeli narrative of Israel’s 1948 founding next to the Palestinian narrative of nakba, with blank space in the middle for students to insert their own thoughts. The ministry reportedly instructed the school to withdraw the book as it had been rejected by the ministry in 2005.

[Sources: Irish Times (1 October 2010); Chronicle of Higher Education (4 November 2010).]

According to a detailed report on impunity published by the Israeli human rights organization

B'Tselem in October 2010, the Israeli military killed 1,510 Palestinians in 2006–2009, (excluding those killed during Operation “Cast Lead”—see below). Of these, 617, including 104 children aged under 18, were not taking part in any hostilities when they were killed. B'Tselem called for an investigation into 288 of the killings committed in 148 incidents, most in the Gaza Strip; investigations were opened in only 22 incidents, most in the West Bank. B'Tselem reported that only four investigations were opened within a month of the incident. In two investigations, the case was closed without any prosecution of the soldiers involved.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 183.]

Although some Israeli military investigations into specific incidents were ongoing, the Israeli authorities still failed to conduct independent investigations into alleged war crimes and other serious violations of international law by Israeli forces during Operation “Cast Lead” that conform with international standards. The United Nations (UN)-mandated Fact-Finding Mission on the conflict (the Goldstone report) found in 2009 that Israeli forces and Palestinian armed groups had both committed war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity. By the end of 2010, only three Israeli soldiers had been convicted in connection with Operation “Cast Lead.” Two of them were found guilty of “unauthorized conduct” for ordering a nine-year-old Palestinian boy, Majed R., to act as a “human shield” by opening bags they believed were booby-trapped. In November 2010, they were demoted and given suspended three-month prison sentences. In January 2010, Israel paid US $10.5 million compensation to the UN for UN buildings damaged during Operation “Cast Lead.” However, no compensation was paid to or on behalf of any of the victims of the attacks. The UN said the payment concluded the financial issues relating to the Operation, even though the Goldstone report had specifically recommended that the UN seek compensation not only for UN personnel and civilians killed or injured in attacks on UN premises, but also for civilian victims of other attacks during the Operation.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 183–184.]

See also Germany, Lebanon, United States.

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The United Nations (UN) Security Council still did not make public the findings of the UN Commission of Inquiry into serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law since September 2002, delivered to the UN secretary-general in November 2004. In 2003 the Ivorian government accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) over serious crimes committed in violation of international law. However, it repeatedly failed to facilitate ICC initiatives to assess national efforts on accountability for such crimes, including to determine whether the ICC should open an investigation there.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 101.]

In 2011, historian Laurent Gbagbo, who had become president of Ivory Coast after controversial elections in October 2000, was deposed amid violent conflict after he had refused to accept that he had lost the presidential elections in late 2010. In February 1982, Gbagbo (1945–), a history lecturer, director at the Institut d'histoire, d'art et d'archéologie africaines, National University of Abidjan (1981–1982), and student-union and teacher-union activist since 1969, had circulated a suppressed speech on democracy and the advantages of a multiparty system that he had intended to deliver. The cancelation of the lecture entitled “Youth and Democracy on the Ivory Coast” sparked off student unrest in February and led to several retaliatory measures by the government against universities and secondary schools. Gbagbo went into self-imposed exile in France for more than six years. In September 1988, he returned and in December 1988, he was summoned to a meeting and reprimanded by President Félix Houphouët-Boigny for unspecified subversive activities. In November 1989, the socialist opposition party Front populaire ivoirien (Ivorian Popular Front) that he had cofounded in 1982, was legalized and challenged Houphouët-Boigny in the October 1990 elections, the first since independence in 1960. In February 1992, he and his wife were arrested with other opposition party leaders because they were held responsible for the riots that had followed anti-government student demonstrations earlier that month. These had been organized because Houphouët-Boigny had refused to accept the findings of a commission of inquiry into a military raid on Yopougon University campus in May 1991. In March 1992, Gbagbo was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for “acts of violence and destruction of public property” despite his parliamentary immunity. In protest, all other opposition members of Parliament resigned. In July 1992, Gbagbo was released after the National Assembly had adopted an amnesty law.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 1993 (London 1993) 104–105; Index on Censorship, 3/82: 45; 5/92: 35; 6/92: 35; 9/92: 43; Derek Jones, ed., Censorship: A World Encyclopedia (London/Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 2001) 587; Keesing's Record of World Events (CD-rom version); Robert Mundt, Historical Dictionary of the Ivory Coast (Metuchen: Scarecrow Press, 1987) 72; NRC Handelsblad (6 April 2011), 11.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In May 2010, the United Nations (UN) High Commissioner for Human Rights visited Japan and called on the government, inter alia, to resolve the “comfort women” issue. During the same month, the UN Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women noted that survivors of sexual crimes “do not want to receive economic compensation without an official apology and official recognition of State responsibility.” She considered the “comfort women” reparation movement one of the most organized and well documented. Councils in 21 Japanese cities or towns adopted resolutions advocating apology and compensation for survivors of the “comfort women” system.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 189.]

See also France.

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

There were two achievements in the efforts against impunity during 2010. In a landmark ruling on 4 February 2010, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights condemned Kenya's government for expelling the Endorois people from their traditional land for tourism. It ruled that the eviction—with minimal compensation—violated the rights of the Endorois as an indigenous people to property, health, culture, religion, and natural resources. It ordered Kenya to compensate and restore them to their historic land. It was the first international tribunal ruling to find a violation of the right to development. In another unprecedented judgment, Kenya's constitutional court awarded US$500,000 compensation to 21 political prisoners who were tortured during the government of former president Daniel arap Moi (1978–2002). The court had previously ruled that this case could not be heard.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 136.]

In March 2010, the International Criminal Court (ICC) decided to investigate crimes against humanity allegedly committed during the post-election violence of 2007–2008. In December 2010, the ICC Prosecutor requested the ICC to issue summonses against six individuals for crimes against humanity alleged to have been committed during the post-election violence. The same month, the parliament passed a motion calling for the executive arm of government to initiate Kenya's withdrawal from the Rome Statute establishing the ICC and for the repeal of the International Crimes Act which incorporates the statute into Kenyan law. The government's formal reaction to the motion was pending at the end of 2010.

While the ICC investigated a limited number of cases, Kenya did not credibly and effectively investigate and prosecute other perpetrators of the post-election violence. Witness protection emerged as a key challenge to investigations. Threats against individuals who witnessed post-election violence, including some who testified before the Commission to Investigate the Post-Election Violence, increased after the prosecutor announced that he would seek to open a Kenya investigation. In May 2010, the president signed into law amendments to the Witness Protection Act, a key step in reforming Kenya's witness protection system. The amendments created a new witness protection agency with increased independence, but resources and time were needed to implement changes.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 3, 194–195; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 133–134, 140.]

The Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC) established in the wake of the post-election violence of 2007–2008 started its operations. By the end of 2010, the TJRC was engaged in a country-wide process of taking statements from possible witnesses. However, its work was constrained by questions over the credibility of the chairperson and lack of funding. In April 2010, the Commission vice-chair resigned, citing allegations that the chairperson had been involved in human rights violations and other issues that might be the subject of the TJRC inquiry. Following a petition in April 2010 by eight of the nine TJRC Commissioners, the Chief Justice appointed a tribunal in October 2010 to investigate the issue. In November 2010, the TJRC chair stepped aside pending the tribunal's report, which was due within six months.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 195.]

Although Kenya was obliged to arrest and surrender to the ICC anyone named in an arrest warrant, in August during celebrations to mark the new constitution the government hosted Sudanese President Omar Al Bashir, against whom the ICC issued arrest warrants for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes in March 2009 and July 2010. Kenya cited a July 2009 decision by the African Union not to cooperate with the ICC in arresting al-Bashir to justify its failure to do so during his visit.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 195; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 133–134, 140.]

See also Sudan.

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In February 1997, Hwang Jang-yop (1923–2010), a former Chairman of the Supreme People's Assembly (1972–1983), went into exile in South Korea. He had been largely responsible for crafting the official Juche ideology (chu-cheism; the spirit of national sovereignty). In this context, he helped delete references to Joseph Stalin from the speeches of former President Kim Il-sung (1912–1994) in the 1940s and early 1950s and he supervised the rewriting of the history of the Korean Workers' Party (KWP, the Communist Party) to aggrandize Kim's founding and leading role of the KWP. Hwang had also been the teacher of Kim Jong-il (the son of Kim Il-Sung and the Supreme Leader of North Korea since 1994) at Kim Il-sung University. In 1960, when Kim Jong-il began his graduate course at this university, a number of historiographical articles praising the juche ideology were published under his name. They were described as heavily distorted versions of Korean history.

[Sources: Leonid Petrov, "North Korean Historiography in Crisis (1956–1967)," in Young-A Cho, ed., Korean Studies at the Dawn of the Millennium: Proceedings of the Second Biannual Conference, Korean Studies Association of Australia (Melbourne 2002), 382; Wikipedia (2 May 2011).]

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Baktybek "Bakyt" Beshimov was a history and political science professor at Kyrgyz State University who became President of Osh State University (1994–) until his dismissal and house arrest, a member of parliament as the leader of the sole opposition party (1998–2000, 2005–2009), and a former ambassador to India, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, and Nepal (2000–2005). After [2007], he came under constant surveillance by state security officers and received repeated threats to his life from government agents. The threats intensified in 2009 after Beshimov took President Kurmanbek Bakiyev to court for violating the Constitution's prohibition against partisan lobbying, after he led parliamentary investigations into charges of corruption against the government, and after he transpired to be the sole member of parliament to vote against the government's decision to evict the United States Air Base from Kyrgyzstan. In April 2009, he reportedly received public threats from the head of the State National Security Committee at a parliamentary session. He evaded two assassination attempts (poisoning and a staged car crash on a mountain road). In the autumn of 2009, he went into exile in the United States, where he worked on the history of the Ferghana valley as a visiting fellow at Harvard University's Davis Center for Russian and Eurasian Studies and at the Center for International Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In May 2010, following a coup, he was offered his country's ambassadorship to Washington, but he turned it down.

[Sources: Scholar Rescue Fund, "Summer Featured Scholar 2010" (New York 2010); Corydon Ireland, "The Man from Kyrgyzstan," Harvard Gazette (3 March 2011).]

Four days of violence in June 2010 between ethnic Kyrgyz and ethnic Uzbeks left hundreds dead and forced hundreds of thousands to flee their homes. Serious human rights violations marred the efforts to restore order to the region, including widespread reports of the use of excessive force by security forces, arbitrary detentions, and torture and other ill-treatment during transfer and in custody. Attempts to establish the truth about what happened were undermined by apparent ethnic bias. At least 271 people were remanded in custody charged with participation in the violence, the majority ethnic Uzbeks. There were concerns over ethnic bias in the attitudes of the authorities following the events. The Jalal-Abad prosecutor's office stated that 88 people faced charges in relation to the violence, and that 26 were ethnic Kyrgyz. By 10 November 2010, official figures revealed that 271 individuals had been arrested in relation to the violence. Human rights defenders and lawyers maintained that the majority of those arrested were ethnic Uzbeks.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 201, 203–204.]

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Few or no steps have been taken by any Lebanese government to investigate the thousands of disappearances, abductions, killings and other abuses that were committed during the fifteen-year civil war (1975–1990), nor even to adequately protect mass graves, despite the pleas of the now ageing relatives of the thousands of missing people. Despite a 2009 pledge to work to uncover the fate of the “disappeared” and to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances, the government took no steps on these issues in 2010. An official joint Syrian-Lebanese committee established in May 2005 to investigate cases of Lebanese who “disappeared” at the hands of Syrian security forces did not published any findings in 2010. Each day a solemn group of people gathered in a Beirut park clutching precious but yellowing photographs of their long-lost loved ones, to ask what became of them and where their remains lie. The Council of Ministers provided a short document about mass graves to a court that was hearing a lawsuit filed by two NGOs. The NGOs were working on behalf of people whose relatives had disappeared or been abducted, and who hoped to protect and identify the bodies buried in three mass graves cited in an official 2000 report. In March 2010, senior government leaders boycotted the Arab Summit held in Libya in protest at Libyan leader Mu’ammar al-Gaddafi’s alleged involvement in the abduction and enforced disappearance of senior Shi’a Imam, Musa al-Sadr, and two companions in 1978.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 48, 205, 207; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 556, 560–561.]

Tension increased within the fragile unity government and in the country amid reports that several members of Hizbullah—Lebanon’s most powerful political force and a partner in the coalition government—were to be indicted by the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL), set up under United Nations auspices in connection with the 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Hizbullah called for a boycott of the STL and accused it of being an “Israeli project” and of failing to investigate earlier allegations that had led to four former Lebanese security and intelligence heads being detained without charge for nearly four years. In September 2010, Prime Minister Saad Hariri said that it had been a mistake to accuse the Syrian government of responsibility for his father's assassination.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 48, 205; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 561.]

See also Libya, Syria.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The government made no progress in ensuring the prosecution of those responsible for war crimes committed during the armed conflict (1979–2003), and made little effort to implement the recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). The TRC, mandated to investigate human rights violations committed in the conflict, presented its final report to the government in December 2009, and concluded its four-year mandate in June 2010. Its key recommendations included dispensing reparations; establishing a criminal tribunal to prosecute the most notorious perpetrators; barring from public office scores of former supporters of the warring factions, including current President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf; and instituting an informal village-based reconciliation mechanism. Implementing the recommendations was slowed by disagreement about which branch of power should take the lead, as well as by legitimate questions about the constitutionality of some recommendations. The poor quality of sections of the report, notably the lack of solid factual evidence about those recommended for prosecution and bans from public office, further undermined its findings. During 2010, the president asked the justice ministry, the Law Reform Commission, and the National Bar Association to study the legal and constitutional implications of the recommendations. However, the slow pace of this consultation process raised questions about the president's will to move things forward. Some former warlords named in the TRC report maintained seats in the Senate and other positions of power. The trial of former Liberian President Charles Taylor continued at the Special Court for Sierra Leone in The Hague. He was facing charges of war crimes, but only for his alleged involvement in the war in Sierra Leone. He was not charged with crimes under international law committed in Liberia.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 3, 208; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 142, 145–146.]

Serious abuses and some deaths resulting from harmful traditional practices continued to occur in 2010, in part because of distrust of the judicial system and the absence of law enforcement and judicial authorities. These included ritual killings, including one case in which alleged perpetrators were local government officials; killings of alleged witches; and “trials by ordeal” in which suspects of crimes were forced to swallow the poisonous sap of a tree or endure burning, their guilt or innocence being determined by whether they survive. The government condemned these practices and on several occasions the police and judiciary took action against alleged perpetrators.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 144.]

See also Sierra Leone.

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The Amazigh (Berbers), the main cultural and linguistic minority, faced discrimination and harassment by security officials. Libyan authorities did not allow schools to teach, or media to use, the Amazigh language. Libyan law also banned use of non-Arab Amazigh names on all official documentation. In January 2010, Colonel Muammar al-Gaddafi criticized Amazigh New Year celebrations as un-Islamic and not recognized by the state, saying they disrupted national unity; an Amazigh organization reported that at least two people had been arrested in connection with trying to organize celebrations. The Amazigh website Libya Imal was among those blocked by authorities during the same month. In August 2010, Internal Security officers arrested Amazigh activist Ali Abu al-Seoud and detained him incommunicado for eight days in connection with his online writing on Amazigh rights. They released him without charge.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011) 566.]

The authorities did not make public any account of the June 1996 Abu Salim prison massacre in which 1,200 prisoners were killed, nor did they hold anyone responsible. On 6 September 2009, the acting secretary of defense established a seven-judge investigation panel, headed by a former military tribunal judge, to conduct an investigation. The panel’s final report was due in March 2010, but it remained unpublished in late 2010. Libyan authorities offered compensation of 200,000 dinars (US$162,000) to families who agreed to relinquish all legal claims, but most of the victims’ families in Benghazi, Libya’s second-largest city, refused to accept compensation on those terms and continued to call for criminal accountability. In June 2010, families reported that local authorities and security officials were pressuring them to relinquish their compensation claims. In October 2010, the Organizing Committee of the Families of Victims of Abu Salim in Benghazi suspended their weekly public protests after security officials undertook to address their health, housing and socioeconomic concerns.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 211–212; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 562, 564.]

There were still dozens of unresolved disappearance cases, including those of Libyan opposition members Jaballa Hamed Matar and Izzat al-Megaryef, whom Egyptian security had arrested in 1990 in Cairo. Their families later learned that Egypt had handed them over to Libyan security officials, who detained them in Abu Salim prison. Prominent Lebanese Shi'a cleric Imam Musa al-Sadr disappeared in Libya 32 years ago; his fate remains unknown.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 564.]

See also Lebanon.

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The dispute with Greece over the name “Macedonia” continued to dominate international relations and domestic politics. In November 2010, the European Commission criticized Macedonia’s uneven progress toward European Union accession, highlighting concerns about independence of the judiciary and media freedom, but recommended that accession talks should be opened, pending resolution of the country’s name. Divisions arose over government expenditure on monuments to Macedonia’s history and over war crimes proceedings in the wake of the 2001 armed conflict. Ethnic Albanian political parties argued for some cases to be dropped under the 2002 Amnesty Law, which granted amnesty to those involved in the 2001 conflict, except in cases taken under the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). As the cases were investigated but not prosecuted by ICTY, they argued that the Amnesty Law should apply. Impunity continued for the enforced disappearance in 2001 of six ethnic Albanians and the abduction of 13 ethnic Macedonians and one Bulgarian.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 214–215.]

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 1 August 2010, police dispersed eight candlelight vigils commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the Internal Security Act (ISA), detaining more than thirty people. The ISA permitted indefinite detention without charge or trial of any person deemed by officials to be a threat to national security.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 333.]

MALAWI

Last Annual Report entry: —.

On 28 October 2010, the National Archives issued a letter with an immediate suspension of the weekly tabloid Weekend Times (launched in 2009) on charges of failing to register the paper.

According to the 1958 Printed Publications Act, all newspapers were required to be registered and to deposit a copy of each of their publications with the National Archives. Under this law, the National Archives could close publications for an indeterminate period without appeal. The paper's ban came three months after President Bingu wa Mutharika threatened to shut down newspapers that he accused of lying. At the time, two papers had cited a regional agency's report forecasting food shortages in Malawi.

[Source: Committee to Protect Journalists, "Malawi Government Bans Weekly Tabloid" (1 November 2010).]

On 14 May 2011, photojournalist Jacob Nankhonya of Blantyre Newspapers was stopped from taking pictures at a memorial service for the late former President Hastings Kamuzu Banda (1896/1906–1997) at Kamuzu's mausoleum at the Heroes' acre in the capital Lilongwe. Possibly, the reason was that Jim Jumani Johansen, who claimed to be Banda's biological son, passed through the spot the photojournalist had focused on with his camera.

[Source: Media Institute of Southern Africa, Ifex Alert (19 May 2011).]

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

MALI

Last Annual Report entry: —.

See Mauritania.

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In July 2010, Mohamed Lemine Ag Maleck, a Malian history student, was arrested in Oualata, 1,200 km south of the capital Nouakchott. He was held for more than twenty days at the police station before being charged with giving information to a foreign power. The accusation was based on his possession of a GPS device and a camera, equipment he was using to take photos and design itineraries for a tourism agency.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 223.]

Although slavery was abolished in 1981 and has been a criminal offence since 2007, the practice persisted. There have been no judicial proceedings against slave owners. Two families were freed from slavery during 2010 with the help of two human rights organizations, SOS Esclaves and L'Initiative pour la résurgence du mouvement abolitionniste en Mauritanie (IRA, Initiative for the Resurgence of the Abolitionist Movement in Mauritania). Eight anti-slavery activists were arrested and detained in December 2010 in Nouakchott after raising the case of two young girls who they believed were held in slavery.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 223–224.]

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

There were no advances in ending impunity for past human rights violations committed during Mexico's "dirty war" (1964–1982).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 224.]

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

MONTENEGRO

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

While war crimes prosecutions against low-ranking military personnel or police officials continued, senior officials were rarely indicted. Under an extradition agreement signed with Serbia in October 2010, eleven people wanted in Montenegro were arrested in Serbia including five men suspected of committing war crimes in Dubrovnik, Croatia. Proceedings continued against nine former police officers and officials, five in their absence, for the enforced disappearance in 1992 of Bosniak refugees, who were handed over to the de facto Bosnian Serb authorities. In November 2010, the authorities granted former President Momir Bulatović permission to divulge state secrets when he appeared as a witness in this case.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 230.]

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The long-running truth and reconciliation process launched in 2004 by the Equity and Reconciliation Commission (ERC) continued its slow progress. From the outset, the process explicitly omitted any consideration of justice as a means to remedy the enforced disappearances and other gross human rights violations committed by government forces between 1956 and 1999 and, in practice, it largely failed even to provide the truth about what happened to those who disappeared or suffered other grave abuses. The authorities showed little sign of implementing the far-reaching legal and institutional reforms that had been due to flow from the process, to hold the security forces accountable under the law and eradicate the use of secret detention and torture. In January 2010, the Advisory Council for Human Rights, mandated to follow up on the ERC recommendations, published a report, covering the period since the ERC ended its work in 2005. It failed to provide a comprehensive list of those who had disappeared or any detailed findings on individual cases or whether they had been referred for further investigation. The overdue list of 938 victims of enforced disappearance and other human rights violations was published on 14 December 2010 as an annex to the initial report. Little and vague information, if any, was added on individual cases. Six pending cases were listed and referred for further investigation. Victims and survivors continued to have no effective access to justice, and none of those who perpetrated the gross violations were investigated or brought to account. By the end of 2010, the authorities had still not taken any concrete measures to implement recommendations for judicial and institutional reform made by the ERC, including reform of the judiciary and security forces. The European Union provided twenty million euros to assist the government to introduce legal reforms and eight million euros toward preserving the memory and archives of the gross human rights violations in 1956–1999. In September 2010, the government declared that it would convert some former secret prisons into memorials for the “preservation and rehabilitation of memory.” No steps were known to have been taken by the Polisario Front to address the impunity of those accused of committing human rights abuses in the camps in the 1970s and 1980s.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 48, 232, 234; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 570.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 21 February 2009, history teacher Ma Khin Khin Leh (?1966–) was released. In July 1999, she had been detained with eighteen others in Pegu, on suspicion that they were planning a pro-democracy march scheduled for 19 July (Martyrs’ Day, commemorating the 1947 assassination of General Aung San [1915–47], independence leader and father of opposition leader Daw Aung San Suu Kyi). The military intelligence service arrested her and her three-year old daughter after officials from the State Peace and Development Council (military junta) attempted to detain her husband, Kyaw Wunna, a political activist and one of the march organizers, but could not locate him. The child was released after five days’ detention. In December 1999, a Special Court sentenced Ma Khin Khin Leh to life imprisonment. In January 2000, she was transferred to an unknown location. After her release in 2009, she was harassed and in the summer of 2010 she fled to Thailand where she lived as an illegal refugee.

[Sources: <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/18.pdf>; Amnesty International, Myanmar: Prisoners of Political Repression (London 2001), 14; Amnesty International, Report 2003 (London 2003), 181; Amnesty International, “Political Prisoners Set Free in Myanmar” (24 February 2009); Amnesty International, Amnesty in actie (February 2011), 11; American Association for the Advancement of Science, Human Rights Action Network, BU0009.Daw (5 December 2000).]

In his report to the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council in March 2010, Tomás Ojea

Quintana, the Special Rapporteur for the Situation of Human Rights in Myanmar, outlined a “pattern of gross and systematic violation of human rights which has been in place for many years.” He concluded that “UN institutions may consider the possibility to establish a commission of inquiry (CoI) with a specific fact finding mandate to address the question of international crimes.” In late 2010, more than thirteen countries publically supported the formation of a CoI, including the United States, the United Kingdom and several other European countries, Australia, and Canada. UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon did not publically comment on Quintana’s call. During a general debate at the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva on 17 September 2010, Burmese ambassador U Wunna Maung Lwin denied that the situation in Burma warranted an inquiry, saying there were “no crimes against humanity in Myanmar...(w)ith regard to the issue of impunity, any member of the military who breached national law was subject to legal punishments...there was no need to conduct investigations in Myanmar since there were no human rights violations there.” Quintana’s report to the UN General Assembly in October 2010 elaborated on the possible parameters of a CoI, possible areas of investigation, and time frames. In late October 2010, United States Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said she wanted to “underscore the American commitment to seek accountability for the human rights violations that have occurred in Burma by working to establish an international Commission of Inquiry.” China actively tried to block the proposal. The European Union, which drafted the annual Burma resolution, did not pursue calls for the CoI to be included in the resolution in the UN General Assembly.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 292–293.]

On 27 July 2010, the army arrested Buddhist monk and Rakhine historian Ashion Pyinya Sara (= U Pyinya Sara), leading abbot of the Buddha Vihara Mahamuni orphanage in Sittwe. When the orphanage was raided, antiques from the library (ancient coins, Buddha statues, palm-leaf inscriptions) were seized. The charges against U Pyinya Sara—inter alia, abuse of Buddhist religious principles (by living with a woman), misappropriation of funds donated by foreign countries, and disruption of the stability of the state—were widely believed to have been fabricated to hide the real motive, namely the monk’s critical political attitude. On 2 August 2010, he was reportedly tortured during interrogation. He went a on hunger strike. At the trial, the government’s main witness—the woman who had supposedly lived with the monk—retracted her earlier accusation. In September 2010, he was sentenced to eight years and three months’ imprisonment on charges including handling obscene materials, insulting religion, criminal breach of trust and possession of foreign currency. U Pyinya Sara was a well-known Arakanese historian specialized in the history of the ancient kingdom of Arakan and Arakanese literature, an activity seen as behavior against solidarity of the union.

[Sources: Altsean Burma (Alternative Asean Network on Burma, Bangkok), The SPDC’s Crimes

Continue: A UN Commission of Inquiry Is still Needed To Protect Burma's People (BN 2010/1073; 28 September 2010); Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 236–237; Burma News International (2 September 2010); Narinjara News (11 & 24 September 2010); “Prominent Historian Monk U Pyinya Sara Arrested in Sittwe” (Democracy for Burma; 30 July 2010).]

See also Spain.

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The Caprivi high treason trial, the biggest and longest criminal trial in Namibia's history, entered its eleventh year. The accused were charged with involvement in attacks carried out in the Caprivi Strip in 1999 by the Caprivi Liberation Army. At the start of the trial in October 2003, there were 132 people on trial. By the end of 2010, 21 of them had died in custody.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 239.]

NEPAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The government and political parties still failed to show the will to establish accountability for human rights violations committed during the war (1996–2006). No one from the security forces or among the Maoists has been held criminally responsible for abuses committed during the conflict. In many cases, those accused of violations actively received protection from the security forces or political parties. In October 2010, the Nepal Army extended the tenure of Colonel Raju Basnet by two years, though he was at the Maharajgunj army barracks in 2003 and 2004 when various cases of torture, arbitrary detention, and enforced disappearance took place. The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) and the United Nations (UN) Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights repeatedly requested that the government start proceedings against Basnet. The Unified Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist) (UCPN-M) leadership likewise failed to cooperate with investigations into alleged crimes committed by Maoists during and after the conflict. Although the Comprehensive Peace Agreement did not provide a broad amnesty for serious crimes, the government continued to discuss the withdrawal of cases deemed “political,” including cases of murder. In April 2010, the long-delayed draft bills to establish a Truth and Reconciliation Commission and a Disappearances Commission were tabled in parliament but awaited debate by the Statute Committee. The drafts had notable shortcomings, including the proposed commission's lack of independence from political influence and a proposal to grant it the power to recommend amnesty for perpetrators of serious human rights violations. A draft bill criminalizing enforced disappearances and establishing a Commission of Inquiry was pending. It incorporated proposed amendments to address some of the serious shortcomings of previous drafts. The amendments included defining enforced disappearances in certain circumstances as a crime against humanity and ensuring that punishments were proportionate to the extreme seriousness of the offence. However, families of the disappeared were dissatisfied with the draft and claimed that it was prepared without adequate consultation.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 239, 240; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 337–338.]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 1 December 2009, Robert and Eleonora van Maasdijk—the children of Gerrie van Maasdijk (1906–1997), general secretary of the royal court until his dismissal by Prince Bernhard (1948–July 1950), and Queen Juliana’s chamberlain afterward (July 1950–1956)—sued historian Cees Fasseur (1938–) for posthumous defamation of their father and for invasion of their privacy because in his book Juliana en Bernhard: Het verhaal van een huwelijk 1936–1956 (2008; Juliana and Bernhard: The Story of a Marriage, 1936–1956) he had called van Maasdijk “a troublemaker,” “a Trojan horse at the court,” and “a splitter of the royal marriage.” On 19 February 1950, Van Maasdijk had written a letter to Prince Bernhard about the latter’s “dubious contacts” (persons involved in illegal arms trade and coup plans against Indonesian President Sukarno in 1950). Van Maasdijk’s diaries also contained entries on these events. The Van Maasdijk children had given Fasseur access to Van Maasdijk’s archives during his research. Fasseur had doubted Van Maasdijk’s story, suggesting that his dismissal by Bernhard was the reason for his confessions. On 23 March 2011, the judge ruled that Fasseur had not acted irresponsibly, that judgments about important persons in his book belonged to his task as a historian, that these judgments were based on much literature and several original sources, and that the Van Maasdijk children had no right to consult Fasseur’s manuscript before publication.

[Sources: Rechtbank Amsterdam, Van Maasdijk versus Cees Fasseur & Arbeiderspers, Archipel, Balans, Subpoena (14 June 2010; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/182.pdf>) and Judgment (23 March 2011; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/200.pdf>).]

In 2010, historian Jolanda Withuis did not receive permission to access the Royal House Archive for her biography about Queen Juliana.

[Source: Historisch nieuwsblad (14 December 2010).]

In June 2010, the Ministry of Justice threatened to sue the National Library of the Netherlands for incitement to hatred and discrimination if it made available online Dutch-language Nazi publications dating from World War II in the framework of a scholarly digitization project of all Dutch-language newspapers from 1618 to 1995. Scholars protested this, arguing that a scholarly edition of these publications, much of which was already accessible through other channels, was in the public interest. On 1 September 2010, Minister of Justice Ernst Hirsch Ballin declared that the library could proceed with the project because of its scholarly nature.

[Sources: Historisch nieuwsblad (October 2010) 31; NRC Handelsblad (1 September 2010) 3; Frank van Vree, “Verboden bronnen,” Groene Amsterdammer (23 June 2010).]

On 26 April 2011, historian and writer Thomas von der Dunk (1961–) was to give the annual Willem Arondéus lecture, entitled “The New Taboo on the War,” organized by the province of North Holland. Under pressure from the Freedom Party (PVV), politicians from the ruling parties Christian Democratic Appeal (CDA) and People’s Party for Freedom and Democracy (VVD) canceled the lecture for being “tainted by party politics” because Von der Dunk wanted to draw parallels between tolerance of the political elite for populist parties in the 1930s and tolerance for the PVV in present time. Von der Dunk declared that the ban confirmed his taboo thesis. On 27 April 2011, the Platform Stop Racism and Exclusion organized the lecture in open air in front of the provincial house: Von der Dunk spoke to an audience of 800 (instead of the 160 guests originally invited). In May 2011, the lecture was published as a pamphlet in Amsterdam.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (22 April 2011), 2, 3, 24, (28 April 2011), 7; Thomas von der Dunk, “Het nieuwe taboe op de oorlog” (<http://opinie.volkskrant.nl>; 21 April 2011); Wikipedia (30 April 2011).]

See also Bosnia-Herzegovina, Sierra Leone.

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

NIGER

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In late 2010, none of the police officers responsible for the execution of Mohammed Yusuf, leader of the Boko Haram Islamist group, and dozens of his suspected supporters in Maiduguri in July 2009 were prosecuted. Similarly, the government did still not hold members of the police and military accountable for their unlawful 2008 killing of more than 130 people during sectarian violence in Jos, or for the 2001 massacre by the military of more than 200 people in Benue State, and the military's complete destruction of the town of Odi, Bayelsa State, in 1999. (See NCH Annual Report 2010.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 150.]

NORWAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

OMAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2009–2010, militant nationalist groups in Balochistan threatened teachers and school administrators in order to prevent standard school practices such as the teaching of Pakistani history. On 25 October 2010, for example, the Balochistan Liberation Front threw pamphlets into educational institutions in the province, warning teachers and staff not to sing the national anthem, or to raise the national flag, or to celebrate Pakistan Day (23 March) and Independence Day (14 August), or to teach Pakistan Studies (Pakistan history and geography). The pamphlets warned that there would be serious consequences for noncompliance. On 13 June 2009, the Baloch Liberation Army assassinated Anwar Baig, a senior teacher in Kalat (south of the provincial capital Quetta), because he had opposed recitation of the Baloch nationalist anthem in school and did not want to hoist the nationalist flag instead of the Pakistani flag.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “Their Future Is at Stake:” Attacks on Teachers and Schools in Pakistan’s Balochistan Province (Washington 2010) 2, 33–34.]

In March 2010, a three-member Judicial Commission constituted by the Supreme Court began to review cases of enforced disappearance. Its mandate included recording evidence of released people and investigating the role of the intelligence agencies. The commission reached its conclusion on 31 December 2010 and submitted its findings and recommendations to the federal government for review. The commission’s report remained classified at the end of 2010. Hundreds of people went missing, apparently after being held by the intelligence services or the army. The majority of cases were in Balochistan. Hundreds of habeas corpus petitions remained pending in provincial high courts but the intelligence services refused to respond to court directions. Families of the disappeared were threatened for speaking out about their missing loved ones.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 252.]

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

See Israel, United States.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

According to Peru's Truth and Reconciliation Commission, almost 70,000 people died or "disappeared" during the internal armed conflict (1980–2000). They were victims of atrocities committed by the Shining Path and the Túpac Amaru Revolutionary Movement, and of human rights violations by state agents. In August 2010, President Alan García signed into law Decree 1097 that amounted to a disguised amnesty for perpetrators of human rights violations during this conflict. Decree 1097 violated Peru's international human rights obligations by allowing a statute of limitations to be applied to crimes against humanity committed before 2003, the year Peru ratified the United Nations Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes against Humanity. Such crimes would include atrocities committed during the first government of Alan García (1985–1990), such as the massacre of 122 prisoners at El Frontón prison in 1986. Decree 1097 also obliged judges to close judicial proceedings against military and police personnel if formal charges were not presented within the 36 month maximum allowed by law. Within days a general and several members of the Colina Group—a death squad responsible for killings and "disappearances" during the government of former President Alberto Fujimori (1990–2000)—asked a judge to close investigations against them. García initially defended the decree but changed his mind after intense international and domestic criticism. In September 2010, a series of decree laws were issued effectively rolling back advances in tackling impunity over the previous ten years. Congress voted to revoke Decree 1097 but two further decrees allowing members of the armed forces accused of human rights violations to be tried under military courts remained in place.

In December 2009, a Supreme Court panel unanimously confirmed a 25-year prison sentence for Fujimori for the extrajudicial execution of 15 people in the Barrios Altos district of Lima in November 1991, the enforced disappearance and murder of nine students and a teacher from La Cantuta University in July 1992, and two abductions. Fujimori was the first democratically elected Latin American leader to be convicted for grave human rights violations in his own country. In January 2010, the Supreme Court upheld the sentence passed on Fujimori. Given the landmark significance of the Fujimori conviction, prosecutions in other human rights cases from the armed conflict period had disappointing results, with convictions trailing behind the number of acquittals. In June 2010, the National Human Rights Coordinator, an NGO that monitored accountability, reported that the National Criminal Court, created in 2004 to hear cases involving human rights violations and terrorism, had acquitted 65 military and police agents, convicted only 15, and dismissed 23 cases. The Peruvian military consistently failed to provide information to help prosecutors identify officers who participated in atrocities. Mainly as a result of this lack of cooperation, prosecutors and lawyers for relatives of victims had difficulty assembling evidence that meets the rigorous standards courts demand. Several former senior military officials facing charges used tactics to delay court proceedings and then filed habeas corpus petitions to the Constitutional Court, claiming that their right to a trial within a reasonable time had been violated. In October 2010, members of Peru's "Colina group" death squad and former high-ranking officials in Fujimori's government (1990–2000) were convicted of the killing of fifteen people and the enforced disappearance of ten others in 1991 and 1992. However, thousands of other cases remained unresolved. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights condemned Peru's failure to implement a 2003 agreement to ensure truth, justice and reparation for over 2,000 women who were forcibly sterilized under Fujimori's government. Individual reparations, including formalizing ownership of land granted to relatives and victims, a priority agreed by the government in 2003 before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, remained pending at the end of 2010.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 15, 16, 261; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 263–264.]

See also Bolivia.

PHILIPPINES

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In February 2010, the Commission on Human Rights of the Philippines announced that it had recorded 777 cases of extrajudicial executions and 251 cases of enforced disappearance since 2001.

In September 2010, human rights group Karapatan recorded 1,206 extrajudicial executions and 206 victims of enforced disappearance during the same period. A report published in September 2010, commissioned by the United States Agency for International Development and the NGO Asia Foundation recorded 305 cases of extrajudicial executions with 390 victims from 2001 to 2010. The same report stated that only 1 per cent of reported cases resulted in a conviction, and that members of the armed forces were implicated in 20 per cent of cases.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 262, 263.]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 11 June 2010, Dariusz Ratajczak (1962–2010), a history lecturer at the University of Opole (until 1999) and Holocaust denier, was found dead in a car parked near a shopping center in Opole. The body had been in the car for nearly two weeks and was decomposed beyond recognition. Autopsy showed that it was a suicide due to alcohol abuse. One observer linked his death to an operation of the Mossad (the Israeli Institute for Intelligence and Special Operations), but this was not confirmed by others. In November 1999, he had been suspended from his position following complaints made by an official commission investigating Nazi crimes in Poland for publishing remarks challenging the Holocaust of the Jews during World War II in his March 1999 booklet Tematy Niebezpieczne (Dangerous Topics). In December 1999, a court in Opole had found Ratajczak guilty of breaching the Institute of National Remembrance law that outlawed the denial of crimes against humanity committed by Nazi or by communist regimes in Poland, but also said that he had caused “negligible harm to society” due to the low circulation of the self-published book (230 copies) and to the fact that in the second edition and in public appearances Ratajczak had criticized Holocaust denial. After several appeals, the verdict was upheld and the case dismissed in 2002. In April 2000, Ratajczak had been dismissed from the university for violating ethical standards and banned from teaching at other universities for three years. From then on, he had lived in increasing isolation, surviving with menial jobs.

[BBC News (16 & 17 November, 8 December 1999); “Holocaust Denier Death, Mossad Linked,” Press TV (<http://www.presstv.ir/detail/139718.html>); United States State Department, Annual Report on International Religious Freedom 2000 (Washington 2000), 348; Wikipedia (28 May 2011).]

QATAR

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Until January 2010, there was no Freedom of Information Act in Russia. Journalists' and historians' requests for information to be declassified were rarely successful.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 1/11: 88.]

In May 2010, the court rejected the defamation case of Yevgeny Dzhugashvili, Joseph Stalin's grandson living in Georgia, against radio station Ekho Moskvy in defamation over the comment "Stalin signed an order that children can be shot from the age of twelve as enemies of the nation." (See NCH Annual Report 2010). On 26 November 2010, the Duma (Russian parliament) condemned Stalin by name for the massacres in Katyń (in April 1940) and other sites.

[Sources: BBC News (26 November 2010); Historisch nieuwsblad (February 2011), 25; Keesings historisch archief (2010), 261–262, 672; Telegraph (17 May 2010).]

In a televised interview in July 2010, President of Chechnya, Ramzan Kadyrov, described activists of the Memorial Human Rights Center as "enemies of the state, enemies of the people, enemies of the law." The Kremlin failed to react. Human rights defenders working in other regions (such as Dagestan) also faced harassment and attacks. In September 2010, the defamation trial of Kadyrov against Memorial (concerning Kadyrov's responsibility for the assassination of journalist and historian Natalia Estemirova in 2009) took place. (See NCH Annual Report 2010.) In 2010 and 2011, Memorial was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 272; Committee to Protect Journalists, Attacks on the Press in 2009 (New York 2010) 157–162, 187, 266–267; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 456–457; NRC Handelsblad (11 March 2011), 10.]

On 9 July 2010, the sixth anniversary of the unsolved murder of Russian-born American journalist and historian Paul Klebnikov (1963–2004), no progress in the investigation was reported. On 9 July 2004, Klebnikov had been gunned down. The alleged mastermind of the murder—Chechen separatist leader Khozh-Akhmed Nukhayev, the subject of Klebnikov's 2003 book "Conversation With a Barbarian"—was never apprehended or prosecuted. Two alleged accomplices were acquitted in May 2006 following a flawed and closed trial. Another possible reason for the murder was Klebnikov's publication of a list of Russia's 33 billionaires. As a historian, Klebnikov was reportedly fascinated by the battles of the Russians with Napoleon and during World War II.

[Sources: Committee to Protect Journalists, Paul Klebnikov (9 July 2004); Committee to Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (13 July 2010).]

Over two years since the Russian conflict with Georgia over South Ossetia (August 2008), Russian authorities had yet to ensure a comprehensive investigation into and accountability for international human rights and humanitarian law violations by their forces, who used cluster bombs in areas populated by civilians in Georgia, leading to civilian deaths and injuries. Russia also launched indiscriminate rocket attacks on civilian areas, causing casualties. Russian forces in Georgia failed to protect civilians in areas under their effective control while also preventing Georgian forces from policing these areas.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 460.]

In December 2010, it was reported that the case of historian Mikhail Suprun (see NCH Annual Report 2010) had yet to be brought to court. It also became known that the Deputy Chief Prosecutor of Arkhangelsk province, who headed the investigation committee, was the editor of a Book of Memory himself.

[Source: Catriona Bass, "Memory Incompatible: The Archangelsk Affair Continues," Open Democracy (1 December 2010).]

See also Georgia, Ukraine.

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In late 2009 the Senate summoned the president of the opposition political party PS-Imberakuri, Bernard Ntaganda, on accusations of "genocide ideology." In June 2010, the police arrested Ntaganda and raided his house and the party office. The charges against him included endangering national security, inciting ethnic divisions, and organizing demonstrations without authorization. In February

2011, Ntaganda was found guilty of “divisionism” (and two other offenses) and sentenced to four years’ imprisonment, two years of which were for the offense of “divisionism.” Victoire Ingabire, president of another opposition political party, FDU-Inkingi, who returned to Rwanda in January 2010 after 16 years in exile, was arrested in April 2010 on charges of “genocide ideology,” “divisionism,” and collaboration with the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), an armed group active in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo and composed in part by individuals who participated in the 1994 Rwanda genocide. She had declared that during the genocide Hutu militias had systematically killed about 800,000 Tutsis and moderate Hutus, but also that Hutus were killed by Tutsis. Ingabire was released on bail with travel restrictions, but in October 2010 re-arrested following allegations of involvement in forming an armed group. In November 2010, she remained in detention awaiting trial. Peter Erlinder, an American and one of Victoire Ingabire’s defense lawyers, was arrested in May 2010 on charges of “genocide denial and minimization,” and “spreading malicious rumors that could endanger national security.” He was released on bail three weeks later. The charges against Erlinder, who is also a defense lawyer at the Tanzania-based International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), related primarily to articles published in previous years in which he questioned key events surrounding the genocide. Déogratias Mushayidi, a former journalist and outspoken government opponent in exile, was arrested in Burundi in March 2010 and handed over to Rwandan authorities. In September 2010 Mushayidi was found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment on three charges: spreading rumors inciting civil disobedience, recruiting an armed group to overthrow the government, and using forged documents. He was also charged with four other offenses, including “genocide ideology” and “divisionism,” for which he was acquitted. The authorities continued to misuse broad and ill-defined laws on “genocide ideology” and “sectarianism.” The laws prohibited hate speech, but also criminalized legitimate criticism of the government. In April 2010, however, the government announced a review of the “genocide ideology” law, and indicated that the “sectarianism” law might also be reviewed. In January 2011, the minister of justice announced again that the genocide ideology law would be reformed. (See also NCH Annual Reports 2009, 2010.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, “Freedom of Expression Criminalized in Rwanda,” The Wire (October-November 2010), 9; Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 5, 274, 275; Amnesty International, Safer To Stay Silent: The Chilling Effect of Rwanda’s Laws on “Genocide Ideology” and “Sectarianism” (London 2010), 7–17, 21, 28–29; “Genocide Memorial Row in Rwanda,” BBC News (18 January 2011); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 154–156; Human Rights Watch, Justice Compromised; The Legacy of Rwanda’s Community-Based Gacaca Courts (Washington 2011), 31–33.]

On 8 July 2010, Agnès Uwimana Nkusi, editor of the privately-owned bimonthly Umurabyo, and around 15 July 2010, Saidati Mukakibibi, a reporter at Umurabyo, were detained for a series of opinion pieces written ahead of the August 2010 presidential elections, some of which claimed that there were growing divisions within the army, and that Hutu victims of the 1994 genocide deserved justice. One column was accompanied by a photo of President Paul Kagame with a Nazi swastika superimposed in the background. In January 2011, prosecutors requested a 33-year sentence for Uwimana and 12 years for Mukakibibi. On 4 February 2011, they were sentenced to 17 and 7 years' imprisonment respectively on charges of "threatening state security, genocide ideology, divisionism and defamation" (Uwimana) and charges of "threatening state security" (Mukakibibi) for "inciting disobedience, causing divisions and denying the 1994 genocide." The World Association of Newspapers and News Publishers said that the government used the "genocide ideology" law to suppress the free expression of opinions and that charges such as defamation or insulting the president were often inflated to "genocide denial" or "inciting public disorder." In June 2010, the chairman of the Media High Council Board had already accused Uwimana of publishing "defamatory articles and falsehoods" in an article that suggested that all Rwandans were both victims and perpetrators of the 1994 genocide. In 2007–2008, Uwimana had served a one-year prison sentence on charges of ethnic divisionism and libel after she had published an opinion piece on ethnic violence in Rwanda.

[Sources: Article 19, "Government Promises To Bring Freedom of Expression Laws in Line with International Standards" (London, 27 January 2011); Ifex Communiqué (9 February 2011); PEN Writers in Prison Committee, RAN 06/11 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/64.pdf>; 14 February 2011).]

In September 2010, the deadline to complete gacaca trials of genocide cases was postponed indefinitely. The government developed mechanisms to handle outstanding genocide cases and to adjudicate alleged miscarriages of justice by gacaca jurisdictions. Gacaca courts prosecuted around 1.5 million cases with involvement from local communities across the country. The conduct of trials before gacaca courts had been mixed. Some judges delivered fair and objective judgments; others handed down heavy sentences, including life imprisonment in isolation, on the basis of very little evidence. A number of witnesses and judges proved vulnerable to corruption and outside influence, affecting the outcome of trials and undermining confidence in the courts. Some defense witnesses were afraid to testify for fear of being accused of genocide themselves, and there were numerous allegations that gacaca courts sacrificed the truth to satisfy political interests.

The mandate of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) was extended until the end of 2011 for first-instance trials and to the end of 2012 for appeals. Ten suspects subject to arrest warrants by the ICTR remained at large. In November 2010, the ICTR Prosecutor made new applications to transfer cases to Rwanda. Past applications failed after Trial Chambers decided that the accused would not receive fair trials. Judicial proceedings against suspects of the 1994 genocide took place in several European countries and the United States. Sweden consented to extradition in 2009, but the case has yet to be decided before the European Court of Human Rights. No country extradited genocide suspects to Rwanda due to fair trial concerns. (See also previous NCH Annual Reports.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 275–276; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 154, 157–158; Human Rights Watch, Justice Compromised: The Legacy of Rwanda's Community-Based Gacaca Courts (Washington 2011).]

In September 2010, French magistrates conducted investigations in Rwanda into the shooting down of the plane in April 1994 which killed Rwandan President Juvénal Habyarimana and sparked the genocide. It was the first time that French magistrates visited Rwanda as part of their investigations. French judges dropped international arrest warrants issued in November 2006 against nine senior Rwandan Patriotic Front members for shooting down the plane, in which French nationals were also killed, and instead placed some of these individuals under investigation.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 276.]

See also Belgium, Congo (Democratic Republic), Ethiopia, Finland, Sierra Leone.

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In January 2010, Turki Haydar Muhammad al-‘Ali and five other people, mostly students, were arrested after posters of an al-Hussainiya (Shi'a religious center) were displayed on the occasion of Ashura (the traditional annual Shi'a mourning procession) in December 2009. They were detained without charge or trial at al-Ihsa prison and all were believed to be still held at the end of 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 278.]

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Chad.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In March 2010, the Serbian parliament narrowly adopted the “Srebrenica Resolution,” which condemned crimes committed against the Bosniak (Bosnian Muslim) population of Srebrenica in July 1995, and apologized to the families of the victims, but failed to refer to genocide, as required by the 2007 decision of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in a case brought by Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) against Serbia. In January 2010, following Croatia’s 2008 claim against Serbia, Serbia filed a counterclaim at the ICJ, alleging that Croatia had committed genocide against Croatian Serbs.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 37–38, 281.]

In November 2010, Serbia moved closer to European Union (EU) membership when the European Commission sent the government a questionnaire to assess its readiness for EU candidate status. Progress remained conditional on Serbia’s continued co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). In a June 2010 briefing to the United Nations Security Council, ICTY prosecutor Serge Brammertz noted Serbia’s cooperation with requests for assistance, but indicated that efforts to arrest former Bosnian-Serb General Ratko Mladić and former Croatian Serb leader Goran Hadžić “have thus far produced few tangible results.” In September and November 2010, Brammertz reiterated his dissatisfaction with Serbia’s efforts to secure the arrests of fugitives and called on the European Union (EU) to press Serbia for cooperation. On a more positive note, Serbian authorities recovered Mladić’s wartime notebooks during a search operation in February 2010 and provided them to the ICTY, which would likely introduce them as evidence in several trials. Mladić was arrested in May 2011 (See Bosnia-Herzegovina entry).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 281; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 463.]

Kosovo

In May 2010, the European Union Rule of Law and Police Mission in Kosovo (EULEX) announced that only 60 of the 900 war crimes cases inherited from the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) were under investigation. Investigations into the abduction of non-Albanians after June 1999 were transferred to the local Special Prosecutor, on the basis that EULEX did not consider them war crimes.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 283.]

In May 2010, EULEX announced that its investigation into the so-called “Yellow House” case, involving the alleged transfers by the KLA in 1999 of around 400 Serbian and other captives to detention facilities in Albania, had failed to produce evidence to substantiate allegations of organ-trading. Investigations into the case by Dick Marty, the rapporteur of the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly, and the Serbian war crimes prosecutor continued, but no new facts were made public. In the year prior to September 2010, EULEX completed five war crime cases, with eight more ongoing and 27 at pre-trial stages. EULEX completed eight cases related to the March 2004 riots during the same period.

A draft Law on Missing Persons failed to include provisions for reparation, including compensation, to relatives of the disappeared. According to the International Committee of the Red Cross, 1,837 persons remain missing from the 1999 conflict, the majority Kosovo Albanians. In May 2010, EULEX and the Serbian authorities jointly announced the discovery of a suspected mass grave in southern Serbia believed to contain the remains of as many as 250 Kosovo Albanians who went missing during the 1999 war. In August 2010, the Office of Missing Persons and Forensics (OMPF) was transferred from EULEX to the Kosovo Ministry of Justice. In September 2010, the OMPF and the Serbian Commission for Missing Persons visited potential mass graves at Rudnica in Serbia and Belaćevac in Kosovo. During 2010, OMPF exhumed the bodies of 34 individuals; identified 57 mortal remains and returned 103 bodies to families for burial. Some three wrongly identified bodies were re-identified by the International Commission on Missing Persons.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 38, 283; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 471–472.]

In July 2010, the International Court of Justice issued an advisory opinion that Kosovo's 2008 declaration of independence did not violate applicable international law. In September 2010, the United Nations General Assembly adopted a resolution on Kosovo, which envisaged the resumption of talks between Serbia and Kosovo, facilitated by the European Union (EU).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 281.]

In July 2010, closing arguments were heard at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) against former Assistant Interior Minister Vlastimir Đorđević, indicted for crimes against humanity and war crimes in Kosovo. He was charged with crimes leading to the deportation of 800,000 Albanian civilians, the enforced disappearance of more than 800 ethnic Albanians, and leading a conspiracy to conceal their bodies by transporting them to Serbia for reburial. During the same month, the ICTY Appeals Chamber ordered the partial retrial of Ramush Haradinaj, former commander of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) and later Prime Minister of Kosovo; Idriz Balaj, a former member of the KLA in command of a special unit known as the Black Eagles; and Lahi Brahimaj, who served as a deputy commander of the KLA in the Dukagjin area of Kosovo. The Appeals Chamber judgment highlighted “the gravity [that] the threat of witness intimidation posed to the trial’s integrity.” In 2008, the accused were acquitted of joint criminal enterprise in the persecution and abduction of civilians suspected of collaborating with Serbian forces in 1998. In September 2010, the ICTY denied Haradinaj’s motion for provisional release, citing the integrity of the trial. A revised indictment issued in November 2010 focused on the alleged murders of Serbs, Roma and Ashkali.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 281; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 470–471.]

See also Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia, Montenegro.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Sierra Leone continued to move beyond the legacy of its eleven-year civil war (1991–2002), which resulted in economic devastation, infrastructure collapse, mass displacement, and atrocities including sexual slavery, forced recruitment of child soldiers and amputations. However, crucial Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) recommendations were not implemented. However, reparations programs for war victims, as recommended by the TRC, provided financial and medical assistance and skills training to some 20,000 victims with support from the United Nations (UN) Peacebuilding Fund and UN Development Fund for Women.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 285; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 163.]

Since 2002 the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) had sentenced eight men to prison terms: Moinina Fofana; Allieu Kondewa; Issa Sesay; Morris Kallon; Augustine Gbao; Alex Brima; Ibrahim Kamara; and Santigie Kanu. All eight were transferred in October 2009 to Rwanda to serve out their sentences. Sam Hinga Norman died of natural causes in 2007 as did Foday Sankoh in 2003. Sam Bockarie was killed in Liberia in 2003 and Johnny Paul Koroma remained at large. The few trials before the SCSL contributed to partial disclosure of the truth about the serious crimes committed in Sierra Leone's armed conflict since 1996. The convictions of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) leaders Sesay, Kallon and Gbao were the first for attacks on United Nations peacekeepers as a violation of international humanitarian law and for forced marriage as an inhumane act constituting a crime against humanity. However, fewer than a dozen of those responsible for hundreds of thousands of crimes under international law were held to account by the SCSL, and most perpetrators went unpunished. The 1999 Lomé Accord contained an amnesty provision for those responsible for crimes under international law committed in Sierra Leone. Not a bar to prosecution before the SCSL, it prevailed under Sierra Leonean law, so no investigations or trials for crimes committed in the civil war took place before national courts in Sierra Leone. Concerns also remained regarding the SCSL's inaccessibility to the public, its cost management and slowness, selective justice, inadequate legacy programs (to rebuild the local justice system and strengthen local institutions), and failure to prosecute corporate actors such as diamond dealers. During 2010, the trial of former Liberian president Charles Taylor—charged with eleven counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for his role in supporting Sierra Leonean rebel groups during the conflict—made notable progress. The defense, which closed its case in November 2010, brought forward 21 witnesses, including Charles Taylor himself. Earlier, 94 witnesses testified for the prosecution. Closing arguments were scheduled for February 2011 and a judgment was expected later in 2011. Taylor was the first sitting African head of state to be indicted and face trial before an international or hybrid tribunal. Due to security concerns, his trial was taking place in The Hague, Netherlands, instead of in Freetown. Meanwhile, the SCSL began closing down operations in Freetown. In May 2010, it handed over control of its detention facility to the Sierra Leone prison service. It also reached an agreement with the government on residual functions of the court, which included witness protection, supervision of sentences, the trial of the last person indicted (Koroma), and SCSL archives. As the SCSL was establishing a policy on access to its archives, concerns were raised that the policy could be overly restrictive and might not allow prosecutors to use the archives to pursue war criminals in other jurisdictions such as Liberia.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 286–287; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 162–163.]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In March 2010, the International Herald Tribune newspaper apologized and paid fines for a defamation claim in relation to an article on political dynasties which included the names of former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew (in office 1959–1990) and his son Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong (in office 2004–) in a list of families occupying high positions in Asia.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 288.]

In May 2010, Vincent Cheng, held under the Internal Security Act in 1987 as the alleged leader of a Marxist conspiracy, agreed for the first time to speak publicly about his treatment in detention at a seminar, Singapore's History: Who Writes the Script, organized by students from the History Society of the National University of Singapore. The National Library Board, the venue's sponsor, however, rescinded the invitation and the event went ahead without Cheng's participation.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 366.]

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Former Prime Minister Robert Fico unveiled the statue of Svätopluk at Bratislava Castle shortly before the June 2010 parliamentary elections, expressing the wish for it to become a destination for pilgrims to honor Slovak nationhood. Under the rule of Svätopluk I (830–894), King of Great Moravia (871–894), Great Moravia reached its largest territorial expansion. When the statue became the focal point for right-wing extremists, the new government and the liberal SaS (Sloboda a Solidarita; Freedom and Solidarity) political party reportedly wanted to remove the statue from the castle grounds.

[Source: Slovak Spectator (10 August 2010).]

SLOVENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The authorities continued to fail to guarantee the rights of former permanent residents of Slovenia originating from other former Yugoslav republics (they were known as the “erased”). Their legal status had been unlawfully revoked in 1992, resulting in violations of their economic and social rights. Some of them were also forcibly removed from Slovenia. On 8 March 2010, the National Assembly passed a law which aimed at retroactively reinstating permanent residency status to the “erased.” The parliamentary and public discussion prior to the adoption of the law was marred by xenophobic statements by several parliamentarians. On 12 March 2010, right-wing parties filed a proposal with the parliament to organize a referendum on the adoption of the new law; it was rejected by the Constitutional Court in June 2010. In July 2010, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruled that the authorities had violated the right to private and family life of eight applicants whose permanent residency permit had been revoked in 1992. The ECHR also found a violation of the right to an effective remedy, as the authorities had failed to implement two separate decisions of the Constitutional Court, issued in 1999 and 2003, related to the rights of the “erased.” In August 2010, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) recommended, among other things, that the authorities grant full reparation, including restitution, satisfaction, compensation, rehabilitation and guarantees of non-repetition, to all people affected by the revocation of their permanent residency status.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 290–291.]

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

See India, Thailand.

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In April 2010, the Supreme Court accused investigating judge Baltasar Garzón of breaking the 1977 amnesty law. Garzón had initiated Spain's first ever investigation into crimes committed during the Civil War (1936–1939) and the Franco regime (1939–1975), involving the enforced disappearance of over 114,000 individuals in 1936–1951. Subsequently, in May 2010, the General Judicial Council suspended him from duty for the duration of his trial before the Supreme Court. (See NCH Annual Report 2010.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 301; Keesings historisch archief, (2011) 165–166.]

In September and November 2010, the National Criminal Court closed investigations into crimes committed in Myanmar and Tibet. The decisions were taken following the limitation of universal jurisdiction by an amendment to the Law on the Judiciary in October 2009. Since the amendment, domestic courts were no longer able to prosecute cases unless the victims were Spanish citizens, the alleged perpetrator was in Spain, or there was another “relevant connecting link” with Spain and only if there was no effective investigation or prosecution already in another country or international court.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 301.]

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In May 2009, the civil war (1983–2009) between government forces and the separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) ended with the defeat of the LTTE. When in late 2009, former army commander Sarath Fonseka, then a presidential candidate, stated he was willing to testify about the conduct of the war, the defense secretary threatened to have him executed for treason. In March 2010, United Nations (UN) Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon announced plans to establish a Panel of Experts to advise him on accountability issues in Sri Lanka. President Mahinda Rajapaksa protested against the announcement and in May 2010 appointed an ad hoc Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission (LLRC) to examine the failure of the 2002 ceasefire, but its terms of reference made no mention of seeking accountability for violations of human rights or humanitarian law. The authorities continued to deny access to human rights organizations and other independent observers to visit the country to conduct research. On 6 July 2010, Minister Wimal Weerawansa led a demonstration that temporarily closed down the United Nations's Colombo office in an unsuccessful bid to force Ban Ki-moon to withdraw his Panel of Experts. A United States State Department report, released on 11 August 2010, noted "the history of failings of a series of past [Commissions of Inquiry] established in Sri Lanka." These included two investigations (the "Group of Eminent Persons" and the LLRC) into laws-of-war violations during the civil war. These violations included including the government's indiscriminate shelling of civilians and the LTTE's use of thousands of civilians as human shields in the final months of the war. Sri Lanka had a long history of establishing ad hoc inquiries to deflect international criticism over its poor human rights record. Since independence in 1948, Sri Lanka had established more than ten such commissions, none of which had produced any significant results. The LLRC's mandate, which focused on the breakdown of the 2002 ceasefire between the government and the LTTE, did not explicitly require it to investigate alleged war crimes during the conflict, nor did the LLRC show any apparent interest in investigating such allegations in its hearings to date. As pressure mounted for an independent investigation into alleged laws of war violations, the government responded by threatening journalists and civil society activists, effectively curtailing public debate.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010), 302; Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 28, 301, 302; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010),

347, 352–53; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 370, 372; Human Rights Watch, “Sri Lanka: US Report Shows No Progress on Accountability” (11 August 2010).]

Enforced disappearances and abductions for ransom carried out by members of the security forces were reported in many parts of the country, particularly in northern and eastern Sri Lanka and in Colombo. Hundreds of members of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) who reportedly disappeared after they had surrendered to the army in 2009 remained unaccounted for. Military and civilian officials rejected allegations that Sri Lankan forces had violated international humanitarian law in the final phase of the armed conflict and made repeated public statements claiming that “zero civilian casualties” had occurred. Hundreds of people seeking news of relatives who disappeared after arrest by the army attempted to testify before the Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission when it held sessions in the north and east starting in August 2010. Few were able to speak to the commissioners, and there were reports that witnesses were photographed and threatened. The commission’s interim report made useful recommendations to safeguard the rights of detainees and address other public grievances, but failed to address the need for accountability. Suspected perpetrators of human rights violations continued to hold responsible positions in government. In November 2010, the government investigated claims that the LTTE killed captured soldiers as the army advanced toward Kilinochchi, but continued to reject allegations that its own forces killed civilians and captured combatants during the armed conflict.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 302, 303.]

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

Awaif Ahmed Issag Osman ([1985–]), a Darfuri feminist and activist who had started her own community publication, Al Raheel (“tree” news), was arrested by the national security authorities. She had posted news on a tree trunk in the center of El Fasher, North Darfur, including articles about the conflict (2003–), violence against women, and the culture and history of Darfur.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “Hellman/Hammett Grants Honor 42 Writers for Courage Facing Political Persecution” (4 August 2010).]

The government made little progress in implementing recommendations of the African Union (AU) High Level Panel on Darfur. The AU and other influential leaders did not press the government to do so. In Geneva, in September 2010, the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council renewed the mandate of the Independent Expert on Sudan, maintaining a much-needed avenue for human rights reporting, over objections from Sudan and its allies. The two major peacekeeping missions in Sudan, UNMIS (UN Mission in Sudan) and UNAMID (UN–AU Mission in Darfur), did not publicly report on their human rights concerns except through regular reports to the UN secretary-general.

On 12 July 2010, the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued an additional arrest warrant against President Al Bashir for genocide. The pre-trial chamber found there were reasonable grounds to believe that Al Bashir was responsible for three counts of genocide against the Fur, Massalit and Zaghawa ethnic communities. In July 2010, the Assembly of the African Union (AU) reaffirmed its decision not to co-operate with the ICC in relation to the arrest and surrender of Al Bashir. The Assembly asked AU member states to comply with its decision. Al Bashir visited Chad and Kenya, both states parties to the Rome Statute of the ICC, in July and August 2010. The Sudanese government did not co-operate with the ICC. The three people against whom the ICC had issued arrest warrants—Al Bashir, Ahmed Haroun (governor of South Kordofan since May 2009), and Ali Kushayb (former Janjaweed leader)—also remained free from prosecution in Sudan.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 2, 305; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 133–134.]

On 8 February 2010, the International Criminal Court (ICC) decided not to confirm the charges against Bahar Idriss Abu Garda, leader of the United Resistance Front, a Darfur-based armed group. Garda had been summoned in relation to three war crimes in an attack on Haskanita in 2007 against peacekeepers from the African Union Mission in Sudan (AMIS). He appeared voluntarily before the ICC on 18 May 2009. The pre-trial chamber rejected the ICC Prosecutor's appeal on 23 April 2010 and again refused to confirm the charges. On 17 June 2010, Abdallah Banda Abbaker Nourain, chief commander of the Collective Leadership of the armed opposition Justice and Equality Movement (JEM), and Saleh Mohammed Jerbo Jamus, former chief of staff of the Sudan Liberation Army-Unity who then joined the JEM, appeared before the ICC. The hearing to confirm the charges against them took place on 8 December 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 305.]

See also Kenya.

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

SWAZILAND

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In September 2010, the government doctored a report it had commissioned ahead of the United Nations General Assembly, by changing the report's conclusion that Swaziland was "not likely" to meet the Millennium Development Goals target of halving hunger and poverty in the country by 2015 so that it read that the country could "potentially" meet the target. An October 2010 report from the Washington-based International Food Policy Research Institute indicated that 18 per cent of Swaziland's one million people were suffering from hunger, compared to 12 per cent in 1990. In addition, 6.1 per cent of Swazi children under five were underweight, compared to 8.1 per cent in 1992, making Swaziland one of the few African countries where hunger had become more widespread during the last decades.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief, (2010), 650–651; "Swazi Govt Tried to Underreport Hunger" (<http://www.afrol.com/articles/36780>; 15 October 2010).]

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

See Rwanda.

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2010, crackdowns on celebrations of the Kurdish New Year, Newruz, led to the death of at least one person, while those arrested during the festivities were tried by the military. In July 2010, a military court sentenced nine Kurds alleged to have participated in the celebrations in Raqqa to four months for “inciting sectarian strife.” Kurdish citizens who organized a one-minute commemoration ceremony for the victims of the 1988 Halabja massacre (in Iraq) were also sentenced to prison.

[Sources: Cairo Institute for Human Rights Studies, Roots of Unrest: Human Rights in the Arab Region—Annual Report 2010 (29 March 2011), Summary of the Report (<http://www.cihrs.org/Images/ArticleFiles/Original/631.pdf>); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 588–589.]

In 2010, the authorities took no steps to account for thousands of people, mostly islamists, who disappeared in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and others abducted in Lebanon by Syrian forces or by pro-Syrian Lebanese and Palestinian militias, who then handed them over to Syrian forces in the years before they withdrew from Lebanon in April 2005.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 315.]

See also Lebanon.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

TANZANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

See Rwanda.

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The Devil's Discus, a biography about King Ananda Mahidol (Rama VIII) (1925–46) written by South African author Rayne Kruger (1922–2002) (London: Cassell, 1964) and banned in Thailand, was republished in 2009 in Hong Kong. An underground Thai translation was published in 2010. Journalist Paul Handley's unauthorized biography of King Bhumibol Adulyadey (Rama IX), The King Never Smiles (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006), was also banned in Thailand. In late May 2011, Thai-born United States citizen Joe Gordon (possibly a pseudonym) was arrested and charged with posting translations from Handley's book. The Thai government also blocked Yale's website.

[Sources: Freedom against Censorship in Thailand, "Interview with Prudence Leith, widow of Rayne Kruger" (21 January 2011); Newley Purnell, "Charge Against Professor Raises Questions about Academic Freedom in Thailand," Chronicle of Higher Education (1 June 2011); Wikipedia (3 February 2011).]

In 2010, government forces often raided Islamic schools in the south, including tadikas (after-school religious courses generally taking place in a mosque), to target teachers. One teacher interviewed by Human Rights Watch on 30 March 2010 said that teaching children about the Jawi language and Malay culture was seen by the military as disobedience and incitement to insurgency. He added that his school did not even have history courses. On the other hand, Muslim separatists in the three southernmost provinces attacked schools and killed teachers because in many villages schools were seen as symbols of the government, imposing an alien language of instruction (Thai), religion (Buddhism) and history (Thai national history) as part of an assimilation policy in a previously autonomous area.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, "Targets of Both Sides:" Violence against Students, Teachers, and Schools in Thailand's Southern Border Provinces (Washington 2010), 92; UNESCO, Protecting Education from Attack: A State-of-the-Art Review (Paris 2010) 41.]

A political crisis polarized Thai society for a fifth consecutive year, spiking sharply after former Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, deposed in a 2006 coup and in self-imposed exile, was convicted in his absence by a court in Bangkok in late February 2010 on corruption charges. Mid-March through late May 2010 saw increasingly violent anti-government protests by the United Front for Democracy against Dictatorship, partly affiliated with Thaksin. The government invoked the Internal Security Act in March 2010 and the Emergency Decree in April 2010; the latter remained in place in Bangkok and three other provinces until almost the end of 2010. In the aftermath of the violence, the government established several bodies for national reform and a Truth for Reconciliation Commission.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 319.]

Although Thailand and Cambodia normalized their relations in August 2010, in February 2011, new skirmishes took place in the Temple of Preah Vihear area (See NCH Annual Report 2009). The temple site, constructed between the ninth and eleventh centuries and dedicated to Hindu deity Shiva, had been a royal Khmer site linked to Angkor Vat.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief, (2011) 36; NRC Handelsblad (7 February 2011) 7.]

On 24 April 2011, Somsak Jeamteerasakul [Jeamtheerasakul] ([1958]–), a history professor at Thammasat University, revealed at a press conference that he had received phone calls in which he was threatened with lèse majesté charges. At a 10 December 2010 public event, Somsak had been on a public panel debating the lèse majesté laws and he had spoken about the reform and modernization (not the overthrow) of the monarchy, reportedly revealing some previously classified data in the process. Other sources said that Somsak had written an open letter to the King's youngest daughter, Princess Chulabhorn, who was herself not covered by the lèse majesté law. More specifically, Somsak had asserted that Thai citizens were not allowed to debate freely with the princess about a comment she made about the political crisis because of the lèse majesté law. Somsak unexpectedly became very popular and the anti-government Red Shirts, who had never heard of him, made copies of CDs of his speeches. On 11 May 2011, Somsak turned himself in to the police to hear the official charges filed by the Royal Thai Army, which he denied. Political scientist Giles Ji Ungpakorn, himself convicted for lèse majesté and exiled in the United Kingdom, said that the military wanted to create a climate of fear and to weaken the political opposition in anticipation of national elections expected in July 2011.

Somsak had been a leftist student leader during the royalist massacre of students at Thammasat University on 6 October 1976. He was arrested and later sentenced to two years' imprisonment. From the 1990s he had written a series of iconoclastic articles attacking several taboos surrounding the monarchy, questioning its democratic and politically impartial character. A number of these articles, published in newspapers and news weeklies, were expurgated.

[Sources: Patrick Jory, "Thai Historical Writing," in Axel Schneider & Daniel Woolf, eds., The Oxford History of Historical Writing, volume 5, 1945 to Present (Oxford 2011), 554–555; Yojana Sharma, "Academics Unnerved over Lèse Majesté Threat," University World News (27 April 2011); Yojana Sharma, "Academic Charged in Political Case," University World News (15 May 2011); Southeast Asian Press Alliance, Ifex Alert (12 May 2011); Newley Purnell, "Charge against Professor Raises Questions about Academic Freedom in Thailand," Chronicle of Higher Education (1 June 2011); Giles Ji Ungpakorn, "Academic Freedom and Lèse Majesté," University World News (22 May 2011).]

See also Myanmar.

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In January 2010, the Timor-Leste Office of the Ombudsman for Human Rights and Justice and the Indonesian National Human Rights Commission signed a memorandum of understanding on the implementation of recommendations of the joint Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF) and of the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR). The content of the memorandum was not made public. In early July 2010, two draft laws establishing a National Reparations Program and an "Institute for Memory," mandated to implement recommendations of the CTF and CAVR, were presented for public consultation. Parliament was scheduled to debate the laws in late September 2010; however, the debate was delayed until February 2011. There was very little progress in addressing past serious human rights violations, including crimes against humanity, committed in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999).

In March 2010, President José Ramos-Horta of Timor-Leste told the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council that “in the efforts to bring about peace between long-standing rival communities, often we have to compromise on justice.” This statement flew in the face of recommendations from the CAVR in 2005, as well as by Timorese victims, national human rights groups and UN justice experts. Ramos-Horta rejected calls from national and international NGOs for an international tribunal for past crimes, although he said he would not oppose it should the UN Security Council decide to establish one. The Serious Crimes Investigation Team continued to investigate serious human rights violations committed in 1999.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 28, 322.]

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In August 2010, the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC) opened regional branches throughout the country to collect testimonies. The TJRC was established in 2009 to shed light on human rights violations committed in 1958–2005. By the end of 2010, more than 5,800 people had made statements before the TJRC but most of these cases were from the 1960s to the 1980s. No victims of past human rights violations received any reparations. No progress was made in the investigation of 72 complaints lodged by victims of the political repression in 2005.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 322, 323.]

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2001.

In January 2011, less than a month after Mohamed Bouazizi’s desperate act (he set himself alight after a local official in the town of Sidi Bouzid prevented him from selling vegetables from his handcart and reportedly assaulted him), the government of President Zine El ‘Abidine Ben ‘Ali collapsed. Ben ‘Ali fled the country, seeking refuge in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia. The people of Tunisia celebrated the end of years of unaccountable rule (1987–2011), setting the stage for the restoration of a participatory and rights-respecting government to be elected. The fall of Ben ‘Ali’s government reverberated throughout the region and the world. In no time the upheaval in Tunisia triggered tremors in other countries. People took to the streets in Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, Jordan, Libya and Yemen.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), xii–xiii.]

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In a lecture on 7 May 2010, historian Taner Akçam (1953–) claimed that the Ergenekon group had prepared a hit list of five individuals, including Hrant Dink (assassinated in 2007), Nobel Prize for Literature winner Orhan Pamuk, and himself, all targeted for assassination because they spoke out on the Armenian genocide. They were reportedly condemned to death as “traitors to national security.” On 27 March 2011, a court in Sisli ordered Pamuk to pay fines to six plaintiffs in compensation for insulting their “Turkishness” after citing the number of Kurds and Armenians killed in Turkey. He had two weeks to appeal the case. The six who had launched the lawsuit included ultra-nationalist lawyer Kemal Kerincsiz (a suspect in the alleged Ergenekon coup plot and five others said to be relatives of soldiers killed during Turkey’s fight against “terrorism.”

(“Ergenekon” was the name of an alleged clandestine ultra-nationalist and state-sponsored terror organization with ties to the military and security forces, with the aim of overthrowing the government, and allegedly linked to several assassinations, including that of Hrant Dink; since October 2008, 273 people, including 116 military officers, were charged in the Ergenekon trial with trying to overthrow the government and to instigate armed riots).

[Sources: Armenian Weekly (11 May 2010; 28 March 2011); Index on Censorship, 4/10: 27–29, 206.]

On 20 July 2010, publisher Ragip Zarakolu and author Mehmet Güler were tried under the Anti-terror Law on charges of spreading propaganda that supported the banned Kurdish Workers’ Party (PKK) in a book by Güler entitled “The KCK File: The Global State and Kurds Without a State.” In May 2010, the book had been presented at the Diyarbakir Book Fair, in southeastern Turkey, where it was seized by police and subsequently banned. Zarakolu and Güler denied that the book promoted violence. Güler said that his book studied issues such as the closure of Kurdish political parties and the arrests of activists and members of city councils in the past year, adding that he “tried to give a short history of the Kurdish question, without being a supporter or an opponent for any side.” On 10 March 2011, Zarakolu was fined and Güler given a fifteen-month suspended prison term. In May 2009, Zarakolu and Güler had also been charged in another trial which concerned a novel by Güler about the Kurdish question.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 4/10: 39–40; PEN, Ifex Alert (26 July 2010; 14 March 2011).]

On 10 August 2010, upon his return in Turkey to visit his terminally ill father after having lived in exile for 19 years, German-Turkish writer Doğan Akhanlı (1957–) was charged with “violently undermining the constitutional order” and accused of involvement in a 1989 robbery and a murder. As a left-wing political activist, Akhanlı had joined the illegal Revolutionary Communist Party of Turkey (TDKP) after the 1980 military coup and become an underground fighter against the ruling junta. Arrested in 1985, he was convicted of membership in a terrorist organization and tortured in prison. After his release in 1987, he was kept under surveillance as a potential enemy of the state. In 1991, he and his family fled to Germany, where he was granted political asylum. In Cologne, he wrote a trilogy “Kayip Denizler” (The Disappearance of the Sea) about Turkish history. The first two volumes treated the 1970s and 1980s in Turkey; the prize-winning third volume, “Kiyamet Günü Yargıcları” (The Judges of the Last Judgment; translated into German as Die Richter des jüngsten Gerichts), described the Armenian genocide. Akhanlı was imprisoned. As the two principal prosecution witnesses withdrew their confessions saying that they were made under torture in 1992, Akhanlı was released on 6 December 2010. Many critics, including the German writer Günter Walraf, suspected that the trial was politically motivated.

[Sources: “Freedom and Justice for Doğan Akhanlı” (Online petition; 29 October 2010); Volker Hage & Daniel Steinvoth, “Thin Evidence: Trial of German-Turkish Author Slammed as ‘Revenge,’” Spiegel Online (12 August 2010); NRC Handelsblad (7 December 2010: 7; 9 December 2010: 8); Wikipedia (28 December 2010).]

In September 2010, folk music artist Pinar Sag faced four years’ imprisonment for allegedly praising İbrahim Kaypakkaya (1949–73)—founding member of the illegal Communist Party of Turkey—Marxist-Leninist (TKP-ML) in 1973—and for criticizing the killing of seventeen people by security forces. In a hearing on 15 September 2010, Sag said in her defence: “I advocated for peace.”

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (23 September 2010).]

The repeal in September 2010 of a provision in the constitution granting immunity from prosecution to military and public officials for crimes committed during and after the 1980 military coup was significant, although jurists debated whether existing statutes of limitations for torture and murder would impede prosecution. Three trials of alleged anti-government coup plotters (the “Ergenekon” gang, comprising senior retired military, police, mafia, journalists, and academics—see Akçam entry above) continued. In related prosecutions, 69 naval officers faced trial for plotting a 2008 campaign of violent attacks aimed at destabilizing the government, and 196 retired and serving military personnel were due to stand trial starting in December 2010 for a 2003 coup plot. The most significant attempt at bringing to justice state perpetrators of extrajudicial killings and “disappearances” continued with the ongoing trial in Diyarbakır of a now-retired colonel, village guards, and informers for the murder of 20 individuals between 1993 and 1995 in Cizre, Sırnak province.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 482–483.]

On 14 September 2010, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) unanimously ruled that Turkey had violated journalist Hrant Dink’s right to life (by failing to prevent the murder although the police and gendarmerie had been informed of the likelihood of an assassination attempt and even of the identity of the suspected instigators; and by not conducting an effective investigation into the failures which occurred in protecting Dink’s life) and to free expression (the guilty verdict having been handed down in the absence of a “pressing social need” and having made him a target for extreme nationalist groups). The ECHR concluded that the Court of Cassation had indirectly punished Dink for criticizing the official denial of the view that the 1915 events amounted to genocide. In paragraph 135 of the judgment, the ECHR reiterated that it was an integral part of freedom of expression to seek historical truth. In a defense argument submitted by Turkey to the ECHR, Dink had been compared to a Nazi leader and he had been accused of publishing “hate speech.” After the ECHR ruling, the Turkish government declared that it distanced itself from that argument and that it would not appeal the ECHR judgment. A murder trial of the alleged gunman and 19 other defendants in the Dink case had been ongoing for three years. (See previous NCH Annual Reports).

[Sources: European Court of Human Rights, Dink versus Turkey (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/170.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/171.pdf>; Strasbourg; 14 September 2010); Bianet, Ifex Alert (30 August 2010); “Hrant Dink,” <http://www.hrantdinkodulu.org> (19 March 2011); Human Rights Watch, “Turkey: Uncover Plot Behind Journalist’s Murder” (16 September 2010); Index on Censorship, 4/10: 212; 1/11: 156–173.]

On 30 October 2010, after a court ruling, the video-sharing website YouTube, blocked since May 2008, was made accessible after videos criticizing Atatürk were made inaccessible in Turkey although visible in the rest of the world. Reporters without Borders said that thousands of websites remained blocked, in most cases for criticizing Atatürk or the army, for perceived attacks on the nation’s “dignity” or for referring to the Kurdish and Armenian minorities.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 31–32; Index on Censorship, 1/11:

118; Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (8 June & 9 July & 4 November 2010).]

On 3 November 2010, writer Nevin Berktaş was arrested and detained because of her book “Difficult Places that Challenge the Faith: Prison Cells” (2000) describing resistance in the prison cells where she had been held for 22 years after the September 1980 military coup. The trial against her on charges of “spreading propaganda for an illegal organization” had been pending for ten years.

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (24 November 2010)]

In January 2011, caricaturist Bahadır Baruter was reportedly threatened and insulted on the Internet after he designed a deck of cards with Ottoman sultans resembling insects.

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (10 January 2011).]

In January 2011, the popular series Muhteşem Yüzyıl (The Magnificent Century), a fictional version of the life of Sultan Süleyman (1494–1566) which went on air on Show TV on 6 January 2011, sparked street protests and tens of thousands of complaints from conservatives and nationalists, including from the ruling Justice and Development party (AK), who felt its portrayal of the ruler’s drinking and womanizing insulted their ancestors. The series was also criticized by Deputy Prime Minister Bülent Arınç and members of the Prosperity Party (SP). Protests had started after promotional material had been broadcast from 11 December 2010 onward and billboards to advertise for the series were posted. Some people demanded cancellation of the series even before the first episode had been broadcast. On 5 January 2011, a group of protestors gathered in front of Show TV in Istanbul to express their disapproval. The Radio and Television Supreme Council (RTÜK; a body regulating the media) declared that it had received 74,911 complaints about the series between 11 December 2010 and 6 January 2011 and that the series did not display “the necessary sensitivity to the privacy of a historical figure” and broke a law stipulating that broadcasts “should not violate society’s national and moral values.” It warned that it could block future episodes if the producers did not make changes. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdoğan said that “The privacy of historical figures is important. We are not a nation or a state without roots; we are a nation that built civilisations.” Süleyman became known in the West as the Magnificent and the Lawgiver in Turkey and ruled during the Ottoman Empire’s Golden Age.

[Sources: Bianet, “RTÜK: “Magnificent Century” Series Clashes with “Moral Values” (13 January 2011); Historisch nieuwsblad (March 2011), 27; Delphine Strauss, “Sultan’s Love Life Opens Moral Rift,” Financial Times (15–16 January 2011), 2.]

On 3 March 2011, Nedim Şener, a reporter for the daily national newspaper Milliyet and author of The Dink Murder and Intelligence Lies (2009), was arrested together with numerous others for questioning “on suspicion of being members of the Ergenekon terrorist organization and of spreading hatred and enmity among the population,” a charge so vague that it potentially could cover legitimate acts of critical journalism. Another arrested person was socialist economist, writer and historian Yalçın Küçük (1938–), author of, inter alia, historical studies on the Ottoman and Republican periods and on Soviet economic development. Earlier in 2011, Şener had reportedly received death threats for his comments that suggested police accused of negligence into the inquiry into Dink’s death were also linked to Ergenekon. In one of the two books he wrote since his release, entitled “Red Friday, Who Broke Dink’s Pen?”, he had revealed secret documents about Dink’s murder, proving that the National Intelligence Agency MİT and the police had notice of the preceding death threats against Dink. On 6 March 2011, Şener and others were formally charged with being members of the Ergenekon organization. (See also NCH Annual Report 2010.)

[Sources: Bianet, “Several Journalists in Police Custody” (4 March 2011); Human Rights Watch, “Turkey: Journalists’ Arrests Chills Free Speech” (4 March 2011); Ifex Communique (16 June 2010); International Press Institute, Ifex Alert (16 June 2010); PEN, Rapid Action Network 10/11 (4 & 7 March 2011).]

On 26 April 2011, demolition began of an unfinished 30 meter-high statue created by Turkish artist Mehmet Aksoy—called the Statue of Humanity and devoted to reconciliation with Armenia—in Kars, near the Armenian border. In January 2011, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan had called it an affront to the nearby sixteenth-century shrine (rebuilt in 1996) of the Muslim Saint Hasan Harakani (963–1033). Kars’s large Armenian community had been annihilated in the 1915 genocide. In 2009, Turkey and Armenia had agreed to normalize relations after nearly a century of hostility and, therefore, the former mayor of Kars had commissioned the sculpture.

[Source: BBC News (10 January & 26 April 2011).]

See also United States.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

During his first two years in office (2006–2008), President Gurbanguly Berdymukhamedov began to reverse some of dictator Saparmurad Niyazov’s most ruinous social policies. But then his course appeared to reverse. The government increasingly repressed NGOs and Turkmen activists, and prevented citizens from leaving the country. Instead of continuing needed reforms in education in 2010, the government introduced burdensome requirements for students seeking to travel abroad for university, and allowed “Ruhnama” (The Book of the Soul), Niyazov’s propaganda book, to remain a subject in university entrance exams.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 485.]

The authorities continued to withhold information about the whereabouts of dozens of people arrested and convicted in connection with the alleged assassination attempt on former President Saparmurad Niyazov in 2002. Calls on the authorities to disclose information about those who had died in custody remained unanswered.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 332.]

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In June 2010, the International Crimes Act, which incorporated the 1998 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) into domestic law, came into effect. Arrest warrants issued in 2005 by the ICC for Joseph Kony, leader of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), and three LRA commanders remained in force, but the men remained at large.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 332.]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic).

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 15 June 2010, a court was due to start hearing a lawsuit initiated by Volodymyr Volosyuk against President Viktor Yanukovich for declaring in the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg in April 2010 that the famine that killed millions of Ukrainians in the 1930s had affected many nationalities and ethnic groups, and that therefore it was not fair to label it genocide. Volosyuk argued that Yanukovich wounded his personal honor and dignity and the memory of the millions of Ukrainians who died in the famine; he asked for an apology.

[Source: "Ukrainian Sues Yanukovich Over Famine Statement," RFE/RL (15 June 2010).]

In early September 2010, Minister of Education Dmytro Tabachnyk reportedly ordered to remove passages about the 2004 Orange Revolution (which, prompted by fraudulent elections, led to the defeat of Yanukovich) from the new 2010 history textbooks and replace it with summary information on the 2004–2010 period. The textbooks for the fifth class, with a print run of 506,000, received a new front cover without the background picture containing the Orange Revolution protests that was included in the 2005 edition; the 2010 edition had only Cossack leaders on the front cover. In a Russophile turn, other passages reportedly cut out included episodes when Ukrainians fought against Russia for independence. The Holodomor of 1932–1933 was no longer designated as "artificial" and directed against Ukraine.

[Source: Taras Kuzio, "Orange Revolution Erased from Ukrainian School Textbooks"]

(<http://www.jamestown.org/blog>; 7 September 2010).]

On 8 September 2010 in Kyiv, members of the Security Service of Ukraine (SBU) detained historian Ruslan Zabily (also: Zabilyi), the director of the Memorial Museum at the former prison of Lonskoho in Lviv (a museum under SBU auspices), for fourteen hours for planning to divulge state secrets. His computer was confiscated on the grounds that it allegedly contained top-secret documents. On 9 September 2010, the SBU launched a criminal case against him for alleged violation of national secrecy laws. On 13 and 14 September 2010, SBU officers in Lviv searched the museum and removed other computers to determine whether secret information was stored there. Zabily declared that his computer only contained documents concerning the guerrilla UPA (Ukrainian Resistance Army, the military wing of the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists, OUN) and the Ukrainian independence movement in the 1940s and 1950s, all of which were documents declassified in 1991, and for some, in 2008–2009 (when former President Victor Yushchenko had decreed that secret archival documents be declassified). Volodymyr Vyatrovych, the former director of the SBU and the SBU archive, endorsed this opinion. On 15 September 2010, more than 100 leading historians from around the globe issued an open letter to SBU, protesting against Zabily's detention and calling on the government not to restrict archival access.

In October 2009, Lviv historians and others had signed an open appeal to the government and the SBU expressing their opposition to the creation of the museum under SBU auspices, inter alia because the museum would also serve as a research institution aimed at studying the history of repression against the Ukrainian and other peoples in the twentieth century.

[Sources: "Director of the National Museum-Prison "Tyurma na Lonskoho" Detained by the Security Service" (Human Rights in Ukraine; <http://khpg.org/index.php?id=1284024778>; 9 September 2010); Natalia Feduschak, "Harassment of Historian Raises Censorship Fears," Kyiv Post (15 September 2010); "Lviv Museum-Prison "Tyurma na Lonskoho" Must Not Be under the Auspices of the SBU" (Human Rights in Ukraine; <http://www.khpg.org/en/index.php?id=1254833201>; 6 October 2009); "SBU Claims that Historian Wanted To Pass on State secrets" (Alliance Maidan, Ukraine; <http://eng.maidanua.org/node/1143>; 9 September 2010).]

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In March 2010, the Ministry of Defense announced the establishment of the Iraq Historic Allegations

Team to investigate allegations of criminal wrongdoing in relation to the abuse of Iraqi citizens by United Kingdom armed forces. Investigations began in November 2010 and were expected to take two years.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 340.]

On 15 June 2010, the Bloody Sunday Inquiry published its findings into the events of Sunday 30 January 1972, during which thirteen civil rights marchers were killed and as many others wounded by British soldiers in Derry, Northern Ireland. The inquiry concluded that none of those killed or injured that day bore any responsibility for the shootings; none of them posed a threat. It confirmed that several of the victims were shot in the back while running away. It also found that the accounts put forward by many of the soldiers were manifestly and knowingly untrue. Accordingly, the deaths and injuries caused by British soldiers that day were found to be unjustified. In response, Prime Minister David Cameron gave a public state apology for the “unjustified and unjustifiable” killing.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 31, 340; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 436.]

In June or July 2010, Robert Service, professor of history at Oxford University, and former Cambridge fellow Rachel Polonsky threatened to sue historian Orlando Figes, history professor at Birkbeck College, London for defamation because he had posted negative pseudonymous reviews of their works on the British site of online bookseller Amazon. On 23 April 2010, Figes had already issued a statement in which he admitted responsibility for the reviews (after first denying it and threatening to sue for libel anyone who connected him with the reviews) and apologized to Service and Polonsky. After the latter threatened to go to court, Figes agreed to pay legal costs and damages and to issue a second apology to them. Polonsky declared that her book, Molotov's Magic Lantern, had benefited from the publicity surrounding the affair.

[Sources: Daily Mail (23 April 2010); Guardian (16 July 2010); New York Times (19 July 2010); “Orlando Figes,” Wikipedia (23 October 2010).]

In September 2010, MI6: The History of the Secret Intelligence Service 1909–1949 was published. During research for this first official history of MI6 (2005–2010), Northern Irish author Keith Jeffery, a member of the School of History and Anthropology at Queen's University, Belfast, had “full and unrestricted” but privileged access to MI6's closed archives. MI6 officially acknowledged its existence in 1994 only; it did not release any of its departmental records to the British National Archives. Jeffery accepted some constraints, but argued that as long as deletions were restricted to “genuine matters of national security” rather than an attempt to protect the agency from embarrassment, or to suppress failure or wrongdoing, “it ought to be a price worth paying.” A similar study for the Security Service (MI5), The Defence of the Realm: The Authorized History of MI5, was published by historian Christopher Andrew in 2009.

[Sources: David Jobbins, “UK: Belfast Historian Sheds Light on Secret Service,” University World News (26 September 2010); NRC Handelsblad (1 October 2010) 15.]

See also Myanmar, Thailand.

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In November 2009, the National Security Archive (NSA) submitted a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request to access a 600-plus-page internally-produced history of Nazi-hunting and Nazi-protecting by the United States (US) government written by staff of the Justice Department Office of Special Investigations (OSI; the unit responsible for excluding or deporting Nazi collaborators who entered the US illegally or fraudulently following World War II). The department denied the request on grounds that the history—although commissioned by former Attorney General Janet Reno in the late 1990s, completed in 2006 and never revised since then—was a “predecisional” draft and therefore withholdable under the fifth exemption to the FOIA (“inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters”). In May 2010, after the NSA filed suit, the department released a heavily redacted version of the report, in which roughly a quarter of the contents were blacked-out (even the “personal opinions” of Congresswoman Liz Holtzman as she had expressed them in public as well as to the author of the history). In November 2010, former officials leaked the full, uncensored text of the report to the New York Times, which published it on its website and featured some of its more notable revelations in a front-page article entitled “Nazis Were Given ‘Safe Haven’ in US, Report Says.” While some of the withheld information was embarrassing, most of it was not and much of it was already in the public domain. The department continued to withhold the “official” version for a further two months, releasing it with minor deletions days before it was scheduled to justify its actions in court. In 2009, the Justice Department had been charged by President Barack Obama with the responsibility of ensuring compliance with his directive that a “presumption of openness” should govern all official disclosure decisions.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 1/11: 33–34; National Security Archive, “Justice Department Censors Nazi-Hunting History” (13 November 2010).]

On 3 September 2010, Kaukab Siddique, associate professor of English and journalism at Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, called the state of Israel illegitimate at a pro-Palestinian rally in Washington. Asked about previous statements in which he had said that the Holocaust was a “hoax” intended to buttress support for Israel, Siddique replied that he was protected by academic freedom. After a controversy broke out, Siddique received threatening emails. Cary Nelson—the president of the American Association of University Professors known for his defense of the right of professors to take highly unpopular positions—declared that academic freedom protects the professor’s right to criticize the moral legitimacy of the Israeli state but that with regard to the Holocaust the question was whether the views called into question professional competence: “If he [Siddique] teaches modern literature, which includes Holocaust literature from a great many countries, then Holocaust denial could warrant a competency hearing,” Nelson commented. Siddique’s statements also prompted a letter from two Pennsylvania state senators in October 2010.

[Source: Dan Berrett, “Academic Freedom and Holocaust Denial,” Inside Higher Ed (26 October 2010).]

In September 2010, some conservative Texas Board of Education members asserted that the history textbooks presented a pro-Islamic and anti-Christian bias; for example, they reportedly spelled out atrocities committed by Christian crusaders while ignoring similar atrocities by Muslim fighters and reportedly called Christians “violent attackers” or “invaders” while playing down Muslim conquests in Europe as “migrations.” (See also NCH Annual Report 2010.)

[Source: New York Times (22 September 2010).]

In September 2010, the Pentagon [Department of Defense] bought up and on 20 September 2010 destroyed 10,000 copies of the book Operation Dark Heart. The book, an insider’s account written by Lieutenant Colonel Anthony Shaffer about life in Afghanistan, had been cleared for publication by Shaffer’s superiors at the United States army reserve command despite being critical of strategy in Afghanistan. The Pentagon justified its action because the book “contained information which could cause damage to national security.” Only a few copies survived the destruction. Shaffer agreed to a redacted version of the book, which was released days later. He declared that, although the Pentagon had promised “surgical” censorship, the book had been substantially redacted throughout its 300 pages with black marks replacing words or passages deemed unacceptable.

[Source: Telegraph (26 September 2010).]

In September 2010, Our Virginia: Past and Present (Five Ponds Press, Weston, Connecticut)—a history textbook written by Joy Masoff and distributed for the first time to fourth-graders of the public elementary schools in the State of Virginia—claimed that thousands of African Americans fought for the South during the Civil War (1861–1865). The claim, often made by groups disputing the widely accepted conclusion that the struggle over slavery was the main cause of the Civil War (such as the Sons of Confederate Veterans), was called a misrepresentation by professional historians.

[Source: Washington Post (20 October 2010).]

On 8 November 2010, Waziyatawin, a historian and professor of indigenous studies at the University of Victoria, British Columbia, Canada, and an activist for land rights of the Dakota people, gave a lecture at Winona State University, Minnesota, about reclaiming Native American land rights “by any means necessary.” After a student accused her of inciting violence against white people, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), reportedly concerned about national security, called her. A spokesperson for the FBI would not confirm whether there was an active investigation.

[Source: Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, “B.C. Professor’s Lecture Prompts FBI Call” (11 January 2011).]

On 30 November 2010, the Turkish Coalition of America (TCA) sued the University of Minnesota for defamation over the website of its Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies (CHGS) which contained a list of “unreliable websites” for research on genocide—including the TCA website—because they did not call the 1915 Armenian massacres a genocide. The CHGS removed the links to “unreliable websites”; it declared, however, that the decision to remove them was taken before it was informed of the TCA charge. On 30 March 2011, a federal judge ruled in favor of the university, arguing that the CHGS had the right to express views criticizing websites that argued against the certainty of an Armenian genocide and that the CHGS was free to indicate to students that it thought that certain websites were not proper sources for scholarly research. The ruling was unusual in that it was decided strictly on the issue of academic freedom.

[Sources: Scott Jaschik, “Suit Over ‘Unreliable Websites,’” Inside Higher Ed (1 December 2010); Sott Jaschik, “Unusual Ruling for Academic Freedom,” Inside Higher Ed (31 March 2011).]

In [November] 2010, a judge ruled that an article by David Holthouse (see NCH Annual Report 2009) had to feature a “retraction and apology” that contained the following passage: “We now realize that we misunderstood Professor [Gunter] Lewy’s scholarship, were wrong to assert that he was part of a network financed by the Turkish Government, and were wrong to assume that any scholar who challenges the Armenian genocide narrative necessarily has been financially compromised by the Government of Turkey. We hereby retract the assertion that Professor Lewy was or is on the Government of Turkey's payroll."

[Source: Scott Jaschik, "Suit Over 'Unreliable Websites,'" Inside Higher Ed (1 December 2010).]

In 2010, there continued to be an absence of accountability and remedy for the human rights violations, including the crimes under international law of torture and enforced disappearance, committed as part of the United States (US) program of secret detention and rendition (transfer of individuals from the custody of one state to another by means that bypass judicial and administrative due process) operated under the administration of President George W. Bush (2001–2009). In his memoirs, published in November 2010, and in a pre-publication interview, Bush admitted that he had personally authorized "enhanced interrogation techniques" for use by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) against detainees held in secret custody. On 9 November 2010, the US Department of Justice announced, without further explanation, that no one would face criminal charges in relation to the destruction in 2005 by the CIA of videotapes made of the interrogations of two detainees—Abu Zubaydah and 'Abd al-Nashiri—held in secret custody in 2002. The 92 tapes depicted evidence of the use of "enhanced interrogation techniques" against the two detainees. The "preliminary review" ordered in August 2009 by Attorney General Eric Holder into some aspects of some interrogations of some detainees held in the secret detention program was apparently continuing at the end of 2010. On 8 September 2010, the full US Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit upheld the US administration's invocation of the "state secrets privilege" and agreed to dismiss a lawsuit brought by five men who claimed they were subjected to enforced disappearance, and torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment at the hands of US personnel and agents of other governments as part of the US secret detention and rendition program operated by the CIA. The six judges in the majority pointed to the possibility that "non-judicial relief" might be open to the plaintiffs, and that action to this end could be taken by the executive or Congress. There were calls for the US to investigate how much US officials knew about the torture or other ill-treatment of detainees held by the Iraqi security forces after new evidence emerged in files released by the Wikileaks organization in October 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 16, 343–344.]

In March 2011, William Cronon, Frederick Jackson Turner and Vilas research professor of history, geography and environmental studies at the University of Wisconsin and president-elect of the American Historical Association, was asked to write an article for the New York Times on the historical context of the effort of Scott Walker, Governor of Wisconsin, to get a state law approved to strip public-employee unions (including University of Wisconsin employees) of most bargaining rights. During his research for the article, on 14 March 2011, Cronon posted on his blog critical observations about the network of conservatives reportedly working to undermine union rights. He pointed to the American Legislative Exchange Council, a conservative group backed by business interests that circulated draft legislation in every state capital, much of it similar to a union-busting law in Wisconsin. On 16 March 2011, the Republican Party of Wisconsin filed a freedom-of-information request (on the basis of the Wisconsin Open Records Law) with the university, demanding copies of all emails into and out of Cronon's state email account from 1 January 2011 which referenced any of the following terms: Republican, Scott Walker, recall, collective bargaining, AFSCME (American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees), WEAC (Wisconsin Education Association Council), rally, union, Alberta Darling, Randy Hopper, Dan Kapanke, Rob Cowles, Scott Fitzgerald, Sheila Harsdorf, Luther Olsen, Glenn Grothman, Mary Lazich, Jeff Fitzgerald, Marty Beil, or Mary Bell. The purpose of the request was reportedly to see whether Cronon supported the recall of Republican state senators, which would be against university policy (he would then have violated a state law barring public employees from using state resources, such as their work e-mail accounts, for partisan political purposes). On 21 March 2011, the article in the New York Times appeared. The demand was called an abuse of academic freedom with a chilling effect on the university. On 27 March 2011, the American Historical Association deplored what it called an effort to intimidate Cronon. On 1 April 2011, Chancellor Caroly Martin of the University of Wisconsin at Madison partially complied with the state open records request by releasing a selection of Cronon's e-mails, excluding those e-mails involving personal communications, those about personnel matters, and those reflecting "intellectual communications among scholars." The university noted that confidentiality of scholarly discussions was vital to scholarship and to the mission of the university; that faculty members had to be afforded privacy in these exchanges in order to pursue knowledge and develop lines of argument without fear of reprisal for controversial findings and without the premature disclosure of those ideas; that the public interest in intellectual communications among scholars as reflected in Cronon's e-mails was outweighed by other public interests favoring protection of such communications; and that having every exchange of ideas subject to public exposure put academic freedom in peril and threatened the processes by which knowledge was created. The Republican Party did not plan to appeal the partial denial of its request. [Sources: William Cronon, "Wisconsin's Radical Break," New York Times (21 March 2011); William Cronon, "Scholar as Citizen" (blog; <http://scholarcitizen.williamcronon.net>); Doug Lederman, "Wisconsin Stands Up for Professor," Inside Higher Ed. (4 April 2011); Peter Schmidt, "Wisconsin GOP Seeks E-Mails of a Madison Professor Who Criticized the Governor," Chronicle of Higher Education (25 March 2011); "A Shabby Crusade in Wisconsin" (editorial), New York Times (25 March 2011).]

On 14 April 2011, the National Security Archive (NSA) filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) lawsuit to compel the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to release its five-volume Top Secret "Official History of the Bay of Pigs Invasion". Based on a review of hundreds of CIA documents and on dozens of interviews with key operatives and officials involved in this 1961 operation, it was written by CIA historian Jack Pfeiffer (?–1997) in the 1970s. In 1987, then retired, Pfeiffer himself filed an unsuccessful FOIA lawsuit seeking the release of volume 5 ("Internal Investigation Report"). Volume 3 (Evolution of CIA's Anti-Castro Policies, 1951–January 1961) was released in 1998. In 2005, the NSA had already unsuccessfully requested the disclosure of the study.

[Source: National Security Archive, Update (14 April 2011).]

See also Bolivia, Colombia, Germany, India, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Kyrgyzstan, Myanmar, Philippines, Russia, Sri Lanka, Thailand.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 2 August 2010, former Montevideo provincial congressman for the Communist Party of Uruguay (PCU), Carlos Alberto Tutzó López, sued journalist Álvaro Alfonso in defamation and demanded the confiscation of all editions of his book Secretos del Partido Comunista (Secrets of the Communist Party; July 2008). A book passage claimed that Tutzó, arrested in 1977 by agents of the military dictatorship (1973–1985), was a "collaborator" with his jailers.

[Source: Inter American Press Association, Ifex Alert (10 August 2010).]

Some positive steps were taken to break the cycle of impunity for human rights violations committed during the nearly twelve-year period of civilian and military rule (1973–1985). In October 2010, the Supreme Court of Justice ruled unanimously that the 1986 Law on the Expiration of the Punitive Claims of the State (Expiry Law) was unconstitutional in the case of former President Juan María Bordaberry (1971–1976), thus allowing his trial to continue. He was charged with ten cases of homicide. This was the Supreme Court's second landmark ruling on the Expiry Law, which prevented the prosecution of police and military officials for crimes committed under military rule. However, the ruling applied only to the case at hand and therefore did not provide for the reopening of previously archived cases. In the same month, members of Congress presented a bill that would declare three articles of the Expiry Law null and void. The Chamber of Deputies approved the bill, but it remained pending before the Senate at the end of 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 15, 346.]

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 10 February 2010, photographer and videographer Umida Ahmedova was convicted of defamation and insulting the Uzbek people for publishing a book of photographs in 2007 and producing a documentary film in 2008 that reflect everyday life and traditions in Uzbekistan, with a focus on gender inequality. She was acquitted.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 498.]

See also Kyrgyzstan.

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2008, German church historian Hubert Wolf (1959–) published Papst und Teufel, Die Archive des Vatikan und das Dritte Reich (translated as Pope and Devil: The Vatican's Archives and the Third Reich in 2010), for which he made use of these archives.

[Source: John Pollard, “Pope and Devil: the Vatican's Archives and the Third Reich,” Times Higher Education (19 August 2010).]

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2008, Thich Quang Do (1928–), a Buddhist scholar and poet, author of several novels and studies of Buddhist history, became Supreme Patriarch of the unofficial Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam. In 2010, he remained under de facto house arrest (See previous NCH Annual Reports).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 15, 352; Freedom House, “Thich Quang Do” (9 December 2010).]

In April 2011, Bui Chat ([1984–])—founder-director of the underground Giay Vun publishing house that had published the works of banned authors, including poets and historians, for almost a decade—received the International Publishers Association Freedom to Publish Prize. On 30 April 2011, after he returned home from Argentina where he picked up the prize, he was briefly arrested, his house was searched and his prize was confiscated. On 2 May 2011, Bui Chat was released but he remained under surveillance and subject to interrogation.

[Sources: International Publishers Association, Ifex Alert (28 April 2011); International Publishers Association, Press Releases (2 & 3 May 2011); Ifex Communiqué (4 May 2011); Reporters without Borders, “Independent Publisher Freed, but Questioned Again” (5 May 2011).]

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco/Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

ZAMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 26 March 2010, armed police raided an art gallery in Bulawayo that presented pictures of victims and families from the Matabeleland massacres in the 1980s in which an estimated 20,000 people were killed by troops loyal to President Robert Mugabe. They arrested artist Owen Maseko on charges of “insulting or undermining the authority of the president,” later altered into “publication of false statements prejudicial to the state.” He spent four days in police custody before he was released on bail. In late 2010, he awaited trial.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 198; D. Smith, “Police Shut Art Gallery for Showing Images of Zimbabwe Political Violence,” Guardian, (4 April 2010).]

INTRODUCTION

The sixteenth Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists, and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

The complete set of Annual Reports (1995–2010) was compiled by Antoon De Baets. Please send any comments to: <antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org>.

Please quote as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2010 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org>).

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The failure to implement the 2005 Action Plan on Peace, Justice and Reconciliation and disband illegal armed groups allowed individuals suspected of serious human rights violations to stand for and hold public office. The Afghan government and its international supporters failed to institute proper human rights protection mechanisms ahead of the August 2009 elections. The elections were marred by violence and allegations of widespread electoral fraud. Despite a public outcry, President Karzai's post re-election cabinet included several figures facing credible and public allegations of war crimes and serious human rights violations committed during Afghanistan's armed conflicts (1978–2001), as well as after the fall of the Taleban (2001–). Human rights groups continued to document war crimes.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 55; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 271.]

On 27 October 2007, Sayed Parwez Kambakhsh, a student and part-time journalist in his early twenties, was detained in Mazar e-Sharif, Balkh province, northern Afghanistan, accused of writing and distributing an article that criticized the role of women in the Quran. Kambakhsh declared that he had merely downloaded the article from the Internet and sent it to friends, and that, while in detention, he had been forced to sign a confession after torture. On 22 January 2008, the court in Balkh sentenced Kambakhsh to death for blasphemy (insulting Islam and the prophet) in a trial of a few minutes. One of the pieces accepted as evidence was a book found in his bedroom, The Story of Civilization (title possibly Religion in the Story of Civilization), written by American historian Will Durant (1885–1981). In October 2008, an appeals court upheld the conviction but commuted his sentence to twenty years' imprisonment because the prime witness for the prosecution had retracted his statement. In February 2009, the Supreme Court upheld the sentence. He was reportedly under threat from his fellow prisoners. In August or September 2009, President Hamid Karzai pardoned him. Kambakhsh was granted asylum in Europe.

[Sources: BBC News (Online; 7 September 2009); Human Rights Watch, "Afghanistan: 20-Year Sentence for Journalist Upheld—Politicized Case Shows Grave Threat to Freedom of Expression" (Online; 10 March 2009); International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, "Sayed Parwez Kambakhsh—Afghanistan" (Online).]

See also Pakistan.

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 1996.

See Serbia.

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, under a state of emergency imposed in 1992, and with President Abdelaziz Bouteflika winning reelection to a third term, perpetrators of atrocities during the internal conflict (1992–2000) continued to enjoy impunity. The legal framework for that impunity was the 2006 Law on Peace and National Reconciliation, which provided an amnesty to security force members for the actions they took in the name of combating terrorism, and to armed group members not implicated in the most heinous acts. The law promised compensation for families of disappeared persons but at the same time made it a crime to denigrate state institutions or security forces for the way they conducted themselves during the internal conflict.

Over 100,000 Algerians died during political internal conflict. Thousands more were abducted by security forces or armed opposition groups, and never located, dead or alive. On 19 April 2009, Bouteflika expressed his continuing commitment to the process of “national reconciliation” initiated when he first came to power in 1999. During his election campaign, he proposed the introduction of an amnesty for armed groups. In August 2009, the government promulgated Law 09–04 and issued a presidential decree to make the Algerian National Advisory Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (CNCPPDH) more transparent and independent. In March 2009, the Sub-Committee on Accreditation of the International Coordinating Committee of National Institutions had recommended not to fully accredit the CNCPPDH for failing to comply with the Paris Principles on national human rights institutions.

In 2009, the authorities took no further steps to investigate the thousands of enforced disappearances that took place during the internal conflict of 1992–2000. In September 2009, the father of Faycal Benlatreche (one of the disappeared), who had continued to campaign for truth and justice over many years and who founded the Association of the Families of the Disappeared in Constantine, died. In August 2009, a government minister reportedly said that almost 7,000 families of the disappeared had accepted financial compensation from the state, totalling 11 billion dinars

(about 14 million American dollars). CNCPPDH head Farouk Ksentini called for an official public apology to be made to the families of the disappeared but also described some of their demands for truth and justice as impossible to realize. Associations of families of the disappeared faced harassment such as registration difficulties and bans on their meetings. They condemned the continued failure of the state to provide a detailed account of the fate of their missing relatives.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 48, 60, 61; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 480, 482.]

See also Morocco/Western Sahara.

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2008 and 2009, Argentina actively promoted international resolutions to curb impunity for abuses. Its efforts led to a 2008 United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council resolution recognizing the importance of the right to the truth, encouraging states to implement the recommendations of non-judicial bodies (such as truth and reconciliation commissions), and to establish specific mechanisms to complement the justice system to investigate gross human rights violations. In June 2009, the Organization of American States Permanent Council adopted a similar resolution. In March 2009, the UN Human Rights Council approved another resolution proposed by Argentina, which encouraged states to use forensic genetics to contribute to identifying remains of abuse victims, and to restore the identity of individuals who were separated from their families, including those taken away when they were children.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 196; United Nations Resolution of 2008 at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/to/163.pdf; United Nations Resolution of 2009 at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/to/204.pdf; Organization of American States resolution of 2009 at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/to/198.pdf.]

In 2009, Argentina made significant progress in prosecuting military and police personnel responsible for disappearances, killings, and torture during the last military dictatorship (1976–1983). Several important cases were reopened in 2003 after Congress annulled the 1986 “Full Stop” law, which forced a halt to the prosecution of all such cases, and the 1987 “Due Obedience” law, which granted automatic immunity in such cases to all members of the military, except those in positions of command. In June 2005, the Supreme Court declared the laws unconstitutional. In addition, since 2005 several federal judges had struck down pardons decreed by then-president Carlos Menem in 1989–1990 of former officials convicted of or facing trial for human rights violations. As of July 2009, 588 people faced charges for these crimes. Since the amnesty laws were annulled, 44 people had been convicted. Delay in judicial processes undermined accountability, however. According to the Center for Legal and Social Studies, 193 people implicated in crimes committed during the dictatorship died before being brought to justice. An important reason for the delay was that several complex cases were on the docket to be heard by the same tribunal in the city of Buenos Aires. In March 2009 some cases were redistributed to other tribunals. The security of witnesses in human rights trials was also a serious concern. According to the Prosecution Co-ordination Unit, at the end of 2009 more than 600 people were facing criminal proceedings for human rights violations, including enforced disappearances. Trials resulted in more than thirty convictions during the year.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 65; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 192–193.]

During the military regimes of 1976–1983, the ESMA Naval Mechanics School served as a clandestine detention center, where thousands of people were forcibly disappeared, or tortured, or both. Seventeen former ESMA officers finally went on trial for human rights abuses, including torture and murder. Officer Alfredo Astiz was first prosecuted in relation to these crimes in 1985 but amnesty laws, since-repealed, halted the proceedings.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 12.]

In September 2009, President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner sent a legislative proposal to Congress to decriminalize defamation to comply with the court ruling in the case of historian Eduardo Kimel (See NCH Annual Report 2009). In November 2009, the proposal was approved. On 6 January 2010, Fernández decreed that the armed forces declassify all documents related to 1976–1983.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 193–194; Keesings historisch archief (2010) 150; Kimel judgment at:

http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/1e/105.pdf.]

See also Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay.

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

Turkish-born Armenian journalist Murad Bojolyan (1950–), a historian and oriental specialist graduated at the Department of Oriental Studies of Yerevan State University (1972) and author of a book about the Ottoman Empire (published in Russian), was charged in 1992 with spying for the Turkish National Intelligence Organization MIT and communicating to them information in exchange for payment concerning Armenia's and Nagorno Karabakh's military, economic and political affairs, particularly about the Russian troops based in Armenia (See NCH Annual Report 2006). The information, communicated by Bojolyan for personal gain, included, inter alia, data concerning border controls, military personnel, radar and military installations, and military aircraft. Retracting an earlier confession, Bojolyan argued that all the information had been collected from the mass media and was thus in the public domain. In December 2002, a court in Yerevan found Bojolyan guilty of treason and sentenced him to ten years' imprisonment with confiscation of all property. His various appeals were dismissed. In November 2009, the European Court of Human Rights did not find it unreasonable that even certain types of non-classified information, if collected by an intelligence service of a foreign state, might cause damage to national security and that the state had a legitimate interest in making the communication of such information to a foreign intelligence service a punishable act. It rejected Bojolyan's application.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Final Decision as to the Admissibility of Application no. 23693/03 by Murad Bojolyan against Armenia (Strasbourg, 3 November 2009), at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/1e/149.pdf.]

See also Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Fiji, Indonesia.

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 31 December 2009, journalist Eynulla Fatullayev (See NCH Annual Report 2009) was sentenced to two months (later four months) pre-trial detention on the charge of narcotics possession because some heroin had allegedly been found in his jacket. The drugs incident was widely seen as a trumped-up charge aimed at keeping Fatullayev in prison regardless of a forthcoming European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) judgment. On 18 March 2010, Fatullayev was threatened with death in an anonymous call to his father. On 22 April 2010, the ECHR ruled that Fatullayev's rights to free expression and to a fair trial had been violated and that he should be given compensation. The court, by a vote of six to one, also ordered his immediate release. It also reiterated the role that freedom of speech and the media play in a democratic society to seek out historical truth. The Azerbaijani government filed an appeal at the ECHR Grand Chamber. On 2 June 2010, Fatullayev began a hunger strike, which ended several days later after he was told that President Ilham Aliyev was informed about his situation and the ECHR judgment. On 6 July 2010, a Baku court convicted Fatullayev of drug possession and sentenced him to 2,5 years' imprisonment.

[Sources: Article 19, "Azerbaijan: European Court Orders Release of Wrongly Imprisoned Journalist Eynulla Fatullayev" (23 April 2010); Article 19, "Azerbaijan: Eynulla Fatullayev Sentenced to 2.5 Years' Imprisonment on New Political Charge" (7 July 2010); Committee To Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (Online; 31 December 2009; 22 January 2010; 18 March 2010); Idem, "Petitioners Urge Azerbaijan To Free Eynulla Fatullayev" (Online; 20 January 2010); European Court of Human Rights, Eynulla Fatullayev versus Azerbaijan: Statement of Facts (Online http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/150.pdf; 9 September 2008); Human Rights Watch, “Azerbaijan: European Court Orders Release of Journalist” (22 April 2010); Ifex Communiqué (Online; 19 June 2010); Institute for Reporters Freedom and Safety, Press releases (Online; 30 December 2009, 1 January & 2 February & 1 March & 26 May & 7 July 2010); PEN, RAN 27/07 Update # 7 (Online; 1 June 2010); Reporters Without Borders, “In Latest Provocative Move, Authorities Say Heroin Found on Imprisoned Journalist” (Online; 31 December 2009); Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Alert (22 July 2010).]

On 29 July 2009, a district court dropped charges against Avaz Zeynalli, chief editor of the newspaper Khural, for his translation and publication of Adolf Hitler’s Mein Kampf.

[Source: Index On Censorship, 4/09: 118.]

On 31 August 2009, the Supreme Court upheld the decision of a district court to confiscate and destroy the manuscript of a book written in prison by Ganimat Zahid, chief editor of the newspaper Azadlig, about the modern history of Azerbaijan. Zahid wrote the history book while serving a four-year prison sentence on charges of hooliganism since November 2007. The prison head confiscated the handwritten 300-page manuscript from Zahid, declared that it included statements against the Azerbaijani government, ex-president Heydar Aliyev, and incumbent president Ilham Aliyev, and destroyed it. Zahid filed a lawsuit against the prison administration and demanded that they be fined in compensation.

[Sources: Azeri Report, “Last Words of Ganimat Zahid” (Online [2008]); Institute for Reporter Freedom and Safety, Ifex Alert (2 September 2009); Index On Censorship, 4/09: 116.]

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 9 February 2010, the Bahrain Center for Human Rights reported that the government banned books regarding the Shi'ite majority, including history books.

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (9 February 2010).]

In May 2010, the Ministry of Culture and Information banned and confiscated all copies of a book edition of the diary of Charles Belgrave (1894–1969), a British key adviser to Bahrain's rulers, Shaikh Hamad ibn Isa Al Khalifa and Shaikh Salman ibn Hamad Al-Khalifa, from 1926 to 1957. As Belgrave contributed to governmental reform and documented his relationship with the governor, his diary (published in full, printed for the first time, and imported from Lebanon by the Bahraini Al-Isma House) was one of the most significant sources for Bahraini history. The diary reportedly contained sections criticizing the rulers and sensitive sections about income distribution, land appropriation, sectarian discrimination, and political opposition movements. The diary's original copy was believed to be in the possession of the government, which refrained from publishing it. The diary's content, however, had later been leaked and published on several websites by anonymous institutions and individuals.

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (27 May 2010).]

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, the government was moving toward bringing to trial those responsible for international crimes in connection with the 1971 independence war against Pakistan. In 2009, parliament passed amendments to the International Crimes (Tribunals) Act of 1973, but the law still fell short of international standards.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 266.]

See also India.

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In February 2009, a district court in Brest ordered the immediate seizure and destruction of the seventh and eighth issues of the opposition monthly historical magazine Arche (See NCH Annual Report 2007) on the grounds that their content was “extremist”.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 121; Reporters without Borders, “Judge Orders Two Issues of Cultural Magazine Seized and Destroyed” (Online; 26 February 2009).]

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Goddamn Days on a Goddamn Globe (Dutch: Godverdomse dagen op een godverdomse bol), a sarcastic novel narrating the history of humanity and published in October 2008 by Dimitri Verhulst (1972–), was reportedly not available in some Flemish and Dutch bookshops because of its alleged blasphemous title and offending language.

[Source: Keesings historisch archief (2010) 130–31.]

Since at least August 2008 and increasingly in the run-up to the June 2010 elections, one of the electoral candidates, Bart De Wever (1970–), a historian-turned-politician and chairman of the separatist Nieuw-Vlaamse Alliantie (NV-A; New Flemish Alliance) which openly advocated the gradual breakup of Belgium, received several death threats by email and other channels originating from what are widely believed to be radical francophone circles. He was also falsely accused of Holocaust denial. While investigating the threats, the federal police increased protection measures for De Wever. After the elections of June 2010, the NV-A emerged as the biggest party in Dutch-speaking Flanders and the whole of Belgium.

[Sources: De Morgen (13 August 2008); Nieuwsblad (14 August 2008); A. van de Velde, “Profiles of Possible Belgian Prime Ministers” (Online, Reuters, 13 June 2010).]

See also Chad.

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, the Ministry of Defense approved a procedure allowing documentation relating to past human rights violations to be requested from the armed forces. President Evo Morales Ayma initially insisted that no files existed relating to people who were forcibly disappeared under previous governments. In February 2010, however, the army chief of staff refused access to the archives of the military dictatorships of General Hugo Banzer (1971–1978) and Colonel Luis García Meza (July 1980–1981) to a civil commission, headed by prosecutor Milton Mendoza, that wanted to investigate 156 disappearances and murders during Meza’s military dictatorship. On 19 May 2010, Minister of Justice Nilda Cope urged the army to comply with a Supreme Court order to declassify their archives about these dictatorships. On 31 May 2010, Defense Minister Rubén Saavedra announced that the armed forces had finally agreed to declassify the archives.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 80; Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (22 February & 3 June 2010); “Gobierno boliviano hará que desclasifiquen archivos militares” (Online; Prensa Latina <http://www.prensa-latina.cu>).]

In May 2009, the trial began of 17 senior officials, including former President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada, in connection with the “Black October” events of October 2003 in which at least 67 people were killed and more than 400 injured in clashes between the security forces and demonstrators protesting against government proposals to sell off national gas resources. At the end of 2009, Sánchez de Lozada remained in the United States (US) awaiting the outcome of an extradition request. Several former ministers charged in the case left Bolivia during 2009, thus evading prosecution. In November 2009, a US court ruled that sufficient grounds existed to try Sánchez de Lozada and former Defense Minister Carlos Sánchez Berzaín in the US in a civil suit for damages in relation to charges of crimes against humanity and carrying out extrajudicial executions. Former Interior Minister Luis Arce Gómez was extradited from the US to Bolivia. On arrival he was given a 30-year prison sentence. He had been convicted in 1993 of enforced disappearance, torture, genocide and murder committed in 1980 and 1981.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 14, 79–80.]

In July 2009, forensic work to locate the remains of members of an armed opposition movement who had forcibly disappeared in 1970 began in Teoponte, a rural area 300 kilometers from La Paz. By the end of 2009, nine bodies had been found. The search for the remains of around fifty others believed to have died in the area continued.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 80.]

See also Paraguay.

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In October 2009, the United Nations International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) started the trial of Radovan Karadžić. He was charged with two counts of genocide. The first was related to crimes committed between 31 March and 31 December 1992 in a number of municipalities in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH), which included killings, torture, and forcible transfer or deportation which aimed at the destruction of Bosnian Croats and Bosnian Muslims as ethnic or religious groups. The second covered the killing of more than 7,000 men and boys in July 1995 in Srebrenica. There were five counts of crimes against humanity, including persecution, extermination, murder, and deportation of non-Serbs. The indictment also contained four charges of violations of the laws or customs of war such as hostage-taking and spreading terror among the civilian population. Karadžić boycotted the proceedings from the beginning by repeatedly refusing to appear in the courtroom. In November 2009, the presiding judge appointed a lawyer to represent him in his absence. The trial was adjourned until March 2010 to enable the court-appointed lawyer to prepare for the case. At the end of 2009, seven war crimes cases concerning BiH were pending before the ICTY. In addition, three cases were on appeal. In 2009, Ratko Mladić, fellow indicted architect of the Srebrenica massacre, remained at large. In September 2009, Momčilo Krajišnik, a Bosnian Serb wartime leader, began a 20-year sentence in the United Kingdom following the March 2009 ruling by the ICTY Appeals Chamber affirming his convictions for deportation, forcible transfer, and persecution.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 81; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 386–387; Krajišnik judgment at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/17.pdf.]

War crimes prosecutions continued before the War Crimes Chamber (WCC) of the State Court of BiH. By the end of 2009, the WCC had delivered 39 final verdicts since its creation in 2005. There were 57 cases pending at trial and appeals panel stage. Some war crimes trials of low-level perpetrators were also held in the local courts in both of the semiautonomous entities of the country—the Federation of BiH (FBiH) and Republika Srpska (RS)—as well as in Brčko District. However, the capacity of the courts and prosecutors of FBiH and RS to prosecute war crimes cases remained inadequate. In December 2008, the authorities had adopted a State Strategy for the Work on War Crimes in an attempt to address all outstanding war crimes cases. In the absence of a centralized case file database, there had been varying estimates of between 6,000 and 16,000 war crimes case files open at different stages of prosecution registered in all jurisdictions. However, implementation of the strategy in 2009 was extremely slow and obstructed by a lack of political will. Verbal attacks on the justice system and denial of war crimes by some senior politicians in the country further undermined the efforts to prosecute. In October 2009, the BiH State Parliament rejected the extension of the mandate of international judges and prosecutors working in the WCC. On 14 December 2009, the High Representative used his special powers to overrule the State Parliament's decision and extended their mandate. Witness support and protection measures were inadequate in all courts in BiH. This meant that in some cases victims, including survivors of war crimes of sexual violence, were not able to access justice.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 81–82; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 386–387.]

Progress in identifying the whereabouts of victims of enforced disappearance during the 1992–1995 war remained slow and was obstructed by the lack of cooperation between the authorities of FBiH and the RS. According to different estimates, the whereabouts of between 10,000 and 12,000 people remained unknown. In addition, some 3,000 bodies which had been located and exhumed were still unidentified. Exhumations conducted by the Missing Persons Institute continued at different locations. RS authorities failed to create a database of missing persons and to open the Fund for Support to the Families of Missing Persons, both of which were envisaged by the Law on Missing Persons adopted in 2004. In 2009, the Advocacy Center–TRIAL (ACT), an NGO based in Geneva, lodged five individual communications to the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Committee on behalf of the relatives of victims of enforced disappearance in BiH. The NGO alleged multiple violations of human rights due to the lack of investigation, criminal prosecution, reparations, and effective remedy following the disappearance of their relatives. ACT submitted an additional 16 complaints to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) on behalf of the relatives of the disappeared. In October 2009, the Union of Associations of Families of Missing and Captured Persons of RS filed 78 cases with the ECHR on behalf of the families of disappeared Serbs. The Union alleged that the authorities had failed to respond to their continuous enquiries about the whereabouts of their relatives despite previous rulings of the Human Rights Chamber of BiH which had obliged the authorities to do so.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 82.]

In March 2010, the Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe, Thomas Hammarberg, reported that the Council of Europe had coordinated the preparation of Common Guidelines which led to the drafting of new history and geography textbooks as well as teaching manuals.

[Source: T. Hammarberg, “Atrocities in the past must be recognised, documented and learned from—but not distorted or misused for political purposes” (Council of Europe; Online; 22 March 2010).]

See also Greece.

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Brazil never prosecuted those responsible for atrocities committed during the period of its military dictatorship (1964–1985). In December 2009, however, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva announced the creation of a truth commission to investigate torture, killings, and enforced disappearances during the dictatorship, as a part of the Third National Human Rights Plan. Some non-governmental organizations and relatives of victims criticized the initial proposals as the commission’s remit did not appear to include the prosecution of past violators. The proposal was strongly criticized by the military, with the Minister of Defense attempting to further weaken it. Nevertheless, increasing challenges were made to the long-standing impunity for crimes committed during the military era. In August 2009, the Supreme Court ruled that Uruguayan Colonel Manuel Cordero Piacentini could be extradited to Argentina to face charges in connection with the enforced disappearance of Uruguayan and Argentinian citizens and torture in the context of Operation Condor, a joint plan by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to eliminate opponents. A 1979 amnesty law has thus far been interpreted to bar prosecutions of state agents. In 2009, however, the Supreme Federal Tribunal considered a petition by the Brazilian Bar Association arguing that the amnesty law did not cover crimes such as torture when committed by state agents.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 13, 84; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 205.]

In March 2009, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights filed an application at the Inter-American Court of Human Rights against Brazil regarding the “Guerrilha do Araguaia” case (military operations against the Araguaia Communist guerrilla movement in 1972–1975) (See also NCH Annual Report 2009). The commission asked for the state to be held accountable for the enforced disappearance of members of the guerrilla force. It called on Brazilian officials to investigate the crimes, prosecute the perpetrators, and provide information and official documents on the disappearances, including on the fate and location of the victims.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 206.]

See also Paraguay.

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

There was slow progress in establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and a Special Tribunal within the justice system to investigate Burundi’s violent history and to prosecute crimes of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. In July 2009, however, after months of delays, a tripartite committee including the government, the United Nations (UN), and civil society initiated national consultations on transitional justice, financed by the UN Peacebuilding Fund. The consultations sought to solicit Burundians’ opinions on aspects of the proposed TRC and a special chamber in Burundi’s judicial system. The latter, potentially composed of both Burundian and international judges, would be dedicated to prosecuting war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide committed during the civil war (1993–2009). No timeline was in place for the establishment of either mechanism. Serious war crimes by the last active rebel movement National Liberation Forces (FNL), the ruling party National Council for the Defense of Democracy–Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD), and the former Burundian army remained unpunished.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 3, 91; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 85–86.]

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In March 2009, the historic first hearing of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC, Khmer Rouge Tribunal), a hybrid tribunal presided over by both Cambodian and international judges, took place with the trial of Kaing Guek Eav (known as Duch). Duch was the commander of notorious security prison S-21. During the 72-day hearing, survivors and victims of Khmer Rouge atrocities heard for the first time evidence against “those most responsible”. Duch admitted responsibility for crimes committed at S-21, including killing about 15,000 people. The trial of four senior Khmer Rouge leaders was in preparation, and the International Co-Prosecutor submitted requests to open investigations into an additional five suspects. In July 2009, co-investigating judges decided to allow “confessions” obtained by torture as evidence in the case of Ieng Thirith. This breached the “exclusionary rule” in Article 15 of the United Nations (UN) Convention against Torture which binds the ECCC. Ongoing political interference by the government in the work of the ECCC undermined its integrity. Prime Minister Hun Sen repeatedly demanded that the court not prosecute suspects other than five currently in custody, saying that additional investigations could lead to unrest. Credible reports of widespread corruption at the ECCC were not sufficiently addressed.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 92, 93; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 282.]

CAMEROON

Last Annual Report entry: —

In December 2009, Jean-Bosco Talla of Germinal newspaper was arrested and charged with insulting President Paul Biya. Germinal had published an extract from a banned book that alleged that President Biya and his predecessor, Ahmadou Ahidjo (1924–1989; President 1960–1982), had entered into a political pact sealed by a homosexual act. On 28 December 2009, the High Court found Talla guilty and sentenced him to a suspended one-year prison term and a fine. He remained in custody at the end of 2009 because he failed to pay the fine.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 95.]

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Rwanda.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Congo (Democratic Republic).

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Throughout 2009, the Senegalese authorities asserted that the trial of Chad's former President Hissène Habré could not begin until they had received a certain amount financial assistance, which international donors considered excessive. In 2006, the African Union (AU) had called on Senegal to try Habré, who was living in exile in Senegal, for crimes against humanity and torture committed during his rule (1982–1990). In February 2009, President Abdoulaye Wade threatened to lift the judicial surveillance under which Habré had been placed and to remit him to the AU. A few days later, Belgium filed a case against Senegal before the International Court of Justice (ICJ) asking the ICJ to compel Senegal to take measures to prevent Habré from fleeing the country and to either prosecute him or extradite him to Belgium for trial. In May 2009, the ICJ rejected the Belgian request. In September 2009, Habré's complaint against Senegal started to be examined before the ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) Court of Justice for violations by Senegal of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, notably relating to the principle of non-retroactivity of penal legislation. The Court had not taken a decision on the issue by the end of 2009. [Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 4, 279; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 91.]

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In September 2009, the government announced its intention to reopen both the National Commission on Political Imprisonment and Torture and the National Commission for Truth and Reconciliation (the Valech and Rettig Commissions) in order to allow previously unregistered cases of torture and enforced disappearance to be presented. The Supreme Court announced that it would speed up the processing of cases of human rights violations committed during the military government of Augusto Pinochet (1973–1990), amid concerns that reforms to the Code of Criminal Procedure in 2010 might stall pending cases. According to official figures, between January and October 2009, 69 former security force agents had been charged, sentenced, or tried in connection with human rights violations. However, by the end of October 2009, final sentences had been handed down in only 179 out of a total of 3,186 cases. Thirty-two of those charged or convicted had been generals in the Chilean army. In September 2009, more than 165 former agents of the Dirección de Inteligencia Nacional (DINA, National Intelligence Directorate) were charged in connection with their involvement in the torture and enforced disappearance of political activists in the early years (1973–1977) of the military regime. Also in September 2009, the Supreme Court’s criminal chamber confirmed a 3,5-year sentence against two retired air force officers for the torture of seventeen people between 1973 and 1975. For the first time, the court expressly declared torture, a systematic practice during the Pinochet years, to be a crime against humanity. A majority of the five judges in the Supreme Court’s criminal chamber ruled that an amnesty decreed by the military government in 1978 was inapplicable to war crimes or crimes against humanity, and that these crimes were not subject to a statute of limitations. However, not all of the judges agreed that the amnesty was inapplicable. Given that court rulings in Chile were not binding in cases other than the one under review, and that the composition of the Supreme Court panel may change from case to case, the legal obstacles to convictions were not entirely overcome. A bill promoted by the government to amend the criminal code so that crimes against humanity were not subject to amnesties or statutes of limitation has been deadlocked in Congress since 2005. During 2008 and increasingly in 2009, the Supreme Court’s criminal chamber applied a “partial statute of limitations” (known in Chile as media prescripción) that allowed those convicted for human rights violations to receive a reduced sentence in recognition of the time elapsed since the criminal act (more than 30 years in some cases).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 12, 103; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 207–208.]

In December 2009, a judge ordered the arrest of six people after fresh investigations into the death in 1982 of former President Eduardo Frei Montalva revealed the cause of death was poisoning, rather than an infection as initially believed. The Supreme Court subsequently rejected legal challenges (amparo) by those charged. Lawyers for the Frei family argued that he was murdered because of his opposition to the government of Augusto Pinochet (1973–1990).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 103.]

On 14 January 2010, a court absolved journalist Pascale Bonnefoy Miralles of all charges in a pending libel case filed by Edwin Dimter Bianchi, a former army lieutenant acting on the orders of General Augusto Pinochet. In a 26 May 2006 article entitled, “Edwin Dimter, the stadium’s sadistic prince”, Bonnefoy had written that Dimter had been in the Chile Stadium during the military coup of 11 September 1973 when this location was transformed into a prison camp (later renamed Victor Jara Stadium after one of its most famous victims). The judge ruled that Bonnefoy had not intended to insult Dimter.

[Source: Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Alert (26 January 2010).]

See also Peru.

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 5 October 2008, Yan Chongnian, a scholar specializing in Qing history and Manchu culture (1644–1911), director of the Manchu studies department at the Beijing Academy of Social Sciences, and a popular guest on the CCTV-10 TV show Lecture Room (a program focusing on Chinese history and traditional culture), was attacked when he was in a bookstore in Wuxi to promote his new book, The Kangxi Emperor (about Qing emperor Kangxi, 1654–1722). The author was slapped in the face twice because the attacker disagreed with his historical views. Another bystander yelled at Yan: “traitor”. Yan was possibly attacked for not condemning the non-Han rulers outright and for being sensitive to qualified historical evaluations of their rule.

[Source: “Historian Slapped, Ethnic Tensions Persist in China’s Nationalist Narrative” (Online; China Digital Times, 9 October 2008).]

In 2009, Zhang Huaiyang, a cyber-dissident from Shenyang, province of Liaoning, was sentenced to 18 months' forced labor for asking on the Internet whether activists intended to gather in Tiananmen Square to mark the anniversary of the 1989 massacre. He was convicted of "inciting unrest and endangering national security". In [2009] or [2010], Sun Fuquan, a journalist from Shenyang, was sentenced to 21 months' forced labor for posting information about the 1989 events online. He was convicted of "inciting subversion of state authority" and "dividing the country". Reporters without Borders said that between 400 and 500 keywords linked to the events of 4 June 1989 were censored online.

[Source: Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (Online; 7 June 2010).]

On 28 March 2009, writer Tan Zuoren ([1954]–), chief editor of the cultural magazine Wen Hua Ren and founder of the environmental organization "Green Rivers", was arrested in Chengdu, Sichuan. On 17 July 2009, he was tried on charges of "incitement to subvert state power by causing damage to the image of China's government", inter alia, for his articles about the 1989 Tiananmen massacre (including an essay entitled "Witnessing the Final Beauty: An Eyewitness's Diary of the Square") uploaded in May 2007 on an United States-based website, for trying to organize a public commemoration of its twentieth anniversary, and for conducting an investigation into the death of school children in the May 2008 Sichuan earthquake. On 9 February 2010, he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and three years' suspension of political rights.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 105; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 286–288; PEN, China; Writer Tan Zuoren Sentenced (1 March 2010).]

In April 2009, the Central Propaganda Department of the State Administration of Radio, Film and Television issued detailed regulations including a ban on videos that show "distortions of Chinese culture or history". Among the confidential directives of the department circulated to Chinese news bureaus in the run-up to the celebration of the 60th anniversary of the proclamation of the People's Republic of China on 1 October 2009, and leaked by individual users of the international micro-blog site Twitter between 15 and 25 August 2009, was the following: "It is forbidden to report on the 'Journey of the Berlin Wall' activity held by the German Embassy and other activities commemorating the fall of the Berlin Wall which involve poisoning our ideological sphere and propagating Western democracy and freedom. Any related reports that are published will be immediately removed" and "As for 60th anniversary columns that take a look back in history, immediately 'fast forward,' do not allow articles that 'keep dwelling on the 60s and 70s'. Look back immediately starting from 1978, with the main subjects of development and progress."

[Sources: Amnesty International, People's Republic of China: The Olympics; Committee to Protect

Journalists, Ifex Alert (1 October 2009); Freedom House, Ifex Alert (3 April 2009); Xiao Qiang, “The Latest Directives from the Ministry of Truth” (China Digital Times, 29 August 2009).]

On 4 June 2009, according to organizers, over 150,000 people commemorated the twentieth anniversary of the Tiananmen military crackdown, but the authorities denied entry to some Chinese and foreign activists who wished to participate. During the week of 4 June 2009, more than ten pages were removed from the Hong Kong issue of Esquire magazine because it contained “problematic” and “provocative” content. It featured a section on the twentieth anniversary.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 107; Index on Censorship, 4/09: 61, 64, 129.]

In September 2009, Chinese Civilization Revisited, a book by journalist Xiao Jiansheng (based in Hunan) questioning the official version of China’s 5,000 years of history and culture (but not touching directly the Communist decades) was banned in mainland China, but published by Hong Kong-based publisher Bao Pu (made possible because of Hong Kong’s guaranteed rights of freedom of the press and expression).

[Source: BBC News (28 September 2009).]

The authorities continued to tighten restrictions on freedom of expression, assembly, and association due partly to sensitivities surrounding a series of landmark anniversaries, including the 60th anniversary of the People’s Republic on 1 October 2009. The authorities tried to control the Internet by restricting news reporting and shutting down publications and Internet sites, including ones that “slandered the country’s political system”, “distorted the history of the Party”, and “incited ethnic splittism”. The government blocked access to content and recorded individuals’ activities through new filtering software such as Blue Shield. Following the publication of Charter 08 in December 2008 (See NCH Annual Report 2009), a document calling for political reform and greater protection of human rights, police questioned signatories and put them under surveillance for many months. Liu Xiaobo, a prominent intellectual and signatory originally detained in December 2008, was sentenced to 11 years’ imprisonment on 25 December 2009 for “inciting subversion of state power”. His lawyers were given only twenty minutes to present their case, in a trial that lasted less than three hours.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 104.]

In May 2010, Yuan Tengfei ([1972–]), a middle-school history teacher at the Haidian Teachers’ Training Institute, Beijing, and member of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP), whose polemical and uncensored classes on Chinese history—particularly on Mao Zedong and the Cultural Revolution—circulated since 2008 on videos shared by an audience of hundreds of thousands, was reportedly officially reprimanded but not arrested. Yuan had compared Mao to Hitler and Stalin, and his mausoleum to Yasukuni Shrine (where fourteen Japanese class A war criminals had been enshrined and worshiped since 1978) in Tokyo.

[Sources: T. Hao, “Mao Zedong in Video-History’s Gaze” (Online, Open Democracy, 12 July 2010); E. Mu, “The History Lessons of Yuan Tengfei”, China Heritage Quarterly, no. 22 (June 2010).]

On 1 June 2010, a cartoon alluding to 4 June 1989 was published in the newspaper Nanfang Dushi Bao (Southern Metropolitan Daily) and posted on its website. It showed a child drawing tanks and a figure resembling a soldier on a blackboard. It was soon withdrawn from the site, along with the comments it had prompted.

[Source: Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (Online; 7 June 2010).]

On 4 June 2010, attempts by hundreds of Chinese to mark the twenty-first anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre by using the location-based service FourSquare to “check in” at it and leave messages were blocked by the government.

[Source: Guardian (4 June 2010).]

On 20 June 2010, Bao Pu of the Hong Kong-based New Century Press said that he had to stop the print run of 20,000 copies of the alleged memoirs of former premier Li Peng (1928–), containing an insider account of the decision-making behind the 1989 Tiananmen Square crackdown “because of copyright problems”. Excerpts of the memoirs had been provided to the media on 4 June 2010. In his memoirs, Li allegedly claimed that armed rioters opened fire first at Chinese troops, forcing them to return fire in self-defense, and gave a precise death toll for the military action (313 dead, including 42 students and 23 soldiers).

[Source: Guardian (20 June 2010).]

See also Vietnam.

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 22 May 2009, Miguel Ángel Beltrán Villegas (1965–), a historian, sociologist, and associate professor (2005–) at the Universidad Nacional in Bogotá, was arrested in Mexico and transferred to a Colombian prison on the charge of being a key member of the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC; Colombian Revolutionary Armed Forces) known as “Jaime Cienfuegos” and supposedly responsible for writing “ideological material and articles” that supported guerrilla groups. The Colombian government considers FARC to be an international terrorist group. Beltrán admitted that he met FARC leader Raúl Reyes (killed in March 2008) and other FARC members during peace talks hosted in Mexico and later interviewed Reyes as part of his academic research into the Colombian conflict, but denied being “Jaime Cienfuegos”. President Álvaro Uribe publicly stated, including on the Colombian Presidency’s official website, that Beltrán was the FARC member known as “Jaime Cienfuegos” and therefore a terrorist. Beltrán’s trial began on 29 December 2009, but a first hearing was postponed until 17 February 2010.

[Source: International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-yearly Caselist to 31 December 2009 (Online, 2010) 25.]

Only around 3,700 of the 31,000 paramilitaries who had allegedly demobilized since 2003 participated in the Justice and Peace process by the end of 2009. The Justice and Peace process allowed former paramilitaries to benefit from reduced sentences in return for confessions about human rights violations. Some paramilitaries confessed to human rights abuses and implicated others, including people in politics, business, and the military. However, the process still fell short of international standards on the rights of victims to truth, justice, and reparation. Some 90 per cent of those who were demobilized continued to escape effective investigation as a result of Decree 128 and Law 782, which grant de facto amnesties to those not under investigation for human rights violations. In June 2009, Congress approved a law to regularize the legal status of 19,000 supposedly demobilized paramilitaries after the Supreme Court ruled in 2008 that they could not benefit from amnesties. The law authorized the Attorney General to suspend, interrupt, or abandon investigations against them, thus enabling them to evade justice. By the end of 2009, no paramilitary had been sentenced under the Justice and Peace process. Most of the 18 paramilitary leaders extradited to the United States on drug-trafficking charges refused to co-operate with the Colombian justice system in its investigations into human rights violations. Colombian judicial officials experienced difficulties in gaining access to the few who did agree to co-operate. Some paramilitaries returned a small portion of the 4-6 million hectares of land stolen by them, but there were concerns that some of these lands could again fall under the control of such groups or their backers. Some of the few original owners whose land was returned were threatened or killed. Victims or their families participating in the Justice and Peace process, those accompanying them, and judicial officials investigating human rights violations were threatened and killed. This dissuaded many victims from participating in the process.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 12, 110.]

See also Ecuador.

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, former vice-president and leader of an armed group, continued to be detained by the International Criminal Court (ICC) awaiting trial in connection with crimes allegedly committed in the Central African Republic (CAR) by his armed group in 2002 and 2003. The ICC pre-trial chamber authorized his release to await trial, provided there was a country willing to host him. This drew protests from the ICC prosecutor's office and lawyers representing victims. However, no country offered to accept him. Subsequently, the appeals chamber ordered Bemba to remain in custody pending trial, due to start in April 2010. In January 2009, the ICC trial of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, charged with the war crimes of recruiting and using children under the age of 15 in hostilities, began. The trial had not concluded by the end of 2009. The ICC trial of Germain Katanga and Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui began in November 2009. They had been jointly charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity, including the recruitment and use of children aged under fifteen, murder, rape and sexual slavery.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 98–99, 125; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 104–105.]

See also Rwanda.

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 12 February 2009, television station Canal Bénédiction Plus was forced to stop broadcasting because it had shown footage of a national political convention set up in 1991 to make the transition to a multi-party democracy.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 132.]

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The authorities continued to fail to investigate war crimes committed during the 1991–1995 war by members of the Croatian Army and police forces against Croatian Serbs and members of other minorities. A lack of political will to deal with those cases remained one of the main obstacles. The disproportionate number of cases against Croatian Serbs was demonstrated in a September 2009 report in the newspaper Jutarnji List, where the justice minister said that 2 per cent of the cases which had been prosecuted were against ethnic Croats whereas the remaining 98 per cent included cases against Croatian Serbs and other minorities. The minister's own view was that this was understandable, as he claimed that Croatian Serbs had committed more war crimes than ethnic Croats. Measures designed by the government to address impunity for war crimes remained unimplemented. Only one case was under prosecution in 2009 in one of the special war crimes chambers established at four county courts in Zagreb, Osijek, Rijeka, and Split. These had been established in 2003 in order to try war crimes cases outside the community where the crimes were committed, a move which was supposed to lessen potential pressure on witnesses and reduce ethnic bias. The HRC, the United Nations (UN) Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, and the European Commission expressed their concerns at reports of ethnic discrimination in the prosecution of war crimes cases. Serbs remained the majority of defendants in domestic war crimes prosecutions. In the first eight months of 2009, Croatian authorities issued eight new war crimes indictments against sixteen individuals, fourteen of whom were Serbs. In first eight months of 2009 twenty war crimes trials were completed in Croatia; of the 61 defendants involved in these trials, 37 were Serbs.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 115–116; Human Rights Watch, World

Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 391–392.]

During 2009, the prosecution of Croatian Army Generals Ante Gotovina, Ivan Čermak and Mladen Markač at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) continued. The three were charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity arising from a 1995 military offensive against rebel Serbs. Both the UN Human Rights Committee (HRC) and the ICTY chief prosecutor reported that Croatia continued to fail to submit to the ICTY all outstanding military documents related to Operation Storm, conducted in 1995, for which they were on trial in The Hague. Croatian authorities continued to deny possessing key documents.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 115.]

In March 2009, Drago Hedl (See NCH Annual Report 2008), editor of the satirical weekly Feral Tribune, and a photographer were forcibly removed from a public press conference organized by Branimir Glavaš, a member of parliament (before his conviction in May 2009 for war crimes in his capacity as local military leader in 1991 in Osijek).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 116.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Serbia.

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

In [June] 2010, the Communist Party expelled historian and state television commentator Esteban Morales, [former] director of the Center on United States Studies at the University of Havana, because in April 2010 he had published an article, in which he had accused senior party officials of looting the state before it crumbled, denouncing it as “counter-revolutionary corruption and bureaucracy”. Morales also disappeared from the nightly Mesa Redonda (Round Table) news television program, where he was customarily invited for comments on the United States.

[Sources: P. Campos, “Esteban Morales Booted from Cuba’s Communist Party”, Havana Times (Online; 28 June 2010); Guardian (2 July 2010).]

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The United Nations Committee on Missing Persons in Cyprus continued its work. Between January and September 2009, the remains of 104 individuals were exhumed from different burial sites located across Cyprus.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 119.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2000.

In 2009, there was some movement toward acknowledging responsibility for enforced sterilizations of Romani women carried out in the past. In November 2009, the Prime Minister expressed regret over the illegal sterilizations, and asked the Minister of Health to report on the implementation of existing regulations that prohibited them. According to the Czech NGO Group of Women Harmed by Forced Sterilization, at least 100 women may have been sterilized against their will. Although most forced sterilizations were carried out in the 1970s and 1980s, the most recent reportedly occurred in 2007. In October 2007, the Constitutional Court dismissed a claim for financial compensation from a Romani woman who had been illegally sterilized, on the grounds that her legal action was beyond the time limit for such claims. She had received an apology from a hospital in Vitkovice after the Regional Court in Ostrava decided in 2005 that the doctors acted illegally when they carried out the sterilization without her informed consent. The Minister for Human Rights subsequently announced that the state was nevertheless obliged to take a position that reflected the non-reversible impact of sterilization on women's lives.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 120.]

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

See United States.

DJIBOUTI

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In February 2008, the Comisión de la Verdad (CV; Truth Commission), set up in May 2007 to investigate alleged human rights abuses committed over the last 27 years, particularly during the right-wing administration of former President Leon Febres Cordero (1984–1988), began receiving testimonies. In September 2008, an interim report was issued. Former President Febres Cordero died in December 2008. By the end of 2009, the CV had heard 700 testimonies relating to cases of torture, enforced disappearance, extrajudicial execution, and death in custody. On 16 December 2009, commission member Israel Batista declared that two persons who testified before the commission about the 2008 Colombian attack of FARC guerrillas on Ecuadorian territory, leaving 25 dead, were assassinated. Another witness disappeared. On 26 January 2010, the National Assembly approved a law that granted immunity to the CV members. On 7 June 2010, chairperson Elsie Monge presented the CV final report to President Rafael Correa.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 131; Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 129; El Telégrafo (Guayaquil) (Online; 7 June 2010); G. Solano, “Ecuador To Investigate Rights Abuses” (Associated Press Online; May 2007); El Mercurio (17 December 2009); Esmeraldas (February 2010) 17.]

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

In 2009, Zahi Hawass, the head of the Supreme Council of Antiquities, launched a campaign against Ahmed Saleh, the manager of the Mit Rahina antiquities zone. As he was a mummification specialist and had a master’s degree in Egyptian antiquities from Manchester University, England, Saleh had proposed an approach that differed from Hawass’s with respect to how to deal with certain Egyptian antiquities, especially the mummy of King Tut. Hawass reportedly launched a media campaign against Saleh and subjected him to dozens of investigations. He was deprived of promotions, could not attend international antiquities exhibitions, and suffered salary deductions. The Administrative Court reviewed Saleh’s case against the Supreme Council of Antiquities.

[Source: Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, Ifex Alert (6 October 2009).]

On 17 April 2010, a group of lawyers filed a motion with the Prosecutor General to confiscate the book “A Thousand and One Nights” (a collection of folk tales compiled in Arabic from the mid-8th to the mid-13th century) and imprison its publishers, claiming that the heritage script “was offensive to public decency”. The book had appeared in the Zakhaer (Treasures) series, issued by the general authority of cultural palaces at the Ministry of Culture. Two parts of the tale had already been published and the lawyers considered these as evidence to corroborate the complaint. The silence of the minister of culture in the case was criticized. Following the submission of the obscenity case, the interior ministry attempted to ban Sufi dhikr (a religious group ceremonial activity) from taking place in mosques in May 2010, claiming that such ceremonies were undermining public morality by allowing men and women to mix.

[Sources: Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, Ifex Alert (26 April 2010); Article 19, “Artist Alert May 2010” (Online).]

See also United Kingdom.

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In November 2009, at a session of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, El Salvador accepted responsibility for the killing of Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero as he said mass in a hospice in San Salvador in March 1980. The government declared its intention to fulfil the requirements of the Commission’s 2000 report which included a thorough and independent investigation into the murder, reparations, and repeal of the 1993 amnesty law.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 134.]

Throughout 2009, the 1993 amnesty law remained in place, obstructing efforts to bring to justice those responsible for past human rights violations during the internal armed conflict (1980–1992). The new government pledged to reform the Inter-Institutional Commission for the Search for Disappeared Children established to clarify the whereabouts of some of the 700 children who disappeared during the conflict. The commission had been criticized for only finding the whereabouts of some 30 of the children by the end of its mandate.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 134.]

ERITREA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ESTONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

On 15 October 2009, Parliament approved the so-called “Bronze Night” package, a set of amendments to the Penal Code and two acts. The amendments expanded the definition of “an offense committed during mass disorder”. This could include non-violent acts such as the symbolic destruction of national flags or those of foreign states or international organizations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 139.]

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, no one was investigated or held to account for war crimes and other wide-spread violations of the laws of war during Ethiopia’s bloody military intervention in neighboring Somalia from 2006 to 2008. In August 2008, the Ethiopian government intended to launch an inquiry into allegations of serious crimes in Somali Regional State (the Ogaden), where the armed forces had been fighting a campaign against the rebel Ogaden National Liberation Front for many years. The inquiry was sponsored by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, lacked independence, and concluded that no serious abuses had taken place.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 120–121.]

EUROPEAN UNION

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

On 4 November 2009, Brij Lal, a Fijian historian of Indian descent, professor of Pacific and Asian History at the Australian National University, and editor of the Journal of Pacific History, was arrested and threatened by senior military officers at an army camp in the capital Suva following interviews with overseas media he had given on the recent expulsion of Australian and New Zealand diplomats by the military government of Prime Minister Frank (Voreqe) Bainimarama. The military threatened to kill him if he remained in Fiji. Lal was spending several months in Fiji conducting research for a forthcoming book on squatter settlements. On 5 November 2009, he was expelled to Australia. A specialist in Indo-Fijian history and the history of indenture, Lal served also as the nominee of opposition leader Jai Ram Reddy on the three-member Constitutional Review Commission, whose work culminated in the adoption of the constitution in 1997–1998. Lal condemned Bainimarama's first coup d'état in 2000. Following a ruling by the Fijian Court of Appeal that his second military coup in 2006 was illegal, Bainimarama had stepped down as prime minister on 10 April 2009. President Ratu Josefa Iloilo later announced the abolishment of the constitution and reappointed Bainimarama as prime minister.

[Sources: Amnesty International, "Fiji: Downward Spiral Continues for Human Rights Following Persecution of Prominent Human Rights Lawyer" (19 January 2010); Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 143; "Fiji Throws Out Australian Academic" (Online; AFP; 4 November 2009); Wikipedia (Online; 27 September 2009).]

FINLAND

Last Annual Report entry: —

See Rwanda.

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

Although a report by an international fact-finding mission commissioned by the European Union confirmed that violations of international human rights and humanitarian law had been committed by Georgian, Russian, and South Ossetian forces during the 2008 war, and called on all sides of the conflict to address the consequences of the war, no side conducted comprehensive investigations into these violations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 37.]

In June 2010, the last statue of Stalin, located in the latter's place of birth Gori, was taken down. There were plans to replace it with a monument to the "victims of the Russian aggression" in the 2008 war (despite the fact that it was Georgia that started the war with Russia).

[Source: New Zealand Herald (1 July 2010).]

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 24 January 2009, police confiscated copies of Nazi newspapers that were reprinted in a German history magazine by the British company Albertas. Officials announced that 280 unsold copies had been seized and that Albertas faced prosecution for "printing and circulating swastikas", a criminal offense.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 142.]

On 6 August 2009, Jewish leaders in Germany backed a renewed demand by historians to publish a new edition of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf, accompanied by a critical introduction and footnotes challenging Hitler's assertions. The German state of Bavaria, the copyright holder of the book, had banned the book since 1945. (See also Azerbaijan).

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 142.]

On 27 October 2009, Bishop Richard Williamson (1940–) was fined by a Regensburg judge for Holocaust denial in a January 2009 interview with the Swedish television which had taken place in Germany. On 16 April 2010, the sentence was confirmed. (See Annual Report 2009 under Vatican).

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 115; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 617, (2010) 253.]

In November 2009, two German men who had killed actor Walter Sedlmayr in 1990, had been sentenced to life imprisonment in 1993, and who were released in 2007 and 2008 after serving their sentence, sued the online encyclopaedia Wikipedia, claiming that mention of their names in the latter's crime summaries infringed their privacy. Whereas the German-language version of the Wikipedia article removed the names, other versions did not. German courts allowed a criminal's name to be withheld in news reports once they had served a prison term and a set period had expired. Jennifer Granick, a lawyer for the online civil liberties group Electronic Frontier Foundation, said that people had to be allowed to publish truthful information about historical events. Some added that attempts to remove names from the electronic record could produce the opposite result (a phenomenon known online as the "Streisand effect", after singer Barbra Streisand, whose attempts to remove pictures of her beach house from online records outraged people, who then copied the pictures and distributed them over the Internet).

[Source: C. Arthur, "Wikipedia Sued by German Killers in Privacy Claim", Guardian (Online: 13 November 2009).]

On 30 April 2010, the Federal Administrative Court ordered the government to release secret files kept by the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND; German intelligence agency) on top Nazi Adolf Eichmann after World War II. The ruling came after reporter Gabriele Weber had sued the BND to release the 4,500 pages of files, which could fill in gaps about Eichmann's postwar life (including his escape to Argentina). The BND had argued that releasing the files could jeopardize informants and harm relations with a "foreign intelligence service" that provided some of the information. But the court ruled that while the BND could withhold some files for those reasons, it could not keep them all secret.

[Source: "German Court Orders Eichmann Files Released" (Online; Associated Press; 30 April 2010).]

On appeal, the suit between author and documentary filmmaker Volker Kühn and Dutch-born singer and actor Johannes Heesters (See NCH Annual Report 2009) was settled on 22 April 2010: Heesters gave up asking for retraction from Kühn whereas Kühn had agreed not to call Heesters a liar anymore.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (23 April 2010); "Singer Settles Suit Over Alleged Nazi-performance" (Online; Associated Press; 22 April 2010).]

See also China, Russia.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In March 2008, Foreign Minister Dora Bakoyannis said that Greece would veto Macedonia's bid to join NATO and the European Union because it objected to Macedonia taking the name of the northern Greek region Macedonia, which implied a territorial claim (an allegation denied by Macedonia). In April 2008, the Greek government was offended by posters in Skopje, which had the swastika superimposed on the Greek flag, by a magazine cover which depicted Prime Minister Kostas Karamanlis as an SS officer, and by images of Macedonian Prime Minister Nikola Gruevski laying a wreath by a flag showing a map of Greater Macedonia, which included parts of northern Greece. Bakoyannis also declared that the government in Skopje regarded the Greek province of Macedonia as occupied territory and refused to remove such claims from textbooks, speeches, maps, and national documents.

[Sources: BBC News (6 March & 2 April 2008); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 389, 437.]

On 9 June 2010, a Greek prosecutor referred to trial journalist Tákis Michas, author of the book "Unholy Alliance: Greece and Milosevic's Serbia" and of an 2009 article entitled "They Saw Mladić and Karadžić at a Small Church" in the newspaper Saturday Eleftherotypia. According to the charges, he had defamed Stavros Vitalis in these writings (which did not explicitly mention Vitalis) by falsely calling him a paramilitary who led Greek volunteers who fought in the Bosnian-Serb forces during the Bosnian war (1992–95). In this capacity, Vitalis supposedly participated in several massacres, including the Srebrenica genocide, and was never prosecuted for such acts. The presence of Greek volunteers in the Bosnian Serb army, however, seemed well-established.

[Source: Greek Helsinki Monitor, Ifex Alert (14 July 2010).]

GRENADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Documents in the archive discovered in July 2005 (See previous NCH Annual Reports) led to the March 2009 arrest of two ex-agents of the National Police for their alleged participation in the 1984 disappearance of student leader Edgar Fernando García. President Álvaro Colom ordered the archives to be transferred to the institutional authority of the ministry of culture, and the process of opening the files to the public was underway. In February 2008, Colom announced that he would open the military archives spanning the civil war. In September 2008, following a Constitutional Court ruling in favor of releasing military archives, Congress passed the Law of Access to Public Information, which ordered that “in no circumstances can information related to investigations of violations of fundamental human rights or crimes against humanity” be classified as confidential or reserved. The Guatemalan military, however, only released a small portion of its archives. In February 2009, the Constitutional Court ordered the Ministry of Defense to hand over files relating to an ongoing legal case against several former high-ranking military officers accused of genocide against indigenous peoples, crimes against humanity, and war crimes during the internal armed conflict (1960–1996). Among the crimes of which they were accused was the 1982 massacre of some 250 persons in Plan de Sánchez, Baja Verapaz department. The defense ministry refused to hand over all the documents, alleging that some of them had been lost. The ministry had not raised the problem of missing documents previously, despite more than two years of legal proceedings over disclosure of the documents. By the end of 2009, the documents had not been released and legal challenges to the court’s decision continued.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 155; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 225.]

Between 30 April and 5 May 2009, nine members of the Asociación para el Estudio y Promoción de la Seguridad en Democracia (SEDEM; Association for the Study and Promotion of Security under Democracy) and the Unidad de Protección de Defensoras y Defensores de Derechos Humanos (UDEFEQUA; Human Rights Defenders Protection Unit) received over forty SMS text messages containing death threats. The texts focused on their work to bring to justice those responsible for the crimes committed during the internal armed conflict (1960–1996). SEDEM urged the authorities to declassify military archives that might contain evidence of some of the crimes. UDEFEGUA supported hundreds of Guatemalan activists at risk since 2000.

[Source: Amnesty International, “Guatemalan activists receive death threats by text message” (7 May 2009).]

In August 2009, the first conviction for the crime of enforced disappearance occurred, when an ex-paramilitary leader was sentenced to 150 years’ imprisonment for his role in disappearing individuals between 1982 and 1984. The verdict was made possible by a landmark ruling by the Constitutional Court in July 2009, which established the permanent character of the crime of enforced disappearance. Guatemalans seeking accountability for past abuses faced daunting obstacles. Prosecutors and investigators received grossly inadequate training and resources. The courts routinely failed to resolve judicial appeals and motions in a timely manner, allowing defense attorneys to engage in dilatory legal maneuvering. The army and other state institutions resisted cooperating with investigations into abuses committed by current or former members (See entry above). The police regularly failed to provide adequate protection to judges, prosecutors, and witnesses involved in politically sensitive cases.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 224–25.]

In October 2009, the United Nations (UN) General Assembly passed a resolution supporting the UN-sponsored Comisión Internacional Contra la Impunidad en Guatemala (CICIG, International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala) and calling on the UN and the Guatemalan government to continue assisting the CICIG in its efforts to improve criminal investigations, prosecution procedures, and the implementation of public security-related legislation.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 155.]

In November 2009 the Spanish government enacted legislation to limit the application of universal jurisdiction by Spanish courts. It remained unclear what the impact of this legislation would be on the Guatemala case. On 2 December 2009, however, National Security Archive expert Kate Doyle testified before a judge in Madrid on the authenticity of 359 pages of documents concerning the 1982 counterinsurgency campaign (a scorched earth policy), of which the defense ministry had previously claimed (See entry above) that they could not be located. In a landmark ruling, Spain’s Constitutional Court had held in September 2005 that, in accordance with the principal of “universal jurisdiction”, cases of alleged genocide committed during Guatemala’s civil war could be prosecuted in the Spanish courts. In July 2006, a Spanish judge had issued international arrest warrants for former military dictator General Efraín Ríos Montt and seven other Guatemalan officials on charges of terrorism, genocide, and torture. In December 2007, the Guatemalan Constitutional Court had held that the arrest and extradition requests issued by Spain were invalid.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 159; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (2009) 182–183, 2010 (2010) 225, 227; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 216; National Security Archive, Update (2 December 2009); NRC Handelsblad (28–29 March 2009) 31.]

GUINEA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

A national commission of inquiry, set up in 2007 to investigate grave human rights violations in 2006–2007, did not conduct any investigations. In October 2009, the United Nations (UN) secretary-general established an International Commission of Inquiry (ICI), endorsed by the African Union and the Economic Community of West African States, to investigate the grave human rights violations, including rape, committed by the security forces on 28 September 2009 in the capital Conakry, where more than 150 people were killed when security forces violently repressed a peaceful demonstration. In December 2009, the ICI submitted its report to the UN secretary-general. The report was not officially made public. The ICI found that it was reasonable to conclude that the crimes committed on that day and in the immediate aftermath may constitute crimes against humanity. It also concluded that there were sufficient grounds to attribute criminal responsibility to some individuals, including President Dadis Camara. In October 2009, the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) launched a preliminary examination to determine whether the violations of 28 September 2009 fell within ICC jurisdiction. The same month, the junta set up a national commission of inquiry, which was boycotted by local civil society organizations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) xv , 157.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: 1999.

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: 1997.

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

A few weeks after the constitutional crisis and coup of 28 June 2009, during which President Manuel Zelaya was ousted from power by the military and expelled from Honduras, the Minister of Culture, Arts, and Sports Rodolfo Pastor Fasquelle, went into hiding. In mid-August 2009, he went into exile in the United States, where he became a visiting professor in Harvard University's history department. Pastor had studied history at Tulane University, New Orleans, and El Colegio de Mexico. On 20 August 2009, the new Minister of Culture, Arts, and Sports, Myrna Castro, dismissed historian Darío A. Euraque, director of the Instituto hondureño de antropología e historia (IHAH; Honduran Institute of Anthropology and History) (2006–2009). Euraque challenged the legality of the dismissal. IHAH board member and historian Freddy Flores publicly expressed his concern. Euraque was also a professor at the history department of Trinity College in Hartford, CT, United States (1990–) and author of Reinterpreting the Banana Republic: Region and State in Honduras (1996; translated into Spanish as El capitalismo de San Pedro Sula y la historia política hondureña 1870–1972). He became a visiting professor in Trinity College. (See also NCH Annual Report 2009). [Sources: “Los atropellos y desaciertos de la ministra de cultura de facto: el despido del Dr. Darío Euraque” (Online; voselsoberano.com; 24 August 2009); Historia a Debate (Academia Solidaria), Honduras file (February 2010); N. Rayman & E. Spitzer, “Overthrown Honduras Culture Minister, Now at Harvard, Watches Strife From Afar”, The Crimson (2 October 2009).]

After the military-backed coup d'état of June 2009, months of political turbulence and instability followed, which November elections failed to resolve. The Tegucigalpa-San José accord—brokered by the international community and which included a truth commission to clarify responsibilities—made no progress and the de facto government remained in power at the end of 2009.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 15.]

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 21 September 1998, János Kenedi (1947–), a historian specialized in the functioning of dictatorial secret services, asked the interior ministry for access to certain documents as he wished to publish a study on the functioning of the State Security Service in the 1960s. Upon the ministry's refusal on the grounds that the documents were classified as state secrets, in January 1999 Kenedi obtained a court order for unrestricted access after arguing that it was necessary for the purposes of his ongoing historical research. After its appeal to the Supreme Court failed, in November 1999 the ministry offered access on the condition that Kenedi signed a confidentiality undertaking. Upon his refusal, and despite repeated enforcement orders, the ministry remained reluctant to grant him unrestricted access to the documents. In August 2005, Kenedi lodged an application before the European Court of Human Rights, which in May 2009 ruled that the authorities had misused their powers by delaying Kenedi's exercise of his right to freedom of expression and therefore violated it. With the excessively long proceedings the government also violated the "reasonable-time" requirement, which was tantamount to arbitrariness.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Kenedi versus Hungary (Strasbourg 2009) at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/143.pdf.]

In 2004, a public debate took place as to whether a statue should be raised for Pál Teleki (1879–1941), a prime minister (1920–1921, 1939–1941) who cooperated with Nazi Germany in the early stages of World War II. In this discussion, historian László Karsai (1950–), a specialist in the history of the extermination of Jews and Roma, said that Teleki had been one of the most reproachable figures of Hungarian history, responsible for substantial anti-Semitic legislation and for dragging Hungary into World War II. Karsai published an article on this subject in a weekly paper, criticizing the right-wing media, including publicist B.T., for embellishing Teleki's role and for having made anti-Semitic statements in this context. In 2005, B.T. sued Karsai for defamation. In 2006, the Supreme Court upheld a decision in favor of B.T. In 2009, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that Karsai's freedom of expression had been violated, in particular by ordering him to publish a rectification at his expense and to bear considerable legal costs. It said that the obligation to publish a rectification affected Karsai's professional credibility as a historian and was therefore capable of producing an intimidating effect.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Karsai versus Hungary (2009) at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/144.pdf.]

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Perpetrators of human rights violations in Punjab between 1984 and 1994, and Assam between 1998 and 2001—including enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions—continued to evade justice. Impunity persisted for past offenses, including enforced disappearances of thousands of people during the armed conflict in Kashmir since 1989. The International People’s Tribunal on Human Rights and Justice in Indian-administered Kashmir published a report documenting unmarked graves of more than 2,900 people who allegedly disappeared during the conflict.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 169.]

In 2009, twenty people had so far been convicted of the targeted massacre of about 3,000 Sikhs in northern India (including Delhi) after the assassination of the then Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by her Sikh bodyguards in 1984. Public pressure forced the Central Bureau of Investigation to prosecute Jagdish Tytler and Sajjan Kumar, two Congress Party leaders accused of inciting their supporters to commit the Delhi massacres, after it had initially stated that there was no evidence against them.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 168–169; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 299.]

In 2009, most of those responsible for the attacks on Muslim minorities in 2002 in Gujarat and other human rights violations, including extrajudicial executions in that state, were not brought to justice.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 169.]

In May 2009, the nationalist Hindu Janajagruti Samiti (HJS; established 2002) criticized the updated class VII textbook issued by the National Council for Educational Research and Training (NCERT) for “glorifying foreign history while not giving Indian history due significance”. Some critics also found too much information on the Mughals (1526–1858) and too little on Maratha King Shivaji (1627–1680). Two chapters termed objectionable by teachers and parents would be reviewed and possibly taken out by the Goa Board of Secondary and Higher Secondary Education (GBSHSE).

[Sources: The Hindu (13 July 2005); Times of India (17 May 2009).]

On 23 November 2009, a hitherto unpublished official report drafted by a commission of inquiry chaired by former judge Liberhan became known. It stated that the 6 December 1992 attack on and destruction of a mosque in Ayodhya (See previous NCH Annual Reports) was prepared by leaders of the Hindu-nationalist organization Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS, National Volunteer Corps founded in 1925). The commission indicted 68 leaders of the opposition Bharatiya Janata Party and other allied Hindu nationalist organizations for the 1992 destruction. Impunity continued for those who took part in the attendant violence and the ensuing massacres in some states.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 169; NRC Handelsblad (23 & 25 November 2009).]

December 2009 marked the 25th anniversary of the catastrophic leak of deadly chemicals from Union Carbide's pesticide plant in Bhopal, India—one of the world's worst industrial disasters. In December 1984, thousands died and an estimated 100,000 people were still suffering the health consequences of that leak. Despite efforts by survivors to pursue justice through courts in India and the United States, a quarter of a century after the leak, no one has ever been held to account for the leak or its aftermath. State action continued to be inadequate and compensation insufficient. The plant site remained contaminated.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) xix–xx, 168.]

On 4 September 2009, the Gujarat High Court lifted the ban on a book about Ali Jinnah written by Jaswant Singh (See NCH Annual Report 2009).

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 146.]

In October 2009, the government reportedly ordered Working Title Films, the producers of a film based on the book Indian Summer: The Secret History of the End of an Empire by historian Alex von Tunzelmann, to rewrite certain scenes if they wished to receive permission to film in India. The film treated the relationship of love and friendship between Jawaharlal Nehru (India's first prime minister) and Edwina Mountbatten, the wife of British India's last viceroy, and would reportedly include scenes showing Nehru and Mountbatten kissing, holding hands, and using the word "love".

[Source: Independent (7 October 2009).]

In May 2010, it was revealed that most of the official records of the 1971 India-Pakistan war leading to the independence of Bangladesh were shredded shortly after the war, probably deliberately. They included records documenting the creation of the Mukti Bahini (the Bangladesh freedom fighters) and the Indian army operations during the war. The Indian Army had housed and trained the Mukti Bahini in different camps across India; the fighters were later a part of the operations led by the eastern command.

[Source: J. Joseph, "Truth Lost? Most Military Records of Bangladesh War Missing", Times of India

(Online; 9 May 2010).]

See also Myanmar.

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, impunity remained the rule for members of the security forces responsible for abuses. Indonesian military officers and militia leaders were yet to be brought to justice for past atrocities committed in Timor-Leste, Papua, Aceh, the Moluccas, Kalimantan, and elsewhere. The elite Kopassus military special forces continued to engage in abuses.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 306, 309.]

In 2009, the government continued to promote reconciliation with Timor-Leste at the expense of justice for crimes under the Indonesian occupation of East Timor (1975–1999). Over 300 individuals who were indicted by the United Nations (UN) Special Panels for Serious Crimes for crimes against humanity and other crimes remained at large and were outside the territorial jurisdiction of Timor-Leste. Most of them were believed to live in Indonesia. The government refused to facilitate the extradition of those indicted on the basis that it did not recognize the UN mandate to try Indonesian citizens in Timor-Leste.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) xvi, 171–172.]

In 2009, at least 114 people were detained for peacefully expressing their views. The overwhelming majority were peaceful political activists who were sentenced to terms of imprisonment for raising prohibited pro-independence flags in Maluku or Papua. In March 2009, Buce Nahumury was sentenced to four years' imprisonment for having participated in a peaceful Cakalele dance in Ambon Maluku province in June 2007. During the dance, the “Benang Raja” flag, a symbol of the South Maluku independence movement, was unfurled in front of President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono. All 22 other Cakalele dancers were serving prison sentences of between 7 and 20 years.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 170–171.]

In 2009, the central government made no serious efforts to establish a truth and reconciliation tribunal in Aceh to investigate crimes committed before the signing of the 2005 peace agreement, despite the fact that under the 2006 Law on the Governing of Aceh, such a tribunal was to be operational by August 2007.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 306, 309.]

In September 2009, the Special Committee on Disappearances 1997–1998 of the House of People’s Representatives urged the government to create an ad hoc human rights court to try those responsible for enforced disappearances. They also urged it to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance. However, the government had not acted on the recommendations by the end of 2009.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 172.]

In September 2009, the Australian federal police reopened a war crimes investigation into the 1975 killing of five Australia-based journalists by Indonesian forces in Timor-Leste (See previous NCH Annual Reports). The Indonesian Ministry of Foreign Affairs responded that it considered the case closed and that the investigation could have implications for bilateral relations.

On 1 December 2009, the censorship board (Lembaga Sensor Film) banned the film Balibo, directed by Australian Robert Connolly. On 2 December 2009, several government bodies welcomed the censorship board’s decision, saying that the film would have damaged Indonesia’s diplomatic relations and cast its military in a negative light. As a result of the ban, the Jakarta International Film Festival and others canceled their plans to screen the film, but in defiance of the ban, the Alliance of Independent Journalists held two screenings of Balibo in Jakarta on 3 December 2009, for what it said were educational purposes. The Alliance of Independent Journalists (AJI) filed a lawsuit against the censorship board for its decision, arguing that it violated the public’s right to information.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (7 December 2009); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 314; “Indonesia: Historical Books and Films Banned” (<http://www.freewordonline.com>; 2010); International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Alert (10 March 2010); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 147.]

In December 2009, John Roosa’s book on the 1965 coup (See NCH Annual Report 2009) was effectively banned together with four other books. On 8 January 2010, eighty-two intellectuals, including six historians, issued a statement to protest the bans.

[Source: Southeast Asian Press Alliance/Institute for the Studies on Free Flow of Information, Ifex Alert (21 January 2010).]

See also Netherlands, Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 26 and 27 December 2009, demonstrators gathered in major cities to mark the religious festivals of Ashura and Tasoa, which coincided with mourning rituals for the highest-ranking clerical critic of the government, Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri. Police and basij paramilitary forces attacked demonstrators in Tehran and Qom, wounding many and killing at least eight. More than a thousand people were detained, including Mahin Fahimi, a historian and member of Mothers for Peace (a group which campaigned against possible military intervention in Iran over its nuclear program, sought solutions to the region's instability, and campaigned against political imprisonment). [Sources: Amnesty International, Iran: Fears for Demonstrators As Authorities Warn of Zero Tolerance amid Ongoing Arrests and Trials (Online; 9 February 2010); Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (16 February 2010).]

Ahead of expected demonstrations during the 31st anniversary of the Islamic Revolution on 12 February 2010, the government attempted to slow down the Internet and block text messaging. [Sources: Committee to Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (12 February 2010); Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (16 February 2010).]

In April and May 2010, at least a dozen statues of secular figures disappeared in Tehran, including one of sociologist and historian Ali Shariati (1933–1977) (See previous NCH Annual Reports) and two of heroes from the time of the Constitutional Revolution (1905–1911). [Source: NRC Handelsblad (11 May 2010).]

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, those accused of committing crimes under Saddam Hussein continued to be brought to trial but before a seriously flawed court which handed out further death sentences. In August 2009, the Iraqi High Tribunal (IHT) sentenced former deputy prime minister Tariq Aziz and Ali Hassan al-Majid (known as “Chemical Ali”) each to seven years’ imprisonment for their roles in planning the forced displacement of Kurds from northern Iraq in the late 1980s. The conviction followed a separate fifteen-year prison sentence that both received in March 2009 for the former government's execution of merchants accused of profiteering under sanctions in 1992. Also in March 2009, the IHT sentenced al-Majid to death for the murder of Shi'ite Muslims in 1999 (he was previously sentenced to death for his role in the 1988 Anfal campaign against the Kurds and for the suppression of a Shi'ite uprising after the 1991 Gulf War).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 49; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 503.]

In June 2010, Khazi Mutlaq, a government official in charge of democratizing Iraq's lesson plans, noted that the 2003 overthrow of the Saddam Hussein regime by the United States-led coalition forces and its aftermath were variously called "invasion", "occupation", "liberation", and "Operation Freedom" and that therefore the government did not wish to address the subject in the history textbooks. He feared that sectarian disagreement would interfere with the official goal to "make [the] history curriculum an instrument to unify the Iraqi people". According to Mohammed Kamil, the chairman of the history department at Mustansiriya University, Baghdad, the history of the Saddam era (1979–2003) was also poorly treated in the history textbooks.

[Source: T. Arango, "In Rewriting Its History, Iraq Treads Cautiously", New York Times (29 June 2010).]

On 26 July 2010, two car bombs exploded near the holy Shi'ite city of Kerbala, southern Iraq, killing twenty mainly Shi'ite pilgrims who wanted to attend the Shabaniyah festival commemorating the birthday in 868 CE of Imam Muhammad al-Mahdi, the last of Twelve Imams and believed by Twelver Shi'ite Muslims to be hidden in the ninth century to save humanity.

[Source: "Two bombs kill 20 near Iraqi Shi'ite city of Kerbala" (Online; Reuters, 26 July 2010).]

See also Syria.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council created an independent fact-finding mission led by South African judge Richard Goldstone (previously prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunals for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia) to investigate alleged violations during the 22-day conflict in Gaza and southern Israel that ended in January 2009. The Goldstone report found that both Israeli forces and Hamas (and other Palestinian groups) committed war crimes and, possibly, crimes against humanity. It stated that “[t]he prolonged situation of impunity ha[d] created a justice crisis”. It recommended that if the two sides failed to carry out investigations and ensure accountability, the UN Security Council should exercise its authority and refer the situation to the International Criminal Court. In November 2009, the UN General Assembly gave Israel and the Palestinian side three months to show they were willing and able to undertake investigations that met international standards.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) xiv–xv.]

On 23 July 2009, the education ministry ordered the removal of the word nakba from a school textbook for eight- and nine-year-old Arab children. Education minister Gideon Saar told the Knesset that “[i]n no country in the world does an educational curriculum refer to the creation of the country as a ‘catastrophe’”, but Arab member of parliament Hana Sweid accused the government of “nakba denial”. In 2007, a controversy had erupted when the nakba concept was introduced into a book for use in Arab schools only by the then education minister, Yuli Tamir, of the center-left Labour party. Arabs made up about a fifth of the Israeli population (they were descendants of those who did not leave their homes during the 1948 war) (See also NCH Annual Report 2009).

[Sources: Guardian (Online; 22 & 23 July 2009); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 152.]

On 21 February 2010, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced that Israel had added two holy sites in the occupied West Bank to a list of national heritage sites: the Cave of the Patriarchs / Ibrahimi Mosque in Hebron (the site where the biblical patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were possibly buried), and Rachel’s Tomb in Bethlehem. The move heightened tensions.

[Sources: Independent Media Review Analysis (Online; 21 February 2010); Jerusalem Post (Online; 22 February 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2010) 221–22; NRC Handelsblad (22 February 2010) 5, (1 March 2010) 4.]

In May 2010, the newspaper Ha'aretz, its reporter Gidi Weitz, and Neta Shoshani, a student at the Bezalel Art School in Jerusalem, petitioned the Israeli High Court of Justice for access to records stored in the archives of the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF; the army) relating to the battle of Deir Yassin (a village near Jerusalem) in April 1948. Many believe that Etzel (Irgun) and Lehi (Stern Group) underground units massacred dozens of Palestinian civilians in Deir Yassin and forced the survivors to flee. In 2006, Shoshani had asked to see the material for her art school final project, but she had been granted partial access only. In the spring of 2007, she had asked to see the photographs in the collection. In September 2007, however, a committee of ministers had extended the 50-year moratorium on the disclosure of the records to 2012 with the argument that they could harm national security and foreign relations. In addition to the photos sought by Shoshani, Ha'aretz demanded to see reports on the conquest of Deir Yassin written by military historian Meir Pa'il, at the time an intelligence officer in the Hagana (a Jewish paramilitary organization which became the IDF after independence), and several other documents and photos.

[Source: Jerusalem Post (Online; 5 May 2010).]

In mid-June 2010, a controversy arose over two omissions by the education ministry in the high school history textbooks—the 1982 war between Israel and Lebanon and the Oslo Accords of 1993 which created the Palestinian National Authority—and over the question whether these omission were political.

[Source: Haaretz (Online; 25 June 2010).]

See also Lebanon, Palestinian Authority, Spain, United Kingdom.

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 3 February 2010, Luigi Marino withdrew an iPhone application (called iMussolini and launched on 21 January 2010), which allowed users to download a 25-minute collection of video and audio clips from dozens of speeches made by the former Italian dictator Benito Mussolini (1883–1945). Cinecittà Luce, the film institute holding the copyright of the pictures, declared that the application did not serve any educational purposes, and threatened to sue Marino for damages. The phenomenon was said to fit into a broader campaign to rehabilitate Mussolini's legacy since 2001.

[Sources: BBC News (24 July 2002; 3 February 2010); NRC Handelsblad (4 February 2010) 5.]

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Although they were handed to the United Nations (UN) secretary-general in November 2004, the UN Security Council still made not public in 2009 the findings of the UN Commission of Inquiry into Serious Violations of Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law in Ivory Coast since September 2002. In 2003, the Ivorian government accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) over serious crimes. While ICC officials visited Ivory Coast in July 2009 at the invitation of civil society, as in previous years the government was not forthcoming in assisting the ICC mission.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 96.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In July 2009, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women reiterated its recommendation that Japan should urgently find a lasting solution for the situation of the “comfort women” – survivors of Japan’s military sexual slavery system (1931–1945), including compensation for the victims, prosecution of the perpetrators, and educating the public about these crimes. Twelve local councils adopted resolutions calling for an apology and compensation for survivors of the system.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 190.]

On 1 April 2010, the Yokohama branch of the Japan Teachers’ Union (JTU) boycotted middle school history textbooks written by the right-wing Group for Creating New History Books and adopted by the city office of education. JTU published a compilation of its own material for teachers, declaring that the textbooks (published by Jiyusha publishers) contained many inaccuracies legitimizing Japan’s past aggression in Asia. For example, they reportedly represented Japan’s colonial rule in Korea (1910–1945) as a modernization, hiding the forced nature of the annexation, and defended the inaccurate theory that Japan ruled Korea in ancient times. On 28 April 2010, the Yokohama education office notified middle schools that they were obliged to use the textbooks that it had selected.

[Source: Dong-A Ilbo (17 May 2010).]

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

More than 1,000 people lost their lives and an estimated 300,000 were displaced from their homes in the violence that followed the December 2007 elections. The coalition government formed in February 2008 agreed to implement the recommendations of a commission established to investigate the post-election violence (known as the Waki Commission for its chairperson, Justice Philip Waki). In October 2008, the commission recommended that the government establish a national tribunal to investigate and prosecute those most responsible for the violence, or refer the crimes to the International Criminal Court (ICC). In 2009, the government did not take measures to ensure accountability for human rights violations committed during the post-election violence in 2007–2008 when more than 1,000 people were killed. In February 2009, parliament rejected a bill to establish a special tribunal to investigate and prosecute suspected perpetrators of these crimes. In July 2009, the cabinet rejected the tabling of a redrafted government version of the bill. A bill seeking to establish a special tribunal was published in August 2009 and was pending in parliament at the end of 2009. In July 2009, the government announced plans to carry out “accelerated reforms of the judiciary, the police and the investigative arms of government” to deal with human rights abuses during the post-election violence, but no timeline was given.

At the end of 2009, an application by the ICC prosecutor filed in November to the ICC pre-trial chamber to authorize an investigation into possible crimes against humanity during the post-election violence was pending. In July 2009, the government appointed commissioners to the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC), established following the post-election violence, and the President approved several amendments to the 2008 TJRC Act, including that no amnesty may be recommended by the TJRC in respect of genocide, crimes against humanity, and gross human rights violations. However, concerns remained about the failure of the TJRC law to provide for effective protection for victims and witnesses and for adequate reparations for victims.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 4, 195–197; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 128.]

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

South Korea believed that hundreds of South Korean prisoners of war from the Korean War (1950–1953) remained in North Korea against their will.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 329.]

See also Japan, Korea (South).

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Between June and September 1950, after Kim Il-sung's Communist army invaded the south (thus starting the Korean War) in June, at least 10,000 and possible as much as 100,000 persons suspected of supporting Communism were executed by South Korean forces, the police, and anti-Communist groups in Taejon, Busan, and other places, for fear of collaboration with the North. In 2008, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), established in December 2005, investigated the massacre, thus bringing to an end decades of official silence about the massacre; it first reported on the massacre on 26 November 2009. Most of the victims were either alleged Communists staying in prison or suspected sympathizers enrolled in an official "re-education" movement known as the Bodo League (also known as Gukmin Bodo Ryeonmaeng; National Rehabilitation and Guidance League). The TRC covered the period from 1910 until 1990 (the Korean resistance to the 1910–1945 Japanese annexation, the political oppression during 1945–1950, the Korean War (1950–1953), and the succession of military dictatorships regimes until the late 1980s.

[Sources: H. McDonald, "South Korea Owns Up to Brutal Past", Sydney Morning Herald (Online; 15 November 2008); Keesings historisch archief (2010) 237; Wikipedia (Online; 5 June 2010).]

See also Japan, Korea (North).

KOSOVO

See Serbia/Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: —

On 13 June 2010, the regional records office of the village of Bazar-Korgon, Jalal-Abad Province, burned down during riots in the south. More than 20,000 records reportedly disappeared. Eighty per cent of Bazar-Korgon's inhabitants were ethnic Uzbeks.

[Source: "Paper office burnt down in Jalal-Abad region of Kyrgyzstan" (Online; News Agency 24.kg, 14 June 2010).]

See also Uzbekistan.

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In Lebanon, human rights groups won a court order to disclose the findings of an earlier official investigation into enforced disappearances but the government, consisting of different factions, was apparently not willing to disclose it. In March 2009, the Special Tribunal for Lebanon was established in the Netherlands with a mandate to prosecute the perpetrators of one set of political crimes—the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri and related attacks—but it was not complemented by measures to investigate many others. In April 2009, the tribunal ordered the release of four former heads of Lebanese intelligence and security services who had been held for almost four years in detention without charge following their arrest in 2005 on suspicion of their involvement in Hariri's assassination. The tribunal did not yet issue any indictments. A United Nations-appointed international commission continued its investigations.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 48; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 534–535.]

In March 2009, reconstruction of the Nahr al-Bared refugee camp—destroyed in the 2007 battle between the Lebanese army and the armed Fatah al-Islam group—officially began, but in August the State Shura Council, the highest administrative court, declared a two-month suspension after a leading politician submitted a petition noting that reconstruction might damage archaeological finds uncovered under the rubble. Reconstruction resumed in October 2009.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 532.]

More than a year after the end of the fighting that broke out in May 2008 between the Hezbollah-led opposition and pro-government groups, killing at least 71 people in two weeks, judicial authorities failed to hold accountable fighters responsible for attacks against civilians. More than three years after the end of the 2006 war between Israel and Hezbollah, neither the Israeli nor the Lebanese government had investigated the violations of the laws of war committed by the warring parties. The submunition “duds” left behind by Israel's bombing campaign continued to harm civilians. In May 2009, Israel handed to the United Nations data and maps on the cluster munitions it fired over southern Lebanon during the conflict. Lebanon signed the Convention on Cluster Munitions in December 2008.

Despite a pledge in the government's ministerial declaration of August 2008 to take steps to uncover the fate of the Lebanese and other nationals who disappeared during and after the 1975–1990 Lebanese civil war, and to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances, the government took no practical steps to uncover mass graves or collect information on the disappeared. The fate of Lebanese and other residents of Lebanon who disappeared at the hands of Syrian security forces remained unknown. An official joint Syrian-Lebanese committee established in May 2005 to investigate such cases had not published any findings.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 534; International Convention for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/to/28.pdf.]

See also Bahrain.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In December 2009, the final report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), established to shed light on the human rights violations committed during the period 1979–2003, was released. In June 2009, the TRC had already submitted an unedited version of its report (highlighting the role played by corruption and poor management of natural resources in giving rise to the armed conflict) to the legislature and to President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf. The final report recommended establishing an extraordinary criminal tribunal to investigate and prosecute those suspected of having committed crimes under international law as well as economic crimes. A total of 98 individuals were identified as the “most notorious perpetrators”, including Charles Taylor and seven other leaders of various armed groups. Thirty-six were identified as responsible for crimes under international law but not recommended for prosecution because they spoke truthfully and expressed remorse. Johnson-Sirleaf was included in the list of supporters of armed groups, and the TRC recommended that she be banned from running for public office for 30 years. In July 2009, Johnson-Sirleaf declared to be committed to work with all key stakeholders to implement the TRC recommendations, but the legislature's formal debate of the report was postponed until early 2010. Efforts at justice were further complicated by problems with the quality of the TRC report, weaknesses within the judicial system, the potential for the legislature to block accountability efforts, and the existence of a 2003 act that granted immunity for war crimes committed from 1989 through 2003.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 3, 207, 208; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 139–140.]

See also Sierra Leone.

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Throughout 2009, relatives of the 1,200 prisoners believed to have been killed at Abu Salim Prison on 29 June 1996 held peaceful protests in Benghazi, Ajdebia, and other cities to demand truth, justice, and reparation. On 26 March 2009, three members of the Organizing Committee of Families of Victims of Abu Salim were arrested. Fouad Ben Oumran, Hassan El-Madani and Fathi Tourbil were at the forefront of the demonstrations by families of victims. On 28 March 2009, they and two others arrested were released days later without being formally charged. In September 2009, the authorities appointed a judge to head an investigation into the incident, but neither his mandate nor other details of the investigation were disclosed. The authorities informed some families that prisoners had been killed, and in some cases issued death certificates, but many families rejected the offer of financial compensation as it was conditional on their not seeking judicial redress. The authorities did not make public any account of the events or held anyone responsible. In October 2009, they announced plans to demolish Abu Salim Prison, prompting an outcry by some families of victims who feared the destruction of evidence.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 49, 209, 211; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 537.]

In March 2009, Jamal al-Haji and Farag Hmeid were released. They were the last of a group of fourteen prisoners arrested in 2007 for planning a peaceful demonstration to commemorate the anniversary of a violent crackdown on demonstrators in Benghazi (another of the fourteen, Abderrahman al-Qotaiwi, initially reported as disappeared, was released apparently in 2008) (See also NCH Annual Report 2009).

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 536.]

Hundreds of cases of enforced disappearance and other serious human rights violations committed in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s remained unresolved, and the Internal Security Agency (ISA), implicated in those violations, continued to operate with impunity. The security forces, particularly the ISA, detained and interrogated individuals suspected of dissent or terrorism-related activities, while holding them incommunicado and denying them access to lawyers. On 28 October 2009, the General People's Committee for Justice invited people to contact it if they had been detained by security forces without trial or after acquittal or completion of sentences in the framework of "national reconciliation". The committee's secretary reportedly said that victims would receive financial compensation for every month spent in prison, and that the "door remained open" for judicial redress. However, the authorities did not publicly apologize for the human rights violations committed, nor were perpetrators brought to justice.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 209, 211.]

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In October 2009, the European Commission recommended opening negotiations on accession to the European Union (EU), but in December 2009 EU Foreign Ministers postponed their decision at Greece's request. Non-governmental organizations expressed concerns at measures taken by the government, inter alia, to reinforce Macedonia's claims to a historic identity (including the building of monuments at public expense).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 213.]

See also Greece.

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In early 2010, the ban on March 8, a Tamil-language book by lawyer K. Arumugam (See NCH Annual Report 2007), was confirmed. Deputy Home Minister Fu Ah Kiow justified it as "just ordinary procedure".

[Source: B. Kuppusamy, "Malaysia's 'Bad' Books Sent into Literary Limbo", Asia Times (Online; 24 February 2010).]

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

There was no move to bring perpetrators of past human rights violations to justice. However, attempts from opposition members of parliament to enact a law providing immunity from prosecution to the former president failed when the Speaker of Parliament declared the move unconstitutional.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 219–220.]

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, impunity for past human rights violations remained entrenched. Little or no action was taken to bring to justice those responsible. Investigations into hundreds of cases of serious human rights violations committed during the “dirty war” in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s made no progress and some documents from previous investigations remained unaccounted for. During its five-year existence, the Special Prosecutor’s Office established in 2001 to investigate and prosecute abuses committed during the “dirty war” in the 1960s–1980s made very limited progress. It did not obtain a single criminal conviction. Of the more than 600 disappearance cases, it filed charges in 16 and obtained indictments in 9. The office determined the whereabouts of only 6 disappeared individuals (4 had been sent to psychiatric institutions and 2 had been killed in detention). After President Felipe Calderón officially closed the office in 2007, the cases were transferred to another, non-specialized unit within the Attorney General’s Office, which did not make significant advances in the investigations. In March 2009, a federal court confirmed the closure of the case of genocide against former President Luis Echeverría for the 1968 Tlatelolco student massacre. In December 2009, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights found Mexico responsible for the enforced disappearance of Rosendo Radilla by the army in Guerrero state in 1974. It ordered a new civilian investigation, reparations for the relatives, and reform of the military penal code to end military jurisdiction over the investigation and trial of human rights cases.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 226; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 239–240.]

See also Colombia.

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

On 4 April 2002, the official newspaper Moldova suverană (Sovereign Moldova) published an article written by a historian and former deputy minister for education, S.N., stating that Anatol Petrenco (1954–), chairman of the Association of Historians of the Republic of Moldova and a university professor, owed his studentship and further career as a historian to his cooperation with the Soviet secret service KGB as an informant. Petrenco sued the S.N. for defamation, but in 2002–2004 the domestic courts dismissed the case, qualifying the impugned statements as value judgements. The Supreme Court omitted to comment on the expert linguistic report attached to Petrenco's appeal according to which the author had directly insulted him and damaged his honor, dignity, and professional reputation. In 2005, Petrenco applied to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) for invasion of his privacy and defamation. The ECHR found that statements about collaboration with the KGB could not be considered mere value judgments. Whether an individual had collaborated with the KGB was not a matter for speculation but a historical fact capable of being substantiated by relevant evidence. By presenting Petrenco's collaboration with the KGB as an established fact whereas it was mere speculation, S.N.'s article overstepped the limits of acceptable comments in the context of a debate of a general interest. The ECHR held that publicly implying, without proof, that Petrenco collaborated with the KGB, breached the latter's right to respect for private life.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Petrenco versus Moldova: Judgment (2010).]

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

MONTENEGRO

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

MOROCCO/WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, a list of cases of enforced disappearances investigated by the Equity and Reconciliation Commission (ERC) was still not published. The ERC, established to investigate gross human rights violations committed under the rule of King Hassan II (1956–1999), when state violence against dissidents and opponents was particularly extreme (1961–1999), completed its work in November 2005 and the list was due to be published by the Advisory Council on Human Rights (ACHR), tasked to follow up its work. In September 2009, the ACHR said that 17,012 survivors and victims' families had received financial compensation as a result of the ERC decisions and 2,886 people had been issued with health care cards. However, victims and survivors continued to be denied effective access to justice and the perpetrators had still not been held to account. The government did not yet implement most of the institutional reforms recommended by the ERC. In addition, as of October 2009, the families of the disappeared persons whose cases were handled by the ERC and, afterward by the ACHR, had not received a full account of the ERC findings concerning the disappearance of their relatives.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 48–49, 234; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 542.]

In late 2009, Mustapha Manouzi declared that Forum vérité et justice (Truth and Justice Forum, established in 1999), of which he was the new president, would press the government to establish a national day in memory of the disappeared and to add a chapter on the “years of lead”, the period of human rights abuses under King Hassan II's rule (1961–1999), in history textbooks.

[Source: M. Saadi, “Droits de l'homme: Le forum ne renonce jamais”, Telquel (Online; [2009]).]

Polisario camps

In 2009, the stalemate continued in negotiations on the status of Western Sahara between Morocco and the Polisario Front. The Polisario Front called for an independent state in Western Sahara and ran a self-proclaimed government-in-exile in refugee camps in south-western Algeria. No steps were known to have been taken by the Polisario Front to address the impunity of those accused of committing human rights abuses in the camps in the 1970s and 1980s.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 231, 234.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 3 March 2008, authorities arrested historian U Aung Hla Thein in Sittwe, the capital of Rakhine (or Arakanese) State. He was questioned for three hours and then released. His computer and many documents were seized, including research papers about Rakhine history. He had previously written a Rakhine textbook for primary-level students. His arrest could have been related to the official referendum scheduled for May 2008 and rumors that some intellectuals in Sittwe were preparing to oppose it.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Myanmar: The Repression of Ethnic Minority Activists in Myanmar (Online; 16 February 2010); Narinjara (Independent Arakanese News Agency), “Arakanese Historian Arrested in Sittwe” (Online; 7 March 2008).]

In January 2009, the press scrutiny board delayed an edition of the arts monthly Myanmar Thit because the cover, featuring a portrait of the Burmese former United Nations (UN) Secretary-General U Thant (1909–1974) to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of his birth, had to be replaced with the UN logo and a quotation. The board also rejected a speech written by Mahatma Gandhi, one of the founding fathers of India.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 85, 126.]

On 19 July 2010, Martyrs’ Day (commemorating the 1947 assassination of General Aung San [1915–47], the independence leader known as the “Father of Burmese Independence”, and father of opposition leader Daw Aung San Suu Kyi), news about the commemoration ceremony was censored. The use of portraits of Aung San on magazine covers was disapproved. “New Style” magazine had intended to publish a 200–page special issue for Martyrs’ Day, but the censor board rejected some 70 pages of the material, deleting seven or eight entire stories.

[Source: Mizzima/Ifex, Ifex Alert (26 July 2010).]

See also Thailand.

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

NEPAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In 2009, efforts to establish a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) stalled. Nepali critics of a draft TRC bill, pending since 2007, noted shortcomings, among them the proposed commission's lack of independence from political influence, inadequate witness protection, and a proposal to grant it the power to recommend amnesty for perpetrators of serious human rights violations. Both sides of the conflict (1996–2006)—state forces and Maoist armed groups—had subjected people to enforced disappearances. In October 2008 the Maoist-led government decided to withdraw 349 cases against Maoists pending in court, claiming that they were “political” in nature. After the Maoist-led government in August 2008 announced that it would compensate “victims of conflict”, families of victims in some cases suspended their pursuit of criminal investigations, fearing they might negatively influence their applications for compensation.

According to the International Committee of the Red Cross, more than 1,300 people remained unaccounted for by the end of 2009. In June 2009, a draft bill criminalizing enforced disappearance lapsed, and a Commission of Inquiry into disappearances was not set up. The proposed bill failed both to employ a definition of enforced disappearance consistent with international law, and to recognize enforced disappearance as a possible crime against humanity. Impunity continued for perpetrators of human rights abuses during the conflict—no cases were tried before a civilian court. Survivors of violations reported that police refused to file complaints or investigate cases. The authorities failed to implement court-ordered arrests of military personnel accused of human rights violations. The army continued to make unsupported claims that it dealt with abusers in its ranks, yet promoted officers identified as alleged perpetrators of human rights violations. Particularly controversial was the appointment of Major General Toran Bahadur Singh as acting army chief. As head of the 10th Division, Singh was accused of involvement in cases of enforced disappearances in Maharajgunj in 2003. In 2009, the prime minister blocked his promotion to lieutenant general. The police reported that the army continued to refuse to cooperate in investigations into army abuses. The government claimed that it was too weak to initiate prosecutions against the army.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 240; Human Rights Watch, World

Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 320–322.]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In February 2007, journalist and historian Marcel Metze (1953–), author of several corporate histories, signed a contract with Rijkswaterstaat (RWS; Directorate-General for Public Works and Water Management responsible for major highways and waterways) to write a 300-page book (with the draft title The RWS Book of Change) containing the history of its reorganization in the 2003–2008 period. In November 2008, after having read four fifths of the manuscript, RWS director-general Bert Keijts told Metze that, in his view, the manuscript described the management responsible for the reorganization in an unbalanced way, disapprovingly, and sometimes disrespectfully. Although Metze defended his independence as a researcher, on 30 March 2009 RWS wrote to him that the manuscript (the publication of which was already announced) would not be published. On 20 April 2009, RWS rejected Metze's request for permission to publish the manuscript himself. In November 2009, RWS announced that in January 2010 it would publish the manuscript with SDU publishers in a revised form (one third of the original would be deleted and Metze's original contribution would not be mentioned). On 9 December 2009, a judge in The Hague ruled that the conflict was not about freedom of commissioned journalistic and historical research but about contract law. He further said that RWS had not committed copyright abuse or censorship and that Metze could not publish the manuscript himself because the 2007 contract stipulated that RWS had exclusive publication rights, which were only transferable after its written approval. In January 2010, after questions by members of parliament, Minister of Transport, Public Works and Water Management Camiel Eurlings reportedly asked RWS to approve Metze's request to publish in order to avoid censorship charges. Metze adapted a few passages related to the privacy of some civil servants. It appeared in March 2010 as Veranderend getij: Rijkswaterstaat in crisis—het verhaal van binnenuit (Changing Tide: The Directorate-General for Public Works and Water Management in Crisis—The Inside Story).

[Sources: M. Metze, personal communication (December 2009 & January 2010); NRC Handelsblad (26 November 2009) 3, (11 January 2010) 3, (12 March 2010) 6; Parool (27 November 2009); Volkskrant (11 January 2010); Rechtbank 's-Gravenhage, Vonnis in kort geding Marcel Metze versus Rijkswaterstaat (zaaknummer/rolnummer: 348566/KG ZA 09-12889; December 2009) at:

http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/132.pdf.]

On 1 December 2009, Robert and Eleonora van Maasdijk, the children of Gerrie van Maasdijk (1906–1997), general secretary of the royal court until his dismissal by Prince Bernhard (1949–March 1950), and Queen Juliana’s chamberlain afterward (–1956), sued historian Cees Fasseur (1938–) for libel because in his book Juliana en Bernhard: Het verhaal van een huwelijk 1936–1956 (2008; Juliana and Bernhard: The Story of a Marriage, 1936–1956) he had called van Maasdijk “a troublemaker”, “a Trojan horse at the court”, and “a splitter of the royal marriage”. In February 1950, van Maasdijk, a confidant of the queen, informed others about Prince Bernhard’s possible involvement in 1950 coup plans against the Indonesian President Sukarno. Van Maasdijk’s diaries also contained entries on these events.

[Sources: NOS (Online, 1 December 2009); NRC Handelsblad (11 December 2009) 4; Volkskrant (1 December 2009); Welingelichte Kringen (Online; 1 December 2009).]

See also Lebanon.

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

See Fiji.

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

NIGER

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2009, the government did still not hold members of the security forces accountable for past crimes, including the massacre of more than two hundred people by the military in Benue State in 2001 and the military's complete destruction of the town of Odi, Bayelsa State, in 1999 (See NCH Annual Report 2008).

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 144.]

NORWAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

OMAN

Last Annual Report entry: —

In March 2010, the government confiscated several banned books at the Muscat International Book Fair, including Tribes on the Eve of the English Coup in Salalah, by Ahmed Al-Zubaidi (probably a history of the sultanates of Muscat and Oman around 1870–1890).

[Arab Network for Human Rights Information, “Oman: Confiscation To Reach Legacy Books; A Black List of Writers To Be Denied Media Appearance” (Online; 28 March 2010).]

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The government's response to the long-standing conflict at the north-western border with Afghanistan vacillated between appeasement and extreme violence; neither strategy indicating a government committed to protecting human rights. In fact, there was a clear link between the surging conflict and decades of successive Pakistani governments ignoring the rights of the millions who live in the difficult terrain of north-western Pakistan, evading accountability for current or past abuses. The people of the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) bordering Afghanistan did not have the same rights as the other citizens of Pakistan: under the colonial era Frontier Crimes Regulation (1901) that still governed most administrative and judicial aspects of their lives, they were outside the writ of the National Assembly as well as the judiciary. Pakistanis living in the FATA were legally subject to collective punishment for crimes committed on its territory or for "acting in a hostile or unfriendly manner".

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 21–22.]

See also Bangladesh, India.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 31 August 2009, Gaza's ruling Islamist movement Hamas disapproved the idea that United Nations (UN)-run schools should teach about the Holocaust to their pupils (some 200,000 children). The head of its education committee in Gaza, Abdul Rahman el-Jamal, reportedly declared that the Holocaust was a "big lie" and that the UN should teach about the nakba ("catastrophe"; the term used by Palestinians to describe the expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians from Israel in 1948).

[Source: BBC News (31 August 2009).]

See also Israel.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In August 2008, around the time that the Comisión de Verdad y Justicia (CVyJ; Truth and Justice Commission) published its final report, primary-school curricula offered a course “Autoritarismo en la historia reciente del Paraguay” (Authoritarianism in Recent Paraguayan History) for the first time. [Source: A. Criscaut, “Nuevos documentos de la era stronista de Paraguay: Los archivos del terror II”, Página 12 (Online; Buenos Aires; 15 April 2010).]

Significant progress was made in bringing to justice some high-profile perpetrators of human rights abuses during the military government of General Alfredo Stroessner (1954–1989). By the end of 2009, some 13,700 applications for reparations had been made to the Ombudsman after modifications to legislation on compensation were made in 2008. In October 2009, the defense minister authorized the unsealing of files dating from the military regime, giving human rights activists investigating human rights violations during this period access to this information for the first time. In May 2009, Sabino Augusto Montanaro, interior minister between 1968 and 1989, was arrested after voluntarily returning from exile. He faced trial for human rights violations including crimes allegedly committed as part of Operation Condor, a joint plan by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to eliminate opponents.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 12, 258.]

In October 2009, two tons of military records were discovered at the Ministry of Defense. The archives, labeled archivos del terror II (a first find of files was done in December 1992), included records of the reorganization of the Paraguayan army and the purchase of arms during the War of the Triple Alliance against Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay (1864–1870), a list of names of Bolivian prisoners captured in the Chaco War (1932–1935), and documents about the Stroessner era and Operation Condor. The defense minister authorized the unsealing of files.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 258; M. Almada, “The Man Who Discovered the Archives of Terror”, UNESCO Courier (Online; 2009, no. 9); A. Criscaut, “Nuevos documentos de la era stronista de Paraguay: Los archivos del terror II”, Página 12 (Online; Buenos Aires; 15 April 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2010) 266.]

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 7 April 2009, in a unanimous verdict, a three-judge panel of the Peruvian Supreme Court convicted and sentenced former president Alberto Fujimori to 25 years’ imprisonment for crimes against humanity. He was the first democratically elected Latin American leader to be convicted for grave human rights violations in his own country. The court found him responsible for the extrajudicial execution of fifteen people in the Barrios Altos district of Lima in November 1991, the enforced disappearance and murder of nine students and a teacher from La Cantuta University in July 1992, and two abductions. Fujimori appealed the sentence and a final verdict was still pending. The trial was respectful of due process guarantees and consistent with international standards of fair trial. By October 2009 Fujimori had been convicted and sentenced in each of the other cases for which he was extradited from Chile in 2007, involving charges of corruption, bribery, and phone-tapping. In a separate trial, in April 2008 General Julio Salazar Monroe, former head of the National Intelligence Service during the Fujimori government, was sentenced to 35 years in prison for ordering the Cantuta killings. By September 2009, 13 members of the Colina group, the government death squad directly responsible for the La Cantuta and Barrios Altos killings, had been convicted. Efforts to investigate and prosecute former officials and military officers implicated in scores of other killings and disappearances dating from the beginning of the armed conflict had poor results. Lack of cooperation by the military consistently hampered the investigations. Moreover, President Alan García’s government repeatedly questioned the legitimacy of human rights trials. In October 2009, Defense Minister Rafael Rey claimed at a War Marines ceremony that the military and police did not commit crimes against humanity because they did not kill for religious, racial, political, or ideological reasons. According to information published by the human rights Ombudsman in December 2008, of 218 cases monitored by the institution—which included abuses committed by insurgent groups—only eight had led to convictions, while 122 were still under investigation by prosecutors. In October 2009, the National Human Rights Coordinator, an NGO that monitored accountability, reported that the National Criminal Court, created in 2004 to deal with human rights violations and terrorism, had acquitted 52 military and police agents and convicted twelve. The ratio of acquittals to convictions increased significantly in 2008–2009: the court acquitted 29 agents and convicted only two. In September 2009 the Supreme Court overturned one of the two convictions. In October 2009, the National Criminal Court acquitted five former top ranking army officers responsible for counterinsurgency operations of enforced disappearances in 1990, discounting evidence that disappearance was a systematic practice at the time.

There was no progress in implementing the recommendations of the 2001 Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) set up to investigate human rights violations committed during the internal armed conflict (1980–2000). Little progress was made regarding the 1,000 cases of past human rights violations filed with the Public Prosecutor's Office since 2003. The Ministry of Defense continued to withhold information on cases involving military personnel. In November 2009, the Reparations Council, a body set up in 2006 to create a record of victims of human rights violations during the armed conflict so that they could claim reparation, had to suspend its work owing to lack of resources.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 10–12, 260; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 245–247.]

In September 2009, Salomón Lerner, former TRC president and then rector emeritus of the Catholic University of Peru, president of the Institute for Democracy and Human Rights, and vice-president of a commission charged with creating a Museum of Memory, which would focus on human rights abuses in Peru, again received death threats and anti-Semitic e-mails.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 260; Human Rights Watch, “Peru: Investigate Threats Against Rights Defender” (25 September 2009); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 249.]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 25 November 2008, a Moscow court refused to reopen the investigation into the 1940 Katyń massacre. On 29 January 2009, the Supreme Court confirmed this judgment.

[Source: Keesings Historisch Archief (2009) 89.]

In March 2009, the Hollywood film Defiance (Polish: Opor), directed by Edward Zwick, was banned in several cinemas across Poland because of a local perception that it was rewriting history in an anti-Polish sense. It depicted the story of a Jewish underground movement led by the four Bielski brothers that waged a campaign of armed resistance against the Nazis and saved 1,200 Jews from the Holocaust. But the film was criticized from two sides. Nationalist Poles believed that the Bielski partisans also took part in a brutal 1943 attack led by Soviet partisans on the village of Naliboki in which 128 people were killed, despite historical investigations that exonerated them. The liberal newspaper Gazeta wyborcza gave evidence suggesting that the leader of the group, Tuvia Bielski, took part in a joint operation with the Soviets to wipe out Polish anti-Communist units (the underground Home Army) and that he helped lead the Soviets to the whereabouts of a Polish underground leader.

[Sources: Guardian (Online; 5 March 2009); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 176.]

On 27 November 2009, President Lech Kaczynski approved legislation that allowed for people to be fined or imprisoned for possessing or buying Communist symbols (like the hammer and sickle and the red star). The law, however, did not list the banned symbols and it also exempted from punishment their use for artistic, educational, or collectors' purposes. It complemented legislation that made it a crime to promote Nazism.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief (2010) 141; M. Scislowska, "Poland Clamps Down on Communist Symbols" (Online, AP, 27 November 2009).]

See also Russia.

QATAR

Last Annual Report entry: —

Members of a tribe blamed for a failed coup attempt in 1996 continued to be denied nationality, employment, and other rights.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 48.]

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In [September] 2009, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that part of the files relating to the overthrow of Ceaușescu's regime and the ensuing bloodshed in 1989 (some 1,200 files) should be declassified and made available to the organization "21 December 1989". On 10 February 2010, the government decided to publish 8,000 files. The members of "21 December 1989" (founded in January 1990 and led by Teodor Mărieș) participated in the uprising; they were seeking information on more than 1,000 persons who were killed during the revolution. Romania had declassified and released over 10,000 files since January 2010, with another 1000 documents remaining to be reviewed.

[Sources: P. Ciocoiu, "Files on Romanian revolution declassified", SETimes: The News and Views of Southeast Europe (Online, 24 February 2010); European Court of Human Rights, Association 21 December 1989 Bucarest & Teodor Mărieș & Marin Stoica versus Romania (2009) at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/146.pdf (in French).]

On 8 October 2009, a monument for the Holocaust victims was erected in Bucharest.

[Source: Keesings historisch archief (2009) 633.]

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 27 October 1999, Igor Sutyagin (1965–), a historian, expert on arms control issues, senior researcher in the Department of Military and Political Research of the Institute of United States and Canadian Studies of the Russian Academy of Sciences, and author of a 1998 book entitled "Strategic Nuclear Arms in Russia", was arrested by the Federal Security Bureau (FSB) of the Kaluga region and interrogated for about 60 hours. The FSB reportedly considered that by publishing a book about nuclear disarmament, Sutyagin disseminated "secret information", although he reportedly did not have access to such information. Sutyagin had, however, exchanged information with a United States doctoral candidate at Princeton University on the subject of strategic nuclear weapons and compiled information on military and defense issues in Russia, while working as a private consultant for the United Kingdom-based Alternative Futures consultancy. On 5 November 1999, Sutyagin was formally charged with high treason. On 12 September 2001, the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention held that Sutyagin's detention was not arbitrary. In 2004, he was found guilty of passing state secrets to foreign officials and sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for espionage. On 19 April 2007, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe demanded his immediate release. In April 2010, a court in Arkhangelsk rejected an appeal for his release on the grounds that he had broken prison rules. On [15] July 2010, he was one of the "Western spies" handed over by Russia to the United States in a spy swap. He was granted an official pardon as part of the deal. Sutyagin subsequently went into forcible exile in the United Kingdom.

[Sources: Amnesty International, "Russian Scientist Could Face Forcible Exile" (8 July 2010); Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly, "Resolution 1551 (2007): Fair Trial Issues in Criminal Cases Concerning Espionage or Divulging State Secrets" (19 April 2007), paragraphs 11, 15, at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/167.pdf; Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, "Russian Court Rejects Appeal By Scientist Accused Of Spying" (Online; 1 May 2010); Telegraph (15 July 2010); United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, Igor Sutyagin v. Russian Federation (E/CN.4/2002/77/Add.1 at 70; 2001) at: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/154.pdf.]

The 2007 film Katyn, documenting the 1940 killing of 20,000 Polish intellectuals and military officers, was barred from broad distribution in Russia, which amounted to a de facto ban. On 28 April 2010, however, shortly after the plane crash in which Polish President Lech Kaczynski and many Polish officials died, President Dmitry Medvedev ordered to publish files on the massacre (which had been declassified in September 1992 on the orders of then-President Boris Yeltsin and had been available to specialized researchers) on the website of the Rosarchiv (Russian Federal Archival Service; <http://www.rusarchives.ru>). One of the documents was a 5 March 1940 four-page memorandum from Lavrenty Beria, head of the NKVD secret police, to Joseph Stalin in which he suggested to execute the Polish prisoners held by the Soviets. Records of an investigation into the massacre that began in the 1990s and was closed in 2004 were not opened, despite the fact that a court case about it was pending.

[Sources: Article 19, "World Press Freedom Day: Free Media and Freedom of Information" (30 April 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2010), 261–62; National Security Archive, "Historic Dissident Journal Published Online" (30 April 2010); A. Osipovich, "Russia Publishes Katyn Archives" (Online; AFP; 28 April 2010).]

From August 2007, Mukhmed Gazdiev, a retired history teacher from Karabulak, Ingushetia, who was disabled and in poor health, had been harassed and intimidated, because he enquired into the enforced disappearance of his son, Ibragim ([1978–])—an economist who worked as a shop manager—after he was seized by armed men in camouflage (believed to be members of the Federal Security Services [FSS]) on 8 August 2007. In May 2008, the FSS searched his home using a warrant issued for a neighbor’s house. In [2010], Mukhmed Gazdiev complained to the court against the suspension of the criminal investigation into his son’s disappearance, believing that his son was still held in state custody, although the authorities denied this.

[Source: Wire (Amnesty International Newsletter; June/July 2010), 8, also at:
http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/ca/61.pdf.]

In March 2009, emergency situations minister Sergei Shoigu called for a federal law “On Combating the Rehabilitation of Nazism, Nazi Criminals or their Collaborators in the Newly Independent States on the Territory of the Former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics”, based on Holocaust denial legislation in Germany, that would criminalize attempts to “rehabilitate Nazism” and that aimed to protect the memory of the Soviet victims of World War II (See NCH Annual Report 2009). The law would also seek to punish Baltic, eastern European, or former Soviet states that maintained that they were “occupied” rather than “liberated” by the USSR, and to bar Western historians who accused the Red Army of carrying out atrocities during its 1945 advance on Berlin or point out that Nazi Germany and the USSR were once allies under the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop pact. Anyone condemning the Allies for the 1945 forcible repatriation to the USSR and subsequent execution or deportation of about two million Soviet citizens who had fallen into German hands before they were freed by the Allied advance (the so-called “victims of [the February 1945 Conference of] Yalta”, including Russian Cossacks, prisoners of war, forced laborers, émigrés, and anti-Communists who had fought for Germany against Stalin) could be branded as a “criminal”. The proposed memory law, which won almost universal backing in the Russian parliament in May 2009, was criticized because of its overbroad definition of Nazi rehabilitation (regarding equally culpable criticism of the USSR and heroization of Nazi Germany). Observers also saw the new legislation as part of a continuing rehabilitation of Stalin as it would outlaw criticism of many of his policies. The Global Campaign for Free Expression Article 19 recommended that the draft law be rejected by the Russian parliament because its scope was discriminatory and raised questions concerning the respect of the sovereignty of foreign states; because combating the re-examination of the decisions of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg and the desecration of the memory of the victims of the “Great Fatherland War” were illegitimate restrictions on the right to freedom of expression; because, as more than sixty years had passed since the end of World War II, it was not longer necessary to interfere with the right to freely seek historical truth in order to protect the victims of the war; and because the draft law failed to require that any interference with that right should be proportionate to the value or the interest protected by the state. Later in 2009, the government supported the principle of the law, but turned down the proposed project because of the vagueness of its terms. A new version of 16 April 2010, in which punishment was proposed exclusively for “public denial or approval of the Nazis crimes against peace and the security of the humankind established by the verdict of the Nuremberg Tribunal” was again criticized, inter alia because the 1945 Nuremberg statute does not know the category “crimes against the security of the humankind”.

[Sources: American Historical Association, “Open Letter to President Dmitrii Medvedev” (Washington 17 June 2009); Telegraph (Online; 5 March & 19 May 2009); Article 19, “Proposed Law Attempts To Regulate History and Memory” (1 October 2009); Article 19, Memorandum on the Russian Draft Federal Law “On Combating the Rehabilitation of Nazism, Nazi Criminals or their Collaborators in the Newly Independent States Created on the Territory of Former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics” (London 2009); N. Kosopov, “History and Truth: Russian MPs Appeal To Nuremberg”, University Values Bulletin (Online; June 2010).]

On 30 October 2009 (Political Prisoners Day since 1974; a national day of remembrance for political repression in the USSR), President Dmitry Medvedev attacked those seeking to rehabilitate Stalin. He said that it was not possible to justify those who exterminated their own people and warned against efforts to falsify history and defend repression. According to Memorial, more than 12 million Soviet citizens died in Stalin’s purges.

[Sources: Article 19, “World Press Freedom Day”; BBC News (30 October 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 319; Telegraph (Online; 30 October 2009).]

In September 2009, parts of The Gulag Archipelago, a historical account of life in the Soviet labor camps between 1918 and 1956 written by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, became obligatory reading in secondary schools.

[Source: Wikipedia (Online; 28 July 2010).]

On 3 September 2009, unknown persons paid suspicious visits to the apartment buildings where Oleg Orlov (1953–), chairman of the Memorial Human Rights Center, and Alexander Cherkasov, researcher on armed conflict for Memorial, lived. Both men, who were Moscow-based experts on the Caucasus, spoke out following the abduction and murder of historian Natalia Estemirova (1959–2009), a journalist for Novaya Gazeta and Memorial’s head of the Chechnyan desk in Grozny, on 15 July 2009. The visits took place one week before court proceedings were to open in a civil defamation suit brought by the President of Chechnya, Ramzan Kadyrov, against Memorial and Orlov who had declared that Kadyrov was morally responsible for the murder of Estemirova and for the overall deteriorating human rights situation in Chechnya. Kadyrov sued for alleged damages to his “honor and dignity”. On 6 October 2009, a Moscow court ruled that Orlov’s statement defamed Kadyrov and ordered Orlov and Memorial to pay a fine and publish a retraction saying that the statement did not correspond to reality. Orlov did not publish the retraction. On [23] January 2010, the ruling was confirmed on appeal. On 20 October 2009, Kadyrov brought criminal charges against Orlov for the same statement. The trial was underway. The circumstances of Estemirova’s murder (she was found shot dead in Ingushetia); the pattern of threats against Memorial staff members (including Akhmed Gisayev), forcing three of them to leave the region; other murders of civic activists; and the nature of Estemirova’s investigations into official abuses, all pointed to possible official involvement in, or acquiescence to her murder. Estemirova had exposed several highly sensitive cases, including a public extrajudicial execution of a man suspected of collaborating with insurgents, and accumulated evidence linking torture, disappearances, murders, arsons, and punitive violence to Chechen authorities and, particularly, to Kadyrov’s militia. After the murder, Memorial was obliged to temporarily suspend its activities in the North Caucasus. On 11 January 2010, Chechnya’s ombudsman Nurdi Nukhazhiyev made a series of accusatory statements, alleging that Memorial used facts about human rights violations to “destabilize” the situation in Chechnya. In early February 2010, Kadyrov dropped the charges. In December 2009, Memorial received the Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought, awarded by the European Parliament

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 31, 269, 271; Article 19, “Russia: Article 19 Concerned About Continued Harassment of Oleg Orlov Under Criminal Defamation Laws” (16 December 2009); Committee to Protect Journalists, Attacks on the Press in 2009 (New York 2010) 157–162, 187, 266–267; Committee to Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (26 February 2010); Freedom House, Ifex Alert (21 December 2009 & 19 January 2010); Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (8 & 14 September 2009); Human Rights Watch, “Russia: Drop Criminal Libel Charges Against Activist” (29 October 2009); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 3, 27, 429–430; Human Rights Watch, “Russia: A Year Later, No Prosecution in Estemirova Murder” (8 July 2010); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 178–179; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 635; NRC Handelsblad (28 October 2009) 5, (23–24 January 2010) 5, (10 February 2010) 4; PEN, “Day of the Imprisoned Writer: Russia, Natalia Estemirova: Journalist and Human Rights Defender” (15 November 2009).]

On 13 September 2009, Mikhail Suprun, a professor of history at Pomorsky State University, Arkhangelsk, was briefly arrested by officers from the Federal Security Service (FSB). His entire personal archive (including copies of historical documents) was seized. Suprun, a Ph.D. student, and Colonel Alexander Dudarev (=Dudaryev), head of the archives of the Arkhangelsk Regional Ministry of Internal Affairs, were charged with “violating privacy laws”. Suprun was accused of gathering material for a database about Polish and German persons resettled in the Arkhangelsk region, and Dudarev with helping him. Dudarev had given him a list of 40,000 German gulag victims—Russian-speaking ethnic Germans and prisoners of war (captured by the Red Army)—deported to the Arkhangelsk region between 1945 and 1956, which he studied with the help of the German Red Cross to produce a Book of Memory of Victims of Political Repression about these Germans. An FSB investigator told Suprun that some relatives of the Germans had complained that they did not want information about their relatives inserted in such a Book of Memory. After his brief arrest, Suprun left Russia for a temporary research assignment in Poland. So-called Books of Memory contained basic biographical information (such as date and place of birth, data and nature of repression, profession, family position). Around 300 such Books of Memory were reportedly created in Russia and the information from them was placed on a Memorial CD containing more than 2,5 million names.

[Sources: Guardian (15 October 2009); N. Holdsworth, “Russia: Arrest of Historian Sparks Outcry”, University World News (Online; 1 November 2009); Kharkiv Human Rights Protection Group, “Russia: Historian Investigating Soviet Victims of Repression Interrogated by the FSB” (Online; 2 October 2009); Kharkiv Human Rights Protection Group, “Memorial Criticizes Persecution of Historians and Archivists in Arkhangelsk” (Online; 5 October 2009).]

On 8 October 2009, Yevgeny Dzhugashvili, Stalin’s grandson living in Georgia, sued the liberal opposition newspaper Novaya Gazeta and its journalist Anatoly Yablokov, for printing an article that referred to Stalin as a “bloodthirsty cannibal”. Dzhugashvili alleged that the article had offended Stalin’s honor and dignity, particularly the claim that he had personally signed the (recently declassified) death warrants of thousands of “enemies of the state” shot during the “Great Terror” in the 1930s and during the 1940 Katyń massacre. Dzhugashvili’s lawyer said that since Stalin could not defend himself, it was necessary to put the story straight. On 13 October 2009, the court found that the article did not posthumously defame Stalin. In December 2009, Dzhugashvili sued radio station Ekho Moskvy in defamation over comments made by presenter Matvey Ganapolsky on a program in October (Ganapolsky said: “Stalin signed an order that children can be shot from the age of twelve as enemies of the nation.”)

[Sources: BBC News (8 October 2009); Holdsworth, “Russia”; Telegraph (13 October 2009); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 178; 2/10: 142; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 634; Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, “Stalin’s Grandson Launches Second Libel Case” (19 December 2009).]

See also Georgia, Poland.

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The authorities used broadly defined genocide ideology laws to silence dissent, including criticisms of the ruling Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF) political party and demands for justice for RPF war crimes. As of August 2009, there were reportedly 912 people in prison (356 awaiting trial; 556 convicted and sentenced) on genocide ideology charges. Some cases resulted in acquittals, often following a period of prolonged pre-trial detention. Although the law covered some acts that can constitute hate speech, it required no link to any genocidal act, and was extremely vague. For example, it penalized people with a 10- to 25-year prison term for “dehumanizing” a group of people by “laughing at one’s misfortune” or “stirring up ill feelings”. It penalized young children with sentences of up to 12 months at a rehabilitation center, and those aged 12 to 18 with prison sentences of between 5 and 12,5 years (See also NCH Annual Report 2009).

On 23 June 2009, the ban on the British Broadcasting Corporation’s (BBC) Kinyarwanda radio service was lifted. The Rwandan government had suspended it saying that it threatened the country’s national reconciliation by hosting people with views negating the 1994 genocide (See NCH Annual Report 2009). In September 2009, Article 19 recommended that the government repeal the 2008 Law Relating to the Punishment of the Crime of Genocide Ideology of Rwanda because its overbroad formulations violated international law on genocide and “hate speech”.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 277; Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 273; Article 19, Comment on the Law Relating to the Punishment of the Crime of Genocide Ideology of Rwanda (London, September 2009) 4; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 102–104; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 150, 151; Index on Censorship, 4/09: 181; 2/10: 48.]

Gacaca trials, whose procedures fail to meet international fair trial standards, were expedited with the objective of completing all outstanding cases by December 2009. The 31 July 2009 deadline for new accusations before gacaca was extended in some areas. Some gacaca trials were reportedly marred by false accusations, corruption, and difficulties in calling defense witnesses. In December 2009, with several appeals and revisions pending, the deadline to end gacaca was extended to the end of February 2010. After the closure of gacaca, new accusations were to be presented before conventional courts. According to the National Service of Gacaca Jurisdictions, gacaca courts decided nearly 1.6 million genocide cases since their start in 2002.

In December 2009, the United Nations Security Council extended the mandate of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) until the end of 2012 to ensure it could finalize the trials. Judicial proceedings against genocide suspects took place in many countries including Belgium, Canada, Finland, and the United States. Extradition hearings against genocide suspects continued in Finland, Sweden, and the United Kingdom. No country extradited genocide suspects to Rwanda for trial. The Rwandan government reported that it had over 500 genocide suspects under investigation around the world. It also stated that some African countries had not co-operated with its investigations.

War crimes and crimes against humanity committed by the RPF and the Rwandan Patriotic Army (RPA) before, during, and after the 1994 genocide were not prosecuted. There were no new criminal investigations or prosecutions initiated against former RPA fighters accused of committing war crimes and crimes against humanity. Despite estimates by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees that the RPF killed between 25,000 and 45,000 civilians in 1994, Rwanda has tried only 36 RPF soldiers. The ICTR did not issue indictments against any RPF commanders implicated in such abuses. In July 2009, at an international conference assessing the ICTR legacy, many participants deemed the prosecutor's decision not to indict any RPF crimes to be the ICTR's greatest failure.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 3–4, 274–275; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 17, 148–150.]

The teaching of contemporary national history, including the 1994 genocide, was suspended in public schools because no approach was deemed acceptable. In April 2010, in order to commemorate the sixteenth anniversary of the genocide, an international symposium took place in Kigali, in which the subject of “teaching history of genocide” also featured. Historian Paul Rutayisire of the National University of Rwanda declared that finding consensus to teach the subject would be a long-term process.

[Sources: E. Cole & J. Barsalou, “Unite or Divide? The Challenges of Teaching History in Societies Emerging from Violent Conflict”, United States Institute of Peace, Special Report, no. 163 (June 2006), 2, 7–8; Hironelle News Agency, “Rwanda/Genocide: Rwandan Scholars Caution Teaching of Genocide History in Schools” (Online, 23 April 2010).]

See also Sierra Leone.

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

On 1 October 2009, cleric Sheikh Saad al-Shithri (also: Saad Bin Naser al-Shethri), a member of the government-sanctioned Supreme Committee of Islamic Scholars, said that religious scholars should vet the curriculum at the only co-educational university in the country, King Abdullah's University of Science and Technology (KAUST) at Tuwal, to prevent alien ideologies such as "evolution". The government had promised academic freedom for KAUST, but clerics would reportedly try to obstruct the project. A few days later, al-Shitri was expelled from the committee.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (5 October 2009) 4; "Saudi Scholars To Vet University Curriculum" (<http://www.dawn.com>; 1 October 2009).]

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Chad.

SERBIA/KOSOVO

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 3 October 2003, Željko Bodrožić (1970–), editor of the local weekly newspaper of Kikinda, Kikindske, published an article about the well-known nationalist historian from Belgrade, Jovan Pejin, former director of Serbia's state archives (2001–2003). Pejin had appeared as a guest on the program Unbuttoned of Novi Sad Television to discuss his book Autonomous Vojvodina: A Nightmare for the Serbian People. In the article "The Floor is Given to the Fascist", Bodrožić called Pejin "an idiot" and "a fascist". Pejin sued Bodrožić for insult and later for defamation, as at the hearing in the insult case, Bodrožić had referred to him as "a member of the fascist movement in Serbia". On 23 June 2009, the European Court of Human Rights eventually decided on the case. It noted that Bodrožić could have been imprisoned for 75 days, had he not been able to pay the fine imposed. While Bodrožić had indeed used harsh words which might have been considered offensive, his statements had been a reaction to Pejin's provocative interview in the context of free debate on an issue of general interest and without the aim to stir violence; the expressions used by Bodrožić could only have been interpreted as value judgments and therefore opinions not susceptible of proof. Pejin, a public figure, should have anticipated potential harsh criticism by a large group of people. Therefore, he had been obliged to display a greater degree of tolerance in this context. By sentencing Bodrožić criminally for the article, the authorities had limited excessively his free expression.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Bodrožić versus Serbia (2009) at:

http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/1e/147.pdf.]

In January 2009, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) opened proceedings against former Assistant Interior Minister Vlastimir Đorđević, indicted for crimes against humanity and war crimes in Kosovo. He was charged with responsibility for crimes by police under his command leading to the deportation of 800,000 Albanian civilians, the enforced disappearance of more than 800 ethnic Albanians, and leading a conspiracy to conceal their bodies which were transported to Serbia for reburial. Also in January 2009, proceedings were suspended against Vojislav Šešelj, Serbian Radical Party leader, indicted for crimes against humanity and war crimes in Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina. In July 2009, he was convicted for contempt of court for disclosing the identities of protected witnesses. In February 2009, the ICTY convicted five Serbian political, police, and military leaders of war crimes and crimes against humanity during the 1999 Kosovo conflict. Former Serbian President Milan Milutinović was acquitted. In October 2009, the appeals chamber considered the prosecution's application for a retrial of Kosovo Albanian Ramush Haradinaj, acquitted of war crimes in 2008. The Belgrade Special War Crimes Chamber continued its efforts to hold alleged perpetrators accountable for wartime abuses, despite limited funding, inadequate political support, and little public awareness of its work.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 280–281; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 439.]

The European Union-led police and justice mission EULEX and the ministry of justice established mixed judicial panels and an Office of Special Prosecutors, which included local prosecutors, to address war crimes and other serious crimes committed during the 1998–1999 conflict. In March 2009, EULEX opened a preliminary investigation into the alleged transfers by the Kosovo Liberation Army in 1999 of around 400 Serbian and other captives to detention facilities in Albania. The Council of Europe investigation into the allegations by Swiss senator Dick Marty continued, but his visit to Kosovo, scheduled for 2009, was postponed. The Serbian War Crimes Prosecutor also initiated an investigation. The Kosovo authorities dismissed the allegations and refused to investigate them. According to the International Committee of the Red Cross Kosovo, 1,885 persons, the majority Kosovo Albanian, remained missing from the 1999 conflict. In December 2008, EULEX had taken responsibility for the Office of Missing Persons and Forensics (OMPF). By December 2009, 101 mortal remains had been exhumed and 83 returned to their families; 400 previously unidentified remains were sent to the International Commission for Missing Persons for identification through DNA analysis. Investigations were opened in a few cases. Families of the disappeared held repeated demonstrations calling for the return of missing relatives. Amendments to the 2006 Law on Civilian Victims of War providing compensation to relatives of the disappeared had not been introduced by the end of 2009.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 282; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 446–448.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Some progress was made in implementing the recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC)—established after the 1991–2002 civil war—but no follow-up committee was appointed and the constitutional review process stalled. The prosecution case in the trial of former Liberian President Charles Taylor before the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) in The Hague ended on 27 February 2009, and included 91 witnesses. Taylor faced 11 charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for his role in supporting rebel groups during the civil war in Sierra Leone (1991–2002). In July 2009, the defense case began. Taylor was the first sitting African head of state to be indicted and face trial before an international or hybrid war crimes tribunal.

On 26 October 2009, the SCSL appeals chamber upheld the convictions of the Revolutionary United Front leaders Issa Sesay, Morris Kallon, and Augustine Gbao on nearly all counts. The convictions were the first for attacks on United Nations peacekeepers as a violation of international humanitarian law and for forced marriage as an inhumane act constituting a crime against humanity. The reparations program, set up under the TRC, devoted most of 2009 to identifying 28,000 war victims, implementing symbolic reparations in 18 chiefdoms. The only funds for the reparation program, drawn from the peacebuilding fund, ran out in late 2009 and the government took no steps to ensure funding for the future.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 3, 284–285; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 155–156.]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 14 July 2010, the official Media Development Authority (MDA) banned a video by film director Martyn See, entitled “Ex-political Prisoner Speaks Out in Singapore” or “Dr. Lim Hock Siew”, on the grounds that it was “contrary to public interest” because it “[gave] a distorted and misleading portrayal of Dr. Lim’s arrests and detention under the Internal Security Act (ISA) in 1963”. Lim, a former leader of the left-wing political party Barisan Sosialis (Malay for Socialist Front), was imprisoned from February 1963 (when Operation Coldstore, a crackdown on left-wing politicians, took place) until 1982. The MDA also ordered See to remove all digital copies of the film uploaded on the video website YouTube and his own blog. Another of See’s films, “Zahari’s 17 Years” (2006), about ex-political prisoner Said Zahari, who spent a total of 17 years in detention after Operation Coldstore, was banned in 2007. At that occasion, See declared: “The government is clearly not allowing history to be heard. It does not want to acknowledge the history of detention because it is an acute embarrassment”.

[Sources: “Singapore bans film about ex-political detainee” (Online; Reuters; 10 April 2007); Southeast Asian Press Alliance, Ifex Alert (15 July 2010).]

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

SLOVENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

See Ethiopia.

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Following civil society protests, the South African government confirmed in August 2009 that it would act on the International Criminal Court arrest warrant against the President of Sudan if he travelled to South Africa, despite the position taken at the African Union Heads of State and Government Summit in Sirte, Libya, in July 2009.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 297–298.]

In December 2009, human rights organizations sought an order in the Pretoria High Court declaring unlawful the decision of the authorities not to initiate an investigation into alleged crimes against humanity committed in Zimbabwe by individuals known to travel to South Africa.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 298.]

See also Sudan.

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 15 February 2007, the family of the late Manuel Gutiérrez Torres, local leader of the Falange (the Spanish Fascists) during the civil war (1936–39) and mayor of Cerdedo (Pontevedra), Galicia, in the 1940s and 1950s, sued historian Dionisio Pereira González, a specialist in the history of the Galician workers' movement, for defamation because in his book A Ila República e a Represión franquista no Concello de Cerdedo (2003; The Second Republic and the Francoist Repression in Cerdedo; Verbo Xido publishers), he had concluded from numerous oral sources that Gutiérrez

Torres, his brothers, and other falangistas probably participated in the harsh repression at the time, particularly in the assassination of six persons in August 1936 (See NCH Annual Report 2009). In early 2008, the court acquitted Pereira. On 20 May 2008, 349 historians sent a letter to the government in which they protested the abuse of libel laws and asked constitutional protection for free scholarly historical research based on written or oral sources, arguing that the December 2007 Law of Historic Memory, while encouraging historical research about the civil war and the Franco era, would have the unintended effect of exposing historians increasingly to libel trials initiated by the heirs of former perpetrators. On [7] April 2009, the ruling was confirmed on appeal. Pereira said that journalists Emilio Silva and Santiago Macías had been sued various times for their book Las fosas de Franco (2003; Franco's graves); that Alfredo Grimaldos's work about the post-1975 transition period was denounced by the family of former minister Juan José Rosón; that writer Marta Capín was acquitted in a case against the family of a falangista mentioned in her work Los crímenes de Valdediós; and that a judge closed a website which contained a list of those responsible for the repression under Franco in the village of O Grove after two children of one of them had complained. [Sources: Historia a Debate (Academia Solidaria) (Online; Santiago de Compostela 2007–2009); J.A. Rojo, "La historia oral de la guerra llega a juicio", El País (Online; 2 June 2008).]

In 2008, judge Baltasar Garzón (1955–) had opened an investigation into cases of enforced disappearances dating from the civil war (1936–1939) and early years (1939–1952) of the rule of Francisco Franco. Later that year, he dropped the investigation (See NCH Annual Report 2008). In December 2008, the National Criminal Court ruled that it was not competent to investigate such cases and therefore referred the 114,266 suspected cases of enforced disappearance to the 43 local criminal courts in whose jurisdiction the mass graves had been found. Subsequently, 13 courts classified the cases as ordinary crimes and closed the investigations on the grounds that the crimes had passed the statute of limitations. Only 3 of the local courts classified the cases as crimes under international law (which have no expiry date). These investigations were ongoing at the end of 2009. On 11 March 2009, the Senate rejected a draft law calling on the government to take on the task of locating, exhuming, and identifying the remains of victims. This was in contradiction to the 2007 Law of Historical Memory, which contained provisions to help families locate and recover the remains of their loved ones. In September 2009, Spain ratified the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, but enforced disappearance was still not criminalized in Spanish law.

In May 2009, however, a Supreme Court investigating magistrate, Luciano Varela, ruled that by intentionally bypassing Spain's 1977 amnesty law, Garzón had committed abuse of power. Consequently, Garzón faced trial and suspension from his duties. However, Garzón's decision not to apply the 1977 amnesty law was supported by international conventional and customary law, which imposed on states a duty to investigate the worst international crimes, including crimes against humanity. In 2008, the United Nations Human Rights Committee had called on Spain to repeal the 1977 amnesty law and to ensure that domestic courts did not apply limitation periods to crimes against humanity. In 2009, the Committee against Torture also recommended that Spain “ensure that acts of torture, which also included enforced disappearances, were not offenses subject to amnesty” and asked Spain to “continue to step up its efforts to help the families of victims to find out what happened to the missing persons, to identify them, and to have their remains exhumed, if possible”. In April 2010, masses rallied in Madrid and other cities for a halt to criminal proceedings against Garzón. On 14 May 2010, Garzón was suspended.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 298, 300; Human Rights Watch, “European Union: Protest Sanctions Against Judge Garzón” (22 April 2010); Human Rights Watch, “Masses Rally to Support Spain’s Garzón” (29 April 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2010) 328.]

In September 2009, the Israeli government criticized the newspaper El Mundo for publishing an interview with revisionist historian David Irving as part of its coverage of the seventieth anniversary of the outbreak of World War II. It said that the newspaper put “freedom of expression over morality and ethics”.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 186.]

In October 2009, parliament adopted without debate an amendment to the Law on the Judiciary, which would restrict the application of universal jurisdiction. Thirteen cases under investigation in Spain could be closed as a result. The amendment limited universal jurisdiction to cases in which the victims were Spanish or in which Spain had a “relevant connecting link”, where the alleged perpetrator was in Spain, and as long as no “effective” investigation or prosecution has already begun in another country or international court. The criteria for “effective” were not defined.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 300.]

On 12 April 2010, the National Court declared anti-constitutional the closure of the Basque-language daily newspaper Euskaldunon Egunkaria (Newspaper of the Basques) (See NCH Annual Report 2003).

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief (2010) 263; NRC Handelsblad (13 April 2010) 4.]

See also Guatemala.

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 19 May 2009, the government declared victory over the separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), marking an end to a 26-year-long armed conflict (1983–2009) that caused between 80,000 and 100,000 deaths. During the last months of the war, both the Sri Lankan armed forces and the LTTE repeatedly violated the laws of war, causing unnecessary civilian suffering and casualties. Despite government promises, including in a 23 May 2009 joint statement by President Mahinda Rajapaksa and United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, no serious steps were taken to investigate allegations of human rights and laws-of-war violations during the war's final months. The government's refusal to address accountability for serious abuses continued a longstanding pattern of impunity for rights violations by state security forces. Past efforts to address shortcomings through the establishment of ad hoc mechanisms in Sri Lanka produced few results.

In June 2009, a Presidential Commission of Inquiry, established to look into serious violations of human rights committed since 2006, was disbanded without completing its mandated tasks. Of the sixteen cases referred, only seven were investigated, with reports on five finalized. No reports were made public and no inquiry resulted in prosecutions. People suspected of committing human rights violations continued to hold responsible positions in government. Minister of National Integration Vinayagamoorthy Muralitharan (alias Karuna) and Chief Minister of the Eastern Province Sivanesathurai Chandrakanthan (alias Pillayan) were reportedly responsible for abducting teenagers to serve as child soldiers, and holding as hostage, torturing, and unlawfully killing civilians and people suspected of links to the LTTE. Both men were formerly LTTE members. There was no official investigation into any allegations of abuse.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 302; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 347, 352–353.]

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 4 March 2009, the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued an arrest warrant against President Omar Hassan Ahmed Al Bashir—the first for a sitting head of state by the ICC—for war crimes and crimes against humanity by Sudanese forces and allied militia against the civilian population of Darfur (2003–). The African Union (AU) and the League of Arab States expressed their support for Al Bashir and requested the Security Council to defer the case under Article 16 of the ICC Rome Statute. The request was not granted. The warrant against Al Bashir was the third issued by the ICC relating to Darfur. The government of Sudan ignored international attempts at justice and continued to refuse to arrest former government minister Ahmad Harun and militia leader Ali Kushayb even though warrants from the ICC have been outstanding against both of them for war crimes and crimes against humanity since April 2007. In March 2009, the AU formed a panel on Darfur, headed by former South African President Thabo Mbeki, to investigate ways of securing peace, justice, and reconciliation in the region. In October 2009, the panel submitted its report to the AU. Among other recommendations, it called for the creation of a hybrid court comprising Sudanese judges as well as AU-appointed judges from other countries to prosecute the most serious crimes committed in Darfur. The report was subsequently endorsed by the AU Peace and Security Council.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 2, 304–305; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 20, 169, 175.]

On 27 September 2009, President Al Bashir lifted the censorship, imposed 18 months earlier by the National Intelligence and Security Services (NISS). The government called on editors in return to adhere to a journalistic “ethical code” that could mean they would not address issues that would have been censored in the past.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 307.]

See also South Africa.

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In January 2009, the military trial of 25 people accused of extrajudicial executions in 1982 (known as the December Murders) resumed after a six-month adjournment. The trial had begun in November 2007 following 25 years of impunity. Among the defendants was former President Lieutenant Colonel Desire (Desi) Delano Bouterse, who took power in a military coup in 1980 and was replaced in 1987. Bouterse and 24 other men were charged with the killing of 13 civilians and 2 army officers who were arrested by the military authorities and executed the next day in Fort Zeelandia, a military base in Paramaribo, in December 1982. The presiding judge rejected a motion filed in 2008 by the defense to ban the media from covering the trial. Witnesses, including former soldiers, testified before the military court stating that Bouterse was at Fort Zeelandia on the morning of the first killings. In August 2009, a civilian witness, brother of one of the victims, told the court that during an interview, a former high-ranking officer, who later died, had implicated Bouterse in the killing of two of the victims. Bouterse denied any involvement in the killings. The trial was continuing at the end of 2009. On 19 July 2010, Bouterse was elected the new President of Suriname.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 12, 307–308.]

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

See Germany, Rwanda.

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In March 2004, Kurdish groups held large-scale demonstrations, some violent, in northern Syria, to protest their discriminatory treatment by the Syrian authorities. In the violent crackdown, at least 36 people were killed, most of them Kurds, and over 160 people were injured. The security services detained more than 2,000 Kurds (many were later amnestied). In the ensuing years, security forces repressed at least fourteen political and cultural public gatherings, almost all peaceful, organized by Kurdish groups, and often resorted to violence to disperse the crowds. They included cultural celebrations such as Nowruz (the Kurdish new year) in March 2006, 2008, and 2009, and commemorations of the March 2004 events or the 1979 death of Mustapha Barzani (1903–1979), the primary political and military leader of the Kurdish rebellion in Iraq.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, Group Denial: Repression of Kurdish Political and Cultural Rights

in Syria (Online; 26 November 2009); Index on Censorship, 3/04: 122.]

On 29 November 2006, Waed al-Mhana, a journalist and campaigner for endangered archaeological sites, posted an article on the Kuluna Shuraka (We are all partners) website, in which he criticized a ministry of culture decision to destroy an old market (al-Suk Al-Atiq) in the historic district of Old Damascus. The market was demolished later that year. In April 2007, charges of violating the press code because the article contained “inappropriate phrases that include abasement” were brought against him. In July 2008, he was sentenced in absentia to two months’ imprisonment and fined. Al-Mhana, who was not notified about the trial, objected to the ruling. In April 2009, a retrial started.

[Sources: Committee To Protect Journalists, “Syrian journalist held incommunicado, another on trial” (Online; 22 April 2009); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 194.]

During 2009, the Syrian government showed no interest in clarifying the fate of those who disappeared under the rule of Hafez al-Assad (1970–2000), the father of President Bashar al-Assad.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 48.]

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 28 March 2010, the opposition Democratic Progressive Party and several action groups, including the Taiwan Association of University Professors, expressed fear that the Kuomintang government in office since May 2008 would “sinicize” and “detaiwanize” history textbooks used at senior high schools by increasing the teaching of Chinese history and neglecting the history of Taiwan’s indigenous peoples in order to emphasize its One China policy.

[“Taiwan activists want DPP action against China-centric history books”, Taiwan News (Online; 28 March 2010).]

TANZANIA

Last Annual Report entry: —

A report mentioned that historian Farrid Himid was the publisher of a censored cultural newspaper, Fahari ya Zanzibar (The Pride of Zanzibar).

[Source: L. Adam, “Give Sex or Be Blacklisted” (<http://www.freemuse.org>; 24 April 2008).]

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In April 2009, the government announced that there would be no prosecutions for the killings in the historic Krue Se mosque in 2004 (See NCH Annual Reports 2005, 2008). On 27 April 2009, nine people were killed and two others injured in five separate attacks on the eve of the fifth anniversary of the Krue Se mosque incident.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 321.]

On 24 May 2010, Suthachai Yimprasert (also spelled Yomprasert), history professor at Chulalongkorn University, Bangkok, was arrested by the authorities under orders from the Center for the Resolution of the Emergency Situation (CRES) and detained without charge (although there was reportedly an accusation that he plotted to overthrow the monarchy) in an army camp in Saraburi province following the government crackdown on the anti-government Red Shirt protesters on 19 May 2010. On 27 May 2010, Suthachai went on a hunger strike because he was forbidden access to newspapers, radio, or television, and because CRES had seized the teaching materials he had brought with him to prepare his classes. A former student activist at Thammasat University, Bangkok, in the 1970s, Suthachai fled into the jungle with other students in October 1976 when police suppressed and arrested students at the university, leaving over 39 dead and more than 145 injured. In [2001], he co-wrote State Crime in an Era of Change, a book on the official 2000 investigations into the 1976 coup, using student leader testimonies and concluding that the crackdown on students and the subsequent coup had been planned in advance by the government. As Suthachai's name had been on a CRES list of people and organizations suspected of plotting to overthrow the monarchy, he had filed a defamation lawsuit against Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva and CRES in April 2010 for linking him to such plots. The lawsuit was rejected by the courts. Suthachai believed his name was on the list only because he had campaigned to seek the release of a woman convicted of lèse-majesté. On 30 May 2010, Suthachai was released, ostensibly after a group of professors (including historians Thida Saraya, Chalong Suntaravanich, and Nidhi Eiwsriwong) and students handed over 318 signatures of protest to the rector of Chulalongkorn University. Suthachai will possibly face charges of terrorism because he supported the Red Shirts.

[Sources: A. Ashayagachat, "Chula Lecturer Suttachai Released", Bangkok Post (Online; 31 May 2010); Y. Sharma, "Thailand: Detained Professor Starts Hunger Strike" (Online; University World News; 30 May 2010); G. Ju Ungpakorn, "Thailand: Silence of the Academic Community" (Online; University World News; 13 June 2010).]

See also United States.

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Impunity persisted for grave human rights violations committed during Timor-Leste's 1999 independence referendum and the previous 24 years of Indonesian occupation (1975–1999). Reports by both the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR) and the Indonesia-Timor-Leste Truth and Friendship Commission (CTF) documenting human rights violations had not been debated in parliament by the end of 2009. However, in mid-December 2009, a parliamentary resolution on the establishment of a follow-up institution on the CAVR/CTF recommendations was passed. The Prosecutor General did not file any new indictments based on findings of the United Nations Serious Crimes Investigation Team into crimes committed in 1999. Only one person remained in jail for these crimes. In August 2009, President José Manuel Ramos-Horta rejected calls to set up an international tribunal for past crimes. In September 2009, however, a National Victims' Congress called again for such an international tribunal.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 322–323.]

Holding accountable those responsible for the 2006 violence, which erupted after the dismissal of one third of Timor-Leste's military, remained slow and incomplete but a number of cases were investigated, awaited trial, or were completed.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 322–323.]

See also Indonesia.

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In February 2009, the government established a Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission to shed light on human rights violations committed between 1958 and 2005. The decree creating the commission did not clarify its powers and no provisions were made to bring to justice perpetrators of abuses.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 324.]

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2001.

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 7 January 2009, socialist economist and historian Yalçın Küçük (1938–), author of, inter alia, historical studies on the Ottoman and Republican periods and on Soviet economic development, was arrested for investigation in the “Ergenekon” affair (“Ergenekon” was the name given to an alleged state-sponsored terror organization in Turkey with ties to members of the military and security forces). Küçük was released two weeks later to face trial in September 2009. In 1997, he had been accused of sympathies with PKK” (the outlawed Kurdistan Workers Party) and sentenced to two years’ imprisonment for an interview with its leader, Abdullah Öcalan.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 01/10: 14–20; PEN, Half-yearly Caselist to 31 December 2009 (Online, 2010), 88; Wikipedia (Online; 16 March 2010).]

In February 2009, Nedim Sener, a reporter for the daily national newspaper Milliyet, published The Dink Murder and Intelligence Lies (February 2009), a controversial book about the 2007 murder of journalist Hrant Dink (See NCH Annual Report 2009). The book dealt with the gendarmerie, police, and national intelligence officers who were accused of having prior knowledge of the murder plans and of preventing the solution of the case with misleading evidence and fake documents. In June 2009, Sener faced multiple charges filed by several senior police and security service officials, including “targeting officials on anti-terrorist duties” and “obtaining and revealing secret information”, facing a total of 32 years and six months’ imprisonment (Dink’s murderer was given a twenty-year sentence). On 4 June 2010, Sener was acquitted of most of the charges.

[Sources: Bianet, Ifex Alert (9 June 2009); Ifex Communiqué (16 June 2010); International Press Institute, Ifex Alert (16 June 2010).]

On 24 February 2010, a court in Istanbul fined Turkish Radio and Television Corporation (TRT), Bey Productions Company, and Ökkeş Şendiler for posthumous defamation because they claimed that Hrant Dink had been responsible for the massacre of 19–25 December 1978 in Maraş. On 24 December 2008, TRT had broadcast the documentary “Maze of the Kings” about that massacre in which Şendiler (a prime suspect of the massacre who was acquitted later) had held Dink responsible for it. According to official numbers, 111 people, mostly Alevi (members of a religious minority), died in the massacre.

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (3 March 2010).]

In May 2010, the Public Chief Prosecutor in Istanbul opened a case against sociologist and political scientist Ismail Beşikçi (1939–) on charges of “spreading propaganda for the PKK” (See also NCH Annual Reports 2002, 2009). The charges were based on his article entitled “The Right of Nations to Self-Determination and the Kurds” for “Contemporary Law and Society” magazine. In the article, Beşikçi wrote, inter alia, “The Kurds pay the price for a 200-year struggle for freedom and for a free fatherland...The states that jointly kept the Kurds under oppression could always unite politics, ideology, military force, and diplomatic power against the Kurds.”

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (7 July 2010).]

On 15 June 2010, the Radio and Television Supreme Council (RTÜK) decided to impose a broadcast ban on the Haber Türk television station after writer Sevan Nisanyan commented on the Armenian genocide as a guest on the “One to One” program, hosted by Fatih Altaylı. RTÜK said that Nisanyan “exceeded the limits of criticism” with his statements that allegedly “humiliated the Republic of Turkey”.

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (6 July 2010).]

See also Armenia.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In March 2010, Borys Gudziak, rector of the Ukrainian Catholic University, Lviv, had declared in Japan that the new government of recently elected President Victor Yanukovich wanted to impose Soviet historical views and to rehabilitate Stalin and Stalinism. In early May 2010, a monument to Stalin was unveiled in Ukraine. Later that month, Yanukovich declared that the Holodomor was not a genocide, but still a mass crime organized by Stalin. He did not abolish the history textbooks introduced by the previous government (See also NCH Annual Report 2009).

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (19 May 2010); “Ukraine: Rector Warns of Intimidation” (Online; University World News; 30 May 2010).]

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In January 2009, the Consultative Group on the Past set up by the government in 2007 recommended establishing an independent commission to deal with the legacy of the past by combining processes of reconciliation, justice, and information recovery. Twenty years after the killing of prominent human rights lawyer Patrick Finucane, the government continued to renege on its commitment to establish an independent inquiry into state collusion in his death. Three public inquiries into allegations of state collusion in the killings of Robert Hamill, Rosemary Nelson, a human rights lawyer, and Billy Wright finished taking evidence. Final reports were expected in 2010. The exclusion of family members and their lawyers from a number of sessions of each inquiry gave rise to concern.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 342.]

In February 2009, the chairman of the House of Commons media select committee asked al Jazeera to apologize for broadcasting comments made by Sheikh al Qaradawi on 6 February. The latter claimed in a live broadcast that the Holocaust was “divine punishment” and expressed a wish for Allah to kill Jews.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 207.]

In [January 2010], Reza Pankhurst (1976–), a postgraduate teacher for the subject “States, Nations, and Empires” at the London School of Economics (LSE) and a British muslim, was accused of Islamist “infiltration”. In 2002–2006, he had spent four years in Egyptian prisons for membership of Hizb ut-Tahrir al-Islami (Islamic Liberation Party), an organization which advocated the creation of a Muslim caliphate in the Arab world. On his return to the United Kingdom, he had been accepted by LSE on a master’s course in the history of international relations, but he was reportedly also questioned and followed by British security services. The LSE defended Pankhurst’s right to “freedom of expression within the law”.

[Source: Guardian (17 January 2010).]

Northern Ireland

On 30 January 1972 (“Bloody Sunday”), thirteen people died when British soldiers opened fire on a civil rights march in Derry, Northern Ireland (See NCH Annual Report 1998–2001, 2003). The Widgery Inquiry, held the same year, was perceived by nationalists as a whitewash. In 1998, a new investigation, the Saville Inquiry into Bloody Sunday, was initiated and became the longest-running and costliest inquiry in British legal history. Its report was published on 15 June 2010. Prime Minister David Cameron told members of parliament that it showed that the shooting dead of the thirteen was “unjustified and unjustifiable”.

[Source: BBC News (Online; 17 June 2010).]

On 30 June 2009, Ian Paisley jr. was fined for contempt of court after he failed to disclose a police source that provided information about the destruction of files by the Northern Ireland police force related to the 1997 murder of Loyalist Volunteer Force leader Billy Wright.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 206.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, India, Russia, Rwanda, Spain, United States.

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

Although there was overwhelming evidence that senior Bush administration officials had approved brutal and illegal interrogation methods, the Obama administration showed little enthusiasm for initiating a thorough investigation of these abuses. In an important step, Attorney General Eric Holder appointed a federal prosecutor to review post-9/11 interrogation practices. By all indications, however, the investigation was narrowly circumscribed and unlikely to examine the responsibility of senior officials who set the policies and authorized abuses.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 594.]

The Obama administration invoked an overly broad understanding of the “state secrets” privilege, arguing that litigation related to the United States (US) secret detention and rendition program, as well as lawsuits filed by victims of torture and illegal surveillance, should be dismissed because they might divulge classified information. While it released several important Bush-era interrogation-related memoranda, the administration backtracked on a commitment to release photographs depicting detainee abuse, claiming that doing so could jeopardize US troops abroad.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 594.]

On 2 March 2009, federal authorities confirmed that 92 videotapes detailing the harsh interrogation of detainees (including the use of illegal interrogation techniques) at secret prisons were destroyed in 2005 and 2006 by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) (See NCH Annual Report 2009). The order was given by the former head of CIA clandestine operations, José Rodríguez Jr. On 15 April 2010, it was revealed that the CIA’s then-director, Porter Goss, approved a similar 2005 decision to destroy dozens of videotapes of brutal interrogations carried out on two detainees in Thailand in 2002 because of concern that they would expose the CIA to prosecution.

[Sources: Ifex, Alert (10 March 2009 & 22 April 2010); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 26; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 223.]

On 11 September 2009, American distributors announced that they would not sell the British film Creation about Charles Darwin because the theory of evolution was considered “controversial” among American audiences.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 208.]

On 26 July 2009, the Obama administration ordered the declassification of more than 1,000 US intelligence images of melting Arctic ice formerly classified as confidential by the George W. Bush administration.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 209.]

In August–October 2009, a Florida state court judge authorized lawyers of the R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company to issue a subpoena requiring Robert Proctor, a professor of the history of science at Stanford University specializing in the history of the tobacco industry, to make his book manuscript available to them so they could comb it for possible material to use in cross-examining him in a civil lawsuit pending there. In the planned book, tentatively titled “Golden Holocaust: A History of Global Tobacco”, Proctor argues that tobacco companies knew smoking was addicting and caused lung cancer long before the surgeon general declared it to be such in 1964 and that the general public’s awareness of the dangers was raised only later. Proctor refused to produce the manuscript, which led Reynolds to seek to exclude his testimony in the lawsuit as a sanction. Proctor’s lawyers argued that forcing him to share the manuscript would violate his copyright, his right to privacy, and his academic freedom (his right to research and gather and publish news and information under the First Amendment). They further said that Proctor should be regarded as a journalist who was covered by legal precedents protecting journalists from compelled disclosure of unpublished material. Ann Arvin, Stanford’s dean of research, said that disclosing unfinished research in such circumstances “could have the detrimental effect of discouraging scholars from participating as expert witnesses in litigation”. Proctor, who in 1999 became the first historian to testify against the tobacco industry and testified in fifteen cases, alleged that for years the tobacco industry had tried to use multiple legal and extra-legal means to prevent him from testifying in litigation, including accusations of witness tampering and witness intimidation (because Proctor had investigated the rumor that the tobacco industry had hired history graduate students as research assistants), and subpoenas for email correspondence. In November 2009, the Florida court ruled that Proctor had a constitutional right to choose when and where his writings were published. Another historian testifying for lung cancer patients in litigation, Louis Kyriakouides, an associate professor of history at the University of Southern Mississippi, reported also about the harassment-by-subpoena strategy.

[Sources: R. Proctor, “Plaintiffs’ Motion for Reconsideration of Order Overruling Objections to Subpoena and for Protective Order Concerning Unpublished Manuscript” (9 October 2009); P. Schmidt, “Scholars’ Right to Keep Unpublished Work Private Is at Issue in Lawsuit”, Chronicle of Higher Education (Online; 12 October 2009); J. Wiener, “Big Tobacco and the Historians”, The Nation (Online; 25 February 2010).]

In the fall of 2009, scholar Jytte Klausen published The Cartoons that Shook the World, about the controversy regarding the Danish cartoons depicting the Prophet Mohammed which erupted in 2006. Over the summer, Yale University Press unexpectedly took the decision not to publish the cartoons themselves in the book on grounds of taste, offense, and the possibility that it might reignite the conflict. Not only were the cartoons removed from the book, but also historic illustrations of Mohammed that Klausen had wanted to include to illustrate her thesis were omitted.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 4/09: 74–81.]

On 28 December 2009, President Barak Obama issued EO 13526 and a Presidential Memorandum and set goals for declassification of historical records, for a reduction in the number of original classification authorities, and for the promotion of the use of new technologies in declassification.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2007 (2007) 65; National Security Archive, Update (4 January 2010).]

On 16 March 2010, historians criticized about one hundred amendments to the Texas social studies curriculum for public schools which were preliminarily approved earlier in March 2010 by the Texas board of education (comprised of 10 Republicans and 5 Democrats), saying that many of the proposed changes were historically inaccurate. On 21 May 2010, the 15-member board voted 9–5 to pass the new standards that applied to all classes, arguing that the teachers who wrote the curriculum had been too liberally biased. The new textbooks would, inter alia, play down the role of Thomas Jefferson among the founding fathers; question the separation of church and state; insert a vindication of Joseph McCarthy's anti-Communist crusade during the 1950s; replace the word "capitalism" by "free enterprise system"; focus more on biblical and Christian traditions; and give more attention to Ronald Reagan, as the architect of national revival and the victor of the Cold War, and to such conservative organizations as the Heritage Foundation, the Moral Majority, and the National Rifle Association. The changes would become effective in August 2011. California and Texas had substantial impact on the nation's textbooks being the largest of the states that adopted textbooks statewide. As many American states bought the cheaper textbooks sold in Texas, the measure could affect textbooks there as well.

[Sources: K. Alexander, "History Debate Delays Vote On Social Studies Curriculum", The Statesman (15 January 2010); BBC News (25 June 2010); "Editorial", Los Angeles Times (Online; 28 March 2010); Harvard Crimson (24 March 2010); J.V. Siegel, "Texas Textbooks Rewrite History" (The DePaulia Online; 31 May 2010); Washington Post (18 March 2010).]

See also Bolivia, China, Colombia, Cuba, Honduras, India, Russia, Rwanda.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The law continued to grant impunity to those responsible for human rights violations under the military government (1973–1985). In October 2009, a referendum was held on the proposed annulment of the 1986 Law on the Expiration of the Punitive Claims of the State (Expiry Law), which prevented cases of alleged violations committed during the military-backed governments from being reopened. However, the proposal failed to gain the majority needed to overturn the law. In the run-up to the referendum, the Uruguayan Supreme Court had delivered a landmark ruling on 19 October 2009 that the Expiry Law was unconstitutional because it was inconsistent with Uruguay's obligations under international law. The ruling was given in the case of Nibia Sabalsagaray, a young activist who was tortured and killed in 1974. In August 2009, a law on reparations for victims of the military government and the previous civilian regime (1968–1973) was passed by the Senate. In March 2009, eight former military and police officials were sentenced to between 20 and 25 years' imprisonment for their role in the deaths of 28 people in Operation Condor, a joint plan by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to eliminate opponents. On 22 October 2009, Gregorio Álvarez, former general and de facto president between 1980 and 1985, was sentenced to 25 years in prison for killing 37 activists in Argentina in 1978. It was the first time in Latin America that a judge sent a former head of state to prison. In February 2010, former President Juan María Bordaberry was sentenced to thirty years' imprisonment for undermining the constitution through an auto-coup on 27 June 1973, and for being a participant in nine disappearances and two political assassinations committed by the security forces while he was president between 1972 and 1976.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) xiv, 12–13, 347; National Security Archive, Update (Online, 30 March 2010).]

See also Brazil, Paraguay.

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

The government persisted in its refusal to investigate the 13 May 2005 massacre of hundreds of citizens in Andijan (Andizhan), or to prosecute those responsible for it (See previous NCH Annual Reports). Instead, authorities clamped down on any individual they believed to have participated in the events or who might know the truth about what occurred. The government's reliance on surveillance, interrogations, ostracism, and threats against survivors of Andijan and their families continued to trigger further refugees from the area. On 26 May 2009, hours after a series of violent acts in the Andijan area, including at least one suicide bombing, police visited at least three homes of relatives of individuals imprisoned for alleged involvement in the 2005 events or who had fled Uzbekistan in their wake. The Uzbek government continued to work with Kyrgyz authorities to forcibly return Uzbek asylum seekers to Uzbekistan. Since 2005 more than a dozen people have been returned against their will. Haiatjon Juraboev, who was snatched off the streets of Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, in September 2008, was sentenced in Tashkent to thirteen years' imprisonment in February 2009 for religious extremism and illegal border crossing.

In April 2009, Elena Urlaeva, a leading member of the Human Rights Alliance, was assaulted by two unidentified men. She was among a group of human rights defenders who were prevented by police from publicly commemorating the fourth anniversary of the 2005 Andijan killings and who were detained as they left their homes on the morning of 13 May 2009. Seven were detained at police stations for over seven hours; others were held under house arrest.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 350; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2010 (Washington 2010) 474–475.]

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In January 2009, pro-government activists carrying iron bars, machetes, and firearms forced their way into the Fundación Ateneo cultural center in Caracas. They were protesting at the center's decision to organize a seminar commemorating the anniversary of the creation in 1970 of Bandera Roja, a left-wing political party opposed to the government. The police failed to intervene.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2010 (London 2010) 352.]

On 4 February 2010, police dispersed hundreds of students protesting against the official celebration by President Hugo Chávez's supporters of the 18th anniversary of his failed 1992 coup as an army officer against then-President Carlos Andrés Pérez. The official interpretation saw the coup as a justified rebellion seeking to topple a corrupt government that ignored the plight of the poor.

[Source: Washington Post (Online; 4 February 2010).]

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 10 September 2008, Ngô Quỳnh (also Ngô Quanh) (?1984–), student and dissident writer, author of online dissenting articles, including “Viet Nam Needs To Compile a New History Book” and “Journey to Lang Son's Dairy” (published on overseas websites), was arrested in Hanoi as he was on his way to the parish of Thai Ha, where a mass rally by Catholics protesting against government policy was taking place (See NCH Annual Report 2009). He was detained in a labor camp in Ha Dong province. Indicted on 3 July 2009, he and five other members of the banned pro-democracy group Bloc 8406 were charged with “propaganda against the Communist system of government” as well as “slandorous allegations undermining national security, the social order and the people's trust in the Party”. On 9 October 2009, after a trial of a few hours, he was sentenced to three years’ imprisonment and to three years' probationary detention. On 21 January 2010, his sentence was upheld on appeal.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (20 August 2009); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 31 December 2008 (London 2009) 63; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 31 December 2009 (London 2010) 66; PEN, Rapid Action Network 47/08 (23 September 2008), 49/09 (15 September 2009), 52/09 (14 October 2009); Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (13 October 2009).]

On 25 August 2009, reporter Huy Duc was dismissed from the governmental daily Saigon Tiep Thi (Saigon Marketing) for posting criticism of the USSR on his personal blog on 23 August 2009 (See NCH Annual Report 2009). In the offending entry (<http://www.blogosin.org>), he had referred to the Berlin Wall as a "Wall of Shame", condemned the USSR's "purges" in East Germany, and called the USSR "an occupation force...that deprived people of their basic rights". On 28 August 2009, journalist Pham Doan Trang, editor of Tuan Vietnam, an online weekly (part of VietnamNet, Vietnam's most popular news website) was arrested for "threatening national security" (See NCH Annual Report 2009). On 27 July 2009, she wrote an article in which she had criticized China's role during the partition of Vietnam in 1954. In the past, she had condemned China's territorial claims in the South China Sea. On 5 or 12 September 2009, she was released. On 27 August 2009, police also arrested political blogger Bui Thanh Hieu (1972-) (also known by his blogger name: Nguoi Buon Gio ["Wind Trader"]) for "threatening national security" because he had written critically, inter alia, about competing territorial claims with China (including regarding the long-contested Paracel and Spratly Islands). On 5 September 2009, he was released. Several bloggers had accused the Vietnamese authorities of failing to stand up to China's territorial claims over the Paracel and Spratly Islands in the South China Sea because they were afraid of offending China.

[Sources: Committee to Protect Journalists, "Vietnam Cracks Down on Bloggers and Online Journalists" (3 September 2009); Index on Censorship, 4/09: 214; PEN, Rapid Action Network 49/09 (15 September 2009); Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (2 September 2009).]

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco/Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

On 20 January 2009, Wagdi Sharbi, a journalist of the daily al Watani, was released after eight days' imprisonment for covering a rally in Aden to commemorate a massacre which took place on 13 January 1986. On that day, fighting broke out between two rival southern groups. Southerners celebrated the anniversary as a festival for tolerance and unity among the people of the south. On 13 January 2008, the previous commemorative meeting had been dispersed by government troops, leaving three persons killed.

On 21 May 2009, the anniversary of the 1994 declaration of an independent state by south Yemeni political leaders, a large protest was held in Aden. Security forces killed at least three people and wounded another 25 to 30 in their response to the protest. On 8 July 2009, two people were killed when police opened fire to disperse a crowd in southern Yemen after a series of protests had taken place to mark the fifteenth anniversary of the failed 1994 secession, amid increasing North-South tensions.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, In the Name of Unity: The Yemeni Government's Brutal Response to Southern Movement Protests (Washington 2009) 29, 35–36; Index on Censorship, 4/09: 214, 217.]

ZAMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In July 2009, youth militia, established by the ruling ZANU-PF political party, reportedly attempted to control schools. Some youth militia centers were running history clubs at schools. Teachers in rural areas said that the setting up of militia bases at schools intimidated them. The Progressive Teachers' Union of Zimbabwe was disturbed by these developments.

[Sources: "Political Violence Growing in Rural Areas" (Online; Irinnews, 27 July 2009); UNESCO, Education Under Attack 2010 (Paris 2010) 242.]

In April 2010, armed police raided an art gallery in Bulawayo that presented pictures of victims and families from the 1980s Matabeleland massacres in which an estimated 20,000 people were killed by government troops. They arrested the organizer.

[Source: D. Smith, "Police Shut Art Gallery for Showing Images of Zimbabwe Political Violence", Guardian, (Online; 4 April 2010).]

INTRODUCTION

The fifteenth Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it. This Annual Report and all previous Annual Reports were compiled by Antoon De Baets and revised by Ingrid Sennema. Please send any comments to <antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org>.

Please quote as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2009 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org>).

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, President Hamid Karzai's government did little to implement the five-year Action Plan for Peace, Reconciliation and Justice (a part of the Afghanistan Compact officially initiated in December 2006). The legal status of an amnesty for war criminals, passed by parliament in 2007, was still unclear, but the debate was dominated by parliamentarians such as Abdul Rabb al Rasul Sayyaf, Burhanuddin Rabbani, and Taj Mohammad, all of whom have been implicated in war crimes. No effective accountability mechanism had been established and only a handful of those responsible for serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law during three decades of conflict (1978–2008) had been brought to justice, mostly in other states under the principle of universal jurisdiction.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 55–56; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 212.]

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 1996.

See Serbia.

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

During the internal conflict of 1992–2000, over 100,000 and perhaps as many as 200,000 Algerians were killed. In May 2008, the United Nations Committee against Torture urged the government to amend Articles 45 and 46 of the 2006 Decree implementing the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation (Law 06–01), which gave immunity to the security forces and allowed for the punishment of victims and their families, human rights defenders and others who criticized the conduct of the security forces during the conflict. The authorities had still not investigated the fate of thousands of people subjected to enforced disappearance. In May 2008, a senior official stated that

5,500 families of victims of enforced disappearance had accepted compensation but that 600 others had refused, insisting that they be told the truth about the fate of their missing relatives. Later, the head of the National Advisory Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights said that 96–97 per cent of the families of the disappeared had accepted compensation, but gave no details. Under Law 06–01, relatives can seek compensation if they obtain a death certificate from the authorities for the person who disappeared. Some families complained that they were put under pressure to obtain such certificates. Victims' families continued to be harassed when seeking truth and justice.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 60–61, 62–63; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 444, 446.]

On 4 August 2008, a court in Constantine dismissed a complaint brought by Louisa Saker (née Bousroual), president of the Association of the Families of the Disappeared in Constantine, in connection to the 1994 arbitrary arrest and disappearance of her husband, Salah Saker (1957–), a teacher and member of the banned Salvation Islamic Front (Front Islamique du Salut, FIS). On 26 March 2008, Louisa Saker had been convicted of participating in an unauthorized “unarmed march” and received a suspended fine for having taken part in a peaceful demonstration in 2004 by families of victims of enforced disappearance. She was acquitted of other charges relating to undermining the authority of public officials, violence and theft, but two other relatives of victims of enforced disappearance were convicted in the same case of all of the charges and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. In November 2008, the Constantine Court of Appeals upheld the conviction. The Algerian authorities did not implement the March 2006 recommendations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee in the Bousroual and Saker v. Algeria case, which called for an investigation into the enforced disappearance of Salah Saker. The February 2006 amnesty laws barred courts from investigating complaints against the security forces.

[Sources: Amnesty International, International Day of the Disappeared; Global Reach: Regional Case Studies and Brief Country Background (POL 36/001/2008; London 28 August 2008); Amnesty International, Report (London 2009) 63; Amnesty International, The Wire, 37 no. 7 (August 2007) 2; 38 no. 7 (August 2008) 3; Human Rights Committee, Communication No. 992/2001: Bousroual and Saker versus Algeria (CCPR/C/86/D/992/2001; 24 April 2006); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 446.]

See also Morocco.

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

On 20 March 2008, the Minister of Culture, Boaventura Cardoso, announced that a commission for the scientific research into the history of Angola—including the battles fought in the civil war (1975–2002) such as the Cuito Cuanavale Battle in 1987–1989—would be set up by the Ministries of Education, Culture and the State Secretariat for Higher Education.

[Source: Angola Press Agency, “Creation of History Research Commission Announced” (WWW-text; Angola Press Agency; 21 March 2008).]

See also Namibia.

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, Hugo del Campo (1941–2008) died. A historian working at several universities (1966–1975), including the Humanities Department of the Universidad Nacional del Sur (National Southern University), Bahía Blanca, he was arrested together with many other lecturers in [November 1976], tried for “ideological infiltration” and imprisoned for political reasons for six years. In 1983, he went to France and taught at the Universities of Paris IV and Marne-la-Vallée. He was the author of Los anarquistas (1971; The Anarchists), Sindicalismo y peronismo (1983; Trade-unionism and Peronismo), and El sindicalismo revolucionario (1985; Revolutionary Trade-unionism). His last book, a history of Argentina between 1955 and 2005, would be published posthumously.

[Source: J. Horowitz, personal communication (December 2008); <http://www.hugodelcampo.com>; “List of the accused”].

In November 1989, Eduardo Kimel, a journalist and a historian graduated from Buenos Aires University, published La Masacre de San Patricio (The San Patricio Massacre) (second edition 1995), a book about the murder of five clergymen of the Palatine Order committed in July 1976 during the military dictatorship (1976–1983), in which he criticized the handling of the case by the authorities, among them a judge. He had written, inter alia: “The evidence that the order to carry out the murder had come from within the core of the military structure in power checked the development of the [legal] investigation, bringing it to a standstill". In October 1991, this same judge sued him for libel. In 1995, Kimel was sentenced for libel to one-year suspended imprisonment and payment of a heavy fine as compensatory damages. The case, in which the charge changed from libel to "false imputation of a publicly actionable crime" and later again to libel, eventually went to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. At the public hearing held before the Court in 2007, Kimel stated that "The greatest paradox [is] that the only person to be prosecuted and punished in connection with the San Patricio massacre has been the journalist who wrote the book". In May 2008, the court unanimously ruled that Kimel's freedom of expression and right to a fair trial had been violated, and that the laws that protect against slander and libel in Argentina violated the American Convention on Human Rights.

[Sources: Inter-American Court of Human Rights, Case of Kimel v. Argentina: Judgment of May 2, 2008 [available at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/105.pdf]; C. Wendell, The Right to Offend, Shock or Disturb: A Guide to Evolution of Insult Laws in 2007 and 2008 (Reston, VA, 2009) 84–85.]

Since 2003 Argentina has made significant progress in prosecuting military and police personnel responsible for "disappearances", killings, and torture during its last military dictatorship (1976–1983). The executive branch actively encouraged these prosecutions, reinforcing what began as a legal challenge to impunity in the courts. In late 2008, there were more than 400 people facing charges for these crimes, the vast majority of whom were in pretrial detention. Several important cases were reopened in 2003 after Congress annulled the 1986 "Full Stop" law, which forced a halt to the prosecution of all such cases, and the 1987 "Due Obedience" law, which granted automatic immunity in such cases to all members of the military, except those in positions of command. In June 2005, the Supreme Court declared the two laws unconstitutional. In July 2008, the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances visited Argentina and noted that more than twenty judgments had been handed down on perpetrators of past human rights violations and that 1,000 criminal proceedings remained open. Since 2005, several federal judges have struck down pardons decreed by the former President Carlos Meném in 1989 and 1990 of former officials convicted or facing trial for human rights violations. In April 2008, for instance, a federal appeals court upheld the unconstitutionality of pardons in favor of Jorge Rafael Videla, former head of the military junta, and two others in a case regarding the "disappearance" of two businessmen.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 66; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 150–151.]

In April 2008, in the first judgment of its kind, Osvaldo Rivas and María Cristina Gomez were sentenced to eight and seven years' imprisonment respectively for the "appropriation" of Maria Eugenia Sampallo, the daughter of a couple who were the victims of enforced disappearance in 1977. The ex-army captain who stole the child and gave her to the couple was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Also in April 2008, a court indicted seven military officers in connection with the "illegal appropriation" of babies from the military hospital in Campo de Mayo while their mothers were in detention. In July 2008, Jorge Rafael Videla, former head of the military junta, was indicted on similar charges.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 66.]

In December 2008, forensic investigators announced the finding of thousands of bone fragments and a wall with 200 bullet holes in the Arana police detachment near Buenos Aires, the first time that a mass burial site has been found in a former clandestine detention centre. The process to identify the remains has been initiated.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 66.]

See also Chile, Uruguay, Vatican.

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

See Azerbaijan, Switzerland, United States.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In February 2008, the government made an historic apology to the "Stolen Generations"—Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people who as children were forcibly removed from their families as a result of government policy between 1870 and 1970. However, the government opposed compensation. It pledged to "close the gap" between indigenous peoples and other Australians, but opposed the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 27, 69; Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission, Bringing Them Home: Report of the National Inquiry into the Separation of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Children (Sydney 1997).]

See also United Kingdom.

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

On 27 April 2009, Holocaust denier Gerd Honsik (1941–) was sentenced to five years' imprisonment by a Vienna Court. In 1992, he had already been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment, but he escaped to Spain where he was arrested in August 2007 and extradited. His recent sentence was heavier because he had repeated his denial. He intended to appeal. His 1995 application to the European Court of Human Rights was declared inadmissible.

[Sources: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/1e/51.pdf [1995 case]; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 263; NRC Handelsblad (28 April 2009).]

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 20 April 2007, Eynulla Fatullayev, a journalist who had been harassed by the government for years, was arrested, charged with libel, tried, and sentenced to two and a half years' imprisonment. The charges were based on anonymous comments posted on a website in February 2007 and attributed to Fatullayev, suggesting that both Azerbaijanis and Armenian forces were responsible for the massacre of hundreds of ethnic Azeri civilians from the village of Xocal in 1992, during the war in Nagorny Karabakh (1988–1994). (Another version of the comments reportedly suggested that Azerbaijanis were responsible for the 1992 massacre of residents of the town of Khodjali in Nagorno-Karabakh.) Fatullayev denied being the author. The court ruled Fatullayev had libeled both the population of Xocal and Azerbaijani war veterans. On 30 October 2007, Fatullayev was sentenced to an additional eight and a half years' imprisonment on charges of terrorism, incitement of ethnic hatred, and tax evasion, despite the lack of plausible evidence. In Realny Azerbaydzhan (Real Azerbaijan), a Russian language newspaper founded by him, he had published an article in which he argued that Azerbaijan's support of the United States position on Iraq made Azerbaijan more more liable to an attack by Iran. In the article he also mentioned some possible Azeri targets of such an attack. The conviction was upheld by the appeals court in January 2008 and by the Supreme Court in June 2008. He was reportedly held in solitary confinement.

[Sources: Amnesty International, "Azerbaijan: Eynulla Fatullayev, Journalist Harassed and Imprisoned" (WWW-text; 2008); International PEN, "Azerbaijan: Eynulla Fatullayev" (WWW-text; 2008).]

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, decree 56/2002, which confers immunity from investigation or prosecution on government officials alleged to be responsible for torture and other serious human rights abuses committed prior to 2001, remained on the books. Despite the efforts of local human rights groups to establish a means for addressing such violations, the government insisted that the matter was closed. In its submission to the United Nations Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review mechanism in April 2008, Bahrain stated "there are no cases of torture in the kingdom".

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 450.]

On 16 December 2008, three young men aged 19 and 20 were detained while they were busy writing slogans and pasting pictures and posters on the walls of the Ras Rumman area in Manama, the capital, in memory of victims of torture who were killed in past years (especially in 1980–1990). Each year on 17 December, Martyrs Day is held to commemorate those who died as well as those still suffering as a result of torture in Bahrain. Close to this event and during periods of unrest, it is customary to see graffiti and portraits of martyrs on the walls of villages and cities. The authorities usually send a security-backed group to scratch out and wipe clean the graffiti and slogans after a short period of display.

[Sources: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (28 January 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2008) 709.]

In April 2009, journalist and writer Abbas Al-Murshid (?1978–) was detained when he returned from a visit to Saudi Arabia, probably in connection with his critical writings on the so-called Bandargate scandal (an alleged political conspiracy by certain government officials to marginalize the majority Shia community). Some of his books were confiscated, including two historical ones: a volume of the six-volume Gazetteer of the Persian Gulf, Oman and Central Arabia by John Gordon Lorimer (1870–1914) (probably the volume containing a history of Bahrain between 1602 and 1907) and Portuguese Colonialism.

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (15 April 2009).]

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In April 2008, Foreign Adviser Iftekhkar Ahmed Chowdhury discussed with the United Nations Secretary-General, Ban Ki-moon, the possibility of United Nations involvement in ending impunity for atrocities in the 1971 Bangladesh independence war. However, as in the past, no official Commission of Enquiry was established to investigate the war crimes, crimes against humanity, and other serious violations of human rights and humanitarian law as a first step towards establishing truth, justice, and full and effective reparations for victims. No concrete action was taken by the government to implement the 1973 International Crimes (tribunals) Act.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 76; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 221.]

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

In March 2007, the Union of Belarusian Writers complained that Belarusian officials were imposing state ideology on schools and banned certain works, such as those by Yanka Kupala (1882–1942; penname of Ivan Lutsevich), a poet who had defended the Belarusian language against russification. In the same month, books by well-known activists of the Belarusian diaspora, such as People of the Union of Belarusian Youth, by Yury Turonak, a Belarusian historian based in Poland, and Anti-Bolshevik uprisings and Partisan Struggle in Belarus, by Yuri Vitsbich, were confiscated from the NGO World Association of Belarusians. In 1998, another book of Turonak, Belarus under German Occupation, had reportedly already been withdrawn.

[Sources: Article 19, Speaking Out for Free Expression, 1987–2007 and Beyond (London 2008) 183; Viasna (The Human Rights Office), “Search Held in ‘Batskaushchyna’ Office” (WWW-text; 17 March 2007).]

In the summer of 2007, X [confidential name] (1958–), a historian and anthropologist at the History Department of Belarusian State University, Minsk (1991–2008), was forced to meet a KGB officer and accused of collaboration with the European Humanities University-in-exile (EHU) in Vilnius, Lithuania. The same day, the police accused him of having stolen a mobile phone. After several months of intense psychological pressure on him, his relatives, and his collaborators, he resigned. In March 2008, he became a visiting professor of EHU and academic co-director of the Center for Advanced Studies and Education (CASE) in Lithuania and Belarus. In December 2008, he was appointed dean at the EHU Arts and History Department.

[Sources: Scholars at Risk, Summary Report of 2008 SAR/EHU Meeting & Symposium in Vilnius, Lithuania (1 October 2008) 10; X, personal information (June & December 2008).]

On 25 March 2008, security forces reportedly used excessive force against demonstrators who had gathered in the capital, Minsk, to commemorate Freedom Day (the anniversary of the creation of the Belarusian People's Republic in 1918). Around a hundred demonstrators were detained and subsequently sentenced to a fine or held in administrative detention. The authorities took unprecedented action against journalists who were covering the demonstration.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 77.]

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

See Central African Republic, Congo (Democratic Republic), Rwanda.

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

On 9 September 2008, the archive of the Instituto Nacional de Reforma Agraria (INRA; National Institute of Agrarian Reform), the library of the Centro de Estudios Jurídicos y de Investigación Social (CEJIS; Center for Legal Studies and Social Research), and several other documentation centers were looted and burned in Santa Cruz de la Sierra by a paramilitary group, reportedly in order to destroy evidence of the illegal occupation of indigenous lands by large landowners. This act was called a "memoricidio" ("memorycide").

[Source: Manifiesto contra la barbarie, el genocidio y el memoricidio: 9 de Septiembre, Día aciago de la destrucción de la memoria cruceña (Bolivia) (WWW-text; <http://www.arxiv.org>).]

In October 2008, an extradition request was filed with the United States government regarding former President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada (president in 1993–1997 and 2002–2003) and two former ministers. All were accused of involvement in genocide for their role in the killings of 67 people during demonstrations in El Alto in 2003. In November 2008, several former ministers and military officers were notified of charges in connection with the killings. However, there were concerns about delays in starting oral proceedings. In the same month, legislation was enacted which, in addition to recognizing state responsibility, provides for compensation for individuals injured during the confrontations and for the relatives of those killed.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 81–82.]

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Senior politicians and military officers indicted for war crimes committed during the 1992–1995 war continued to be tried before the United Nations International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). In July 2008, Radovan Karadžić, the war-time Bosnian Serb president, was arrested in Belgrade and transferred from Serbia to The Hague, thirteen years after his indictment. Karadžić was charged with genocide (including at Srebrenica), crimes against humanity, and war crimes. He did not recognize the court's jurisdiction. A "not guilty" plea was entered on his behalf. In September 2008, prosecutors narrowed the geographic scope of the indictment, but it remained vague on charges of sexual violence. Ratko Mladic, fellow indicted architect of the Srebrenica massacre, remained at large. In November 2008, Karadžić testified as a defense witness in the ongoing ICTY appeal of Momčilo Krajišnik, a Bosnian Serb wartime leader convicted of crimes against humanity [See Krajišnik's judgment on http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/1e/17.pdf] in 2006.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 82–83, 283; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 349.]

In July 2008, a Dutch district court in The Hague ruled that it lacked jurisdiction to hear a civil claim against the United Nations brought by some 6,000 relatives of Srebrenica massacre victims.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 350.]

The War Crimes Chamber (WCC) of the BiH (Bosnia and Herzegovina) State Court continued to prosecute those responsible for war atrocities. In July 2008, seven out of eleven accused were found guilty of genocide committed at Kravica farm near Srebrenica in July 1995. They were convicted of killing more than 1,000 Bosniak men and sentenced to between 38 and 42 years' imprisonment. The remaining four accused were acquitted of all charges. In September 2008, the WCC launched a new national war crimes strategy to address the backlog of cases, which could involve as many as 10,000 suspects. According to the strategy, prosecutions before the WCC would focus on "those who planned the worst atrocities" during the war. Courts in the two semi-autonomous entities of BiH (Republika Srpska, RS, and the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, FBiH) continued to prosecute war crimes cases. According to the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), RS prosecutors had brought a total of 21 indictments against 44 accused, with district courts reaching twelve verdicts and nine cases ongoing. In the FBiH, cantonal courts had decided a total of 85 verdicts against 119 defendants, with sixteen cases still in process. The discovery in August 2008 of a mass grave near Kamenica, believed to hold the bodies of up to one hundred victims of the 1995 Srebrenica massacre, was a reminder that Bosnia remains marked by the legacy of the 1992–1995 war.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 83; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 350.]

Almost thirteen years after the war ended in 1995, an estimated 13,000 people still remained unaccounted for. In 2008, the Missing Persons Institute (Institut za Nestale Osobe, INO) started its work at full capacity. In June 2008, the International Committee of the Red Cross donated its database of missing persons to the INO, facilitating the establishment of a centralized system of information on all missing people in Bosnian and Herzegovinan territory. In May 2008, the Constitutional Court delivered two verdicts in a hearing concerning 230 cases filed by the families of missing persons. It found the applicants' right to family and private life as well as their right to freedom from inhumane treatment had been violated because the state authorities had not opened investigations into the enforced disappearance and deaths of their relatives.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 83–84.]

In 2008, Mirsad Tokaca (?1955–), president of the Sarajevo-based NGO Research and Documentation Center (RDC; founded 2002), his family, and seventeen RDC employees received death threats after in the RDC database Human Losses in Bosnia-Herzegovina 1991–1995 (also known as the Bosnian Book of the Dead), the total number of those killed in the Bosnian war had been estimated at almost 97,000 (57,500 military victims; and 39,300 civilians, 33,000 of which were Bosniaks, 4,100 Serbs, and 2,200 Croats), a much lower rate than the usual estimate of 200,000.

Among Tokaca's critics was Smail Cekic, head of the Sarajevo-based Institute for the Investigation of Crimes against Humanity and International Law, who questioned Tokaca's research methods and accused him of "fogging the essence and size of the genocide" of Bosniaks. Until 2002, Tokaca had been secretary of the Bosnia-Herzegovina State Commission on War Crimes Documentation. In the same year, he turned down an offer to chair a similar commission at the level of the (Croat-Muslim) Federation of Bosnia-Herzegovina because of insufficient impartiality guarantees, and founded the RDC.

[Source: D. Halimovic, "Bosnian Researcher Counts War Dead, And Faces Threats For His Methods", Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (WWW-text; 21 November 2008).]

See also Montenegro.

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Brazil has never prosecuted those responsible for atrocities committed during its period of military dictatorship (1964–1985). The 1979 amnesty law has thus far been interpreted so as to bar prosecutions of state agents. In July 2008, the Minister of Justice, Tarso Genro, reopened the debate by stating that torture was not a political crime and therefore not covered by the 1979 amnesty law. His statements were dismissed by the Minister of Defense and members of the armed forces. In October 2008, the Brazilian Bar Association petitioned the Supreme Federal Tribunal to rule on this interpretation of the amnesty law. In a landmark ruling in the same month, a civil court in São Paulo found Colonel Carlos Alberto Brilhante Ustra civilly responsible for acts of kidnapping and torture during his time as director of a dictatorship intelligence agency in São Paulo in the 1970s. However, federal government lawyers announced that they would defend Ustra and his co-defendant in a separate civil case, brought by federal public prosecutors, on the grounds that the amnesty law should protect them from prosecution.

On 8 April 2009, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights stated that amnesties and statutes of limitations could not be applied to crimes against humanity that were committed during the military dictatorship (1964–1985). The commission also addressed the legal issue of the permanent sealing of official files related to certain matters, which was introduced in May 2005. The petition was brought by relatives of seventy persons forcibly disappeared by the military during its operations against the Araguaia Communist guerrilla movement in 1972–1975. Because of the 1979 amnesty law, no Brazilian official had been convicted for human rights violations committed during the dictatorship. The Supreme Federal Tribunal was investigating challenges to the amnesty law's applicability to human rights violations (see above).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 85–86; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 163; Human Rights Watch, Brazil: Prosecute; Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, IACHR Takes Case against Brazil to the Inter-American Court (Press release 16/09; 8 April 2009).]

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

In April 2007, a conference on the massacre of Christian civilians by irregular Ottoman troops in the village of Batak in early 1876—a prelude to the eventual foundation of the Bulgarian nation in 1878—was canceled after Bulgarian media attacked its intended approach. The conference, scheduled for May 2007 in Sofia and organized by Martina Baleva ([1972]–), an art historian working at the Kunsthistorisches Institut, Free University of Berlin, and Ulf Brunnbauer (1970–), a historian of Southeastern Europe at the Osteuropa-Institut, Free University of Berlin, was meant to accompany an exhibition on the history of Batak as a national site of memory. The authors declared that the number of victims of the massacre (estimated at 12,000) was highly exaggerated and pointed to inconsistencies in the national narrative. They also showed that one important source for the historical imagination of the massacre was “The Batak Massacre”, a 1892 painting by the Pole Antoni Piotrowski, who had based this on fake photographs with scenes of the massacre that he had staged in 1886–1988 but that were later believed to be authentic. Baleva and Brunnbauer used these findings as evidence for the existence of anti-Islamic stereotypes in Bulgaria. While several Bulgarian historians, including from the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences, joined the protests and Prime Minister Sergey Stanishev and President Georgi Parvanov (both historians) reacted in public, others defended the scholars' method. The scholars themselves offered their apologies and declared that their intention was not to deny but to demystify the massacre. However, the radical right-wing political party Ataka and its television channel Skat organized a smear campaign against Baleva, in which such newspapers as Trud (Labor) and 24 Tschassa (24 Hours) participated. Baleva also received written and oral death threats. Bozhidar Dimitrov, director of the National Museum of History in Sofia and presidential advisor, declared in 24 Tschassa that he would sue both scholars for denial of the massacre. In April 2007, Baleva hastily returned from Bulgaria to Germany, where she lived anonymously. In June 2007, she filed a charge against Ataka and Skat.

[Sources: M. Baleva & U. Brunnbauer, eds., Batak: Ein Bulgarischer Erinnerungsort ([Sofia/Berlin] 2007), 10–14, 157; Berliner Zeitung (22 November 2007); U. Brunnbauer, personal information (October–December 2008); Deutsche Welle (22 November 2007); Frankfurter Rundschau (20 November 2007); Kölner Stadt-Anzeiger (19 November 2007); M. Kraske & E. Schmitter, “Terror um ein Bild”, Der Spiegel (19 November 2007) 74; Der Standard (28 November 2007); Süddeutsche Zeitung (23 November 2007).]

See also Greece.

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In November 2007, a committee including representatives of the government, the United Nations (UN), and civil society was formed to guide popular consultations on the establishment of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission and a Special Tribunal to investigate and prosecute the most serious crimes committed during the civil war (1993–2005). Although the UN Peacebuilding Fund, established by the UN Peacebuilding Commission, contributed one million US dollars, the committee did not organize consultations scheduled to start in June 2008. They were rescheduled for March 2009. President Pierre Nkurunziza wrested control of the process from the first vice president, contravening an agreement with the UN, and was rebuked by the UN secretary-general. The government continued to urge amnesty for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide, despite UN opposition.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 94; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 42.]

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC; the Khmer Rouge tribunal)—a hybrid tribunal presided over by both Cambodian and international judges to address crimes from the Khmer Rouge era—continued to make slow progress toward holding its first trials. At the end of 2008, five senior Khmer Rouge officials remained in detention, including Kaing Guek Eav (also known as Duch), the former chief of Tuol Sleng prison; Pol Pot's deputy, Nuon Chea; former Khmer Rouge Foreign Minister Ieng Sary, former Khmer Rouge Social Affairs Minister Ieng Thirith, and former Khmer Rouge Head of State Khieu Samphan. All were charged with crimes against humanity and war crimes, except for Ieng Thirith, who was charged with crimes against humanity only. Serious concerns remain about political interference in the court from the Cambodian government, corruption among Cambodian personnel, lack of sufficient victim and witness protection, and the limited number of cases brought to address the deaths of as many as two million people during the 1975–1979 genocide. Criticism of the tribunal mounted, with many Cambodians saying they were losing interest as the process dragged on without tangible results. Several pre-trial hearings were held at the ECCC. However the first trial to take place, that of Duch, was postponed until 2009 following a decision by co-prosecutors to seek a broader indictment. By the end of 2008, the ECCC Victims Unit had received over 1,100 civil party applications, 34 of which had been accepted, and around 1,700 complaints from victims.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009), 96; Human Rights Watch, Cambodia: 30 Years After Fall of the Khmer Rouge, Justice Still Elusive (Washington 5 January 2009); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 232–233].

On 12 February 2009, the Education Minister launched the first history textbook that treated the genocide of 1975–1979 for the third form of the secondary school. Based on A History of Democratic Kampuchea, 1975–1979 (2007) by Khamboly Dy of the Documentation Center of Cambodia (DC-Cam), more than 500,000 copies were distributed. The DC-Cam book was the first scientific study produced by a Cambodian about the genocide; but even this report evaded the question whether Vietnam “liberated” or “occupied” Cambodia in January 1979.

[Sources: K. Dy, A History of Democratic Kampuchea, 1975–1979 (<http://www.dccam.org>; DC-Cam 2007); Le Monde (13 February 2009); Phnom Penh Post (17 October 2008); Straits Times (12 February 2009).]

See also Thailand.

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 15 April 2008, the Barrick Gold Corporation, Toronto, the world's biggest gold mining company, sued the publishing house Éditions Écosociété in Montréal for defamation and demanded six million Canadian dollars in damages. In June 2008, the Banro company also sued the same publisher for five million Canadian dollars in damages in Ontario. One of its books, Noir Canada: Pillage, corruption et criminalité en Afrique (2008; Black Canada: Plundering, Bribery, and Crime in Africa), by Alain Deneault (1970–), a lecturer at the Université de Québec à Montréal (UQAM), Delphine Abadie, and William Sacher, discussed Barrick's responsibility in the expulsion of thousands of self-employed miners and their families from the Bulyanhulu mine in Tanzania in August 1996, in the course of which 52 miners were reportedly buried alive. In a section called "Thèse 1: Homicide et génocide involontaires" ("Thesis 1: Killings and involuntary genocide"), the authors called for an independent public inquiry into the events. The company emphasized that those events took place before its purchase of the property from Sutton Resources, Vancouver, in 1999. Deneault declared that the book did not hold Barrick directly responsible for the incident, but rather presented opinions, including Barrick's, on the case. Previously, Barrick had apparently threatened to sue Guardian journalist Greg Palast with defamation if he did not apologize for his report, which was the first publication containing these allegations.

[Sources: A. Deneault, D. Abadie, W. Sacher, Noir Canada: Pillage, corruption et criminalité en Afrique (Montréal: Écosociété, 2008) 17–26; The Gazette (15 April 2008); Globe and Mail (WWW-text; 14 April 2008); The Militant (23 June 2008).]

See also Palestinian Authority, Rwanda.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 24 May 2008, Belgian authorities arrested Jean-Pierre Bemba, leader of the Movement for the Liberation of Congo (MLC). He was transferred to The Hague, where the International Criminal Court (ICC) charged him with war crimes and crimes against humanity, all allegedly committed in the south of the Central African Republic (CAR) between October 2002 and March 2003. In May 2007, the ICC prosecutor's office had announced that it would monitor more recent events to determine whether an investigation into crimes committed in the north of the CAR would warrant investigation. On 10 June 2008, ICC Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo addressed a letter to President François Bozizé noting that acts of violence committed in the north would require sustained attention. In August 2008, Ocampo's letter resulted in a letter from Bozizé to United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon, in which he asked the United Nations to intercede in any possible ICC investigations of crimes in the north pursuant to article 16 of the ICC Rome Statute, which empowers the Security Council to suspend court proceedings for up to twelve months, renewable if required, to maintain international peace and security. Security Council intercession is highly unlikely given that the only ongoing ICC proceedings in the CAR pertain to crimes committed in the south in the 2002–2003 period, and there are no ICC investigations concerning the north at this point.

In September 2008, as part of the implementation of the comprehensive peace agreement, parliament adopted a general amnesty law, which covered crimes by government and armed political forces between 15 March 2005, when President François Bozizé came to power, and 13 October 2008, when the law was promulgated by the President. Although the amnesty was not supposed to cover crimes committed between October 2002 and March 2003, it granted immunity to several political and military leaders of the 2002–2003 armed conflict. They included former President Ange-Félix Patassé who was in power during the period, his former defense minister and his former presidential security aide. Such an amnesty law would not preclude the International Criminal Court from pursuing prosecutions for crimes under international law.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 101; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 47.]

See also Uganda.

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In March 2008, the government convened a Commission of Inquiry to investigate crimes committed in the wake of the February 2008 coup attempt by Chadian rebels backed by Sudan. In September 2008, the Commission issued a report that implicated President Idriss Déby's Presidential Guard in the disappearance of Ibni Oumar Mahamat Saleh, the spokesman for a coalition of opposition parties, and found that members of the Chadian security forces were responsible for crimes including arbitrary arrests, unlawful killings, torture, and rape. Chadian government helicopters were charged with indiscriminate attacks against civilians. The report represented an important step toward accountability, but did not identify specific perpetrators of abuses. A body established by the government to continue the work of the Commission was composed of ten ministers and the prime minister—a lack of independence that suggests limited political willingness to push investigations forward. No action was taken by the government to implement the Commission's recommendations.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 8; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 49.]

See also Senegal.

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

According to official figures, 1,125 cases of human rights violations committed during the military government of General Augusto Pinochet (1973–1990) remained open; 3,195 had been subject to investigation. By the end of 2008, 245 members of the security forces had been convicted in connection with 115 cases. At the time of his death from a heart attack in December 2006, Pinochet was under house arrest, facing prosecution for torture, enforced disappearances, tax evasion, and forgery. The Supreme Court had closed three previous cases against him on medical grounds, but judges came to doubt that his mild dementia disqualified him from trial.

In June 2008, Manuel Contreras, the former head of the National Intelligence Directorate (Dirección de Inteligencia Nacional, DINA) was found guilty of the 1974 car bomb killings of former Army Commander-in-Chief Carlos Prats González and his wife in Argentina. The judge added two life sentences plus twenty years to the time Contreras was already serving in prison. Seven other former DINA agents and two civilians received sentences of up to twenty years' imprisonment. Pinochet, who had succeeded Prats as army commander just before the 1973 coup, escaped prosecution for the crime.

In October 2008, retired General Arellano Stark was sentenced to six years' imprisonment for his role in the killings of four political prisoners in 1973 as head of the Caravan of Death. Four other officers were given sentences of between four and six years. This was the first conviction in relation to the 72 killings carried out by the Caravan of Death in the north of Chile. In November 2008, it was confirmed that Stark would not be imprisoned for health reasons.

A majority of the five judges in the Supreme Court's criminal chamber ruled that the amnesty decreed by the military government in 1978 was inapplicable to war crimes or crimes against humanity, and that these crimes were not subject to a statute of limitations. Given that court rulings in Chile were not binding in cases other than the one under review, and that the composition of the Supreme Court panel could change from case to case, the legal obstacles to convictions had not been entirely overcome. A bill promoted by the government to amend the criminal code so that crimes against humanity were not subject to amnesties or statutes of limitations remained deadlocked in Congress in 2008. During 2007 and increasingly in 2008, the Supreme Court had applied a law allowing those convicted for human rights violations to benefit from a sentence reduction in recognition of the time elapsed since the criminal act (more than thirty years in some cases), which meant that several former military personnel sentenced to prison by lower courts were exempted from serving time.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 106; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 165–166.]

See also Peru.

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, Wang Dan (1969–), a former Beida student of international politics (1987–1988) and history (1988–1989) who was number one on the list of the most wanted student leaders issued by the government on 13 June 1989, launched a campaign to urge the Chinese government to allow him and other blacklisted former Tiananmen protest leaders to return to China. (See also http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/ca/04.pdf).

[Source: Index on Censorship, 2/09: 24–39.]

In March 2008, a petition by the Tiananmen Mothers (a group of 130 human rights defenders—mainly women—seeking accountability and redress for the killing of their children and other close relatives during the suppression of peaceful protests around Tiananmen Square in June 1989), signed by 127 people, was submitted the parliament. In May 2009, during the run-up to the twentieth anniversary of the massacre, Ding Zilin (?1936–) (a former professor of philosophy and supervisor of graduate students at People’s University, whose son Jiang Jielian was killed during the massacre) was placed under house arrest. On 15 May 2009, two days ahead of a 17 May memorial ceremony, Zhang Xianling, another member of the Tiananmen Mothers, was warned not to invite media to participate in, or report on, the ceremony.

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué (3 June 2009); NRC Handelsblad (23–24 May 2009) 1, 4.]

On 26 August 2008, Hu Shigen (1954–), a lecturer at the Beijing Language and Culture Institute, political activist and dissident writer, was released (see NCH Annual Report 2008). He remained formally deprived of his right to exercise free speech, right of association and of free assembly, and his eligibility to work for a state institution.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (27 August 2008); International PEN, Rapid Action Network 43/08 (8 September 2008).]

In March 2009, Jiang Yanyong (?1932–), an army surgeon in Beijing who eyewitnessed the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, wrote a letter to President Hu Jintao demanding an apology for the period he spent in detention in 2004 and the subsequent months of house arrest. (See NCH Annual Report 2008).

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “China: Tiananmen’s Unhealed Wounds” (13 May 2009).]

In March 2009, Zhang Shijun (?1969–), a former soldier who took part in the military crackdown in Beijing on 3–4 June 1989 and who publicly expressed regret over his involvement, published an open letter to President Hu Jintao urging an official reassessment of the “June 4 tragedy, the event in China’s recent history that causes bitter weeping and choking back tears”. Zhang was detained by security forces shortly after his letter was made public, and his whereabouts were unknown.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “China: Tiananmen’s Unhealed Wounds” (13 May 2009).]

On 1 April 2009, the State Administration of Radio, Film, and TV issued detailed regulations including a ban on videos that show “distortions of Chinese culture or history”.

[Source: Freedom House, Ifex Alert (3 April 2009).]

On 2 April 2009, Jiang Qisheng (?1948–), deputy chairman of the Independent Chinese PEN Centre and a former Tiananmen Square student protester, was detained and questioned, due to concerns that he was writing an article to commemorate the 2009 anniversary of the Tiananmen Massacre. (See also NCH Annual Reports 2001 and 2003). He was warned against any activities commemorating the massacre. In March and May 2009, he had his home searched and documents and computers confiscated. Jiang was one of the original signatories of Charter 08, a human rights movement established on 10 December 2008, the sixtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Point 19 of Charter 08, read: “Transitional Justice. Rehabilitate the reputation of and give state compensation to the victims who suffered political persecution during past political movements as well as their families; release all political prisoners, prisoners of conscience, and people who are convicted because of their beliefs; establish a truth commission to restore historical truth, to pursue accountability and to fulfill justice; seek a settlement of the society on this foundation”. Other signatories included Ding Zilin (see above) and her husband Jiang Peikun.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, “China: Tiananmen’s Unhealed Wounds” (13 May 2009); Ifex Communiqué (3 June 2009); PEN American Center, Ifex Alert (2 April 2009).]

On 4 April 2009 (Qing Ming, the traditional day of remembering and honoring the dead), Sun Wenguang (?1934–), a retired professor of Shandong University, Jinan, Shandong Province, was beaten by five unidentified men as he returned from paying respects to the memory of the former Chinese Communist Party General Secretary, Zhao Ziyang (see below), and of Zhang Zhixin, a dissident killed during the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), at Jinan’s Martyrs’ Park. From 1966 on, Sun had been frequently harassed and imprisoned.

[Sources: Human Rights in China, “Retired Professor Attacked after Honoring Memory of Late Party Secretary Zhao Ziyang” (6 April 2009); Human Rights Watch, “China: Tiananmen’s Unhealed Wounds” (13 May 2009).]

On 14 May 2009, the secret memoirs of the former Chinese Communist Party General Secretary, Zhao Ziyang, Prisoner of the State: The Secret Journal of Zhao Ziyang (New York) were published. Dictated during his years of house arrest (1989–2005) and smuggled out on thirty 60-minute cassettes disguised as children’s music or Peking opera, the book gave insight into the workings of and schisms within the CCP Standing Committee. The publishers, Simon & Schuster, were so worried about news leaks of the book that they listed it as Untitled by Anonymous in their catalogue. The book was also translated and published in Chinese by New Century Press (Hong Kong), run by Bao Pu, a political commentator, human rights activist and the son of Zhao’s former chief of staff Bao Tong.

[Sources: Independent (15 May 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 334.]

After an interview on 23 May 2009 with the Dutch newspaper NRC Handelsblad about the forthcoming twentieth anniversary of the massacre, Li Hai (?1954–), a former student leader and former student of Marxist philosophy, went into hiding. He had already been imprisoned for six months after he tried to commemorate the 1989 massacre in June 1990. During this prison term, he was tortured. In 1995, he was harassed when he tried to commemorate and investigate the June 1989 events. In 1996, he was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment on charges of "prying into state secrets" for compiling a list of 600 names of those killed in June 1989 and handing it over to human rights organizations. Li spent the majority of his prison term in solitary confinement. After his release in 2003, he was frequently harassed by the police.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, "China: Tiananmen's Unhealed Wounds" (13 May 2009); NRC Handelsblad (23–24 May 2009) 1, 4.]

Tibet

On [11] September 2008, Rangjung (?1984–), a Tibetan writer, singer and television presenter, was reportedly arrested at his home in Amdo Golok (eastern Tibet), and held without charge, probably because of his outspoken pro-Tibetan views, as expressed, inter alia, on a web blog and in two books on Tibetan culture and history, Dhung shen kharpo (Pure Loyalty) and Himalaya Reboed (Himalaya Call for Hope).

[Source: International PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 31 December 2008 (London 2009) 53.]

Xinjiang

On 10 February 2009, Tohti Tunyaz (pen name: Tohti Muzart) (1959–), an Uighur historian and writer, was released at the end of his sentence. However, he was reportedly not able to rejoin his family in Japan. (See NCH Annual Reports 2000, 2001, 2003, 2004; see also http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/ca/22.pdf and four follow-ups).

[Sources: International PEN, Rapid Action Network (17 February 2009); Reporters without Borders, Press Release (20 February 2009).]

See also Nepal, Vietnam.

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 4 February and 20 July 2008, millions of people marched in Colombia and around the world in protest at kidnappings by the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC; Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia). Thousands of people had also taken to the streets in Colombia on 6 March 2008 to demand an end to human rights abuses by the security forces and paramilitary groups. Four months later, Jhon Fredy Correa Falla, a member of the Movimiento nacional de víctimas de crímenes de estado (National Movement of Victims of State Crimes), which organized the March protest, was shot dead by four gunmen on motorbikes.

X [name confidential] (1978–), a student of history with a bachelor degree in anthropology (1996–2003) completing her master's degree on the history of the feminist movement in Bogotá at the Universidad Nacional de Colombia, was one of the organizers of the march against violence. Less than a week later, she received a letter from a paramilitary group, the Aguilas Negras al Rearme, Bloque Metropolitano de Bogotá (Black Eagles) declaring that the organizers of the march had become military targets and would all be killed. X was the author of several articles in the area of gender and social movements in Colombia and co-author of a "Plan for Equal Opportunities" with the Mayor of Bogotá. She co-founded Hijos e hijas por la memoria y contra la impunidad (Sons and Daughters for Memory and against Impunity) after the assassination of her father. She went to the United States, where she continued her studies at Duke University, North Carolina.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 17; Scholars at Risk, Colo-528 (New York 2008).]

In 2008, the Attorney General's Office investigated cases of extrajudicial killings of civilians attributed to the Colombian army involving more than a thousand victims since mid-2003. Under pressure to show results, army members apparently took civilians from their homes or workplaces, killed them, and then dressed them up to claim they were combatants killed in action. The Defense Ministry issued directives indicating that such killings were impermissible. Such directives, however, were regularly undermined by statements from high government officials, including President Álvaro Uribe, who for years publicly denied that the problem existed, and accused human rights defenders reporting these killings of colluding with the guerrillas in an orchestrated campaign to discredit the military.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 173–174.]

Some 1,778 bodies of victims of enforced disappearance by paramilitaries were exhumed by the authorities from 1,441 graves between 2006 and 2008. By the end of 2008 the remains of only around 300 victims had been identified and returned to their families. The exhumations were dogged by serious deficiencies, making it more difficult to identify both the victims and the perpetrators.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 112.]

More than 130,000 victims of paramilitary violence made official claims for reparation under the Justice and Peace process. This process allows paramilitaries who have laid down their arms to benefit from significantly reduced prison sentences in return for confessions about human rights violations and reparations for their victims. However, 90 per cent of paramilitaries were not eligible for inclusion in the process and thus evaded justice. Threats against and killings of victims testifying in the process continued, while many paramilitaries failed to collaborate fully with the Justice and Peace tribunals, in particular failing to return land previously misappropriated by them.

In May 2008, fifteen national paramilitary leaders were extradited to the United States to face drugs-related charges. Their extradition followed claims by the Colombian government that they had failed to abide by the terms of the Justice and Peace process. The United States government maintained that Colombian investigators would have access to the extradited paramilitaries. However, concerns remained that the extradition had undermined investigations in Colombia into human rights violations committed by the paramilitaries and into the links the latter may have had with Colombian politicians and other state officials.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 112–113.]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In a February 2008 report, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Violence against Women concluded that “due to political interference and corruption, perpetrators, especially those who belong to the State security forces, go unpunished”. In one exceptional case, a military court in Katanga continued proceedings against Gedeon Kyungu Mutanga and 25 others accused of committing war crimes and crimes against humanity between 2004 and 2006, one of the largest war crimes trials in the history of the DRC.

The International Criminal Court (ICC) provided some hope for victims seeking justice. On 6 February 2008, the ICC took custody of Ituri warlord Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, who was charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. On 26 September 2008, the court confirmed the charges against Ngudjolo and Germain Katanga, another Ituri warlord arrested in 2007 and surrendered to the ICC in February 2008. The case was expected to go to trial in 2009. On 28 April 2008, the court unsealed an arrest warrant for Jean-Bosco Ntaganda, military chief of staff of the forces of rebel commander Laurent Nkunda’s National Congress for the Defense of the People (CNDP), for crimes allegedly committed in Ituri. Procedural errors in the prosecution of Thomas Lubanga Dyilo (the first person to be detained by the ICC in March 2006) delayed the proceedings. The temporary stay of proceedings was lifted in November 2008. The stay was imposed in June 2008 after the ICC trial chamber held that the withholding of potentially exculpatory evidence by the prosecution violated the right of the accused to a fair trial.

On 24 May 2008, Belgian authorities arrested Jean-Pierre Bemba, DRC Senator, leader of the Movement for the Liberation of Congo and former Vice-President of the DRC, at the request of the ICC to face charges of responsibility for war crimes and crimes allegedly carried out by his forces between October 2002 and March 2003 during the conflict in the Central African Republic. The ICC was also investigating the conduct of Bemba's troops in Congo, but has not filed charges in that case. [Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 127–128; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 63–64.]

See also Central African Republic, Uganda.

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In March 2008, the trial of General Ante Gotovina and two other generals began at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). The three were accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity, including persecution and murder committed during Operation Storm against rebel Serbs in Krajina between August and November 1995, during which around 200,000 ethnic Serbs were forced out of the region. While Croatia handed over all its indictees to the ICTY, they were criticized by the latter in June 2008 for failing to deliver all requested documents related to the Gotovina case, a charge rejected by Croatia.

According to a report of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), during the first nine months of 2008 there were twenty active war crimes trials across eight county courts in Croatia, involving 72 defendants, 45 of whom were Serb. Nine of the trials (involving seventeen defendants) reached final verdicts, with fourteen defendants convicted (eight Serbs, six Croats) and three acquitted (two Serbs, one Albanian). According to the report, the ethnicity of victims and perpetrators continued to affect the prosecution of war crimes cases. In the vast majority of prosecutions, the victims were ethnic Croats, and the perpetrators members of the Yugoslav Peoples Army (JNA) or Serbian paramilitary groups. There was a continuing failure to investigate most war crimes committed by the Croatian Army and police forces. Despite the fact that specialized war crimes chambers had been created in four county courts in 2003, they prosecuted only two cases in 2008, both for war crimes committed against Croatian Serbs. The vast majority of war crimes cases continued to be prosecuted by the local courts in the communities where the alleged crimes had been committed. In some cases witnesses refused to testify as they feared for their safety.

Little progress was made in establishing the whereabouts of more than 2,000 people still unaccounted for since the 1991–1995 war, although the Croatian authorities had assumed full responsibility from the International Committee of the Red Cross in 2007 for investigating these disappearances. Impunity for enforced disappearances remained a serious problem due to the failure of the authorities to conduct thorough investigations and bring perpetrators to justice.

In September 2008, the government indicated a willingness to extradite its citizens to neighboring countries to face trial on war crimes and other charges, “if other states were prepared to do the same”. Despite regional mechanisms for judicial cooperation, Croatia and Serbia prohibited the extradition of their citizens, widely seen as an impediment to war crimes accountability.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 118–119; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 355–356.]

See also Serbia.

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 4 January 2008, the Education and Culture Ministry of northern Cyprus announced that it had rewritten its history textbooks since 2004 (after the election of Turkish Cypriot President Mehmet Ali Talat). Minister Canan Öztoprak said that pictures of atrocities such as the mass murders of Turkish Cypriot civilians in December 1963 by the Greek Cypriot militia were deeply disturbing for children. Such pictures were removed and replaced with others that still explained the events but did not depict the atrocities in such detail. The textbooks also dropped such terms as “motherland” in reference to Turkey and used the words “Cypriot” and “people” to designate the two communities.

In October 2008, Greek Cypriot Education Minister Andreas Demetriou announced that the Greek Cypriot government would revise history textbooks to bolster peaceful coexistence between the Greek- and Turkish-speaking communities. Many Orthodox church leaders, including Archbishop Chrysostomos, nationalist politicians, and conservative teachers criticized the measure as undermining Cyprus’s “Hellenic” heritage. Equally controversial were the apportionment of responsibility for the intercommunal violence in 1963–1974 and the partition of 1974. In this respect, Demetriou declared that “Greek-Cypriot extremists” also bore some responsibility for the division of the island. While he called the partition “the 1974 tragedy”, the opposition referred to it as “the Turkish invasion”. A special committee chaired by President Demetris Christofias was set up to look at issues of educational reform and history education.

[Sources: Der Spiegel Online International (17 March 2009); Financial Times (28 October 2008); Keesings historisch archief (2008) 613; C. Makriyianni & C. Psaltis, “The Teaching of History and Reconciliation”, Cyprus Review (Spring 2007), 58; “North Adopts Fresh Approach to History”, Turkish Daily News (4 January & 13 October 2008).]

The United Nations Committee on Missing Persons continued its work to exhume and identify victims of the inter-ethnic conflict who have been missing since 1963. During 2008, the remains of 93 individuals were exhumed, and the remains of 39 were identified and returned to their families. These brought the total number of exhumations since 2004 to 466, and the total number of identified and returned remains to 110.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 122.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2000.

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

DJIBOUTI

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

In February 2008, the Truth Commission, set up in May 2007 to investigate human rights violations committed under the government of Leon Febres Cordero (1984–1988), began receiving testimonies. In September 2008, an interim report was issued. Former President Febres Cordero died in December 2008.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 131.]

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Widespread human rights violations committed during the internal armed conflict (1980–1992) remained unpunished and the 1993 amnesty law was still valid. In September 2008, the mandate of the Inter-Institutional Commission for the Search for Disappeared Children was extended, although the extension was only granted until 31 May 2009. The commission had been established in 2004 to clarify the whereabouts of some 700 children who were victims of enforced disappearance during the conflict. It was criticized for inefficiency and lack of independence because it located only thirty of the disappeared children.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 136.]

In November 2008, two human rights organizations filed a suit in a Spanish court against former President Alfredo Cristiani Burkard (in power during 1989–1994), and fourteen military officers in connection with the murder of six Jesuit priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in 1989.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 18, 136–137.]

ERITREA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ESTONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In May 2008, the Federal Supreme Court overturned earlier rulings and sentenced to death former President Mengistu Haile Mariam (in exile in Zimbabwe) and eighteen senior officials of his Dergue government (in power during 1974–1991). The prosecution had appealed against life imprisonment sentences passed in 2007, after the nineteen had been convicted by the Federal High Court of genocide and crimes against humanity perpetrated during the Dergue government.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 145.]

EUROPEAN UNION

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In April 2008, the European Union (EU) Council approved an amendment to the EU Framework Decision on Combating Terrorism, introducing new offenses of provocation and terrorist recruitment and training, including when committed on the Internet. The provocation offense gave rise to concern about criminalization of speech with little connection to terrorism. In September 2008, the European Parliament recommended narrowing the amendment, so that only speech intended to directly incite specific terrorism offenses would be criminalized.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 359.]

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

FINLAND

Last Annual Report entry: –.

See Rwanda.

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 18 November 2008, a report on “memory laws”, commissioned by the National Assembly, recommended that no new laws on historical truth and memory should be adopted. It indicated that it was not the role of Parliament to adopt laws which pre-judge the relative importance or value of historical facts, particularly when such laws include criminal sanctions. A week earlier, a group of historians and writers had published the Appel de Blois (Appeal of Blois) which maintained that it was not the business of any political authority to define historical truth and to restrict the liberty of historians by penal sanctions.

[Sources: Appel de Blois at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/to/162.pdf; Article 19, Ifex Alert (26 November 2008) at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/to/167.pdf.]

On 16 February 2009, the Council of State (the highest court) recognized the “responsibility” of the French State for the deportation of 76,000 Jews in 1942–1944 (during World War II). It declared that the then Vichy government had permitted or facilitated deportations that led to anti-Semitic persecution without being coerced by the occupiers. But it also found that reparations had since been made “as much as was possible, for all the losses suffered”. In 1995, then President Jacques Chirac had for the first time officially recognized state responsibility in the deportation of French Jews.

[Sources: BBC News (16 February 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 130–131.]

See also Rwanda, Thailand.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 1950, the Stadtschloss, the seventeenth-century palace of the Hohenzollern (the Prussian royal family) which was badly damaged in World War II, and other buildings (such as the city palace of Potsdam) were demolished as they were seen as reminders of Prussian militarism. The Schlossplatz on which it stood was renamed Marx-Engels Platz. In 1976, the Palast der Republik (East German parliament) came in the place of the Stadtschloss. In 2006–2008, the Palast itself was demolished. Plans to rebuild the Stadtschloss were at an advanced stage.

[Source: R. Bevan, The Destruction of Memory: Architecture at War (London 2006) 193–194.]

On 27 November 2008, Dutch-born singer and actor Johannes Heesters (1903–), believed to be the world's oldest performing actor, sued author and documentary filmmaker Volker Kühn, an expert on the history of cabaret, for reckless and defamatory statements because the latter had declared various times that Heesters had performed before Nazi guards during a visit to Dachau concentration camp on 21 May 1941. Heesters did not deny the visit, but rejected charges that he sang there. On 16 December 2008, a court in Berlin ruled that the statements were neither negligent nor defamatory. Although the judge declared that the question whether Heesters performed or not was unsolvable, he added that Heesters had not proven that the factual basis of Kühn's statement was untrue and that the latter had acted prudently in formulating his opinion because it was based on a videotaped 1990 interview with a former inmate, Viktor Matejka, since deceased, who said that he had been present at the performance. Kühn had uttered the accusation on a CD, Hitler und die Künstler: Mit den Wolfen geheult (2007; Hitler and the Artists: Crying with the Wolves), and in a February 2008 interview with a Dutch newspaper.

[Sources: K. Connolly, "Centenarian Rejects Claim He Sang for SS Troops in Nazi Death Camp", Guardian (28 November 2008); "Gericht weist Klage wegen angeblichem KZ-Auftritt ab—Historiker will Aussagen nicht wiederholen" (WWW-text; B2B Berlin 16 December 2008); "Gerichtsurteil: Historiker darf weiter von Heesters' SS-Auftritt sprechen" (WWW-text; Spiegel Online, 16 December 2008); Landgericht Berlin, "Johannes Heesters verliert Prozess um Äußerungen über Auftritt im Konzentrationslager Dachau” (Pressemitteilung Nr. 52/2008; WWW-text; 16 December 2008); NRC Handelsblad (20 October & 16 December 2008).]

On 25 February 2009, Horst Mahler (1936–), a former defense lawyer for members of the Rote Armee Fraction who had joined the extreme nationalist Nationaldemokratische Partei Deutschlands (NDP; National Democratic Party of Germany) between 2000 and 2003, was sentenced to six years’ imprisonment on charges of Volksverhetzung (hate speech) for Holocaust denial during a November 2007 interview. On 11 March 2009, he was sentenced to (a concurring) five years and two months’ imprisonment on a similar charge. Mahler had faced several legal charges in the past. In 2004, he was charged for Holocaust denial in connection with his founding role in the Verein zur Rehabilitierung der wegen Bestreitens des Holocaust Verfolgten (VRBHV; Society for the Rehabilitation of Those Persecuted for Refutation of the Holocaust). In 2006, his passport was revoked by the German authorities to prevent him from attending the “International Conference to Review the Global Vision of the Holocaust” in Tehran, Iran.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief (2009) 130, 194; “Horst Mahler”, Wikipedia (version 29 April 2009).]

See also Bulgaria, Greece, Russia, Rwanda, United Kingdom.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In November 2008, Polymeris Voglis (1964–), an assistant professor of contemporary history at the University of Thessaly and former post-doctoral fellow at Princeton (1999–2000), Columbia (2001), and New York (2002) universities, could not attend the conference “Cold War in the Mediterranean: Connecting the Fronts” at Columbia University, because he did not get a visa in time from the American embassy in Athens despite repeated reminders and an invitation letter from Columbia. He was scheduled to present a paper on the Marshall Plan in Greece. Voglis was the author of Becoming a Subject: Political Prisoners during the Greek Civil War (2002).

[Sources: A. Liakos, personal communication (November 2008); P. Voglis, personal communication (November 2008).]

On 22 December 2008, Konstantina Kuneva, who worked as a historian in Bulgaria and in 2001 became a migrant worker in Greece and trade union leader of the Attica Union of Cleaners and Domestic Workers, was attacked and seriously injured in Athens. The attack was allegedly connected with her trade union activities and followed an escalation of tension between her and her employers.

[Source: Amnesty International, “Greece: Investigate the Attack of Trade Union Leader” (7 March 2009).]

On 24 February 2009, a hand grenade was thrown at a facility of the Social and Political Rights Network (an immigrant support network headed by leftist activists) in Athens, causing material damage. The attack was reportedly carried out by neo-Nazis of Chryssi Avghi celebrating the anniversary of the founding of Germany’s Nazi party NSDAP on 24 February 1920. The Chryssi Avghi (Golden Dawn) Party openly supports National Socialism.

[Source: Ifex, Communiqué 18–9 (4 March 2009).]

In March and April 2009, the Sunday weekly Proto Thema, Greece’s largest newspaper, attacked Alexis Heraclidis, a professor at Panteion University, Athens, three times and accused him of “participating in a filthy campaign against our history” with his “anti-Greek” and “shameful” comments that in 1919 the Greeks engaged in ethnic cleansing against the Turks in Asia Minor (made in a state TV documentary) and that the Republic of Macedonia had a right to use that name (made in his university work). On 9 April 2009, there was a debate in Parliament in which his statements were rejected by the Deputy Minister of Education, who said that “his views cannot withstand criticism as they lack scholarly validity”. No colleagues reportedly came forward to defend him, on the contrary, some defamed him as well.

[Source: Ifex, Communiqué 18–9 (5 May 2009).]

On 5 and 12 July 2009, Proto Thema (see above) and some members of parliament of the far-right political party Laos (Popular Orthodox Rally Party) attacked Giorgos Kokkinos (1960–), an associate professor teaching history didactics and modern and contemporary European, Balkan and Greek history at the Aegean University, Rhodes, for “violating the constitution”, “not being patriotic enough” and “being a danger to the nation”, and called for his dismissal. The author of several books (including textbooks), Kokkinos was known for his inclusive views on Greek history. For a petition in his support, see http://www.petitiononline.com/mod_perl/signed.cgi?KOKKINOS&1.

[Sources: C. Gaganakis, personal communication (July 2009); V. Sakka, personal communication (July 2009).]

GRENADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In February 2008, President Álvaro Colom announced that all military archives relating to human rights violations committed during the internal armed conflict (1960–1996) would be made public, but the army refused to comply. However, the minister of defense had since delayed handing over the files, arguing that the constitution protected the confidentiality of documents related to national security. A new law passed in September 2008 challenged this argument: article 24 of the Law of Access to Public Information ordered that “in no circumstances can information related to investigations of violations of fundamental human rights or crimes against humanity” be classified as confidential. In March 2008, in a case brought against former high ranking army officers for alleged crimes against humanity, the Constitutional Court ruled that classified military documents be made public. At the end of 2008, the documents had still not been released.

The July 2005 discovery of an archive of the disbanded National Police (discovered by accident in July 2005 and containing an estimated 80 million documents on atrocities committed by security forces during 1881–1997, and especially during the internal armed conflict of 1960–1996, particularly the most violent years 1975–1985) could play a key role in the prosecution of those who committed human rights abuses during the conflict. By October 2008, the Human Rights Ombudsman’s Office had processed seven million of those documents, primarily related to cases presently under active investigation. The office planned to open the first part of the archive in 2009. Some of the archive’s 200 staff members received death threats.

In late March 2009, officials involved in opening the police archives and members of their families were threatened and attacked. On 25 March 2009, a day after the Human Rights Ombudsman (also called Special Prosecutor for Human Rights), Sergio Morales, had released the Special Report on the Historical Archives of the National Police: The Right to Know, his wife was kidnapped and tortured. One official was beaten up and a number of threats were made against other officials of Morales's office, including a bomb threat and a threat against the life of Morales himself. Activists hoped that information from the archives would serve as evidence in legal cases against hundreds of perpetrators of civil-war era human rights abuses.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 159; Amnesty International, "Threatened and Attacked: The Dangers Of Opening Guatemala's Police Files" (27 March 2009); Article 19, Ifex Alert (1 April 2009); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 182–183; Keesings historisch archief (2009) 216; Miami Herald (29 March 2009); NRC Handelsblad (28–29 March 2009) 31; S. Grainger, "Guatemala Scans Police Archive for Civil War Clues" (WWW-text; Reuters; 24 March 2009).]

Guatemala continued to suffer the effects of an internal armed conflict (1960–1996). A United Nations-sponsored truth commission estimated that as many as 200,000 people were killed during the 36-year war, and attributed the vast majority of the killings to government forces. Guatemalans seeking accountability for these abuses faced daunting obstacles. Attacks and threats against human rights defenders were commonplace, and posed a significant obstacle to their work. Others involved in human rights prosecutions were also routinely threatened or attacked, including forensic experts, plaintiffs, and witnesses. The Human Rights Ombudsman's Office documented nearly 200 attacks and threats against human rights defenders in 2007. Prosecutors and investigators received grossly inadequate training and resources. The courts routinely failed to resolve judicial appeals and motions in a timely manner, allowing defense attorneys to engage in dilatory legal maneuvering. The army and other state institutions resisted cooperating fully with investigations into abuses committed by current or former members. The police regularly failed to provide adequate protection to judges, prosecutors, and witnesses involved in politically sensitive cases.

In September 2007, the United Nations secretary-general appointed a Spanish former prosecutor and judge to lead the newly-created Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG). The commission's mandate was to work with the Attorney General's Office to investigate, prosecute, and dismantle the "clandestine groups" responsible for ongoing violence against human rights defenders. In its first year, the commission had taken on fifteen cases, which were seen as representative of the most entrenched problems of impunity. Yet as the CICIG acknowledged in its 2008 annual report, it was also "systematically obstructed" at times by the very corruption it sought to root out.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 182–183, 185.]

Of the 626 massacres documented by the truth commission, only three cases were successfully prosecuted in the Guatemalan courts. The third conviction came in May 2008, when five former members of a paramilitary “civil patrol” were convicted for the murders of 26 of the 177 civilians massacred in Rio Negro, Baja Verapaz department, in March 1982. A draft law to establish a commission to find victims of the estimated 45,000 enforced disappearances carried out during the internal armed conflict (1960–1996) was still awaiting approval by Congress.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 159; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 182.]

In a landmark ruling, Spain’s Constitutional Court held in September 2005 that, in accordance with the principle of universal jurisdiction, cases of alleged genocide committed during the civil war (1960–1996) could be prosecuted in the Spanish courts. In July 2006, a Spanish judge issued international arrest warrants for eight Guatemalans and the Spanish government requested their extradition in late 2006. However, in December 2007 the Guatemalan Constitutional Court ruled that two of the accused could not be extradited to Spain. Nevertheless, the Spanish court pushed ahead with the case: in February, May, and October 2008 it collected testimony from witnesses, victims, and experts on the conflict. Meanwhile, in Guatemala, the case continued to be held up by defense motions, while witnesses and experts were subjected to harassment and threats.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 185.]

GUINEA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

The Commission of Inquiry set up in 2007 to investigate grave human rights violations committed in 2006 and 2007 did not conduct any investigations. In May 2008, the commission president accused the government of freezing its financial support. In a statement in October 2008, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions expressed concern at the lack of progress and the failure to assure funding or to put in place a witness protection mechanism. He stated that the situation had all the hallmarks of a commission being used to distract attention and promote impunity.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 160.]

In October 2008, the government for the first time acknowledged responsibility for the political violence committed during the presidency of Ahmed Sekou Touré (in power during 1958–1984), but failed to reiterate an earlier commitment by Prime Minister Lansana Kouyaté to establish a truth commission to investigate the thousands of Guineans killed during Touré's regime.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 78–79.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: 1999.

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: 1997.

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, there was still no accountability with regard to the 1994 case involving the killing of civilians in Raboteau by soldiers and paramilitaries during the military government (1991–1994). In 2005, the Supreme Court overturned the convictions of fifteen former soldiers and paramilitaries in the case.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 188.]

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: 2002.

By the end of 2008, the principal recommendation of the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, which called on the government to carry out a comprehensive investigation to clarify cases of enforced disappearances during the 1980s and 1990s, had not been implemented. In 2007, the Working Group had reported on 125 cases of disappearance that remained to be clarified.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 165.]

On 21 July 2009, a few weeks after President Manuel Zelaya was ousted from power by the military and expelled from the country during a constitutional crisis on 28 June 2009, the new Minister of Culture Myrna Castro dismissed Natalie Roque Sandoval, director of the Centro Documental de Investigaciones Históricas de Honduras (CDIHH; containing the National Archives, the Ethnohistorical Archives and the Specialized Anthropology Library) when Roque publicly opposed military occupation of the CDIHH premises. Press releases about the past of de facto President Roberto Micheletti were allegedly destroyed. In late July 2009, the International Council on Archives issued the following statement on the Honduran archives: “As the international non-governmental organization which aims to advance the cause of archives worldwide, ICA wishes to express its professional concern about reports that the building housing the national archives in Honduras has been occupied by military personnel, creating a situation which could cause harm to some of the archives kept there. ICA believes that it is timely to remind the international community that the rule of law and the protection of citizens’ rights depend on the preservation of archives, which provide evidence of key decisions and entitlements. It is also an inescapable duty of all civilized societies to look after their archives, because they transmit the collective memory from one generation to another. Without its archives, a country will lose its history, memory and identity”.

[Sources: N. Roque Sandoval, “Honduras: Los golpistas contra la cultura” (WWW-text; Argenpress Cultural, 31 July 2009); International Council on Archives, [Statement on Honduran Archives] ([July] 2009).]

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In October 2008, the extreme rightist Magyar Garda (Hungarian Guard) disturbed the commemoration of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. In December 2008, the organization was banned. [Source: Keesings historisch archief (2009) 80.]

See also Slovakia.

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In February 2008, Jodhaa Akbar, a film about Mughal Emperor Akbar (1542–1605) by director Ashutosh Gowariker, was banned in the states of Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, Haryana, and Uttarakhand because their governments feared that certain communities that felt they were misrepresented might turn violent. The Supreme Court overturned the ban.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/08: 167.]

On 5 June 2008, pro-Marathi activists from the Shiv Sangram group attacked the house of Kumar Ketkar, editor of Loksatta, because it had contained articles critical of the state government and the latter's decision to erect a statue of Marathi Emperor Shivaji (1627–1680), the leader who had opposed Mughal domination and became founder of the Maratha State.

[Sources: The Hindu (13 June 2006); Index on Censorship, 3/08: 205.]

In May 2009, the standard seventh textbook of the National Council for Educational Research and Training (NCERT) was criticized by the Hindu nationalist Hindu Janajagruti Samiti (HJS; established 2002) for “glorifying foreign history while not giving Indian history due significance”. Some critics also found too much information on the Mughals and too little on Maratha King Shivaji (1627–80; Shivaji had opposed Mughal domination and became founder of the Maratha State). Two chapters termed objectionable by teachers and parents would be reviewed and possibly taken out by the Goa Board of Secondary and Higher Secondary Education (GBSHSE) after a GBSHSE committee recommendation.

[Source: Times of India (17 May 2009).]

On 20 August 2009, Jinnah: India, Partition, Independence (2009), a book written by Jaswant Singh (1938–), a leader of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) who had served as finance and external affairs minister, was banned in Gujarat. The book examined the role of Ali Jinnah, Pakistan's first governor-general, Jawaharlal Nehru, India's first prime minister, and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, of Gujarati origin and India's first home minister, in the 1947 partition of India, and argued that the latter two, members of the Congress Party, had been more responsible for the partition than Jinnah and that Jinnah had been “demonized” in India. He added that Jinnah did not “win” Pakistan but that Nehru and Patel “conceded” it to him. On 19 August 2009, the BJP had “dissociated” itself from the book and expelled Singh from the party. In 2005, BJP leader Lal Krishna Advani had already been criticized for describing Jinnah as “a secular leader”.

[Sources: BBC News (18 & 20 August 2009); Times of India (14 August 2009).]

Jammu and Kashmir. Impunity continued for past offences including enforced disappearances of thousands of people during the armed conflict in Kashmir since 1989.

Gujarat. Those responsible for the violence in 2002 in which thousands of Muslims were attacked and more than 2000 killed largely continued to evade justice. The Mumbai High Court made limited progress towards accountability by convicting twelve people in January 2008 for an incident of sexual assault.

Punjab. Many of the police officers responsible for serious human rights violations between 1984 and 1994 were not brought to justice. Findings of an inquiry by the Central Bureau of Investigation into allegations of unlawful killings of 2,097 people cremated by police had not been made fully public.

Assam. No action was taken on findings by the Commission of Inquiry published in 2007 according to which the unlawful killings of 35 individuals between 1998 and 2001 were carried out at the behest of a former chief minister and the state police.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 170.]

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In January 2008, former President Suharto died without having faced prosecution for abuses committed during his rule (1965/67–1998). The list of abuses was extensive, and included anticommunist pogroms that killed half a million or more people in 1965–1966, and atrocities by security forces in East Timor, Aceh, southern Sumatra, and Papua. Many collaborators in Suharto-era abuses still held positions of power. Several were candidates for the 2009 elections, including General Wiranto and Suharto’s son-in-law Prabowo Subianto, implicated in abuses in East Timor and other crimes.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 259.]

In March 2008, the Supreme Court overturned the conviction of former militia leader Eurico Guterres for instigating violence following the 1999 United Nations-sponsored referendum on independence for East Timor (now Timor-Leste), in which militias backed by the Indonesian-army killed hundreds of Timorese and destroyed much of East Timor's physical infrastructure. With the reversal of the conviction, all eighteen people indicted by the Indonesian Ad Hoc Human Rights Court on East Timor were acquitted.

In July 2008, the Indonesian and Timorese joint Commission on Truth and Friendship (CTF), established to document crimes committed in Timor-Leste in 1999 and promote reconciliation, released its final report. It allocated institutional responsibility for gross human rights violations to pro-autonomy militia groups, and to the Indonesian army, civilian government and police. The Indonesian government welcomed the report and expressed its regret over the events of 1999, but stopped short of offering an apology. The CTF's mandate prevented it from pursuing its own prosecutions, and it did not name violators. Concerns about impunity led the United Nations to boycott the CTF's investigations and instead resume prosecutions through the Serious Crime Unit and Timor-Leste prosecutors.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 172, 324; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 260.]

In November 2008, Pretext for Mass Murder (Madison 2006), a book on the 1965 coup by John Roosa, and A Not-so-Distant Horror: Mass Violence in East Timor (Ithaca 2005) by Joseph Nevins, were investigated by the Attorney General. The second book contained what the Commission of Truth and Friendship (established jointly by Indonesia and Timor-Leste to document crimes committed in Timor-Leste in 1999) had already officially established as facts.

[Sources: M. Hammer, personal communication (November 2008); S. Prasetyo, personal communication (August 2009).]

In late November 2008, at the request of House Speaker Agung Laksono, the Attorney General Office investigated the Indonesian translation of Legacy of Ashes: The History of the CIA (2007), a book written by New York Times journalist and Pulitzer Prize winner Tim Weiner, because it included a claim by a former Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) official that Adam Malik, a top diplomat and later minister of foreign affairs and vice president (1978–1983), had been a CIA agent in 1964 to promote the anti-communist cause in Indonesia.

[Sources: Asia Media (WWW-text; 1 December 2008); Indonesia Matters (WWW-text; 26 November 2008); Jakarta Post (24 November 2008).]

Aceh

In 2008, accountability for past human rights violations committed during or after the Aceh conflict (1976–2005) was still lacking. No truth and reconciliation commission was established. In August 2008, a United States court ruled that a lawsuit against Exxon Mobil for alleged complicity in military abuses in Aceh could proceed to trial.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 260, 262.]

Maluku

Twenty-one men who performed a traditional war dance in front of President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono culminating in the unfurling of the banned “Benang Raja” flag were sentenced to between 7 and 20 years’ imprisonment for “rebellion” in trials throughout 2008.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 171.]

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In August 2008, security forces forcibly prevented a peaceful gathering at an unmarked graveyard in Tehran to mark the twentieth anniversary of mass executions starting in 1988 for which no one was held accountable. At least three people were subsequently sentenced to prison terms for participating in the commemoration, or planning to do so.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 174.]

In December 2008, the Center for Human Rights Defenders was forcibly closed by security officials shortly before it was to hold an event commemorating the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 173.]

See also Azerbaijan, Germany.

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In February 2008, parliament passed legislation intended to refine procedures for vetting former Baath Party members. The new law focused on group affiliation rather than individual responsibility for past abuses. At the same time, an amnesty law was passed partly aimed at easing overcrowding in the detention system, but it had a limited impact on the number of detainees.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 465.]

In November 2008, the religious authority in Najaf renewed its objections to the history textbooks of the Saddam Hussein era that were still in use, and demanded a right to study Shiite history. The Director of Education in Najaf, Majid Sudani said, however, that in 2007 he had consulted Ayatollah Ali Al Sistani, the senior Shiite cleric in Iraq, who had declared that he was against sectarian curricula and in favor of a unified curriculum for all religious sects.

[Sources: Asharq Alawsat (13 November 2008); The Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI), Special Dispatch No. 970 (26 August 2005).]

The Supreme Iraqi Criminal Tribunal (SICT) continued to try former senior officials, Ba'ath party members, military officers and others associated with the former presidency of Saddam Hussain (1979–2003). Trials were marred by political interference undermining SICT's independence and impartiality. In September 2008, it was reported that the Iraq government had engineered the dismissal of one of the judges who had tried Saddam shortly before the year-long trial ended in 2006, replacing the judge with one considered more likely to support the imposition of the death penalty. In May 2008, the SICT began trying former foreign minister and deputy prime minister Tariq Aziz, along with seven other defendants, for the former government's execution of merchants accused of profiteering while Iraq was subject to sanctions in 1992. On 2 December 2008, the SICT imposed death sentences on Ali Hassan al-Majid and Abdul Ghani Abdul Ghafour, both senior officials under Saddam, after convicting them of involvement in thousands of killings during the 1991 uprising in southern Iraq.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 178; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 468.]

See also Azerbaijan.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 24 September 2008, Polish-born Zeev Sternhell (1935–), a Holocaust survivor, a veteran who fought in the wars of 1967, 1973, and 1982, a specialist in fascist history, professor of political science and director of the Center for European Studies, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, was slightly wounded in a bomb attack reportedly launched by ultranationalist Israelis. As a member of Peace Now (an Israeli group campaigning against settlement building), Sternhell was a well-known critic of Jewish settlement in the occupied West Bank and of the Israeli blockade of the Gaza Strip. Before the attack, he had received threats by telephone.

[Sources: BBC News (25 September 2008); International PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 31 December 2008 (London 2009) 91.]

On 14 December 2008, Richard Falk, a Jewish-American professor of international law at Princeton University and United Nations Special Rapporteur on Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories (2008–), was forbidden entry into Israel because he had compared Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to Nazi atrocities and described Israel's embargo on Gaza, which was controlled by Hamas, as a crime against humanity. After subjecting him to an extensive body search, authorities detained him overnight in a small cell with five other persons before deporting him on a flight to the United States. The Israeli Foreign Ministry called Falk's United Nations mandate "biased and distorted" because it only covered Israeli human rights and humanitarian law violations.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, "Israel: Reverse Expulsion of Human Rights Rapporteur" (17 December 2008); I. Kershner, "U.N. Rights Investigator Expelled by Israel", New York Times (16 December 2008); NRC Handelsblad (16 December 2008) 4.]

In 2009, Rafi Greenberg, a senior lecturer in archaeology at the University of Tel Aviv, was denied entry on the City of King David (Ir David) excavations, Jerusalem, after many years of collaboration in them, reportedly because he criticized the politicization of the project. Greenberg had suggested that public trust in the fact that the excavations unearthed the palace of King David (1000 BCE) (who was seen as the King who unified Israel) could legitimize the Jewish claim on the Palestinian quarter of Silwan where its ruins were located.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (18–19 April 2009), Science, 8–9.]

On 24 May 2009, a governmental panel supported a bill brought to parliament to ban Israeli Arabs from commemorating the Nakbah (the “Catastrophe”: the 1948 Palestinian expulsion and dispossession) on 15 May (the day Israelis celebrate their Independence Day). Proposed by Yisrael Beiteinu (“Israel Our Home”), the party of far-right Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman “to strengthen unity in the state of Israel”, it was widely condemned.

[Source: BBC News (25 May 2009).]

See also Lebanon, Palestinian Authority, United States.

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

See Uruguay.

IVORY COAST (Côte d’Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, the United Nations (UN) Security Council had still not made public the findings of the UN Commission of Inquiry into serious violations of human rights and international humanitarian law since September 2002, which had been handed to the UN secretary-general in November 2004. In September 2003, the Ivorian government accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) over serious crimes. However, as in previous years, the government consistently undermined a planned ICC mission to assess the possibility of opening an investigation into such crimes.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 58.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Parliaments in Taiwan and South Korea passed resolutions calling for justice for the survivors of Japan's military sexual slavery system during World War II. The United Nations Human Rights Committee recommended that Japan apologize and accept legal responsibility for the "comfort women" system. The city councils of Takarazuka, Kiyose, and Sapporo passed resolutions calling on the Japanese government to resolve this issue.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 191.]

In January 2009, the controversy regarding the mass suicides after the 1945 battle of Okinawa (see NCH Annual Report 2008) was reignited. On 3 February 2009, the government decided not to insert a special Battle of Okinawa clause into textbook screening guidelines that would give "special consideration" to passages about the history of Okinawa.

[Sources: Japan Times (4 February 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2008) 109–110; Telegraph (9 January 2009).]

On 9 April 2009, the Education, Science and Technology Ministry released details of two textbooks that passed its 2008 screening process, including a controversial history textbook written by members of the Japanese Society for History Textbook Reform. The textbook, Chugakko Shakai Rekishi (Middle School Social Studies and History; published by Jiyu Sha), was an updated edition of a former textbook, Atarashii Rekishi Kyokasho (New History Textbook; published by Fusosha). According to ministry officials, nearly 300 parts of the textbook had to be edited as part of the screening process. For example, a passage that said that the Imperial Japanese Army "was unable to prevent improper killing and abuse" of prisoners of war and civilians during the war was changed to a sentence saying that Japan had "committed improper murders and abuse, and caused great damage".

[Source: Asian News/Yomiuri Shimbun (10 April 2009).]

See also Korea (North), Korea (South).

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

In January and February 2008, widespread violence followed the disputed December 2007 presidential and parliamentary elections. In the worst outbreak of ethnic and partisan conflict since independence in 1963, over 1,100 people were killed, over 350,000 people were internally displaced, and property worth millions of dollars was destroyed. International mediation produced a coalition government in March 2008. In October 2008, the Commission of Inquiry on Post Election Violence (CIPEV) that had investigated the violence of 2007–2008 submitted its report to the government. The CIPEV recommendations covered individual criminal responsibility of alleged perpetrators of the violence, police reform, the incorporation into domestic legislation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) and constitutional reforms. The CIPEV key recommendation was for the government to establish a Special Tribunal to investigate and prosecute perpetrators of the violence. If the government failed to do this, the CIPEV recommended that the cases be referred to the ICC for investigation. In November 2008, the government formed a cabinet committee headed by President Mwai Kibaki and the prime minister to implement the report. In December 2008, the government announced that the committee would prepare a draft bill to establish a Special Tribunal to investigate and prosecute alleged perpetrators of the post-election violence. However, by the end of 2008, the government had not announced a comprehensive plan of action to implement the report or guarantees that victims of human rights abuses would receive reparations. Parliament, however, enacted an International Crimes Act to incorporate the ICC Rome Statute into domestic law.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 8, 195–196; Human Rights Watch, Give Parliament Time to Enact Necessary Legislative and Constitutional Amendments (23 December 2008); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 82.]

In October 2008, parliament passed a law establishing a Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC), in accordance with the political mediation agreement signed in March 2008. The TJRC mandate would be to investigate human rights violations, including those committed by the state, groups or individuals, between 12 December 1963 and 28 February 2008. The law contained a number of provisions which breached international law and best practice standards: these included provisions allowing the TJRC to recommend amnesty for crimes under international law such as torture, enforced disappearance, and extrajudicial executions, and provisions creating obstacles to prosecutions of crimes under international law. The law did not guarantee a comprehensive protection program for victims and witnesses, and fell short of ensuring a broad range of reparations for victims of human rights violations. By the end of 2008, the TJRC had not been formed.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 196; Article 19, Ifex Alert (3 November 2008).]

On 21 February 2009, around 23 members of Bunge la Mwananchi (People's Parliament, a civil society forum purporting to offer an alternative to the official Kenyan National Assembly) were reportedly arrested after attending readings commemorating two victims of assassination: Mau Mau leader Kimathi Wa Chiuri (Dedan Kimathi; 1920–1957) and journalist, politician and member of parliament Pio Gama Pinto (1927–1965). They were charged with “being members of an illegal sect”.

[Source: International Pen Writers in Prison Committee, Rapid Action Network RAN 13/09 (24 February 2009).]

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

North Korea's widespread policy of enforced disappearance practised since the Korean War (1950–1953) continued. Family members of suspected dissidents disappeared under the principle of “guilt by association”. The authorities, however, still refused to acknowledge the use of enforced disappearances. In 2008, the issue of foreigners allegedly abducted by North Korea mostly in the 1970s and 1980s remained unresolved. South Korea said that 496 of its citizens, abducted by North Korean agents, remained in North Korea against their will, but North Korea denied this. However, in August 2008, North Korean officials agreed to re-open investigations into the fate and whereabouts of several Japanese nationals who had disappeared in previous decades. They admitted that North Korea had abducted thirteen Japanese—returning five to Japan in 2002, but claiming that the other eight died—and that no other Japanese citizens were abducted. Japan insists that several more of its citizens were abducted.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 200; Human Rights Watch, World

Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 283–284.]

See also Korea, South.

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In January 2008, President-elect Lee Myung-bak said he would not call on Japan to apologize for its wartime atrocities. In October 2008, the South Korean parliament passed a resolution calling for justice for the survivors of Japan's military sexual slavery system during World War II.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 201.]

In February 2008, President Lee Myung-bak took office with a pledge to change South Korea's policies on North Korea, saying he would speak out on the latter's human rights record and demand the return of South Korean prisoners of war and abductees. Under former Presidents Kim Dae-jung and Roh Mu-hyun, both of whom had summit meetings with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, South Korea offered large amounts of aid and started major economic projects in North Korea, but largely remained silent on human rights violations.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 284.]

In early October 2008, the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology announced that it would intervene in the revision process for an authorized six-volume high school history textbook entitled A Modern and Contemporary History of Korea (published by Kumsung Publishers) written by, inter alii, Kim Han-jong, a history education professor at the Korea National University of Education, and Hong Soon-kwon, a history professor, ostensibly "to establish the legitimacy of the Republic of Korea". On 9 October 2008, the Joint Committee on Resolving the Textbook Issue, a newly formed coalition of history associations (including the Association for Korean Historical Studies, the Korean Association of History Education, and the National History Teachers Association) and civic organizations (including the Institute for Research in Collaborationist Activities) declared that the plan damaged the textbook authorization system and undermined the neutrality of education as guaranteed by the Constitution. On 14 October 2008, the ministry set up a committee of experts (teachers, professors, and school supervisors) after the governmental National History Compilation Committee (which had authorized the textbook in 2002, 2004, and 2005) had declined to give its opinion on 253 items which were listed in a revision request by various conservative groups (including members of the ruling Grand National Party and the New Right group Textbook Forum) who had criticized the textbooks as too friendly to North Korea, anti-United States, and leftist. Authorization would be revoked if the ministry's demands for revision were not accepted. On 16 October 2008, the official National Institute of Korean History (NIKH) submitted a report entitled "A Review of A Modern and Contemporary History of Korea and Proposed Guidelines" to the ministry with its judgment on 49 of the 253 items, which was meant to serve as a guideline for the textbook's revision. One of the NIKH comments was that, after the Korean War (1950–1953), the Republic of Korea (South Korea) emphasized economic development and deterred communist threats by deferring democracy. On 30 October 2008, the ministry demanded that the authors of this and five other textbooks delete or revise 55 sections that "undermined the legitimacy of the South Korean government".

One textbook (published by the Institute for Better Education) stipulated that President Syngman Rhee, South Korea's founding president (1948–1960) but called an anti-communist by liberals, exploited the North Korean threat to "shore up his dictatorial regime". The Defense Ministry demanded that the passage be rewritten as "He did his best to contain Communism". The Kumsung textbook stipulated that President Park Chung Hee (in power 1961–1979), a military strongman who came to power in a coup in 1961, was "a president who placed himself above the nation's Constitution". The Defense Ministry demanded that this was to be replaced with: "a president who contributed to the nation's modernization". The Ministry of Unification demanded that the term "sunshine policy" (the South Korean doctrine toward North Korea during the administration of former President Kim Dae-jung [1998–2008]) be described as a "policy of reconciliation and cooperation". The authors rejected the interference as a beautification of Korea's history, overlooking Korean collaboration with the Japanese occupiers and postwar dictatorships, and as reminiscent of the censorship of those dictatorships.

Professional historians such as Ju Jin-oh (Chu Chin-oh), a history professor at Sangmyung University, declared that such revisions would be contrary to the current curriculum (which said that the rule of Presidents Syngman Rhee and Park Chung-hee was dictatorial), created in 1997, and thus tended to justify the authoritarian rule of the past as an unavoidable consequence of the Korean War (1950–1953). Another historian, Lee Tae-jin, chairman of the Korean History Department at Seoul National University and the dean of the College of Humanities, however, criticized the textbook for its liberal bias; as a result, Lee declared, there was a tendency to highlight only the popular uprisings in contemporary history, while ignoring the Korean Empire period and the period of enlightenment for Korea. The shift of the ministry from a unification to a national security perspective was ascribed to the hardening of the South-North relations under the conservative government of President Lee Myung-bak, elected in February 2008.

[Sources: Chosun Ilbo (26 February 2009); The Hankyoreh (22 September 2008; 9–10 & 17–18 & 20 & 28 October 2008; 15 January 2009); International Herald Tribune (17 November 2008); New York Times (17 November 2008).]

See also Japan, Korea, North.

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: –.

See Uzbekistan.

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

More than two years after the end of the 2006 war between Israel and Hizbollah, neither the Israeli nor the Lebanese government has investigated the violations of the laws of war committed by the warring parties. The estimated one million cluster bombs left behind by Israel's bombing campaign continued to harm civilians. Israel persisted in its refusal to turn over detailed information on the location of the areas that had been target of the cluster attacks. In July 2008, the bodies of two Israeli soldiers captured by Hizbullah from northern Israel in July 2006 were handed over to Israel in exchange for five Lebanese prisoners, four of them Hizbullah members, and the human remains of almost 200 Arab nationals.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 207; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 486, 488.]

Little action was taken to address impunity for political killings, enforced disappearances, torture and other abuses committed during the civil war (1975–1990) and since. In 1992, the Lebanese authorities said that more than 17,000 people had disappeared while in the custody of the parties to the conflict. There was no new information about some 650 Lebanese and other nationals reported to have disappeared when held by the Syrian authorities after they were abducted or detained in Lebanon. An official joint Syrian-Lebanese committee established in May 2005 to investigate such cases had not published any findings. In August 2008, the authorities said they were “committed to pursuing the issue of Lebanese citizens who are missing or detained in Syria”. However, the government took no practical steps to uncover mass graves or collect information on the disappeared.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 207; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 486, 488.]

In [2008], the Israeli film Waltz with Bashir was banned despite documenting an important period of modern Lebanese history and winning a Golden Globe for Best Foreign Film. The film depicts the September 1982 killings of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps that took place by Lebanese militias following the assassination of Lebanese President Bashir Gemayel. Film director Ari Folman also briefly examined the role of the Israeli government in the killings, as Lebanon was under Israeli occupation at the time. The ban was part of a larger prohibition of any goods that originated from Israel.

[Source: Article 19, Artist Alert (WWW-text; January 2009).]

On 2 December 2008, the 11th report was issued of the United Nations International Independent Investigation Commission on its investigations into the killing of former Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri and 22 others in February 2005 and twenty other bombings and assassinations. The Special Tribunal for Lebanon, which would further investigate and prosecute the cases, was scheduled to begin functioning on 1 March 2009. In August 2008, Ayman Tarabay and Moustapha Talal Mesto, two of nine men detained without charge since 2005 in connection with the investigation into the Hariri killing, were released on bail. The seven others continued to be detained without charge or trial even though the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention ruled in November 2007 that six of them were arbitrarily detained.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 207; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 490.]

See also Syria.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, the Liberian Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), which had since its creation in 2006 been plagued with leadership, transparency, and operational problems, showed significant improvement. From January to September 2008, the TRC conducted well-attended, countrywide hearings in which over 500 victims and some 35 former faction leaders testified. One session took place in the United States, the first time TRC hearings have been held outside the country where the violations occurred. They were followed by institutional and thematic hearings that were continuing at the end of 2008. The victims described war crimes committed by all sides in the conflict (1979–2003), while perpetrators often failed to admit violations or ask forgiveness, and appeared to use the hearings to absolve them of their guilt. In September 2008, the TRC made a request to the Special Court for Sierra Leone for former President Charles Taylor to testify. TRC commissioners were praised for having brought the perpetrators to testify, but also criticized for their lack of rigorous questioning, thus failing to ensure a more accurate historical account. Questions remained about whether TRC commissioners should act on their power to recommend individuals for prosecution, as included in their mandate; and whether the Liberian judicial system would be able and willing to try these cases. In December 2008, however, in an effort to call on alleged perpetrators to attend hearings, the TRC published a list of 198 names of alleged perpetrators who refused to appear and respond to allegations against them.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 209–210; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 87, 90.]

In March 2008, an appeal court in the Netherlands overturned the conviction of Gus Kouwenhoven who had been found guilty of breaking a United Nations arms embargo by supplying weapons to former President Charles Taylor during Liberia's conflict. The appeals court followed the district court by acquitting Kouwenhoven of charges of war crimes.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 210.]

In September 2008, Charles "Chuckie" Taylor, Jr., the son of former Liberian president Charles Taylor, went on trial in the United States (US) accused of torture while he headed Liberia's Anti-Terrorist Unit (ATU). On 30 October 2008, the jury found the defendant guilty on all counts. The case against Taylor, an American citizen, was the first brought under the US Torture Victim Protection Act (enacted in 1994 to allow charges against a person accused of torture abroad if the accused was in the US or was an American citizen). It was also the first prosecution for war crimes committed in Liberia. Sentencing was due in early 2009.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 209–210; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 90.]

See also Sierra Leone.

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

The State Security Court sentenced Idriss Boufayed and ten others to prison terms of up to 25 years after being convicted on vaguely worded charges, including "attempting to overthrow the political system”, “spreading false rumours about the Libyan regime”, and “communication with enemy powers”. In February 2007, they had been arrested after Boufayed and three others issued a statement about a planned peaceful protest to commemorate the killing of at least twelve people during a demonstration in February 2006 in Benghazi. In October 2008, Idriss Boufayed was released, as were eight of his co-defendants in November 2008. No explanation was given for the releases. Two men sentenced with them remained in prison.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 47, 212.]

The authorities failed to address the long-standing pattern of impunity for perpetrators of gross human rights violations. No public information was made available about the investigation into events in 1996 at Tripoli’s Abu Salim Prison in which hundreds of prisoners were allegedly killed. The only organization permitted to address human rights, the Society of Human Rights of the Gaddafi International Charity and Development Foundation (GDF), announced that a preliminary report establishing criminal and legal responsibility for the incident would be submitted to the judicial authorities, but gave no date. In June 2008, it was reported that the North Benghazi court ordered the authorities to disclose the fate of some 30 prisoners who were feared to have died in detention during the events at Abu Salim, but they failed to provide any public information. Some reports suggested that the authorities had agreed to pay financial compensation to about 35 families of prisoners who died in return for their agreement not to seek judicial redress. The authorities took no steps to address the legacy of gross human rights violations committed in earlier years, notably the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, including the enforced disappearance of hundreds of critics and opponents of the government. Many are feared to have died or been killed in custody.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 212–213.]

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

On 17 June 2008, a new law banned the public use of Nazi and Soviet symbols such as the swastika, hammer and sickle, national anthems, and portraits of leaders.

[Source: Keesings historisch archief (2008) 678.]

See also Belarus, Russia.

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

See Greece.

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

In October 2008, journalist, historian, and politician Mohamed Nasheed won the presidential elections with 54 per cent of the votes. (See NCH Annual Report 2006).

[Source: Keesings historisch archief (2009) 287.]

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2002.

Although slavery was officially abolished in 1981 and made a criminal offence in 2007, evidence indicated the continued existence of the practice. People were believed to be held in forced labor or slavery in the regions of Tiris Zemour and Nema. In September 2008, a former slave wrote to the authorities asking them to look for fourteen members of his family still held in slavery in Tiris Zemour.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 223.]

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 12 April 2007, President Felipe Calderón signed a law (passed by the federal Parliament) decriminalizing defamation and insult. The federal Senate declared it was for “civil court judges to decide if persons, journalists and communicators act within or outside the law when they disseminate information or opinions, by eliminating the possibility of a prison sentence for any abuse of freedom of expression”. These would henceforth be punishable by fines or the award of damages. “Under no circumstances” were the negative opinions of literary, artistic, historical, scientific or professional critics to be considered “attacks on the honor” of a person or institution.

[Source: C. Wendell, The Right to Offend, Shock or Disturb: A Guide to Evolution of Insult Laws in 2007 and 2008 (Reston, VA, 2009) 93.]

During its five-year existence, the Special Prosecutor’s Office that former President Vicente Fox established in 2001 to address abuses committed during the “dirty war” in the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s made very limited progress in investigating and prosecuting these crimes. It did not obtain a single criminal conviction. Of the more than 600 “disappearance” cases, it filed charges in sixteen cases and obtained indictments in nine. The office determined the whereabouts of only six “disappeared” individuals, finding that four were sent to psychiatric institutions and two were killed while in detention. After President Felipe Calderón officially closed the office, the cases were transferred to another, non-specialized office within the federal Attorney General’s Office, which did not make significant advances in the investigations.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 226; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 192–193.]

On 25 or 26 July 2008, Miguel Ángel Gutiérrez Ávila (?1955–2008), an anthropologist, author of a number of books on the indigenous people of Guerrero state and activist for the rights of the Amuzgo people, was killed (probably beaten to death) while driving toward Chilpancingo de los Bravo, the capital of Guerrero. His filming equipment was stolen. Between 23 and 25 July 2008, he had visited the Suljaa’ and Cozoyoapan communities in Costa Chica, Guerrero, for a documentary film on indigenous cultures and traditions, entitled “La Danza del Tigre” (The Dance of the Tiger). During his visit, he had also documented alleged human rights violations by the authorities against the staff of the a local community radio station Radio Ñomndaa/La Palabra del Agua (The Word of the Water). According to local press reports, one lead pointed to the involvement of Aceadeth Rocha Ramírez, mayor of the municipality of Xochistlahuaca in Costa Chica and allegedly one of a number of local political leaders opposed to indigenous movements and Radio Ñomndaa. Another lead suggested that Gutiérrez had angered the authorities by filming members of the Agencia Federal de Investigación (AFI; Federal Investigations Agency) as they raided the radio station. Gutiérrez's publications included La tradición oral afromestiza en México (1985; The afromestizo oral tradition), Déspotas y caciques: una antropología política de los Amuzgos de Guerrero (2001; Despots and caciques: a political anthropology of the Amuzgos of Guerrero) and La historia del estado de Guerrero a través de su cultura: una perspectiva antropológica (2008; The history of the state of Guerrero through its culture: an anthropological perspective).

[Sources: International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-Yearly Caselist To 31 December 2008 (London 2009) 33; Idem, Rapid Action Network 42/08, Update 1 (29 July 2009).]

On 2 October 2008, the 40th anniversary of the Tlatelolco Square massacre, when government forces gunned down protesters in Mexico City in circumstances that have never been sufficiently clarified, those responsible were no closer to being held to account. A federal court review of a previous ruling that former President Luis Echeverría Álvarez should not stand trial for genocide in connection with the Tlatelolco massacre was pending at the end of 2008.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 226.]

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

MONTENEGRO

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Judicial investigations proceeded slowly into the 1992 enforced disappearance of 83 Bosnian Muslims (Bosniaks) who had fled to Montenegro from the then Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina (RBiH). In May 2008, a retired senior police officer testified that the then Minister of Interior Pavel Bulatović had ordered the Bosniaks to be detained and handed over to the Bosnian Serb Army. In June 2008, Milo Đukanović, Prime Minister both then and in 1992, denied knowledge of the “deportations”. On 25 December 2008, the government acknowledged state responsibility for the enforced disappearances. In this unprecedented decision, they agreed to provide reparations to nine survivors and their families, and to the relatives of those who were killed as a result of their unlawful “deportation” by the Montenegrin police to Bosnian Serb military forces.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 38–39, 231.]

MOROCCO/WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, Morocco made important progress in addressing past abuses and allowing space for public dissent and protest. But the authorities, aided by complaisant courts, continued to use repressive legislation to punish peaceful opponents, especially those who violate the taboos against criticizing the king or the monarchy, questioning the “Moroccanness” of Western Sahara, or “denigrating” Islam.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 497.]

The Human Rights Advisory Board, charged with continuing the work of the Equity and Reconciliation Commission (IER; established in 2004 to look into grave human rights violations committed during the rule of King Hassan II during 1956–1999), still did not publish the list of all cases of enforced disappearances investigated by the IER. The IER’s final report, published in January 2006, recommended measures to prevent repetition of grave human rights violations through a comprehensive program of judicial and institutional reforms, but these had not yet been implemented. Nor was any progress made toward providing victims with effective access to justice or holding individual perpetrators to account, issues that were excluded from the remit of the IER.

In June 2008, a court ordered Al-Jarida Al-Oula newspaper to stop publishing testimonies made by senior public officials to the IER, following a complaint by the President of the Human Rights Advisory Board. This intervention was widely criticized by local human rights organizations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 234.]

Little independent information was available about conditions in the refugee camps run by the Polisario Front in Algeria. No steps were known to have been taken to address the impunity of those accused of committing human rights abuses in the camps in the 1970s and 1980s.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 234.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 21 February 2009, history teacher Ma Khin Khin Leh (?1966–) was released. (See NCH Annual Reports 2001, 2003; and http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/ca/18.pdf and follow-up.)

[Source: Amnesty International, “Political Prisoners Set Free in Myanmar” (24 February 2009).]

See also Thailand.

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

There was no end in sight for the Caprivi treason trial, which started in 2004 following attacks carried out in the Caprivi Strip in 1999 by a secessionist group, the Caprivi Liberation Army. Most of the 117 people on trial spent their ninth year in detention. By the end of 2008, the prosecution had still not closed its case. None of the police officers accused of torturing suspects detained in the wake of the Caprivi uprising faced any formal charges or disciplinary action.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 239.]

Mass graves were reportedly discovered in northern Namibia and southern Angola, containing the bodies of people unlawfully killed between 1994 and 2002 by Namibian and Angolan security forces. Suspected supporters of the Angolan armed group the União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola (UNITA; National Union for the Total Independence of Angola) were allegedly targeted by the security forces, particularly in the late 1990s and in early 2000. In September 2008, the existence of the graves was reported by the National Society for Human Rights (NSHR). On 1 October 2008, the Minister of Safety and Security said that the government already knew about the graves. A police investigation launched by the government later that month was criticized by the NSHR for its failure to include independent forensic experts.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 240.]

NEPAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

During the 1996–2006 armed conflict, both the security forces and the Communist Party of Nepal-Maoist (CPN-M) rebels were responsible for human rights abuses. Security forces committed hundreds of extrajudicial killings, widespread torture, and, in some years, the largest number of “disappearances” in the world. Maoist forces abducted, tortured, and killed civilians suspected of being “informers” or “enemies of the revolution”, extorted “donations” from villagers, recruited children as soldiers, and abducted students for political indoctrination. Maoists often executed their victims in public, forcing the victim’s relatives and other villagers to observe the killing. Even after they signed a peace agreement in November 2006, both the army and Maoists failed to cooperate with police investigations. In late 2008, not a single perpetrator had been brought to justice before a civilian court. The Nepal Army continued to resist accountability. The police, subordinate to the army, resisted filing cases of human rights violations.

The lack of political will to address crimes was also reflected in proposals to grant an amnesty for serious human rights abuses committed during the conflict. Draft laws on both a truth and reconciliation commission and a disappearances commission contained such an amnesty. In September 2008, although the ruling parties affirmed their commitment to establish commissions on national peace and rehabilitation, truth and reconciliation, “disappearances”, and land reform, they had not made significant progress on establishing any of them in late 2008.

In early 2008, the International Committee of the Red Cross listed more than 800 people who had disappeared at the hands of the government and the CPN-M during the conflict and whose fate and whereabouts remained unknown. The government conducted consultations on a draft bill which would make enforced disappearance a criminal offence under Nepalese law. However, the June 2007 Supreme Court order that the government form a commission to investigate cases of enforced disappearances remained in limbo due to lack of political will. In November 2008, the government released a draft of the Disappearances (Crime and Punishment) Bill.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 240–241; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 272–273.]

Following demonstrations on 10 March 2008 in Kathmandu to commemorate the failed 1959 Tibetan uprising against Chinese rule, over 2,500 Tibetans were arrested for protesting peacefully. On 18 April 2008, two Tibetan journalists covering the protests, Tenzin Choephel and Thupten Shastri, were arrested. On 8 August 2008, 1,300 Tibetans were arrested after another demonstration.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, “Nepal: Stop Illegally Detaining Tibetans” (20 April 2008); Idem, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 276, 278; Index on Censorship, 3/08: 209; Keesings historisch archief (2008) 526–527.]

In May 2008, the government was urged to ensure the security of historical materials and papers contained in Narayanhiti Palace, including the Madan Puraskar Pustakalaya (the biggest record library of Nepal), during the process of transferring ownership of the premises after abolishing the monarchy and establishing the republic on 28 May 2008.

[Source: “Nepal govt urged to protect historical documents at Narayanhiti”, OneIndia (WWW-text, 25 May 2008).]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2002–2004, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs refused a grant for a project proposal by Selma Leydesdorff (1949–), a professor of oral history and culture at the University of Amsterdam, in which she would interview the widows of the 1995 Srebrenica genocide in depth. A letter of inquiry, sent by Leydesdorff in 2002, was not answered by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and a first project proposal from October 2003 was rejected in April 2004. After an appeal by the author, a hearing was organized in June 2004 in which it was agreed that she would be given the opportunity to submit a new proposal. This second project received support from, inter alia, the International Commission for Missing Persons, several Bosnian women’s organizations, and several ministry officials, but was again turned down in December 2004. Minister of Foreign Affairs Ben Bot and Minister of Development Cooperation Agnes van Aardenne personally intervened to block the grant. The official reasons given during ministerial replies to five questions asked in parliament, were that the project did not fit into foreign policy programs and that due to its scholarly character, it had not the required social relevance, nor would it foster reconciliation. In ministry circles, however, other reasons circulated such as suspicion of Leydesdorff’s motives and fear for the project’s political aspects, particularly by encouraging legal claims by survivors for financial compensation in the wake of a possible lawsuit against the Netherlands (such a lawsuit was eventually started by some Srebrenica survivors in 2007). The project eventually resulted into the book De leegte achter ons laten: een geschiedenis van de vrouwen van Srebrenica (March 2008; Leaving the void behind us: a history of the women of Srebrenica).

[Sources: S. de Hoop, “Vrouwen van Srebrenica en hun leed”, Internationale Spectator, 2009: 326; S. Leydesdorff, De leegte achter ons laten: Een geschiedenis van de vrouwen van Srebrenica (Amsterdam 2008), 375–385; NRC Handelsblad (11 March 2008).]

In 2009, historian Lambert Giebels (1935–) was granted access to 73 pages of secret Council of Ministers minutes on the “Hofmans affair”. (See NCH Annual Report 2007.)

[Source: L. Giebels, “Geheime ministerraadnotulen Hofmans-affaire openbaar”, Historisch nieuwsblad (March 2009) 7.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Germany, Liberia, Rwanda.

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

NIGER

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In October 2008, the Community Court of Justice of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) ordered the Niger government to pay reparations to a woman who had been kept as a domestic and sexual slave for a decade. The woman had lodged a complaint against the government for failing to implement existing laws against slavery. This landmark decision corroborated allegations by international and national NGOs who had said that there were still slaves in Niger although this practice had been made a crime in 2003.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 246.]

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

NORWAY

Last Annual Report entry: —.

See Rwanda.

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

In April 2008, Law Minister Farooq Naik promised that the government would trace all people subjected to enforced disappearance. According to the government's own figures, 1,102 people have disappeared in the province of Balochistan alone. In May 2008, the government set up two committees to trace disappeared people. In June 2008, the government stated that 43 disappeared persons had been traced in Balochistan, and had either been released or detained in an official place of detention. Petitions relating to hundreds of cases of disappearances remained pending before the Supreme Court. On 21 November 2008, Human Rights Minister Mumtaz Alam Gilani announced that a new law was being prepared to facilitate the recovery of disappeared people and stated that his ministry had 567 documented cases of enforced disappearance. On 25 November 2008, the Senate Standing Committee on the Interior reportedly acknowledged that intelligence agencies maintained "countless hidden torture cells" across the country. Despite these initiatives, new cases of enforced disappearance were reported.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 252–253.]

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2006–2009, X (name unknown), an archaeologist specialized in Islamic archaeology and the history of Islamic art and architecture and working as a university professor at the University of Gaza, received repeated threats by telephone from unidentified persons who did not state why he was being targeted. The reason was probably his active engagement with Western communities, including his participation in visiting programs at the University of Chicago and Montclair State University, Montclair, New Jersey, in the United States. He relinquished his position as chair of the department of antiquities, University of Gaza, (of which he was the founder) because he refused to serve under a violent political and administrative body that had obtained power as a result of armed conflict. He went into exile in Canada, where he became a visiting professor at the Department of Near and Middle Eastern Civilizations, University of Toronto.

[Source: Scholars at Risk (SAR), Case Palestinian Authority 540 (New York June 2009).]

See also Israel, Syria, United States.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

In August 2008, nearly five years after it was established by law, the Truth and Justice Commission (TJC) presented its conclusions and recommendations to the state. During the same month, the new President Fernando Lugo made a public apology to the victims of human rights violations under the military government of General Alfredo Stroessner (1954–1989), the first such statement ever by a Paraguayan head of state. However, he stopped short of accepting state responsibility for the violations. A new law passed in September 2008 enabled victims of detention on political grounds in 1954–1989 to seek reparations; those who were tortured or disappeared during that time were already eligible for reparations. In December 2008, the TJC published its report and recommendations on human rights violations committed during 1954–1989. The TJC's conclusions identified 20,090 direct victims of human rights violations during the period under investigation. These included 19,862 victims of arbitrary or illegal detention, 18,772 victims of torture, 59 victims of extrajudicial execution and 336 victims of enforced disappearance. The TJC recommended that the Public Prosecutor and Procurator General investigate all cases further. It found that sexual violence had been employed as a repressive strategy, identifying cases of rape and sexual abuse by military and police officers committed against girls aged between 12 and 15. Through witness testimony, the TJC investigated violence against children, particularly in campesino (peasant) communities. It also concluded that systematic and generalized violations against the Aché indigenous peoples in the 1970s might constitute a crime against humanity.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 18, 259–260.]

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 10 December 2007, the trial began of Alberto Fujimori, former president of Peru (1990–2000), who was extradited from Chile. He was accused of the extrajudicial execution of fifteen people in the Barrios Altos district of Lima in November 1991, the enforced disappearance and murder of nine students and a teacher from La Cantuta University in July 1992, and two abductions. He faced a sentence of up to 35 years' imprisonment. During 2008, the three judges of the Special Criminal Court heard evidence from Fujimori and scores of witnesses, including victims' relatives, members of the Colina group (an army death squad responsible for the killings), high-ranking military officers, journalists, and human rights experts. It was the first time in its history that Peru tried a former president for grave human rights violations. On 7 April 2009, Fujimori was found guilty on charges involving serious human rights violations. He was convicted of the killings of 25 people in two massacres (1991, 1992), and of the kidnappings of a journalist and a businessman in 1992. The massacres were carried out by the Colina unit, a specialized squad of military intelligence officers operating under his control. During the trial, evidence showed that the killings formed part of a counterinsurgency strategy that Fujimori established and carried out through the intelligence services. [Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 196; Idem, "Peru: Fujimori Verdict a Rights Victory" (WWW-text; 7 April 2009).]

According to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), almost 70,000 people died or "disappeared" during the internal armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities committed by the Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) and the Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement, and others of human rights violations by state agents. In August 2008, five years after the publication of the final TRC report, the TRC's former president criticized the government's failure to implement any of the recommended reforms. In November 2008, two separate bills proposing amnesties for police and military personnel implicated in human rights violations were presented to Congress.

In April 2008, General Julio Salazar Monroe, former head of the National Intelligence Service (SIN) during the Fujimori government (1990–2000), was sentenced to 35 years' imprisonment for ordering the Cantuta killings. Efforts to investigate and prosecute former officials and military officers implicated in scores of other killings and disappearances dating from the beginning of the armed conflict had meager results. Lack of cooperation by the military hampered investigation of human rights cases. The excessive workload of prosecutors, inefficiency, and inexperience in dealing with human rights cases also contributed to the delays. According to information published by the Human Rights Ombudsman in December 2007, of 192 cases monitored by the institution—which include abuses committed by insurgent groups—only six had led to convictions, while 110 were still under investigation by prosecutors. In all, only nineteen individuals had received prison sentences. In August 2008, the Ombudsman noted with concern that court proceedings were stagnating.

In May 2008, Peru was reviewed under the Universal Periodic Review mechanism of the United Nations Human Rights Council. During the review, Peru pledged to report back to the Human Rights Council on its efforts to implement the TRC recommendations, in particular with regard to victims' compensation and institutional reform, including bringing to justice those responsible for human rights violations during the armed conflict.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 261; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 195–197, 200.]

On 21 July 2008, Leysi Suarez, a model and a dancer for the band Alma Bella, was featured on the cover of D'Farándula magazine sitting naked on a horse and using the national flag as a saddle in the run-up to the 187th anniversary of Peru's 1821 independence from Spain on 28 July. She could face up to four years' imprisonment for offending patriotic symbols.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/08: 186.]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 25 November 2008, a Moscow court refused to reopen the investigation into the 1940 Katyn massacre. On 29 January 2009, the Supreme Court confirmed this judgment.

[Source: Keesings historisch archief (2009) 89.]

See also Israel, Russia.

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 27 March 2008, students from the Volgograd Academy of Public Administration barred entry to the new rector in protest over the de facto dismissal of the former rector, historian, and political theorist Mikhail Sukiasyan (1992–2008). The students also organized strikes. Sukiasyan had reportedly angered the Volgograd region governor by inviting Boris Nemtsov, a leader from the opposition Union of Right Forces, to speak to students during the 2007 parliamentary election campaign. Shortly after, his re-election was not confirmed by the administration of President Vladimir Putin.

[Source: Georg-Eckert Institut, Das Bulletin no. 4 (Winter 2008) 64–65; International Herald Tribune (Russian press review; 28 March 2008).]

On 8 July 2008, the Ulyanovsk city court judged extremist Hitler's Table Talk, a book by British historian Hugh Trevor-Roper (1914–2003) and banned it.

[Source: SOVA Center for Information and Analysis, Aggressive Racism in Russia, Efforts to Counteract It, and Abuse of Anti-Extremist Legislation: Current Trends (November 2008) 5.]

On 4 December 2008, masked and armed men broke into the premises of the Research and Information Center Memorial in St. Petersburg. They had a warrant signed by the Prosecutor's Office and included police, special forces, and members of the investigative committee of the Prosecutor's Office. They seized the entire archive of Memorial in St Petersburg: eleven hard drives containing electronic archives on the Soviet repression from 1917 to the 1960s collected since 1987. These included biographical information on more than 50,000 victims of Stalinist repression; the results of the search for execution and burial sites of victims of repression (several hundred sites described or photographed); the photo collection (over 10,000 photographs) and accompanying textual material of the "Virtual Gulag Museum" (an online source linking more than one hundred local Russian museums). Also confiscated were the database to the oral history archive and an electronic collection of photographs, including scans of historic materials from private archives. In addition, the prosecutors took a hard drive and documents belonging to art historian Aleksandr Margolis, a member of Memorial and director of the “International Charitable Foundation for the Renaissance of St. Petersburg-Leningrad” dedicated to the preservation of St Petersburg's historic architecture. The search was apparently ordered in connection with an investigation against the local newspaper Novy Petersburg (New Petersburg) for publishing an “extremist” article in June 2007. However, Memorial director Irina Flige declared that Memorial had no relationship with the newspaper. She also said that the seizure might have been part of an official campaign to rehabilitate the Stalinist regime. The raid took place one day before Flige would attend a conference in Moscow about Stalin's place in Russian history. Memorial has been nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize.

[Sources: http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/ca/58.pdf; O. Figes, “Shelved: Did Kremlin Make my Stalin Book Disappear?” Guardian (4 March 2009); Idem, “Open Letter by International Scholars Regarding Attack on Memorial” (5 December 2008); L. Harding, “British Scholar Rails at Police Seizure of Anti-Stalin Archive”, Observer (7 December 2008); Human Rights Watch, “Russia: Police Raid Prominent Rights Group” (WWW-text; 4 December 2008); A. Rodriguez, “Russia Rewriting Josef Stalin's Legacy”, Chicago Tribune (WWW-text; 17 December 2008).]

On 25 February 2009, Russian archivists issued a DVD and a book of historical documents meant to counter Ukrainian claims in relation to the Holodomor (the famine that as a result of Stalin's farm collectivization program killed millions of people in 1932–33).

[Sources: M. Foley, “Ukraine: The Politics of Hunger” (WWW-text); S. Gutterman, “Russia Blasts Ukraine's Soviet-era Genocide Claims” (WWW-text; Associated Press); H. Swoboda & J.M. Wiersma, eds., Politics of the Past: The Use and Abuse of History (Strasbourg 2009) 11.]

In March 2009, emergency situations minister Sergei Shoigu called for a law, based on Holocaust denial legislation in Germany, that would criminalize attempts to “rehabilitate Nazism” and to suggest that the USSR did not win World War II. The law would also seek to punish eastern European or former Soviet states which deny they were liberated by the Red Army. The call came after a NTV documentary had exposed the scale of human losses during the Battles of Rzhev, fought in 1942–3, killing up to 1.5 million soldiers, two-thirds of them Soviet. Critics had demanded the arrest of its presenter, Alexei Pivovarov, who was reportedly accused of being part of a Jewish conspiracy financed in the West to belittle the Soviet war effort.

[Sources: American Historical Association, “Open Letter to President Dmitrii Medvedev” (Washington 17 June 2009); Telegraph (5 March 2009).]

On 19 May 2009, President Dmitry Medvedev decided to create a Commission to Counteract Attempts at Falsifying History to Damage the Interests of Russia, consisting of 28 members, including members of parliament, FSB intelligence service officials and only three historians. Among the historical events labeled as sensitive were the August 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact of nonaggression between the USSR and Nazi Germany, the Soviet annexation of the Baltic countries, and the 1940 Katyń massacres. The plan coincided with the introduction of a bill “opposing the rehabilitation of Nazism, Nazi criminals and their accomplices on the territory of the independent states, former republics of the Soviet Union”. According to this bill, anyone condemning the Allies for the 1945 forcible repatriation to the USSR and subsequent execution or deportation of about two million Soviet citizens who had fallen into German hands before they were freed by the Allied advance (the so-called “victims of [the February 1945 Conference of] Yalta”, including Russian Cossacks, prisoners of war, forced laborers, émigrés and anti-Communists who had fought for Germany against Stalin) could be branded as a “criminal”. In a 17 June 2009 letter to Medvedev, the American Historical Association asked to disband the commission as it contradicted the principle of intellectual freedom.

[Sources: American Historical Association, “Open Letter to President Dmitrii Medvedev” (Washington 17 June 2009); Guardian (13 July 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 319; Y. Kiselyov, “When Interpreting History Becomes a Crime”, Moscow Times (3 June 2009); NRC Handelsblad (22 May 2009) 7, (6–7 June 2009) 4–5.]

On 3 March 2009, the publishing house Atticus canceled publication of The Whisperers: Private Life in Stalin's Russia, a book by British historian Orlando Figes (1959–), professor of history at the University of London, about life under Stalin (translated into 22 languages, including all the European languages of the former Soviet Union except Russian). The publisher mentioned economic reasons, but Figes believed that the decision was the result of political pressure and reflected a desire by the Kremlin to rehabilitate Stalin. The book drew on several hundred family archives and thousands of interviews with survivors of the Stalinist regime that Figes conducted with Memorial. Memorial was attacked for helping “foreign historians accused of setting out to blacken Soviet history by focusing on Stalin's crimes”.

[Source: O. Figes, “Shelved: Did Kremlin Make my Stalin Book Disappear?” Guardian (4 March 2009); NRC Handelsblad (5 March 2009).]

On 19 June 2009, the home affairs ministry in St Petersburg shut down the website <http://www.hrono.info> (founded in 2000), because it had published extracts from Hitler's autobiography, Mein Kampf. However, the website founder, Vyacheslav Rummyantsev, a history graduate from Moscow State University, declared that the closure had nothing to do with Hitler, adding that the text, widely available elsewhere, was only summarized on the site. According to Rummyantsev, the real reason was an article posted on 16 June 2009 which criticized St. Petersburg's pro-Kremlin governor, Valentina Matviyenko, for her decision to cut an allowance given to survivors of the Nazi siege of Leningrad (1941–1944). The website (also available at <http://www.hrono.ru>) was Russia's largest online history resource, widely used by scholars in Russia and elsewhere for its biographical and historical material.

[Source: Guardian (13 July 2009).]

On 3 July 2009, the Russian delegation walked out of a session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Organisation for the Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) in Vilnius, Lithuania, after the assembly had passed a resolution, of which paragraph 10 read: "Recalling the initiative of the European Parliament to proclaim 23 August, when the Ribbentrop-Molotov Pact was signed 70 years ago, as a Europe-wide Day of Remembrance for Victims of Stalinism and Nazism, in order to preserve the memory of the victims of mass deportations and exterminations". Russia accused the OSCE of trying to "distort history with political goals".

[Sources: BBC News (3 July 2009); Guardian (13 July 2009); Organisation for the Security and Co-operation in Europe Parliamentary Assembly, Resolution on Divided Europe Reunited: Promoting Human Rights and Civil Liberties in the OSCE Region in the 21st Century (Document AS (09) D 1 E; Vilnius 3 July 2009), paragraph 10.]

Chechnya

A number of mass graves were found in Chechnya. However, the federal authorities blocked the construction of a forensic laboratory, which could have helped to identify the fate of victims of enforced disappearance. On 17 June 2008, four members of the human rights organization Memorial were detained in Chechnya, while filming a building thought to have been used as a secret detention center. The video footage was destroyed and the four were threatened.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 271, 272.]

See also Poland, Syria, Ukraine, Vietnam.

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

President Paul Kagame sought to prevent independent prosecution of soldiers of the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), a rebel group he once headed and Rwanda's dominant political party, for war crimes committed during and after the 1994 Rwandan genocide, including the killing of at least 30,000 people. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) was mandated to prosecute such crimes, but rather than see it try RPF soldiers, the government arranged to have the one remaining case under ICTR investigation transferred to its own court where it could more easily determine the outcome.

In June 2008, Rwanda charged four Rwandan Patriotic Army (RPA) military officers with war crimes for the 1994 killing of fifteen civilians. Two of the officers confessed to the killing and were sentenced to eight years' imprisonment. Two more senior officers were acquitted after a brief trial. The RPF had acknowledged the crime committed by its soldiers, but brought the accused to trial only after the ICTR prepared a case against them. Neither the Rwandan prosecutor's office nor the ICTR anticipated any more of such prosecutions, despite United Nations estimates that between 25,000 and 45,000 persons were killed by RPF soldiers in 1994.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 277; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 9–10, 100.]

At the end of December 2008, Rwanda's prisons contained 59,532 people, 37,277 people of whom had been accused of genocide. In October 2008, an estimated 10,000 category-one cases were pending before gacaca courts (community-based tribunals, created in 2001 in an effort to combine restorative and punitive justice), whose procedures fail to meet international standards of fair trial. Category one cases involved the planners, organizers, instigators, and supervisors of the genocide. Of these, at least 6,000 were rape cases which were transferred to category one in May 2008. Originally scheduled to end in 2007, gacaca tribunals would continue to hear cases until 2010. Instances of faulty procedure, judicial corruption, and false accusations undermined trust in the gacaca system among victims as well as the accused. The safety of witnesses in judicial proceedings continued to be a concern, with 17 genocide survivors killed in the first nine months of 2008, some in connection with giving testimony in gacaca proceedings.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 276–277; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 99–101.]

The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) was to finish all first-instance trials by the end of 2008 and complete all work by 2010, according to United Nations Security Council Resolution 1503. This deadline became unfeasible, given the 28 detainees on trial and the nine accused awaiting trial. In July 2008, the United Nations Security Council extended the terms of the Trial Chamber and its judges until 31 December 2009. ICTR judges, however, refused transfers to Rwanda, citing among other reasons difficulty in obtaining defense witness testimony and the possible imposition of a sentence of life in solitary confinement. (The 2007 transfer law abolished capital punishment and replaced it with life imprisonment in solitary confinement, commonly considered as a violation of Article 7 of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights.) Four requests by the Rwandan Prosecutor General for cases to be transferred from the ICTR to Rwanda were rejected on the basis that the accused were at risk of being subjected to an unfair trial. The four decisions cited reports that defense witnesses inside and outside Rwanda risk being rejected by their community, arrested, tortured, and in some cases killed. The Rwandan Parliament passed a law on 3 November 2008 to prohibit solitary confinement for transfer cases.

Judicial proceedings against genocide suspects took place in Belgium, Canada, France and the Netherlands. Extradition hearings against genocide suspects in Sweden, Germany and Norway were continuing. A genocide suspect was detained in Finland and it remained unclear whether he would be extradited to Rwanda. The United Kingdom agreed to the extradition of four Rwandans, a decision which was appealed. A French appeals court refused to extradite two Rwandans, as did a German court. More than a dozen requests were pending in other European countries. Belgium was pursuing further domestic prosecutions. In February 2008, a Spanish judge issued arrest warrants for 40 Rwandan Defense Force (RDF) officers for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed against Spanish, Rwandan, and Congolese citizens in the 1990s. The prosecution was based on both domestic law and universal jurisdiction (a doctrine which permitted national courts to prosecute the most heinous crimes committed abroad). At the African Union summit in June 2008, President Paul Kagame criticized abuse of the principles of universal jurisdiction in response to the arrest warrants issued in France and Spain against leading RPF members. The summit called for an international regulatory body “to review and/or handle complaints or appeals arising out of abuse of the principle of universal jurisdiction” by states.

On 5 August 2008, the report of the Mucyo Commission, set up in 2006 by the Rwandan government to investigate the role of France in the 1994 genocide, was published. The report alleged the involvement of 33 current and former French political and military figures in the genocide. On 15 November 2008, the Prosecutor General stated that the authorities were ready to indict 23 of those named. The Mucyo report followed an investigation instituted by a French judge into the shooting down of a plane in 1994 whose passengers included President Juvenal Habyarimana of Rwanda, President Cyprien Ntaryamira of Burundi and three French nationals. On 17 November 2006, the French judge issued international arrest warrants against nine leading RPF members for shooting down the plane. On 9 November 2008, Rose Kabuye, Chief of Protocol for President Kagame, was arrested in Frankfurt, Germany. She was transferred to France and charged with “complicity in murder in relation to terrorism”.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 276–277; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 9–10, 102.]

Authorities used prosecution, or the threat of prosecution, for “genocide ideology” to silence dissent of many kinds, including calls for justice for war crimes committed by the Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF). Prosecutors brought hundreds of cases involving this accusation before the charge was finally established by law in June 2008. The current definition was vague, required no link to any genocidal act, and prohibited speech protected by international conventions. The offence was punishable by 10 to 25 years’ imprisonment. This law could potentially stifle freedom of expression, and restrict the ability of the accused to put forward a defense in criminal trials.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 277; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 102–104.]

In 2008, the Rwandan government expelled historian and Human Rights Watch expert Alison Des Forges (1942–2009) after Human Rights Watch had published an extensive analysis of judicial reform there, drawing attention to problems of inappropriate prosecution and external influence on the judiciary that resulted in deficient genocide-related trials and verdicts. Des Forges was best known for her award-winning account of the genocide, Leave None to Tell the Story (1999). She appeared as an expert witness in eleven trials for genocide at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, three trials in Belgium, and at trials in Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Canada. In 2009, Des Forges died in an plane crash.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “Human Rights Watch Mourns Loss of Alison Des Forges: Leading Rwanda Expert Killed in Plane Crash” (WWW-text; 13 February 2009).]

On 21 March 2008, Bonaventure Bizumuremyi, founder and editor of Umuco, faced prosecution for defaming President Paul Kagame, because in an article he had compared the latter to Hitler and claimed that he would be tried on genocide charges.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 2/09: 132.]

On 25 April 2009, the Rwandan government suspended the British Broadcasting Corporation's (BBC) Kinyarwanda radio service saying it threatened the country's national reconciliation by hosting people with views negating the 1994 genocide. Minister of Information Louise Mushikiwabo justified the suspension on the grounds that the program amounted to a "blatant denial of the 1994 genocide against the Tutsi of Rwanda". The suspension followed the BBC's broadcast of a promotion of a forthcoming feature of its weekly local vernacular program "Imvo n'imvano" (Analysis of the Source of a Problem) that was to include a debate on forgiveness among Rwandans after the genocide. The advance segment included comments by a former presidential candidate opposing the government's attempt to force Rwanda's entire Hutu population to apologize for the genocide, since not all Hutu people had killed Tutsi or otherwise participated in the genocide. It also included a man of mixed Hutu-Tutsi ethnicity questioning why the government had refused to allow relatives of those killed by the Rwanda Patriotic Front (RPF)—led by President Paul Kagame that took over the country and stopped the genocide—to mourn for their loved ones. According to estimates from experts working for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, RPF soldiers killed between 25,000 and 45,000 people between April and August 1994. The government declared that it would no longer tolerate anyone who implied that there had been a double genocide in 1994 (one by the Hutus and the other by the Tutsi-led RPF in their bid to end the first one). Rwanda has since banned the use of ethnic labels and established stringent laws against "divisionism" (spreading ideas that encourage ethnic animosity between the Tutsi and Hutu populations) and "genocide ideology" (ideas that could lead to genocide, including the double genocide thesis). In 2004, the government already lodged complaints against the BBC radio station after a parliamentary report accused it of propagating "genocide ideology". In late 2007, the government accused a BBC journalist, Yusuf Mugenzi, of exacerbating ethnic differences through the Imvo n'imvano program and of giving airtime to "genocide fugitives", referring to the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), a Hutu rebel group based in eastern Congo, some of whose members took part in the 1994 genocide and continued to threaten stability in the region.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, "Rwanda: Restore BBC to the Air" (27 April 2009); Human Rights Watch, "Rwanda: Tribunal Risks Supporting 'Victor's Justice'" (1 June 2009); Ifex Alert (29 April 2009); K. Roth, "The power of horror in Rwanda", Los Angeles Times (11 April 2009).]

See also Sudan.

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

See Bahrain.

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

Despite the elimination of the last legal obstacles, the criminal investigation of Hissene Habré's case did not begin during 2008. In April 2008, the National Assembly adopted a constitutional amendment introducing retrospective legislation for crimes against humanity, war crimes, genocide, and torture which would permit the trial of the former Chadian head of state who was living in exile in Senegal and who stands accused of crimes against humanity and torture during his 1982–1990 rule. In May 2008, a coordinating judge was appointed to organize the trial. The new legislation amended a 2007 law that permitted the prosecution of cases of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture, including crimes committed outside of Senegal. It encompassed crimes committed prior to the enactment of the 2007 law. Prosecutors were conducting interviews with victims and former officials of the Habré regime and were examining fourteen complaints filed in September 2008, alongside documentary evidence from the files of the Bureau of Documentation and Security, Chad's former political police. The prosecution would subsequently decide whether to file formal charges.

In August 2008, prosecutors in Chad accused Habré of providing support to rebel groups involved in the failed February 2008 coup and sentenced him to death in absentia. Senegal's justice minister expressed concerns that the decision would interfere with Senegal's proceedings against Habré, but Chadian authorities insisted that the ruling pertained only to the events of February 2008. (See Chad.) [Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 8, 281, 282; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 52; International Federation for Human Rights, "African Union: Press Senegal on Habré Trial (28 January 2009).]

See also Chad.

SERBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 30 July 2008, Radovan Karadžić was transferred to the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) (See Bosnia and Herzegovina). The arrest was a significant breakthrough in Serbia's cooperation with ICTY, reflecting the growing authority within the government of President Boris Tadic's Democratic Party. Widespread public hostility to the ICTY persists. ICTY indictees Ratko Mladic and Goran Hadzic remained at large in late 2008. In August 2008, special prosecutor for war crimes, Vladimir Vukcevic, reiterated that the arrest of both fugitives was a priority for Belgrade. In the same month, the president of the National Council on ICTY Cooperation, Rasim Ljajic, said that Mladic had been hiding in military barracks in Belgrade from June 2002 until the end of 2005. During a September 2008 visit to Serbia, ICTY Prosecutor Serge Brammertz expressed "careful optimism" that Mladic would be "arrested soon", but declined publicly to assess Serbia's cooperation with the ICTY.

Prosecutions continued at the War Crimes Chamber at Belgrade District Court. In September 2008, the Serbian Supreme Court upheld the appeals of two members of the Scorpions paramilitary group, convicted in April 2007 for the murder of six civilians from Srebrenica in 1995, reducing one sentence from twenty to fifteen years and ordering the retrial of another defendant sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

In June 2008, the Supreme Court sentenced former secret police chief Radomir Markovic to 40 years' imprisonment, and several other defendants to long prison terms, for the attempted murder of opposition leader Vuk Draskovic in October 1999. The verdict concluded an eight-year cycle of trials, during which three earlier decisions of lower courts had been annulled by the Supreme Court, which ultimately tried the case itself.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 284; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 402–403.]

In September 2008, the Helsinki Committee for Human Rights in Serbia and its director Sonja Biserko received threats linked to their work on war crimes accountability. On 30 September 2008, ultranationalists protested outside the group's office. On 2 October 2008, Biserko's home address was published by a tabloid newspaper article calling her a "traitor". She was subsequently placed under police protection.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 406.]

In November 2008, the International Court of Justice (ICJ) decided that it had jurisdiction over Croatia's motion to sue Serbia for genocide.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 283.]

Kosovo

On 3 April 2008, Ramush Haradinaj, a former commander of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA), was acquitted by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). Haradinaj, who was Kosovo's prime minister at the time of his indictment, had been charged with murder, persecution, rape, and torture of Albanians, Serbs and Roma in 1998 during the Kosovo conflict. ICTY judges found him not guilty on all counts. The court cited significant difficulties in obtaining testimony of many witnesses due to security concerns. Prosecution appeals against the acquittal was pending in late 2008.

The remaining international prosecutors and judiciary of the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) made slow progress in addressing an estimated backlog of 1,560 war crimes cases. In August 2008, UNMIK said that proceedings were open in seven cases, only one of which was not an appeal or a retrial. According to UNMIK, prosecutors were also reportedly directing investigations in 47 cases. In November 2008, following negotiations with Pristina and Belgrade, the United Nations Security Council approved a "status-neutral" plan to reconfigure UNMIK. This enabled a European Security and Defence Policy mission (EULEX), envisaged in the Ahtisaari Plan and authorized by the European Union in February 2008, to take over responsibilities for international policing and the investigation and prosecution of outstanding war crimes in December 2008. The United Nations Secretary-General also reported that the UNMIK Department of Justice had established guidelines to enable access to criminal files by EULEX prosecutors, who had repeatedly complained that war crimes files were not available.

There was little progress in determining the fate of missing persons. As of April 2008, 1,963 persons—the majority Kosovo Albanian—remained missing. In June 2008, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe nominated Dick Marty as rapporteur to investigate the fate of missing Serbs allegedly transferred to northern Albania after June 1999. The Kosovo government refused to investigate the allegations. The Office of Missing Persons and Forensics performed 73 exhumations and recovered 53 sets of mortal remains. Some 437 exhumed bodies remained unidentified.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 283–286; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 410–411.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

The 2005 report of Sierra Leone's Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) attributed the civil war (1991–2002) largely to decades of corrupt rule by the political elite and recommended abolishing the death penalty, repealing laws that criminalize seditious libel, increasing the transparency of the mining industry, improving good governance, and establishing a reparations fund for war victims. Despite a presidential promise in February 2008 to implement the TRC recommendations, little progress was made during 2008. No steps were taken to create a TRC follow-up committee. The mandate of the National Commission for Social Action, the agency in charge of reparations, was extended. It was given responsibility for overseeing the setting up of a Special Fund for War Victims. The Reparations Task Force was reconstituted as a Reparations Steering Committee.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 288; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 107.]

In January 2008, the trial of former Liberian president Charles Taylor—charged with eleven counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for supporting Sierra Leonean rebel groups—resumed before the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL). This followed a six-month delay due to an overhaul in Taylor's legal team after he sought to fire his lawyers over concerns that he was receiving inadequate resources to prepare his defense. The prosecution completed its case in late 2008. Taylor was the first former African head of state to stand trial in front of an international or hybrid international-national war crimes tribunal. For security reasons his trial was taking place in The Hague instead of Freetown, Sierra Leone's capital.

After issuing verdicts in the cases of its first five defendants in 2007, the SCSL Appeals Chamber in February 2008 upheld the original sentences passed in the cases of Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) members Alex Tamba Brima (50 years' imprisonment), Ibrahim Bazy Kamara (45 years' imprisonment) and Santigie Borbor Kanu (45 years' imprisonment). The case against Moinina Fofana and Allieu Kondewa, members of the Civil Defence Forces (CDF), was concluded in May 2008. Doubling their original sentences, the Appeals Chamber sentenced them to 15 and 20 years' imprisonment respectively. In the cases against Revolutionary United Front (RUF) members Issa Sesay, Morris Kallon and Augustine Gbao, the defense cases were heard. Judgments had not been issued by the end of 2008.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 288; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 105, 108.]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

On 17 May 2008, the Board of Film Censors and the Media Development Authority banned screening of the film One Nation under Lee, produced and directed by artist Seelan Palay. The film documented the rise to power of former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew (in power in 1959–1990).

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 3/08: 211; Reuters India (21 May 2008).]

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

On 21 August 2009, the government of Prime Minister Robert Fico barred Hungarian President László Sólyom from making a controversial visit during which he had planned to unveil the statue of Saint Stephen (975–1038), the first Hungarian king, in the southern town of Komárno, on the River Danube, which separates Slovakia and Hungary. No Slovak officials had been invited to the event, which coincided with the anniversary of the 1968 invasion of (Czecho)Slovakia by five armies, including Hungary's. The incident heightened bilateral tension over Slovakia's treatment of its ethnic Hungarians, who make up about ten per cent of the population.

[Sources: BBC News (21 & 25 August 2009); NRC Handelsblad (28 August 2009) 5.]

SLOVENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

The authorities still failed to guarantee the rights of a group of permanent residents known as the “erased”. A year after Slovenia's 1991 declaration of independence, more than 18,000 individuals were unlawfully removed from the registry of permanent residents. They were people originating from other former Yugoslav republics, many of them Roma, who had been living in Slovenia but had not acquired Slovenian citizenship after independence. The move was discriminatory as citizens of former Yugoslav republics were treated less favorably than other foreign nationals whose permanent residency status was granted automatically. As a result of the “erasure”, many permanent residents were forcibly expelled from Slovenia. Many others lost their jobs, were denied access to education and the right to a comprehensive healthcare service. The issue of the “erased” was the subject of much political debate in the run-up to the September 2008 parliamentary elections. The Constitutional Committee of Parliament initiated a discussion on a draft constitutional law on the “erased”. The draft law, which had been presented by the government in 2007, would maintain discriminatory treatment of the “erased”. It would provide new legal grounds for discriminatory actions by the authorities, including the possibility of reversing individual decisions to restore permanent residency. It failed to restore the permanent residency status of the “erased”, disclaimed state responsibility for the “erasure” and explicitly excluded the possibility of reparations, including compensation for human rights violations suffered by the “erased”. Through 2008, deportation procedures were initiated against “erased” individuals, although deportations were not carried out. The authorities failed to acknowledge the discriminatory nature of the “erasure”, and did not implement two earlier Constitutional Court decisions which found the “erasure” illegal and unconstitutional.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 292–293.]

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In December 2008, the Pretoria High Court ruled as unconstitutional, unlawful, and invalid, the 2005 National Prosecution Policy on the prosecution of offences “emanating from conflicts of the past”. The case had been brought by relatives of victims of extrajudicial executions and disappearances in the 1980s. The Court accepted that the policy would have the effect of allowing immunity against prosecution for individuals who had not co-operated with or had been denied amnesty by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, even in circumstances where there was a well-founded case against them.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 300.]

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In August 2008, the restrictive Official Secrets Act (1968, amended 1978) was criticized as Minister of Defense Carme Chacón announced her intention to declassify thousands of secret files of historical value. Many important documents, especially military documents on the 1936–1977 period referring to repression under Franco’s rule were either unavailable for public use or badly preserved. In addition, since Franco’s death, no government legally regulated the military justice archives.

[Sources: El País (10 August 2008); Frankfurter Rundschau (20 August 2008); A. González Quintana, “Spain: Pact of Oblivion”, UNESCO Courier, 2008, no. 9 (WWW-text).]

On 16 October 2008, judge Baltasar Garzón initiated a case against General Francisco Franco (1892–1975) and 35 of his generals and ministers for crimes against humanity during the civil war (1936–1939) and the first years of the dictatorship (1939–1952) when accepting a petition filed by thirteen associations of victims’ families and ordering to open nineteen mass graves believed to hold the remains of hundreds of victims. An estimated 114,266 persons disappeared at the time; most of them were killed at the hands of Franco’s supporters and buried in mass graves. Garzón maintained that he could investigate these crimes against humanity because they had no statute of limitations. In November 2008, however, judges from the Audiencia Nacional (National Criminal Court), had suspended the opening of the mass graves while it examined the public prosecutor’s appeal. When the latter questioned Garzón’s jurisdiction, he made use of the following arguments: the perpetrators were dead; the crimes were covered by a 1977 amnesty law (granting amnesty for all crimes with a political connection committed up to 1977) and by rules stipulating that most crimes lapse after twenty years; and, finally, international human rights laws did not apply to the civil war as Spain was not a signatory to them at the time. On 18 November 2008, Garzón declared that he was dropping a case. On 2 December 2008, the National Criminal Court said that it was not competent to investigate crimes of this type and the investigation was closed. However, Garzón ruled that local courts were competent to investigate such crimes when they had been committed in their territorial jurisdiction and on 26 December 2008 he sent information to a number of local courts for further investigation on suspected cases of enforced disappearances and the illegal removal of 30,960 children from their families.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 301, 303; Guardian (17 October 2008); New York Times (17 October & 19 November 2008); NRC Handelsblad (28 May 2009) 4; The Times (19 November 2008).]

By the end of 2008, the procedural guidelines and mapping of graves required by the Law on Historic Memory, introduced in December 2007, had still not been developed.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 303.]

See also Austria, El Salvador, Guatemala, Peru, Rwanda.

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Investigations into human rights violations by the military and police stalled and court cases did not proceed as witnesses refused to come forward for fear of reprisals. In April 2008, the International Independent Group of Eminent Persons tasked with overseeing the latest Presidential Commission of Inquiry (COI) into sixteen cases of serious violations of human rights terminated their mission stating that the COI had not been able to investigate cases in accordance with international standards. The process was so flawed that the International Independent Group of Eminent Persons, after regularly raising serious concerns, eventually withdrew from its role as observer. Four Sri Lankan commissioners also resigned.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 305; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 310.]

On 7 October 2008, Vinayagamoorthi Muralitharan, otherwise known as Karuna, was sworn into Parliament. As a military commander of the Tamil Makkal Vidulthalai Pulika, and previously as a military commander in the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, Karuna was suspected of serious human rights abuses and war crimes, including the abduction of hundreds of teenagers to serve as child soldiers, and the torture, holding as hostage and killing of hundreds of civilians. There had been no official investigation into these allegations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 305.]

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 14 July 2008, Prosecutor Luis Moreno Ocampo of the International Criminal Court (ICC) submitted to the ICC's pre-trial chamber an application for an arrest warrant to be issued against President Omar al-Bashir. The application included ten counts of Darfur-related war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide that were allegedly carried out on al-Bashir's "direct orders". The application triggered calls by states belonging to the African Union, the League of Arab States, and the Organization of the Islamic Conference to defer the case under article 16 of the ICC Rome Statute (which empowers the Security Council to suspend court proceedings for up to twelve months renewable if required to maintain international peace and security). On the initiative of Rwanda, the African Union adopted a decision criticizing what it called the abuse of universal jurisdiction (See Rwanda).

In October 2008, the government announced that it had detained former Janjaweed leader Ali Kushayb, indicted by the ICC in 2007, pending his prosecution by a special court in El Geneina in West Darfur. Despite an announcement that his trial would begin in October 2008, the case had not started by the end of 2008. There were unconfirmed reports that he remained free to travel between the Darfur states. Ahmed Haroun, also indicted by the ICC in 2007, remained in his position as Minister of State for Humanitarian Affairs. On 20 November 2008, the Prosecutor applied for arrest warrants to be issued against three commanders of armed opposition groups operating in Darfur. He did not disclose their names. The commanders were accused of war crimes arising from an attack on the African Union Mission in Sudan (AMIS) in December 2007 in which twelve peacekeepers were killed.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 8, 307; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 9–10, 121.]

See also Chad, Uganda.

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

The trial of those accused of carrying out extrajudicial executions in December 1982 continued in the capital, Paramaribo. 25 people, including seventeen former members of the armed forces, were accused of the extrajudicial execution of thirteen civilians and two army officers, who had been arrested in December 1982 on suspicion of organizing an attempted coup and held at the army barracks of Fort Zeelandia in Paramaribo. One of the accused, former President Lieutenant Colonel Désiré (Desi) Delano Bouterse, announced on television at the time that the fifteen detainees had been killed while trying to escape. Reports indicate that the victims showed signs of torture. The victims included journalists, lawyers, university lecturers, businessmen, and a trade union leader. The trial, which started in November 2007, was held before a military court instead of an ordinary civilian court, despite the fact that all ordinary offences committed by military personnel, including human rights violations and crimes under international law, should be tried in civilian courts, according to ordinary criminal procedures. The charges against the accused did not include the crime of torture. During the hearings in July and August 2008, the defense challenged the impartiality of two judges, arguing a conflict of interest. In November and December 2008, the court dismissed this objection. [Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 310.]

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

See Rwanda.

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

On 21 October 2008, the District Court of Winterthur imposed a fine on three Turks, Ali Mercan, Hasan Kemali, Ethem Kayali, for denial of the 1915–1917 Armenian genocide. On 30 June 2007, they were present at a Turkish nationalist meeting organized by Doğu Perinçek (see NCH Annual Report 2008) and declared there that the massacre of the Armenians was not a genocide, but an international lie orchestrated by France, the United Kingdom and “Russian tsarists”.

[Source: National Academy of Sciences of the Republic of Armenia (Armenian Genocide Museum-Institute) “Swiss court fines three Turks for Armenian Genocide denial” (WWW-text; 23 October 2008).]

See also Rwanda.

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

The fate of some 17,000 people, mostly Islamists who were victims of enforced disappearance in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and hundreds of Lebanese and Palestinians who were detained in Syria or abducted from Lebanon by Syrian forces or Lebanese and Palestinian militias, remained unknown. In August 2008, the Lebanese and Syrian Presidents issued a joint statement pledging to examine the fate of people who disappeared in their countries.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 316.]

In April 2009, the Ministry of Culture confiscated the book “Syria in the Russian Flights During the Nineteenth Century” [sic] (General Syrian Book Organization, April 2009), after massive protests alleging that it tarnished the image of Syria and its citizens. The book dealt with impressions of Russian citizens who had visited Syria or had resided there in the mid-nineteenth century, including doctors, diplomats, travelers, poets, historians, and archaeologists. The book’s two translators stated that they had not deleted some offensive passages because this would amount to misleading and to embellishment of the text. The manager of the General Syrian Book Organization apologized for the publication of the book in the al-Watan newspaper; he blamed his predecessors for the decision to publish.

[Source: Ifex Alert (Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, 26 May 2009).]

See also Lebanon.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In November 2008, the legislature passed a resolution calling on the Japanese government to apologize and issue reparations to the survivors of Japan's military sexual slavery system during World War II.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 318.]

See also Japan.

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In January 2008, an independent committee found no evidence linking any government official to extrajudicial executions during former Prime Minister Thaksin's "war on drugs" in 2003. This was despite its objective to identify people who might be brought to justice for such killings, and its findings that Thaksin's shoot-to-kill orders were widely implemented and that the interior ministry was ordered to issue a blacklist. According to the report, of 2,819 people killed between February and April 2003—54 in shoot-outs with the police—only 1,370 were related to the drugs trade.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 322.]

On 15 June 1962, the International Court of Justice ruled that the Temple of Preah Vihear area, occupied by Thailand since 1954, was situated on territory under Cambodia's sovereignty since the 1904–1908 boundary settlement between France (at that time conducting Cambodia's foreign relations) and Thailand. It instructed Thailand to withdraw and to restore to Cambodia any sculptures and other works of art removed from the temple. When on 7 July 2008 UNESCO recognized the site as heritage of humanity, tensions between the two countries flared up. In November 2008, Cambodia and Thailand agreed to determine the border on the basis of a French map from 1907. The temple site, constructed between the ninth and eleventh centuries and dedicated to Hindu deity Shiva, had been a royal Khmer site linked to Angkor Vat.

[Sources: Amnesty International (Amnesty International), Report (London) 2009: 95; Le Figaro, 18 July 2008: 7; International Court of Justice, Case Summaries: Case Concerning the Temple of Preah

Vihear (Merits)—Judgment of 15 June 1952 (WWW-text; The Hague); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 46; S. Rosenne, The World Court: What It Is and How It Works (Dordrecht/Boston/London 1995) 198–199.]

The offices of some Network for Human Rights Documentation–Burma (ND–Burma) members in Thailand were raided by the authorities and documents were removed. The network—comprising ten independent, community-based organizations—collected data on human rights violations committed in Burma under military rule to create an accurate historical record.

[Source: L. Bickford, P. Karam, H. Mneimneh & P. Pierce, Documenting Truth (New York 2009) 9, 31.]

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In July 2008, the Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF) report into the 1999 violence was officially submitted to the governments of Timor-Leste and Indonesia. The report concluded that crimes against humanity occurred in Timor-Leste in 1999 (during and after a United Nations [UN]-sponsored referendum on independence, militias backed by the Indonesian army killed hundreds of Timorese and destroyed much of Timor-Leste's physical infrastructure) and attributed institutional responsibility to the Indonesian military, police, and government. UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged the leaders of Indonesia and Timor-Leste to follow up the release of the report with initiatives to “ensure full accountability” and “end impunity”. The leaders, however, rejected calls to bring individuals to account but formally accepted the findings of the report, emphasizing their determination to “bring closure to a chapter of our recent past”. Concerns about impunity led the UN to boycott CTF investigations and instead resume prosecutions through the Serious Crime Unit, set up in conjunction with Timor-Leste prosecutors. By the end of 2008, twenty cases had been submitted. The UN estimated that it could take three years to complete investigations into nearly 400 cases.

Those responsible for perpetrating human rights violations at the time of the independence referendum in 1999 and during violence in April/May 2006 continued to enjoy impunity. In May 2008, President José-Manuel Ramos Horta issued a decree granting full and partial pardons to 94 prisoners. As a result, at least twenty prisoners were released, including former Interior Minister Rogerio Lobato, who had played an instrumental role in the 2006 crisis (when fighting between soldiers and police triggered wider violence in which at least 37 people were killed). Nine prisoners serving sentences for committing crimes against humanity in 1999 also received commuted sentences with four released in June 2008. In September 2008, a petition against the president's decision to pardon the criminals was rejected by the court of appeal. Timorese politicians and human rights activists backing the petition felt that the decision "strengthens impunity, weakens the people's faith in the justice system and undermines the rule of law". In July 2008, Horta unveiled new draft legislation addressing the 2006 crisis. If passed by parliament, the law would provide a wide-ranging amnesty for perpetrators: even individuals responsible for murder and other serious crimes would be able to immunize themselves from prosecution by issuing an apology.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 323, 324; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 321–324.]

See also Indonesia.

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In September 2008, the representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights submitted the final report on national consultations for a future Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to President Faure Gnassingbé. The consultations helped to gather the views of Togolese people on the nature and mandate of the TRC, established to shed light on political violence in Togo. The report called on the authorities to take appropriate steps to ensure the safety of witnesses, victims, and alleged perpetrators.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 325.]

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2001.

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, the trial continued of nineteen people accused of the January 2007 murder of Turkish-Armenian journalist and human rights defender Hrant Dink. Reports by the Parliamentary Human Rights Investigative Commission in July 2008, and by the Prime Ministry Inspectorate in November 2008 pointed to failures by state authorities to act on intelligence reports about plans to murder Dink, and supported the Dink family lawyers' demand for criminal investigation of the Trabzon and Istanbul police. (See NCH Annual Reports 2006, 2007, 2008.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 332; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 420.]

After protests from the Hrant Dink Foundation, the Ministry of Education stopped distribution of a DVD containing a one-sided depiction of the Armenian genocide of 1915–1917.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (4–5 April 2009) 5.]

Traditional Newroz/Nevruz festivals after the 21 March equinox, which are celebrated especially by the Kurdish community, were refused authorization in south-eastern Turkey. Television footage showed law enforcement officials beating people after demonstrations went ahead without permission.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 331.]

In early October 2008, the Education Ministry's Board of Education and Discipline removed passages about the military coups of March 1971, September 1980, and February 1997, and about the Gulf War (1990–1991) from official history textbooks for the year-eight course History of the Turkish Republic and Kemalism because they reportedly "introduced matters contradictory to the democratic character of the republic and hampered consolidation of Turkish democracy".

[Source: Turkish Daily News (4 October 2008).]

In December 2008, three scholars, Cengiz Aktar, a professor of European Studies at the University of Bahcesehir, Istanbul, Ahmet Insel, and Baskin Oran, and a journalist, Ali Bayramoglu, issued a public apology on the Internet for the Armenian genocide in the following terms: "My conscience does not accept the insensitivity shown to and the denial of the Great Catastrophe that the Ottoman Armenians were subjected to in 1915. I reject this injustice and for my share, I empathize with the feelings and pain of my Armenian brothers and sisters. I apologize to them". The letter triggered a furious response from ultranationalists, who labeled it a "betrayal" and an "insult to the Turkish nation". In late January 2009, the campaign had attracted over 28,000 signatures. Four Ankara residents had demanded the trial of the signatories, but the Chief Public Prosecutor's Office declined to prosecute them.

[Sources: Bianet, Ifex Alert (28 January 2008); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 9, 210; R. Tait, "Writers Risk Backlash with Apology for Armenian Genocide", Guardian (8 December 2008).]

In [March] 2009, several men assaulted and harassed author Latife Tekin when she questioned the expropriation of land and the improper acquisition of the archaeological site of Mydos during a panel discussion in Bodrum, Mugla. The Aegean Environment and Culture Foundation (EGEÇEP) condemned the attack and alleged that men who harassed Tekin worked for the businessman who bought the land from the villagers.

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (1 April 2009).]

On 5 May 2009, the trial began against Nedim Gürsel on charges of "incitement to hatred" and "humiliating the religious values of part of the population" for his novel Daughters of Allah. On 25 June 2009, Gürsel was acquitted. The court had concluded that the novel did not incite hostility and violence, inter alia because it was set in the past, spanning the Prophet Muhammed's lifetime to World War I, so that it could not be seen as an imminent danger to peace.

[Source: International PEN, Ifex Alert (14 July 2009).]

In June 2009, Nedim Sener, a reporter for the daily Milliyet who wrote The Dink Murder and Intelligence Lies, a book about the murder of journalist Hrant Dink, faced up to 28 years' imprisonment after police officers filed complaints against him under the Anti-Terrorism Law. The book dealt with the gendarmerie, police, and national intelligence officers who were accused both of having prior knowledge of the murder plans and of preventing the solution of the case with misleading evidence and fake documents.

[Source: Bianet, Ifex Alert (9 June 2009).]

In 2009, an armed group, the so-called "People's Defence Forces" (Hezen Parastina Gel, or HPG, in Kurdish), related to the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party), openly threatened sociologist and political scientist Ismail Beşikçi (1939–) on their website. (See also NCH Annual Report 2002.) A group of intellectuals and academics condemned this, saying that Beşikçi (author of several works on Kurdish history) was "a respectable intellectual who used insight, courage, and determination to oppose the Turkish Republic's official ideology, official history and official truths, all of which ignored, denied and denigrated the Kurdish people".

[Source: IPS Communication Foundation (Bianet), Ifex Alert (26 February 2009).]

See also Switzerland, United States.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

On 1 September 2008, mandatory university courses on the Holy Rukhnama, the philosophical book written by the previous president Saparmurad Niyazov, were discontinued. Plans for the book to be taught together with courses on history, political science, and economics, were implemented.

[Source: Index on Censorship, 4/08: 190–191.]

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In February 2008, the government and the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) signed an Annex to the June 2007 Agreement on Accountability and Reconciliation. By the end of 2008 hopes of a final settlement had faded in the face of the repeated failure of LRA leader Joseph Kony to show up to sign the final peace agreement. Meanwhile, LRA forces continued to commit abuses against civilians outside Uganda. The parties agreed, however, to create a special division of the Ugandan High Court to try serious crimes committed during the conflict (1986–2006) and to broader accountability measures such as a truth commission, reparations, and traditional justice practices. In May 2008, judges were appointed to the special division. As the International Criminal Court (ICC)'s statute permitted national trials of its cases where certain requirements are satisfied, LRA leaders for whom ICC arrest warrants were issued could potentially be prosecuted by the special division, although only if the ICC judges determine that the national trials provide an adequate alternative.

In the meantime, warrants issued by the ICC for LRA leaders in 2005 remained outstanding. No major players—including the United States, the United Kingdom, the European Union, and the United Nations—took steps to ensure the apprehension of the suspects, although the European Parliament adopted a resolution calling on European Union and African Union member states and regional countries to help implement the warrants. The mandate of the Special Envoy of the United Nations secretary-general for the LRA-affected areas, Joaquim Chissano, was renewed for 2008. Throughout his tenure, he generally failed to stress the importance of justice for past crimes as a basis for any durable peace. After his June 2008 briefing, United Nations Security Council members could not agree on a position concerning the ICC. Meanwhile, the LRA attacked civilians in the Democratic Republic of Congo, the Central African Republic, and Southern Sudan.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 335; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 130, 132, 135.]

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: 1996.

On 15 September 2008, President Victor Yushchenko had a meeting with Minister of Education and Science Ivan Vakarchuk to discuss history teaching and the “objectivity of interpretation of certain historical facts in the textbooks”. Among the issues were Kiev’s ancestry as compared to Novgorod’s ancestry and the Holodomor (the famine that as a result of Stalin’s farm collectivization program killed millions of people in 1932–1933). According to Ukrainian researcher Karina Korostelina, the doctrine was called “scientific nationalism”. On 23 October 2008, the European Parliament labeled the Holodomor a crime against humanity and called on all of the former Soviet countries to open up their archives on the Holodomor.

[Sources: European Parliament, “Resolution on the Commemoration of the Holodomor, the Ukraine Artificial Famine (1932–1933)” (23 October 2008); Kyiv Post (30 March 2009).]

See also Russia.

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In April 2008, astronomer Nicholas Kollerstrom was stripped of his honorary post at University College London’s Department of Science and Technology Studies (1997–2008), after his Holocaust denial and anti-Semitic views on 9/11 were uncovered by bloggers. In October 2008, a European Arrest Warrant was issued in the United Kingdom to detain the Australian Frederick Toben and extradite him to Germany because he denied the Holocaust on an Australian website.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, “Debate: The Kollerstrom Question” (28 April 2008); Index on Censorship, “Extradition Will Make Dr. Toben a Martyr”. (28 April 2008);

In July 2008, the United Nations Human Rights Committee expressed concern that “a considerable time after murders (including those of human rights defenders) in Northern Ireland have occurred, several inquiries into these murders have still not been established or concluded, and that those responsible for these deaths have not yet been prosecuted”.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 341, 344.]

See also Russia, Rwanda, Uganda, Vatican.

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In January 2009, William Robinson ([1959]–), a Jewish sociologist at the University of California at Santa Barbara, sent the eighty students in his sociology of globalization class an e-mail (entitled “parallel images of Nazis and Israelis”) in which he compared more than a dozen graphic images of Jews in the Holocaust to pictures of Palestinians caught up in Israel’s recent Gaza offensive along with a statement in which he described Israel’s policies in Gaza as a “slow-motion genocide”. The complaints of two Jewish students who dropped the class, saying they felt intimidated by the e-mail, triggered a campus investigation and drew accusations of anti-Semitism from the Wiesenthal Center and the Anti-Defamation League, even when many students and faculty members voiced support for him. Robinson called the accusations and the campus investigation an attack on academic freedom; he said that the accusers confused his criticism of Israeli policies with anti-Semitism. Cleared of improper conduct on 25 June 2009, Robinson wanted a campus apology and an investigation into the action taken against him.

[Sources: Angeles Times (WWW-text; 30 April & 25 June 2009); Inside Higher Ed (WWW-text; 12 & 29 May 2009).]

On 17 February 2009, the 100th anniversary of Goyathlay (Geronimo; 1829–1909)—a leader of the Chiricahua Apache who fought against Mexican and American expansion into Apache tribal lands—his grandson, Harlyn Geronimo, sued the secret society Skulls and Bones to return Geronimo’s remains. In 1918, society members had allegedly invaded Geronimo’s grave at Fort Sill and stolen his skull, some bones and other items buried with him. Geronimo declared: “According to our traditions the remains of this sort, especially in this state when the grave was desecrated, need to be reburied with the proper rituals to return the dignity and let his spirits rest in peace”.

[Source: Fox News (WWW-text; 17 February 2009).]

On 26 February 2009, Secretary of Defense Robert Gates (Obama administration) lifted the blanket ban on news media coverage of the return of fallen soldiers. (See NCH Annual Reports 2005, 2006.)

[Source: National Security Archive, Update (26 February 2009).]

On 2 March 2009, federal authorities confirmed that 92 videotapes detailing the interrogation of detainees (including the use of illegal interrogation techniques) at secret prisons were destroyed in 2005 and 2006 by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The order was reportedly given by the former head of CIA clandestine operations, José A. Rodríguez Jr.

[Sources: Ifex, Alert (10 March 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 223.]

In April 2009, Guenter Lewy (1923–), a Jewish exile from Germany since 1939 and a professor emeritus of political science at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, who disputed the genocidal character of the 1915 Armenian massacres in his 2005 book The Armenian Massacres in Ottoman Turkey: A Disputed Genocide, sued the Southern Poverty Law Center (a group known for its studies of hate groups) for defamation. Two quotes from an article by David Holthouse, associate director of the center's quarterly magazine Intelligence Report, entitled "State of Denial: Turkey Entices U.S. Scholars, Law Makers to Cover Up Armenian Genocide" (Summer 2008), were cited as defamatory: "Lewy is one of the most active members of a network of American scholars...financed by hundreds of thousands of dollars each year from the government of Turkey, who promote the denial of the Armenian genocide". and "Lewy makes similar revisionist claims in his...book...and in frequent lectures...Revisionist historians who conjure doubt about the Armenian genocide and are paid by the Turkish government provided politicians with the intellectual cover they needed to claim they were refusing to dictate history rather than caving in to a foreign government's present-day interests". Backed by the Turkish American Legal Defense Fund, Lewy sought eight millions in damages because the accusations hurt his "scholarly credibility", falsely imputed academic corruption, fraud and deceit, and caused the loss of book sales and of speaking engagements. In November 2005, Lewy had been invited by Gazi University in Ankara, Turkey, to present a paper at an International Symposium on the "Development of Turkish-Armenian Relations and the Events of 1915". After attending, he had concluded that the conference was a political rally rather than a scholarly enterprise and had withdrawn his paper from publication. In 2007, Lewy also declared that his book had been rejected by eleven publishers, including four university presses, before the University of Utah Press published it.

[Sources: S. Jaschik, "Going after a Scholar's Critic", Inside Higher Ed (WWW-text; 4 May 2009); United States District Court, District of Columbia, Guenter Lewy versus Southern Poverty Law Center and David Holthouse: Complaint (2009).]

In April 2009, Clark University, Worcester, MA, canceled a campus talk by Norman Finkelstein (see NCH Annual Reports 2007, 2008) scheduled for 21 April. Its president, John Bassett, declared that his presence "would invite controversy and not dialogue or understanding", and would conflict with a Holocaust conference scheduled for 23–26 April 2009.

[Source: Boston Globe (10 April 2009).]

See also Azerbaijan, Bolivia, Colombia, Greece, Indonesia, Korea (South), Liberia, Palestinian Authority, Russia, Uganda.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

The 1986 Expiry Law remained in force. This law granted members of the security forces immunity from prosecution for crimes committed during the military government (1973–1985). However, the government excluded some cases previously covered by the law, allowing investigations to progress. Scores of former military officers were called to testify in the case against the former head of military government General Gregorio Álvarez (1981–1985) and Juan Larcebeau, a retired naval officer. Both men were accused of being co-authors of the enforced disappearances of more than thirty people. In October 2008, the Appeal Court changed the charge from enforced disappearances to “aggravated homicide”. The investigation continued into the 1976 abduction and enforced disappearance of 22 people returned to Uruguay from Argentina in a Uruguayan Air Force flight. The investigation into the enforced disappearance of Maria Claudia Garcia de Gelman, initially closed under the Expiry Law, was reopened in August 2008. The move was prompted by a petition from her daughter, María Macarena, based on new evidence that she was on the 1976 Uruguayan Air Force flight. María Macarena was born in detention and raised in another family, unaware of her true identity. Italy continued its efforts to prosecute Uruguayan military officers accused of abducting and torturing Uruguayan-Italian citizens in the context of Operation Condor, a joint plan by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to eliminate opponents.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 349–350.]

In 2008, several journalists were cleared of libel charges brought by former military officers named in their reports. In February 2008, a retired army major filed a suit against Roger Rodríguez of the newspaper La República for defamation and slander. The suit related to articles linking the retired major to the death of student Santiago Rodriguez Muela, who was shot dead in 1972 during an attack on a meeting of students, professors, and parents at the Liceo No 8 school in the capital, Montevideo. In April the court dismissed the case, but an appeal was pending at the end of 2008.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2009 (London 2009) 350.]

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

In 2008, the government continued to reject numerous calls for an independent international inquiry into the May 2005 Andijan massacre, when government forces killed hundreds of protestors, most of them unarmed. The circumstances surrounding the massacre have not been clarified, and those responsible for the killings have not been held accountable. The government continued to persecute anyone whom it deemed to have any connection to or information about the events. Refugees, who fled Uzbekistan in the immediate aftermath of the massacre and later returned, as well as their families, were a particular target of government pressure. They were subjected to interrogations, constant surveillance, ostracism, and in some cases overt threats to their lives, which triggered a new wave of refugees. Refugees in neighboring countries feared for their security because Uzbek security forces operated in some areas across the border, such as Osh, Kyrgyzstan. International pressure on the Uzbek government declined with the suspension and subsequent partial lifting of European Union sanctions.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 390, 435, 438.]

In August 2008, historian X [confidential name] (1970–), a deputy head and senior fellow at the Department of Central Asian and Middle East Studies at the Beruni Institute for Oriental Studies of the Academy of Sciences of Uzbekistan, Tashkent, and a senior lecturer in history, development policies, and religion studies at the Tashkent State Institute of Oriental Studies was harassed during interrogations by the Uzbek security service as a result of some of his research topics (notably ethnopolitics and democratization in Central Asia), his association with foreign scholars, and his visits to foreign universities (which were controversial after the European Union imposed sanctions on Uzbekistan following the May 2005 massacre in Andijan). On one occasion, he was forced to write a statement in which he “admitted” that his passport was false; it was confiscated for one month. X, who had a Ph.D in history from the Beruni Institute and a MA in political science from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe Academy in Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan, authored articles focusing on the Bukhara emirate in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the history of (West) Turkestan between 1919 and 1924, the relationship between Islam and democracy, and peace and stability in Central Asia.

[Source: Scholars at Risk, Case Uzbekistan 521 (New York 2008).]

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

In January 2009, it was revealed that British-born Bishop Richard Williamson (1940–), a member of the traditionalist Society of St Pius X (SSPX) whose excommunication was lifted that month, had denied the Holocaust in a November 2008 interview. As a result, Williamson was removed from his post as the head of a seminary in Argentina in early February 2009. On 12 February 2009, Pope Benedict XVI told American Jewish leaders that any denial of the Holocaust was “intolerable”, especially if it came from a clergyman. Expelled from Argentina, Williamson returned to the United Kingdom. On 27 February 2009, Williamson apologized for the offence he had caused by his Holocaust denial.

[Sources: BBC News (12 & 27 February 2009); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 210–211.]

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

In 2008, President Hugo Chávez declared that Simón Bolívar (1783–1830), the leader who liberated Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia from Spanish rule in the 1810s and 1820s, was assassinated by foreign enemies (including United States President Andrew Jackson, Spanish King Fernando VII, and the English court) instead of having died of tuberculosis. He established a commission that would investigate Bolívar’s death. Venezuelan historians, including the specialist in the history of Bolívar, Elías Pino, and Inés Quintero, secretary of the Academia Nacional de Historia, however, rejected the President’s hypothesis as fantasy. In 1963, a commission of experts of the Sociedad Venezolana de Historia de la Medicina (Venezuelan Society of the History of Medicine) and of the Academia had already come to the same conclusion.

[Source: M. Rico, “La reinención de la agonía y muerte de Bolívar”, El País (21 December 2008).]

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

On 10 September 2008, Ngô Quỳnh (?1984–), student and dissident writer, author of online dissenting articles, including “Viet Nam Needs To Compile a New History-book” and “Journey to Lang Son’s Dairy” (published on overseas websites), was arrested in Hanoi as he was on his way to the parish of Thai Ha, where a mass rally by Catholics protesting against government policy was taking place. He was detained at a labor camp in Ha Dong province. Indicted on 3 July 2009, he and five other peaceful democracy activists were charged with conducting anti-government propaganda, which carried a sentence of up to twelve years’ imprisonment.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (20 August 2009); International PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 31 December 2008 (London 2009) 63; International PEN, Rapid Action Network 47/08 (23 September 2008).]

On 25 August 2009, reporter Huy Duc was dismissed from the governmental daily Sai Gon Tiep Thi for posting criticism of the USSR on his personal blog on 23 August 2009. In the offending entry (<http://www.blogosin.org>), he had referred to the Berlin Wall as a “Wall of Shame”, condemned the USSR’s “purges” in East Germany, and called the USSR “an occupation force...that deprived people of their basic rights”.

[Source: Reporters without Borders, “Newspaper Dismisses Reporter over Blog Entry Critical of Soviet Union” (31 August 2009).]

On 28 August 2009, journalist Pham Doan Trang, editor of Tuan Vietnam, an online weekly that is a component of Vietnamnet, Vietnam’s most popular news website, was arrested. On 27 July 2009, she wrote an article in which she had criticized China’s role during the partition of Vietnam in 1954. In the past, she had condemned China’s territorial claims in the South China Sea.

[Source: Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (2 September 2009).]

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: 2003.

ZAMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: –.

In 2008, it was reported that access to public archives, including public records, was restricted by chapter 175 of the National Archives Act and allowed only at the archive director's discretion.

[Source: Article 19, Speaking Out for Free Expression (WWW-text; 2008).]

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

Zimbabwe's long history of impunity for politically motivated crimes worsened the political crisis. In 2008, those who committed past abuses remained free to carry out further violence and other crimes. Since 2000, the government had led an onslaught on the judiciary that included physical and verbal attacks against judges and bribes intended to compromise the impartiality and undermine the work of the judiciary.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2009 (Washington 2009) 142.]

See also Ethiopia.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington], Amnesty International [AI, London], Article 19 [A19, London], Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York], Index on Censorship [IOC, London], the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London], International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London], Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York], and other sources. It reports about the censorship of history, the persecution of historians around the globe, and related topics. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

This Annual Report and previous Annual Reports were compiled by Antoon De Baets and revised by Ingrid Sennema.

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In February 2007, the Amnesty Bill was introduced, absolving the government of responsibility for bringing to justice suspected perpetrators of past human rights violations. In December 2007, President Hamid Karzai stated that his administration did not yet have the capacity to arrest and prosecute those responsible for past human rights abuses. Those accused of such abuses included members of parliament as well as provincial government officials. There was no progress on the implementation of the Action Plan on Peace, Justice and Reconciliation, a five-year plan for transitional justice (part of the Afghanistan Compact) launched in February 2006.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 45–46; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 237.]

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The government took no steps to address the gross and widespread human rights abuses committed by armed groups and state security forces during the internal conflict (1992–2000) in which as many as 200,000 people were killed. In November 2007, the United Nations Human Rights Committee (HRC) called for the government to amend Articles 45 and 46 of Law 06-01 implementing the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation, which lend impunity to the security forces and criminalize public criticism of their conduct. On 6 February 2008, Algeria signed the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance but failed to take any steps to investigate the fate of thousands of victims of enforced disappearances. Under the aforementioned law, relatives can seek compensation if they obtain a death certificate from the authorities for the person who disappeared. Some families complained that they were pressurized to seek such certificates, while others refused to do so fearing that this would make any investigation impossible. The authorities told the HRC that they had selected 6,233 requests for compensation and had categorized some 17,000 cases as “killed terrorists”, but provided no details of the disappeared to whom these referred. Some families received death certificates stating that relatives who had disappeared had been killed while active in armed groups. It was not known how many families received compensation.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 50–51.]

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See Namibia.

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Since 2003 Argentina has made significant progress in prosecuting military and police personnel responsible for disappearances, killings, and torture during its last military dictatorship (1976–83). President Néstor Kirchner encouraged these prosecutions, reinforcing what began as a legal challenge to impunity in the courts. In 2003, several important cases were reopened after Congress annulled the 1986 “full stop” law and the 1987 “due obedience” law. In June 2005, the Supreme Court declared the laws unconstitutional. Since 2005 several federal judges have overruled the pardons (decreed by President Carlos Menem in 1989 and 1990) of former officials convicted of or facing trial for human rights violations. In April 2007, a federal court of appeals in Buenos Aires ruled that pardons granted to former military rulers Jorge Videla and Emilio Massera in 1989 for crimes under international law were unconstitutional and therefore null and void.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 15, 54–55; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008) 186–87.]

On 26 June 2007, two armed persons broke into the offices of the Comité de defensa de la salud, la ética profesional y los derechos humanos (Committee for the Defense of Health, Professional Ethics and Human Rights; CODESEDH) in Buenos Aires. A computer containing evidence and archives relating to several ongoing trials related to the period of military dictatorship (1976–83) were stolen.

[Source: Observatory for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, Steadfast in Protest: Annual Report 2007 (Paris/Geneva 2008) 106.]

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In January 2007, the Tasmanian Aboriginal Centre obtained a court injunction preventing all scientific investigations (including DNA and other non-destructive tests) of the skeletons of seventeen Aboriginal islanders stored in the London Natural History Museum. In May 2007, the skeletons were returned to the center to be cremated.

[Source: IOC, 3/07: 156.]

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

See United Kingdom.

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

In November 2007, freelance journalist Anar Mahmudoglu was harassed after publication of his book Lifetime Struggle, which contained a critical portrait of former President Heydar Aliyev. The newspapers XXI As, Republicans, and Azad Azerbaijan denounced him for his negative portrayal of Aliyev. The Presidential Administration and the Ministry of National Security marked the part related to the former president and sent the book to the Presidium of the National Science Academy, which dismissed Mahmudoglu from the academy. Mahmudoglu was also harassed by others in matters directly related to the book.

[Source: Institute for Reporter Freedom and Safety, Ifex Alert (16 January 2008).]

On 14 June 2008, an event organized by the “Che Guevara Fan Club” in the “Alaturka” Cafe to mark the eightieth birthday of Che Guevara (1928–67) was raided by police. Out of the approximately 25 people present, twenty were detained by police and taken to a police department. All were released after seven hours.

[Source: Institute for Reporter Freedom and Safety, Ifex Alert (16 June 2008).]

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

In early 2007 and again in January 2008, the Ministry of Islamic Affairs (MIA) banned Omar bin Al-Khattab, a Martyr, a novel by Abdulla Khalifa, published outside Bahrain, about Omar Ibn Al-Khattab (the second Caliph after the prophet Mohammed and regarded by Muslims as one of the “four righteously guided Caliphs”). MIA had evaluated the novel from a Sharia’ (religious) point of view and concluded that it defamed Omar and “fomented sectarianism” in society. A sentence reading that “Ibn Al-Khattab wobbled” was allegedly considered libelous. Khalifa’s earlier novel, Husain’s Head, was also banned.

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (23 January 2008).]

In June and September 2007, a coalition of human rights groups and opposition political societies sponsored workshops for setting up a truth and reconciliation mechanism to address torture and other serious human rights abuses committed prior to 2001. The government continues to insist that it considers such matters closed. In its November 2006 response to the review conducted by the United Nations Committee Against Torture, it had declared that the reform project of King Shaikh Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifahad “paved the way for the provision of humanitarian assistance and the realization of transitional justice, beginning with a general amnesty...closing a chapter on the past.” The authorities, however, did not prevent the transitional justice meetings from taking place and the minister of social development addressed the opening session of the June conference.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 463–64.]

On 19 July 2007, the Publication and Press Directorate of the Ministry of Information banned a book written by academic Nader Kathem, entitled Memory Exploitations: In a Pluralistic Society Saddled with History, a collection of recent press articles about history addressing the historical constraints on cultural pluralism in Bahrain.

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, BCHR/IFEX Flash (20 October 2007).]

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2007, demands increased to investigate serious human rights violations committed during the independence war against (West) Pakistan in 1971. However, as in the past, no action was taken by the government to implement the 1973 International Crimes (Tribunals) Act and no official commission was established to provide a comprehensive account of the 1971 events, to determine responsibilities and to make recommendations for reparation to the victims.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 65.]

In June 2008, it was discovered that the original versions of the hand-written proclamations of independence—drafted during the war against Pakistan in 1971 and serving as an interim constitution until December 1972—were missing. Some former government officials declared that they could have been lost, removed, or destroyed by the military government which seized power in 1975. Photocopies of some of the promulgations—signed by all cabinet ministers except then-imprisoned Sheikh Mujibur Rahman (Bangladesh's first prime minister)—did still exist.

[Source: BBC News (18 June 2008).]

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In June 2008, the Association for Battlefield Archaeology and Conservation (ABAC) sued the amateur archaeological association the Diggers in Ypres on the charge of illegal excavation because they had allegedly excavated World War I battlefields without a license and without properly documenting their work. For more than twenty years the Diggers, led by Patrick Van Wanzele, had searched the fields, excavating weapons, ammunition, and human remains in the process. Their work had led to the reburial of 215 soldiers.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (7 June 2008).]

See also Chad.

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In mid-September 2007, the cantonal Ministry of Education in Tuzla withdrew two new history textbooks about the twentieth century, written by, among others, Edis Dervišagić, because of their representation of Yugoslavia in World War II, its collapse in 1991, and the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1992–95.

[Source: Eckert: Das Bulletin, no. 2 (Winter 2007), 48, 50.]

Many perpetrators of human rights violations committed during the 1992–95 war continued to evade justice. The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) continued to try alleged perpetrators. Under the terms of the “completion strategy” laid down in United Nations Security Council Resolutions, ICTY was expected to complete all trials, including appeals, by 2010. Co-operation between ICTY and FBiH (Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina) and RS (Republika Srpska) authorities appeared to improve. In 2007, the two most wanted ICTY indictees, Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic, remained at large (Karadzic was arrested in Serbia for genocide in July 2008). In June 2007, Gojko Klicovic, former prime minister of Republika Srpska, was extradited from Serbia to Bosnia. He was charged with crimes against humanity. War crimes proceedings before domestic courts continued, including at the War Crimes Chamber within the FBiH State Court, although efforts to bring perpetrators to justice remained insufficient to provide justice to the victims, given the scale of the crimes committed and the potentially huge number of crimes to be investigated and prosecuted.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 70–71; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 373–74.]

According to estimates by the International Commission on Missing Persons (ICMP), over 13,000 persons who went missing during the 1992–95 war were still unaccounted for. Many of the missing persons, the majority of whom were Bosniak (Bosnian Muslim), were victims of enforced disappearances. Progress continued to be slow in transferring competencies from the FBiH and RS missing persons commissions to the national Missing Persons Institute (MPI). In November 2007, the FBiH Council of Ministers adopted a number of documents, including the MPI's statute, with a view to finally enabling the Institute to begin its activities.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 72; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 374.]

See also Montenegro.

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In August 2007, the federal government released a report entitled The Right to Memory and Truth on the results of an eleven-year investigation by the Special Commission on Political Deaths and Disappearances. The report detailed 475 cases of torture and disappearance during the military government (1964–85) and marked official recognition that human rights abuses were committed under the regime. The commission was unable to clarify important aspects of these crimes, including the whereabouts of the majority of the “disappeared,” because the Brazilian armed forces had never opened key archives from those years. In September 2007, the Superior Tribunal of Justice ordered the armed forces to open secret files and reveal what had happened to the remains of Brazilians who died or disappeared during the suppression of the Araguaia guerrilla uprising in 1971. Brazil never prosecuted those responsible for atrocities committed during military rule (1964–85). An amnesty law passed in 1979 pardoned government agents and members of armed political groups who had committed abuses.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 74; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 193–94.]

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Since 2006 the government has provisionally released thousands of prisoners accused of crimes connected to the assassination of President Melchior Ndadaye in 1993 and the subsequent civil war (1993–2005). Some had been detained for years without trial. In principle, they will appear before a truth commission. In June 2005, the United Nations (UN) Security Council directed that the government hold public consultations on transitional justice mechanisms to address crimes committed during the civil war. The proposed establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission and a special tribunal to investigate and prosecute such crimes had not been implemented. Initially, both sides could not agree on the issues of amnesty, the links between a truth and reconciliation commission and a special tribunal, and the independence of the prosecuting body. In May 2007, President Pierre Nkurunziza confirmed that no amnesty would be granted to those responsible for crimes under international law. Both sides agreed to undertake national consultations on the establishment of the two mechanisms, and on the establishment of a steering committee, comprised of members of the Burundian government, the UN and civil society. On 2 November 2007, the government signed an official agreement marking the start of a six-month consultation period. Despite this apparent progress, the government has yet to recognize the need for an independent prosecutor for the tribunal. The ruling National Council for the Defense of Democracy–Forces for the Defense of Democracy insisted that only cases in which reconciliation had failed would be brought to the tribunal. This position conflicts with international law principles, which hold that all serious crimes under international law must be prosecuted.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 82; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 85.]

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In June 2007, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC; Khmer Rouge Tribunal) became operational, ending a disagreement between national and international judges, and paving the way for investigations and prosecutions. By the end of 2007, five senior Khmer Rouge (KR) officials were in ECCC detention: Kaing Guek Iev (Duch), the former chief of S-21 (Tuol Sleng) prison; Pol Pot's deputy and so-called Brother Number Two, Nuon Chea; former KR Foreign Minister, Ieng Sary; former KR Social Affairs Minister, Ieng Thirith; and former KR Head of State Khieu Samphan. All five were charged with crimes against humanity, and three of them also with war crimes. In November 2007, a first hearing was held by the pre-trial chamber. Trials were expected to begin in April 2008.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 83; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 257–58.]

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 28 August 2007, under pressure from war veterans' groups and some politicians, the Canadian War Museum (CWM; the national museum of military history), Ottawa, adjusted the wording on a panel dealing with the 1945 firebombing of Dresden. The original text was as follows: "The value and morality of the strategic bomber offensive against Germany remains bitterly contested. Bomber Command's aim was to crush civilian morale and force Germany to surrender by destroying its cities and industrial installations. Although Bomber Command and American attacks left 600,000 Germans dead and more than five million homeless, the raids resulted in only small reductions of German war production until late in the war." In June 2007, a report by the Senate subcommittee on veterans' affairs had suggested that the facts of the exhibition be presented in a way that was less offensive to veterans. A few days after the release of the report, CWM director Joe Geurts resigned without explanation. In May 2005, veterans had protested against two paintings in the CWM because they showed the torture of a Somalian teenager by a Canadian soldier in 1993; they had also protested the inclusion of Holocaust exhibits at CWM, calling them "inappropriate".

[Source: Financial Post (28 August 2007).]

See also Iran, United States.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In May 2007, the International Criminal Court (ICC) prosecutor's office announced that they would investigate crimes committed in the Central African Republic during the 2002–3 fighting, and would continue to monitor the current conflict. In October 2007, the ICC opened a new field office in Bangui.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 93.]

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In February 2007, the long-standing campaign to bring former dictator Hissène Habré to justice reached a turning point, when Senegalese President Abdoulaye Wade signed into law measures to remove the primary legal obstacles to the trial. In February 2000, Habré had been arrested in Senegal on charges of crimes against humanity and torture stemming from his 1982–90 rule in Chad. In 2001, Senegal had refused to prosecute him and in 2005 it had refused to extradite him to face charges in Belgium. However, in 2006, Dakar agreed to abide by a July 2006 African Union decision that Habré should be put on trial in Senegal. The 2007 legislation allows such a trial by permitting Senegal to prosecute gross human rights violations, even when committed outside the country. By the end of 2007, an investigating judge had not been appointed.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 92, 258–59; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008) 97.]

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In October 2006, President Michelle Bachelet announced that she would present a bill to prevent the application of the amnesty law (in force since 1978) in cases of grave human rights abuse. Her announcement came in response to a ruling of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights that the law was incompatible with the American Convention on Human Rights. However, the bill has been delayed by differences of opinion on its necessity given the advances in the courts and the possibility that legislation might be challenged in the Constitutional Court.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 195–96.]

A number of military officials and former secret service agents were found guilty of involvement in abductions, torture and killings during the military government of Augusto Pinochet (1973–90). In October 2007, Manuel Contreras, former head of the secret service, and three former agents were sentenced to between ten and fifteen years' imprisonment for an abduction in 1974. The Supreme Court ruled that neither amnesties nor statutes of limitations may block the trials or punishment. However, in November 2007, it acquitted a retired colonel of the enforced disappearance of three people in 1973 on the basis that the statute of limitations had expired. This judgment was considered a setback for all those seeking justice. As of July 2007, 458 former military personnel and civilian collaborators were facing charges for enforced disappearances, extrajudicial execution, and torture; 167 had been convicted; and 35 were serving prison sentences.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 15, 92; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 195–96.]

See also Peru.

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 27 May 1992, Hu Shigen (1954–), a lecturer at the Beijing Language and Culture Institute, political activist and dissident writer, was detained in Beijing and on 27 September 1992 charged with “counterrevolutionary crimes” for planning 4 June 1989 memorial activities in many of China’s major cities. A founding member of the China Freedom and Democracy Party (CFDP) (1991) and China Free Trade Union (CFTU) (1991), Hu had drafted a number of key documents for both organizations and campaigned for government accountability concerning the violent suppression of the Democracy Movement in June 1989. On 16 December 1994, he was charged with “leading a counterrevolutionary organization” and “counterrevolutionary propaganda”, and sentenced to twenty years’ imprisonment and five years’ deprivation of political rights. On 15 June 1995, his sentence was upheld on appeal by the Supreme Court. On 16 December 2005, after being interviewed by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Torture, he reportedly received a seven-month reduction to his sentence. In August 2007, his sentence was reduced by two years. His health was reportedly very poor. On 26 August 2008, Hu was released.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (27 August 2008); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 33–34; PEN American Center, Writers Demand Release of Jailed Colleagues Before Beijing Olympics (10 December 2007).]

In April 2007, the film Though I Am Gone, by film maker Hu Jie, which told the story of a female principal beaten to death by Red Guards in the Cultural Revolution, was to be screened at YunFest, a documentary festival held by the Yunnan Academy of Social Sciences in Kunming, Yunnan Province, southwest China. The authorities canceled the festival at the last minute so that the film could not be shown. In June 1999, Hu had resigned from the Jiangsu provincial bureau of the official Xinhua News Agency and become an independent film maker. Another of his documentaries was In Search of the Soul of Lin Zhao ([2006]), also about the Cultural Revolution; when an instructor at an arts college screened it, she received one year of reeducation through labor.

[Sources: IOC, 2/08: 5, 68–73; Though I Am Gone (10 parts; YouTube).]

On 24 April 2007, Long Xinmin, head of the General Administration of Press and Publication, was demoted following, inter alia, a public outcry over his decision to ban eight books, several of which were said to be about sensitive episodes in China's recent history. On 26 April 2007, one of the authors of the books, Zhang Yihe, filed a lawsuit demanding a repeal of the order. In [2004], the book Days of Old Do Not Disappear Like Smoke, a memoir about intellectuals purged during the Anti-Rightist Campaign (June 1957 until 1958), written by Zhang Yihe, the daughter of one of them, had been banned. It continued to be circulated in pirate copy. The unabridged version, entitled The Last Aristocrats, was later published in Hong Kong.

[Sources: IOC, 3/07: 111; Independent Chinese PEN Center, "Zhang Yihe Receives the ICPC Second Freedom to Write Award" (Beijing 31 October 2004).]

In July 2007, history teacher Dolma Kyab [See NCH #44; NCH Annual Report 2006] was reportedly moved from a prison in Lhasa to a labor camp in Xining, Qinghai Province.

[Source: PEN, Rapid Action Network (8 August 2007).]

On 24 August 2007, writer and human rights activist Lu (Lü) Gengsong ([1956]–) [See NCH #50] was arrested in Hangzhou, Zhejiang Province, apparently following the on-line publication of articles critical of the authorities. His home was searched and his computer and personal files were reportedly confiscated. His wife was also taken in for questioning as a “criminal suspect” but released three hours later. On 29 September 2007, he was charged with “inciting subversion of state power” (an initial charge of “illegal possession of state secrets” was dropped). A history graduate from Zhejiang University, Lü taught at the Zhejiang Higher Professional School of Public Security (a police training academy) before being expelled in 1993 because of his pro-democracy activities. He went on to become a freelance writer, and has published several books on political reform, including A History of Chinese Community Party Corrupt Officials (Hong Kong 2000). He is known for his reporting on human rights violations and his political commentaries published on the Internet. He is also an active member of the banned China Democracy Party (CDP). After his arrest, more than a thousand writers and activists in China signed a petition demanding his release. On 5 February 2008, Lü was sentenced to four years’ imprisonment after a one-day closed-door trial on 22 January 2008, during which reference was made to five of his articles.

[Sources: IOC, 1/08: 195; 2/08: 181; PEN, Rapid Action Network (3 October 2007 & 6 February 2008); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007, 35.]

On 5 February 2008, journalist Ching Cheong [See NCH Annual Report 2007] was released on parole, reportedly because he had served more than half of his sentence. He returned to Hong Kong. [Source: IOC, 2/08: 181.]

On 7 May 2008, the Chinese organizers of the Sixteenth World Congress of the International Union of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences postponed the congress scheduled to take place in Kunming, Yunnan province (more than 1,200 miles from Beijing) in July 2008 (ahead of the Olympic Games in August). More than 6,000 participants had registered to attend the congress, which would broach issues such as ethnic and linguistic differences, history, and archaeology.

[Sources: C. Bodeen, “China Nixes Major Academic Conference Ahead of Olympic Games” (7 May 2008); M. Delaney, “Beijing Cancels Anthropology Congress” (18 May 2008).]

Around 4 June 2008, police in various provinces issued warnings not to participate in memorial gatherings related to the Tiananmen Square massacre of 4 June 1989 in which at least 2,000 Chinese students and workers died. They continued to scrutinize all sensitive words and phrases about the anniversary. Any attempt to search for “Liu Si”—the Chinese abbreviation for 4 June—on the Baidu or Sohu search engines was completely blocked and resulted in the connection to the site being restarted. Ding Zilin, whose son Jiang Jieliang was killed during the June 1989 massacre, posted an open letter to the authorities on the Tiananmen Mothers website (<http://www.tiananmenmother.org>) calling for the national flag to be flown at half mast in honor of the Tiananmen victims as it was for the victims of the May 2008 earthquake. The website was blocked in China.

[Sources: International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Update (5 June 2008); Reporters without Borders, Ifex Update (4 June 2008).]

During the unrest in Tibet in early 2008, historian Wang Lixiong (1953–) and Tibetan writer (1966–) Tsering Woenser (also Öser), authors of the book Mémoire interdite: Témoignages sur la Révolution culturelle au Tibet (2008; Prohibited Memory: Witnesses of the Cultural Revolution in Tibet), were put under house arrest after speaking to reporters. She had declared that she wanted the Chinese “to learn the truth about Tibetan history, culture, religion and traditions.” In June 2004, she had been dismissed from her position at the Tibet Autonomous Region Literature Association, and left Lhasa for Beijing. Her books were banned in mainland China. In April 2008, her house arrest was suspended. On 27 May 2008, her email and blog (located at <http://woenser.middle-way.net>) became the target of cyber-attacks. Her web-logs had been shut down earlier.

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué (4 March 2008); PEN, Ifex Press Release (6 March 2008); PEN, Ifex Update (28 May 2008); Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Update (12 January 2007; 7 March 2008).]

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Reports of extrajudicial executions of civilians by the army have increased substantially in recent years, according to the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights as well as local groups, including the Colombian Commission of Jurists. In July 2007, retired army Colonel Alfonso Plazas Vega was arrested for his part in the enforced disappearance of eleven people during a military assault on the Palace of Justice in Bogotá after M-19 guerrillas took hostage those inside in November 1985. Over 100 people died during the military assault, including twelve Supreme Court judges. In September 2007, Attorney General Mario Iguarán said there was strong evidence that many of those who disappeared were alive when they left the building. In October 2007, former justice minister and Senator Alberto Santofimio was sentenced to 24 years' imprisonment in connection with the killing of presidential candidate Luis Carlos Galán in 1989. In November 2007, it was made public that a team from the Office of the Attorney General had reopened investigations into 294 of the thousands of killings of members of the left-wing party Patriotic Union (Unión Patriótica) since 1985. Paramilitaries and the security forces were believed to have been responsible for most of these killings.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 98–99; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008) 201.]

Only some ten per cent of more than 31,000 demobilized paramilitaries qualified for inclusion in the Justice and Peace Law (JPL) under which those who lay down their arms can benefit from significantly reduced prison sentences in return for confessions about human rights violations and reparations to their victims. With only some twenty investigative units to handle thousands of cases, the process progressed slowly. Although paramilitary leaders who confessed revealed some information about their victims, information on the latter's identities and the whereabouts of their bodies remained sketchy. More than 1,100 bodies were exhumed from numerous mass graves in 2006–7, but most of these were discovered as a result of information from rank-and-file paramilitaries outside the JPL process. The vast majority of bodies remained unidentified. Most of the at least four million hectares of land estimated to have been stolen by paramilitaries had yet to be identified and very little land had been returned to its rightful owners. Most paramilitaries escaped effective investigation through Decree 128 and Law 782, which granted de facto amnesties to those not under investigation for human rights abuses and who admitted to being members of paramilitary groups, an offence known as “conspiracy to commit a crime”. However, in July 2007, the Supreme Court of Justice ruled that membership of paramilitary groups was not a political crime and, as such, amnesties were not applicable. This left some 19,000 paramilitaries in legal limbo.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 98.]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In 2007, few military or civilian authorities were held accountable for past crimes. Warlords and militia leaders continue to be awarded top army positions instead of facing justice for their abuses. In January 2007, however, judges at the International Criminal Court (ICC) decided that there was sufficient evidence against its first suspect in custody, Ituri warlord Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, charged with enlisting, subscribing, and using child soldiers. The trial, the first in ICC history, was scheduled to start in March 2008. In October 2007, the government surrendered Germain Katanga, former commander of another Ituri armed group, to the ICC. For his involvement in killings, use of child soldiers, sexual enslavement, and pillaging allegedly committed in Ituri District in 2003, he was indicted by the ICC on charges of crimes against humanity and war crimes.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 113; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008) 105, 109.]

On 22–23 March 2007, the roof of the Archives nationales du Congo (Arnaco; National Archives of Congo) was destroyed during violence in Kinshasa between Congolese government troops backing the newly elected President Joseph Kabila and “rebel” soldiers fighting for former opposition leader and failed presidential candidate Jean-Pierre Bemba.

[Source: G. Convents, “Les Archives nationales du Congo en danger”, Association belge pour l’histoire contemporaine, 2007, no. 2, 9–11.]

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In November 2007, the Ministry of Security and Public Order banned a commemoration of the May 1999 disappearance of 300 persons (in the wake of the civil war) planned by NGOs and families of victims, saying it would disturb public order. [See Annual Reports 2004–6.]

[Source: Observatory for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, Steadfast in Protest: Annual Report 2007 (Paris/Geneva 2008) 70.]

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) continued to try alleged perpetrators of serious violations of international humanitarian law during the 1991–95 war. The Croatian judiciary continued to investigate and prosecute war crimes. However, in the majority of cases criminal proceedings were related to cases where the victims were ethnic Croats. Despite significant developments with regard to crimes committed against Croatian Serbs in Osijek, there continued to be widespread impunity for crimes committed by members of the Croatian Army and Croatian police forces.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 104–5.]

Serbs continue to make up the vast majority of defendants and convicted war criminals in Croatia, a disproportion so large that it suggested an anti-Serb bias. According to statistics released by the state prosecutor's office in May 2007, of 3,666 people charged with war crimes since 1991, 3,604 were prosecuted for involvement in aggression against Croatia, while 62 were members of the Croatian armed forces. The absence of an agreed threshold for determining when acts should be prosecuted as war crimes may also provide part of the explanation for the disparity. In absentia trials are opposed by the prosecutor's office in Zagreb, but continue to take place for war crimes with defendants mostly being Serbs: at the end of October 2007, 19 of the 23 defendants on trial in absentia were Serbs. Trials against Croats for wartime abuses were far more likely to result in acquittals.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 380–81.]

On 12 February 2008, Drago Hedl, editor of the satirical weekly Feral Tribune, received an anonymous letter at his home address containing a death threat, probably because he had written a series of articles concerning war crimes committed by the Croat army against Croatian Serb civilians in the eastern city of Osijek in 1991. Several other individuals involved in the trial for war crimes over the civilian deaths received the same letter, which contained warnings and a drawing of a skull. Feral Tribune was also sued in defamation for one million kuna by Branimir Glava, who had been charged with war crimes. The newspaper claimed that its reporting on the case against Glava (who was released on bail) had led to death threats against its journalists, including Hedl, and against witnesses.

[Sources: International Press Institute, Ifex Alert (20 February 2008); IOC, 2/08: 183; World Association of Newspapers, Ifex Update (27 February 2008).]

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 4 January 2008, the Education and Culture Ministry of northern Cyprus announced that it had rewritten its history textbooks since 2004. Minister Canan Öztoprak said that pictures of atrocities such as the mass murders of Turkish Cypriot civilians in December 1963 by the Greek Cypriot militia were deeply disturbing for children. Such pictures were removed and replaced with others that still explained the events but did not depict the atrocities in such detail.

[Sources: C. Makriyianni & C. Psaltis, "The Teaching of History and Reconciliation," Cyprus Review (Spring 2007), 58; "North Adopts Fresh Approach to History", Turkish Daily News (4 January 2008).]

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #17 (2000).

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

DJIBOUTI

Last Annual Report entry: —.

On 18 March 2007, Jean-Paul Noël Abdi, President of the Djibouti League of Human Rights, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment on charges of divulging false news and defamation following publication by Abdi of an information sheet on 3 March 2007 entitled "Le Day, zone de non-droit" (The Day, an area where the law does not apply), in which he reported the discovery of a mass grave in the village of Day (Tadjourah district), containing the bodies of seven civilians reportedly killed by government forces on 1 January 1994. He also denounced the rape of a young girl by a sergeant of the Presidential Guard in Day in February 2007. On 11 April 2007, he was sentenced on appeal to one year's imprisonment (eleven months of which were suspended) and a fine. In June 2007, his lawyers lodged an appeal with the Court of Cassation.

[Source: Observatory for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, Newsletter no 42 (April–June 2007) 7.]

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances criticized the government for failing to resolve some 2,270 cases of enforced disappearance during the internal armed conflict (1980–92). It highlighted the role of the 1993 Amnesty Law which allows perpetrators of human rights violations, including enforced disappearance, to evade prosecution. The National Assembly approved an annual day of remembrance to commemorate the children who were victims of enforced disappearance during the conflict, in accordance with the ruling of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. In March 2007, Rufina Amaya, the last remaining survivor of the El Mozote massacre, died of natural causes. According to reports, the El Salvadorian Armed Forces killed 767 people in El Mozote and surrounding areas in an operation carried out in December 1980. To date nobody has been brought to justice for this massacre or others that occurred during the conflict.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 16, 122.]

ERITREA

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In March 2007, two information ministry employees were arrested: Ibrahim Abdella, a music archive employee at Eri-TV, and a news archive employee.

[Source: Ifex Communiqué (10 July 2007).]

ESTONIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

See European Union.

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In January 2007, a court convicted former President Mengistu Hailemariam of genocide in absentia, and sentenced him to life imprisonment. Mengistu, the leader of the former Dergue military government (1974–90), lived in Zimbabwe under the protection of the government there. On appeal in May 2008, Mengistu was sentenced to death. In February 2007, 33 members of the former government who had been detained since 1991 and convicted in December 2006 of genocide and mass killings were sentenced to life imprisonment or long prison terms. Trials of other former officials for killings during the “Red Terror” campaign against “anti-revolutionaries” (1977–79) were almost completed.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 129; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 120.]

EUROPEAN UNION

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 19–20 April 2007, the Council of the European Union (EU) reached a general approach on a Framework Decision on Combating Racism and Xenophobia. It established that the following intentional conduct would be punishable in all EU member states: “(1) publicly inciting to violence or hatred...directed against a group of persons or a member of such a group defined by reference to race, colour, religion, descent or national or ethnic origin; (2) publicly condoning, denying or grossly trivialising (a) crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes...directed against a group of persons or a member of such a group defined by reference to race, colour, religion, descent or national or ethnic origin, and (b) crimes defined by the Tribunal of Nuremberg directed against a group of persons or a member of such a group defined by reference to race, colour, religion, descent or national or ethnic origin. The agreement avoided singling out Holocaust denial, and Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania were persuaded to drop their request for a reference to “Stalinist” crimes to be included in the agreement.

[Sources: European Union (Council), Framework Decision on Combating Racism and Xenophobia (April 2007); & reaction: Luigi Cajani (historian), Europe Moves To Censor Historians (July 2007); & motion (General Assembly of the International Committee of Historical Sciences) (September 2007): all texts on Topics page of <http://www.concernedhistorians.org>; IOC, 3/07: 115.]

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In October 2007, history teachers protested when President Nicolas Sarkozy ordered that a farewell letter written by schoolboy Guy Môquet to his family before his execution by the Nazis be read to all lycée students in France in honor of patriotism and the Resistance. Many teachers and schools refused to take part in the commemoration with unions denouncing the order as “intolerable political interference” and exploitation and manipulation of history for political ends.

[Source: J. Marshall, “France: Historians Combat Politicians’ ‘Official History’”, University World News (13 January 2008).]

See also Iran.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 7–8 April 2007, about eighteen metres of Berlin Wall fragments were removed from the center of Berlin by the Federal Civil Engineering and Planning Office to make way for new office blocks, despite protests from residents claiming that it was a cultural and historical artifact.

[Source: IOC, 3/07: 113.]

See also Canada.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The government continued to pay some financial reparations for human rights abuses under former governments, in accordance with the recommendations of the National Reconciliation Commission.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 140.]

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 25 September 2007—after elections which brought a more conservative government to power under the same prime minister—the new Minister of Education and Religious Affairs Evripídes Stylianídes withdrew the history textbook of Maria Repoussi and others [See NCH Annual Report 2007] under pressure from the right-wing political party Laos (Popular Orthodox Rally Party) and temporarily replaced it with an old one from 1989.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad, 26 September 2007.]

On 4 December 2007, Panayote Dimitras, spokesperson of Greek Helsinki Monitor (GHM), testified as a prosecution witness in the trial of author Kostas Plevris. While on 13 December 2007 Plevris, a lawyer and author of the Holocaust-denying book Jews: The Whole Truth was convicted of inciting racial hatred and given a fourteen-month suspended sentence (his co-defendants being acquitted), Dimitras became the target of a hate campaign. He and other GHM staff, along with Jewish activists who had testified against Plevris, were subjected to insults, threats, and racist attacks on the Internet and in the extreme right-wing press. For example, an extreme right-wing youth group posted a video clip of an attack on Dimitras during the trial on the video-sharing site YouTube and posted insults, death threats, and anti-Semitic messages underneath. In addition, Plevris launched a series of legal actions against representatives of GHM and the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece (KIS), claiming he was defamed by their complaints, and seeking compensation. Trial dates are set for later in 2008. The 2007 Plevris trial was the first of its kind in Greece, under legislation passed in 1979.

[Source: Ifex Communiqué, 17–3 (22 January 2008).]

See also United States.

GRENADA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The prosecutors and investigators who handle human rights violations from the civil war (1960–96) received grossly inadequate training and resources. The courts routinely failed to resolve judicial appeals and motions efficiently, allowing defense attorneys to engage in dilatory legal maneuvering. The army and other state institutions failed to cooperate fully with investigations into abuses committed by their current or former members. The police did not provide adequate protection to judges, prosecutors, and witnesses involved in politically sensitive cases. Of the 626 massacres documented by the 1999 United Nations Truth Commission, only two cases have been successfully prosecuted in the Guatemalan courts. In April 2007, the Constitutional Court confirmed the lower courts' sentencing of Colonel Byron Disrael Lima Estrada, Captain Byron Lima Oliva, and priest Mario Orantes Nájera to twenty years' imprisonment on charges of being accomplices in the 1998 murder of Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera [See NCH #13; see NCH Annual Reports 1998–2001, 2003–4]. The discovery in July 2005 of approximately 70 to 80 million documents of the disbanded National Police, including files on Guatemalans who were murdered and disappeared during the armed conflict, could play a key role in the prosecution. Yet there is no legal framework in place to ensure adequate long-term management of the archive, nor to regulate public access to its files. In July 2007, a Guatemalan court of appeals ordered the declassification of military documents from the 1980s.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 210–12.]

On 26 September 2005, in a landmark ruling, Spain's Constitutional Court held that, in accordance with the principle of universal jurisdiction, cases of alleged genocide committed during Guatemala's internal armed conflict (1960–96) could be prosecuted in the Spanish courts, even if no Spanish citizens were involved. On 7 July 2006, Spanish Judge Pedraz issued international arrest warrants against a group of eight former high-ranking Guatemalan military officials and in late 2006 the Spanish government requested their extradition. The extradition proceedings, however, were delayed due to the defendants' numerous appeals. In December 2007, the Guatemalan Constitutional Court ruled that warrants and extradition requests issued by the Spanish judge would not be implemented. In September 2007, General José Efraín Ríos Montt, former President and part of this group, was elected to Congress and so gained parliamentary immunity. A case presented in 2000 against the group in the Guatemalan judicial system made no progress throughout 2007. In addition, the government refused to release 25-year-old military documents allegedly containing evidence that the widespread human rights violations were part of an intentional military strategy during the conflict. The United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances criticized the government for failing to make any significant progress in determining the fate of approximately 45,000 people who remained disappeared.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 16–17, 143; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 213–14.]

In February 2007, an employee of the Center for Legal Action on Human Rights (Centro para la Acción Legal en Derechos Humanos, CALDH) was briefly kidnapped and several other members of CALDH's legal team received written and oral threats. In 2007, members of the Guatemalan Foundation for Forensic Anthropology (Fundación de Antropología Forense de Guatemala, FAFG) continued to receive death threats in connection with their work of exhuming bodies buried in clandestine cemeteries throughout Guatemala. Others involved in human rights prosecutions are also routinely threatened or attacked, including justice officials, forensic experts, plaintiffs, and witnesses. Journalists, labor activists, and others who have denounced abuses by the authorities are also subject to violence and intimidation. Guatemalan human rights organizations said that 158 of such acts of violence or intimidation were reported between January and August 2007. There is widespread consensus among local and international observers that the people responsible for these acts of violence and intimidation are affiliated with private, secretive, and illegally armed networks or organizations, commonly referred to in Guatemala as “clandestine groups.” These groups appear to have links to both government officials and organized crime—which give them access to considerable political and economic resources. In August 2007, Congress approved the creation of an International Commission Against Impunity in Guatemala. The commission, organized under the auspices of the United Nations, would aid national authorities in the investigation and prosecution of members of these clandestine groups.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 142; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 212–13.]

Guatemalan human rights organizations reported that between January and August 2006 161 acts of violence or intimidation took place against Guatemalans seeking justice for past abuses; between January and August 2007, there were 158 such acts.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 208; 2008 (2008), 213.]

GUINEA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999).

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #6 (1997).

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 12 August 2007, Lovinsky Pierre-Antoine ([1953]–), a psychologist and political and human rights activist, was abducted. In November 2007, human rights activist Wilson Mesilien ([1968]–) was threatened several times. Both were founding members (1996–) and coordinators of the Fondasyon Trant Septanm (30 September Foundation; named after the date of the 1991 military coup during which President Jean-Bertrand Aristide was ousted). The Fondasyon pressed for an end to impunity for past abuses and reparation to victims of the 1991–94 military regime (when an estimated 3,000 persons were killed) and to the victims of the transitional government of 2004–6. Since 1996, the Fondasyon members have carried out weekly marches in Port-au-Prince and other towns in memory of the victims. During a tour of a photo-exhibition of these victims, they also gathered signatures to amend the Constitution in order to abolish the Haitian army. Days before his abduction, Pierre-Antoine had announced his intention to stand as Senator in the elections initially scheduled for December 2007 under the banner of the Fanmi Lavalas Party (a left-wing political party led by Aristide). The threats and abduction could reportedly come from people connected with the former military. Pierre-Antoine had been a grass-roots community organizer for several years. During Aristide's last presidency (2001–4), he had been appointed General Coordinator of the National Office on Migration. He left Haiti and went into exile during the transitional government and returned in February 2006 after René Préval had been elected president for the third time. [See NCH #53.]

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 148; AI, Urgent Action (18 December 2007); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2008 (Washington 2008), 217.]

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In the night between 1 and 2 May 2007, vandals desecrated the grave of János Kádár, the last Communist ruler (1956–89), and removed his skull and several bones. Graffiti reading “a murderer and traitor may not rest in holy ground” was found nearby.

[Source: BBC News Online (3 May 2007).]

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

A majority of police officers responsible for serious human rights violations during the 1984–94 civil unrest in Punjab continued to evade justice. Following violent attacks by Sikh militants, security forces had illegally detained, tortured, executed, or disappeared thousands of people during counterinsurgency operations. The findings of a Central Bureau of Investigation probing into allegations of unlawful killings of 2,097 people who were cremated by the police had still not been made fully public, nine years after the investigation was launched. The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) awarded compensation to the relatives of 1,298 victims of such killings in one district, Amritsar. However, the NHRC was criticized for the slow pace of its investigations, and in October 2007 a commission appointed by the NHRC in 2006 to examine compensation claims was criticized by human rights organizations for various failings.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 154; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 274.]

In 2007, a number of attacks occurred on places of religious worship, including a bomb blast at the Sufi shrine in Ajmer in October. The Indian government succeeded in preventing communal riots following this and other attacks. It failed, however, to prosecute most of those who instigated or participated in religious mob violence.

* Despite national and international condemnation, the Gujarat state government continued to protect those responsible for the killing of Muslims during the 2002 riots. Perpetrators of the violence indicated in the media that members of the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) were implicated in the violence, yet no substantive investigation was carried out. Little action was taken over an official report that more than 5,000 displaced families continued to live in “sub-human” conditions in Gujarat.

* After more than a decade of hearings, a special court convicted 100 people for their involvement in the 1993 serial bomb attacks in Mumbai. However, the individuals believed responsible for attacks upon Muslims in January 1993, which preceded the bomb blasts, are yet to be prosecuted and punished.

* Despite promises made by the Prime Minister in 2005, there was also no progress in justice for victims of the 1984 anti-Sikh riots.

* In Jammu and Kashmir, state and non-state actors continued to enjoy impunity for torture, deaths in custody, abductions, and unlawful killings. A human rights organization reported that in the past eighteen years 1,051 people had been victims of enforced disappearance in Baramulla district alone.

* In November 2007 in Assam, a commission of inquiry into the unlawful killings between 1998 and 2001 of 35 individuals associated with the United Liberation Front of Asom published its findings. It concluded that the killings had been carried out by surrendered members of the organization at the behest of a former chief minister and the state police. It remained unclear if anyone would be brought to justice.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 153–54; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 276.]

In May 2007, the art history archives of the Maharaja Sayajirao University in Vadodara, Gujarat, were temporarily closed after the arrest of an art student who had depicted a Hindu goddess in a controversial way in one of his paintings.

[Source: IOC, 3/07: 17–23, 114.]

In September 2007, a case was presented in the Supreme Court against the $560 million Sethusamudram Ship Canal Project, which aimed to create a navigable sea route around the Indian peninsula so ships could avoid going around Sri Lanka. The petitioners argued that the planned route would damage the Ram Sethu (also called Adam's bridge)—the natural structure that joined Sri Lanka to the Asian continent during the last Ice Age—but that they believed was 1,750,000 years old and hence synchronous with the golden period of deity Rama's rule. When the government submitted an affidavit saying "mythological texts" could not "incontrovertibly prove" the existence of Lord Rama or the construction of the Ram Sethu, opposition demonstrations forced Minister of Culture and Tourism Amibika Soni to suspend two directors of the archaeological service, and the government to withdraw the affidavit on 14 September 2007.

[Source: M. Singh, "India's Debate Over Sacred Geography", Time (18 September 2007).]

On 25 February 2008, Akhil Bharatiya Vidyarthi Parishad activists, led by Vikas Dahiya, vandalized the office of S.Z.H. Jafri, head of the history department at Delhi University, and allegedly manhandled him, in protest against the B.A. History (Honours) syllabus. They claimed that a portion of it—an essay by A.K. Ramanujan entitled "Three Hundred Ramayanas: Five Examples and Three Thoughts on Translation" for the course on "Ancient Indian Culture"—contained "objectionable" references to Hindu gods.

[Source: "Historian's Office in India Vandalized by Activists", The Hindu (26 February 2008).]

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Some progress was made in addressing human rights crimes of the Suharto era (1965/67–98). In December 2006, the Constitutional Court declared unconstitutional a law establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). The law empowered the TRC to award amnesties to perpetrators of past crimes and barred victims from taking any future legal action against them. Reparations to victims were made contingent upon the latter's signing formal statements exonerating the perpetrators. The Court declared that provisions of the TRC law violated Indonesia's international obligations and domestic laws. The decision came after two years of legal challenges by Indonesian human rights groups.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 280.]

In June 2007, dancers performing a traditional local dance in front of President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono were arrested after they raised the Maluku independence flag in Ambon, Maluku province. During interrogation they were allegedly beaten and threatened. Most of them were charged with "rebellion".

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 155.]

In late February 2008, Bersihar Lubis, a columnist with the Indonesian-language daily Koran Tempo, was sentenced to one month's imprisonment for "insulting" the Attorney General's Office. In an article written in March 2007, he had condemned the burning of history textbooks that offered a different interpretation of the 1965–66 events to the official version [See NCH Annual Report 2007]. [Sources: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 280; P. J. Tan, "The Legacy of the Suharto Era Lingers in School History Books", Inside Indonesia, 92 (April–June 2008).]

See also Timor-Leste.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Central African Republic; Congo (Democratic Republic); Ivory Coast; Morocco; Namibia; Peru;

Sudan.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In July 2007, security forces arrested six Amir Kabir University students who were staging a peaceful sit-in in commemoration of the anniversary of the 1999 student protests violently suppressed by the government.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 473.]

In 2002–3, [confidential name] (1980–), a history student at Tehran University since 1999 (BA in 2003), joined student demonstrations against the execution of Hashem Aghajari [See NCH #28 and NCH Annual Reports 2003–5, 2007]. Within a week, security forces reportedly seized her education documents, and she was forced to promise not to “commit these kinds of crimes again” in order to finish her undergraduate studies. The Ministry of Information reportedly continued interrogating her about her role in the demonstrations. She left Iran to study Arabic in Syria and Lebanon (2004), and after her return to Tehran University, the historical subjects she proposed to study, including the history of Iran’s Jewish minority, were considered “dangerous.” As a member of the Student’s Committee for Human Rights (2006–8), supporting Iran’s political prisoners and publishing a website about human rights violations, she was arrested twice. In 2007, she completed her MA, writing her thesis on the history of Iran in the Islamic era, but she was banned from pursuing her PhD studies. The intelligence service allegedly ordered the institutions where she applied for jobs to reject her. Reportedly, she was also forced to divorce her husband because of their joint activism in the student movement. She reported that her ex-husband has been falsely accused of working with an armed foreign group to overthrow the government. Because of their relationship and the severity of charges against him, when he is sentenced in court, she will be sent to prison as well.

[Source: SAR, “Case Iran-545” (2 May 2008).]

In December 2006, Mehrnoushe Solouki [1970–], a French-Iranian citizen residing in Canada, and a filmmaker and journalism graduate student at Quebec University, Montréal, entered Iran in order to film her third documentary, on the subject of the burial rites of religious minorities such as the Armenian Christians, Jews, and Zoroastrians. The Ministry of Islamic Culture and Guidance granted her a research license and officials were told in advance of locations where she would film. In February 2007, however, Solouki stumbled upon a site in Khavaran cemetery, Tehran, that was reportedly a mass grave of regime opponents summarily executed in the summer and fall of 1988, and filmed it. Because the authorities probably believed that she intended to make a film critical of the executions, she was arrested and imprisoned in solitary confinement. She was reportedly held in inhumane conditions and subjected to daily interrogations. On 28 March 2007, she was released when her parents posted bail, but authorities confiscated her French passport. In breach of Iranian law limiting travel bans to six months, she was not allowed to return to France. In July 2007, an unknown assailant in Tehran attacked and injured her. On 17 November 2007, Solouki was tried in closed-door proceedings on charges of “intent to commit propaganda” against the Iranian regime and fined. She had neither edited nor broadcast any film taken during her stay. On 18 January 2008, she was allowed to leave Iran for France. Solouki declared that she planned to make a film about her story. [See NCH #52.]

[Sources: Associated Press, “Iran Allows Filmmaker to Leave Country” (22 January 2008); IOC, 3/07: 118; SAR, “SAR calls for letters on behalf of detained graduate student Mehrnoushe Solouki” (4 December 2007); T. Tahbaz, “Iran: Nightmares of Evin Haunt Freed Filmmaker” (Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty; 22 January 2008).]

In January 2008, [confidential name] (1957–), a PhD in history, an assistant professor at the history department of Ferdowsi University, Mashhad (2006–8), and specialist in early modern and modern Iranian and Turkish history, was dismissed because he had published a Farsi translation of An Islamic Utopian: A Political Biography of Ali Shariati [for Shariati, see several NCH Annual Reports], a book written by Ali Rahnema of the American University of Paris, despite the fact that the government had revoked the permit for this translation since 2005. Labeled an “ideological non-conformist,” he was questioned by a security officer about his research and writings (he was working on English to Farsi translations of two histories of the Ottoman Empire) and threatened openly with violence. In addition, after establishing contact with one of the authors, historian John Woods of the University of Chicago, he was accused of having “suspicious relationships with foreigners”. [Source: SAR, “Case Iran-543” (11 March 2008).]

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The Supreme Iraqi Criminal Tribunal (SICT) continued to try former senior party, army, security, and government officials associated with the previous Ba'ath administration headed by Saddam Hussain for gross human rights violations committed during his rule (1979–2003). Several defendants were sentenced to death after grossly unfair trials and three, sentenced in 2006, were executed. Political interference continued to undermine SICT's impartiality. On 24 June 2007, the trial was concluded of those allegedly responsible for abuses committed during the 1988 Anfal campaign, in which Iraqi forces used chemical weapons and killed as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds. Three of the six defendants—Ali Hassan al-Majid, Sultan Hashim Ahmad al-Ta'i, and Hussain Rashid al-Tikri—were sentenced to death for war crimes and crimes against humanity. Ali Hassan al-Majid was also convicted of genocide. On 4 September 2007, the death sentences were confirmed on appeal and the three were expected to be executed within 30 days. However, the US military refused to transfer the three to Iraqi custody because of a legal wrangle between Prime Minister al-Maliki and the Presidential Council.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 163–64; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 482.]

In 2007, [confidential name] (1954–), a historian at the history department, College of Education, Al-Mustansiriyah University, Baghdad, and specialist in modern Ottoman and Turkish history, was increasingly harassed after a militia group of the Al-Mahdi army began to run the university. He received threatening telephone calls and was treated aggressively by several of his colleagues in the history department due to their sectarian beliefs. His life was thought to be in danger. In 2008, he was offered a one-year visiting fellowship at Fairfield University, CT, United States.

[Source: SAR, November 2007 Profiles (New York 2007).]

In 2007, the life of [confidential name] (1931–), professor of archaeology at Baghdad (1969–75) and Mosul (1980–89) universities, head of the history department, University College of Al-Mansour (1990–92) and head of the history department of the Institute of Advanced Historical Studies, Union of Arab Historians (1994–97), was threatened. In the 1970s, during the Baathi regime, he had been appointed Director General of Antiquities of the North, a position which gave him full responsibility for all of northern Iraq, including ancient Assyria. Between 1977 and 1986 he led many rescue excavations. In addition, he was a prominent Christian and since 2003 Christians had been targeted by militias. He feared for his safety and went into exile to the United States, where in early 2008 he took up a one-year fellowship at Brown University, Providence, RI.

[Source: SAR, Case Iraq 655 (New York 2007).]

In February 2007, Saad Eskander, director of the Iraqi National Library and Archives, reported that his collaborators Ali Salih, Ahmed Sali, and an unnamed librarian had been assassinated in November 2006, December 2006, and February 2007 respectively.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad, 2007 (16 February 2007).]

On 10 April 2007, Abdul Ghabur Al-Qasi [al-Qaisi] (–2007), history professor at the University of Diyala, Baquba, was reportedly killed. On 16 April 2007, Jaffer Hasan Sadiq (–2007), professor at the history department, Faculty of Humanities, [University of Mosul], was assassinated in front of his house in Al-Kafaa'at district, northeast of Mosul City. On 29 October 2007, an armed group attacked the house of Jamal Mustafa, head of the history department at Educational College, University of Diyala, Baquba, and abducted him.

[Source: Russell Tribunal, List of Killed, Threatened or Kidnapped Iraqi Academics (2008).]

See also United Kingdom, United States.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In 2007, historian Ilan Pappé [See NCH Annual Report 2003] left his position of senior lecturer at the Haifa University political science department after he had endorsed the international academic boycott of Israeli institutions, provoking the university president to call for his resignation.

[Source: Guardian (26 May 2008).]

See also Malaysia, United States.

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

On 15 January 2008, Pope Benedict XVI canceled a planned speech at La Sapienza University, Rome, following protests from students and 67 academics against his statement that condoned astronomer Galilei Galileo's conviction for heresy in 1633. Galileo had argued that the earth revolved around the sun, but he had been forced to renounce his findings publicly. In 1990, then Cardinal Ratzinger, in charge of Catholic doctrine, had described the verdict as "rational and just". In 1992, however, Pope John Paul II had expressed regret at the way Galileo had been treated.

[Sources: BBC News (15 January 2008); IOC, 2/08: 186.]

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Throughout 2007 neither the government nor the rebel leadership took significant steps to discipline, investigate, or hold accountable those responsible for atrocities committed during the 2002–3 civil war. In April 2007, President (and historian) Laurent Gbagbo signed a regulation providing for an amnesty for most of the crimes committed in the context of the conflict since 2002. The amnesty did not expressly exclude crimes under international law, including the widespread and systematic acts of sexual violence against women. In July 2007, however, Gbagbo stressed that this amnesty excluded "crimes against humankind" and assured the delegation that "victims [would] have every opportunity to lodge their complaints". The United Nations (UN) Security Council had still not made public or discussed the findings of the UN Commission of Inquiry report into serious human rights violations since September 2002, which was handed to the UN Secretary-General in November 2004. In September 2003, the Ivorian government accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) over serious crimes. However, in 2006 and 2007 it consistently undermined a planned ICC mission to assess the possibility of opening an investigation into such crimes.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 104; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 103–4.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In March 2007, the Education Ministry ordered publishers of new history textbooks to change passages on the mass suicides after the 1945 battle of Okinawa. The passages, confirmed by historical research, suggested that Japanese soldiers actively encouraged civilians to commit suicide, partly for fear of what they might tell the invaders. At least 500 civilians, including entire families, committed suicide rather than surrender to American forces after the battle that left more than 200,000 dead. Okinawan politicians passed two resolutions against the revisions and in late September or early October 2007, at least 110,000 persons demonstrated in Ginowan, Okinawa, against the intended revisions. On 27 December 2007, the government announced that the planned revisions were canceled.

[Sources: BBC News Online (22 June & 11 July 2007); IOC, 1/08: 200; Keesings historisch archief, 2008: 109–110.]

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Since 7 September 2007, Kim Dong-ay ([1947–]), a former university lecturer in Chinese history and an executive of a temporary educators' union, and her husband (name unknown), a former university lecturer in Korean labor history, have staged, together with others, a street protest near the National Assembly in Yeouido, Seoul, urging the government to give the same status to part-time lecturers as to full-time professors and to improve other working conditions including job security and salary. At least until late March 2008, they spent the nights in a tent near the Assembly.

[Source: Park Si-soo, "Part-Time Lecturers Fight Discrimination", Korea Times (30 March 2008).]

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

See United States.

KYRGYZSTAN

See Uzbekistan.

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2007, almost 400,000 people continued to live without citizenship. The vast majority were citizens of the former Soviet Union who were living in Latvia at the time of the break-up of the Soviet Union (1991). In order to obtain citizenship, non-citizens must pass a number of tests, for example on the Latvian Constitution, history, and language, as well as recite the lyrics of the Latvian national anthem.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 187.]

See also European Union.

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In 2007, no criminal investigations or prosecutions were initiated into mass human rights abuses that were committed during and after the civil war (1975–90). Abuses included killings of civilians; abductions and enforced disappearances of Palestinians, Lebanese and foreign nationals; and arbitrary detentions by various armed militias and Syrian and Israeli government forces. In 1992, the Lebanese government had estimated that a total of 17,415 people had disappeared during the civil war. Since April 2005, relatives and friends of the disappeared have been holding a sit-in in front of the United Nations offices in Beirut to demand information on the fate of people still unaccounted for. According to Lebanese human rights groups, Syria had committed at least 640 enforced disappearances, detaining Lebanese incommunicado in Syrian prisons. An official joint Syrian-Lebanese committee established in May 2005 to investigate the cases had not published any findings at the end of 2007.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 191; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 498, 502.]

On 30 May 2007, the United Nations (UN) Security Council adopted resolution 1757 to establish the Special Tribunal for Lebanon to try those suspected of involvement in the February 2005 killing of former Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri and 22 others and, if the court so decides, a number of other possibly related attacks committed since October 2004. On 28 November 2007, the UN International Independent Investigation Commission submitted its ninth report into the killing and eighteen other attacks it was helping to investigate.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 189; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 498, 500.]

See also Syria, United States.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), established in 2006 and mandated to investigate gross human rights violations and economic crimes that occurred between January 1979 and 14 October 2003, proceeded slowly. In March 2007, the Commission's work was suspended due to concerns over transparency. A working group comprising TRC members and donors was set up, leading to a number of positive developments including the hiring of key staff. Public hearings were due to start in January 2008. The TRC was empowered to recommend for prosecution the most serious abuses of human rights. Questions remained about whether prosecutions should take place during or after the completion of the TRC's work; whether TRC commissioners would act on their power to recommend individuals for prosecution; and whether the Liberian judicial system would be able and willing to try these crimes.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 191–92; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 134–35.]

See also Sierra Leone.

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The legacy of gross human rights violations committed in the past remained untackled. The violations, which were committed particularly in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, included the enforced disappearance of hundreds of individuals, many of whom were feared to have died in custody while detained on political charges.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 195.]

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

See also European Union.

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

There were delays in the adoption of a draft Law on Cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for former Yugoslavia (ICTY), and disputes between the Ministry of Justice and Macedonia's Public Prosecutor on jurisdiction over four cases due to be returned to Macedonia from the ICTY by the end of 2007. Albanian political parties argued for the application of the law adopted in March 2002, which provided an amnesty for all those involved in the 2001 armed conflict, except those accused of war crimes under ICTY jurisdiction.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 196–97.]

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In July 2008, the Israeli delegation to the Sixteenth Congress of the International Council on Archives (consisting of archivists Zohar Aloufi, Nava Eisin, Michal Henkin, Anies Karawy, Ziona Raz, Silvia Schenkolewski-Kroll, Amira Stern, and Masha Zolotarevsky) in Kuala Lumpur were not given visa by the Malaysian authorities in time to participate. The Israeli Panel at the Congress was canceled. A similar problem arose in 1982, when an Israeli delegation could not attend the Table Ronde des Archives (CITRA). Several archivists protested against the situation in 1982 as well as in 2008.

[Sources: Eric Ketelaar, e-mail (21 July 2008); Letter of the Israel Archives Association (20 July 2008).]

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In March 2007, President Felipe Calderón officially closed the Special Prosecutor's Office (SPO) that former President Vicente Fox (2000–6) had established to address abuses committed during the “dirty war” in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s. During its five-year existence, the SPO had made very limited progress toward investigating and prosecuting these crimes. Its initial advances—such as the 2003 Supreme Court ruling authorizing prosecution of decades-old disappearance cases—were offset by significant failures; it did not obtain a single criminal conviction. Of the more than 600 disappearance cases, it filed charges in sixteen cases and obtained indictments in nine; the office determined the whereabouts of only six disappeared individuals. The government ignored the concluding SPO report which acknowledged that the abuses were systematic state crimes. In October 2007, the creation of a fund to compensate victims was announced.

* In July 2007, a federal judge concluded that the 1968 massacre of scores of students in Tlatelolco Square in Mexico City constituted genocide but that there was insufficient evidence against former president Luis Echeverría to continue the prosecution. In early 2008, an appeal on this ruling was pending.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 16, 205; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 220–21.]

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

MONTENEGRO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007) under Serbia & Montenegro.

No progress was made in the investigations of six former police officers indicted in February 2006 for the enforced disappearance of 83 Bosniak (Bosnian Muslim) civilians in 1992. In related civil proceedings, in 25 out of 38 first instance decisions, Montenegro was found responsible for the enforced disappearances or deaths of the Bosniak civilians, and compensation was awarded to survivors or to family members for the deaths of their relatives. The state appealed each decision. The court rejected claims that the authorities had violated the relatives' rights under Article 3 (prohibition of torture) of the European Convention on Human Rights in failing to provide information on the fate and whereabouts of the disappeared.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 210–11.]

MOROCCO/WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The Equity and Reconciliation Commission (ERC), established in 2004 to inquire into enforced disappearances, arbitrary detentions, and other grave human rights violations committed during the reign of Hassan II (1956–99), had completed its work in 2005. Despite ERC recommendations, authorities took no steps to bring to trial those implicated in past abuses, including some who continued to hold high government posts. Nor had the government implemented the ERC's recommendations to ratify the International Criminal Court statute and abolish the death penalty. In August 2007, the Human Rights Advisory Board (CCDH), charged with continuing the work of the ERC, said that 23,676 people had received compensation for human rights violations committed in 1956–99.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 214; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 514.]

In 2007, the Polisario Front took no steps to address the impunity of those accused of human rights abuses in their camps in the 1970s and 1980s.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 214.]

On 19 June 2008, at the request of CCDH head Ahmed Herzenni, a Rabat court ordered Arabic-language daily Al Jarida Al Oula to stop publishing hitherto unpublished testimony about human rights abuses under King Hassan II (1956–99). Senior officials close to the late king had given this information to the ERC, but in 2005 the CCDH had replaced the ERC and taken charge of the latter's archives. Herzenni cited a law for the protection of government archives and declared that the testimony was “intended to be a rich resource for serious researchers and not the subject of competition between journalists seeking a scoop”. Before the court order, a total of four previously unpublished testimonies had been published in Al Jarida Al Oula.

[Source: Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Update (20 June 2008).]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 26 March 2007, Ko Kyaw Thu Moe Myint, a teashop owner, was arrested for having written a book of poems and distributed it to his family and friends. Two of the eleven poems referred to independence hero Aung San.

[Source: IOC, 3/07: 109.]

On 25 May 2007, a biography of former Prime Minister U Nu (1907–95) by journalist Than Win Hlaing was banned. In 2000, Than had been sentenced to seven years’ imprisonment for having written about opposition leader Aung Sang Suu Kyi (1945–) and her father Aung San (1915–47). On 3 January 2007, he had been released after a pardon.

[Source: IOC, 1/07: 112; 3/07: 109.]

On 8 August 2008, the twentieth anniversary of a student-led uprising popularly referred to as “8-8-88” was commemorated. The 1988 protests led to the downfall of dictator Ne Win (ruled 1962–88), but a new group of Burmese generals crushed the protests, killing an estimated 3,000 people. Anticipating anniversary protests on the streets, the junta put a heavy military and police presence on every main road. Although many Rangoon residents were dressed in black to commemorate the anniversary, protests were limited. In Taunggok, northwest Myanmar, forty-eight activists who had organized a silent commemoration march, were arrested.

[Sources: Article 19, “Burma: 20 Years of Suffering” (8 August 2008); Ifex Communiqué 17–31 (13 August 2008); NRC Handelsblad (9 August 2008) 4.]

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The National Society for Human Rights (NSHR) requested that the International Criminal Court (ICC) investigate human rights abuses carried out in SWAPO (South West Africa People's Organization) camps in exile prior to independence in 1990, and in the north-east of the country in the 1990s. The NSHR cited Sam Nujoma, Namibia's first President (1990–2005), and retired army Lieutenant General Solomon Hawala as responsible for the detention, torture, and enforced disappearance of thousands of SWAPO members in Angola in the 1980s. NSHR's demand was strongly condemned by the ruling party SWAPO as a threat to the policy of national reconciliation. The ICC does not have jurisdiction for crimes committed prior to July 2002 and therefore the NSHR request would not be admissible.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 219.]

NEPAL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Both the government and the Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist) (CPN (M)) largely failed to implement commitments to human rights in the Comprehensive Peace Accord (CPA), signed in November 2006, after the civil war (1996–2006). Measures to address impunity for past violations and abuses were grossly inadequate. The Red Cross estimated that there were 1,042 cases of enforced disappearances attributable either to the Nepalese Army or CPN (M) forces. Although the CPA had committed the government and Maoists to make public the whereabouts of disappeared people within 60 days of its signing, there was no progress. On 1 June 2007, the Supreme Court called for setting up a commission of inquiry to investigate the disappearances, and commissioners were appointed by October 2007, but in early 2008 the commission had yet to start work. In June 2007, a draft Truth and Reconciliation Commission bill was tabled. It proposed establishing a commission with a mandate to investigate gross human rights violations and crimes against humanity committed during 1996–2006. More than 12,000 people were killed in the conflict, many of them civilians. The United Nations, several international NGOs, and local NGOs raised concerns about provisions granting amnesty to perpetrators of gross human rights violations.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 220–21; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 294–95.]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 7 August 2008, summary proceedings were started against the Koninklijk Instituut voor de Tropen (Royal Tropical Institute), Amsterdam. A person [name unknown] had complained that the exhibition “Palestina 1948, herinneringen aan een verdwenen vaderland” (Palestine 1948: Remembering a Past Homeland) (1 March 2008–4 January 2009), about the Palestinian view on the 1948 events (called Nakba or Catastrophe), was one-sided and therefore intentionally distorting with the aim of delegitimizing Israel, which amounted to an act of anti-Semitism and incitement to hatred against the Jews. The judge ruled that the exhibition was not objectionable, came under the right of free expression, and rejected the demand to amend it.

[Source: Amsterdam Court, Kort Geding (Summary Proceedings) 402248 / KG ZA 08–1291 Pee/MV (7 August 2008), at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/89.pdf.]

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2007, federal authorities had not taken any action to ensure accountability for past atrocities such as the military’s complete destruction of the Bayelsa state town of Odi in 1999 or its massacre of several hundred civilians in Benue state in 2001.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 137.]

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Bangladesh.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

At the end of July 2008, Abd al-Sattar Qassim (Abdul Sattar Qassem) (?1949–), professor of history or political science at An-Najah National University, Nablus [See NCH #15; NCH Annual Reports 2000–2001], was arrested by a group of 50 or 60 policemen and briefly detained. No reason was given, nor was he questioned. Qassim had publicly said that the Palestinian factions had to break the stalemate.

[Source: Palestine News Network, “Detained Palestinian professor: We must break the internal stalemate” (2 August 2008).]

See also Lebanon, Syria, United States.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In 2007, the Supreme Court ruled that enforced disappearances committed in the late 1960s and early 1970s by state agents were covered by the statute of limitations.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 15.]

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In November 2006, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled on a case involving the indiscriminate killing in 1992 of 41 Shining Path prisoners at a prison in Lima. The court ordered the government to pay compensation of about $20 million to the families of the dead and to individuals tortured during the operation. President Alan García said that he could not accept paying compensation to “terrorists,” and said he would ask the court for an “interpretation” of its decision.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 226.]

In September 2007, the efforts of Peruvian prosecutors to bring former President Alberto Fujimori to justice in Peru finally bore fruit, when the Chilean Supreme Court, in a landmark decision, authorized his extradition on charges of human rights abuses and corruption, including the killing of 15 people in 1991 and the enforced disappearance and killing of nine students and a professor in 1992. It was the first time anywhere in the world that a former president was extradited to stand trial in his home country for human rights violations. Fujimori’s trial was continuing at the end of 2007. A bill to ratify the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court stalled when the Constitutional Court, ruling on a petition by a group of opposition senators, declared it unconstitutional. A bill to reform the constitution to allow ratification of the Rome Statute has been in the Senate since April 2002.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 15, 93, 238; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 196, 224.]

While authorities had made some progress toward holding accountable those responsible for abuses committed during the armed conflict (1980–2000), most perpetrators continued to evade justice. In 2003, the official Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) had estimated that almost 70,000 people had died or disappeared during the armed conflict. Many were victims of atrocities committed by the Shining Path (Sendero Luminoso) and another insurgent group, and others of human rights abuses by state agents. In early 2008, only 17 former military officers and civilians had been convicted for abuses attributed to state actors by the TRC. The military often failed to provide information needed to identify potential key witnesses who served in rural counterinsurgency bases during the conflict. It also declined to identify military officials known to witnesses only by their aliases. An effective programme for protecting those who survived human rights abuses during the conflict, their relatives as well as witnesses and lawyers had not been implemented by the end of 2007. The National Council for Reparations, established in 2006 to oversee reparations to victims of human rights abuses documented by the TRC, began its work. By the end of 2007, it had registered cases in more than 800 communities. In November 2007, the Supreme Court of Justice ruled that those responsible for the crime of enforced disappearance included not only those who carry out the killing and hide the body, but also those higher up in the chain of command.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 238; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 224–25.]

In November 2005, Congress member Rafael Rey, later Minister for Production, sued Nelson Manrique, historian and columnist for the newspaper Perú 21, for defamation. Initially Manrique was acquitted, but Rey appealed the decision and on 9 January 2007, a court in Lima found Manrique guilty and ordered him to pay damages. Manrique appealed the decision. In April-May 2005, Manrique had written in his columns that Rey and his party, CODE-Renovación, forged signatures in order to be able to register for the 2000 general elections.

[Source: IPYS, Ifex Alert (27 June & 17 July 2007).]

On 21–22 June 2007, officials of the Instituto Nacional de Cultura (INC, National Institute for Culture) ordered three of the ninety drawings of an exhibition by political cartoonist Piero Quijano to be withdrawn. The drawings illustrated articles that had been published in the newspapers Perú 21, La República and the magazine Somos, about the Truth and Reconciliation Commission report, the possible privatization of the Machu Picchu ruins, and the President's paternity respectively. Quijano and director Armando Williams of the José Carlos Mariátegui Museum decided to cancel the exhibition altogether. A 30 June 2007 press release from the office of President Alan García read: "The Chief of State said the National Culture Institute had censored artist Piero Quijano's exhibition because it cannot be permitted that the Armed Forces be insulted in a public place."

[Source: IPYS, Ifex Alert (29 June & 17 July 2007).]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In July 2008, medievalist Bronisław Geremek (1932–2008) died [See NCH Annual Report 2007].

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 31 January 2008, the Constitutional Court limited the authority of the CNSAS (Council for the Study of the Securitate Archives) as it ruled the law that established it in 2000 unconstitutional, particularly the part allowing the CNSAS to name former Securitate collaborators. The judgment came after a legal challenge from Dan Voiculescu, founder of the Conservative Party, whom the CNSAS in 2006 declared to have been a Securitate informer. On 6 February 2008, a government decree changed the law: the CNSAS was still allowed to study the files but had to hand any incriminating information to the courts.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief, 2008: 273–74; NRC Handelsblad (7 February 2008) 4; “Romania Court Rules on Secret Files” (BalkanInsight.com, 1 February 2008).]

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In April 2006, Rector Leonid Kossovich of Saratov State University, central Russia, dismissed historian Velikhan Mirzekhanov ([1963]–), a former dean of the university’s history faculty who had been criticized by a State Duma member of parliament for the pro-Kremlin party United Russia for alleged “anti-government attitudes” and undermining academic authority. When Kossovich called a meeting to announce the dismissal—without any reference to established disciplinary procedures—the historians present walked out. Later, an impromptu meeting of the faculty’s 2,000 students and 120 staff, called to defend the dean, was broken up by security men, some of whom were armed. In the end, Mirzekhanov kept his position.

[Source: N. Holdsworth, “Russia: Freedom under Threat”, University World News (13 January 2008).]

In 2007, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruled that Russia was responsible for enforced disappearances, torture and extrajudicial executions in 15 judgments relating to the second Chechen conflict (1999–2006). The ECHR sharply criticized the ineffectual investigations. The European Committee for the Prevention of Torture highlighted gross inadequacies in many of the investigations opened into allegations of torture. There was no single comprehensive list of disappeared persons, no work to collect DNA from relatives of the disappeared, no work to exhume the mass graves, and no fully functioning forensic laboratory carrying out autopsies. Very few cases were actually tried.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 248–50.]

In July 2007, two new manuals for teachers, intended as a basis for developing new textbooks in 2008, were alleged to gloss over the state terror, the labor camps, and the forced starvation during the Soviet era (1917–91) and of including propaganda to promote President Vladimir Putin’s vision of a strong state. One manual for social studies teachers, edited by Leonid Polyakov, presented as fact Putin’s view that the collapse of the USSR was “the greatest geopolitical catastrophe of the twentieth century” and described the United States as bent on creating a global empire. In June 2007, at a conference he hosted for teachers, and in late October 2007, at a memorial liturgy in Butovo, Putin had described Joseph Stalin’s Great Purge of 1937, in which 1.5 million people had been imprisoned and 700,000 killed, as terrible, while adding “Regarding the problematic pages in our history, yes, we do have them, as does any state. We have fewer such pages than do some countries, and they are less terrible than in some countries”. He reportedly suggested that the repression was an ideological error rather than a structural part of despotism. The second manual, A Modern History of Russia, 1945–2006: A Book for the Teacher, was edited by Alexander Filippov, a deputy head of a research institute linked to the Kremlin. Its final chapter, written by Pavel Danilin ([1977]–) (a project manager at the Effective Policy Foundation, a think-tank with close links to the Kremlin) was entitled “Sovereign Democracy”, a term officially used to justify Putin’s authoritarian rule. The book called Stalin a “contradictory” figure and stated that while some consider him evil, others recognized him as a “hero” for his role in World War II and his territorial expansion. His mass repression was reportedly dismissed as “necessary” to make the country great.

[Sources: D.W. Benn, “Review Article: The Teaching of History in Putin’s Russia”, International Affairs, 84, no. 2 (2008), 365–70; T. Halpin, “Textbooks Rewrite History to Fit Putin’s Vision”, Times (30 July 2007); IOC, 1/08: 105–115; President of Russia, “Excerpts from Transcript of Meeting with Participants in the National Russian Conference of Humanities and Social Sciences Teachers” (21 June 2007); Idem, “Opening Address at a Meeting with History Scholars” (27 November 2003); S. Walker, “Vladimir Putin Rewrites Russia’s History Books to Promote Patriotism”, Independent (20 August 2007).]

In late 2007 or early 2008, extreme Russian nationalists broke up a famine exhibition at a Ukrainian cultural centre in Moscow. This happened after the Ukrainian parliament had condemned the Holodomor (the famine that as a result of Stalin’s farm collectivization program killed possibly as many as 7.5 to 10 million people in 1932–33) as genocide and after a law was tabled in November 2007 to make it illegal to deny the Holodomor. Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko had launched an international campaign to have the Holodomor recognized as genocide by the United Nations in time for the 75th anniversary in November 2008.

[Source: M. Foley, “Ukraine: The politics of hunger” (WWW-text).]

In August 2008, writer Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn (1918–2008), 1970 Nobel Prize winner for Literature, died. On 6 September 1973, Solzhenitsyn had declared that he would publish The Gulag Archipelago 1918–1956: An Experiment in Literary Investigation (Russian: 1973–74; English: London/New York 1973–78), a historical account of life in the labor camps based on personal testimonies and reports, memoirs, and letters by 227 witnesses and written secretly in 1958–68. The decision was triggered by the suicide of typist Elizaveta Voronyanskaya (?1903–73) in Leningrad in August 1973. She had hidden part of the manuscript but revealed its whereabouts after the KGB had interrogated her for five days, enabling the KGB to seize it. Solzhenitsyn’s harassment had begun in February 1945 when, as a commander of the reconnaissance artillery battery, he was arrested for anti-Stalinist remarks in some of his intercepted letters, tried, and sentenced to eight years’ imprisonment (1945–53)—most of it spent in the government research facility for imprisoned scientists near Moscow, during which he memorized 12,000 verses composed in his head—and three years of internal exile (1953–56). He was rehabilitated in March 1957. He wrote many literary works about his camp experiences. Pressed by his editor, he removed chapter 20 of his novel V krughe pervom (1968; The First Circle) containing a critical survey of Stalin’s life, including his early revolutionary years. Despite constant threats, harassment, confiscation of many of his papers, and censorship by the KGB, the press, and the Writers’ Union (from which he was expelled in 1969), the circulation of KGB forgeries of his work to undermine his reputation, and, finally, a failed assassination attempt in 1971, he was a leading dissident emphasizing traditional cultural values and freedom of expression and religion, until he was arrested on 12 February 1974, stripped of his citizenship, and deported to the FRG, Switzerland, and the United States, where he settled in Vermont (1976–90). It was reportedly the first deportation of a dissident since Leon Trotsky’s in 1929. In exile, Solzhenitsyn wrote the historical tetralogy The Red Wheel (started in 1968), on life in Russia in 1914–18 and containing a critical treatment of Lenin. The first volume, August 1914, had already appeared abroad (Russian; Paris 1971). Further KGB forgeries, doctored memoirs, and a two-volume hostile novel commissioned by the Soviet authorities appeared while he lived abroad. Many Soviet citizens ran into trouble for possessing or circulating copies of The Gulag Archipelago or other works of Solzhenitsyn. In June 1989, Novy Mir (New World) began publishing The Gulag Archipelago (under the supervision of historian and editor Vadim Borisov). In August 1990, Solzhenitsyn’s citizenship was restored. In May 1994 he returned to Russia. [See also NCH Annual Report 2006].

[Sources include: S.P. de Boer, E.J. Driessen & H.L. Verhaar, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union 1956–1975 (The Hague 1982) 542–45; IOC, 2/72: 96; 4/73: 31–45; 2/74: viii–ix, 65–74 ; 3/74: xiv; 1/75: 19–20; 1/78: 77–78; 1/80: 74; 1/89: 5; 2/89: 41; 5/89: 41; 3/90: 41; 9/90: 41; 10/90: 41; 1/91: 40; 3/91: 41; 3/98: 93; 2/04: 200–7; D. Jones, ed., Censorship: A World Encyclopedia (London/Chicago 2001) 2084, 2110, 2275–79; Y. Maltsev, “Farewell to Aleksandr Sozhenitsyn” (WWW-text; 6 June 2008); M. Tucker, ed., Literary Exile in the Twentieth Century: An Analysis and Biographical Dictionary (Westport 1991) 632–40.]

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The Rwandan government continued to struggle with the consequences of the 1994 genocide that killed about three-quarters of the Tutsi population. In 2001, Rwanda established a system of community-based gacaca courts to try all but the most egregious genocide-related crimes. As the number of persons accused of genocide increased to 818,000, in March/May 2007 the government reformed the gacaca jurisdictions for the third time, seeking to expedite the trials. While the provisions of the 2007 law speeded up the gacaca trials, this was at the expense of the fairness and quality of the rulings. Early 2007, the government announced the provisional release of 8,000 detainees, many of whom had reportedly confessed to participation in the genocide; this was the third wave of mass releases since 2003 in an attempt to address prison overcrowding. By October 2007, some 47,000 persons were sentenced to community service and some 10,000 were carrying it out. Rwandans continued to flee to neighboring countries to escape from the gacaca system. Some were afraid that the tribunals would expose their involvement in the genocide. Others fled for fear of false accusations. Rwandan sources also reported throughout the year that gacaca judges and witnesses (for the prosecution and the defence alike) had been threatened and in some cases killed. In 2006–7, several survivors of the genocide and judges involved in gacaca jurisdiction were murdered.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 252–54; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 144–46.]

On 28 November 2007, in a trial known as “the media case,” the Appeal Court of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) partly upheld the conviction of (historian) Ferdinand Nahimana for inciting genocide [See NCH Annual Report 2004], but reduced his sentence from life to thirty years’ imprisonment. The ICTR was due to end trials in 2008 and began its exit strategy by proposing to transfer cases to national courts, including to Rwanda. Since its inception, the ICTR has only tried crimes committed by members and supporters of the government in power in April 1994, but not those by the now ruling Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF). In April 2007, President Paul Kagame pardoned former President Pasteur Bizimungu, imprisoned for fifteen years on charges of forming a criminal association and inciting rebellion after attempting to form a political party to rival the dominant RPF. In October 2007, the Rwandan Commission of Inquiry to investigate the role of the French military in the genocide presented its report to Kagame.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 252–54; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 146–47; IOC, 1/08: 205–6; ICTR, “La Chambre d’appel réduit les peines d’emprisonnement de Nahimana, Barayagwiza et Ngeze” (28 November 2007).]

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See United Kingdom.

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Chad.

SERBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007) under Serbia & Montenegro.

On 26 February 2007, the International Court of Justice (ICJ) rendered judgment in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro, the first-ever ruling on the application of the 1948 Genocide Convention. While finding that Serbia was not directly responsible for genocide during the Bosnian war, the ICJ determined that it had breached the convention by failing to prevent and punish genocide at Srebrenica, including its failure to arrest Ratko Mladić and cooperate fully with the ICTY. Bosnian victims' associations were dismayed at the verdict and staged a number of peaceful protests.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 71, 260; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 374, 422. Complete text of judgment at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/18.pdf.]

The government formed in May 2007 signaled a greater willingness to address accountability for war crimes. Indicted war crimes suspect and Bosnian Serb General Ratko Mladić, however, remained at large in Serbia, despite repeated commitments from Belgrade that he would be brought to justice. Nevertheless, Serbia improved its cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). Prosecutions continued at the ICTY in a number of high-profile cases involving former Yugoslav and Serbian army and government officials. Between 32 and 35 cases of war crimes were reportedly under investigation by the War Crimes Chamber of the Belgrade District Court, although few prosecutions were completed. In May 2007, Milorad “Legija” Luković-Ulemek and Žveždan Jovanović were convicted and sentenced to forty years’ imprisonment for their roles in the murder of former Prime Minister Zoran Đinđić, along with ten others.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 260–61; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 421–22.]

The United Nations Interim Administration in Kosovo (UNMIK) failed to implement measures ensuring access to redress and reparations for violations of rights by members of the international community. In February 2007, the former international Ombudsperson in Kosovo was appointed chair of the Human Rights Advisory Panel (HRAP), which had been set up in March 2006 to provide remedies for acts and omissions by UNMIK; the HRAP did not convene until November 2007. In May 2007, the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights ruled inadmissible two complaints against member states of the NATO-led Kosovo Force (KFOR), considering that acts and omissions by UNMIK and KFOR could not be attributed to those states, as they did not take place on their territory, or through any decision taken by their authorities.

There was little progress in determining the fate of missing persons. Seven years after the investigations opened, indictments had still not been issued in connection with the transfer to Serbia of the bodies of at least 900 ethnic Albanians in 1999. As of August 2007, 2,047 persons, the majority of whom were Kosovo Albanian, remained missing. All known remains exhumed in Serbia have been transferred to Kosovo. Exhumations of 73 bodies or parts of bodies were conducted by the Office of Missing Persons and Forensics. Some 455 exhumed bodies remained unidentified. Proceedings continued against six senior Serbian political, police and military officials jointly indicted for crimes against humanity and violations of the laws and customs of war in Kosovo. They include former Serbian president Milan Milutinović.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 261–62; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 428–29.]

At the ICTY in March 2007, the trial began of Ramush Haradinaj, former Kosovo Liberation Army leader and former Kosovo Prime Minister. Haradinaj had been indicted with others for crimes against humanity and violations of the law or customs of war. He had returned to The Hague the previous month for the start of the trial, after spending more than a year on provisional release with the unprecedented ability to engage in political activities. Haradinaj was permitted by UNMIK to top the list of his Alliance for the Future of Kosovo party in the November 2007 elections. The total number of domestic war crimes prosecutions remained low.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 260–62; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 428–29.]

See also Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The 2005 report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) attributed the civil war (1991–2002) largely to decades of corrupt rule by the political elite and recommended abolishing the death penalty, repealing laws that criminalize seditious libel, increasing the transparency of the mining industry, improving good governance, and establishing a reparations fund for war victims. On 13 and 14 November 2007, a conference initiated by the Human Rights Commission of Sierra Leone (HRCSL) and attended by representatives of civil society, United Nations agencies and the government, discussed the implementation of TRC recommendations. The Task Force on Reparations presented a report to the government on setting up a Special Fund for War Victims and a Reparations Programme. The Vice President publically committed himself to ensuring justice and full reparations for the tens of thousands of Sierra Leonean women victims of sexual violence.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 265; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 152–53.]

The United Nations-mandated Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) made progress on achieving accountability for war crimes. The SCSL, established after the civil war (1991–2002) to bring justice to victims of atrocities, handed down its first five judgments in 2007. In June 2007, three members of the rebel Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) were convicted for, inter alia, the recruitment and use of child soldiers, the first such conviction by an international tribunal. They were each acquitted of three other charges, including those of causing sexual slavery and forced marriage. In August 2007, two members of the Sierra Leonean Civil Defense Forces (CDF) were convicted of war crimes including murder and pillage. A third CDF indictee, former interior minister Chief Sam Hinga Norman, died in custody in February 2007. In May 2007, the defence cases for the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) accused—Issa Sesay, Morris Kallon and Augustine Gbao—opened and were expected to last until April 2008. In June 2007, the trial of former Liberian president Charles Taylor—charged with eleven counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for supporting Sierra Leonean rebel groups—started, but was postponed after Taylor boycotted the trial and dismissed his lawyers. Taylor was appointed new counsel and the trial was expected to resume in January 2008. For security reasons, it took place at The Hague, Netherlands.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 191, 263–64; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 153–54.]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

SLOVENIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The Slovenian authorities failed to restore the status of permanent residents to a group of people known as the “erased” or to ensure that they had full access to economic and social rights. The “erased” included at least 18,305 individuals unlawfully removed from the Slovenian registry of permanent residents in 1992. They were mainly people from other former Yugoslav republics, many of them Roma, who had been living in Slovenia and had not acquired Slovenian citizenship after Slovenia became independent. In October 2007, the government presented to Parliament a draft constitutional law, which was intended to resolve the status of the “erased” but maintained discriminatory treatment of the “erased”, provided new legal grounds for more discriminatory actions by the authorities, and failed to restore retroactively the status of permanent residents of all the “erased”. The draft also disclaimed responsibility of state bodies for the “erasure” and explicitly excluded the possibility of compensation for the human rights violations suffered by the “erased”.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 268-69.]

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Canada.

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In July 2007, relatives of victims of human rights violations committed during the era of apartheid (1948–94), the Khulumani Support Group and two other NGOs launched proceedings in Pretoria High Court to declare invalid amendments to the National Prosecution Policy which would have the effect of allowing impunity for perpetrators who had not cooperated with the Truth and Reconciliation Commission or had been refused amnesty by it. Proceedings were continuing at the end of 2007.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 274.]

In October 2007, the Ministry of Justice and Constitutional Development issued a statement reiterating the government's opposition to a lawsuit brought in the United States by victims of human rights violations. The victims were seeking damages from fifty American, European, and Canadian corporations for alleged complicity in abuses during the Apartheid era. The statement was made in response to the decision of the New York Circuit Court of Appeal to reverse the decision of a lower court to dismiss the suit. The minister stated that the responsibility for rehabilitation and redress lay with the South African government and not foreign courts.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 274.]

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In November 2007, Parliament passed the Law of Historic Memory concerning the victims of the civil war (1936–39) and Franco era (1939–75). Despite some positive features, the law fell short of international standards on the rights to remedy and reparations for the victims of gross human rights violations. The law denounced “the use of violence to impose political views”, repeatedly described the Franco regime as a “dictatorship”, and declared “illegitimate” the summary trials of Franco's opponents. Among its provisions were a ban on political meetings at the Valle de los Caídos (Valley of the Fallen), a monument built by General Francisco Franco in memory of the fallen Nationalists in the Civil War and the site of his tomb. Symbols from the Franco era (statues, plaques) would be removed and venerations of Franco banned. On 18 November 2007, members of the Fascist Falange party held a mass at Franco's tomb and the far right Frente Nacional paid homage there for the last time on 20 November 2007, the anniversary of Franco's death in 1975.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 278; IOC, 1/08: 207; S. Kingstone, "Franco Bill Divides Spaniards", BBC News (20 November 2007).]

On 16 January 2008, proposed new lyrics to the national anthem were dropped after complaints that they failed to reflect regional differences and were reminiscent of Franco's dictatorship. Written in 1761, The Royal March had no official lyrics, and verses used during Franco's rule were dropped after his death.

[Source: IOC, 2/08: 192.]

In August 2008, the very restrictive Official Secrets Act (1968, amended 1978) was criticized as Minister of Defense Carme Chacón announced her intention to declassify thousands of secret files with a historical value.

[Sources: El País (10 August 2008); Frankfurter Rundschau (20 August 2008).]

See also Guatemala.

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

Several hundred cases of enforced disappearances were reported in the first six months of 2007. The Human Rights Council's Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances expressed concern about the high number of such cases in Sri Lanka.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 278–79.]

See also India.

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 27 April 2007, the International Criminal Court's (ICC) Pre-Trial Chamber issued arrest warrants against two individuals involved in the conflict in Darfur: State Minister for Humanitarian Affairs Ahmad Muhammad Harun and Janjaweed militia leader Ali Kushayb. Both were accused of war crimes and crimes against humanity. The government publicly refused to cooperate with the ICC, and instead of handing Harun over to the court, in September 2007 they appointed him co-chair of a committee authorized to respond to human rights complaints, including those on Darfur. Kushayb, who had been arrested in connection with other crimes, was, according to the Foreign Minister, released from custody in October 2007.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 281; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 166–67.]

On 11 December 2007, the security authorities arrested Abdel Fattah Al-Sadany ([1977–]) and Mahrous Mohammed Abdul Azim ([1977–]) of Madbouly Publishing House (Egypt) at the Khartoum International Book Fair on charges of insulting Islamic religion for distributing a book entitled “The Prophet’s Wife Eats Her Children Up” (London: Dar al-Jamal), by Syrian writer Nabil Fayyad. The book includes sentiments considered critical of Al-Sayeda Aisha (the Prophet Mohammed’s wife). Eyewitnesses declared that the agents who arrested him were accompanied by members of the fundamentalist group of Ansar Al-Sunna. On 16 December 2007, the two were sentenced to six months’ imprisonment. The Book Fair also witnessed the confiscation of several books about Shiite beliefs and a book on the crisis in Darfur, Darfur, History of War and Genocide (Horizons House).

[Source: Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, Ifex Alert (17 December 2007).]

See also Uganda.

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

On 12 December 2007, the Federal Court found Doğu Perinçek (1942–), President of the Turkish Workers' Party, guilty of racial discrimination and fined him. It was the first time that a supreme court ruled in a case of Armenian genocide denial. Under the penal code, any act of denying, belittling, or justifying genocide was a violation of the anti-racism legislation. In May, July, and September 2005, Perinçek had asserted in Lausanne, Zürich, and Bern that the Armenian genocide was an “international lie”. He had distributed a tract in German entitled “The Great Powers and the Armenian Question” in which he denied the Armenian genocide. On 15 July 2005, the Swiss-Armenian Association had filed a suit. In the March 2007 trial before the district court in Lausanne, several historians had acted as witnesses in favor and against the accused in the Perinçek trial, including Justin McCarthy (1945–), Jean-Michel Thibaux (1949–), Paul Leidinger (1932–), Yves Ternon (1932–), and Norman Stone (1941–). The district court found Perinçek guilty of racial discrimination and ordered him to pay a fine, but Perinçek appealed the verdict. In 2001, twelve Turks prosecuted in Switzerland on similar charges had been acquitted. In 2003, the parliaments in the canton of Vaud and Geneva had adopted laws criminalizing genocide denial. In October 2006, Christoph Blocher, leader of the right-wing Swiss Popular Party and Minister of Justice opposing the law, had suggested, during a visit to Turkey, that the Swiss law should be changed. Perinçek reportedly intended to apply to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg.

[Sources: “Court Confirms Verdict against Perinçek” (Swissinfo.ch; 19 December 2007); “Swiss ‘Genocide’ Trial for Turk”, BBC News (6 March 2007); Tribunal d’arrondissement de Lausanne, Jugement rendu par le Tribunal de Police le 9 mars 2007 à 11:45 heures dans la cause Dogu Perincek (2007). Complete judgment at:

http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/70.pdf.]

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The fate of an estimated 17,000 persons remained unknown. The disappeared persons were mostly Islamists (Muslim Brotherhood members) who were victims of enforced disappearance after they were detained in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and hundreds of Lebanese and Palestinians who were detained in Syria or abducted from Lebanon by Syrian forces or Lebanese and Palestinian militias.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 291; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 522.]

On 7 August 2008, Aref Dalila (1943–), professor and dean of the faculty of economics at Damascus University, journalist, and writer of many books on economics, politics, and social history [See NCH Annual Report 2006], was released unexpectedly.

See also Lebanon, Sudan.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

In January 2007, Prime Minister Su Tseng Chang defended changes to new high school history textbooks in the face of strong criticism. The textbooks, intended to be used from February 2007, referred to the “mainland” or “our country” simply as “China”. Sun Yat-sen was referred to only by name without explaining that he was also the nation’s founding father. Opposition politicians said that the changes were an attempt to downplay the island’s cultural and historic links with China. The government in Beijing declared that the changes were politically motivated and accused Taiwanese officials of introducing independence ideologies into the classroom.

[Source: BBC News Online, 31 January 2007.]

In February 2007, public events were organized to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the “228 incident” (the military suppression of public protests in February 1947 which resulted in thousands of deaths and injuries).

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 291.]

In May 2007, it was announced that the Chiang Kai-shek Memorial Hall was to be officially renamed the Taiwan Democracy Memorial Hall. The renaming was one of the efforts by President Chen Shui-bian to remove reminders of Taiwan’s authoritarian past under Chiang, who led Taiwan’s first government after fleeing mainland China in 1949 (1949–75), and its links to mainland China. Chiang’s statues and name were removed in many places.

[Sources: BBC News Online, 19 May 2007; IOC, 2/08: 182; Keesings historisch archief, 2008: 287.]

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In May 2007, a court found three military personnel responsible for the deaths of 32 people during the attack on the Krue Se mosque in April 2004, in which more than 100 people were killed during clashes with security forces. None were prosecuted and one of them was subsequently appointed to the Internal Security Operations Command (ISOC) in charge of combating violence in the south.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 295.]

On 2 October 2007, the Special Branch Police banned and confiscated copies of Seventy-Five Years of Thai Democracy: A Thorn-Filled Path, a book by social critic Sulak Sivaraksa (1933–) [See NCH Annual Report 1995] about politics, democracy, and the monarchy. The police alleged that the material might “cause unrest and degrade good morals” in Thai society.

[Sources: IOC, 1/08: 209; Southeast Asian Press Alliance, Ifex Alert (4 October 2007).]

On 15 February 2008, the radio program Chirmsak's Viewpoints, was taken off the air after the show's host, Chirmsak Pinthong, contested Prime Minister Samak Sundaravej's claim that only one student was killed in the 1976 pro-democracy demonstrations.

[Source: IOC, 2/08: 193.]

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The government continued to ignore the recommendations of the Commission on Reception, Truth and Reconciliation regarding past crimes committed during Indonesia's occupation (1975–99).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 344.]

The United Nations Integrated Mission in Timor-Leste (UNMIT) re-established the Serious Crimes Investigation Team to complete investigations into outstanding cases from the events surrounding the independence referendum of 1999 when serious human rights violations were committed. However, the prosecution branch was not reinstated. Both the Timorese and Indonesian governments resisted further initiatives to bring to justice all perpetrators of the 1999 crimes.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 297.]

In February 2007, the Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF) established jointly by Indonesia and Timor-Leste to document crimes committed in Timor-Leste in 1999 and to promote reconciliation, began its fact-finding work through public and closed hearings. In July 2007, the United Nations (UN) Secretary General Ban Ki-moon instructed UN officials not to testify before the CTF because the CTF could recommend amnesty for serious crimes. Concerns were also expressed by national and international observers about the CTF's treatment of victims during hearings and possible biased assessment of the testimonies of military officials, militia members, and bureaucrats over those given by victims. In September 2007, the CTF held its fifth and final public hearing in Dili. The hearings were poorly attended and accompanied by demonstrations, protesting it as a mechanism to perpetuate impunity. The CTF mandate was extended until early 2008.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 156, 297; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 286, 347.]

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

Throughout 2007, a collective of more than a hundred victims of human rights abuses committed during the 2005 presidential elections filed several complaints. Although the Togolese authorities had publicly committed themselves to put an end to impunity, no progress was known to have been made in the examination of these complaints.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 297–98.]

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In early March 2006, a trial was initiated against Sýrrý Öztürk (Sirri Öztürk), owner of Sorun Publishing House, and Osman Tiftikçi, a former army officer who served during the 1971 coup and author of the history book Osmanli dan Günümüze Ordunun Evrimi (The Evolution of the Army from Ottoman Times Until Today). The trial was brought to court by the General Staff on charges of “degrading the army”. It was postponed several times but would continue in 2008. Tiftikçi lived abroad but an arrest warrant was issued against him. The book had been subject to legal scrutiny before publication.

[Sources: Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert, 13 July 2007; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 63.]

In April 2006, Ali Rıza Vural, publisher of Doz Publishing House, Ahmet Zeki Okçuoglu (1950–), owner of Doz Publishing House, Vahdettin Ince, translator, and Bedri Vatanserver, owner of Can Printshop, faced charges related to the publication of a book entitled Barzani and the Kurdish National Movement (February 2003); the former was charged with insulting the Turkish state; the others with separatist propaganda. The two-volume book focuses on Mulla Mustafa Barzani (1903–79), the founder of the Kurdistan Democrat Party (KDP) and father of current KDP leader, Masoud Barzani. The initial 2003 case had been dismissed but was relaunched after a reprint in May 2005. Excerpts from the book leading to the charges referred to Atatürk’s suppression of the Kurds and to his failure to keep promises made to the Kurdish community in return for their compliance with the creation of the Turkish state. The book is also said to touch upon the Armenian genocide. One excerpt read: “Kurds organized uprisings one after the other, they rebelled against imperialists and the local states that seized their rights. All uprisings were brutally crushed. Mustafa Kemal in Turkey crushed Kurds heavily”. The trial continued in March 2008.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 64.]

In [June] 2006, Ahmet Önal, owner of Peri Publishing House [See NCH Annual Report 2007], was charged with insulting Atatürk when he published Dersim’de Alevilik (Alawitism in Dersim), a book written by Munzur Cem and Huseyin Baysulun (Hüseyin Beysülen). In February 2007, the case was dropped due to a statute of limitations. Önal has had a total of twenty-six cases brought against him in connection with various books he published.

[Sources: IOC, 3/06: 83 ; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 62–63.]

On 19 January 2007, the day after the murder of journalist Hrant Dink [See NCH Annual Reports 2006–7], writer Temel Demirer read a press statement during a protest gathering in central Ankara, saying that Dink had been killed not only for being Armenian, but also because he had spoken of an “Armenian genocide”. He called on others to recognize the fact of an Armenian genocide. Charged with “denigrating the Turkish Republic” and “inciting to hatred and hostility”, Demirer was tried on 6 March 2008.

[Source: Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert, 5 March 2008 (Demirer).]

On 10 March 2007, journalist Hacı Bogatekin wrote an article entitled “Turkey has made mistakes” in his local newspaper Gerger Firat in Adiyaman, southeastern Turkey, in which he called the state responsible for “the deaths of millions of Armenians and Syriac Christians in the east and south-east regions of the country, as well as for the deaths of the Alevi in Dersim, the Greek Orthodox with the September movement in Istanbul, and more recently, the deaths of hundreds of people in Maras, Malatya, Corum and Sivas". On 26 September 2007, he went on trial for "degrading Turkishness, the Republic, state institutions or its organs", under Article 301 of the Penal Code. A subsequent hearing was scheduled for 6 November 2007.

[Source: Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert, 1 October 2007.]

On 15 June 2007, Sarkis Seropyan, license owner of Agos, and Hrant Dink's son Arat Dink, also an editor of Agos [See NCH Annual Report 2007], were charged with "insulting the Turkish identity" for republishing a 2006 interview with Hrant Dink [See NCH Annual Reports 2006–7], in which the latter had declared that the Armenian genocide had taken place and that he would not remain silent on this issue. Other newspapers who also reported on Hrant Dink's utterances were not tried. On 11 October 2007, both were sentenced to one-year suspended prison terms. They appealed the sentence. When, on 9 November 2007, Seropyan and editor Aris Nalci criticized the sentence, both were tried for "attempting to influence the judiciary".

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 10, 302; Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert, 2 October 2007 & 4 March 2008; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 438; IOC, 2/07: 15–17, 21, 27–28, 32–42, 202; 3/07: 136; PEN, Ifex Update (15 October 2007); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 57, 62, 65; Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert, 13 July 2007; World Press Freedom Committee, Ifex Alert (26 June 2007).]

In July 2007, Taner Akçam, a refugee and visiting professor of history at the University of Minnesota, United States [See NCH Annual Report 2007] announced that he had decided "to take Article 301 of the Penal Code, which has put around one hundred academics, journalists and writers on trial since it entered law in June 2005, to the European Court of Human Rights" in protest against the law's threat to academic research. He argued that Article 301 contravened articles 7 (punishment without law), 10 (freedom of expression), and 14 (prohibition of discrimination) of the European Convention of Human Rights. "Facing history and human rights violations of the past cannot be a crime. Rather, they are a precondition for peace and regional rapprochement," he said. Also in July 2007, a court in Ankara accepted part of the court case filed by Sükrü Elekdag, retired ambassador and Member of Parliament, against Agos and Akçam. Akçam wrote an article entitled "Gündüz Aktan and the Saik Problem in the Genocide", which was first published in the Birikim Journal (November 2005) and then as a six-part series in Agos (in January and February 2007). Elekdag claimed that the article "violated" his personal rights and "insulted" him. The court awarded his compensation claim of approximately US$7,676. The defendants planned to appeal the ruling. On 8 November 2007, another case was brought by Elekdag against the publisher of Pencere Publishers Muzaffer Erdogan, translator Ahmet Güner, and Akçam, for the publication of Akçam's book, Treatment of the Armenians in the Ottoman Empire. The trial continued in 2008.

[Sources: Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert (12 July & 30 July & 10 August 2007); Ifex Communiqué 16–42 (16 October 2007); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 59, 61

On 13 July 2007, Eren Keskin, journalist for the daily Birgün, lawyer and former president of the Istanbul chapter of the Human Rights Association [See NCH Annual Report 2007], was sentenced to one-year of imprisonment reduced to a fine. Another trial against her continued.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 303; Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert (13 July 2007); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 62.]

On 13 August 2007, Yasin Yetisgen, editor of the newspaper Çoban Atesi (Shepherd's Fire) in Gaziantep, southeastern Turkey, was arrested for “damaging the unity and integrity of the state” for using the term “North Kurdistan” in an article. On 19 November 2007, a second court case was initiated against him on charges of “alienating the people from military service and insulting the memory of Atatürk”. He faced up to seven and a half years’ imprisonment for publishing an article in issue no. 32 containing references to Atatürk. On 9 November 2007, copies of the issue had been confiscated. The article, written by journalist Berkant Coskun, who lived abroad, was entitled “Mother, Don’t Send Me to Military Service” and contained the following sentences: “Unfortunately, Turkey has been the arena for dirty wars throughout history. Starting with Mustafa Kemal’s [Atatürk’s] massacre order in Dersim [now Tunceli]...” and “If today’s Kurdish movement is called terrorist, that means that the movement which Mustafa Kemal started was no different. The only difference is that Mustafa Kemal was not arrested.” The trial was scheduled to begin on 9 May 2008.

[Sources: Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert, 11 January 2008; IOC, 2/08: 194; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 64–65]

On 28 January 2008 in Izmir, Attila Yayla, a professor of politics, political philosophy, and political economy at Gazi University, Ankara, and head of the Association for Liberal Thinking [See NCH Annual Report 2007], was sentenced to fifteen months’ suspended imprisonment. He would be on probation and subjected to police supervision for two years. Yayla appealed against the verdict. He lived in exile in the United Kingdom. Others reportedly on trial for defaming Atatürk included the translators Lütfi Taylan Tosun and Aysel Yildirim, Zehra Comakli Türkmen of the Özgür-Der Children’s Club, and journalists Mehmet Terzi and Oral Calislar. Writer Mustafa Islamoglu had been imprisoned under the law.

[Sources: American Association of University Professors, “Letter to Turkish Minister of Justice

Mehmet Ali Şahin” (30 January 2008); BBC News Online, 29 January 2008; Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Alert, 19 March 2008; D. Butler & G. Jones, “Turkish academic convicted of insulting Atatürk” (Reuters, 28 January 2008; Ifex Communiqué 16–42 (16 October 2007) ; Ifex Alert (15 October 2007); IOC, 2/08: 194.]

In June 2008, prosecutors launched an inquiry after Nuray Bezirgan, a student, said on the popular television show Teke Tek that she did not like Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, the founder of the modern Turkish state. She also expressed admiration for the leader of Iran’s Islamic revolution, Ayatollah Khomeini. She possibly faced charges for “crimes committed against Atatürk”.

[Source: R. Tait, “Turkish student faces jail over anti-Atatürk TV remarks”, Guardian (16 June 2008).]

On 17 June 2008, Ragip Zarakolu (1948–), co-founder and owner of Belge publishers and one of the founders of the History Foundation [See NCH Annual Reports 2005–7], was sentenced to six, later reduced to five, months’ imprisonment commuted to a fine for the first charge (insulting the state) and was acquitted for the other (insulting Atatürk). Zarakolu planned to appeal the sentence.

[Sources: Bianet (IPS Communication Foundation), Ifex Update (19 June 2008); Ifex Communiqué 16–42 (16 October 2007); IOC, 1/08: 209; PEN American Center, “PEN, Publishers Decry Conviction of Ragip Zarakolu in Turkey” (19 June 2008); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist: To 31 December 2007 (London) 64–65; PEN, Ifex Alert (2 April & 10 May 2007 & 19 March 2008).]

See also Switzerland.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

Peace talks between the government and the rebel Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) continued in southern Sudan. In April 2007, both parties agreed to extend the cessation of hostilities, and in May 2007 both signed a document entitled Comprehensive Solutions to the Northern Uganda Conflict. On 29 June 2007, the parties signed an agreement on "reconciliation and accountability", an agreement purportedly establishing a framework to address crimes committed during the conflict in northern Uganda (1986–2006). Negotiations reportedly focused on bringing about the withdrawal of the International Criminal Court's (ICC) arrest warrants for four senior LRA leaders—Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti (died October 2007), Okot Odhiambo and Dominic Ongwen—by setting up alternative national processes. In 2005, the ICC charged the men with crimes against humanity and war crimes. The ICC's statute allowed national trials of its cases where possible. However, ICC judges would have the final say in deciding whether national trials were an adequate alternative.

[Sources: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 6, 307; HRW, World Report 2008 (2008), 172.]

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

There were continued failures of accountability for past human rights violations, including in relation to alleged state collusion in killings in Northern Ireland.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 313, 316.]

On 26 November 2007, a debate at the Oxford Union, in which Nick Griffin and David Irving [See NCH Annual Reports 1996–7, 2000, 2003, 2006–7] were invited to talk about free speech, was disrupted when thirty protesters forced their way into the building. Five hundred people had staged a sit-down demonstration outside the building. In 1998, British National Party leader Griffin had been convicted for incitement to racial hatred because he had denied the Holocaust. In 2000, Irving was convicted as a Holocaust denier; in February 2006, he was imprisoned in Austria for three years after pleading guilty to Holocaust denial. He served thirteen months of the sentence before being released on probation and was banned from Austria.

[Sources: BBC News, 27 November 2007; IOC, 1/08: 210.]

In [2008], Cambridge University Press reportedly pulped a book, Alms for Jihad: Charity and Terrorism in the Islamic World, by Robert Collins, a professor emeritus of history at the University of California, and J. Millard Burr, a former United States State Department employee, on the threat of a libel suit in the United Kingdom by Sheik Khalid bin Mahfouz, a wealthy Saudi businessman accused of financing terrorist groups.

[Source: Article 19 & Freedom House, Ifex Alert (22 May 2008).]

In March 2008, the National Union of Teachers (NUT) accused the Ministry of Defense of breaching the 1996 Education Act (which prescribed that all political issues had to be treated in a balanced way) over a lesson plan drawn up to teach pupils about the war in Iraq since 2003. NUT claimed that the lesson plan, commissioned by the ministry to the organization Kids Connections, was a “propaganda” exercise and made no mention of the lack of United Nations backing for the war or civilian casualties as a result of the war. NUT also argued that the instructions—designed for use during classroom discussions in general studies, or personal, social and health education (PSE) lessons—were an attempt to rewrite the history of the invasion of Iraq.

[Source: “Iraq: Teachers Told To Rewrite History; MoD Accused of Sending Propaganda to Schools” (Independent, 14 March 2008).]

UNITED NATIONS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

In March 2007, during Black History Month, a charter school in Los Angeles forbade its seventh-grade students from reciting a poem about Emmett Till, a black boy lynched in the 1950s, because it deemed the story unsuitable for young children. Two teachers who signed a protest letter written by the students were dismissed.

[Source: IOC, 3/07: 139.]

On 1 June 2007, Norman Finkelstein (1953–) [See NCH Annual Report 2007], a Jewish political scientist at DePaul University, Chicago (2001–7), was denied tenure. The political science department and a college-level personnel committee both voted in favor of tenure, but the dean of the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences wrote a memorandum against it, and the University Board on Promotion and Tenure voted against granting tenure. The final decision rested with the University President, Dennis Holtschneider, who declared that he had found “no compelling reasons to overturn” the tenure board’s recommendation. He also added that Finkelstein had displayed a lack of “collegiality” and engaged in “ad hominem attacks” on scholars with opposing views. On 24 August 2008, Finkelstein was denied access to his office, his courses were canceled, and he was put on paid administrative leave for his final year. Mehrene Larudee, an assistant professor of international studies, who had supported Finkelstein, was also denied tenure. The American Association of University Professors protested against the lack of appeal in both cases. On 5 September 2007, Finkelstein announced that he had reached an agreement with DePaul University and would resign immediately. On 23 May 2008, he was detained by the Israeli security service, Shin Bet, at the airport of Tel Aviv, deported and banned from Israel for ten years. Shin Bet interrogated him for 24 hours about his contact with the Lebanese Islamic militia, Hizbullah, when he travelled to Lebanon earlier in 2008 and expressed solidarity with the group which waged war against Israel in 2006. He was also accused of having contact with al-Qaeda. Finkelstein rejected the accusations.

[Sources: American Association of University Professors, Letters to Dennis Holtschneider, President of DePaul University (10 July & 20 August & 27 August 2007); Chronicle of Higher Education, 25 May & 4 June & 8 June & 15 June & 25 June & 27 August & 6 September 2007; Middle East Studies Association, Letters to Dennis Holtschneider, President De Paul University, Chicago (10 April & 4 September 2007); T. O’Loughlin, “US Academic Deported and Banned for Criticising Israel”, Guardian (26 May 2008); Washington Post, 9 October 2006: A03.]

On 28 November 2001, the American Historical Association, the Organization of American Historians, the National Security Archive, historian Stanley Kutler, professor emeritus of history and law, University of Wisconsin, and other public interest groups filed a suit in a District Court in Washington, D.C., to stop implementation of President George W. Bush’s 1 November 2001 Executive Order (EO) no. 13233 which gave former Presidents and their heirs or designees (as well as former Vice Presidents) broad authority to withhold or delay release of White House records, and was thought to violate the 1978 Presidential Records Act. The suit requested to prevent the Archivist of the United States from implementing the EO and to compel the release of 68,000 pages of records from former President Ronald Reagan's files withheld since January 2001 despite the requirements of the Act. On 1 October 2007, a federal district court judge ruled that the EO was, in part, invalid. The judge struck down the EO section that allowed former presidents to delay the release of records indefinitely. The court did not address the issue, however, of whether it was permissible for Bush to extend the authority over disclosure of presidential papers to a former president's heirs or to former vice presidents. On 31 December 2007, amendments to the 1976 Freedom of Information Act were signed into law. In 2008, the House of Representatives passed legislation to revoke EO no. 13233 and the Senate held hearings on overturning it.

[Sources: National Coalition for History, "Federal Judge Invalidates Order Allowing Former Presidents to Withhold Records" (2 October 2007); National Security Archive, "Historians, Public Interest Groups Sue to Stop Bush Order; Say New Restrictions on White House Files Violate Presidential Records Act" (press release; Washington 28 November 2001); Idem, Update (1 October 2007); M.J. Sherwin & L. White, "Democracy Requires a Past", Chronicle of Higher Education (13 June 2008).]

In August 2007, archivist of the United States Allan Weinstein said that the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) had lost documents concerning its investigation of the murder of CBS reporter George Polk by unknown assailants at the height of the Greek civil war in 1948, and destroyed its file on requests for Polk documents based on the Freedom of Information Act.

[Source: National Security Archive, Updates (Washington), 10 August 2007 (Polk).]

On 5 September 2007, the National Security Archive (NSA) and Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) sued the White House and the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) seeking the recovery and preservation of more than 5 million White House e-mail messages that were apparently deleted from White House computers between March 2003 (the invasion of Iraq) and October 2005 (the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina). White House officials acknowledged that e-mail was missing from the White House archive, and that the Executive Office of the President (EOP) in 2002 abandoned the electronic records management system put in place under his predecessor Bill Clinton. In November 2007 and January 2008, a federal judge ordered the EOP to preserve all e-mail backup media under its custody or control and to answer questions about the location of the missing e-mails. From 2004, NARA had reportedly warned the White House repeatedly about the risk of lost e-mails. In October 2005, the EOP first discovered that potentially millions of e-mail messages were missing. The loss of White House e-mail first surfaced on 23 January 2006 in conjunction with the investigation into the leak of Valerie Plame's identity by vice presidential aide Scooter Libby when prosecutors were unable to provide copies of e-mail records. After several contradictory statements, the White House admitted on 6 May 2008 that it had no e-mail back-up tapes with data written between March and May 2003 (the invasion of Iraq). An earlier lawsuit had produced landmark rulings in the early 1990s that e-mail had to be treated as government records. Those rulings led to the preservation of more than 30 million White House e-mail messages from the 1980s and 1990s.

[Sources: National Security Archive, Updates (Washington) 5 September & 29 October & 13 November & 14 December 2007 & 8 January & 16 January & 26 February & 18 March & 17 April & 24 April & 6 May & 29 July 2008.]

On 2 November 2007, American-born assistant professor of anthropology Nadia Abu El-Haj, of Palestinian descent, was awarded tenure at Barnard College (a liberal arts college for women affiliated with Columbia University), New York, despite a controversy about petitions supporting and opposing her candidacy. In her first book, Facts on the Ground, she had contended that Israeli archeologists searched for an ancient Jewish presence to help build the case for a Jewish state, and that they sometimes used bulldozers, destroying the remains of Arab and other cultures.

[Source: A. Finder, "Embattled Barnard Anthropologist Is Awarded Tenure", New York Times (3 November 2007).]

In December 2007, President George Bush signed into law the United States Genocide Accountability Act of 2007, which permits the investigation and prosecution of genocide if the alleged offender is brought into, or found in the United States, even if the crime occurred outside the country.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 16.]

On 20 December 2007, the American Historical Association wrote a letter to the Office for Human Research Protections, the official agency that oversees Institutional Review Boards (IRB's) which review experiments with human subjects, including, since 1998, oral history projects. It requested that oral history, including the use of oral history archives, be exempted from review. The letter noted that IRB's were typically comprised of faculty with no expertise in oral history who insisted on specific sets of questions (thereby suppressing the opportunity for dialogue), on the confidentiality of sources (even though the interviewee's particular knowledge was often the purpose of the interview), or on the potential harm of interviews (in some cases, the trauma of reliving a bad experience was cited, in others, the potential personal or legal jeopardy to interviewees or their surviving relatives). The letter stated that such regulations conflicted with the essential canons of historical practice.

[Source: American Historical Association, "Letter to Office for Human Research Protections" (20 December 2007).]

In 2008, Florida legislators introduced SB 2692, the Academic Freedom Act, to protect teachers and students from retaliation for discussing the scientific evidence for and against evolutionism.

[Source: Discovery Institute, "Anti-Freedom Activists Try to Censor Science Education in Florida" (2008).]

On 22 April 2008, the Society of American Archivists and the Association of Canadian Archivists stated their deep concern about the whereabouts, custody, and fate of records captured or otherwise obtained by the United States, and those removed by private parties, during the First (1990–91) and Second (2003–) Gulf Wars. The records under consideration comprised five sets: records seized by the U.S. military and intelligence agencies during the Second Gulf War (millions of pages); records seized from non-governmental combatants (especially those seized in Sinjar, northern Iraq, from an al-Qaeda affiliate in the fall of 2007); millions of pages from 1991 and 2003 obtained by the United States-based non-governmental organization Iraq Memory Foundation; records seized by Kurds during the First Gulf War (an estimated eighteen tons of records seized in northern Iraq); and Iraqi Jewish archives.

[Source: SAA/ACA Joint Statement on Iraqi Records (22 April 2008).]

On 22 July 2008, a federal court in New York decided that the government must release most of the sealed grand jury records from the 1951 indictment of alleged Soviet spies Julius and Ethel Rosenberg. In response to a petition filed in January 2008 by the National Security Archive, the American Historical Association, the American Society for Legal History, the Organization of American Historians, the Society of American Archivists, and New York Times reporter Sam Roberts, the government stated in a June 2008 filing that the Rosenberg case was of "significant historical importance" and therefore it would not contest the release of testimonies of witnesses who had passed away or consented to the disclosure. Thus the materials were covered by an exception to the rule that grand jury records must remain secret indefinitely.

[Source: National Security Archive, Update (26 June & 22 July 2008).]

See also Russia, South Africa, United Kingdom.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The authorities failed to provide redress to relatives of the victims of human rights abuses during the military government (1973–85). The Expiry Law of 1986, which grants members of the security forces immunity from prosecution for crimes committed during the period, remained in force. Draft legislation which would provide reparations to relatives of the victims was before Congress at the end of 2007. In July 2007, the anthropology team from the Humanities Faculty of the University of the Republic began excavations in the Tablada military compound, searching for the remains of detainees who were the victims of enforced disappearance during the period. A total of 47 cases of victims of human rights violations have been excluded from the Expiry Law by the current administration. In September 2007, the appeals court confirmed the trial and detention of former President Juan Maria Bordaberry (1971–76) as co-author of ten homicides. In December 2007, former President General Gregorio Álvarez (1981–85) was arrested and charged with being co-responsible for the enforced disappearances of more than thirty people.

[Source: AI, Report 2008 (2008) 15–16, 322.]

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #49 (2007).

The Uzbek government rejected numerous and repeated calls for an independent international inquiry into the May 2005 Andijan massacre when hundreds of unarmed protestors were killed by government forces. The circumstances surrounding the massacre have not been clarified, and those responsible for the killings have not been held accountable. The government continued to persecute anyone who was thought to have any connection to or information about the events. Refugees who fled in the immediate aftermath of the massacre but returned later, as well as their families, were targets of government pressure. Refugees had to fear for their security even abroad, because Uzbek security services were operating in areas geographically close to the Uzbek border, such as in Osh (Kyrgyzstan).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2008 (2008) 455.]

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

See Italy.

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In March 2008, Takavafira Zhou, history lecturer at Great Zimbabwe University (2004–8) and president of the Progressive Teachers' Union of Zimbabwe, was dismissed after the university labeled him an "academic terrorist" and declared that his teaching and university service were unsatisfactory. Zhou clashed with the Great Zimbabwe University Vice Chancellor Obert Maravanyika a number of times, including the occasion when he led a strike at the university in 2006. Zhou instituted legal action to challenge his dismissal. His court documents reportedly included a letter to the university's chairman, Honour Mkushi, which was copied to President Robert Mugabe in his capacity as Chancellor, in which Zhou alleged that he had been victimized because he failed a history student, Precious Chitapi, whom he said was "protected" by Maravanyika on several occasions, among others by changing university regulations.

[Source: S. Makshori, "'Academic Terrorist' Lecturer Sacked", Financial Gazette (Harare) 20 March 2008.]

For three years, an archaeologist [name unknown] had been a curator for a state organization of museum sites and monuments; this included working with local communities to assess their relationship to the cultural heritage sites in their areas and to educate them about their rights and their role in protecting historic cultural sites. She also worked primarily at an archaeological site in southern Zimbabwe dating from the twelfth century. She focused her research on the impact of land reform on cultural and historic sites in Zimbabwe. This was sensitive work, both because all community-organizing activities were closely watched by the ruling ZANU-PF government, and because of the extreme sensitivity of any issues relating to land use. She was also assaulted and threatened because of her involvement with the opposition party, the Movement for Democratic Change. She went into exile in the United States, where she became a fellow at the Smithsonian Anacostia Community Museum, Washington D.C.

[Source: Scholar Rescue Fund, SRF Grantee Update (May 2008) 11.]

See Ethiopia.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; IOC [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. It reports about the censorship of history, the persecution of historians around the globe, and related topics. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

This Annual Report and previous Annual Reports were compiled by Antoon De Baets and revised by Ingrid Sennema.

July 2007 (revised August 2007)

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In March 2006, Assadullah Sarwari, head of the intelligence agency during the communist period (1978–88), was sentenced to death after an unfair trial for war crimes committed between 1978 and 1992.

During 2006, the government took a few steps to implement the Transitional Justice Action Plan, a five-year plan to gather information about Afghanistan’s legacy of warfare and violence and to consider methods of achieving accountability. A mechanism for vetting political appointments was established, and in December 2006, President Hamid Karzai officially launched the action plan.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 48; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 240–41.]

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

See Greece, Macedonia.

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, no steps were taken to clarify the fate of thousands of victims of enforced disappearance between 1993 and 2002. Dozens of court cases brought by their families had not led to full judicial investigations or prosecution of the alleged perpetrators. The February 2006 laws on “national reconciliation” barred courts from investigating complaints against those responsible (see below). In March 2006, the United Nations Human Rights Committee found that the state had failed to protect the rights and life of Salah Saker and Riad Boucherf who had “disappeared” in 1994 and 1995 respectively, and that the treatment by the authorities of their relatives, who remained without news of their fate or whereabouts, amounted to ill-treatment.

The laws on “national reconciliation” (see below) included provisions to compensate families of victims of enforced disappearance, but no payments had been made by the end of 2006. In the absence of any investigations or judicial proceedings, many families rejected the compensation offer, fearing that the payments were intended to silence their calls for truth and justice. Several dozens of families of victims of enforced disappearance who had appealed to the authorities for help in previous years were summoned by security forces and given written notification of the death of their loved ones, a prerequisite for any compensation claims. The documents, however, refuted the families' claims that their "disappeared" relatives had been arrested by security forces, stating instead that they had been killed by unidentified men or while participating in an armed group. Families of victims of enforced disappearance were intimidated and some were prosecuted in connection with documentation they had produced and their campaigning activities on behalf of the victims or because of their peaceful protests against the government's national reconciliation policies.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 52.]

On 27 February 2006, a presidential "Decree Implementing the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation" containing blanket amnesty provisions for perpetrators of human rights abuses during the internal conflict (1992–2000)—estimated to have claimed as many as 200,000 lives—also criminalized public discussion about it. Its article 46 stated: "Anyone who, by speech, writing, or any other act, uses or exploits the wounds of the National Tragedy to harm the institutions of the Democratic and Popular Republic of Algeria, to weaken the state, or to undermine the good reputation of its agents who honorably served it, or to tarnish the image of Algeria internationally, shall be punished by three to five years in prison and a fine of 250,000 to 500,000 dinars." Human rights groups and associations of victims staged public demonstrations to protest against the new legislation, describing it as unconstitutional.

[Sources: AI, "Algeria: New Amnesty Law Will Ensure Atrocities Go Unpunished" (London 2006); AI, Report 2007 (2007) 39, 50–52.]

See also Morocco/Western Sahara.

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See Namibia.

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In June 2005, the Supreme Court declared the 1986 “Full Stop” law (which halted the prosecution of human rights abuses under the military dictatorship [1976–83]), and the 1987 “Due Obedience” law (which granted immunity in such cases to the military except those in positions of command) unconstitutional. In 2006, several former members of the security forces accused of committing human rights abuses at the time went on trial. Judges, prosecution witnesses, non-governmental organizations and relatives of former victims involved in the trials were attacked and threatened in the last four months of 2006. Since 2005 several federal judges have also struck down presidential pardons decreed by President Menem in 1989 and 1990, but the Supreme Court has not yet ruled on the constitutionality of these pardons.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 55; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 180–81.]

On 22 March 2006, Minister of Defence Nilda Garré requested the armed forces to make their secret archives about the military dictatorship (1976–83) accessible for research.

[Source: Keesings Historisch Archief (2006) 544.]

See also Uruguay.

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See also France, Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In February 2007, a coroner’s court in New South Wales opened an investigation into the murder of cameraman Brian Peters, one of five journalists working for Australian television stations who filmed the Indonesian army’s attack on the East Timorese village Balibo on 16 October 1975 in the lead-up to the invasion of East Timor (now Timor-Leste). There is evidence that the “Balibo Five” were killed by Indonesian forces. In 2000, the Historical Crime Unit formed by the United Nations (UN) Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) had begun an investigation into their deaths, which resulted in the UN issuing international arrest warrants for three Indonesians, including former cabinet minister Yunus Yosfiah, on 3 February 2001. The warrants were never executed. (See also NCH #23).

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué, 6 & 14 February 2007; IOC (2007 no.2) 194.]

See also Timor-Leste.

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 20 December 2006, a Vienna Court ruled that British author David Irving, convicted of Holocaust denial, should serve the rest of his sentence (three years' imprisonment reduced to two) on probation, among other reasons because he had meanwhile admitted that the Holocaust had taken place. Having served thirteen months, Irving returned to the United Kingdom. (See NCH #45).

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (London 2006b) 43; IOC (2007 no.1) 110.]

See also France.

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 27 April 2006, five leading members of the Belarusian opposition were tried and convicted for “organizing an unsanctioned meeting”. The charges related to a peaceful march to commemorate the twentieth anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster on 26 April 1986. The marchers had received permission to march to Bangalore Square in Minsk where speeches were to take place. However, Alyksandr Milinkevich reportedly addressed the crowd before the march began. He and four others were sentenced to fifteen days’ imprisonment.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 63.]

In September 2006, the Information Ministry suspended the monthly historical magazine Arche (established 1997) for three months on the grounds that the September issue violated the terms of its licence by including political articles. The September issue cover photo showed police dispersing an anti-government demonstration in March 2006, and one of its articles was a detailed account of a 1995 crackdown on opposition parliamentarians objecting to a referendum imposed by President Aleksandr Lukashenka that would have made Russian one of Belarus’s official languages. The October and November issues were available on Arche’s website. The editor, Valer Bulhakau, had repeatedly requested authorization to cover politics but without success. On 8 November 2006, the Supreme Court for Economic Affairs rejected the appeal by the Arche editor.

[Sources: IOC (2006 no.4) 185; Reporters without Borders, “Court Upholds Three-month Suspension for Cultural Magazine” (16 November 2006); Idem, “Information Ministry Suspends Opposition Monthly” (22 November 2006).]

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006) under United States.

In December 2006, the Attorney General's Office charged former President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada and two former ministers with the killing of at least sixty people during demonstrations in October 2003. The authorities were seeking Sánchez's extradition from the United States to try him for the killings.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 66.]

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

During 2006, the specialized war crimes chamber within the Bosnian State Court began to hear eighteen cases referred from the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), some involving multiple suspects, including 11 Bosnian Serbs charged with genocide relating to Srebrenica. The district courts in Republika Srpska (RS) continued to try war crimes cases, albeit at a slow pace. In the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FbiH), war crimes trials continued at a faster pace, with half of its ten cantonal courts hearing cases during 2006. The non-availability of suspects remained the biggest impediment to accountability. Many war crimes suspects were Bosnian Serbs and Croats now resident as citizens in Serbia and Croatia and the constitutions of these countries prohibited extradition of their citizens. Bosnia refused to sign up to a September 2006 agreement between Croatia and Serbia that would facilitate prosecutions in the country of residence, insisting that defendants be tried in the country where the crimes took place. During 2006, the Bosnian authorities had not apprehended any persons indicted by the ICTY. Five indictees remain at large, including Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 67–68; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 365–66.]

In 2006, the ICTY continued to try alleged perpetrators of serious violations of international humanitarian law. On 11 March 2006, former Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic died at the ICTY

Detention Unit following a heart attack. He had been on trial before ICTY for war crimes and crimes against humanity in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia and Kosovo, and for genocide in Bosnia-Herzegovina. [Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 67–68.]

According to estimates of the International Commission on Missing Persons (ICMP), approximately 13,000 people who went missing during the war (1992–95) were still unaccounted for. Many of them were victims of enforced disappearances, whose perpetrators enjoyed impunity. Progress was slow in transferring competencies from the missing persons commissions of the FBiH and RS to the national Missing Persons Institute. The Institute's directors were appointed in March 2006, and Steering and Supervisory Board members in December 2006. Approximately 2,500 sets of human remains were exhumed from various locations in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In August 2006, the exhumation of a mass grave in Kamenica, near Zvornik, uncovered 1,009 incomplete and 144 complete skeletons. The site is believed to contain the remains of victims killed by Bosnian Serb forces in Srebrenica in 1995, and was reportedly the biggest mass grave excavated since the end of the war in 1995.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 68.]

On 27 September 2006, ICTY sentenced Momčilo Krajišnik, a former member of the Bosnian Serb leadership, to 27 years' imprisonment for crimes against humanity (persecution, extermination, murder, deportation and forced transfer of non-Serb civilians during the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992–95). These crimes included his government's deliberate policy of destroying or heavily damaging, without overriding military necessity more than 200 cultural or religious sites (museums, archives, libraries, mosques, Catholic churches) of importance to the Muslim and Croat populations in 26 municipalities, including Banja Luka, Bosanski Novi, Prijedor, and Zvornik, in order to wipe out traces of Croat and Muslim culture and religion. In Banja Luka, all traces of mosques and minarets on photos from the 1920s and 1930s were airbrushed out for an exhibition at the local regional archives and the regional museum, celebrating 65 years of Banja Luka as regional capital. ICTY found that the destruction of cultural monuments and sacred sites could be considered a form of persecution and thus a crime against humanity. It was the first sentence in history in which destruction of cultural property formed major evidence for the intent to persecute particular groups. Krajišnik was acquitted of genocide and complicity in genocide charges. [Complete text of judgment at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/kr.pdf.]

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 67; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 365–66; ICTY, Prosecutor v. Momčilo Krajišnik; Case no. IT-00-39-T: Judgement (<http://www.un.org/icty>; 2006), paragraphs 780–83; 836–40; Idem, The Prosecutor of the Tribunal against Momčilo Krajišnik and Biljana Plavsic (Case no. IT-00-39 & 40-PT): Amended Consolidated Indictment (The Hague, 7 March 2002), Schedule D; “Law Report: War, Cultural Cleansing and the Courts” [Interview with archivist Andras Riedlmayer on ABC Radio National] (October 2006).]

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 30 September 2006, Reporters Without Borders requested Brazil's presidential candidates to amend the law regulating access to government archives. Article 23, section 2 of Law No. 8.159 of 8 January 1991 (which was complemented by Law No. 11.111 of 5 May 2005), stated that "access to secret documents relating to the security of society and the state shall be restricted for a maximum period of 30 years from the date of their creation, a period that may be extended once for an equal period." Article 23 section 3 stated that "access to secret documents relating to the honor and image of persons shall be restricted for a maximum period of 100 years from the date of their creation." Reporters Without Borders declared that these periods were much too long and concealed information of general interest from the public. The provisions could also be a source of abuse in the absence of precise criteria about the "honor" and "image" of persons. They wanted the next Congress to approve provisions to speed up the declassification of government documents.

[Source: Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Alert (3 October 2006).]

See also Paraguay.

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In March 2005, the United Nations (UN) Security Council had recommended the establishment of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and a special chamber in the Burundian judicial system to try human rights abuses, both to be staffed by Burundian and international personnel. An ad hoc commission, established under the terms of the Arusha peace accords of 2000, identified over 4,000 persons as “political prisoners” and in early 2006 ordered the release of most of them. Most were convicted of crimes related to the violence following the assassination of President Melchior Ndadaye in 1993 or had been held for years without trial. Although the government declared that the releases were provisional and that the persons involved would face the TRC, some citizens brought a case before the Constitutional Court, arguing that the release violated the constitution. The court ruled in favor of the government. In early February 2006, the government issued a memorandum in order to commence talks with the UN on the TRC and the special chamber. However, the memorandum contained proposals which could hinder efforts to overcome impunity. For example, it proposed a “procedure of reconciliation” which could prevent or limit the investigation and prosecution of crimes under international law. In June 2006 in Dar es-Salaam, Tanzania, the government and the Forces nationales de libération (FNL) signed an agreement to achieve lasting peace, security and stability in Burundi. It stated that the TRC (not yet established) would be renamed the “Truth, Pardon and Reconciliation Commission”. Its mandate would be to establish the facts surrounding “the dark period of Burundi history” and various protagonists’ responsibilities, with a view to achieving forgiveness and national reconciliation.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 76; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 94.]

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In July 2006, the thirty international and Cambodian judges and prosecutors for the tribunal to prosecute the leaders of the Khmer Rouge regime (1975–79), established as the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), were sworn in. Many of the ECCC officials have poor track records in terms of judicial independence and competence. The ECCC was expected to commence its trial phase in mid-2007. In July 2006, Khmer Rouge leader Chhit Chhoeun (Ta Mok) died. He had been detained without trial since 1999, along with Kaing Khek Lev (Duch), chief of the Khmer Rouge’s S-21 (Tuol Sleng) prison. Other senior Khmer Rouge leaders, including Ieng Sary, Khieu Samphan, and Nuon Chea, continued to live freely in Cambodia. The United States continued to withhold direct funding for the ECCC, largely because of concerns about the incompetence and bias of the Cambodian judges. Some were on the ruling party’s central committee while others lacked basic legal training.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 78; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 255–56.]

University lecturer Teang Narithwas was charged with “criminal disinformation” and arrested on 4 September 2006 for distributing a controversial book he had written on the political history of Cambodia.

[Source: World Press Freedom Committee, It’s a Crime: How Insult Laws Stifle Press Freedom: A 2006 Status Report (Reston, VA 2006).]

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, the government made no progress in bringing to justice those responsible for serious human rights abuses, including hundreds of rapes, during the conflict of late 2002 and early 2003. The International Criminal Court (ICC) continued to conduct a preliminary analysis of crimes committed during the period, following a referral by the government in 2005. At the end of 2006, the ICC had not announced whether it would launch a full investigation.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 81.]

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, the Senegalese Council of Ministers announced that it would prosecute former Chadian President Hissène Habré, under house arrest in Senegal since 2000, on charges of torture and crimes against humanity during his rule (1982–90). However, the Senegalese Supreme Court later ruled that Habré could not stand trial in Senegal for crimes allegedly committed elsewhere, leading the Senegalese government to ask the African Union (AU) to decide where he should be tried. In July 2006, citing Senegal's obligation under the 1984 United Nations Convention against Torture to either prosecute or extradite alleged torturers who enter its territory, the AU Assembly of Heads of State and Government asked Senegal to prosecute Habré. In 2005, a Belgian judge had issued an international arrest warrant against Habré. In December 2006, the government set up a working group responsible for organizing the trial.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 19, 225, 321; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 101.]

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

As of October 2006, courts had convicted 109 individuals for human rights abuses under General Pinochet's military rule (1973–90). Thirty-five former generals were convicted or were facing trial. These advances were achieved in spite of a 1978 amnesty law exempting military personnel from punishment for crimes committed between 1973 and 1978. In cases of enforced disappearance, the Supreme Court generally held this amnesty law to be inapplicable, considering them to be kidnappings that were ongoing until the victim's death could be proven. Several judges, however, did consider the amnesty applicable to killings that took place in 1973–78. In contrast, other judges ruled that international human rights law invalidated the amnesty in all cases of grave human rights abuses. The Supreme Court had yet to issue a ruling on this problem. In October 2006, however, in response to a September 2006 ruling of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights that the amnesty law was incompatible with the American Convention on Human Rights and therefore without legal effect, President Michelle Bachelet announced that she would present a bill to prevent the amnesty law from being applied in cases of grave human rights abuses. In December 2006, former dictator Augusto Pinochet died. Just weeks before his death he had faced new charges in connection with 35 kidnappings (including the Prats case, Villa Grimaldi, Operation Colombo and the Caravan of Death), one homicide and 24 cases of torture. He never attended judicial hearings in any Chilean court.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 25, 84–85; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 190–91.]

See also Peru.

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In February 2005, Gendun, a Tibetan monk who studied Buddhist doctrine and philosophy and a teacher of traditional monastic dance (Cham) from the Tibetan area of Amdo, was arrested and in January 2006 sentenced to four years' imprisonment after he had lectured on Tibetan history and culture at a teacher training college in Tsolho (Chinese: Hainan) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture, Qinghai province. His current whereabouts are unknown (he may be held in a "reform through labor" facility [laogai]) and there are concerns for his safety. More than twenty monks, students and teachers were also detained in connection with his case but released soon afterwards.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007), 265–66; International Campaign for Tibet, "Tibetan Monk Imprisoned after Talking about Tibetan Culture" (7 April 2006).]

In March 2006, in spite of an open letter from 48 intellectuals and former officials, the government banned any commemorations of the Cultural Revolution (1966–76) and ignored calls for a memorial hall. The Chinese Communist Party Central Propaganda Department issued a directive banning media commentary, retrospectives or exhibitions on the topic. National security police also prevented several top scholars from attending the conference "Historical Truth and Collective Memory", organized by Song Yongyi (see NCH #16) at New York City University in May 2006 to mark the anniversary. A search on popular websites available in China using the keywords "Cultural Revolution 40th anniversary" reportedly yielded no results.

[Source: Radio Free Asia, "Forty Years On, China's Cultural Revolution Still a Forbidden Zone" (15 May 2006).]

In May 2006, after film director Lou Ye ([1967]–) submitted Summer Palace, a story of love between two Chinese students against the background of the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre, for its première to the Cannes Film Festival, France, without permission of the Chinese state administration for radio, film and television, he and producer Nai An were banned from film-making for five years, probably both for political reasons and because of the nudity scenes in the film. Twenty prints of the film had already been sold abroad. In Serbia, after strong criticism, Serb Film Festival officials reinstated Summer Palace, after it had been taken off the program at the request of the Chinese embassy.

[Sources: Guardian (9 September 2006); IOC (2006 no.4) 186; IOC (2007 no.1) 126.]

Zhao Ziyang: Captive Conversations, a book of interviews with purged Prime Minister (from 1987 CCP Secretary-General) Zhao Ziyang (1919–2005) compiled by former state council member Zong Fengming, was published in Hong Kong despite attempts by the central authorities to ban it. The book was banned on the mainland.

On 31 August 2006, the Hong Kong-based Ching Cheong (1950–), a journalist for the Straits Times in Singapore (1996–) who was under house arrest in Guangzhou since 22 April 2005, was tried in camera and sentenced to five years' imprisonment on charges of espionage. He had allegedly passed on information on Chinese economic, political, and military affairs to two Taiwanese spies. Ching's wife declared, however, that Ching had apparently fallen into a trap set by an intermediary as he tried to obtain manuscripts of secret interviews of Zhao Ziyang with his confidant Zong Fengming (see above) during the former's banishment since 1989. The authorities were reportedly worried that Zhao's inside knowledge of the decision to order troops to open fire during the 1989 Tiananmen Square demonstrations might become public. On 24 November 2006, Ching's appeal was rejected. His sentence was confirmed and, in addition, he was deprived of his political rights for a year and his personal property was confiscated. Transferred in January 2007 from Beijing, where he had been "educated", to Guangzhou, near Hong Kong, he was temporarily refused family visits.

[Sources: Ifex Alert (27 November 2006); IOC (2007 no.2) 190–91; Reporters without Borders, "Hong Kong Journalist Ching Cheong Accused of Spying" ([September] 2006); The Standard: China's Business Newspaper, 31 May 2005; Times, 31 May 2005.]

On 10 September 2006, a new draft law stipulated that news and information released in China by foreign news agencies should not contain anything that served to, inter alia, "undermine...the fine cultural traditions of the Chinese nation."

[Sources: IOC (2006 no.4) 178; IOC (2007 no.2) 192.]

On 12 January 2007, the Central Propaganda Department of the State Administration of Radio, Film and Television imposed new "pre-censorship" rules forcing the media to seek permission to cover "significant historical events" or politically sensitive anniversaries. Among the areas in which media attention would be limited and censored were: the Anti-Rightist Campaign (June 1957 until 1958); the 90th anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution of October 1917; the 1989–91 collapse of the Soviet Union and its Eastern European allies; the Cultural Revolution of 1966–76.

[Sources: AI, People's Republic of China: The Olympics Countdown—Repression of Activists Overshadows Death Penalty and Media Reforms (London 2007); IOC (2007 no.1) 113; IOC (2007 no.2) 190–92.]

In March 2007, the World Association of Newspapers rejected a request by the China Newspaper Association to withdraw a press freedom prize awarded to Shi Tao (see NCH #38). Also in March 2007, Hong Kong's privacy commission cleared Internet company Yahoo! Hong Kong Ltd of any liability for sharing Shi's account user information with the Chinese authorities apparently because there was "insufficient evidence" to hold the company liable under Hong Kong privacy laws. Meanwhile, Shi's mother is suing Yahoo! for helping officials imprison her son.

[Sources: AI, People's Republic of China: The Olympics Countdown—Repression of Activists Overshadows Death Penalty and Media Reforms (London 2007) 11; Ifex Communiqué 16–24 (12 June 2007); IOC (2006 no.4) 186; World Association of Newspapers, Ifex Update (9 March 2007).

In June 2007, the newspaper Chengdu Wanbao in Chengdu, southwest China, dismissed three editors and four employees from the advertising department for letting through a one-line ad on 4 June paying tribute to mothers of protesters killed in the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre. The ad, on the lower right corner of page 14 of the paper, read: "Paying tribute to the strong(-willed) mothers of 4 June victims."

[Source: Ifex Communiqué 16–24 (12 June 2007).]

See also Netherlands.

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, prosecutors announced that they had obtained new evidence in a case involving the "disappearances" of ten people in the 1985 retaking by security forces of Colombia's Palace of Justice (which housed the Supreme Court), after its invasion by the M-19 guerrilla group. In addition, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights issued rulings on cases such as the Pueblo Bello massacre of 1990 in which 43 civilians were killed or forcibly disappeared, and the La Granja and El Aro massacres of 1996 and 1997, in which 19 people were killed. In both cases, the Court held the Colombian state partly responsible and ordered it to make reparations to the victims and their families.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 89; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007), 198.]

In 2006, more than 80 mass graves were found containing the remains of some 200 people killed by paramilitary groups over the course of the internal armed conflict that started in 1948. The Justice and Peace Unit of the Office of the Attorney General claimed that the remains of some 3,000 victims of enforced disappearance were still to be located, although this was thought to be a substantial underestimate. Concerns were raised that some exhumations and the storage of remains in official custody jeopardized forensic evidence. Paramilitaries had reportedly removed remains from some mass graves.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 89.]

On 11 September 2006, army colonel Julio Cesar Becerra Avellaneda demanded alterations to Why Did the General Cry?, a documentary about the 1997 massacre at Mapiripán in which 49 civilians died, a few hours before its screening. Upon refusal, the documentary was banned.

[Source: IOC (2006 no.4) 187.]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In March 2006, Thomas Lubanga Dyilo, leader of an Ituri armed group, the Union of Congolese Patriots (Union des Patriotes Congolais, UPC), was arrested and charged with war crimes—specifically with enlisting and recruiting child soldiers. He was subsequently transferred to the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague, the Netherlands. He became the first person to be arrested and surrendered to the ICC.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 19, 124, 321.]

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

In its resolution 1481 of 25 January 2006, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe condemned the massive human rights violations committed by totalitarian communist regimes and expressed sympathy to the victims of these crimes. It called on all communist or postcommunist parties in its member states which had not yet done so to reassess the history of communism and their own past, to clearly distance themselves from the crimes committed by totalitarian communist regimes and condemn them without any ambiguity.

[Sources: Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (<http://assembly.coe.int>), “Need for International Condemnation of Crimes of Totalitarian Communist Regimes: Resolution 1481” (25 January 2006); Idem, “Need for International Condemnation of Crimes of Totalitarian Communist Regimes: Report” (16 December 2005; Doc. 10765); Idem, “Measures To Dismantle the Heritage of Former Communist Totalitarian Systems: Resolution 1096”; (27 June 1996); Idem, “Measures To Dismantle the Heritage of Former Communist Totalitarian Systems: Report”; (3 June 1996; Doc. 7568).]

In its resolution 1736 of 17 March 2006, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe condemned the extensive human rights abuses committed by the Franco regime in Spain (1939–75) and called on the Committee of Ministers, inter alia, to adopt an official declaration for the international condemnation of the Franco regime and to mark 18 July 2006 as the official day of condemnation of the Franco regime; to continue to make available to all historians and researchers all civilian and military archives which may contain documents that can contribute to establishing the truth regarding repression.

[Sources: (1) Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (<http://assembly.coe.int>), “Need for International Condemnation of the Franco Regime: Recommendation 1736” (17 March 2006); (2) Idem, “Need for International Condemnation of the Franco Regime: Report” (November 2005; Doc. 10737).]

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, impunity for war crimes allegedly committed by Croatian army and police officers in the war (1991–95) remained widespread and the Croatian judicial system failed to adequately address wartime human rights violations, regardless of the ethnicity of the victims or of the perpetrators. Minorities suffered discrimination. Of at least 300,000 Croatian Serbs displaced by the conflict, approximately 125,000 were officially registered as having returned home, a figure widely considered to be an overestimate.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 95.]

In September 2006, the Croatian government sought the status of amicus curiae (adviser to the court on points of law) in the adjoined cases of Generals Ante Gotovina, Ivan Cermak and Mladen Markac (three former Croatian army commanders charged with crimes against humanity and war crimes against Croatian Serbs, including persecutions, deportation and forcible transfers, and murder) at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in order to “correct historical and political inaccuracies” in the indictment against them for crimes committed against Serbs during the 1995 Croatian Army action “Operation Storm.” This was opposed by the ICTY chief prosecutor, who said that Croatia was seeking to influence the outcome of the proceedings. In October 2006, ICTY rejected the application as not being in the interests of justice.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 95; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 373.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina.

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See United Kingdom.

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

See Greece.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #17 (2000).

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In December 2006, three investigative journalists were acquitted of all charges in connection with the publication of classified information about Iraq and the extent of the government's knowledge, in the run-up to the Iraq war, about the existence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. The prosecuting authorities stated that they did not intend to appeal against the acquittals.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 103–4.]

See also Iran.

EAST TIMOR

See Timor-Leste.

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In May 2007, the government of President Rafael Correa set up a four-member Truth Commission to investigate alleged human rights abuses committed over the last 27 years, particularly during the right-wing administration of former President Leon Febres Cordero (1984–88). Interior Minister Gustavo Larrea said that there had been 327 cases of political assassinations, torture and “disappearances” that remained unresolved and unpunished.

[Source: Gonzalo Solano, “Ecuador to investigate rights abuses”, Associated Press (May 2007).]

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In September 2006, Information Minister Anas el-Feki banned the French newspaper Le Figaro and the German newspaper Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung for articles that contained commentaries on the Prophet Muhammad and violent aspects of Islamic history which were deemed insulting to Islam.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.1) 114–15.]

In October 2006, Tal’at Sadat, nephew of the assassinated former President Anwar Sadat, was sentenced to one year’s imprisonment with labour and a fine for defaming the armed forces and spreading false rumours. He had given a series of media interviews in which he alleged that senior army officers had been implicated in the killing of the former president by Islamist soldiers in 1981. He also suggested that President Hosni Mubarak—then Vice-President—had been involved. Although a civilian, he was tried and convicted by a military court, after being stripped of his parliamentary immunity.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 108.]

In January 2007, the feudal Aziz Al-Fiki family demanded the confiscation of the book From the Papers of Shahenda Mekled and filed a defamation claim against its authors, academic Sherin Abu

El Naga and political activist Shahenda Mekled, and its publisher, Mohamed Hashem from Dar Merit Publishing House. The book documented feudal practices in Kamshich village, Menoufia Governorate, before and after the revolution of July 1952—including the murder of Shahenda Mekled's husband and political activist Salah Hussein in 1966. It discussed abuses of the Aziz Al-Fiki family against poor peasants at that time and resistance against this.

[Source: Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, Ifex Alert (10 January 2007).]

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, impunity for past human rights violations, including enforced disappearances, persisted. There was increasing concern among civil society organizations at the possible re-emergence of death squads which had been active during the 1980–1991 armed conflict.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 109, 110.]

ESTONIA

On 15 February 2007, President Toomas Hendrik Ilves refused to sign a controversial law (approved in parliament with 46 to 44 votes) that prohibited the display of monuments glorifying Soviet occupation (1940–41, 1944–91), during which tens of thousands of Estonians were killed. The law would have enabled the removal of the bronze statue of a Soviet soldier erected in 1947 from the center of the capital Tallinn to a less controversial location (a military cemetery on its outskirts). The statue, under which the coffins of twelve Red Army soldiers were buried, was regarded by the ethnic Russians (more than a quarter of the Estonian population of 1,3 million) as an anti-Nazi symbol but by many others as a symbol of Soviet occupation. On 27 April 2007, the statue and remains were indeed relocated. One person died, more than 153 people were injured, and 300 arrested during clashes at the site as police used tear gas to disperse mainly ethnic Russian demonstrators. Visiting Russian members of parliament called the relocation a provocation. Protests against the relocation took place before the Estonian embassies in Russia and the Ukraine. Russia temporarily suspended oil supplies by rail through Estonia.

[Sources: BBC News Online, 12 January, 15 February, 27 & 30 April, 3 May 2007; IOC (2007 no.1) 115.]

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In December 2006, the trial of members of the military government known as the Dergue (1974–91) ended after 12 years. Of the 72 people originally charged, 33 had been in custody since 1991, 14 others had died in custody, and 25 were tried in their absence, including former President Mengistu Hailemariam, who had asylum in Zimbabwe. Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe had refused to extradite him for trial. All were found guilty of capital offences including genocide and mass killings, with sentencing due in 2007. The long series of other trials of officials of the former government for killings during the “Red Terror” campaign against “anti-revolutionaries” in 1977–79 was nearly completed. Many defendants were imprisoned for long periods (which most had already served, leading to their release) and several death sentences were imposed.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 19, 114–15, 116.]

EUROPEAN UNION

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 4 January 1994, the newspaper Le quotidien de Paris published an article by the Austrian historian and journalist Paul Giniewski (1926–), entitled “The obscurity of error” concerning the papal encyclical Veritatis Splendor (1993; The Splendour of Truth). In it, Giniewski wrote that “... Many Christians have recognized that scriptural anti-Judaism and the doctrine of ‘fulfilment’ of the Old Covenant in the New lead to anti-Semitism and prepared the ground in which the idea and implementation of Auschwitz took seed”. On 18 March 1994, the Alliance générale contre le racisme et pour le respect de l’identité française et chrétienne (AGRIF; General Alliance against Racism and for Respect for the French and Christian Identity) brought proceedings against the newspaper, its director, and Giniewski on charges of racially defamatory statements against the Christian community. Giniewski was convicted before domestic courts. On 31 January 2006, however, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) said that it did not accept the argument of the domestic courts that Giniewski’s words amounted to accusing Catholics and Christians in general of being responsible for the Nazi massacres, and that Christians were therefore victims of defamation on account of their religious beliefs. The ECHR considered that Giniewski had sought to develop an argument about a specific doctrine and its possible links with the origins of the Holocaust. In so doing, he had made a serious contribution to a wide-ranging and ongoing debate. The article in question did not contain attacks on religious beliefs as such, but a view which Giniewski expressed as a journalist and historian. As in the Chauvy case (2004), the Court declared that “it is an integral part of freedom of expression to seek historical truth”, and that “it is not its role to arbitrate” the underlying historical issues. Giniewski’s article did not incite to disrespect or hatred nor did it cast doubt in any way on clearly established historical facts. The Court ruled unanimously that Giniewski’s freedom of expression had been violated.

[Source: ECHR, Case of Giniewski v. France: Judgement (Strasbourg 31 January 2006).]

On 12 October 2006, the National Assembly approved on first reading a draft law that would make it a crime to deny the 1915 Armenian genocide. The proposed law, awaiting approval by the Senate and the President, made it an offence to deny the existence of the 1915 Armenian genocide, punishable by up to one year of imprisonment and/or a fine of up to 45,000 euro. The proposal complements France's recognition of the Armenian genocide in a law passed in 2001. Reporters without Borders rejected the measure on the grounds that it attempts to create "an official historical truth—a practice typical of totalitarian regimes." The organisation adds that the law could have "incalculable consequences for all historians as well as for press freedom." Article 19 declared that "[t]his sort of law, whereby the State effectively elevates history to dogma, has no place in a democracy. Laws prohibiting incitement to hatred—so-called hate speech laws—are a more appropriate means of addressing problems of racism." It considered "all laws prohibiting the denial of genocide—including Holocaust denial laws—to breach international guarantees of freedom of expression. It [wa]s inherently illegitimate for the State to impose a blanket ban on discussion of historical matters." Six hundred historians signed a petition against the proposed law.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 5–6, 119; A19, "French Should Scrap Armenian Genocide Law" (London 13 October 2006); Ifex Communiqué (17 October 2006); IOC (2007 no.1) 115.]

See also China, Egypt, Rwanda, United States.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In November 2006, a criminal complaint was filed against United States (US) former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and other high-ranking US officials for alleged crimes under international law committed in Iraq and at Guantánamo Bay. The complaint was based on the Code of Crimes against International Law. This law allows German courts to exercise universal jurisdiction in cases of alleged crimes against humanity, war crimes or genocide, irrespective of where they were committed or the nationality of the accused and the victims.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 123.]

See also Egypt, Poland, United Kingdom.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In October 2006, the government began paying reparations to some 2,000 Ghanaians who had suffered human rights abuses under former governments. The reparation payments were recommended by the National Reconciliation Commission, which addressed human rights violations committed under various governments since independence (1957–93).

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 124.]

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In April 2006, a controversy started over the new history textbook Modern and Contemporary Times (2006) and its accompanying educational material used in the sixth class of the primary school

(twelve-year olds). The book, written by Maria Repoussi (1954–), working at the Aristotelian University of Thessaloniki School of Education, Chara Andreadou, Aris Poutachidis and Armodios Tsivas, was published by the Official organization for the publication of textbooks OESB. It came under attack from the Archbishop of the Orthodox Church and from nationalists across the political scene from the extreme right to the extreme left. As the book was also available in Greek Cypriot schools, Greek Cypriot groups carrying the slogan “I do not forget” demanded an official protest. After a debate in the Cypriot parliament, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and later the Minister of Education urged the Greek government to have the textbook authors revise the account of the “Cypriot Question”. Meanwhile in Greece, the opposition against the textbook converted into a group (with a website, a petition, parliamentary questions, and demonstrations) and demanded the Greek Minister of Education and Religious Affairs, Marieta Giannakou, to withdraw it. The minister ruled out withdrawing it, invited the Academy of Athens to investigate the book, and declared that the textbook authors would be able to expand it during a forthcoming review. The academy made recommendations for a revised version. Meanwhile, the first edition of 175.000 copies was out of print and a second edition was in preparation. According to Repoussi, the accusations against the textbook included downplaying the role of the Orthodox Church in the awakening of national consciousness and the struggle for national independence; painting a rosy picture of the coexistence of Greek-speaking and Turkish-speaking populations during the almost 400 years of Ottoman domination of Greece (1456–1821); overrating the role of women; underrating the role of national heroes (such as the fighters of the 1821 independence); overemphasizing the dark side of history such as civil wars and internecine conflicts; serving foreign interests; and seeking to impose de-Hellenization. In addition, the Communist Party denounced the book as a tool of globalization. complained that the history of the working class was not adequately covered in it, and asked for its withdrawal. On a press conference on 5 March 2007, several history and social science journals defended the textbook. On 24 March 2007, about thirty Greek neo-Nazis, members of the Chryssi Avgghi (Golden Dawn) group, burned copies of the textbook and threw it onto the road at the end of a traditional parade for the anniversary of independence day (25 March 1821) in Athens. Riot police dispersed militants who yelled anti-Turkish slogans and who distributed anti-Turkish pamphlets. The controversy continued.

[Sources: “Greek Neo-Nazis Burn Controversial History Textbook” (Middle East Times, 24 March 2007); International Herald Tribune/Kathimerini, 5 April 2007: 1; Repoussi, M., “Debates on Greek History Textbooks” (Paper presented to the International Conference of the International Society for History Didactics, Tallinn, September 2006), 3–5; Idem, personal communication, December 2006 & July 2007); “Where History Isn’t Bunk”, The Economist, 15 March 2007.]

In June 2006, preparations for a conference on the Greek Civil War (1946–49) in Kastoria, scheduled for July 2006, were interrupted when local authorities withdrew their financial support and the venue was canceled. Shortly before, Nina Gatzoulis, vice-president of the Panmacedonian Association of the United States, had given a lecture in Thessaloniki in which she had attacked various scholars—including Riki Van Boeschoten, a Dutch social anthropologist working at the University of Thessaly, Vólos, who co-organized the conference—involved in research on ethnic minorities. The lecture was reprinted in the Kastoria press. A new venue was found.

[Source: Boeschoten, R. van, personal communication, June 2006.]

See also Macedonia, Netherlands.

GRENADA

In June 2006, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) presented its report about the ‘Grenada 17’ in Parliament. In 1986, the “Grenada 17” were convicted following unfair trials of the murder of Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and others in 1983. The TRC also called for efforts to be made to find the bodies of those who died during the coup and United States invasion and to pay compensation to their families. The government had failed to take any steps to implement the TRC’s recommendations by the end of 2006. In December 2006, the United Kingdom Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Grenada’s highest court of appeal, heard a constitutional motion presented by the 13 members of the “Grenada 17” who remained in prison challenging the constitutionality and fairness of their detention. A decision was expected in early 2007. In December 2006, three of the “Grenada 17” were released for good behavior after completing twenty years in prison. Another was released in 2000 for health reasons.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 126.]

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Of the 626 massacres documented by the Truth Commission sponsored by the United Nations (UN) in 1999, only two cases had been successfully prosecuted in the Guatemalan courts. During the last decade, there had been an alarming number of attacks and threats against Guatemalans seeking justice for past abuses. Targets included human rights advocates, justice officials, forensic experts, and plaintiffs and witnesses involved in human rights cases, and furthermore journalists, labor activists, and others who denounced the abuses. Guatemalan human rights organizations reported that 161 such acts of violence or intimidation took place between January and August 2006. Members of the Fundación de Antropología Forense de Guatemala (FAFG; Guatemalan Foundation for Forensic Anthropology) continued to receive death threats in 2006 and 2007, in connection with their work exhuming bodies buried in clandestine cemeteries throughout Guatemala. There was widespread consensus among local and international observers that those responsible for the threats were affiliated with private, secretive, and illegally armed networks (commonly referred to in Guatemala as “clandestine groups”) with links to both government officials and organized crime. (See also NCH #31[v].)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 206–8.]

In June 2006, a Spanish judge and prosecutor, investigating a case of alleged genocide, visited Guatemala to interview witnesses and suspects. They were prevented from pursuing the case, but in July the judge issued international arrest warrants for the five accused, including former President General Efraín Ríos Montt. However, Ríos Montt remained free after the Guatemalan authorities considered only part of the case presented by the Spanish National Court.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 25, 127.]

In October 2006, a Mexican court authorized the extradition of former President Alfonso Portillo, who left the presidency in January 2004, to face charges of corruption. An appeal was lodged. In December 2006, the government signed an agreement with the UN to establish the International Commission Against Impunity in Guatemala. The Commission would support the Public Prosecutor's Office in prosecuting the activities of illegal security forces and clandestine security organizations. The agreement had not been submitted to Congress for ratification by the end of 2006.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 126.]

On 19 March 2007, the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous people, Rodolfo Stavenhagen, reported that in December 2005 the Department of Prehispanic and Colonial Monuments of the Ministry of Culture and Sports had given permission to a construction firm to build houses on the archeological site of Tulan Tzu, which was considered by the Maya as a sacred place. The project would destroy all the relics and graves of the site.

[Source: Stavenhagen, R., Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of Indigenous People: Addendum—Summary of Cases Transmitted to Governments and Replies Received (A/HRC/4/32/Add.1; New York 2007) 42.]

GUINEA

On 4 October 2006, Ibrahima Sory Dieng, managing director of the state-owned newspaper Horoya, and chief editor Alhassane Souare, were suspended indefinitely for not publishing a photograph of President Lansana Conté alongside his speech commemorating the 48th anniversary of independence in 1958.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.1) 116.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999).

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #6 (1997).

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

In September 2006, police and protesters clashed after it came out that Prime Minister Ferenc Gyurcsány had admitted in May that he had lied during the election campaign. There was further violence on 23 October 2006 at the commemoration of the start of the 1956 uprising.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 132.]

In the night of 1 to 2 May 2007, vandals desecrated the grave of János Kádár, the last Communist ruler (1956–89), and took his skull and several bones. Graffiti reading “a murderer and traitor may not rest in holy ground” was found nearby.

[Source: BBC News Online (London), 3 May 2007.]

See also United States.

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In February 2005, the Commission headed by Justice G.T. Nanavati to probe the 1984 anti-Sikh riots submitted its report to the government. The riots in Delhi had followed the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by two of her Sikh bodyguards and led to a massacre of nearly 3,000 Sikhs. Although two senior Congress leaders blamed for their part in organizing the riots resigned their posts in the government, those responsible for planning and instigating the riots were yet to be prosecuted.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 134; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 274.]

In Punjab, a majority of police officers responsible for serious human rights violations during civil unrest between 1984 and 1994 continued to evade justice. In response to 2,097 reported cases of human rights violations during this period, the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) ordered Punjab state to provide compensation in 1,051 cases concerning people who died in police custody and appointed a commissioner to decide on compensation for 814 additional cases. Findings of the Central Bureau of Investigation on these deaths in custody were not made public and the NHRC did not actively pursue the outstanding cases of impunity.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 134.]

In 2006, a new report indicated that some 10,000 people in Jammu and Kashmir had been victims of enforced disappearance since 1989. The Association of the Parents of Disappeared People reported that the authorities failed to provide information to the families of the victims about their whereabouts.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 134.]

In 2006, there was still no accountability for the deaths of at least 1,100 Muslims in the western state of Gujarat during communal violence that erupted after a train carrying Hindu pilgrims in 2002 caught fire, killing 59 passengers. The Gujarat High Court did not follow up a Union government order to appoint another commission to investigate the cause of the train fire. In October 2006, the National Commission of Minorities declared that 5,703 riot-affected Muslim families were yet to be properly compensated and rehabilitated. There continued to be few successful prosecutions relating to the violence. However, 1,594 cases closed by the state police were reopened on the orders of the Supreme Court and 41 police officials were prosecuted for their alleged role. New evidence on the riots emerged, in the form of details of mobile phone calls made between those leading the attacks and politicians belonging to the then ruling Bharatiya Janata Party, a Hindu nationalist party ruling between 1998 and 2004.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 134–35; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 274.]

Twenty-two years after the Union Carbide Corporation (UCC) pesticide plant in Bhopal leaked toxic gases that devastated countless lives and the environment, survivors continued to struggle for adequate compensation, medical aid and rehabilitation. After a sustained campaign, including a survivors' march from Bhopal to Delhi in April 2006, the government agreed to clean up toxic waste, provide safe drinking water and set up a commission for rehabilitation of the victims. However, there was little progress by the end of 2006. UCC and Dow Chemicals (which took over UCC in 2001) continued to reiterate that they had no responsibility for the gas leak or its consequences.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 135.]

In January 2007, cinemas in Gujarat refused to screen Parzania, a film co-written and directed by Rahul Dholakia ([1967]–) about the communal violence in 2002. Although the censor board approved the film in August 2005 and it was shown in several Indian cities, Gujarat cinema theater owners feared that it could inflame tensions among Hindus and Muslims by resurrecting recent history.

[Sources: IOC (2007 no.2) 194; Sengupta, S., “In India, Showing Sectarian Pain To Eyes That Are Closed”, New York Times, 20 February 2007.]

See also Thailand.

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Indonesia made little progress in addressing the human rights crimes of the Soeharto era (1965/67–98). No charges were brought against the former president for human rights violations committed under his regime, or for the violence instigated by pro-Soeharto forces in a failed attempt to stave off his fall from power in 1998.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 277.]

Trials of senior Indonesian officers at an ad hoc human rights court in Jakarta failed to give a credible judicial accounting for atrocities committed in East Timor (now Timor-Leste) in 1999. In July 2006, the United Nations Secretary-General, while reporting on justice and reconciliation for Timor Leste, called the ad hoc court “manifestly deficient”. In 2006, the Commission of Truth and Friendship established jointly by Indonesia and Timor-Leste to document crimes committed in Timor-Leste in 1999 and to promote reconciliation began its work. Its mandated ability to recommend amnesty for perpetrators of gross human rights violations had been widely criticized. In December 2006, the Constitutional Court annulled Law 27/2004 which mandated an Indonesian Commission of Truth and Reconciliation. The annulment of the law left victims of past human rights violations without a compensation mechanism.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 136, 257.]

On 11 July 2006, Indonesia's National Parliament passed the Aceh Governance Bill, which implemented the peace agreement of August 2005 between the government and rebels of the Free Aceh Movement (Gerakan Aceh Merdeka, or GAM). Although the law established a human rights court for the province, the court could not address any of the past human rights crimes that accompanied three decades of armed conflict in the province (1976–2005). The law also established a truth and reconciliation commission to examine events of the past. In September 2006, local organizations submitted information to Komnas HAM (the National Human Rights Commission) about mass graves excavated in Aceh since the signing of the 2005 peace agreement. The organizations urged Komnas HAM to conduct thorough investigations and to prevent further excavations from taking place without the presence of the necessary medical and legal experts.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 137; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 278.]

On 5 March 2007, the Attorney General's Office banned thirteen history textbooks (published by ten different publishers) that were based on the 2004 junior and senior high school curricula because they allegedly played down the role of the Communist Party of Indonesia (PKI) in the 1948 uprising in Madiun, East Java, and in the September 1965 coup attempt and murdering of six army generals in Jakarta. In some of the textbooks, the official acronym of the 1965 coup attempt was shortened from "G30S/PKI" to "G30S" (the September 30th movement). Attorney General Abdul Rahman Saleh declared that since a military court had proven that the PKI was involved in the 1965 events, the omission of these facts in the textbooks was unacceptable and could create public disorder. One banned history textbook for the final year of high school gave five possible explanations for the 1965 events. Others did not treat contemporary history (including a textbook for seventh graders by Tugiyono about pre-modern history of kingdoms in the archipelago). Still others did indicate the 1965 events as "G30S/PKI", thus coinciding with the official view. A group of 127 historians signed a petition to protest the ban. The Indonesian Legal Aid and Human Rights Association planned to take legal action against the ban.

[Sources: "The Attorney General Office's banning of some history books" (Indonesia Matters, 2007); Febrina, A., "Academics, Activists Join Forces to Defy Ban: The Fight Surrounds Textbooks that Do Not Mention a 1965 Coup d'Etat," Jakarta Post, 20 March 2007.]

Authorities on the island of Bali banned screenings of The Long Road to Heaven for fear of creating tension. The film, about the 2002 nightclub bombings in which 202 people were killed, examined the motivation of the Indonesian and Malaysian Islamic militants for carrying out the attacks. It had been shown in cinemas everywhere else in Indonesia.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.2) 194.]

See also Australia, Malaysia, Netherlands, Timor-Leste.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Central African Republic, Congo (Democratic Republic), Ivory Coast, Rwanda, Sudan, Uganda.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In December 2006, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called for a debate to promote the denial of the Holocaust. A conference denying the Holocaust was staged, apparently as in retaliation for the Danish cartoons.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 5; IOC (2007 no.2) 85.]

In 2007, editor and investigative journalist Roozbeh Mir Ebrahimi ([1980–]) received a Human Rights Watch Hellman-Hammett grant. In September 2004, he had been detained and held in solitary confinement for two months. He wrote two books on contemporary Iranian political history for which he did not receive government permission for publication.

[Source: HRW, 45 Writers from 22 Countries Receive Hellman/Hammett Grants (2007).]

On 3 February 2007, the Press Monitoring Commission closed the conservative daily newspaper Siassat Rouz for publishing an article deemed offensive to Sunni Muslims on 1 February. The article reportedly criticized the second Caliph Omar Ibn al-Khattab (634–44 CE). The newspaper said that a typographical error had occurred. It apologized the next day.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.2) 195.]

On 4 February 2007, historian Hashem Aghajari (1957–) was prevented from attending a conference on political reform in Iran at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston, United States. Officials from the Information Ministry confiscated his passport and told him that the Revolutionary Court had imposed a travel ban on him. (See also NCH #28.)

[Sources: Ifex, Communiqué (13 February 2007); IOC (2007 no.2) 195.]

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Among the more than 250 professors who were killed in Iraq since 30 April 2003 were the following historians: Khalid M. al-Janabi, PhD. in Islamic history, faculty member at the College of Art, Babylon University (date of assassination unknown); Essam Sharif Mohammed (?–2003) (also spelled Hissam Sharif), Ph.D in History, assistant professor at the College of Art, Baghdad University, assassinated on 25 October 2003; Mahfoudh al-Qazzaz (?–2004), PhD. in Islamic history, faculty member at the College of Art, Mosul University, killed by a death squad in front of his family at his home in Mosul on 20 December 2004; Jamhour Karim Kammas Al Zargani (?–2005), PhD. in history, head of department at the College of Education at Al-Basrah University, abducted for two days, tortured, and killed; his family found the dead body with broken arms and legs in a nearby street in Basra on 19 August 2005; Kemal Nassir (?–2006), professor of history, lecturer in Mustansiriya and Kufa, assassinated on 1 October 2006. In addition, on 22 May 2005, Abd-Asalam Ali Hussein, PhD. in Islamic History, was arrested. (See also NCH #47.)

[Source: Russell Tribunal, List of killed, threatened or kidnapped Iraqi Academics (2006).]

On 22 February 2006, a bomb attack by extremists demolished the dome of the al-Askariya shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad, one of the four key Shi'ite holy sites that contains the tombs of the tenth and eleventh of twelve revered Shia imams (reputed to be direct descendants of the Prophet Muhammad), Ali al-Hadi (–868 CE) and al-Hassan al-Askari (–874 CE). It sparked retaliatory sectarian violence across Iraq, in which thousands died and dozens of Sunni mosques were attacked. On 13 June 2007, the shrine's two minarets were also destroyed.

[Source: Keesing's Record of World Events, February 2006; BBC News Online, 13 June 2007.]

In March 2006, Kurds in northern Iraq destroyed the Halabja Monument, which commemorated some 5,000 Kurds killed in a 1988 chemical warfare attack, because they felt that the Patriotic Union, which governed the eastern section of Iraq's Kurdish region, had used the monument to gather money for its own purposes.

[Source: Barsalou, J., & V. Baxter, "The Urge To Remember: The Role of Memorials in Social Reconstruction and Transitional Justice,” United States Institute of Peace Stabilization and Reconstruction Series, no. 5 (January 2007) 9.]

In July 2006, the first trial before the Supreme Iraqi Criminal Tribunal (SICT), which began in October 2005, came to an end. Eight defendants, including former president Saddam Hussein, were tried on charges of crimes against humanity in connection with the arbitrary detention and forced displacement of 800 persons from the town of al-Dujail in 1982, 148 of whom were executed or died in detention. On 5 November 2006, Saddam Hussein and six other defendants were convicted; Saddam Hussein and two others were sentenced to death by hanging. On 30 December 2006, Saddam Hussein was executed. There was a widespread sense within the region and beyond that the trial represented no more than “victor’s justice” and an act of vengeance. In August 2006, a second trial opened, with Saddam Hussein and six other defendants facing charges in connection with the 1988 Anfal campaign against the Kurdish population in northern Iraq, involving the systematic and deliberate murder of at least 50,000 and possibly as many as 100,000 Kurds. In September 2006, the presiding judge was forced to step down following accusations of bias by the Iraqi government. After his replacement, the trial continued but had not been concluded by the end of 2006. After the execution of Saddam Hussein, the trial against the other defendants was expected to continue.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 37–38, 42, 142, 144; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 472, 474.]

In August 2006, Donny George, director-general of the Iraqi museums and president of the State Board of Antiquities and Heritage, went into hiding in Damascus, Syria, and later into exile in the United States, where he became a professor at New York State University. He had received death threats because he cooperated with the American forces. As a Christian, he was also forced into early retirement as his post had been assigned to a Shia Muslim. George said that this interference of supporters of the radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in the Ministry for Antiquities and the State Board had made his position intolerable. He accused them of only being interested in Islamic sites and not in Iraq’s earlier heritage. Excavation and conservation projects had stalled and all foreign archeologists had left Iraq.

[Source: Guardian, 26 August 2006.]

See also Denmark, Germany, United States.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

See United Kingdom.

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See also South Africa, United Kingdom, United States.

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Throughout 2006 neither the government nor the rebel leadership took significant steps to discipline, investigate, or hold accountable those responsible for past atrocities during the 2002–2003 civil war. Despite repeated threats to impose sanctions, the United Nations (UN) Security Council only imposed travel and economic sanctions against three mid-level individuals from the Young Patriots and New Forces. The Security Council has yet to make public or discuss the findings of the 2004 Commission of Inquiry report into human rights abuses since September 2002. The report contained a secret annex listing people accused of human rights abuses who could eventually face trial. Although in September 2003 the Ivorian government had lodged a declaration with the International Criminal Court (ICC) accepting ICC's jurisdiction over serious crimes committed since September 2002, the ICC prosecutor had not yet determined whether to open an investigation.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 107.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, survivors of Japan's system of sexual slavery before and during World War II continued to be denied full reparations. Japanese courts have repeatedly rejected lawsuits seeking compensation, and the government continued to argue that compensation claims were settled by post-war treaty arrangements. On 1 March 2007, Prime Minister Abe Shinzo denied the role of the military in the system, thus contradicting the official Kono declaration of 1993. Abe declared that there was no evidence of coercion. The United States Congress considered passing a resolution demanding that the 1993 declaration be observed.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 153; IOC (2007 no.2) 195, 198.]

On 29 January 2007, Tokyo's High Court confirmed that the public television network NHK had effectively bowed to political pressure and censored a 40-minute documentary about "comfort women" from 2001 (see NCH #38). It could not prove, however, that NHK had been under specific instructions. It ordered NHK and two television production firms to pay 2 million yen (approximately 16,400 US dollar) for breach-of-contract damages to Violence Against Women in War Network - Japan.

[Source: International Federation of Journalists, Ifex Alert (15 February 2007).]

See also Korea, North.

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

On 31 July 2006, Zhasaral Kuanyshalin was sentenced in Almaty for insulting President Nursultan Nazarbayev in an October 2005 statement and in a report filed to the Office of the General Prosecutor seeking treason charges against the president. In the report, he had claimed that Nazarbayev had betrayed Kazakhstan by saying that “Kazakhs were historically a borderless nation, lacking statehood” in his annual address to the nation. Kuanyshalin was sentenced to two years’ imprisonment but was released on amnesty.

[Source: World Press Freedom Committee, It’s a Crime: How Insult Laws Stifle Press Freedom: A 2006 Status Report (Reston, VA 2006) 86.]

In 2007, three private citizens, Almaz Dzhambulov, Zhenis Zhambylov and Katshibek Abdykalykova, sued the opposition newspaper Svoboda slova and one of its journalists, Yerbol Kurmabayev for defamation and sought huge damages. Calling themselves descendants of national poet and folk singer Dzhambul Dzhabayev (1846–1945) and national hero Karasai Batyr, they claimed that Kurmabayev had distorted Kazak history and defamed both historical figures in an article of 25 January 2007 in which the latter had reported that the historical role of both was exaggerated and mythologised.

[Source: Adil Soz, Ifex Alert (15 June 2007).]

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In October 2006, a group of former Mau Mau insurgents launched a suit against the government of the United Kingdom, seeking compensation for human rights abuses including rape, beatings and other torture committed during the so-called Mau Mau rebellion (an uprising in 1952–56 of members of the Gikuyu, Kenya’s largest ethnic group, against British colonial rule in order to obtain land and freedom). According to the Kenya Human Rights Commission, tens of thousands of people were tortured by the British authorities at the time.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 158.]

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

According to the Korea Institute for National Unification (based in South Korea), a total of 3,790 South Koreans were kidnapped and taken to North Korea between 1953 and 1995, 485 of whom remained in detention. Some of the abductees were used in propaganda broadcasts to South Korea, while others were used to train North Korean spies. In spite of its admissions regarding 13 Japanese abductees (five of whom were allowed to return home in 2002, while the others were said to have died), North Korea rejected repeated requests from families of the South Korean abductees to confirm their existence, to return them, or, in the case of the deceased, to return their remains.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 298.]

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See also Korea, North.

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In September 2006, the United Nations (UN) International Independent Investigation Commission submitted its fifth interim report on its investigation into the killing of former Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri and 22 others in February 2005. On 13 November 2006, the Cabinet approved a UN draft for an international tribunal to try those suspected of involvement in the killings, but it was unclear whether the absence of the six ministers who resigned invalidated the vote. The decision also required ratification by Parliament and the President. Syria denied high-level Syrian involvement in the assassination.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 167, 168; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 250, 489.]

Despite campaigning by families and nongovernmental organizations, the fate of approximately 17,000 Lebanese and other nationals who became victims of enforced disappearance in the civil war (1975–90) remained unknown.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 10–11, 168; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 489.]

See also Syria.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In February 2006, seven commissioners were inaugurated to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). The TRC was mandated to investigate gross human rights violations and economic crimes that occurred in 1979–2003, could recommend amnesty in less serious cases and prosecution for the most serious cases. After a three-month preparatory period, the TRC started work in June 2006 and in September its work plan was made public. Nearly 200 people were recruited by the end of September to take witness statements, a process which began on 10 October. However, public hearings due to take place at the end of 2006 were delayed. Civil society demanded a mechanism to call to account perpetrators of war crimes and crimes against humanity in Liberia's wars. Points of debate were whether the trials of alleged perpetrators should take place before or after the TCR had completed its task, whether TCR officials would use their power to recommend individuals for prosecution, and whether the Liberian judicial system should and could handle the trials. Concerns were raised about the safety of witnesses, the role of civil society in the TRC process, and how the TRC should respond to public concerns. By the end of 2006, the TRC had received approximately US$2.2 million of the estimated US$14 million required.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 169, 170; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 133.]

On 17 March 2006, President Johnson-Sirleaf made an official request to the Nigerian government for former Liberian President Charles Taylor to be handed over to Liberia. On 25 March, the Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo officially agreed to the request. Taylor temporarily escaped from his place of refuge in Nigeria but was later arrested. He arrived in Liberia on 29 March, where he was arrested by the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL), mandated by United Nations Security Council Resolution 1622, and immediately transferred to the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) to face trial on charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during the civil war in Sierra Leone (1991–2002). Taylor supported the rebel Revolutionary United Front (RUF) during that war. Due to security concerns, Taylor's trial was relocated to The Hague in June 2006. His trial was expected to begin in 2007. In October 2006, Taylor's supporters appealed to the Supreme Court to stop the TRC from hearing testimony against him, arguing that it would prejudice his trial at the SCSL.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 12, 19, 169, 170, 199, 229, 321.]

In December 2006, reporter Rufus Paul of the Daily Observer was assaulted, allegedly on the orders of the director of the National Archives. The journalist was investigating alleged misappropriation of funds by the said director.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 171.]

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

28 June 2006 marked the tenth anniversary of the large-scale killings in Tripoli's Abu Salim prison, run by the Internal Security Agency. Security forces reportedly killed "around 1,200 people". The government failed to announce the exact number of people killed or the names of the dead.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 497–98.]

On 19 March 2007, the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous people, Rodolfo Stavenhagen, reported that on 30 January 2006 he had received information that the Libyan education system and schoolbooks did not take into account the Berber component in Libya's geography, history and culture.

[Source: Stavenhagen, R., Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of Indigenous People: Addendum—Summary of Cases Transmitted to Governments and Replies Received (A/HRC/4/32/Add.1; New York 2007) 63.]

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

A controversy erupted after Understanding Current History, a program of workshops to promote ethnic reconciliation, was started in 2002. This program, in which twenty-five Macedonian Slav and Albanian history teachers of primary and high schools participated, was directed by psychologist Violeta Petroska-Beska and legal expert Mirjana Najcevska of the Center for Human Rights and Conflict Resolution, Sts. Cyril and Methodius University, Skopje. The project's history lecture included three versions of the armed conflict of 2001, in which ethnic Albanian guerrillas confronted the Macedonian police and army: the opposing Macedonian and Albanian nationalist versions of events and a third version aiming to provide a synthesis. Several leading professional historians, including Blaze Ristevski, head of the Macedonian Academy of Science and Arts History Department, Todor Cepreganov, director of the National History Institute, and Ljupco Jordanovski, speaker of the Macedonian parliament, were skeptical about the attempt which they considered premature.

[Sources: Blazeovski, I., "Macedonia: Reworked History Lessons Cause Storm", Balkan Insight (9 February 2006); Petroska-Beska, V., & M. Najcevska, "Macedonia: Understanding History, Preventing Future Conflict", United Nations Institute of Peace Special Report 115 (February 2004).]

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

In December 2006, March 8, a Tamil-language book by K. Arumugam that chronicled the 15 days of racial clashes that killed six people and injured more than forty in Kampung Medan (a slum area near the capital Kuala Lumpur) in 2001, was banned. The majority of the casualties were Indian. The Centre for Independent Journalism said that the government engaged in whitewashing history by prohibiting the publication of research on the Kampung Medan incident. Other publications banned by the Internal Security Ministry in December 2006 included Sepintas Sejarah Islam (Islam: A Short History) by Ira Puspito Rini and the Indonesian translation of Charles Darwin's Origin of Species.

[Source: Southeast Asian Press Alliance, Ifex Alert (1 March 2007).]

On 12 February 2007, the Malaysian Film Censorship Unit banned Apa Khabar Orang Kampung (Village People Radio Show), an independent documentary by film director Amir Muhammad about the lives of former Malay Muslim members of the now defunct Communist Party of Malaya. After World War II, the communists wanted to liberate the Malay peninsula from British rule. The censors objected to the film's alleged theme of "a noble communist struggle" and to its apparent portrayal of the Malaysian government as being unfair for not appreciating the communists' struggle and for not offering them a decent rehabilitation arrangement as was done in Thailand. The film was also accused of distorting history in equating the communist struggle with that of the Malay warriors who fought British rule in the nineteenth century. The film was the sequel to Lelaki Komunis Terakhir (The Last Communist), which was banned in 2006. In an appeal against the ban, Amir Muhammad argued for a "limited viewing" rating for his film, since it had been ruled "inappropriate for general viewing".

[Source: Southeast Asian Press Alliance, Ifex Alert (26 February & 1 March 2007).]

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In April 2004, Jaime Lagunez Otero, a biologist working at the National Autonomous University of Mexico's (UNAM) Chemistry Institute, was dismissed after twelve years. He was denied access to his personal possessions, archives, and computational infrastructure. Lagunez sued UNAM but in October 2006 his case was still pending. He and others suspect that he was dismissed in retaliation for his role in human rights activism outside of UNAM. Lagunez has been a long-time supporter of efforts to protect Mexican cultural heritage. He openly criticized the official support for the construction of warehouses on important cultural sites. The construction reportedly endangered UNESCO World Heritage sites, such as the 1,200 year-old ruins of Teotihuacan. Besides being involved in local protests, Lagunez's environmental and cultural group had internationalized opposition by joining a coalition of other non-governmental organizations to petition the U.S.-based TIAA-CREF pension fund to withdraw its investments from companies that disregarded cultural heritage sites, abuse human rights or promote unsafe products. Lagunez was unable to find other work in his field in Mexico. He believed that authorities blocked university positions he could otherwise obtain.

[Source: American Association for the Advancement of Science Human Rights Action Network, Case me0706_ote (13 October 2006).]

In February 2006, a draft report compiled by the historical truth unit of the FEMOSPP (The Special Federal Prosecutor's Office, established in 2001 to secure justice for grave human rights violations committed during Mexico's "dirty war" [1960s–1980s]), was leaked to an Internet website. It identified more than 700 cases of enforced disappearance, more than 100 extrajudicial executions and more than 2,000 cases of torture committed by the armed forces and security agencies. In the final days of the administration of President Vicente Fox, a weakened version of the report was officially circulated on the Internet, but the government failed to endorse it, publicize its findings or ensure that victims and their relatives would have access to truth, justice or reparations. The government stated that the work of the FEMOSPP was complete and ordered its closure in November 2006. In the same month, a federal court determined on appeal that the statute of limitations had not expired on the genocide charges faced by former President Luis Echeverría (ruled 1970–76), in connection with the 1968 Tlatelolco Square massacre (at the time, Echeverría had been Minister of Internal Affairs). A federal court ordered his rearrest.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 25, 183–84; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 215, 218.]

On 1 September 2006, Ricardo Delfín Quezada Domínguez, a historian and anthropologist at the Faculty of Anthropology of the Autonomous University of Yucatán, was arrested in Mérida on the charge that he had participated in a grenade attack on the newspaper Por Esto! with which he collaborated. On 3 September 2006, he was released because of lack of evidence. His arrest was possibly linked with his articles in which he had criticized the government's environmental policy, especially in petroleum-rich areas.

[Sources: Academia Solidaria de Historia a Debate (Santiago de Compostela 2006); Giordano, A., "Atacan al periódico 'Por Esto!'" (September 2006).]

See also Guatemala.

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002) under China.

From January 2006, the Police Enquiry Department undertook an investigation of G. Dashrentsen, political commentator for the national newspaper Udriin Sonin (Daily News) after Buddhist Lama Purevbat had brought defamation charges against him in November 2005. In October 2005, Dashrentsen had called Purevbat a “yaschin” (a bone dealer) in an article, “N. Enkhbayar’s Black Spot Moves Ahead in Mongolia”, published in the weekly Deedsiin Hureelen. Dashrentsen claimed that the criticism in the article was not aimed at Purevbat but at the Mongolian President Nambaryn Enkhbayar, who had given an award to Purevbat. In May 2003, at Hambiin Ovoo, near the capital Ulaanbaatar, the bones of more than 600 lamas were uncovered and, in a project initiated by Purevbat, a memorial stupa was to be built, destroying these bones. The bones were considered evidence of mass killings committed during the repression period of the 1930s.

[Source: World Press Freedom Committee, It’s a Crime: How Insult Laws Stifle Press Freedom: A 2006 Status Report (Reston, VA 2006) 95.]

MOROCCO/WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

On 30 November 2005, Morocco’s Equity and Reconciliation Commission (ERC), launched in 2004 by King Mohamed VI, issued its report on grave human rights violations committed in 1956–99, particularly cases of enforced disappearance and arbitrary detention. It provided an official acknowledgement of past repression and elucidated many individual cases. In January 2006, King Mohamed VI gave a speech to mark the publication of the ERC report. He expressed his sympathy for the victims of the violations, but stopped short of offering an apology. He instructed the national human rights institution, the Human Rights Advisory Board (HRAB), to follow up ERC work. In June 2006, Prime Minister Driss Jettou set up joint working committees comprising government officials and former ERC members to examine ERC recommendations, particularly on reparations and institutional and legal reforms. The HRAB began informing victims and their families of the results of research into 742 cases of enforced disappearance that it said it had been resolved. It continued ERC investigations into 66 unresolved cases. The HRAB said that a detailed list of the enforced disappearance cases examined by the ERC would be published in mid-2006, but this had not happened by the end of 2006. No progress was made on providing victims with effective access to justice and holding accountable individual perpetrators, issues not addressed by the ERC.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 39, 188; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 505–6.]

In May 2006, a mission of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights visited the refugee camps in Tindouf in south-western Algeria. Its leaked confidential report recommended closer monitoring of the human rights situation in the camps. Those responsible for human rights abuses in the camps in previous years continued to enjoy impunity. The Polisario Front took no steps to address this legacy.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 190.]

See also Netherlands.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

A cabinet committee appointed to deal with mass graves from the 1966–89 liberation war had not taken a decision on the matter by end of 2006. An opposition call to debate the imprisonment and torture of hundreds of members of SWAPO (South West African Peoples' Organisation) in SWAPO camps in Angola before independence was rejected by the ruling party in October 2006. SWAPO used its parliamentary majority to dismiss the Congress of Democrats' motion before it could be debated, claiming that such a discussion could undermine the policy of national reconciliation.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 193.]

NEPAL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999) under United States.

In May 2006, the SPA (Seven Party Alliance) government appointed a Commission of Inquiry chaired by a former Supreme Court judge to investigate human rights violations committed in the suppression of the People's Movement (the popular protests in April 2006 which led to a political transition). In November 2006, the Commission delivered its report to the SPA government but its findings were not made public. The Commission reportedly recommended action against more than 200 people, including King Gyanendra, senior ministers and security officials. The SPA government formed a committee to study the report. In early June 2006, the Home Ministry established a one-person Disappearances Committee without the capacity to investigate the hundreds of unresolved cases of enforced disappearance. The Peace Agreement signed on 21 November 2006 contained significant human rights commitments, including an end to impunity for human rights abuses. It provided for a Truth and Reconciliation Commission to investigate "serious violations of human rights and crimes against humanity" committed during the armed conflict (1996–2006) and a National Peace and Rehabilitation Commission to provide assistance to conflict victims. The Peace Agreement also included pledges to publicize the whereabouts of victims of enforced disappearances within sixty days and to create an environment conducive to the return of internally displaced people. Marginalized groups were under-represented in the peace process. Measures to address past violations and abuses were inadequate. Neither the security forces nor the CPN (Communist Party of Nepal–Maoist) took concrete steps to strengthen accountability within their ranks.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 195.]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In January or February 2003, after historian Pieter Drooglever (1941–), working at the Instituut voor Nederlandse Geschiedenis (ING; Institute for Netherlands History), The Hague, and at Radboud University, Nijmegen, had started research for his book Een daad van vrije keuze: De Papoea's van westelijk Nieuw-Guinea en de grenzen van het zelfbeschikkingsrecht (The Hague/Amsterdam 2005; An Act of Free Choice: The Papuas of Western New Guinea and the Limits of Self-Determination), commissioned in December 1999 by the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs at the request of the parliament, he was forbidden entry into Indonesia by the new government of President Megawati Sukarnoputri to interview witnesses and to do archival research. In his book, Drooglever described that, despite vague concessions from the Dutch regarding self-determination to the Papuas during the period 1963–69, the Netherlands and the United Nations did not protest when Indonesia in 1969 manipulated a referendum held among the Papua population in the former Dutch New Guinea (Western New Guinea; West Irian Jaya from 1973, Papua Barat from 2000) about self-determination (“the act of free choice”) for, and managed to transform the referendum results into unanimous support for Indonesian hegemony over, and incorporation of, the region. The book was seen as fomenting separatism and lending support to Papuan independence claims. When it was published in November 2005, the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs Ben Bot refused to receive the book publicly in order not to harm Dutch-Indonesian relations. In the summer of 2006, Drooglever was again refused entry in Indonesia.

[Sources: Drooglever, P.J., personal communication (August 2007); Drooglever, P.J., “Een paar bedenkingen”, Bijdragen en Mededelingen betreffende de Geschiedenis der Nederlanden, 2007: 91–104; Meijer, H., ““Geschiedenis is nu eenmaal altijd politiek”: De studie-Drooglever als symptoom van de moeizame omgang van Nederland met het koloniaal verleden en de complexe relatie met Indonesië”, Bijdragen en Mededelingen betreffende de Geschiedenis der Nederlanden, 2007: 72–90; NRC Handelsblad, 15 November 2005: 1, 7; 16 November 2005: 7; NWO Hypothese, December 2006, 15.]

In May 2006, there was a controversy about the extent to which the Nederlandsche Handel-Maatschappij (NHM; Dutch Trading Company, predecessor of the ABN-AMRO bank) had participated in the slave trade after the American organization History Associates Incorporated had published a commissioned history of the LaSalle Bank Corporation in Chicago in which ties of the NHM to the slave era were uncovered.

[Source: History Associates Incorporated, Predecessors of ABN AMRO Bank N.V. and Connections to African Slavery in the United States and the Americas (Rockville, MD, April 2006).]

In early June 2006, officials of the Chinese embassy visited the Wereldmuseum in Rotterdam and asked to change some texts for the exhibition Tibet and the Fourteen Dalai Lamas. “China occupied Tibet” had to be changed into “Tibet is a province of China” and “The Dalai Lama went into exile” into “The Dalai Lama left China voluntarily.” The museum refused to comply with the demand.

[Source: Telegraaf, 5 June 2006.]

Between October and December 2006, problems arose concerning four essays about Ottoman history written by Dutch turkologists, including Jan Schmidt and René Bakker from the University of Leiden, for the catalog of the exhibition Istanbul, The City and the Sultan, organized by the Nieuwe Kerk in Amsterdam. The complete essays were censored without consulting the authors after pressure from the Turkish Ministry of Culture and Tourism. The ministry objected to passages on, inter alia, the foundation of Byzantium (later Istanbul) by Greeks, the presence of Kurds in Istanbul, homosexuality in Ottoman bathhouses, and the ethnic cleansing of the Armenian minority in and after 1915. In 2004, there had been a similar affair. The catalog of the exhibition Morocco: 5000 Years of Culture in the Nieuwe Kerk had been adapted: the country map of Morocco was adapted so it incorporated the Western Sahara, which conformed to the official (and incorrect) representation.

[Sources: Volkskrant, 13 February 2007: 1; 15 February 2007: 12; 26 February 2007: 1, 10.]

On 1 November 2006, the Raad van State (Council of State; the highest administrative court, whose president is the Queen) decided that historian Lambert Giebels (1935–), former socialist Member of Parliament and biographer of President Sukarno, could not access the Royal House Archive for his biography about former Prime Minister Louis Beel entitled De Greet Hofmans-affaire: hoe de Nederlandse monarchie bijna ten onder ging (Amsterdam 2007; The Greet Hofmans affair: or how the Dutch monarchy nearly collapsed). It ruled that the archive had a private, not a public, character, that Queen Beatrix was allowed to decide herself whom she gave access, and that, therefore, Giebels’s 1993 request based on the Freedom of Information Act (Wet Openbaarheid Bestuur) to gain access to documents about the so-called Greet Hofmans affair in the archive was not appropriate. In 1948–56, the influence of mystic healer Hofmans on Queen Juliana almost led to a constitutional crisis and the latter’s divorce from Prince Bernhard. In 1956, Beel had presided an enquiry commission that produced a report about the affair that was kept in the Royal House Archive but sealed for one hundred years. Giebels wanted to consult the document. In August 2005, the Queen had granted privileged access to the archives, including the Beel report, to another historian, Cees Fasseur (1938–), official biographer of Queen Wilhelmina, for his book about the Hofmans affair scheduled to be published in 2009. In January 2005, the Parliament had adopted a motion that those records in the Royal House Archive which referred to the function of head of state or were otherwise of public interest should be transferred to the National Archives in The Hague. According to Giebels, the Beel report was such a record; he suggested that, as a princess, Queen Beatrix might have made controversial statements before the Beel commission at the time.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad, 13 December 2004: 1; 1 November 2006: 1; Raad van State (Council of State) (Afdeling Bestuursrechtspraak), “Uitspraak op het hoger beroep van dr. L.J. Giebels, wonend te Breda, zaaknummer 200602809/1” (1 November 2006).]

See also Greece, Turkey.

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2006, chief film censor Bill Hastings consulted families of the 13 victims of the 1990 Aramoana massacre to see whether a new documentary on the subject, Out of the Blue by Robert Sarkies, should be banned.

[Source: IOC (2006 no.4) 195.]

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Liberia.

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

See Syria, United States.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In August 2006, former President Alfredo Stroessner died in exile in Brazil. Requests for his extradition were unsuccessful and he was never brought to trial for the many human rights violations committed during his rule (1954–89), including in the context of Operation Condor, a joint plan by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to eliminate opponents.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 25, 207.]

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2003, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission had reported that left-wing insurgents and government forces had committed grave human rights abuses in 1980–2000. Peru made significant progress in prosecuting former members of insurgent groups for their past crimes. In 2003, after annulling the sentences of more than 700 prisoners convicted without due process for crimes under the antiterrorism law, the state conducted new trials that resulted in the conviction of more than 450 people for violent crimes. In October 2006, the National Criminal Court sentenced Abimael Guzmán, leader of the Shining Path, an armed group notorious for atrocities, to life imprisonment. Nine other Shining Path leaders received lesser prison sentences. Peru also made some progress in bringing to justice those responsible for abuses committed by state agents during the rule of Alberto Fujimori (1990–2000). More than 1,780 individuals implicated in abuses and corruption during this period were facing charges. Based on evidence collected by an ad hoc solicitor, numerous charges of corruption and human rights violations were brought against Fujimori himself, who was arrested in Chile in November 2005. In May 2006, a Chilean Supreme Court panel granted Fujimori pre-trial release on bail, but barred him from leaving Chile. The court was expected to make a final decision on the extradition request in 2007. Progress in the prosecution of former military and police personnel for human rights violations committed during the first decade of the conflict (1980–90) was more modest. Peru's new president, Alan García Pérez, who took office in July 2006, served an earlier term in 1985–90, at the height of Peru's political violence. During his first presidency, killings and "disappearances" were widespread and went almost completely unpunished. For the third time, the Special Attorney's Office on Forced Disappearance, Extrajudicial Execution and Exhumations of Mass Graves closed the investigation into the alleged responsibility of García, former members of his cabinet and top-ranking military officers in the killing of at least 118 inmates by navy officers during a riot in 1986 at the El Frontón prison in Lima. No legal aid was granted to victims of violations and their relatives, despite reports that nearly 70 per cent of victims had no access to legal representation. Congress passed the Regulation of the Comprehensive Reparation Plan to provide redress to victims of human rights violations during the 20-year armed conflict. In October 2006, the National Council of Reparations, responsible for creating an official registry of victims, was established. Human rights defenders, including victims of human rights violations and their relatives, witnesses, prosecutors and forensic experts, continued to be threatened and intimidated because of their activities. Threats were rarely investigated and none of the perpetrators were brought to justice (See also NCH #41).

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 25, 84, 208–9; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 222, 224–25.]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2006, protesters called for the closure of a German art exhibition, organized by Erika Steinbach, on the displacement of Poles after World War II.

[Source: IOC (2006 no.4) 196.]

In April 2007, historian Bronisław Geremek (1932–) refused to observe a new "lustration" law (a law obliging Poles in positions of responsibility in politics, the media or teaching to declare whether they had ever collaborated with the communist political police) from 15 March 2007 that required him to submit to the National Remembrance Institute (established in September 1998) a declaration that he had not cooperated with the former communist secret police. Geremek declared that he had already made such declarations in 1997 (as Minister of Foreign Affairs) and 2004 (as member of European Parliament), and that the new law was unconstitutional, inter alia because the National Remembrance Institute, not a judge, was entrusted with the screening. He was quoted as saying: "I believe that the law of lustration in its present form violates moral rules and threatens freedom of expression, media independence and the autonomy of universities. It spawns a kind of 'Ministry of Truth' and 'Memory Police'. It disarms the citizen confronted with campaigns of calumnies by weakening the legal protection of citizens' rights". He received a warning that his mandate could be revoked. On 11 May 2007, the Constitutional Court annulled the law.

[Sources: BBC News Online, 25 April 2007; Le Monde, 26 April 2007.]

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In an open letter published in the review 22 in Bucharest, historian Sorin Antohi (1957–), head of the history department at the Central European University in Budapest, Hungary (1998–2006) and of the Pasts, Inc. Institute for Historical Studies, admitted to having collaborated as an informer of the Securitate from 1976 until the 1980s. On 20 October 2006, the Romanian press further reported that official records and university officials denied that he had earned a Ph.D. from the University of Iași in 1995. Instead, his status as a doctoral student had been terminated in 2000. Several of the books he listed as publications could reportedly not be located. On the same day, Antohi admitted that he did not have the academic credentials that he had formerly claimed to have and he resigned from all his academic positions and most of his functions, including his membership of the Presidential Committee for the Analysis of the Communist Dictatorship in Romania and his membership of the International Committee of Historical Sciences.

[Sources include: “Sorin Antohi’s Case: The Documents” (<http://cyberculture.ro>; October 2006); “Interview with Antohi” (<http://interviewwithantohi.blogspot.com>; 28 March 2007).]

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See also Council of Europe.

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Trials of prominent genocide suspects continued before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), which held 56 detainees at the end of 2006. Ten trials were ongoing. Eighteen suspects indicted by the ICTR were still at large. The ICTR was mandated by the United Nations Security Council to complete all trials by the end of 2008. Since its inception, the ICTR has tried only members and supporters of the government in place in April 1994. However, it failed to indict or prosecute leaders of the former Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPF), the dominant political force in Rwanda, widely believed to have authorized, condoned, or carried out war crimes and crimes against humanity in 1994.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 19, 221.]

In April 2006, the Commission of Inquiry set up in April 2005 to investigate the alleged role of the French military in the genocide started work. Rwandan officials stated that, depending on the Commission findings, they might lodge a complaint against French military personnel before the International Criminal Court. In November 2006, a French judge investigating the shooting down of former President Habyarimana's plane in 1994 issued international arrest warrants for nine high-ranking Rwandan officials. He also requested that the ICTR issue an indictment for President Paul Kagame's arrest for his involvement. The investigation by a Spanish judge into the murder of Spanish nationals and other crimes committed between 1990 and 2002 in Rwanda was reportedly completed. The investigation focused on the direct involvement of 69 RPF members, some of whom were high-ranking figures in the military.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 221.]

In July 2006, gacaca jurisdictions (a community-based system of tribunals established in 2002 to try people suspected of crimes during the 1994 genocide), previously engaged in gathering information about the genocide, began trials nationwide. There were serious concerns about the impartiality and fairness of the gacaca system. Establishment of appeals courts lagged behind. Among the estimated 700,000 persons accused, more than 47,000 held local administrative posts and 45,000 were themselves gacaca judges. Officials aimed to have completed all trials by 2007, and some courts spend only a few hours hearing each case. Some 50,000 persons confessed their crimes in the hope of receiving reduced sentences. The system remained very controversial. Because gacaca courts did not hear accusations of crimes committed by soldiers of RPF, the system appeared to deliver one-sided justice.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 19, 220–21; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 142–43.]

In 2006, the authorities compiled a list of hundreds of persons suspected of “divisionism” and “genocidal ideology”. Banned by the constitution, “divisionism” was vaguely and broadly defined in a 2001 law. In September 2006, a priest was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment for minimizing the genocide. In a sermon he had suggested that it was wrong to call persons who participated in genocide “dogs”. During the trial, the prosecutor allegedly said that those convicted of genocide were not human and should properly be called “dogs”.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 143.]

See also United Nations.

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Chad.

SERBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Serbia's cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) came to a virtual standstill in 2006, after moderate progress during 2005. It led to the suspension of talks on a Stabilization and Association Agreement with the European Union (EU). The failure to locate, arrest, and extradite Ratko Mladic remained the most serious shortcoming. In March 2006, Slobodan Milosevic, former Serbian and Federal Republic of Yugoslavia president, on trial at the ICTY for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, died at ICTY's detention unit in the Netherlands. In June 2006, Carla del Ponte, ICTY Chief Prosecutor, reported to the United Nations (UN) Security Council that Serbia's co-operation with the Tribunal remained "difficult and frustrating", although access to archives and documents was improved. She expressed serious concerns at the lack of co-operation by the UN Interim Administration Mission In Kosovo (UNMIK). The ICTY further restricted the conditions under which former Kosovo Prime Minister Ramush Haradinaj could engage in domestic politics. Indicted for crimes against humanity and war crimes in February 2005, he had been provisionally released from the ICTY in June 2005. In May 2006, he was re-elected leader of the Alliance for the Future of Kosovo.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 226, 228; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 411–12.]

Progress was made in bringing Serbs suspected of war crimes to justice in domestic proceedings at the special War Crimes Chamber of the Belgrade District Court, although the Supreme Court continued to overturn war crimes verdicts and send cases back for retrial.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 226.]

On 27 February 2006, the International Court of Justice opened public hearings on genocide charges filed by Bosnia and Herzegovina against Serbia and Montenegro. [Complete text of judgment at http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/icjgeno.pdf.]

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 226.]

In March 2006, at the request of the Special Representative to the UN Secretary-General in Kosovo, an Interpol warrant requested by Serbia, for the arrest on suspicion of war crimes of Kosovo Prime Minister Agim Çeku, former Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) chief of staff and commander of the Kosova Protection Corps, was withdrawn.

Despite some progress in determining the fate of those who went missing during and after the armed conflict in Kosovo (1999), more than 2,200 cases remained, the majority ethnic Albanians. In February 2006, human rights groups called for a parliamentary inquiry into an alleged official cover-up of the transfer from Kosovo to Serbia of the bodies of ethnic Albanians killed in 1999. Some were hidden in mass graves, others allegedly burned. In June 2006, the last of the bodies of more than 700 ethnic Albanians exhumed from mass graves were returned to Kosovo. Police investigations were opened, according to reports in September, but no indictments were published by the end of 2006.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 226–27; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 418.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, China, Croatia.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, trials continued before the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), established in 2002 to bring justice for victims of atrocities committed during part of the civil war (1996–2001). Charges included murder, mutilation, rape and other forms of sexual violence, sexual slavery, conscription of child soldiers, abductions and forced labor. In December 2006, the United Nations Secretary-General appointed Stephen Rapp, a United States national and Chief of Prosecutions at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, as the new SCSL Prosecutor. Of 11 people indicted, 10 were in custody, but Johnny Paul Koroma, former Chairman of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), remained at large. Although individually charged, the trials were conducted in three groups. In the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) trial of three men including Issa Sesay, the prosecution closed on 2 August 2006 and the defence was due to start in 2007. In the Civil Defence Forces trial of three men including Moinina Fofana, closing arguments began in late November 2006. In the AFRC trial, the defence was concluded in December. For the case of Liberian President Charles Taylor, see

Liberia.

Implementation of the recommendations of the 2005 report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) was minimal. During 2006, a TRC task force developed a comprehensive action plan for the government to implement the TRC recommendations and identified a government agency, the National Commission for Social Action, to assist in the process.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 229–30; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 148.]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

In March 1992, pursuant to the 1991 Lustration Act, the Ministry of the Interior of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic searched the archives of the former State Security Agency (StB) for information about Ivan Turek (1944–), who occupied a high administrative position in the state school system, and issued a negative security clearance. According to the ministry, Turek had been registered as an StB collaborator in 1984–89 and, consequently, was disqualified from holding a post in public administration. Turek resigned and applied for another job. Although he alleged that his registration as a StB collaborator had been wrong and that a negative security clearance with all its effects was an interference with his integrity and reputation, the Slovakian courts dismissed his appeal. However, on 14 February 2006, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) held by 6 votes to 1 that Turek’s right to privacy was violated because he was not given full access to a crucial piece of evidence, namely a secret 1972 guideline used for the accusation, which defined the category of StB “agent” and established rules of cooperation with StB agents, including rules for their recruitment.

[Source: ECHR, Case of Turek versus Slovakia (Strasbourg 14 February 2006).]

SLOVENIA

The authorities failed to resolve the problems relating to the so-called “erased”, some 18,300 individuals unlawfully removed from the Slovenian registry of permanent residents in 1992. The “erased” were people from other former Yugoslav republics who had been living in Slovenia but had not acquired Slovenian citizenship after Slovenia became independent in 1991. The authorities failed to ensure that the “erased” had full access to economic and social rights, including the right to work and access to health care. Although the Slovenian Constitutional Court had ruled in 1999 and 2003 that the removal of these individuals from the registry of permanent residents was unlawful, approximately one third of the “erased” still did not have Slovenian citizenship or a permanent residence permit. Many were living in Slovenia “illegally” as foreigners or stateless persons; others were forced to leave Slovenia. Those who managed to obtain Slovenian citizenship or permanent residency—often after years—continued to suffer from the consequences of their past unregulated status and had no access to full reparation, including compensation. In June 2006, 11 “erased” people filed an application with the European Court of Human Rights claiming that the “erasure” resulted in violations of their rights, including the right to private and family life, the right to be free from inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the right to freedom of movement, and the right to be free from discrimination.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 233.]

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

There was concern about the legality of prosecution guidelines approved by the Cabinet in 2005 and presented to Parliament in January 2006. The guidelines would give the National Directorate of Public Prosecutions (NDPP) the administrative discretion to allow immunity from prosecution for crimes “emanating from the conflicts of the past” for people who failed to apply for or were refused amnesty by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC)’s Amnesty Committee. While the applicant would have to disclose all the circumstances of the alleged offence, and the NDPP would have to obtain the views of any victims before arriving at a decision, there was no obligation to take into account the victims' views or no provision for judicial assessment of the truthfulness of the evidence. The guidelines did not explicitly exclude from consideration for immunity crimes such as torture, crimes against humanity and war crimes. As of 30 September 2006, the government had paid reparations of R30,000 (approximately US$4,200) to 15,520 individuals identified by the TRC as eligible because of human rights abuses before May 1994.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 238.]

After publishing an op-ed commentary criticizing Intelligence Minister Ronnie Kasril's opinions on Israel, the weekly Jewish Report refused to print his response in which he compared Israel's treatment of the Palestinians with the Nazis' anti-Jewish policies prior to "the Final Solution". The weekly said that this might constitute hate speech, but this view was criticized by the South African Freedom of Expression Institute.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.1) 127.]

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In the autumn of 2006, traditional festivals celebrating the expulsion of the Moors from Spain in 1492 were toned down because of increased sensitivity over relations with the Muslim community.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.1) 127.]

On 15 February 2007, the family of the late Manuel Gutiérrez Torres, local leader of the Falange (the Spanish Fascists) during the civil war (1936–39) and mayor of Cerdedo (Pontevedra), Galicia, in the 1940s and 1950s, sued historian Dionisio Pereira González, a specialist in the history of the Galician workers' movement, for defamation because in his book A Ila República e a Represión franquista no Concello de Cerdedo (The Second Republic and the Francoist Repression in Cerdedo; 2006; Verbo Xido publishers), he had concluded from numerous oral sources that Gutiérrez Torres, his brothers and other falangistas probably participated in the harsh repression at the time.

[Source: Academia Solidaria de Historia a Debate (Santiago de Compostela 2007).]

See also Council of Europe, Guatemala, Rwanda.

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In February and June 2006, the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court visited Khartoum. He did not visit Darfur, however, or issue any indictments in 2006. He presented six-monthly reports to the United Nations Security Council. In December 2006, he said his Office was seeking to finalize submissions to the judges to be made in February 2007.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 243.]

On 1 February 2007, the Arabic-language newspaper Al-Sudani was closed because it had reported on the case of the assassinated journalist Mohamed Taha Mohamed Ahmed ([1956]–2006) (See NCH #45.) The staff lodged an appeal against the decision.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.2) 202.]

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

On 6 and 11 March 1997, the Télévision Suisse Romande (TSR; French-speaking Swiss television) showed L'Honneur perdue de la Suisse (Switzerland's Lost Honor), a documentary by journalist Daniel Monnat (1951–), as part of his series Temps présent. The documentary treated the importance of wartime economic collaboration between Nazi Germany and Switzerland. The program critically examined some historical “myths” and concluded that the Swiss political and economic elites had accommodated themselves “a bit too well” to the circumstances. On 24 October 1997, after complaints against the documentary, the Autorité indépendante d'examen des plaintes en matière de radio-télévision (AIEP; Independent Authority to Examine Complaints concerning Radio and Television) ruled that the program was biased and had violated the Federal Law on Radio and Television. It invited the Société suisse de radiodiffusion et télévision (SSR) to take measures to remedy the violation. The film, in which nine historians participated, was called a piece of “committed journalism” that illustrated theses and opinions, not facts, without this being acknowledged. According to the AIEP, Monnat had lacked journalistic diligence. The SSR retorted that it had not been consulted by the AIEP and that it had had no access to two expert reports about the documentary written for the AIEP by historians Jean-Claude Favez and Georg Kreis. A court order enabled the SSR to organize a hearing with the two historians in June 1999. In August 1999, however, the AIEP confirmed its earlier decision. Public sale of the documentary tape was banned. In January 2000, the SSR, Monnat and a historian involved in the program initiated proceedings against the AIEP which would eventually be submitted to the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR). On 21 September 2006, the ECHR considered that the documentary was part of a public debate about a serious and controversial question of general interest (the role of Switzerland during World War II) and that criticism expressed in it was not directed at the Swiss population but at the Swiss leadership during World War II. No complaints came from persons mentioned in the documentary or from their heirs nor from the state. The ECHR added that the passage of time had to be taken into account and that discussions about events of more than fifty years ago had to be judged less severely than those of ten or twenty years ago. Monnat had fulfilled his journalistic responsibility. The sanction, including the ban, had had a chilling effect. The ECHR unanimously ruled that Monnat’s freedom of expression had been violated. On 12 November 2006, TSR broadcast Monnat’s documentary again.

[Source: ECHR, Affaire Monnat c. Suisse (Strasbourg 2006).]

In early March 2006, a new, facultative 150-page history textbook for 14- to 18-year-olds in Zürich, Hinschauen und Nachfragen: Die Schweiz und die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus im Licht aktueller Fragen (Observing and questioning: Switzerland and the Nazi era in the light of recent questions), written by Barbara Bonhage, historian at the Federal Polytechnic in Zürich (ETH Zürich), Peter Gautschi, expert on history didactics, Jan Hodel, and Gregor Spuler, was the object of some controversy. It summarized large parts of the 25-volume report of the Swiss Independent Expert Commission on the Second World War presided by historian Jean-François Bergier (December 1996–March 2002) that had investigated the conduct of Switzerland during wartime. Bonhage and Spuler had participated in the work of the Bergier Commission. In the Great Council of Zürich, Rolf André Siegenthaler called the textbook “indoctrination”. Another politician, Luzi Stamm, spoke of its “self-accusatory” tone. One of the five experts guiding its authors, legal scholar Franz Muheim, declared that his criticism was not dealt with in the textbook, which he called one-sidedly negative. Most historians welcomed the textbook.

[Sources: Informationen Georg-Eckert Institut, no. 51, July 2006: 48–50; Le Temps, 10 March 2006.]

In February 2007, the ECHR started a reinvestigation of the case of Martin Stoll, journalist of Sonntags Zeitung, versus the Swiss federal government. In January 1997, Stoll had written two stories that contained leaks from a “confidential” report by the then Swiss ambassador in Washington, Carlo Jagmetti, on negotiations with the World Jewish Congress about unclaimed Jewish assets in Swiss banks. In 1999, Stoll was fined 800 Swiss francs (approximately 648 US dollar) for publishing “official confidential deliberations”. In 2001, he had appealed to the ECHR which ruled in April 2006 by four votes to three that the Swiss authorities had violated Stoll’s right to freedom of expression.

[Source: Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Alert (15 February 2007).]

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

There was increased discussion within civil society over the issue of combating past impunity, particularly with regard to mass human rights abuses committed since the late 1970s. The fate of more than 17,000 people, mostly Islamists, who “disappeared” after they were detained in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and hundreds of Lebanese and Palestinians who were detained in Syria or abducted from Lebanon by Syrian forces or Lebanese and Palestinian militias, remained unknown.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 252.]

See also Iraq, Lebanon.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In June 2006, the National Reconciliation Commission, appointed by the Thaksin Shinawatra government in 2005 to help resolve the crisis in the south, submitted its final report. Recommendations included making the local Bahasa dialect, spoken by Muslims, a working language. Some 1900 people were killed in the last three years in ongoing violence in the Songkla, Pattani, Yala, and Narathiwat Provinces in the south.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 255.]

On 16 November 2006, Ministry of Culture officials forced Bangkok Opera to change the final scene in Ayodhya, an opera retelling the Ramayana epic and written by composer Somtow Sucharitkul. The scene depicted the violent death of demon king Thotsakan (also called Ravan). Contrary to custom, it was originally planned to be shown on-stage rather than off-stage. But the ministry said scenes depicting death were traditionally discouraged in the classical dance of “khon” for fear of provoking misfortune. The opera’s premiere was allowed after Somtow signed a contract stating that the production would not harm local culture and morals.

[Sources: IOC (2007 no.1) 128; Southeast Asian Press Alliance, Ifex Alert (24 November 2006).]

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Following the closure in May 2005 of the United Nations (UN) tribunal in Dili—comprising an investigator’s office (the Serious Crimes Unit or SCU) and courts (the Special Panels for Serious Crimes)—there was a significant lack of efforts to provide accountability and justice for victims of the Indonesian invasion, occupation, and withdrawal (1975–99). In July 2006, the UN Secretary-General issued a report in which he recommended the resumption of the investigative functions of the SCU but not the judicial functions of the Special Panels (The Special Panels were set up by the UN to conduct trials in alleged cases of crimes against humanity committed by Indonesian military and local militias against at least one thousand civilians in Timor-Leste between 1 January and 25 October 1999, in the run-up to Timor-Leste's popular consultation and vote on independence in August 1999). [Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 257; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 336–37.]

In November 2005, the Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconciliação de Timor Leste (CAVR; Commission for Reception, Truth, and Reconciliation) submitted its 2,000-page report to Parliament. The CAVR had received 8,000 individual statements and listened to hundreds of victims' testimonies through public hearings. The report found that at least 102,800 Timorese people had died as a result of the Indonesian occupation and accused Indonesian authorities of crimes against humanity and war crimes. It added that the crimes committed in connection with the independence referendum in 1999, while egregious, "were far outweighed by those committed during the previous 24 years of occupation." President Xanana Gusmão distanced himself from its findings and over 200 recommendations. The report was largely ignored by the Timorese government and the international community.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 257; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 334, 336–37.]

In riots in late May 2006, after Australian and other peacekeepers landed, a mob attacked the SCU archives in Dili. The attorney general's office storing the records was looted, the databases were stolen, and other records, including the files on top Indonesian military commanders like General Wiranto, were stolen. Fortunately, the UN Security Council had required that a copy of the SCU records be made. Another mob threatened the CAVR records, containing, inter alia, interviews with more than 8,000 East Timorese, about human rights violations in East Timor in 1974–99. After archivists informed the Australian government and the UN, guards were instituted and the CAVR records saved.

[Sources: Huskamp Peterson, T., "Temporary Courts, Permanent Records", United States Institute of Peace Special Report, no. 170 [August 2006] 2, 3, 6; "Law Report: War, Cultural Cleansing and the Courts" [Interview with archivist Andras Riedlmayer on ABC Radio National] (17 October 2006).]

See also Australia, Indonesia.

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, writer Elif Shafak, her publisher Metis and her translator were charged with “insulting Turkishness” because in her novel Baba ve Pic (Father and Bastard; English translation: The Bastard of Istanbul) one of the characters had referred to the massacre of Armenians in 1915 as genocide. One character said: “I am the grandchild of a family whose children were slaughtered by the Turkish butchers.” and “I was brought up having to deny my roots and say that genocide did not exist.” On 21 September 2006, she was acquitted because of lack of evidence (and possibly because the charge could harm negotiations between Turkey and the European Union).

[Sources: Ifex Communique 15–37 (19 September 2006); IOC (2006 no.3) 82–83; IOC (2006 no.4) 200; IOC (2007 no.2) 27.]

In 2006, author İpek Çalışlar and Necdet Tatlıcan, chief editor of the newspaper Hürriyet were accused of insulting the memory of Atatürk (Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, founder of the Turkish Republic and its first president, 1923–38) in a newspaper interview of 4 June 2006 about Çalışlar’s bestselling biography Latife Hanım (Lady Latife). The book, about Atatürk’s first wife Latife Uşaklıgil, referred to an anecdote told by Latife’s sister Vecihi—reported in various sources but not substantiated by evidence—about how Atatürk had donned his wife’s hijab (headscarf) once in 1923 to escape assassination by an armed rival. On 19 December 2006, Çalışlar and the others were acquitted. On 13 November 2006, the prosecutor dismissed a complaint against Ecevit Kilic, a reporter for Yeni Aktuel. The complaint related to an interview with Çalışlar about her book.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007), 426; IOC (2007 no.2) 27; PEN, Defamation and “Insult”: Writers React (15 November 2006); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (London) 2006b: 55.]

In [June] 2006, Ahmet Önal, owner of Peri Publishing House, was charged with insulting Atatürk for publishing Alawitism in Dersim, a book written by Munzur Cem and Huseyin Baysulun. In the same month, he was sentenced to thirteen months’ imprisonment on a 2003 charge that writer Evin Cicek’s Turkish-language book Passions and Captives insulted Atatürk. Önal has had in total 26 cases brought against him in connection with various books he has published.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Turkey: Article 301—How the Law on “Denigrating Turkishness” is an Insult to Free Expression (WWW-text; London; March 2006) 5; IOC (2006 no.3) 83.]

On 6 October 2006, Taner Akçam, a refugee and a visiting professor of history at the University of Minnesota, United States, wrote an article in Agos to defend Hrant Dink (see below). He asserted that he, rather than Dink, had consistently used the term “genocide” to describe the Armenian deportations and massacres of 1915–17 and he urged readers, whether they agreed with the use of the term or not, to protect the right of others who do so and to decriminalize the studying and writing of history. In January 2007, Akçam was charged with “insulting Turkishness”, “instigation to commit a crime”, “praise of a crime and criminal”, and “instigating public animosity and hatred”.

In March 1976, Akçam, then an assistant lecturer in the department of economics at the Middle East Technical University and the editor of the magazine Devrimçi Gençlik, had been arrested on six charges arising out of articles he had published. Reportedly sentenced to 750 years’ imprisonment, he had escaped to Germany and the United States.

[Sources: IOC (1976 no. 3) 86; Middle East Studies Association, Letter to Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan (25 January 2007).]

On 12 October 2006, Orhan Pamuk (see NCH #40) received the Nobel Prize for Literature. After the January 2007 murder of Hrant Dink (see below), he temporarily left Turkey.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.2) 15, 17, 19, 25–29.]

On 1 November 2006, Muazzez İlmiye Çig ([1914–]), an archeologist of the Sumerian and Hittite cultures, and Ismet Ogutcu, publisher of the Kaynak Publishing House, were acquitted of charges of “inciting hatred by insulting people based on their religion” for which Çig risked eighteen months’ imprisonment. In her book, Vatandaşlık Tepkilerim (My Reactions as a Citizen), Çig had claimed that traditional headscarves were worn first around 3.000 BCE (during the Sumerian period) by women who worked as prostitutes in temples to differentiate them from women who worked primarily as priestesses.

[Sources: IOC (2007 no.2) 27; “Ninety-two-year-old Turkish archaeologist acquitted in headscarf case” (Cihan News Agency-National, 2 November 2006); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (London) 2006b: 55.]

On 18 November 2006, Attila Yayla, a professor of politics, political philosophy, and political economy at Gazi University, Ankara, spoke on a panel of Izmir organized by the local branch of the governing Justice and Development Party (AKP). He maintained that, despite widespread official propaganda, the single-party era between 1925 and 1945, led mainly by Atatürk, was backward in some respects. He was accused of treason in the press and on television for insulting Atatürk. The Rector of Gazi University, Kadri Yamaç, denounced Yayla’s exercise of freedom of expression and summarily dismissed him. In March 2007, the Izmir Public Prosecutor's office charged him with insulting Atatürk.

[Sources: "Atilla Yayla: What Happened When I Criticized Atatürk, International Herald Tribune, 6 December 2006; Middle East Studies Association, Letter to Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan (7 February 2007).]

On 7 December 2006, Eren Keskin, lawyer and former president of the Istanbul chapter of the Human Rights Association, was tried on charges of "insulting Turkishness" for making a speech in 2004 saying that "the official history of Turkey is a dirty history".

[Sources: Amnesty International, Turkey: Article 301—How the Law on "Denigrating Turkishness" is an Insult to Free Expression (WWW-text; London; March 2006) 7; World Press Freedom Committee, It's a Crime: How Insult Laws Stifle Press Freedom: A 2006 Status Report (Reston, VA 2006) 43.]

On 19 January 2007, Hrant Dink, who had received innumerable death threats (thousands, according to some writers in the Turkish press), was murdered. Perhaps as many as 100,000 mourners attended his funeral on 23 January. After his death, charges against him were dropped but not those against Serkis Seropyan, co-editor of Agos, and Aydin Engin, journalist and author. Investigation into Dink's assassination revealed that it was an organized crime. In June 2007, Hrant Dink's son Arat Dink, editor of Agos, was charged with insulting the Turkish identity for republishing an interview in which his father recognized the Armenian genocide. (See also NCH #48).

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 262; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007), 426; IOC (2007 no.2) 15–17, 21, 27–28, 32–42, 202; PEN, Ifex Update (2 April 2007); PEN, "Statement on the Murder of Hrant Dink in Turkey (19 January 2007); World Press Freedom Committee, Ifex Alert (26 June 2007).]

On 7 March 2007, an Istanbul court ordered the national telecommunications company Turk Telecom to block access to the United States video-sharing website YouTube because some contributions were considered insulting to Atatürk. In some of the offending videos, Atatürk and the Turkish people were referred to as homosexuals. In others, insults had been affixed to the Turkish flag and Atatürk's portrait. Thousands of emails were reportedly sent to YouTube by Turkish Internet users protesting against the videos. Access was restored two days later after YouTube removed the offending videos. On 22 May 2007, a bill passed by Parliament on 4 May 2007 and allowing the authorities to block websites which violated the 1951 law on insults to Atatürk's memory became law.

[Source: Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (9 March & 24 May 2007).]

In March 2007, British publisher HarperCollins received a letter from the publisher in Istanbul of the Turkish translation of The Great War for Civilisation, a book by British journalist Robert Fisk, announcing that they would not organize a press campaign for the book. The reason was that it contained a chapter entitled “The First Holocaust” about the 1915 Armenian genocide. In an article for The Independent, Fisk wrote that the Turkish-language edition of A Shameful Act: The Armenian Genocide and the Question of Turkish Responsibility (first German edition 1996; first Turkish edition 1999), a book by Taner Akçam (see above), was likewise received without publicity and without a single book review.

[Source: Fisk, R., “The Truth Should Be Proclaimed Loudly”, Independent, 17 March 2007.]

In April 2007, it was revealed that the Turkish-language edition of the Dutch-language book De Brug (The Bridge), entitled Köprü, a book about the Galata bridge in Istanbul written by Dutch historian and author Geert Mak, had been doctored. Changes included “migration” for the 1915 “deportation” of Armenians and deletion of a sentence about the “legendary cruelty” of Sultan Mehmet II. Although 20,000 copies were already distributed, the Foundation Collective Propaganda for the Dutch Book in Amsterdam who had published the book in Dutch offered buyers to replace the doctored version by an accurate one.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad, 7–8 April 2007: 1, 7; 10 April 2007: 9; 11 April 2007: 7.]

Ragip Zarakolu’s trial in relation to publication of a translated version of The Truth Will Set Us Free: Armenians and Turks Reconciled (also translated as History Will Free Us All: Turkish-Armenian Conciliation), a book by Armenian writer George Jerjian about the 1915 Armenian genocide, was postponed several times, the last time until May 2007 (see NCH #45). In the light of Hrant Dink’s murder (see above), Zarakolu, temporarily residing in the United States, decided not to attend a court hearing on 15 March 2007. On 3 May 2007, Zarakolu was acquitted, but the book’s translator, Attila Tuygan, was found guilty of “insulting the state and the memory of Atatürk”.

[Source: PEN, Ifex Update (2 April & 10 May 2007).]

See also France, Netherlands, United Nations.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, President Yoweri Museveni offered to grant amnesty to the top five leaders of the rebel group Lord's Resistance Army (Joseph Kony, Vincent Otti, Okot Odhiambo, Dominic Ongwen and Raska Lukwiya), if a peace deal was reached. The offer was made despite arrest warrants against them for crimes against humanity and war crimes issued by the International Criminal Court in 2005.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 12, 19, 266.]

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In 2006, Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams had his invitation to the opening of an exhibition of images of Che Guevara in a London museum withdrawn after museum authorities decided that the presence of politicians would not be "relevant." Adams noted that "it would appear that if Che was alive, he would be barred from his own exhibition."

[Source: IOC (2006 no.3) 118–19.]

On 14 March 2007, a controversial lecture at Leeds University by German political scientist Matthias Kuentzel (1955–), research associate (2004–) at the Vidal Sassoon International Centre for the Study of Antisemitism (SICSA), Hebrew University, Jerusalem, was abruptly canceled due to security concerns. According to Kuentzel, three emails from Muslim students had triggered a change of the title of the lecture (from "Hitler's legacy: Islamic Antisemitism in the Middle East" to "The Nazi Legacy: Export of Antisemitism into the Middle East") and shortly thereafter the cancellation of the lecture altogether. The Head of the German Department who had invited Kuentzel had concluded that the initial title of the lecture was potentially inflammatory given the University's large Muslim population.

[Source: Kuentzel, M., "'Freedom of Expression' at Leeds University", Scholars for Peace in the Middle East (3 April 2007).]

See also Austria, Grenada, Kenya, United States.

UNITED NATIONS

A United Nations photo exhibition on the 1994 Rwanda genocide, scheduled to be opened on 9 April 2007 by Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, was dismantled because of Turkish objections to a reference which read: "During World War I, a million Armenians were murdered in Turkey." The reference was intended to explain the word "genocide", coined by Raphael Lemkin in 1944 with, inter alia, the Armenian massacres in mind. Although after diplomatic consultations the words "in Turkey" were removed, the exhibition was postponed.

[Source: International Herald Tribune, 9 & 10 April 2007.]

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

The French embassy in New York canceled a party in honor of Carmen Callil's new book Bad Faith, an account of the deportation of thousands of French Jews to Auschwitz, because it could not endorse Callil's opinion in the postscript that Israeli Jews were oppressing Palestinians in a way that could be equated with the treatment of Jews in Nazi-occupied France.

[Source: IOC (2007 no.1) 131.]

In 2006, the family of high school student Candice Hardwick, 15, was suing school officials in South Carolina who barred her from wearing a t-shirt illustrated with the Confederate flag. The school did not ban the flag, but did ban "potentially disruptive" clothing. Some believe that flying the flag was an endorsement of the support by the pre-1865 Confederacy for black slavery.

[Source: IOC (2006 no.3) 119.]

In 2006, a secret Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) Clandestine Service History, written in 1958, was declassified (after censorship) after a FOIA request by Charles Gati, professor at Johns Hopkins University, Washington, for his book Failed Illusions: Moscow, Washington, Budapest, and the 1956 Hungarian Revolt (2006). It revealed that the CIA had only one Hungarian-speaking officer stationed in Budapest at the time and did not foresee either the uprising or the Soviet invasion.

[Source: National Security Archive, "CIA Had Single Officer in Hungary 1956" (Update; 31 October 2006).]

In June 2006, the Federal Government released a heavily censored version of a 40-page affidavit that the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) used to obtain the warrant for an unsuccessful search of a farm for the remains of labor leader Jimmy Hoffa (1913–75?), who “disappeared” in July 1975. In the released copy, twelve pages were completely blacked out and some other pages were partially blacked out.

[Source: IOC (2006 no.3) 119]

In June 2006, the Governor of Florida Jeb Bush approved the Education Omnibus Bill for Florida public schools which reportedly contained the following passage: “The history of the United States shall be taught as genuine history and shall not follow the revisionist or postmodernist viewpoints of relative truth...American history shall be viewed as factual, not as constructed.” American historians were very critical of the law. Shortly after the U.S.-led coalition forces invaded Iraq in 2003 and again on Veterans Day in 2005, his brother, President George W. Bush, attacked “revisionist historians” who questioned his justification for the invasion. “It is deeply irresponsible,” President Bush declared, “to rewrite the history of how the war began.”

[Source: Zimmerman, J., “A Florida Law Banning Relativism in Classes Ignores Reality and 75 Years Of Academic Tradition”, Los Angeles Times (7 June 2006).]

On 4 October 2006, the Polish consulate in New York annulled a meeting where British-Jewish historian Tony Judt (1948–), professor of European history and director of the Erich Remarque Institute, New York University, was scheduled to speak for the Network 20/20 about “The Israel Lobby & US Foreign Policy,” after telephone calls from the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) and the American Jewish Committee. Judt himself also canceled a speech entitled “War and Genocide in European Memory Today” at Manhattan College in the Bronx later the same month after a different Jewish group complained and the organizers had asked him not to refer directly to Israel. Over the past years, Judt wrote essays in The New York Review of Books (NYRB), the London Review of Books, the New York Times and the Israeli newspaper Haaretz arguing that religious and territorial fundamentalism prevailed in Israel, which, combined with Zionism, this would lead to an unviable communal Jewish state, and that the only solution was a binational, secular state. He was also critical of the American-Israeli lobby. In 2003, Judt was reportedly removed from the editorial board of The New Republic after he wrote a critical essay about Israel in the NYRB. In support of Judt, the NYRB published an open letter to the ADL signed by over hundred intellectuals.

[Sources: IOC (2007 no.1) 131; Lila, M., & R. Sennett, “The Case of Tony Judt: An Open Letter to the ADL”, New York Review of Books (16 November 2006); Washington Post, 9 October 2006: A03.]

In 2006, according to some sources, the ADL had also accused Norman Finkelstein (1953–), a Jewish political scientist at DePaul University, Chicago, strongly opposed to Israeli policies and author of The Holocaust Industry: Reflections On the Exploitation of Jewish Suffering (2000, 2003) of being a “Holocaust denier”, but the charges proved unfounded. After Finkelstein publicly attacked The Case for Israel (2003), a book by Alan Dershowitz, Harvard University Law School, Dershowitz attempted to prevent a written version of the attack, Beyond Chutzpah: On the Misuse of Anti-Semitism and the Abuse of History (2004) by sending threatening letters to the University of California Press, and to block Finkelstein’s candidacy for tenure by sending a critical dossier to members of DePaul’s Law School and of its political science department.

[Sources: Middle East Studies Association, Letter to Dennis Holtschneider, President De Paul University, Chicago (10 April 2007); Washington Post, 9 October 2006: A03].

In 2007, Human Rights Watch reported that the Bush administration was more hostile to releasing information to the press than prior administrations, moving to reclassify information that had been in the public domain, to reverse the presumption toward disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, and to greatly restrict public access to presidential papers, an important source of information on public policy.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 65.]

On 1 January 2007, the administration of Harker School, San José, California, abruptly canceled a talk, scheduled for 19 January, by Joel Beinin, historian of the modern Middle East and of Jewish history, member of the faculty of Stanford University for more than a quarter century, former president of the Middle East Studies Association of North America, and director of the Center for Middle East Studies at the American University in Cairo. When revoking the invitation, the administration cited pressures (reportedly including the executive director of the Jewish Community Relations Council of Silicon Valley) that threatened to undermine its financial position and public reputation. Beinin was a scholar critical of United States foreign policy and the policies of the Israeli government.

[Source: Middle East Studies Association, Letter to Christopher Nikoloff, Head of School, Harker School, San José, California (14 February 2007).]

In March 2007, the American Historical Association (AHA) adopted a “Resolution on United States Government Practices Inimical to the Values of the Historical Profession” with 1,550 (75.61%) in favor and 498 (24.29%) against. The number of voting members represented 14.67% of the AHA membership.

[Source: American Historical Association at <http://www.historians.org>.]

See also Bolivia, Cambodia, China, Germany, Grenada, Iran, Iraq, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, Sierra Leone, Switzerland, Turkey.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

In late August 2006, Carlos Demasi, professor of national history at the Instituto de Profesores Artigas, associate professor in the Centro de Estudios Interdisciplinarios Uruguayos, coordinator of the project “The Uruguay of Crisis and Dictatorship (1967–85)”, and former president of the Asociación de Profesores de Historia del Uruguay, was publicly criticized by some military and politicians. Among them was former President Luis Hierro López who said that Demasi’s view was the view of the left-wing political party Frente Amplio (Broad Front). The aim of the intervention was reportedly to influence the work of the commission (of which Demasi was a member) that edited a new history textbook on Uruguay in the late twentieth century for secondary schools. In the weekly Búsqueda and during a lecture to secondary-school history teachers at the Colegio San José de la Providencia, Demasi had commented on his research about the period of the military dictatorship (1973–85), said that the democracy deteriorated gradually between 1968 and the 1973 coup, criticized the cooperative attitude of the political parties (blancos and colorados) and their leaders to the army during that period, and discussed the question whether the guerrilla (active since 1963) or the army was primarily responsible for the violence leading to the coup. On 19 September 2006, 500 historians from Europe and the Americas signed an open letter to President Tabaré Vázquez Rosas in support of Demasi.

[Sources: Academia Solidaria de Historia a Debate (Santiago de Compostela 2006); Diario La República (Montevideo), 26 August 2006: 3; 15 September 2006: 32; 22 September 2006: 35; Espectador (Montevideo), 26 November 2006.]

Journalists Pablo Meléndrez, Leonardo Pérez, María José Pino and Soledad Acuña were attacked at the Military Club, Montevideo, by people dressed as civilians after they had begun questioning former President General Gregorio Álvarez (ruled 1981–85) about human rights violations during the military dictatorship (1973–85).

[Source: IOC (2006 no.4) 202.]

Although the Expiry Law of 1986 preventing legal proceedings against members of the security forces from the military period (1973–85) remained in force, some judicial decisions revealed progress in the fight for justice for victims of past human rights violations. In September 2006, a Penal Judge in Montevideo found six military officers and two former policemen guilty of organized crime and of kidnapping Uruguayan members of the opposition group Partido por la Victoria del Pueblo (Party for People's Victory) in Argentina in 1976 as part of Operation Condor. They had not been sentenced by the end of 2006. In November 2006, the 11th Penal Judge ordered the detention and trial of former President Juan María Bordaberry (ruled 1971–76) and former Minister of Foreign Affairs Juan Carlos Blanco. They were charged with the murders of parliamentarians Zelmar Michelini and Hector Gutierrez Ruiz, along with two members of the Tupamaro guerrilla group Movement of National Liberation (Movimiento de Liberación Nacional), Rosario Barredo and William Whitelaw, in Argentina in 1976. The decision was under appeal at the end of 2006.

[Source: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 25, 277.]

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

Since Uzbek government forces killed hundreds of unarmed protestors in the city of Andijan on 13 May 2005, no one was held accountable for the killings. The authorities rejected numerous calls for an independent international inquiry into the massacre. Instead, they conducted closed trials and continued their campaign to silence critics of the government's version of events. Some of those tried were convicted of terrorism, the courts finding that the defendants had been plotting to set up an Islamic caliphate in Uzbekistan. But the trials appeared largely to have been staged to support the government's version of events and to provide justification for the crackdown that followed. On 8 September 2006, Dadakhon Khasanov, a well-known singer and songwriter, was given a suspended three-year prison sentence for writing and performing a song about the Andizhan events.

[Sources: AI, Report 2007 (2007) 123, 278, 279; HRW, World Report 2007 (2007) 442, 444.]

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #45 (2006).

See Ethiopia.

Network of Concerned Historians	NCH
Annual Report 2006	http://www.concernedhistorians.org

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In January 2005, the Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission published the results of its consultation with the Afghan people about human rights violations during armed conflicts since 1979-80. In December 2005, the government passed the Transitional Justice Action Plan, which calls for the commemoration of victims, vetting of state employees to exclude human rights violators, the creation of a truth-seeking mechanism, the promotion of national reconciliation and the establishment of mechanisms to bring perpetrators of past crimes to justice. Some regional officials and commanders -- often called warlords -- continued to maintain links with armed groups that were active in the conflicts.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 51; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 225-26.]

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

In April 2005, the Cold War International History Project reported continued problems with access to files from the communist era, including access to Communist Party records.

[Source: D. Banisar, Freedom of Information Around the World 2006: A Global Survey of Access to Government Records Laws (2006) 5.]

See also Serbia and Montenegro.

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In March 2005, the authorities ordered a ban on import sales of Afrique Magazine after they discovered that the March issue carried a report on political disappearances in Algeria in the 1990s. In the internal conflict (1992-2000), thousands of persons disappeared.

[Source: IOC 2/05: 86.]

At the end of March 2005, the mandate of an official commission on disappearances, set up with a narrow mandate in 2004, expired. The head of the commission publicly excluded criminal prosecution of those responsible for the disappearances and proposed compensation payments to the families. He declared that the commission had concluded that 6,146 individuals had disappeared at the hands of security officers between 1992 and 1998. However, media reports later quoted him contradicting this by saying that half of these were “terrorists”, rather than victims of state abuses. The commission’s confidential report to the President had not been made public by the end of 2005. In September 2005, the government held a national referendum to win support for its Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation which would extend an amnesty to perpetrators of human rights violations (security forces, state-armed militias and armed groups) committed during the internal conflict (1992-2000). President Abdelaziz Bouteflika officially stated that some 200,000 people were believed to have been killed since 1992, but there was no commitment to establishing the truth about these killings and other gross human rights abuses. Regarding the amnesty, although perpetrators of certain serious abuses were not to be exempt from prosecution, no details were provided concerning the process of determining who would be eligible. Similar measures introduced in 1999 were applied arbitrarily and resulted de facto in wide-ranging impunity for abuses committed by armed groups.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 44, 54-56.]

See also France.

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 14 June 2005, the Supreme Court of Justice declared the Full Stop (1986) and Due Obedience (1987) laws unconstitutional, by a 7-1 majority, with one abstention, upholding an earlier decision by Congress from August 2003. The laws attempted to institutionalize impunity in cases of human rights violations committed during the military governments (1976-83). The ruling allowed the reopening of dozens of trial proceedings in Argentina.

[Sources: AI, “Argentina: Historical Ruling Opens the Way for Justice in the Country” (Press Release; 15 June 2005); AI, Report 2006 (2006), 32, 59; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 162, 164-66.]

On 18 November 2005, Mariano Saravia, journalist of the Córdoba daily newspaper La Voz del Interior and author of a book on police brutality during the military dictatorship (1976-83), complained of death threats. He also said to be a victim of “judicial persecution” because he was sued by former members of the military.

[Source: IOC 1/06: 104.]

See also Chile, Cuba, Uruguay.

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In January 2002, Turkish born Armenian journalist Murad Bojolyan (1950-) was arrested and charged with espionage. A historian and oriental specialist graduated at the Department of Oriental Studies of Yerevan State University (1972) and author of a book about the Ottoman Empire (published in Russian), he worked at the Institute of Oriental Studies of the National Academy of Sciences (1972-91) and for the public radio as an announcer and translator into Turkish (1980-91). In 1991-98, he worked at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the National Assembly and in the administration of President Levon Ter-Petrossian as chief translator for the President (1991-98). He was dismissed due to a staff reduction shortly after Robert Kocharyan became President in 1998. Since 1998, he had been working as a journalist, reporting for a number of Armenian and Turkish mass media. He was charged with spying for the Turkish National Intelligence Organization MIT and communicating to them information in exchange for payment concerning Armenia's and Nagorno Karabakh's military, economic and political affairs, particularly about the Russian troops based in Armenia. Retracting an earlier confession, Bojolyan said that any information he had, were public press reports. In December 2002, a court in Yerevan found Bojolyan guilty of treason and sentenced him to ten years' imprisonment with confiscation of all property. His various appeals were dismissed. In October 2005, the European Court of Human Rights rejected most of Bojolyan's complaints but wanted to look into the charge that his freedom of expression had been violated.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Partial Decision as to the Admissibility of Application no. 23693/03 by Murad Bojolyan against Armenia (Strasbourg, 6 October 2005).]

On 17 June 2005, Yektan Turkyilmaz (?1972-), a Turkish citizen of Kurdish origin, a doctoral student of cultural anthropology and a fellow at the John Hope Franklin Humanities Institute, Duke University, Durham (North Carolina, United States), was arrested at Yerevan airport and imprisoned for attempting to smuggle culturally valuable antique books out of Armenia. On his fourth research trip to Armenia, Turkyilmaz had conducted research on the history of Eastern Anatolia during the interwar period. He had acquired around 88 books dating from the 17th to the 20th century from Armenian second-hand bookstores, an open-air market, and as gifts, in order to build up a research collection and a library of Armenian books that would otherwise be lost. However, he was apparently unaware that he was required to declare seven of the 88 books, which were over fifty years old, at customs. Turkyilmaz was questioned on his archival work and political beliefs, and digital copies of his archival research were confiscated. His official request to be released on bail until his trial date (9 August 2005) was rejected. He faced up to eight years' imprisonment. On 16 August 2005, Turkyilmaz, was released but given a suspended sentence of two years' imprisonment. The judge upheld the confiscation of all 88 books, though ordered the return of his electronic research materials. The court had convicted Turkyilmaz on charges of smuggling, but commuted the sentence, as he was cooperative during investigations and partially admitted his guilt. Turkyilmaz was the first Turkish scholar to ask for and receive access to the Armenian National Archives, where he did research in May and June 2005. He was one of the few Turkish scholars who had critically examined the events of 1915 and Armenian claims of genocide, and other instances of political violence in Anatolia and the South Caucasus. He received several foreign scholarships. His dissertation “Imagining ‘Turkey’, Creating a Nation: the Politics of Geography and State Formation in Eastern Anatolia, 1908-1938” won him several awards. Turkyilmaz also studied in the Masters Program at the Atatürk Institute for Modern Turkish History at Bogazici University, Istanbul. (See NCH #39.)

[Sources: AAAS Case, ar0510-tur (5 & 18 August 2005); HRW, World Report (2006) 327; PEN, Rapid Action Network 31/05 (4 & 5 & 22 August 2005); Social Science Research Council, “Yektan Turkyilmaz” (2005).]

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See also Japan.

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 21 February 2006, British writer David Irving (1938-) was sentenced to three years’ imprisonment after pleading guilty to charges of Holocaust denial. The charges stemmed from two lectures he delivered in Austria in 1989. In Austria Holocaust denial is punishable by up to ten years’ imprisonment. While in custody, Irving reportedly found a copy of his Hitler’s War (1977), banned for defending the thesis that Hitler had no knowledge of the Holocaust, in the prison of Graz.

[Sources: IOC 1/06: 104; IOC 2/06: 178.]

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In August 2005, the High Court declared the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution unlawful. The amendment had legitimized the imposition of martial law in 1975-79. Following an appeal by the government, the Supreme Court suspended the High Court ruling.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 65.]

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In April 2005, special forces of the police beat and detained peaceful demonstrators who had gathered on the 19th anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear accident.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 67.]

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

Although the law on universal jurisdiction was amended in 2003 so that victims could lodge complaints directly with an investigating magistrate only if the case had a direct connection with Belgium, a limited number of cases were pursued. One of these was the case of former President of Chad, Hissène Habré (see under Chad).

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 69.]

See also Chad.

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

See United States.

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Under a “completion strategy” laid down by the United Nations (UN) Security Council, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) was expected to conclude all cases, including appeals, by 2010. Between February and April 2005, the last indictments before the closing down of ICTY were confirmed and unsealed. Impunity for war crimes and crimes against humanity during the 1992-95 war was widespread. Thousands of disappearances were still unresolved. According to estimates of the International Commission on Missing Persons (ICMP), between 15,000 and 20,000 people who went missing during the war were still unaccounted for. In August, the Council of Ministers of Bosnia and Herzegovina became the co-founder, with the ICMP, of a federal Missing Persons Institute. Lack of full cooperation with ICTY, particularly by the Republika Srpska (RS), remained an obstacle to justice. Efforts to tackle impunity in proceedings before domestic courts remained largely insufficient, although some war crime trials were conducted. The first convictions for war crimes committed by Bosnian Serbs were passed by RS courts.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 71-73; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 342.]

In July 2005, the tenth anniversary of the massacre of around 8,000 Bosnian Muslims after the UN “safe area” of Srebrenica fell to the Bosnian Serb Army in 1995 took place. While crimes committed in Srebrenica have been recognized as amounting to genocide by the ICTY, the women of Srebrenica whose husbands and sons were killed were still waiting for most of the perpetrators to be brought to justice. During an anniversary ceremony, the remains of 610 victims were buried at the Potocari Memorial. At the end of 2005 the remains of approximately 5,000 victims had been recovered and over 2,800 victims had been identified. In January 2005, implementing a decision by the High Representative, the RS had appointed a working group to study documentation produced by the Srebrenica Commission (established by the RS authorities to investigate the massacre), with a view to identifying those implicated. In its first report in March 2005, the working group had presented a list of 892 suspects reportedly still employed in RS and national institutions. The High Representative, however, expressed concern at the failure to provide specific data on individuals deployed in Srebrenica in July 1995, and urged the ministries involved to provide all information necessary to complete the list so that it could be forwarded to ICTY and the Prosecutor of Bosnia and Herzegovina. A further report and list were presented by the working group in September 2005, by which, according to the High Representative, the obligations of the RS were met.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 72-73.]

See also Greece, Serbia and Montenegro.

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

The federal government made efforts to open files from the military archives and opened a reference center on political repression during Brazil's military government (1964-85), which would contain documents, films, and victims' statements from the period. Human rights groups protested against the fact that only selected archives relating to disappearances and killings of political prisoners would be opened.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 76; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 171.]

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

In 2005, an Italian parliamentary investigation into communist Bulgaria's role in a 1981 attempt to assassinate Pope John Paul II claimed that the Bulgarian authorities had censored 75 percent of the information on the case held in the former secret police's files. Declassified East German files suggested that the Bulgarian secret police indeed recruited the assassin, the Turkish right-wing gunman Mehmet Ali Agca.

[Source: IOC 3/05: 99-100.]

In January 2005, the government proposed to amend the Law for the Protection of Classified Information to make it easier to destroy documents including the files of the former secret police without declassifying or releasing them. The provisions were withdrawn following public criticism that the amendment would allow the mass destruction of important files about Bulgarian history.

[Source: D. Banisar, Freedom of Information Around the World 2006: A Global Survey of Access to

Government Records Laws (2006) 24-25.]

In five different rulings (October 2001, October 2005, January [twice] and February 2006), the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the ban on the commemorative meetings of the Obedinena Makedonska Organizatsiya “Ilinden” (United Macedonian Organization Ilinden) was not necessary in a democratic society and, hence, that the authorities had violated Ilinden’s right of peaceful assembly and association. (See also NCH #5, #27.)

[Sources: European Court of Human Rights, Case of Stankov and the United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden versus Bulgaria: Judgment (Strasbourg, 2 October 2001); Case of the United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden and Ivanov versus Bulgaria: Judgment (Strasbourg, 20 October 2005); Case of the United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden and Others versus Bulgaria: Judgment (Strasbourg, 19 January 2006); Case of the United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden-Pirin and Others versus Bulgaria: Judgment (Strasbourg, 20 January 2006); Case of Ivanov and Others versus Bulgaria: Judgment (Strasbourg, 24 February 2006).]

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Legislation establishing a National Truth and Reconciliation Commission (NTRC), passed in December 2004, mandated the NTRC to establish the truth about acts of violence committed in the course of the conflict since 1962 (including those which occurred in 1972 and 1988 and in the violence following the 1993 assassination of former President Melchior Ndadaye), specify which crimes had been committed, other than genocide, and identify both perpetrators and victims of such crimes. In a report published in March 2005, the United Nations (UN) Secretary-General raised doubts about the credibility and impartiality of the NTRC and addressed the feasibility of establishing an international judicial commission of inquiry. It recommended amending the composition of the NTRC by including an international component (originally it was to comprise 25 members, all Burundians) and setting up a special chamber within the court system of Burundi. This chamber would be competent to prosecute those bearing the greatest responsibility for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, and would be composed of national and international judges. In November 2005, the new government designated a delegation of eight members to establish an NTRC in collaboration with the UN.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 80; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 83.]

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In April 2005, the agreement between Cambodia and the United Nations to set up a criminal tribunal to prosecute suspected major perpetrators of gross human rights violations during the Khmer Rouge rule (1975-79) took effect. The tribunal was expected to try no more than half a dozen people, while tens of thousands of others continued to benefit from a national amnesty.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 81.]

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 1 March 2005, German born Holocaust denier Ernst Zündel (1939-) was deported to Germany to face charges of Holocaust denial. On 3 March 2005 he was arrested. After a two-year legal battle, a Canadian judge had ruled his anti-Semitic hate speech “not only a threat to Canada’s national security, but also a threat to the international community of nations.”

[Source: IOC 3/05: 102-3.]

The screening of a 30-minute film, Temporal Transmissions, by Lebanese-Canadian videographer Jayce Salloum, which covered native Canadian history, was canceled by authorities in the city of Kelowna, British Columbia, because it was “not celebratory enough”.

[Source: IOC 3/05: 100.]

See also Iran.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002) under Belgium.

The judiciary failed to investigate the rape of hundreds of women and other human rights abuses which had occurred during the armed conflict in 2002-3, as well as those that took place after President François Bozizé took power in March 2003. However, in January 2005, the government formally requested the International Criminal Court (ICC) to investigate and prosecute war crimes and other human rights abuses which had occurred in the country during the armed conflict. The ICC had not started investigations by the end of 2005.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 85.]

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In September 2005, Belgium issued an international arrest warrant against former President of Chad, Hissène Habré. He was accused of human rights violations including torture, murder of at least 40,000 people and disappearances during his rule (1982-90). In November 2005, Habré was arrested by the authorities in Senegal, where he had taken up residence after being ousted from power in 1990. Although Chadian President Idriss Déby appealed to the Senegalese President to extradite Habré to Belgium, the Senegalese authorities stated that he would remain in detention until January 2006 when his extradition would be discussed at the summit of the African Union.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 27, 69, 87, 223; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 31.]

See also Belgium.

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In January 2005, the Supreme Court put a time limit of six months on judicial investigations into disappearances and other human rights violations by the military government of Augusto Pinochet (1973-90), but suspended the ruling in May. This allowed investigations to continue into more than 150 cases of human rights violations. In March 2005, the Supreme Court upheld Pinochet's immunity against charges relating to the 1974 assassination in Buenos Aires of former army commander General Carlos Prats and his wife. In June 2005, an appeals court decided that Pinochet was not fit to stand trial on nine charges of kidnapping and one of murder during “Operation Cóndor”, a joint plan by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to eliminate opponents. In September 2005, the Supreme Court upheld the ruling. In contrast, in September and October 2005, the Supreme Court lifted Pinochet’s immunity in the so-called “Operation Colombo” and Riggs Bank cases. In November 2005, Pinochet was charged and placed under house arrest. The charges against him included the murder of 119 people and the disappearance of 15 others in 1975 as part of “Operation Colombo”. Other charges included homicide, torture, kidnapping, money laundering, tax evasion and falsifying documents. This was the first time prosecutors in Chile had successfully cleared all the legal hurdles and indicted him.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 32, 88; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 174-75.]

In March 2005, a group of academics, appointed by the rector of the Universidad de Chile (University of Chile) to restructure the Faculty of Social Sciences, dismissed 54 faculty members. Amongst those dismissed was archeologist María Antonia Benavente Aninat, elected director of the anthropology department with an international reputation in her field. Her dismissal would leave her with her salary cut and without medical coverage or pension. Later, a judge annulled the dismissal but the university appealed that decision.

[Sources include “Fifty-four Academics Unfairly Dismissed at the University of Chile”, NEAR Alert (14 July 2005).]

In 2006, postcards sold in the new cultural center at the presidential palace were banned because they showed national leaders since 1970, including Salvador Allende (1970-73) and Ricardo Lagos (2000-2006), but omitting Augusto Pinochet (1973-90). Visitors had complained about the omission. The center’s spokesman said that the cards were an “artistic project” without any “political message”.

[Source: IOC 2/06: 181.]

See also Argentina, Mexico, Peru.

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, Amnesty International called on the Chinese authorities to stop the detention and harassment of the Tiananmen Mothers, a group of 130 human rights defenders - mainly women - seeking accountability and redress for the killing of their children and other close relatives during the suppression of peaceful protests around Tiananmen Square in June 1989.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 296.]

On 16 January 2005, Tashi Gyaltzen (1964-), a monk from Drakar Trezong monastery, Qinghai province (northwestern China), was arrested together with four other monks. Reportedly, he was administratively sentenced to three years' "reeducation through labor." The monks were allegedly detained for publishing from mid- to late 2004 a journal called "The Charm of Sun and Moon", which contained poems and political writings. Gyaltzen reportedly edited this and other magazines at the monastery and wrote "The Past and Present History of Trezong Monastery" and other articles.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 91; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005: 36-38, 40-41.]

On 9 March 2005, writer Dolma Kyab (pen-name Lobsang Kelsang Gyatso) (1976-), a history teacher at a middle school in Lhasa, Tibet, was arrested, charged with "endangering state security", and on 16 September 2005 was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for his critical writings. On 30 November 2005, the sentence was upheld on appeal. After his studies at a university in Beijing and in India, he returned to Tibet in May 2004. While a history teacher, he wrote a manuscript in Chinese, entitled Sao dong de Ximalayashan, reportedly a compilation of 57 chapters covering various topics including democracy, the sovereignty of Tibet, Tibet under communism, colonialism, and religion. Allegedly, he also started another, shorter, manuscript on the geographical aspects of Tibet, which touched on sensitive topics about the location and number of Chinese military camps in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR). Dolma Kyab is said to be in bad health. (See also NCH #44.)

[Source: PEN, Rapid Action Network (2 August 2006).]

In late March 2005, Beijing University journalism lecturer Jiao Guobiao was reportedly dismissed, six months after he had refused to be relocated to a job in the Center for Ancient Chinese Classics and Archives of Beijing University to study classical Chinese texts as punishment for his criticism of official censorship by China's Publicity Department (formerly known as the Propaganda Department). Jiao had written a pamphlet accusing censors of "obstructing the civilized growth of Chinese society" and comparing them to Nazis.

[Sources include IOC 3/05: 100-101; Reporters without Borders, "Pro-democracy Lecturer Sacked at Beijing University" (1 April 2005).]

In August 2005, Wang Wan[g]xing (?1949-) was released and expelled to Germany with his family. (See NCH #17.)

[Source: AI, Wordt Vervolgd, December 2005-January 2006: 22-24.]

On 26 September 2005, ehoron.com, a website created by Mongolian students in September 2004 to replace a closed website (nutuge.com), was also closed by the Chinese authorities. It was a platform of discussion for about 1,300 Mongolian students and covered a range of subjects affecting Inner Mongolia. The reason for closure was reportedly its “separatist” content, a reference to messages on the website criticizing a Chinese Television cartoon that portrayed Genghis Khan as a mouse with a pig’s snout.

[Source: Reporters Without Borders, “Chinese Shut Down ‘Separatist’ Student Website” (2005).]

Computer firm Microsoft complied with Chinese demands that it censor “subversive” words like “4 June” (date of the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre) on its weblog facility MSN Spaces.

[Source: IOC 2/04: 123, 125; IOC 3/05: 101.]

On 29 January 2006, the Publicity Department closed Bingdian (Freezing Point), the liberal weekly supplement of Zhongguo Qingnian Bao (China Youth Daily) created in 1995 and with a print run of 400,000. In its justification, the department singled out an article by historian Yuan Weishi published on 18 January 2006 and entitled “Modernization and History Textbooks”, which criticized the nationalistic bias in history textbooks glorifying the Boxer Rebellion against foreigners (1898-1900). The department found Yuan’s view “dangerous” and accused Bingdian of hurting national sentiment by romanticizing the foreign presence in China at the end of the nineteenth century. Bingdian was required to print a criticism of the offending article. On 2 February 2006, leading personalities signed an open letter to President Hu Jintao to protest the closure. On 17 February 2006, it was announced that Bingdian could reappear from 1 March 2006 onward. Editor Li Datong and journalist Lu Yuegang, however, were reportedly dismissed, inter alia for their contacts with democracy activists and journalists abroad and for having covered the death of journalist Liu Binyan (1925-2005) in December 2005, and were transferred to the newspaper’s News Research Institute.

[Sources include IOC 2/06: 183; Reporters without Borders, “Weekly Supplement Closed Due to Article on History Textbooks” (25 & 30 January 2006).]

In April 2006, the State Administration of Radio, Film and Television announced that local authorities would be required to verify the content of television series. Scripts would have to be approved every month to prevent “errors” of a political and historical nature.

[Source: Ifex Communiqué 15-15 (18 April 2006).]

The government banned Memoirs of a Geisha, a Hollywood film about the life of a geisha in Tokyo during World War II for fear that it would fuel anti-Japanese sentiment.

[Source: IOC 2/06: 181, 183.]

See also Japan, United States.

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

On 21 March 2006, Jaime Enrique Gómez Velásquez ([1950]-2006) historian and political scientist at Pontificia Universidad Javeriana, Bogotá, trade union leader, leading member of the opposition Movimiento Poder Ciudadano (Movement for Citizen Power), disappeared in Bogotá, probably for political reasons. He was assassinated. On 23 April 2006, his mutilated remains were discovered.

[Source: Academia Solidaria de Historia a Debate (Santiago de Compostela 2006).]

See also United States.

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Two years after the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) announced that the ICC would look into the hundreds of thousands of crimes committed in Congo since July 2002, investigations had yet to result in any international arrest warrants. In January 2006, however, the first arrest warrant was issued against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo. He was alleged to have been involved in the commission of war crimes, namely, enlisting and conscripting children under the age of fifteen and using them for active participation in hostilities.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 27, 97; International Criminal Court, “Issuance of a Warrant of Arrest against Thomas Lubanga Dyilo” (17 March 2006).]

See also Congo (Republic).

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In July 2005, the trial of fifteen members of the security forces and a civilian began in Brazzaville. They were charged with genocide and crimes against humanity for their alleged role in the disappearance in mid-1999 of more than 350 refugees returning from neighboring Congo (formerly Zaire). They were not suspended from their positions before or during the trial. When the trial was concluded in August 2005, the court found the state responsible for the disappearances of at least 80 people, but acquitted all the defendants on the grounds that they bore no responsibility for them. Human rights organizations expressed concern that the court had only pursued the case to prevent the trial of the alleged perpetrators by an independent foreign court.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 98.]

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

The legacy of the 1991-95 war continued to overshadow human rights in Croatia. Trials for war crimes and crimes against humanity continued or started before local courts, often in absentia. In some cases these trials did not meet internationally recognized standards of fairness. There continued to be widespread impunity for crimes allegedly committed by members of the Croatian Army and police forces. Of at least 300,000 Croatian Serbs displaced by the conflict, approximately 120,000 were officially registered as having returned home. In December 2005, former Croatian Army General Ante Gotovina was arrested in Spain, apparently after the Croatian authorities had provided the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) with information on his whereabouts. Gotovina was indicted by ICTY on seven counts.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 100-101.]

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

On 18 February 2006, the Argentinian writer, columnist and historian José Ignacio García Hamilton was barred from entering Cuba. He had scheduled meetings with Cuban intellectuals and several gatherings to publicize his new book, Simón: Vida de Bolívar, a biography of Simón Bolívar (1783-1830), the liberator of Latin America. In 1996 and 2005, García Hamilton had reportedly met with dissidents in visits to Cuba. One of his books (published in 1997), which analyzed authoritarian governments in Latin America, includes a preface by Carlos Montaner, an opponent of the Castro regime. His deportation was believed to be related to the book and its preface.

[Source: Committee to Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (22 February 2006).]

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #17 (2000).

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: none.

Flemming Rose, the cultural editor of the daily newspaper Jyllands-Posten who commissioned twelve controversial cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed and published them in September 2005, was sent “on leave” after he vowed (a promise subsequently retracted) to republish cartoons commissioned by an Iranian newspaper lampooning Holocaust victims.

[Source: IOC 2/06: 184.]

EAST TIMOR

See Timor-Leste.

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 5 March 2005, historian Enrique Ayala Mora (1950-), rector of the Ecuadorian branch of the Universidad Andina Simón Bolívar (1997-) and socialist member of parliament (2003-), was shot at while driving his car home after a political meeting in Quito. He was injured. Although his party belonged to the majority, his recent criticism of government policy was believed to have been the reason for the assault.

[Source: "Atentan contra Enrique Ayala Mora," La Hora (Ecuador), 8 March 2005.]

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

On 25 October 2005, religious authorities banned a book by Natana DeLong-Bas about Wahhabism on the grounds that it was offensive to Islam. The book, probably Wahhabi Islam: From Revival and Reform to Global Jihad (New York 2004), was largely based on an analysis of the writing of Muhammad Ibn Abd al-Wahhab, eighteenth-century founder of Wahhabism.

[Source: IOC 1/06: 109.]

See also Sudan.

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Impunity for past human rights violations, including disappearances, persisted. In March 2005, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that El Salvador had to set up a National Search Commission to trace disappeared children.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 110.]

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

The trial continued of 33 former senior government officials during the rule of the Dergue (1974-90) on charges of genocide, torture and other crimes. They had been in detention for 14 years. Other trials continued in the absence of the defendants, including former President Mengistu Hailemariam, whose extradition had been refused by the Zimbabwe government.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 117.]

EUROPEAN UNION

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

The government proposed legislation to establish a Reconciliation and Unity Commission with the power to recommend amnesty for “politically motivated” crimes committed in connection with the May 2000 coup and to grant compensation to those affected by such crimes. The proposed legislation promoted impunity for human rights violations and acts of treason, and was opposed by the military, the political opposition, and many areas of civil society for this reason. In late 2005, a parliamentary committee recommended that the amnesty proposal be amended to reflect constitutional principles.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 118.]

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In April 2005, more than 1,000 history teachers and other historians, writers, and intellectuals signed a petition demanding the repeal of a new law requiring school history teachers to stress the “positive aspects” of French colonialism. The law of 24 February 2005 was intended to rehabilitate the harkis (the 200,000 Algerians who fought with French colonial troops during the Algerian independence war of 1954-62 and of whom 130,000 were executed as traitors after independence) but its article 4 read: “School courses should recognize in particular the positive role of the French presence overseas, notably in north Africa.” The signatories objected that this imposed an official version of history, obliterating the suffering caused by the French empire. Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika reportedly spoke of “revisionism” and “negationism”. On 8 December 2005, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin declared that politicians should not determine the contents of history teaching. On 12 December 2005, nineteen historians publicly protested against the increasing judicialization of history in France. In January 2006, the controversial article was repealed.

[Sources include Figaro, 14 December 2005; Guardian, 15 April 2005; Libération, 13 December 2005.]

On 30 November 2005, historian Olivier Pétré-Grenouillau, professor at the University of Lorient and member of the Institut universitaire de France, was brought before the court in Paris. The Collectif des Antillais, Guyanais et Réunionnais accused him of denying that the slave trade was a crime against humanity (whereas the Taubira law of 10 May 2001 had given it that status) in an interview with the Journal du Dimanche (Sunday Newspaper) of 12 June 2005. In the interview, however, Pétré-Grenouillau did not deny that the slave trade was a crime against humanity but, rather, denied that it was genocide since the European slave traders’ intent was not to destroy the slaves but to keep them as cheap labor. Observers thought that the real motive behind the accusation was Pétré-Grenouillau’s book Les Traités négrières: Essai d’histoire globale [The Black-Slave Trade: Essay in Global History] (Paris 2004), which viewed the slave trade as a phenomenon of thirteen centuries on five continents, of which the European slave trade (1500-1900) was one part. The book had been awarded several prizes.

[Sources: Figaro, 14 December 2005; Libération, 30 November 2005; Le Monde, 15 December 2005.]

See also Lebanon.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

On 25 January 2005, a brief reference to the Armenian genocide, inserted in a history curriculum in the state of Brandenburg in 2002, was deleted following Turkish diplomatic protests. A chapter entitled “Enthumanisierung (Kriegsalltag)” (“Dehumanization: everyday life in war”) included a text that cited “z.B. Genozid an der armenischen Bevölkerung Kleinasiens” (“for example, the genocide of the Armenian population of Anatolia”). After a wave of protests, Prime Minister of Brandenburg Matthias Platzeck announced on 9 February 2005 that the reference would be reinserted.

[Sources: IOC 2/05: 91; Informationen Georg-Eckert Institut, no. 49 (August 2005) 6-9.]

In October 2005, under much protest German authorities tore down a monument at the former crossing point called Checkpoint Charlie. The controversial monument, erected earlier that month by a private museum, included more than 1,000 crosses, each devoted to someone who died while trying to escape the former German Democratic Republic. The move came after supporters lost a case in court to save the monument and failed to meet a deadline to raise the money to buy the land where it stands.

[Source: BBC News Online (3 November 2005).]

The United States wanted the Holocaust files at the International Tracing Service (ITS), Bad Arolsen, Hessen, containing information on 17,5 million people, to be open to scholars. Germany resisted this request on the grounds that the archives contained sensitive information such as who was subjected to cruel medical experiments, who were thought to be gay, and which Jews allegedly collaborated with the Nazis. On 18 April 2006, during a visit to Washington, Minister of Justice Brigitte Zypries declared that the archives would be opened. The ITS was established at the end of World War II to trace missing persons. From 1955 the Red Cross had been responsible for it.

[Sources: D. Banisar, Freedom of Information Around the World 2006: A Global Survey of Access to Government Records Laws (2006) 50; IOC 2/06: 185; Keesings Historisch Archief, 2006: 268.]

See also Austria, Bulgaria, Canada, China, Denmark, Iraq.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 22 April 2005, the report of the National Reconciliation Commission, investigating past human rights abuses during Ghana’s periods of unconstitutional government between 1957 and 1993, was made public by the government, together with a white paper accepting some of the recommendations.

The report had concluded that the majority of human rights abuses had to be attributed to the unconstitutional governments. The recommendations included a formal presidential apology to victims of abuses by state agents. The government issued an apology to all those who had been wronged by past governments. However, no other recommendations had been implemented by the end of 2005.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 124.]

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 10 May 2005, Riki Van Boeschoten, a Dutch social anthropologist working at the University of Thessaly, Vólos, and Loring Danforth, anthropologist at Bates College (Maine, United States), gave a lecture about refugee children from the Greek Civil War (1946-49) in Eastern Europe at the Hellenic Studies Program of Princeton University (United States). Based on 130 life stories and on archival documents, the lecture explored the mass evacuation of thousands of children during the civil war. In 1948 about 25,000 children were moved by the left-wing Democratic Army to Eastern Europe and a similar number were evacuated by the National Army and settled in “child-towns” run by Queen Frederica. Before the lecture, the program director received threatening phone calls and e-mails from members of the Greek diaspora -- including the Panmacedonian Association of the United States, some Greek members of the Modern Greek Association mailing list, and author Nicholas Gage -- in an attempt to cancel it. They also sent e-mails to the University of Thessaly in order to jeopardize Van Boeschoten’s position. Judging from the title and abstract of the lecture and on previous work of the lecturers, their main complaints were that the removal of children from Greece in 1948 was called an “evacuation” instead of “abduction” (“pedomázoma”, the Greek government’s position during the civil war) and the use of the epithet “Macedonian” for members of the Slav-speaking community and their language. The attacks continued for some time after the lecture but had no effect on Van Boeschoten’s position.

[Sources include NRC Handelsblad, 8 June 2005: 4.]

On 2 and 3 June 2005, all Greek television stations cut the opening scene of a video about the 1995 Srebrenica genocide. It featured a Serbian Orthodox priest blessing paramilitaries who were later seen to execute six Bosnian Muslim men. The stations presented the cut version to the public as being the complete version. Links between the Greek and Serbian Orthodox Churches underpinned pro-Serb sentiments in Greece during the Balkan wars (1991-95).

[Sources: Greek Helsinki Monitor, Ifex Alert, 23 June 2005; IOC 3/05: 105.]

On 1 July 2005, Takis Alexiou, academic, writer and artist, also founder of the Greek Rumi Committee and former President (1994-96) of the Panhellenic Historical and Philosophical Society, was sentenced to 25 months' imprisonment in Rhodes, despite the court prosecutors requesting his acquittal. Charges were brought against him after a Greek Orthodox monk, Arsenios Vliagoftis, member of the Greek Ecclesiastical Commission against Heresies, had declared that the Greek Rumi Committee was a sect. The committee studies the work of Mevlana Celaleddin Rumi, a thirteenth-century philosopher, poet and humanist whose writings were included on the United Nations 1989 list of worldwide literary treasures. An appeal trial was scheduled to take place in March 2006.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005: 52.]

See also Turkey.

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Of the 626 massacres documented by the United Nations sponsored truth commission in 1999, only one case was successfully prosecuted in the courts. In 2004, a lieutenant and thirteen soldiers were found guilty of the 1995 Xamán massacre and each sentenced to forty years' imprisonment. The government issued public apologies in four cases of past human rights violations committed during the internal armed conflict. One public apology, for the 1982 Plan de Sánchez massacre of more than 250 indigenous villagers by state forces, had been ordered by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. The prosecution of former military officers in this case, however, has been held up for years. In February 2005, the Constitutional Court halted the trial and determined that due process had been violated. The case was pending at the end of 2005.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 127-28; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 192.]

Over the past four years, there have been an alarming number of attacks and threats against Guatemalans seeking justice for past abuses. The targets included human rights advocates, justice officials, forensic experts, and plaintiffs and witnesses involved in human rights cases. In August 2005, members of the Guatemalan Foundation for Forensic Anthropology received repeated death threats due to their work consisting in the exhumation of bodies buried in clandestine cemeteries throughout the country. There were new incidents of threats and intimidation of forensic anthropologists in September 2005, and in January and March 2006. There was a widespread consensus among observers that the people responsible for the intimidation were affiliated with clandestine groups. These groups appeared to have links to both state agents and organized crime -- which gave them access to considerable political and economic resources. (See also NCH #31[iii], #31[iv].)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 193.]

In July 2005, 75 million pages of National Police files (covering a century of police operations) were discovered. It was reportedly the largest and most revealing collection of documentation on the “dirty war” (1960-96) ever unearthed in Latin America.

[Sources: K. Doyle, “The Guatemalan Police Archives” (National Security Archive; November 2005); IOC 1/06: 113 .]

In September 2005, the Spanish Constitutional Court ruled that the case for alleged genocide against Guatemalan General Ríos Montt (President in 1982-83), and other officers, could proceed in Spain.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 32, 128, 239.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999).

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #6 (1997).

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In 2005, a significant decline in the domain of accountability for past abuses occurred. Former military leaders accused of human rights violations during the 1991-94 military government continued to enjoy impunity.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 32, 133; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 199.]

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

After they were committed for retrial in another state, hearings in two cases related to the 2002 attacks upon Muslims in the western state of Gujarat were nearing completion. Otherwise, there was little accountability for the deaths of more than 2,000 Muslims in Gujarat during the communal violence that erupted after a train carrying Hindu pilgrims caught fire, killing 59 passengers.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 136; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 265.]

In February 2005, a commission headed by Justice G.T. Nanavati to probe the 1984 anti-Sikh riots in Delhi and elsewhere in the aftermath of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's assassination submitted its report. After initially refusing to take action against Congress leaders named in the report -- a decision that led to widespread protests -- Prime Minister Manmohan Singh offered a public apology to the Sikh community and the government promised to reopen some of the riot cases. Some senior Congress leaders accused of involvement in organizing the anti-Sikh riots resigned from their posts.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 137; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 265.]

Proceedings regarding the 1992 demolition of the Babri Mosque at Ayodhya, Uttar Pradesh, in which senior leaders of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) were facing trial, made little progress during 2005.

In July 2005, there was an attack on the disputed site.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 136-37.]

In Punjab, the vast majority of police officers responsible for serious human rights violations during the period of civil unrest in the mid-1990s continued to evade justice, despite the recommendations of several judicial inquiries and commissions.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 137.]

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

30 September 2005 marked the fortieth anniversary of the alleged coup attempt that precipitated former Indonesian President Soeharto's rise to power. The Indonesian Communist Party remained banned for allegedly plotting that attempt in 1965. After the attempt, at least half a million people were killed in anti-communist purges after the coup attempt, and hundreds of thousands more were imprisoned without charge or trial. To date there has been no accountability for these atrocities. There has also been no legal accounting for the majority of atrocities committed during Soeharto's rule (1965/67-98), or for the violence instigated by pro-Soeharto forces in a failed attempt to stave off his 1998 fall from power. Trials for the 1984 killing of civilians by Indonesian security forces at Tanjung Priok, Jakarta, ended in July 2005 with the appeals court overturning the convictions of twelve of the fourteen defendants.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 272.]

There were concerns that past human rights violations committed during the 29-year conflict between the government and the Free Aceh Movement (Gerakan Aceh Merdeka, GAM) would not be prosecuted and that impunity could undermine prospects for a lasting peace. Despite provisions in the Memorandum of Understanding, signed between the parties in August 2005, that a human rights court would be set up, the government announced that the court would not have powers to hear cases from the past.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 139.]

In a report submitted to the United Nations (UN) Security Council, a Commission of Experts (CoE), appointed by the UN Secretary-General to review the prosecution of serious violations of human rights in Timor-Leste (then East Timor) in 1999, concluded that the judicial process before the Indonesian ad hoc Human Rights Court for Timor-Leste was "manifestly inadequate with respect to investigations, prosecutions and trials". The CoE pointed to provisions in the terms of reference of the Truth and Friendship Commission (TFC), officially established by the governments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste in March 2005 to reveal the truth about the 1999 events, which "contradict international standards on denial of impunity for serious crimes". In particular, the CoE stated that the TFC should not allow amnesties for cases of genocide, crimes against humanity and other grave human rights violations. Despite such criticism, the TFC was set up in August 2005 without appropriate changes to its mandate.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 139-40.]

See also Saudi Arabia, Timor-Leste.

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

See Central African Republic, Congo (Democratic Republic), Ivory Coast (Côte d'Ivoire), Liberia, Sudan, Uganda.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 27 April 2004, leading Shi'a religious leader and scholar Grand Ayatollah Yasub al-Din Rastgari (1927-), author of over a hundred works, was reportedly detained in Qom after publication of his Reality of Religious Unity, a book on Islamic religious history allegedly critical of the policies of some historic Wahhabi sect personalities. In poor health, Rastgari was held incommunicado by the secret service without access to his family. His two sons were also arrested with him and the book's publisher closed down. Rastgari was probably secretly charged with "insulting Islam" and "causing schism" and sentenced to four years' imprisonment by the Special Court for the Clergy. He was previously detained on several occasions, most recently in 1996, when he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment and a period of internal exile for his activities against the regime. (See also NCH #42.)

[Sources: PEN, Rapid Action Network 45/05 (19 October 2005); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005: 67-68.]

On 27 April 2006, Ramin Jahanbegloo, of Iranian and Canadian nationality, adjunct professor of philosophy at the University of Toronto (1999-2001) with doctorates from the Sorbonne (Paris, France) and Harvard University (Massachusetts, United States), author of more than twenty books, and director of Contemporary Studies at the privately run Cultural Research Bureau, Tehran, was reportedly detained at Tehran Airport while attempting to travel to a conference in Europe. Held incommunicado, he was not charged but possibly accused of espionage, violating security measures and of having links to monarchist and other opposition groups. His imprisonment was probably also connected with an article in which he challenged President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's contention that the Holocaust had not taken place. On 3 July 2006, Minister of Intelligence Gholam Hossein Mohseni Ejeie accused Jahanbegloo of "taking part in a United States attempt to carry out a velvet revolution in Iran." On 30 August 2006, he was released on bail.

[Source: Ifex, Action Alert Network, 4, 5, 19 and 23 May, 12 July 2006.]

See also Denmark.

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 25 November 2005, Susanne Osthoff (1962-), a German archeologist involved in preserving Iraq's archeological treasures, was abducted by unknown kidnappers who demanded that Germany stopped cooperating with the United States-backed Iraqi government. Released on 18 December 2005, she declared that her captors demanded German humanitarian aid for Iraq's Sunni Arabs.

[Sources: BBC News Online, 29 November 2005; International Herald Tribune, 30 November 2005; "My Kidnappers Were Not Criminals" (Aljazeera, 26 December 2005).]

The Statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal, established in December 2003 to try members of the former Iraqi government for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes, was amended and adopted by Iraq's Transitional National Assembly in October 2005, one week before the first trial was scheduled to begin. The Assembly renamed the tribunal the "Supreme Iraqi Criminal Tribunal" (SICT). Serious doubts remained about the capacity of SICT to conduct fair trials. After the opening of the first trial on 19 October 2005, two defense counsels were assassinated. As of October 2005, the Multi-National Force retained physical custody of over 90 "high value detainees", including members of the former Iraqi government awaiting trial before SICT. Former Iraqi President Saddam Hussain was brought to trial together with seven others, including former Vice-President Taha Yassin Ramadhan. Charges related to executions on orders of the government of 148 people from al-Dujail, following an assassination attempt against Saddam when he visited the village.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 43, 46, 145; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 451-52.]

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

The report on clerical sex abuse in the diocese of Ferns (the Ferns Inquiry), published in October 2005, was critical of Catholic Church authorities, the Garda (police) and the health authority in their handling of more than 100 allegations of child sexual abuse made between 1962 and 2002.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 147.]

See also United Kingdom.

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See also Bulgaria, Somalia.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

Throughout 2005, neither the government nor the rebel leadership took concrete steps to discipline, investigate or hold accountable those responsible for ongoing crimes, much less past atrocities which took place during the 2000 election violence, 2002-3 civil war, and violent crackdown on an opposition demonstration in March 2004. The United Nations (UN) Security Council had yet to make public or discuss the findings of the Commission of Inquiry report, which was handed to the UN Secretary General in November 2004. The report contained a secret annex listing people accused of human rights abuses. Similarly, the Security Council refused to implement sanctions authorized under resolution 1572, passed in November 2004. While the prosecutor for the International Criminal Court (ICC) announced in January 2005 that he would send a team to Ivory Coast to prepare a possible investigation into war crimes, this had still not taken place by the end of 2005. The prosecutor was acting on an ad hoc request to the ICC by the Ivorian government made in September 2003.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 85.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 9 and 10 April 2005, a protest march with about ten thousand participants was organized in Beijing against the publication and use of a new history textbook which downplayed Japan's atrocities in China during the Pacific War (1931-45), including the 1937 Nanking Massacre and the question of some 200,000 "comfort women". The Japanese embassy was attacked, rallies were also held outside Beijing, and Japanese flags were burned. The unofficial history textbook was approved by a local education authority and was reportedly taken up by a small proportion of schools in Japan. On 4 May 2005, the Parliament of Hong Kong adopted a motion in which it criticized official Japanese approval of the textbook. In July 2005, the "Korean Historical Societies United", a platform of 48 historical societies in South Korea, protested against official Japanese approval of the textbook at the 20th International Congress of Historical Sciences in Sydney, Australia. In particular, it criticized the textbook's view that from time immemorial and until 1910 Korea had always been a country dependent on China, and that only in its capacity as a Japanese colony (1910-45) Korea had been able to achieve modernization. The platform also criticized the way the textbook ignored or justified the violence during the Japanese occupation. The controversial textbook was reportedly updated later.

[Sources: BBC News Online, 9-11 April 2005; Keesings Historisch Archief, 2005: 310-11, 357, 370; The Korean Historical Societies United, "Dear Historians of the World" (Pamphlet distributed at the 20th International Congress of Historical Sciences; Sydney 1 July 2005).]

In 1993, Takashima Nobuyoshi (?1942-), former teacher of social studies in Tokyo and writer of many textbooks, later professor at the University of the Ryukyus, Okinawa, sued the state because after revision the Education Ministry had proposed to change almost the entire text of his four-page manuscript about Emperor Hirohito, the Japanese army, Japanese colonialism, and the Gulf War (1991), to be included in a reader. He had already faced problems with textbook certification in 1989 and 1992. In April 1998 a district court ruled that two changes in his textbook demanded by the ministry were illegal. One passage quoted philosopher Fukuzawa Yukichi (1835-1901), who described other Asian nations as “savage”, the other stated that Japan should have consulted other Asian countries before sending minesweepers to the Persian Gulf in 1991. The court ordered the ministry to pay damages to Takashima. The Tokyo High Court, however, overturned that ruling on appeal. In May 2005, the Supreme Court rejected his appeal against that decision. On 22 November 2005, the Supreme Court reportedly also ruled that Takashima’s testimony had to be heard on appeal. (See NCH #10.)

[Sources: IOC 3/98: 49; IOC 4/98: 115; IOC 1/06: 115; Elsevier (11 December 1993) 54-61 (interview with Takashima); “Nobuyoshi Takashima: Japan’s Top Court Turns Down Professor’s Censorship Claim” (History News Network reproducing Chronicle of Higher Education, 12 May 2005).]

Classified Japanese government documents discovered in a United States archive in [2005] showed how a December 1941 provisional law aimed at suppressing freedom of speech was enacted in Japan. The law was abolished by the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers (SCAP) who ruled Japan from 1945 to 1952.

[Source: IOC 3/05: 110.]

The government was criticized for its continued failure to apologize adequately and provide full reparations for crimes committed against girls and women condemned to sexual slavery - so-called “comfort women” -- in countries occupied by Japan before and during World War II. For over sixty years, the now elderly survivors of an estimated 200,000 victims have been denied justice and adequate reparation from the Japanese government, which only belatedly acknowledged responsibility for the crimes. Courts continued to argue that compensation claims were settled by postwar treaty arrangements. Contrary to international law, some applied statutes of limitation. In June 2005, a United States federal appeals court rejected, for the second time, a suit for damages filed by fifteen survivors. The court cited Japan’s immunity from such lawsuits in the United States. In February 2005, the Supreme Court rejected a compensation claim by seven Taiwanese survivors (the case had begun with nine but two died). In March 2005, a Tokyo High Court also rejected a case by Chinese survivors.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 17, 37, 154-55, 293.]

See also China, Germany, Korea (North), Peru.

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

According to South Korea's Unification Ministry, a total of 3,790 South Koreans were kidnapped and taken to North Korea in 1953-95, 486 of whom remain detained. Some of the abducted had been used in propaganda broadcasts to South Korea, while others had been used to train North Korean spies. North Korea had rejected repeated requests from families of the abducted to confirm their existence, to return them, or, in the cases of the dead, to return their remains. Separately, North Korea admitted to having abducted thirteen Japanese citizens in the 1970s and 1980s.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 294.]

See also Japan, Korea (South), United States.

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In December 2005, Kang Jeong-koo, sociology lecturer at Dongguk University, was suspended by the board of directors after posting an article on the Internet earlier in 2005, which described the Korean War (1950-53) as a "war for reunification". The board claimed that Kang's alleged pro-North Korean remarks disgraced the school's prestige. Kang was also accused of the fact that he had written a commemorative message saying “let’s achieve the great task of national unification by inheriting the spirit of Mankyongdae” during a 2001 visit to Pyongyang, when he went to Mangyongdae, birthplace of North Korea’s founding leader Kim Il-sung. In addition, Kang was indicted for violating the National Security Law. Thirty-three professors from the United States, Norway and New Zealand reportedly sent a letter to the university and to the minister of education, demanding that Kang be allowed to continue teaching and researching. In the letter, they also criticized Seoul’s National Security Law, which forbids pro-North Korean activities.

[Source: “Korean Professor Suspended over Controversy”, Korean Times, 9 February 2006.]

See also Japan, Korea (North), United States.

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

On 16 June 2006, President Vaira Vike-Freiberga vetoed a controversial law which would have allowed the disclosure of the names of more than 4,000 alleged collaborators of the former Soviet secret police KGB.

[Source: Keesings Historisch Archief, 2006: 404.]

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In February 2005, former Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri and 22 others were killed in bomb attacks against civilians in Beirut. A United Nations (UN) inquiry suggested that senior Lebanese and Syrian officials were implicated in the attack on al-Hariri. On 15 December 2005, the UN Security Council endorsed a six-month extension of the investigation, but did not vote on the Lebanese authorities’ request to establish an international court to try suspects in the case.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 43, 46, 167-68.]

In May 2005, a joint Syrian-Lebanese committee was established to investigate the fate of more than 600 Lebanese who disappeared during and after the 1975-90 Lebanese civil war, apparently while in the custody of Syrian forces. The findings of two previous Lebanese investigations were never fully disclosed and no perpetrators were ever prosecuted. In 1992 the Lebanese government had stated that a total of 17,415 people disappeared during the civil war, but no criminal investigations or prosecutions had been initiated by the end of 2005.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 46, 168.]

On 2 June 2005, columnist Samir Kassir (?1961-) was killed in a car bombing in Beirut. A writer and historian with French and Lebanese citizenship and a professor of political science at Beirut's St Joseph University, Kassir had been writing columns for the past ten years for An-Nahar (The Day), a moderate daily newspaper with a circulation of 55,000. Well-known for his anti-Syrian opinions and his criticism of the "Lebanese police state," he had been harassed and threatened for years by Lebanese and Syrian intelligence agents. Kassir was one of the founders of the opposition Movement of the Democratic Left.

[Source: Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert, 2 June & 21 July 2005.]

See also Canada, Syria.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On 10 June 2005, a law establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) was adopted. The TRC was mandated to investigate gross human rights violations and economic crimes that occurred between January 1979 and 14 October 2003. The TRC was set to begin work in early 2006. While the TRC was empowered to recommend prosecution for the most serious cases, there was no indication as to whether the Liberian judicial system would be able and willing to try these crimes. In October 2005, five men and four women were selected as commissioners.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 169-71; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 113-14.]

Throughout 2005, ignoring calls from the international community, Nigeria continued, with the apparent support of the African Union, to refuse to surrender former Liberian President Charles Taylor to the Special Court for Sierra Leone, where he has been charged with crimes against humanity and war crimes against the population of Sierra Leone. President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria maintained his refusal to surrender Taylor on the grounds that it would disrupt Liberia's transition process. In March 2006, Taylor was arrested. He was later transferred to the International Criminal Court in The Hague to be tried.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 27, 117, 200, 227.]

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, the authorities announced a belated investigation into the killing or disappearance of possibly hundreds of prisoners at Tripoli's Abu Selim Prison in 1996.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 43; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 469.]

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999).

In June 2005, the Public Prosecutor was reportedly still waiting for a date from the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) for a joint review of war crime cases under ICTY's jurisdiction involving suspects who may not have benefited from a 2002 amnesty. A March 2002 law amnestied those whose offences in the 2001 conflict came under national jurisdiction. No review had taken place by the end of 2005.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 174.]

See also Greece.

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

On 1 May 2005, journalist, historian, and politician Mohamed Nasheed returned to the Maldives to establish and lead the country's first opposition political party Maldivian Democratic Party (MDP). On 12 August 2005, he was arrested during a peaceful MDP demonstration in the capital Malé and on 27 October 2005 sentenced on charges of terrorism and sedition. He was detained until 1 November 2005, when he was transferred to house arrest. (See NCH #27, #32, #37.)

[Sources: AI, Report (London) 2006: 179; IOC 4/05: 141; IOC 1/06: 116.]

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Despite five years in office, the Special Prosecutor assigned to bring to justice those responsible for widespread human rights violations committed during the "dirty war" in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s achieved virtually no progress. In November 2003, the Special Prosecutor won a landmark decision from the Supreme Court holding that statutes of limitations did not apply to old disappearance cases as long as the victims' bodies had not been found. However, he made only limited progress in uncovering the fate of hundreds of people who were disappeared in the 1970s. His most ambitious move -- the indictment of former President Luis Echeverría (1970-76) for genocide -- was thrown out by a trial judge on the grounds that the statute of limitations had expired. However, he won an appeal before the Supreme Court, which ruled in June 2005 that the statute of limitations had not expired in Echeverría's case because he had been shielded by immunity during his presidency. But the case was rejected again by a lower court in July 2005, on the grounds that the 1971 “Corpus Cristi” massacre did not constitute genocide. The Special Prosecutor subsequently sought to indict Echeverría again on genocide charges for the October 1968 massacre of student protesters at Tlatelolco, Mexico City, but in September 2005 a lower court once again rejected his argument. At the end of 2005, a ruling by the Supreme Court was awaited on the appeal against this decision.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 32, 182; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 203.]

On 4 May 2006, Mario Alberto Aguirre Tomic, a Chilean student at the Escuela Nacional de Antropología e Historia (National School for Anthropology and History), and Valentina Palma Novoa ([1976-]), a Chilean producer of documentaries living in Mexico since 1995 and a former student at the same school, were arrested together with others when they witnessed massive police violence in the village of San Salvador Atenco. They were held incommunicado for a few days and expelled to Chile.

[Source: Academia Solidaria de Historia a Debate (Santiago de Compostela 2006).]

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002) under China.

See also China.

MOROCCO/WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, the Equity and Reconciliation Commission (ERC), appointed by King Mohamed VI in January 2004 and the Arab world’s first truth commission, completed its research into grave human rights violations committed in 1956-99 and submitted its final report. Between December 2004 and May 2005, it received information from more than 16,000 people. Many had appeared in person before the ERC. Several dozens had spoken about their experiences at seven televised hearings held in six regions of Morocco. A planned hearing in Laayoune, Western Sahara, was cancelled without official explanation. The ERC report recommended that compensation be paid to more than 9,000 victims of human rights abuses. It also announced that it had resolved 742 disappearance cases and that 66 outstanding cases would be investigated further by a follow-up committee. The ERC indicated, however, that it had often not obtained the testimonies and documents it had requested from state officials, who were under no compulsion to cooperate. Critics pointed out that the ERC could not publicly name or sanction individual perpetrators, and would thus contribute little to ending impunity. Impunity for past crimes remained a serious concern, particularly since some alleged perpetrators continued to be members, or even high-ranking officials, of the security forces. The independent Moroccan Human Rights Association, meanwhile, organized its own informal public hearings in which some victims named individuals they held responsible for past violations against them.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 43, 44, 46, 187; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 474-75.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 1996, a group of political prisoners in Insein Prison were given additional sentences for attempting to send information about human rights violations to the United Nations and circulating news in prison. Among them was Aung Kyaw Oo, a history student and student union organizer. In [2005], he was accused of distributing a weekly bulletin with transcripts of broadcasts of overseas radio stations in prison.

[Source: AI, Myanmar: Imprisoned for Telling the Truth about Human Rights: Freedom of Expression on Trial in Insein Prison (London 1 March 2005).]

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #2 (1995).

A series of mass graves, believed to contain the remains of members of SWAPO (the former guerrilla movement which became the ruling party after Namibia's independence in 1989) from the 1966-89 liberation war, were uncovered in the north of the country. While opposition and civil society groups called for a truth and reconciliation commission, the government maintained that those who had information about such graves should come forward because the policy of national reconciliation would protect them from recrimination. SWAPO has rejected calls for a truth and reconciliation commission since independence.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 193.]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

See also Greece.

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

See also Korea, South.

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In January 2005, the findings of the judicial commission of inquiry into human rights violations between 1966 and 1999 (known as the Oputa Panel) were published by civil society organizations, but the government did not announce plans to implement the report's recommendations.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 199, 200.]

On 30 October 2005, State Security Services in Port Harcourt began seizing more than eight newspapers and magazines carrying stories on the secessionist state of Biafra (1967-70).

[Source: IOC 1/06: 117.]

See also Liberia.

NORWAY

See Korea, South.

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

In May 2005, the Film Censor Board announced that it intended to lift the ban on Mughal-e-Azam, an Indian film by Karimuddin Asif (1924-71) based on the life and times of Anarkali, dancer at the court of Mughal Emperor Akbar the Great. The film had been prohibited in Pakistan since its release in August 1960.

[Sources: Daily Times, 12 May 2005; IOC 3/05: 113.]

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

See also Syria.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

According to the National Human Rights Coordinating Group, there were 45 incidents involving attacks, threats, and intimidation against witnesses and relatives, judges, prosecutors, forensic staff, and human rights activists from January through October 2005. In September 2005, Salomón Lerner, former president of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) which investigated human rights abuses during Peru's armed conflict (1980-2000), received death threats, probably for his efforts to have former military figures involved in the armed conflict prosecuted. Previously, Lerner had received a series of insulting and anti-Semitic e-mails. Other TRC members had also received insulting messages accusing them of attacking the armed forces. The threats coincided with efforts to discredit the TRC following the second anniversary of the publication of the TRC Final Report. At that occasion, President Alejandro Toledo made a commitment to fund collective reparations and to consider individual reparations. Remembrance events and memorials were organized to mark the anniversary. Several critical articles, however, appeared in the press signed by retired soldiers implicated in abuses. The commissioners faced nine lawsuits from senior retired officers who claimed that they had distorted the facts. Also in September 2005, the nongovernmental Comisión de Derechos Humanos (COMISEDH, Human Rights Commission), whose lawyers represent torture victims and relatives of the "disappeared," suffered two anonymous attacks. Prosecutors and forensic experts working on human rights cases also received threats. Cristina Olazábal, the special human rights prosecutor in Ayacucho, received several intimidating messages from anonymous callers while investigating extrajudicial executions at Accomarca and the Los Cabitos military base in Ayacucho.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 207-8; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 210-11.]

On 28 February and 9 and 11 August 2005, three forensic experts of the Medical Legal Institute (the forensic branch of the public ministry), Ayacucho, archaeologist Luis Alberto Rueda Curimania, odontologist Carlos Alberto Suarez Canlla, and anthropologist Máximo Angel Banda Roca, who were participating in the Los Cabitos investigation, received death threats on their cell phones. They identified remains of those killed during Peru's internal conflict (1980-2000) by conducting exhumations at a military base in Ayacucho, and analyzing the human remains and associated evidence recovered from it. Several human rights violations and extrajudicial killings on the part of both the Shining Path and the Peruvian government's antiterrorist campaign had occurred in Ayacucho. In April 2006, there was a marked increase in hostile acts (including intimidation, harassment and death threats) committed against forensic anthropologists and experts working on clandestine mass graves in Peru. (See NCH #41.)

[Source: AAAS, Case pe0514-for (18 October 2005; 14 June 2006).]

In November 2005, having arrived unexpectedly in Santiago from Japan where he had lived in self-imposed exile since 2000, former president Alberto Fujimori (ruled 1990-2000) was arrested in Chile. He had been shielded from prosecution for extrajudicial executions and disappearances by Japan, which refused to extradite him to Peru. There has also been progress in cases dating from the presidencies of Fernando Belaúnde (1980-85) and Alan García (1985-90). Leaders of the armed opposition group Shining Path (Sendero Luminoso), who had been tried in military courts in the 1990s, were put on trial again, this time in civil courts.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 32, 154, 207-8; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 207-9.]

Women's organizations expressed concern about the lack of resources provided to the Human Rights Prosecutor's Office investigating forced sterilizations under the former government of Alberto Fujimori (1990-2000).

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 208.]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

The once-banned novel The First Circle (1968), written by former dissident and exile Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn (1918-), was adapted by its author into a television series. The story is a fictionalized version of the author's imprisonment in the Gulag camps after criticizing Stalin (1945-53).

[Source: IOC 2/06: 193.]

On 28 June 2005, the state prosecutor ruled that a Russian-language translation of the Shulhan Arukh, a code of Jewish morality and halakhic law compiled by rabbi Yoseif Karo (1488-1575), did not incite religious hatred against Christians.

[Source: IOC 3/05: 114.]

On 3 February 2006, archeologist Stanislav Dmitrijevski (?1967-), from Nizjny Novgorod, was given a suspended sentence of two years on charges of inciting ethnic violence. In 2004, he had published in Pravozasjtsjita (Legal Protection), the magazine of the Russian-Chechnyan Friendship Association (a non-governmental organization founded in 2000), statements of Chechnyan rebel leaders, including Chechen President Aslan Maskhadov (died 2005) and Ahmed Zakayev, spokesman of the Chechen fighters. In the statements the latter had called upon the international community to help end the war in Chechnya and upon the Russians to contribute to a solution of the conflict by not voting for President Putin in the forthcoming elections. Dmitrijevski was ordered to resign from the organization before 1 April 2006, otherwise it would be dissolved. At the end of February 2006, the office of the public prosecutor gave a warning to human rights organization Memorial because it had published on its website an analysis by a Russian civil servant of a handbook of the radical Islamic organization Hizb-ut-Tahrir. Memorial was accused of inciting religious hatred and transgressing the law against extremism. Both steps came after the Russian Parliament adopted a law strictly regulating nongovernmental organizations.

[Sources: IOC 1/06: 118; Wordt Vervolgd, April 2006: 13-15.]

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

At the beginning of 2005, more than 80,000 detainees awaited trial for their alleged participation in the 1994 genocide. The authorities had predicted that, given the capacity of the judicial system, it would take several decades to process all the cases. In August 2005, 36,000 of the detainees were provisionally released on the grounds that they had confessed their involvement in the genocide. In 2005, the gacaca system (meant to combine customary practices of conflict resolution with punitive justice) officially began to gather information on crimes committed between 1 October 1990 and 31 December 1994. The department of gacaca jurisdiction declared that more than 760,000 people could be prosecuted (one in four of the adult population) and that the process should be completed by 2007. There was widespread distrust of the gacaca system. Some Rwandans feared being exposed for their involvement in the genocide by the gacaca tribunals. Others feared that the tribunals could be used by individuals to resolve personal conflicts or to make economic gain. Trials of prominent genocide suspects continued before the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in Arusha, which held 60 detainees at the end of 2005. ICTR continued to work under a United Nations Security Council deadline to finish trials by the end of 2008 and appeals by 2010. ICTR might transfer some case files to the Rwandan authorities to meet this deadline. The ICTR's President estimated that 65-70 cases would be completed by 2008.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 27, 218-20; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 123-24.]

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

In April 2006, Fawaz Turki, journalist and columnist with the English-language Saudi daily newspaper Arab News (1997-2006) was dismissed, inter alia because he wrote about the atrocities committed by Indonesia during its occupation of East Timor (1975-99). Writing about atrocities committed by an Islamic government, even those already documented in publications, was reportedly a taboo.

[Source: Washington Post, 15 April 2006.]

See also Egypt, Iran.

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

In January 2005, parliament passed a law that provided an amnesty for "politically motivated" offences committed between 1983 and 2004.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 27, 223.]

See also Chad.

SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, the trial by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) of former President Slobodan Milosevic, accused of responsibility for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes in Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo, continued. Milosevic died in March 2006. By mid-2006, neither Radovan Karadzic nor Ratko Mladic had surrendered.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 224; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 388-89, 392-93.]

In July 2005, Milorad “Legija” Ulemek-Lukovic was sentenced to 40 years’ imprisonment for the murder of former Serbian President Ivan Stambolic in August 2000; Radomir Markovic, former head of Serbian state security, was sentenced to 15 years in prison for failing to prevent the murder. Another trial against Ulemek-Lukovic still continued: he was also accused of involvement in the murder of Prime Minister Zoran Dindic in March 2003.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 225.]

Despite the resumption of talks, little progress was made in bringing to justice those responsible for both the disappearances of ethnic Albanians and the abduction of Serbs, Roma and other minorities in Kosovo. In March 2005, the ICTY indicted former Prime Minister of Kosovo Ramush Haradinaj for his involvement in the “intimidation, abduction, imprisonment, beating, torture and murder” of Serb, Albanian, and Roma civilians while he was a commander in the Kosovo Liberation Army in 1998-99. Haradinaj resigned and surrendered to the ICTY the same month and was granted conditional release in June 2005.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 224, 226; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 396.]

In areas of southern Serbia bordering Kosovo and mainly inhabited by ethnic Albanians, the authorities made initial steps to incorporate Albanian culture and history in the local school curriculum.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 390.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Greece.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), established in 2002 to bring justice for victims of atrocities committed during the civil war (1991-2002), advanced in three trials involving nine suspects charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. In 2005, the Nigerian government refused to surrender former Liberian President Charles Taylor to the SCSL, which in 2003 indicted him on seventeen counts of war crimes (see Liberia entry). However, the Sierra Leonean government took no steps to end an amnesty, part of the 1999 Lomé peace accord, which prevented prosecution of all those responsible for crimes under international law. In mid-2005, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's 2004 report was released and distributed as part of a nationwide program to raise awareness of human rights. The report noted that decades of corrupt rule by Sierra Leone's political elite largely created the conditions which led to civil war. In June 2005, months after promising to respond to the TRC report, the government of Sierra Leone published its proposals for the implementation of the report's recommendations. This "white paper" was widely criticized by civil society groups, who said it lacked deadlines for implementation, was largely devoid of concrete steps to improve governance or address corruption, and in some cases rejected recommendations, such as the abolition of the death penalty.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 227-28; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 31, 130-31.]

On 30 November 2005, Paul Kamara was released on appeal. (See NCH #38.)

[Sources: AI, Report (2006) 228; IOC 2/05: 102; IOC 1/06: 119; PEN, Rapid Action Network 47/04 (19 October 2005).]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In January 2005, several warlords and others who were alleged to have committed war crimes, crimes against humanity or gross human rights violations, either under the pre-1991 Siad Barre government or during the subsequent civil wars, were appointed as ministers in the Transitional Federal Government or to other federal posts and continued to benefit from impunity.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 233.]

In 2005, Adan Hashi Ayro, military leader of the Ifka Halane court (an Islamic court), gained a reputation as an extremist, when his fighters dug up the graves of Italian colonists in an old cemetery and dumped the remains on the beach.

[Source: K. Lindijer, "Somalia, the new Afghanistan?" (6 June 2006).]

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

In late February 2006, the South African History Archive (SAHA) started court proceedings against the Department of Defence because the latter had transferred military intelligence records concerning international military relations and operations during the Apartheid era to their country of origin, Zimbabwe, without the National Archivist's authorization. The records probably contained names of those who had been engaged in military intelligence operations throughout the region. SAHA was concerned that these were not adequately masked prior to the transfer and asked for the records to be returned.

[Sources: Press Release: South African History Archive Seeks Return of Historical Military Intelligence Records (7 March 2006); D. Banisar, Freedom of Information Around the World 2006: A Global Survey of Access to Government Records Laws (2006) 113.]

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

The government failed to present a report on the situation of victims of the 1936-39 civil war and of Francoism, despite a 2004 request by parliament. In November 2004, an interministerial commission had been set up to this end. In December 2005, President José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero promised to present the results of the commission's work within six months.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 239.]

See also Croatia, Guatemala.

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

In 2005, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights did not make public the report of its July 2004 mission to Sudan, apparently because it was waiting for the Sudanese government to respond, despite the government's previous failure to cooperate on this issue.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 27, 243.]

In January 2005, a commission of inquiry appointed by the United Nations (UN) reported that war crimes and crimes against humanity had been committed in Darfur and that the Sudanese justice system was unable and unwilling to address the situation. In March 2005, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 1593, referring the situation in Darfur to the International Criminal Court (ICC). The resolution required Sudan and all other parties to the conflict to cooperate fully with the Court. As part of a compromise to ensure the support of the United States, the resolution included a provision to exempt nationals of states not party to the Rome Statute of the ICC (other than Sudan) from ICC jurisdiction. The ICC began investigations, but by the end of 2005 had not been granted access to Sudan.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 27, 243; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 29.]

In early May 2005, Mohamed Taha Mohamed Ahmed ([1956]-2006), a journalist and chief editor of the private daily newspaper Al-Wifaq, a member of the Muslim Brothers movement and former member of the National Islamic Front, was charged with blasphemy for insulting the Prophet Mohammed in an article in Al-Wifaq that sparked a religious dispute. The public prosecutor and thousands of demonstrators who disrupted the trial demanded the death penalty. The article was about an Islamic manuscript, “The Unknown in the Prophet’s life,” possibly written by Egyptian historian Taqil-Din Ahmad Al-Maqrizi (1364-1442), a student of Ibn Khaldun. It raised doubts about Mohammed’s parentage and claimed that the real name of Mohammed’s father was not Abdallah but Abdel Lat, or “Slave of Lat,” an idol of the pre-Islamic era. Mohamed Taha Mohamed Ahmed reportedly apologized in a press statement but continued to deny the charges. He had also written critically about the political opposition and armed groups in Darfur. In March 2006, unidentified assailants had set fire to Al-Wifaq’s offices. On 6 September 2006, Taha was kidnapped and beheaded by masked gunmen near the capital Khartoum.

[Sources: Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (12 May 2005); Committee to Protect Journalists, Ifex Update (7 September 2006); L. Boia, ed., Great Historians from Antiquity to 1800: An International Dictionary (Westport 1991) 227-29.]

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

See also Turkey.

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, the government provided no information about thousands of Syrians, Lebanese and other nationals who disappeared in the custody of Syrian forces in previous years. These included some 17,000 people, mostly Islamists who disappeared after they were detained in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and hundreds of Lebanese and Palestinians who were detained in Syria or abducted from Lebanon by Syrian forces or Lebanese and Palestinian militias. In September 2005, however, the government named one judge and two generals as its representatives on a joint Syrian-Lebanese committee intended to address the disappearances issue.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 250.]

On 9 September 2001, Aref Dalila (1943-), professor and dean of the faculty of economics at Damascus University and writer of many books on economics, politics and social history, was arrested and in early 2002 sentenced to ten years' imprisonment with hard labor for a lecture in which he had called for democracy and transparency, and alleged official corruption. He had been arrested together with nine other members of the Civil Society Movement during the "Damascus Spring", a short period of greater openness to public debate and calls for reform. In July 2005, he reportedly started a hunger strike in protest against his solitary confinement and ill-treatment.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2004: 76.]

See also Lebanon.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

See also Japan.

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In May 2005, the legal process, mandated by the United Nations (UN) to investigate and try those responsible for serious crimes committed in Timor-Leste (then East Timor) during 1999 (including the killings of 1,400 East Timorese), terminated, although the job had not been completed. The UN Special Panels convicted a total of 84 people of serious crimes, including crimes against humanity, and acquitted three. Over 300 people indicted for serious crimes were not tried because they could not be brought within the jurisdiction of the Special Panels before the mandate ended. The majority of the Indonesians indicted, including General Wiranto (the former Indonesian defense minister and armed forces commander), remained at large in Indonesia with no prospect of trial. By the end of 2005, there were concerns that those indicted living in West Timor, Indonesia, were returning to Timor-Leste, and that there were no clear arrangements within the under-resourced judiciary to replace the Special Panels. In June 2005, the report of a UN-sponsored Commission of Experts (CoE) mandated to review the prosecution of serious violations of human rights committed in Timor-Leste in 1999 was submitted to the UN Security Council. It concluded that accountability of those who bore the “greatest responsibility” for the violations had not been achieved, and recommended the continuation of the criminal proceedings (See also Indonesia entry). The Security Council had not acted on the CoE’s recommendations by the end of 2005. There has been no judicial accounting for previous atrocities committed during Indonesia’s occupation (1975-99). In October 2005, the Comissao de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconcilio de Timor Leste (CAVR; Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation in East Timor) submitted its final report to President Jose-Alexandre “Xanana” Gusmao. It contained a detailed account of human rights violations in Timor-Leste between 1974 and 1999. Its recommendations echoed those of the CoE report and called for the continuation of the UN-sponsored legal process and consideration of the setting up of an international tribunal under UN auspices if justice failed to be delivered.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 255-56; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 32, 257-59, 272.]

See also Indonesia, Saudi Arabia.

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In December 2004, legal proceedings were initiated against writer and journalist Zülküf Kisanak for his book Lost Villages, which depicted the destruction and forceful evacuation of 3,5000 Kurdish villages by the Turkish armed forces between 1990 and 1995. He was charged with “insulting the Turkish state” and sentenced to five months’ imprisonment -- reduced in December 2005 to a fine of 2000 euros.

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005b: 60-61; PEN, “Statement on the Trial of Orhan Pamuk” (16 December 2005).]

In February 2005, charges were filed against Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk (1952-), author of six novels translated into twenty languages, for “anti-Turkish” statements about the 1915 Armenian genocide in an interview with Das Magazin, the weekly supplement of the Swiss daily newspaper Tagesanzeiger, on 6 February 2005. Pamuk declared that “thirty thousand Kurds and a million Armenians were killed [in Turkey] and nobody but me dares to talk about it.” He referred to the killings by Ottoman Empire forces of Armenians in 1915-17 without, however, calling it a genocide. Turkey denies that the killings amount to a genocide. The “30,000” Kurdish deaths referred to those killed since 1984 in the conflict between Turkish forces and Kurdish separatists. Pamuk had to interrupt his tour of lectures in Germany. In February-April 2005, he was under threat from extremist groups who had objected to the article. It was also reported that a local official in the southern town of Isparta ordered the seizure and burning of all Pamuk’s works in Isparta’s libraries, only to discover that none existed. In a demonstration there, trade unionists tore his photograph to pieces. During a “Respect the Flag” rally in Bilecek, copies of his books were burned in protest at the burning a few days earlier of the Turkish flag during Kurdish new year festivities. In December 2005, Pamuk’s trial for “public denigration of the Turkish identity”, which gained worldwide attention, was suspended until February 2006 because the Ministry of Justice needed more time to decide on the legal basis of the trial (particularly whether Pamuk had to be tried under the old penal code that had been repealed on 1 June 2005). He faced up to three years’ imprisonment and an additional penalty for having made the statement abroad. Over four hundred writers signed a petition to protest Pamuk’s trial. On 22

January 2006, proceedings against Pamuk were dropped. On 8 February 2006, Murat Yetkin, journalist for Radikal, charged for an article criticizing the Pamuk trial, had his case postponed to a later date. (See NCH #40.)

[Sources: IOC 4/05: 145; IOC 1/06: 121, 123; IOC 2/06: 196; PEN Half-Yearly Caselist 2005b: 60-61; PEN, Rapid Action Network 11/05 (5 April & 2 September 2005; 23 January 2006); PEN, “PEN Observers Describe ‘Ugly and Violent’ Scenes Trial of Orhan Pamuk” (16 December 2005); PEN, “Statement On the Trial of Orhan Pamuk” (16 December 2005).]

On 20 June 2005, Turkish preacher Metin Kaplan (1953-) was sentenced to life imprisonment, a sentence annulled on 30 November 2005. (See also NCH #38.)

[Source: HRW, World Report (New York) 2005: 380.]

In November 2005, an expert committee was appointed to assess whether the book published by Ragip Zarakolu was insulting or not. The trial was postponed several times, the last time until June 2006. (See NCH #38).

[Sources: PEN, Rapid Action Network 39/05 (15 & 26 September & 24 November 2005, 15 February 2006); PEN, Rapid Action Network 48/05 (18 November 2005).]

An international conference about the 1915 Armenian genocide, due to be held on 25-27 May 2005 at Bosphorus University, Istanbul, and organized by members of the history, sociology and comparative literature faculties of both Bosphorus and Sabanci universities, was postponed. On 24 May 2005 Minister of Justice Cemil Cicek had said in parliament that the conference was a “stab in the back of the Turkish people” and that “we must end this treason, the spreading of propaganda against Turkey by the people who belong to it.” On 23 September 2005, after it was postponed again, the organizers circumvented the suspension by relocating the venue to Bilgi University, where it took place on 25 September 2005. It was reportedly the first public discussion of the 1915 events between Armenian and Turkish scholars. On 2 December 2005, five journalists (Ismet Berkan, Erol Katirciolgu, Haluk Sahin, Hasan Cemal, Murat Belge) were charged with insulting the judiciary for having criticized the September court decision to ban the conference, and with publicly denigrating “Turkishness” and the institutions of the Turkish state. In April 2006, the trial against the first four journalists was discontinued, but the case against Belge, a columnist for Radikal, was continued but adjourned until June 2006.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 261; IOC 4/05: 6, 145; IOC 2/06: 196; Ifex Communiqué 15-5 (9 February 2006); PEN, Rapid Action Network 06/06 (9 February 2006); PEN, Rapid Action Network 17/06 (3 May 2006); A. J. Yackley, “Turkey Postpones Conference on Armenian Killings” (Reuters, 25 May 2005).]

On 6 September 2005, extremist nationalists attacked an exhibition of photographs in Istanbul and destroyed some of the photographs. The exhibition commemorated the anti-Greek pogrom of 6-7 September 1955, leading to the exodus from Turkey of thousands of Greeks. The group reportedly spread the false rumor that the Greeks had set fire to Atatürk's house of birth in Thessaloniki.

[Source: Historisch Nieuwsblad, October 2005: 6.]

On 7 October 2005, journalist Hrant Dink, editor-in-chief of the Turkish-Armenian weekly Agos, Istanbul, was given a six-month suspended sentence for "insulting and weakening Turkish identity through the media". In February 2004, Dink wrote a series of articles dealing with the collective memory of the Armenian genocide and its impact on the present-day Armenian diaspora. He called on Armenians to overcome their historical anger toward Turks and "turn to the new blood of independent Armenia." On 1 May 2006, his appeal was overturned. In December 2005 new charges had been opened against Dink and three others writing for Agos for an article that challenged Dink's October conviction.

[Sources: IOC 4/05: 145; IOC 1/06: 122; IOC 2/06: 196; Ifex Communiqué 14-47 (22 November 2005); PEN, Rapid Action Network 06/06 (9 February 2006); PEN, Rapid Action Network 17/06 (3 May 2006); "When history hurts: Times are tough for outspoken scholars", Economist, 4 August 2005.]

On 10 November 2005, a trial was launched against Erkan Akay, editor of Yeni Dünya İcin Çağrı (Call for a New World), in Istanbul for his article on the Armenian massacres, "1915-2005 Forgetting or Denial?" He was charged with "denigrating the Turkish national identity". On 14 December 2005, Akay was sentenced to one year's imprisonment -- reduced to a fine of 2,000 euros.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005b: 60-61.]

On 17 November 2005, Fatih Tas, owner of Aram Publishing House, was brought before the court because earlier in 2005 he had published a Turkish edition of Spoils of War: the Human Cost of America's Arms Trade (1997), a book by American academic John Tirman, executive director of MIT's Center for International Studies. Tirman alleged that the Turkish army had used American weapons against Kurdish civilians as well as the rebel group PKK. The charges against Tas (insult to the army, the Turkish state, "Turkishness", and to the memory of Kemal Atatürk) referred to the accusations of human rights violations, to Atatürk's nationalism being labeled as "fascism", and to suggestions that the policy in the Kurdish southeast in the early 1990s amounted to a "genocide". His trial was adjourned to April 2006. On 9 December 2005, Tas was convicted to six months' imprisonment for publishing another book, this time accusing the Turkish army of complicity in the disappearance of a journalist in the early 1990s. Tas remained free pending appeal. In 2002, Tas had already appeared in court after publishing a book by Noam Chomsky.

[Sources: IOC 1/06: 121; IOC 2/06: 196; PEN, Rapid Action Network 48/05 (18 November 2005); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005: 60; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist 2005b: 60-61.]

In early April 2006, the editor of the Literatür publishing house, Abdullah Yildiz, would be brought to trial for publishing The Witches of Smyrna, a novel by Greek writer Mara Meimaridi. Set in the last years of Ottoman rule in Izmir (known in Greek as Smyrna), passages describing parts of Izmir's Turkish quarter as dirty were seen to be "denigrating to Turkish national identity". The book had already been printed for a year, selling 50,000 copies in Turkey, and 100,000 in Greece, with a film adaptation under way.

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué 15-5 (9 February 2006); PEN, Rapid Action Network 11/05 (23 January 2006).]

See also Armenia, Bulgaria, Germany.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In October 2005, the International Criminal Court (ICC) announced its first ever arrest warrants for five members of the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), including leader Joseph Kony and second in command Vincent Otti, for crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in northern Uganda since July 2002. The LRA is a rebel group, established in the 1980s, that had built a military force by kidnapping children and forcing them to commit atrocities.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 14, 27, 264-65; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 40-41.]

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

See Iraq.

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

The government took two initiatives described as moves to address the legacy of past human rights abuses in Northern Ireland. In April 2005, a Historical Enquiry Team (HET) was set up with the view to the Police Service of Northern Ireland investigating unresolved conflict-related deaths. This gave rise to concern about a lack of independence in the investigation. In November 2005, the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill was introduced in parliament which, if enacted, would sanction impunity for past human rights abuses committed by state agents and paramilitaries, and deprive victims of effective redress.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 269, 271.]

See also Austria.

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

Since 1999 or earlier, and scheduled to continue until 2007, a secret historical documents reclassification program has been conducted at the National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), the Department of Defense (DOD), and other government agencies. In March 2002, a secret Memorandum of Understanding had been signed between NARA and the Air Force, the CIA, and other federal agencies to reclassify documents in secret. This resulted in the withdrawal of possibly as many as 55,000 publicly available records (dating back to the World War II era) taken from NARA's open shelves (an operation already begun in 1999), while disguising the results to mislead researchers. The records included a complaint from the CIA director about the bad publicity the CIA was receiving after its failure to predict anti-American riots in Bogotá, Colombia, in 1948, and a report that the CIA and other federal agencies were unable to predict whether Communist China would intervene in the Korean War in the fall of 1950. The reclassification program was justified with the argument that during the implementation of Executive Order 12958 (President Clinton's program for bulk declassification of historical federal records), many sensitive intelligence-related documents that remained classified were inadvertently released at NARA, especially in State Department files. On 14 March 2006, NARA and Defense Department officials acknowledged the existence of the Memorandum.

[Sources: National Security Archive, Update (21 February and 11 & 26 April 2006); IOC 2/06: 197.]

A 2005 proposal to amend the 1990 Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act (NAGPRA) enabling tribes to claim ancient remains even if no genetic or cultural affiliation with them could be established, was not approved.

[Source: R. Dalton, "Law Change Imperils Studies of Ancient Human Remains", Nature (14 April 2005) 810; C. Holden, "U.S. Government Shifts Stance on Claims to Ancient Remains," Science, 309 (5 August 2005) 861.]

On 15 February 2005, the chancellor of the New York Department of Education barred historian Rashid Khalidi, specialist in the history of nationalism in the Arab world, and Edward Said professor of Middle East Studies and director of the Middle East Institute, Columbia University, New York (2003-), from giving lectures as part of a training program on Middle East history and culture for New York public school teachers. The dismissal came after the newspaper New York Sun published a story the same day attacking Khalidi for his criticism of Israeli government policies. The university protested the dismissal and withdrew from the program entirely.

[Sources: B. Doumani, ed., Academic Freedom after September 11 (New York 2006) 29, 53, 222-23, 258-59; A. Humm, "Academic Freedom, Intimidation, and Mayoral Politics: The Case of Rashid Khalidi", Gotham Gazette, April 2005; Middle East Studies Association, Letter to Michael R. Bloomberg, Mayor of New York (7 April 2005).]

On 11 July 2005, a judge accepted that presidential privilege still applied to two of the President's Daily Briefs (PDBs) given to President Lyndon Johnson during the war in Vietnam because they qualified as protected intelligence "methods" that the director of the Central Intelligence Agency had authority to keep secret. In January 2006, Larry Berman appealed the decision. He was supported by several history and political science associations. In the Nixon tapes cases, the Supreme Court had ruled that presidential privilege eroded over time and Congress had found in the 1978 Presidential Records Act that the privilege no longer applied twelve years after the president had left office. (See NCH #38.)

[Source: National Security Archive, Professor Sues CIA for President's Daily Briefs (17 December 2004, 6 May & 15 July 2005, 19 & 27 January 2006).]

On 28 July 2005, Ralph Begleiter's case was dismissed after the Pentagon agreed to release the uncensored images of war casualty honor guards and to process further Freedom of Information Act requests. (See NCH #38.)

[Sources: National Security Archive, Update (4 October 2004; 28 April 2005; 4 August 2005); IOC 3/05: 118.]

Alan Leshner of the American Association for the Advancement of Science criticized managers of United States science centers who submitted to demands of Christian fundamentalist groups not to show films "promoting" evolutionary theory.

[Source: IOC 3/05: 118.]

In August 2005, Bolivian historian Waskar Ari was prevented from taking up a post as assistant professor of History and Ethnic Studies at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln because he had been placed on a list of individuals under "conspicuous revision" and thus subjected to extensive background checks due to alleged security concerns (an approval process without time limit). As a member of the Aymara indigenous people of Bolivia and an authority on religious beliefs and political activism among indigenous Bolivians, Ari served as a consultant with the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank, and obtained a doctoral degree in history at Georgetown University in 2004 (the first Aymara scholar to do so). He was a visiting assistant professor at Western Michigan University and a postdoctoral fellow at the University of Texas. Within the Aymara community of Bolivia, he was widely recognized as a voice of moderation unrelated to extremist groups. According to the State Department, cancellation of his old student visa was done under a terrorism-related section of United States legislation on the granting of visas. It was believed that Ari's ethnicity formed the basis for denying him a new visa. (See NCH #43.)

[Sources: AAAS, Case bo0603-ari (20 March 2006); American Historical Association, "Letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice" (13 February 2006); American Historical Association, "Press Release: American Historical Association expresses concern about denial of visa to Georgetown University PhD from Bolivia" (13 February 2006).]

On 27 December 2005, a federal judge found four leaders of the Hawaiian group Hui Malama I Na Kupuna O Hawaii Nei in contempt for refusing to disclose where they had buried 83 native Hawaiian funerary artifacts borrowed from the Bishop museum in 2000. Hui Malama director Edward Halealoha Ayau was taken into custody. Hui Malama said that the artifacts had been looted from a cave by an American archeologist in 1905 and illegally sold to the museum and that they had put the items back. Thirteen other groups, however, also claimed ownership of the objects. Two of them, Na Lei Alii Kawanakoa and the Royal Hawaiian Academy of Traditional Arts, and the museum had sued Hui Malama for the objects' return.

[Sources: "Hawaiians Refuse To Hand over Artifacts", Taipei Times, 29 December 2005: 7; Washington Post, 3 January 2005.]

Beshara Doumani (1957-), associate professor of history, University of California at Berkeley, and editor of the book Academic Freedom after September 11 (New York 2006), was reportedly harassed and his lectures were watched. He was accused of anti-Americanism and anti-Semitism because of his criticism of American Middle East policy and the Patriot Act (passed in October 2001). His work focused on the social and cultural history of the Middle East during the late Ottoman period.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad, 4 April 2006: 8.]

See also Armenia, Germany, Greece, Japan, Korea (South), Sudan, Turkey.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

The new government of President Tabaré Vázquez Rosas initiated investigations to establish the fate and burial places of victims of disappearances from the period of the military government (1973-85). The investigation sites included military barracks where a number of human remains were discovered. Although no attempts were made to abolish the 1986 Expiry Law, the government interpreted its scope as limited to human rights violations committed after the June 1973 military coup. This interpretation opened up the possibility of legal action against some 600 active and former members of the armed forces in connection with crimes committed before the coup. The government also excluded from the Expiry Law cases that took place in Argentina; they were subsequently brought before the courts. In June 2005, former President Juan Maria Bordaberry and former Minister of Foreign Affairs Juan Carlos Blanco were charged with involvement in the murders of legislators Zelmar Michelini and Héctor Gutiérrez Ruiz and activists Rosario Barredo and William Whitelaw. All four had been killed in Argentina in 1976.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 276.]

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

On May 13, 2005, government forces killed hundreds of unarmed protesters as they fled a demonstration in Andijan (Andizhan) in eastern Uzbekistan. Since the massacre, government authorities have refused demands for an international inquiry and engaged in a concerted campaign to rewrite the history of the events. They denied responsibility for the deaths, blaming them instead on Islamic extremists who were intent on overthrowing the government and creating an Islamic state in the Fergana valley. The government detained hundreds -- perhaps thousands -- of people in Andijan and coerced them into giving evidence about the events. On 20 September 2005, a trial began of fifteen defendants charged with more than thirty crimes relating to the May events. All fifteen were convicted and sentenced to prison terms ranging from fourteen to twenty years.

[Sources: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 276-77; HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 423-24.]

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

See also Bulgaria.

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

There were concerns over the safety of members of the human rights organization COFAVIC (Comité de Familiares de Víctimas de los Sucesos de Febrero-Marzo de 1989; Committee of Relatives of Victims of the Events of February-March 1989), after their police protection was withdrawn in March 2005. The organization had made a public statement which criticized the authorities for not bringing to justice the perpetrators of human rights violations committed during civil disturbances in 1989 known as the Caracazo. In November 2002, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights had ordered Venezuela to protect COFAVIC members after they had suffered threats and acts of intimidation.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 280.]

See also Cuba.

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #38 (2005).

In 2005, the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention declared Thich Quang Do (1928-), an author of, inter alia, several studies of Buddhist history and the secretary-general of the unofficial Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBCV), a victim of arbitrary detention. (See NCH #10, #14, #17, #37, #38.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2006 (2006), 323; United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, Opinion 18/2005 on Arbitrary Detention of Thich Huyen Quang and Thich Quang Do (26 May 2005).]

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

A report of a fact-finding mission to Zimbabwe in 2002 by the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, which was officially made public in February 2005, concluded that human rights violations had occurred in Zimbabwe.

[Source: AI, Report 2006 (2006), 27.]

See also Ethiopia, South Africa.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

AFGHANISTAN

In 2004, little progress was made in bringing to justice those responsible for war crimes, including mass killings and rape, committed during the armed conflicts since 1978. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 36.]

See also United States.

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

ALGERIA

In 2004, no concrete steps were taken to establish the fate of thousands of “disappearances” in the conflict started in 1992. In August and September, many families of the “disappeared” were summoned by a special commission set up in September 2003 to serve as an intermediary between the families and the authorities. The commission’s mandate did not empower it to view information held in the archives of the security forces. Complaints filed in Algerian courts for abduction and illegal detention were not followed up. The remains of victims of killings discovered in mass graves were generally not identified, and the available evidence was not used to establish responsibility for the killings. The authorities continued to deny that state agents had been responsible for a pattern of “disappearances”. The United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances expressed its “deep concern that there have been no clarifications of the more than 1,100 outstanding cases” which it had transmitted to the government. In November 2004, President Abdelaziz Bouteflika announced plans for a general amnesty for all perpetrators of human rights abuses. In the same month, the Permanent People’s Tribunal - an international panel of experts set up to examine human rights issues in the absence of formal commissions of inquiry - met in Paris to examine evidence of human rights abuses committed in Algeria since 1992. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 39-40.]

On 26 May 2004, Hafnaoui Ghoul, a local correspondent for the weekly El Youm in Djelfa, south of Algiers, a historian who runs the regional office of the Ligue algérienne des droits de l’homme (Algerian League of Human Rights), and a spokesperson for the unofficial political group Movement of Citizens of the South, was placed in preventive detention and sentenced to a total of eight months’ imprisonment in a series of court cases, mostly defamation cases filed by local officials after he reported allegations of torture, public mismanagement and corruption. Ghoul had been under house arrest since 15 February 2003 and had received death threats because of his investigations. On 25 November 2004, he was provisionally released.

[Sources: IOC 3/04: 98; IOC 1/05: 92; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 40; Reporters sans frontières, “Journalist Hafnaoui Ghoul receives six-month prison sentence for defamation” (WWW-text; 31 May 2004); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 4; PEN, “Reporters without Borders Urges French Foreign Minister To Raise Press Freedom Issues with Algerian Authorities” (WWW-text; 12 July 2004)].

See also Morocco/Western Sahara.

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ARGENTINA

Following the congressional annulment in August 2003 of the “full stop” and “due obedience” laws - which had obstructed prosecutions of those responsible for human rights abuses committed during military rule (1976-83) - the Néstor Kirchner government continued to press for accountability. Several key trials were underway, including the one of ex-junta leader General Jorge Videla, for his involvement in Operation Condor (a secret criminal plan devised by six Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to kidnap, exchange, or “disappear” political refugees from neighboring states). A final judicial decision on the constitutionality of the annulment of the “full stop” and “due obedience” laws was still pending: in October 2003, the Supreme Court had referred the case to the Criminal Cassation Panel. In August 2004, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal by a former Chilean agent who had argued that the life sentence he received for the 1974 assassination of Chilean army commander General Carlos Prats had to be annulled because the statute of limitations had elapsed. In a landmark decision, the court ruled that, as a crime against humanity, the murder was not subject to a statute of limitations. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 186, 188-90; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 44.]

On 24 March 2004, the 28th anniversary of the military coup that initiated the dictatorship (1976-83) during which thousands of Argentinians disappeared, President Néstor Kirchner led a commemorative event at the Military College. During the event, army chief General Roberto Bendini removed from the walls portraits of two of the institution’s former directors in the 1970s, Jorge Videla and Reynaldo Bignone, both junta leaders during the dictatorship. Four generals and one colonel refused to be present at this event. The same day, Kirchner signed an agreement to convert the Navy Mechanics School (ESMA), a torture center where thousands of disappeared had been held, into a Museum of Memory.

[Sources: HRW, “Argentina Confronts Past on Coup Anniversary” (WWW-text; Washington 24 March 2004); HRW, World Report 2005 (2005): 189-90; IOC 1/05: 66.]

See also Chile, Paraguay, United States, Uruguay.

ARMENIA

On 20 April 2004, police officers arrested Colonel Gegam Arutyunyan, member of the opposition Republican Party’s political council, former deputy defense minister and historian, and held him at an Interior Ministry office. He was charged with the “use of bad language”. His detention reportedly served to prevent his participation in an opposition rally on 21 April.

[Sources: IOC 3/04: 99; C. Maral, “Armenian opposition member re-detained over foul language use”

(WWW-text; 21 April 2004).]

See also Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

AUSTRIA

On 8 January 1997, the Neue Kronen Zeitung published an article, written under the pseudonym “Cato”, about the controversial exhibition “War of Annihilation: Crimes of the Wehrmacht, 1941–1944”, planned to be staged in Salzburg. The article, entitled “Infected with Lies”, was a reaction to a favorable commentary (published on 23 December 1996) by Gerhard Botz, professor at the Institute of History, University of Salzburg, in the newspaper Salzburger Nachrichten. According to Salzburger Nachrichten, Cato had written that (1) it approved the 1940 Katyń massacre committed by the Soviets; (2) it called those fallen in World War II murderers; (3) it tarnished the soldiers of World War II; (4) it collaborated with liars (by which allegedly historians such as Botz were meant); (5) its quality as a newspaper had declined; and (6) its circulation had fallen. Salzburger Nachrichten filed a defamation complaint with the Vienna Regional Criminal Court, which was rejected in June 1997 because Cato’s identity could not be established and because the Neue Kronen Zeitung article was part of a public debate. In a separate case revolving around unfair competition, the Salzburg Regional Court issued an injunction against Neue Kronen Zeitung preventing it from repeating the statements. It called (1), (2) and (5) untrue statements of fact and (3) and (4) value statements containing an unnecessary disparagement of Salzburger Nachrichten. This was confirmed on appeal in December 1997. On 20 March 2003, the European Court of Human Rights unanimously ruled that the statements with a competitive aim (5 and 6) prevailed over those made with an intention to contribute to a public debate (1 to 4) and that the injunction was not disproportionate.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Decision as to the Admissibility of Application no. 42429/98 by Krone Verlag and Mediaprint against Austria (WWW-text; Strasbourg, 20 March 2003).]

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

BANGLADESH

On 12 January 2004, a bomb blast killed three people and injured about thirty, while thousands of devotees were chanting Koran verses and singing Islamic songs during a festival at the 700-year-old shrine of Muslim saint Hazrat Shah Jalal (died 1346) in Sylhet. According to legend, the saint, who came from Yemen to preach Islam, transformed the evil followers of the local king into fish. In an incident at the shrine in December 2003, 500 fish were poisoned in a pond. In May 2004, a new bomb blast killed two persons and injured dozens.

[Sources: “Bangladesh Shrine Bomb Kills Two”, BBC News (12 January 2004); AI, Report 2005 (2005) 51.]

In May 2004, Humayun Azad (?1947-2004), leading writer and professor of German literature at Dhaka University (see NCH #35, #37) returned home. In July, he received a series of death threats. On 25 July, an Islamic leader and member of parliament reportedly told a public meeting that Azad faced “dire consequences” for his writings. On 10 August, Azad died, possibly from a heart attack.

[Sources: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 51; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 32.]

On 20 October 2004, a court in Dhaka gave its verdict in the trial of eleven men accused of killing four Awami League leaders in Dhaka Central Jail in November 1975. Three were sentenced to death in absentia; another three - already sentenced to death for the killing of President Sheikh Mujibur Rahman in August 1975 - were given life imprisonment; five were acquitted. The Awami League claimed that the acquittals were politically motivated. (See NCH #23.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 52.]

BELARUS

On 7 April 2004, the Belarussian cinema and video licensing board banned Mysterium Occupation, a film directed by Andrei Kudinenko (?1972-) and made in the independent studio Navigator. A film about Belarussian partisans in World War II showing life under the Nazi occupation and subsequent Soviet liberation, it was censored because “[t]he treatment of the partisan movement in this film contradicts the essential truth, can insult the feelings of war veterans and have a negative influence on the upbringing of the rising generation and youth.” The board had already banned an American series about Adolf Hitler’s life.

[Source: A. Malpas, “Partisan War”, The Moscow Times, 18 June 2004: 107.]

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

See also Congo (Democratic Republic).

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

Impunity for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during the 1992-95 war continued to be widespread. Thousands of “disappearances” were still unresolved. While perpetrators of wartime violations continued to enjoy impunity, victims and their families were denied access to justice and redress. Lack of cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), particularly by the Republika Srpska (RS), was a major obstacle to justice. According to data from the Red Cross, almost 17,000 persons who went missing during the conflict are still unaccounted for. Many of them “disappeared” after being taken into custody by the military and security forces; those responsible have continued to enjoy impunity. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 58, 59.]

On 21 March 2004, a bomb was thrown at a mosque in Orahova, near Gradiska, in the Bosnian-Serb ruled part of the country. It was the anniversary of the day in 1993 when the original mosque was destroyed. The mosque was rebuilt and reopened in 2003 as Bosnian Muslims expelled during the Balkan wars returned to their own homes.

[Source: IOC 4/04: 130.]

On 19 April 2004, the ICTY Appeals Chamber confirmed that in July 1995 Serb forces had committed genocide in Srebrenica. The Appeals Chamber sentenced Bosnian Serb Army General Radislav Krstic to 35 years' imprisonment for aiding and abetting genocide. An ICTY trial chamber in the case of Bosnian Serb Radoslav Brdjanin, however, found that no genocide had occurred in 1992 in the Krajina area, where Serb forces killed hundreds of Muslim and Croat civilians and expelled hundreds of thousands. On 15 October 2004, the Republika Srpska (RS) Commission on Srebrenica submitted to the RS government a report concerning Srebrenica and acknowledged for the first time that the Bosnian Serb Army had been responsible for the killing of 7,800 Bosnian Muslim men and boys after the fall of Srebrenica in July 1995. The Commission identified the location of mass graves, some of which were previously unknown. By the end of 2004, the bodies of approximately 1,300 people killed after the fall of Srebrenica had been exhumed and identified. RS authorities had previously claimed that only one hundred Bosnian Muslim had been executed and that another 1,900 had died in combat or from exhaustion. In November the RS government apologized for the first time for the human rights violations in and around Srebrenica. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 359-62; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 58-59.]

See also Serbia and Montenegro.

BRAZIL

In response to a photograph published in a national newspaper in October 2004, the army released a statement defending the repressive actions of the 1964-85 military regime, stating that it had laid the foundations for a democratic Brazil. Although the statement was later withdrawn, the subsequent uproar led to the resignation of the Minister of Defense. No military officers resigned.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 63.]

In December 2004, the Supreme Court ordered the federal government to open files on the military operations against armed opposition groups in the region of Araguaia, state of Pará, in the early 1970s (during the military dictatorship). These may enable relatives finally to locate the bodies of victims of military actions.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 20, 60, 63.]

See also Paraguay.

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

BURKINA FASO

No progress was reported in the investigation into the alleged extrajudicial executions of 106 people between October 2001 and January 2002. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 66.]

BURUNDI

In 2004, trials continued of people accused of participating in the violence which followed the 1993 assassination of former President Melchior Ndadaye.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 68.]

At the request of the United Nations Security Council, an assessment was made of the feasibility of establishing an International Judicial Commission of Inquiry in Burundi, as outlined in the 2000 Arusha peace agreement. Such an inquiry would investigate and determine responsibility for crimes under international law committed between 1962 and 2000. At the same time, legislation establishing a National Truth and Reconciliation Commission (NTRC) was adopted by the National Assembly and Senate. Concern was expressed that the law did not provide mechanisms to protect the independence of commission members, and that lack of clarity over the roles of the NTRC and the international commission could jeopardize the work of both.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 16, 68.]

CAMBODIA

In 2004, after seven years of negotiations, Cambodia approved an agreement with the United Nations to establish an internationally-assisted tribunal under Cambodian law to try senior leaders of the Khmer Rouge and those who were most responsible for genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity committed while the Khmer Rouge was in power (1975-79). Based in Cambodia, this “mixed tribunal” will be comprised of a majority of Cambodian judges working alongside international judges, with Cambodian and international co-prosecutors. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 255, 257-58; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 70.]

CANADA

In February 2003, Canadian Holocaust denier Ernst Zündel (?1940-) was deported from the United States to Canada in the wake of charges of anti-Semitism and demands for the censorship of his website. On 21 January 2004, he was imprisoned after Canadian security services considered him as a threat to national security. On 22 September 2004, he was sentenced to a further six months' imprisonment.

[Source: IOC 1/05: 94.]

In November 2004, Iranian-born Seyed Mahmoud Namini was reportedly detained in Toronto after being found in possession of several copies of a book about a Kurdish revolt against the Iranian Islamic regime during the 1980s. He was questioned about his alleged links to Kurdish separatist organizations in the Middle East.

[Source: IOC 1/05: 94.]

CHAD

No formal charges had yet been brought in Chad against people suspected of committing human rights violations and other crimes during the presidency of Hissene Habré (1982-1990) despite judicial investigations. It was unclear whether there was any progress in the investigations. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 74, 75.]

CHILE

In January 2004, the Santiago Appeals Court upheld the conviction of General Manuel Contreras, former head of the Directorate of National Intelligence (DINA), the secret police during the dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet (1973-90), for the 1975 "disappearance" of a detainee. In November, the Supreme Court dismissed a final appeal against the conviction, ruling that the crime of kidnapping was not covered by an amnesty law enacted by the military government in 1978. In recent years, the courts have deemed the 1978 amnesty to be inapplicable in "disappearance" cases since a "disappearance" must be considered a kidnapping - an ongoing crime - unless the victim's remains have been found and the courts have thereby established his or her death. The lawyer representing the State Defense Council had argued that cases of "disappearance" should be treated as murder rather than "permanent kidnapping”. Treating “disappearance” as murder would have allowed the Amnesty Law to be applied. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 197-98; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 76.]

In May 2004, the Santiago Appeals Court stripped Pinochet of his immunity as a former head of state, allowing him to face trial for the “disappearance” of twenty people in the 1970s. The Supreme Court narrowly affirmed the decision in August. The crimes formed part of “Operation Condor” (see Argentina). As of December 2004, the investigating judge in the case was assessing reports on Pinochet’s medical condition before deciding whether to indict him. On 13 December, a judge ordered the indictment and house arrest of Pinochet on nine counts of kidnapping and one of murder. On 20 December, the Santiago Appeals Court upheld the order. The lawyers representing Pinochet appealed to the Supreme Court, which had not ruled by the end of 2004. It is the third time that the Chilean courts have cleared the way for Pinochet to be prosecuted for human rights violations. Pinochet also faces a criminal investigation and a tax office probe after a United States Senate investigation revealed in July 2004 that a bank in Washington D.C. held millions of dollars in secret deposits for Pinochet while he was in detention on human rights charges in London. (See NCH #32.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 198; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 20, 76.]

On 28 November 2004, President Ricardo Lagos presented on television the report of the National Commission on Political Imprisonment and Torture (Comisión Nacional sobre Prisión Política y Tortura), established in 2003. The report was based on testimonies from 35,000 people, many of whom had never testified before about the abuses they had suffered. It concluded that torture had been a systematic state practice and recommended various reparation measures. Human Rights Watch criticized the government’s decision to keep the testimonies secret for fifty years, and urged that it send information about alleged perpetrators to the courts for investigation. The report prompted a national debate in the news media. Prior to the report’s release, the army’s chief commander acknowledged for the first time the army’s institutional responsibility for human rights violations during military rule. Until his statement, the army’s position had always been that human rights violations were solely the responsibility of individual officers. The other branches of the armed forces accepted the findings of the report, but insisted that responsibility for the abuses was individual rather than institutional. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 198-99.]

See also Argentina.

CHINA

On 2 May 2004, freelance journalist Liu Shui was sentenced without trial to two years' re-education camp. Charged with soliciting the services of prostitutes, he had posted numerous articles on the Internet concerning the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre.

[Source: IOC 3/04: 102.]

On 1 June 2004, when Jiang Yanyong (see NCH #37) traveled to the United States embassy to apply for a visa to visit his daughter in California, he was arrested by military and security officials, officially because he had violated regulations regarding military discipline. On 19 July 2004, he was released but remained under house arrest. During his six-week detention, he underwent "thought reform". On 23 March 2005, the house arrest was lifted.

[Sources: AAAS Human Rights Action Network, CH0407.Jia, 14 July 2004; HRW, "China: Whistleblowing Doctor Home but Not Free" (WWW-text, Washington 21 July 2004); HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 264.]

Fifteen years after the 4 June 1989 Tiananmen massacre, the government still banned any public commemoration of the event. Police harassed and detained those dedicated to securing rehabilitation of victims, payment of compensation, or reconsideration of the official verdict. Chinese authorities placed several human rights activists, including Ding Zilin (see NCH #37), leader of the Tiananmen Mothers, under house arrest and harassed them in order to prevent them from commemorating the anniversary and from filing a legal complaint on behalf of 126 others who also lost relatives in 1989.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 263-64; IOC 3/04: 102, 104; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 77.]

The book Days of Old Do Not Disappear Like Smoke, a memoir about intellectuals purged during the Anti-Rightist Campaign (June 1957 until 1958), written by Zhang Yihe, the daughter of one of them, was banned. It continued to be circulated in pirate copy. The unabridged version, titled The Last Aristocrats, was later published in Hong Kong.

[Sources: Independent Chinese PEN Center, "Zhang Yihe Receives the ICPC Second Freedom to Write Award" (WWW-text; Beijing 31 October 2004); IOC 1/05: 95.]

In October 2004, it was reported that the book Xizang Biji (Tibet Journal) (2003), a collection of essays on Tibetan history and culture written in Chinese by the Tibetan (female) writer Wei Se, was banned for its positive references to the exiled Tibetan leader the Dalai Lama. Wei Se was reportedly dismissed, evicted from her home, and barred from leaving the country.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 39.]

On 24 November 2004, journalist and poet Shi Tao (?1986-) was arrested in Taiyuan, Shanxi, northeastern China, and on 28 January 2005 charged with “illegally exposing state secrets abroad” for posting an official document and articles relating to the June 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre on foreign websites and discussion forums. He faced a sentence of between three years’ and life imprisonment if convicted. In April 2004, Shi had pseudonymously sent the dissident online newspaper Min Zhu Ton Xun an internal official note warning journalists of the dangers of social destabilisation on the occasion of the 15th anniversary of the massacre. State Security Ministry agents identified him with the help of filters installed on the Chinese Internet. The ministry told the prosecutor that the document was “jue mi” (top secret). Shi acknowledged that he had sent the document, but disputed its confidential nature.

[Source: Ifex Alert (7 and 16 December 2004, 4 February 2005).]

On 4 December 2004, Ouyang Yi (see NCH #37) was released after he had served his sentence. In 2003, the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention had called Ouyang’s detention arbitrary.

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 38; United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, Report (E/CN.4/2004/3; Geneva 15 December 2003) 7.]

The death and funeral of former Prime Minister (1980-87) and Secretary-General of the Chinese Communist Party (1987-89) Zhao Ziyang (1919-2005), deposed in 1989 for opposing force to crush the Tiananmen student demonstrations and under house arrest until his death, were censored in various ways: for some days, the main news bulletins did not mention his death on 17 January, reflecting government concern that his death spark unrest and dissent (as Hu Yaobang’s death in April 1989 had done); on 23 January, former student leader Zhao Xin was arrested when he asked permission for a public commemoration march. Access to Zhao’s funeral and cremation at the Babaoshan Cemetery for Revolutionaries on 29 January was very restricted; his former chief of staff Bao Tong and groups of peasants were refused entry. Wreath texts were controlled and, against Chinese tradition, the family was forbidden to hold a funeral oration. Some twenty demonstrators were prevented from unfurling banners and dissident Ding Zilin (see item above) was placed under house arrest.

[Sources: Keesing’s Record of World Events, January 2005; Keesings historisch archief, 2001: 116-17, 2004: 498; 2005: 107-8.]

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

In October 2004, the International Criminal Court (ICC) and the government signed a cooperation agreement allowing the ICC to begin investigations into war crimes and crimes against humanity committed within the country. ICC investigators visited Ituri, where initial ICC inquiries were concentrated.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 15, 85.]

On 3 February 2005, a six-metre (19.5-foot) statue of the Belgian King Leopold II (1835-1909) was re-erected after it had been removed on the orders of President Joseph Mobutu in 1967. It was taken down just hours later, reportedly because several ministers opposed having a memorial to a man who had exploited Congo's resources and contributed to millions of deaths, when he was the sovereign of the Congo Free State (1885-1908).

[Source: BBC News Online, 4 February 2005.]

See also Congo (Republic).

CONGO (Republic)

In a case lodged in a French court in 2001, senior Congolese officials were accused of responsibility for the May 1999 "disappearance" of at least 353 refugees returning from the neighboring Democratic Republic of the Congo. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 86.]

CROATIA

It was reported that Orthodox churches were frequently desecrated with fascist Ustasha symbols [As allies of Nazi Germany, the Ustashes established the Ustasha Independent State of Croatia in 1941-45].

[Source: IOC 4/04: 134.]

According to official data, approximately 1,200 people who went missing during the 1991-95 conflict remained unaccounted for. This figure did not include the hundreds of people - mostly Croatian Serbs - missing since “Operation Storm” and “Operation Flash” in 1995. Efforts by the Croatian authorities to clarify the fate and whereabouts of missing Croatian Serbs were generally insufficient, leading to considerable delays in the identification process. Many of those missing were believed to be victims of “disappearances”; most of those responsible continued to enjoy impunity. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 90.]

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

CYPRUS

In August 2004, the Committee for Missing Persons reconvened after five years in an attempt to discover the fate of about 2,000 people missing during ethnic strife in Cyprus since 1963.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 92.]

A Greek Cypriot history textbook which contained an illustration showing Greek Cypriots sitting before their huts in Ottoman times and wearing fezzes was deemed “too Turkish” by the authorities; after the illustration was retouched, the fezzes had disappeared.

[Source: Informationen Georg-Eckert Institut, no. 48, December 2004: 18.]

See also Greece.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #17 (2000).

EAST TIMOR

See Timor-Leste.

ECUADOR

On 5 March 2005, historian Enrique Ayala Mora (1950-), rector of the Ecuadorian branch of the Universidad Andina Simón Bolívar (1997-) and socialist member of parliament (2003-), was shot at while driving his car home after a political meeting in Quito. He was injured. Although his party belonged to the majority, his recent criticism of government policy was believed to have been the reason for the assault. According to a government source, Ayala had staged the assault himself.

[Source: “Atentan contra Enrique Ayala Mora,” La Hora (Ecuador), 8 March 2005.]

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

EL SALVADOR

The government persisted in its stance not to prosecute perpetrators of human rights violations during the 1980-1991 armed conflict, as it would reopen the wounds of the past. This was despite recommendations by the United Nations Truth Commission and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights that the violations should be investigated. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 99.]

In September 2004, a judge in California, USA, held Alvaro Saravia, a former captain in the Salvadorean army now resident in California, responsible for the assassination of Archbishop Oscar Romero in March 1980 in San Salvador. The judge said that it was a “crime against humanity”. Alvaro Saravia was ordered, in absentia, to pay US $10 million in compensatory damages to a relative of the archbishop. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 99.]

ETHIOPIA

Thirteen years after the overthrow of the former military government (the Dergue, 1974-90), over 2,000 of its former officials remain imprisoned without trial on charges including genocide. Of those tried, many had been acquitted, some after more than a decade of imprisonment. The loss of evidence over the years resulted in some acquittals, but also made it more difficult to present an effective defense. Former dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam, on trial in absentia, remains a guest of the Robert Mugabe government in Zimbabwe, with little chance of being held accountable for his abuses so long as he remains there. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 129-30; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 106.]

EUROPEAN UNION

On 27 January 2005, the European Parliament adopted a resolution on remembrance of the Holocaust, anti-Semitism and racism, in which it stated: “The European Parliament, ... [p]ays homage to all the victims of the Nazis and is convinced that lasting peace in Europe must be based on remembrance of its history; rejects and condemns revisionist views and denial of the Holocaust as shameful and contrary to historical truth...”.

[Source: European Parliament, <http://www.europarl.eu.int/>]

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

FRANCE

On 31 January and 1 February 1997, France Info (a station controlled by the national radio broadcasting company Radio France) broadcast 63 news flashes and bulletins on an article published in the weekly magazine Le Point which claimed that Michel Junot—a deputy to Jacques Chirac at the Paris town hall (1977–95) who had been Deputy Prefect at Pithiviers in 1942 and 1943—had supervised the deportation of a thousand Jews from two internment camps under his responsibility. In a defamation case, Michel Boyon (1946–), Radio France’s editorial director, and Bertrand Gallicher (1957–), a journalist with France Info, were convicted of publicly defaming a civil servant (Junot) and ordered to pay a fine and damages. Radio France was ordered to broadcast an announcement of the judgment. In June 1998, the Paris Court of Appeal upheld the judgment. It considered that by alleging that Junot had supervised the deportation and transfer to Drancy, by comparing his situation with that of Maurice Papon (who had been committed for trial before the Bordeaux Assize Court), and by suggesting that he had not been a member of the Resistance, the disputed broadcasts had damaged his honor and dignity. On 30 March 2004, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that Radio France's right to freedom of expression was not infringed by the penalties and orders imposed on them by the French courts to protect Junot's reputation. The Court noted that, although the broadcast concerned an issue of general interest, namely the attitude of senior civil servants during the Occupation (such as Junot and Maurice Papon), and although they had quoted explicitly from the well-documented Le Point article, they had alleged that Junot had admitted "having organized the departure of a convoy of deportees to Drancy", an allegation not published in Le Point. The original bulletin was broadcast several times, although subsequent broadcasts pointed out that Junot denied the allegations. The court found that Gallicher had not shown the utmost caution and special moderation needed in this case.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Affaire Radio France et autres c. France: Arrêt (WWW-text; Strasbourg 30 March 2004).]

On 2 April 1998 a Paris judge ruled that journalist and historian Gérard Chauvy (1952–) and his publisher Albin Michel were guilty of "public defamation" because in his book Aubrac, Lyon 1943 (Paris 1997) Chauvy had reproduced as an appendix a document called "Klaus Barbie's Testament", in which Barbie, wartime Gestapo chief at Lyon, suggested that resistance army fighters Raymond and Lucie Aubrac had betrayed resistance leader Jean Moulin in June 1943, leading to Moulin's arrest and death after torture. Although Chauvy had written in his conclusion that no archival document proved the alleged betrayal and declared that he had acted in good faith, the judge said that Chauvy, by publishing the document and citing it at least 44 times, had given it excessive weight and that he had not been prudent enough in applying the historical method. The court ordered Chauvy to pay damages, to publish a statement in five daily newspapers and to insert a warning in each copy of the book. The judgment was confirmed on appeal in 1999 and in cassation in 2000. On 29 June 2004, the European Court of Human Rights unanimously ruled that the French courts had intervened correctly and not violated Chauvy's freedom of expression.

[Sources: J.-N. Jeanneney, Le Passé dans le prétoire: l'historien, le juge et le journaliste (Paris 1998) 114–18; J.-P. Azéma & G. Kiejman, "L' Histoire au Tribunal", Le Débat, November-December 1998: 45–51; "L'Affaire Aubrac: vérité et mensonges," L'Histoire, June 1997, 78–85; F. Hartog, 'L'Historien et la conjoncture historiographique,' Le Débat, November–December 1998, 6–7; Le Monde, 15 October 1991, 11; R. Evans, "History, Memory, and the Law: The Historian as Expert Witness", History and Theory, October 2002, 338–40; European Court of Human Rights, Case of Chauvy and others vs. France: Judgment (WWW-text; Strasbourg 29 June 2004).

A 9 April 2004 amendment to a January bill on the digital economy removed a statute of limitations that allow plaintiffs to sue websites for defamation years after first publication. According to some parliamentarians, the change was designed to prevent archives holding such material from circumventing the defamation laws.

[Source: IOC 2/04: 128; IOC 3/04: 108.]

In December 2004, the Court of Cassation rejected the appeal lodged by General Paul Aussaresses following his conviction on a charge of “justifying torture”. His memoirs, published in 2001, described acts of torture and summary executions by French army officers in Algeria in the 1950s, and maintained that they had been necessary. In April 2003 the Court of Appeal of Paris had fined him 7,500 Euros and his editors, Plon, 15,000 Euros. The Court of Cassation upheld the prosecution view that freedom of expression should not be confused with the right to say “anything anyhow”. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 110.]

See also Algeria, Congo (Republic).

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See also Argentina, Turkey.

GHANA

The National Reconciliation Commission (NRC) ended its hearings in July 2004. Established by the government in 2002, its task was to compile a record of human rights violations committed during Ghana’s periods of unconstitutional rule since independence in 1957. Most of the witnesses were victims of human rights violations under the military governments headed by former President Jerry Rawlings (1979, 1981-2001). Many of the more than 2,000 testimonies spoke of summary executions, “disappearances”, torture and ill-treatment. The NRC’s report and recommendations were submitted to President Kufuor on 12 October but had not been made public by the end of 2004. The recommendations reportedly included reparations for about 3,000 victims and reforms of institutions including the security agencies. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 114-15.]

GREECE

On 3 May 2004, Greek state television ET-3 canceled the scheduled showing of the award-winning documentary “The Other Side” (produced by journalist Fani Toupalgiki for ET-3), which presented the events of 1963-74 and the build-up to the 1974 partition of Cyprus from a Turkish-Cypriot perspective. The documentary was reportedly seen as “anti-national” and “dangerous”. Its cancellation was allegedly the result of an intervention from the prime minister’s office, possibly in connection with the forthcoming visit of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan to Greece. In January 2004, ET-3 had withdrawn its participation as co-producer of a documentary on a convicted war criminal.

[Sources: Greek Helsinki Monitor, Ifex Alert (4 and 7 May 2004); IOC 3/04: 108-9.]

GUATEMALA

In 2003 and 2004, staff of the nongovernmental human rights organization Dónde están los niños y las niñas? (Where are the children?) were repeatedly threatened and assaulted. In March 2003 and March 2004, director María Isabel Escobar Donis was assaulted. The organization investigated cases of children who “disappeared” or were “adopted” after being forcibly separated from their families during the civil war (1960-96). In April 2004, case files about the involvement of military officials in this operation were stolen from the organization’s offices in the capital.

[Source: AI, Guatemala: Dónde están los niños y las niñas? (WWW-text; 2004).]

Of the 626 massacres documented by the 1999 truth commission, only one case had been successfully prosecuted in the Guatemalan courts (the 1995 Xamán massacre). The Inter-American Court of Human Rights ordered the Guatemalan state to pay compensation to victims’ relatives in a number of prominent cases of past human rights violations for which the state had recognized its responsibility. In a landmark ruling in April 2004, the Court found the Guatemalan state responsible for the massacre of 268 people in Plan de Sánchez, Rabinal, Baja Verapaz, in 1982. (See NCH #14, #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 213-14, 217; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 118.]

Throughout 2004, former members of the Civil Defense Patrols pressured Congress, including by the use of threats, to pay them compensation for services rendered during the civil war (1960-96). Congress agreed in August, despite a June ruling by the Constitutional Court that such payments would be unconstitutional. During the conflict, which ended in 1996, members of the Civil Defense Patrols were implicated in hundreds of cases of human rights violations. Very few have ever been brought to justice. In August 2004, the Constitutional Court delivered its opinion on the creation of a United Nations-backed Commission for the Investigation of Illegal Bodies and Clandestine Security Apparatus, which had been approved by the previous government. It stated that significant parts of such a commission would be unconstitutional. The government announced it would present alternatives to carry the process forward. By the end of 2004 discussions were still ongoing.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 117.]

Human rights activists, witnesses and members of the judiciary involved in investigations of past human rights violations were subjected to persistent intimidation, death threats and attacks.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 118.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999).

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #6 (1997).

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

INDIA

In April 2004, women members of the Association of the Parents of Disappeared Persons were beaten by police when they demonstrated in Srinagar against continuing impunity for those responsible for “disappearances” in the state of Jammu and Kashmir. While the state admitted in 2003 that 3,744 persons had “disappeared” since insurgency began in 1989, human rights activists believed the true figure to be over 8,000. No one had been convicted by the end of 2004.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 127.]

In 2004, large-scale episodes of communal violence remained unpunished. This continued to foster communal resentments throughout India. In August 2004, the Supreme Court issued a key decision in connection with communal violence in Gujarat state in 2002. The violence followed a fire on a train in which 59 Hindus died in February 2002; right-wing Hindu groups blamed the fire on local Muslims. In the ensuing violence more than 2,000 people, mostly Muslims, were killed. The Court directed that more than 2,000 complaints closed by the police and some 200 cases which had ended in acquittals be reviewed. (See NCH #32.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 283-84; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 127.]

In Punjab the vast majority of police officers responsible for serious human rights violations during the period of militancy in the mid-1990s continued to evade justice. In response to 2,097 reported cases of human rights violations, the National Human Rights Commission had ordered the state of Punjab to provide compensation in 109 cases concerning people who had been in police custody prior to their death. 2004 marked the twentieth anniversary of Operation Blue Star - a focal point in the conflict between Sikh nationalists and state security apparatus in the Punjab in the 1980s - and of the anti-Sikh riots in New Delhi, which resulted in more than 3,000 Sikh deaths. In July 2004, the Nanavati Commission of inquiry served former Prime Minister Narasimha Rao, who was home minister in the Congress Party government in 1984, a notice for his failure to act to prevent the attacks on Sikhs. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 284; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 127.]

See also Iran.

INDONESIA

A law passed in September 2004 provided for the establishment of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission to resolve, outside the court system, cases involving grave human rights violations committed prior to the enactment of the Law on Human Rights Courts (2000). The Commission can conduct investigations, grant reparations to victims and recommend presidential amnesties.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 131.]

Trials for the 1984 killing of Muslim protesters by Indonesian security forces at Tanjung Priok in Jakarta finished with lenient verdicts amid ongoing reports of political interference and witness intimidation. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 290-91; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 130.]

By the end of 2004, only one person remained convicted for crimes against humanity committed in Timor-Leste in 1999. Indonesia also continued to refuse to transfer to Timor-Leste 303 people indicted by the Timor-Leste Prosecutor General. They included former General Wiranto who headed the Indonesian armed forces in 1999. Wiranto had also not faced trial in Indonesia for his role in the violence of 1999. Although named as a suspect by Komnas HAM (the National Human Rights Commission), he was never indicted by the Attorney General's Office and ran as a candidate in the presidential elections of May 2004, finishing third.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 130.]

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

All cemeteries, holy places and community properties of the Bahai Faith, Iran's largest religious minority, were seized soon after the 1979 revolution. Many were destroyed, including the house of the prophet Bab, in Shiraz, the house of Bahauallah, the nineteenth-century founder of Bahai Faith, in Takur, and the Bahai cemetery in Shiraz. In 1993 more than 15,000 graves of the Bahai cemetery in Tehran were bulldozed. In Babol, between February and April 2004, the gravesite of Bab's foremost disciple, Muhammad-Ali Barfurushi, known as Quddus, was demolished. In June 2004 the house of Bahauallah's father was destroyed in Tehran.

[Sources: IOC 4/04: 138; Baha'is Decry Cultural Cleansing in Iran (WWW-text; New York 12 September 2004).]

In May 2004, many Zoroastrians made their annual pilgrimage to the temple of Chak-Chak near Yazd. Although Zoroastrianism, a monotheistic religion founded in the seventh century BCE by the prophet Zarathustra, is a permitted faith, many of its rituals are banned and many believers have emigrated to join coreligionists among India's Parsi community. Since 1979, their numbers have halved.

[Source: IOC 4/04: 138.]

On 20 July 2004, a Tehran court sentenced historian Hashem Aghajari (see NCH #37) to three years' imprisonment and a further two years suspended, this time for insulting sacred Islamic tenets. On 31 July, after almost two years' imprisonment, he was released on bail. On 10 March 2005, an appeals court ruled that the twenty-three months he had already served in prison were adequate punishment for the speech and removed an order that he be deprived of civil rights for five years, including a ban on his teaching and writing.

[Sources: AAAS Human Rights Action Network, IR0219-agh, 30 June, 22 July 2004; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 133; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 72; IOC 2/04: 131; IOC 3/04: 112; IOC 4/04: 66; "Iran Appeals Court Further Eases Aghajari's Sentence" (WWW-text; Al Jazeera 2005).]

On 6 February 2005, Hojatoleslam Hassan Youssefi Eshkevari (see NCH #32) was released.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 70.]

See also Canada.

IRAQ

In the weeks before the overthrow of the Iraqi government by the U.S.-led coalition forces in March-April 2003, former Iraqi government officials shredded, burned, or otherwise destroyed many documents. They also removed many sensitive documents for safekeeping which they had to abandon as military defeat became imminent. Countless other records were destroyed as a result of the wartime aerial bombing campaign. Widespread looting and destruction of government property in the weeks after the war led to further destruction of documents. US-led coalition forces, Iraqi opposition groups, and individuals seized hundreds of thousands of Iraqi state documents from government ministries, archives of the Baath Party and organizations affiliated to it, archives of the intelligence and security agencies, and archives of the armed forces and paramilitary groups in cities across Iraq. An unknown number of documents was offered for sale. Millions of documents nevertheless remained intact as sources of information about the practices of the Saddam Hussein government. Together with the forensic evidence from 259 mass graves and witness testimonies, the documentary evidence would serve as the basis for prosecuting former Baathist officials. The Saddam Hussein government had recorded the repression of the Iraqi population by its security and intelligence services in great detail over the years. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: HRW, Iraq: State of the Evidence (Vol. 6, no. 7; Washington November 2004) 4-14.]

Iraq continued to face the legacy of more than two decades of authoritarian rule by former President Saddam Hussein and his Baathist government (1979-2003). The legacy included crimes against humanity, war crimes, and genocide that have long gone unpunished. Many of the victims had been Kurds (an ethnic minority) and Shia (the religion of the Iraqi majority). Government policies and comprehensive economic sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council left Iraq's infrastructure and economy devastated. The Statute of the Iraq Special Tribunal (IST), promulgated under the Coalition Provisional Authority by the Iraqi Governing Council in December 2003, contained substantive and procedural shortcomings that could undermine IST's legitimacy and the fairness of future trials. On 1 July 2004, Saddam Hussein and eleven senior members of his government appeared before the Iraqi Central Criminal Court (and not the IST) and they were charged with crimes punishable under Iraqi legislation. However, defense counsel was not made available to the accused. At the end of 2004, Iraqi judicial authorities were still finalizing the rules of procedures and evidence for the IST. Twenty-one judges and prosecutors were reportedly selected as IST members. In December, Ali Hassan al-Majid, a former General and loyal relative of Saddam Hussein, and Sultan Hashem Ahmad, the former Defense Minister, appeared before an investigative judge for a pre-trial hearing. Charges against them reportedly included involvement in the 1988 gassing of Kurds in Halabja and the crushing of the Kurdish and Shia uprising in March 1991. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 467, 471; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 137.]

See also Kuwait, Syria, United States.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

IVORY COAST

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

JAPAN

The issue of reparations for former “comfort women” -- some 200,000 women forced into sexual slavery during World War II -- remained unresolved. In February 2004, Tokyo’s High Court rejected compensation claims by seven Taiwanese former “comfort women”. The women claimed that they had been victims of systematic sexual abuse by the Japanese Imperial Army and suffered discrimination after the war. They had demanded compensation and an official apology from the Japanese government. There were originally nine plaintiffs, but two died during the case. (See NCH #37; see also item below.) [Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 147.]

In January 2001, Abe Shinzo and Nakagawa Shoichi, two Liberal Democratic Party politicians who were close to Prime Minister Koizumi Junichiro and who were members of the parliamentary group “Diet Members Association to Think about the Future of Japan and History Education”, had reportedly pressured the public television network NHK to censor a 40-minute documentary about “comfort women” (part two of a series entitled “How To Judge Wars”), broadcast on 30 January 2001. Footage of an elderly female survivor and a former Japanese soldier giving testimony at a “civil tribunal” over Japan’s wartime sexual slavery (the Women’s International War Crimes Tribunal, held in Tokyo in December 2000, at which sixty-four surviving elderly victims of the slavery system testified before an international team of prosecutors and judges) were cut, as was the tribunal’s “verdict” in which the late Emperor Hirohito was found guilty of permitting the sexual slavery. Air time was given to historian Hata Ikuhiko, an associate of the Tsukurukai (Association for New History Textbooks, established in 1997) who claimed that most “comfort women” had been willing prostitutes. The censorship process was completed hours before the broadcast. After the broadcast, the Japan-based Violence Against Women in War Network filed a defamation lawsuit, a case under appeal in 2005. In January 2005, the NHK president resigned following a series of scandals, including censorship of the program. Perhaps as many as 400,000 viewers withheld their subscription fees in protest. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: Washington Post, 26 January 2005 (NHK); G. McCormack, “How the History Wars in Japan Left a Black Mark on NHK TV (Their BBC)”, Japan Focus, (WWW-text; 7 February 2005).]

In a case of self-censorship, in September 2004, the comic Shueisha (Young Jump) censored its long running story by Manga artist Hiroshi Motomiya called Kuni Ga Moeru (The Country is Burning), following protests at episodes depicting the 1937 Nanking Massacre in which some 300,000 Chinese citizens were killed by Japanese invading forces. Many in Japan deny the massacres. Shueisha would republish the article in book form with ten pages deleted and eleven amended. A formal apology was published in the November issue.

[Source: IOC 1/05: 103.]

On 9 and 10 April 2005, a protest march with thousands of participants was organized in Beijing against the publication and use of a new history textbook which reportedly downplayed Japan’s atrocities in China during the Pacific War (1931-45), including the 1937 Nanking Massacre and the question of “comfort women”. The Japanese embassy was attacked, rallies were also held outside Beijing, and Japanese flags were burned. The unofficial history textbook was approved by a local education authority and was reportedly taken up by a small proportion of schools in Japan. (See also NCH #27.)

[Source: BBC News Online, 9-11 April 2005.]

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

KENYA

In September 2004, police used tear gas to disperse members of the Masaai community who were demonstrating over land they had lost in colonial times. Several protestors were arrested and one shot dead by police.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 150.]

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

KUWAIT

Diplomatic relations with Iraq were resumed in August. Kuwaiti forensic teams continued to inspect mass graves in Iraq. By the end of 2004, the total number of Kuwaiti prisoners of war whose remains had been identified had reached 190. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 154.]

In August 2004, the Ministry of Information announced that Fahrenheit 9/11, a film about the 11 September 2001 terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, New York, by American filmmaker Michael Moore, was banned. It was deemed defamatory mainly because it suggested secret economic ties between Saudi Arabia's royal family and the family of American President George W. Bush.

[Source: Keesings Historisch Archief, 2004: 752.]

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

See also Libya.

LIBERIA

Civil society expressed interest in prosecuting those responsible for atrocities during Liberia's fourteen year internal conflict (1990-2003). However, they maintained that the disarmament process had to be completed first and more security established before any such process could be initiated. The chairman of the National Transitional Government of Liberia (NTGL), Charles Gyude Bryant, and several ministers and high-level functionaries, themselves former commanders within a warring faction, opposed the trying of war criminals. The peace agreement made provision for the government to consider a general amnesty for those involved in military activities during the conflict. Although the government did not overtly pursue this option, its position remained ambiguous. A truth and reconciliation commission was mandated by the 2003 peace agreement and in January 2004, eight Liberians were appointed as commissioners by Bryant. Legislation to establish the commission was drafted but had yet to be passed. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 141; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 162.]

See also Sierra Leone.

LIBYA

In August 2004, an investigation was opened in Lebanon into the "disappearance" of Imam Musa Sadr - a prominent Shia cleric who "disappeared" with two others in 1978 in Libya - after his family filed a lawsuit before the Lebanese courts. Lawyers working on behalf of Imam Musa Sadr's family called for the indictment of 18 senior Libyan officials. The Lebanese Public Prosecutor summoned the officials for questioning in March 2005.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 166.]

The fate of many prisoners who were killed or "disappeared" in Abu Salim Prison in Tripoli in 1996 remained unknown. In February 2004, Colonel and head of state Mu'ammar al-Gaddafi told Amnesty International that there had been armed clashes between prisoners and guards. In April, Gaddafi affirmed the right of families to know what happened to their relatives during the incidents. However, by the end of 2004 no thorough, independent and impartial investigations were known to have been opened into deaths in custody in the past, including those that allegedly took place in Abu Salim Prison in 1996.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 166.]

LITHUANIA

In 2004, Lithuania's Jewish community argued that while most school textbooks accurately and fairly presented the Holocaust, some perpetuated unfavorable stereotypes of the Jewish community before World War II.

[Source: IOC 4/04: 142.]

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #14 (1999).

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

MEXICO

In 2001, President Fox had established a special prosecutor's office to investigate and prosecute past acts of political violence, including massacres of student protesters in 1968 and 1971, and the forced disappearance of hundreds of government opponents during the country's "dirty war" in the 1970s. For two years the office's progress was limited by insufficient cooperation from the military and inadequate access to government documents. But in November 2003, the special prosecutor won a landmark decision from the Mexican Supreme Court holding that statutes of limitations did not apply to old "disappearance" cases as long as the victims' bodies had not been found. He then obtained arrest warrants for several high-level officials and secured the arrests of two of them accused of participating in a forced disappearance in the 1970s. All the other suspects, however, managed to escape arrest. There were no exhumations, nor any indication that the special prosecutor had made progress uncovering the fate of hundreds of "disappeared" people or in providing Mexico with a comprehensive account of the crimes that took place. The indictment of former President Luis Echeverría was thrown out by a trial judge; the case is now before the Supreme Court. The Minister of Defense and other senior military figures publicly called for amnesty legislation to protect those accused of abuses. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 225-26; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 177.]

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

MOROCCO/WESTERN SAHARA

On 7 January 2004, an Equity and Reconciliation Commission was inaugurated by King Mohamed VI to "close the file on past human rights violations." One of its tasks was to complete payment of compensation to victims of "disappearances" and arbitrary detention that occurred between the 1950s and 1990s. By December the Commission had received requests for reparations concerning more than 16,000 victims. Another of its main tasks was to establish the fate of hundreds of people who "disappeared" in previous decades and, in the case of those who had died in detention, to locate their remains. During 2004, the Commission collected testimonies from relatives of the "disappeared" and began preparing a report, due in 2005, that would set out the reasons and institutional responsibilities for grave violations up to 1999. In December it began organizing public hearings, broadcast on radio and television, in which dozens of witnesses and victims would present their testimonies. However, the Commission's statutes excluded the identification of individual perpetrators and rejected criminal prosecutions, prompting the United Nations Human Rights Committee in November to express concern that no steps were planned to bring to justice those responsible for "disappearances". Some perpetrators were alleged to remain members or even high-ranking officials of the security forces.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 32, 180-81.]

The Polisario Front freed 200 Moroccan prisoners of war whom it had captured between 1975 and 1991 and detained ever since in its camps near Tindouf, south-western Algeria. They were then repatriated under the auspices of the Red Cross. However, 412 remained in detention at the end of 2004. The Polisario Front was obliged to release the prisoners without delay after the end of armed hostilities in 1991 following a ceasefire brokered by the United Nations.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 182.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

On 18 November 2004, almost 4,000 prisoners were released; according to an unconfirmed report U Myo Htun (see NCH #9, 10) was among them.

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 42; IOC 1/05: 94]

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #2 (1995).

NETHERLANDS

In March 2005, historian Jan Herman [=Hans] Brinks (1957-) complained to the European Court of Human Rights that his right to privacy was violated because, despite changed circumstances after the end of the Cold War, he was only granted limited access to outdated information about him held by the Netherlands National Security Service (Binnenlandse Veiligheidsdienst; "BVD"; renamed General Intelligence and Security Service in 2002) that had been gathered at least since 1977. He also complained that his freedom of expression was violated as he found it impossible to secure suitable employment in the Netherlands despite his holding a magna cum laude doctorate degree from the University of Groningen obtained in 1991. He claimed that this was the result of BVD activities and of angry reactions to the often critical positions he had adopted in his academic and journalistic work. He subsequently worked as a researcher and journalist in Germany, the United States of America and the United Kingdom, but returned to the Netherlands in 1998. The information gathered probably referred to his political activity as a student, when he sympathized with the Rote Armee Fraction (Red Army Faction or Baader-Meinhof Gang) in 1977 and his stay in the German Democratic Republic (GDR) (1986–89) where he did free-lance journalistic work and research for a dissertation on East German historical writing. After his Freedom of Information request to the Minister of the Interior in January 2000, parts of six outdated BVD documents—material from a “foreign sister organization” (the West German security service)—were disclosed to him in a paraphrased form and concerned events of 1977–78. Between 2001 and 2004, all his subsequent objections and appeals to obtain more BVD information were refused. On 5 April 2005, the Court unanimously rejected his complaints. It noted that the information withheld from Brinks by the Minister was made available, with Brinks’s permission, to the Groningen Regional Court as well as to the Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State without that information being passed on to Brinks, in order to allow these tribunals to assess whether any information had been unjustly withheld by the Minister under the Freedom of Information Act (Wet Openbaarheid Bestuur). Both concluded that, apart from one document which was subsequently disclosed to Brinks, the Minister had taken a correct decision. The Court considered that the supervision of the regional court and of the jurisdiction division constituted an effective judicial control. It acknowledged as well that the Dutch State enjoyed a “margin of appreciation” when considering that the interests of national security (in withholding from Brinks information that might give an insight into BVD sources, working methods and current level of knowledge) prevailed over Brinks’s interests in being granted full access to any undisclosed information possibly held on him by the BVD. The Court also held that there was no indication that Brinks’s freedom of expression had not been respected.

[Sources: J.H. Brinks, Paradigms of Political Change: Luther, Frederick II, and Bismarck: The GDR on Its Way to German Unity (originally Dutch, 1991; Milwaukee, WI, 2001); European Court of Human Rights, “Decision as to the Admissibility of Application no. 9940/04 by Jan Herman Brinks against the Netherlands” (WWW-text; Strasbourg, 5 April 2005); Raad van State (Council of State) (Afdeling Bestuursrechtspraak), “Uitspraak op het hoger beroep van X [Jan Herman Brinks], wonend te Y [Groningen], zaaknummer 200301254/1” (14 January 2004).]

NEW ZEALAND

On 10 December 2004, Minister of Internal Affairs George Hawkins launched The New Zealand Censorship Database, giving online access to details of censorship decisions made since 1916. It provided information about every publication classified between 1963 and 1994 and included records of the Video Recordings Authority (1987-93) and records of the Chief Censor of Films dating back to 1916. Some of these older records are now held in handwritten form in a variety of books, binders, cards and cupboards.

[Source: IOC 1/05: 105-6.]

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

See also United States.

NIGERIA

In 2004, no-one was brought to justice for the massacre of hundreds of people by the military in Odi, Bayelsa state, in 1999, and in Benue state, in 2001. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 144; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 192.]

In May 2004, some newspaper vendors in the city of Aba were arrested for selling newspapers carrying stories on the secessionist state of Biafra (1967-70).

[Source: IOC 3/04: 116.]

The findings of the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission, known as the Oputa Panel, had still not been made public and the government had made no public statement about plans for implementing the recommendations by the end of 2004. Established in 1999 to investigate human rights violations committed between 1966 and the return to civilian rule in 1999, the Oputa Panel had reported the findings of its public hearings and investigations to President Olusegun Obasanjo in May 2002. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 192.]

Christian fundamentalists were urged to stop destroying relics from Nigeria's traditional tribal faiths. Some of the destroyed artifacts had been the focus of tribal devotions for four centuries.

[Source: IOC 4/04: 145.]

See also Liberia, Sierra Leone.

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

PARAGUAY

In July 2004, an Argentinean court issued an international warrant for the arrest of former President Alfredo Stroessner for his alleged involvement in human rights violations committed under “Operation Condor” (see Argentina). Stroessner, living in exile in Brazil, was also wanted by the Paraguayan courts in connection with “disappearances” and other human rights violations committed under his rule (1954-89). (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 20, 199.]

The Truth and Justice Commission, created in 2003 to examine human rights violations committed between 1954 and 2004, was established in August 2004. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 199.]

PERU

The government established a system of prosecutors’ offices and courts to investigate and try past human rights abuses. It also announced several initiatives to offer reparation to the victims of human rights abuses and their families and to assist development in areas affected by violence. However, by the end of 2004, very few people had received compensation. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 200.]

In August 2004, the Constitutional Court ruled that Peru's Constitution did not permit human rights violations committed by military personnel to be judged in military courts. The special prosecutor's office mandated to investigate 159 cases of "disappearance" under a friendly settlement with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, as well as 43 cases referred to it by Peru's truth commission, had filed charges in only five cases. Another prosecutor charged with investigating human rights violations committed during the government of President Alberto Fujimori (1990-2000) made greater progress. More than forty former agents of the Colina group - a death squad responsible for "disappearances" and extrajudicial executions in the early 1990s - were detained awaiting trial. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 228-29; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 200, 201.]

In August 2004, the Supreme Council of Military Justice confirmed the dismissal of the charges by a military court in 1994 of the former presidential adviser on intelligence, Vladimiro Montesinos; the former Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, Nicolás Hermoza Ríos; and of the retired General Luis Pérez Documet for their alleged involvement in the killing and "disappearance" of nine students and a teacher in 1992. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 201.]

Retrials began in the cases of scores of political prisoners after the Constitutional Court ruled in 2003 that life imprisonment and the use of military courts to try civilians were unconstitutional. Cases being retried included that of Abimael Guzmán, the former leader of the armed opposition group Shining Path. Hundreds of people were awaiting retrial. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 201.]

POLAND

On 10 September 1996, historian Irena Pieniazek (1957-), curator in the Gdynia City Museum, brought defamation charges against the museum director. In 1999 Pieniazek complained to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg that the length of the proceedings (which would last until March 2000) was unreasonable. On 28 September 2004, the Court held that this had indeed been the case.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Case of Pieniazek versus Poland: Judgment (WWW-text; Strasbourg, 28 September 2004).]

On 28 January 2005, unknown persons leaked an alphabetical list of 240,000 people kept on file by Poland's communist-era secret service Urząd Bezpieczeństwa from the state-run Institute of National Remembrance, Warsaw, onto the Internet. The list included former secret agents, informers, secret-service employees and victims of persecution. Journalist Bronisław Wildstein reportedly gained access to the names legally - available to historians, journalists, and others cleared for access - and admitted copying the list from the institute's archives to distribute it to his colleagues. He was dismissed from his paper Rzeczpospolita. He denied having posted the list on the Internet.

[Source: "Poland in Uproar over Leak of Spy Files", Guardian, 5 February 2005 (WWW-text).]

ROMANIA

In [October] 2004, poet and former dissident Mircea Dinescu and art historian and former government minister Andrei Plesu (1948-) resigned from the National Council for the Study of Securitate Archives (CNSAS) because they could not consult all the files of the Securitate (the Romanian security police in 1948–90) on Corneliu Vadim Tudor, former chief propagandist of Ceausescu, leader of the far-right political party PRM, and presidential candidate. CNSAS chairman and historian Gheorghe Onisoru declared that in the files there was no clear proof of Tudor's former collaboration with the Securitate. Tudor declared that he would sue Dinescu and Plesu for defamation. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: NRC Handelsblad, 9-10 October 2004: 4.]

RUSSIA

On 17 July 2004, journalist Pajl Pelojan [Payl Peloyan], from Armenian descent, was stabbed to death in Moscow, possibly for reasons connected to his work. He was the chief editor of Armyanskii Pereulok (Armenian Lane), a Russian-language arts and literature magazine that focused on Armenian history and culture. The magazine's last issue appeared on newsstands in early 2003.

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué, 20 July 2004; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 55.]

In 2004, Memorial, a historical society founded in 1987 to do research into the history of Stalinist repression and later also to investigate war crimes in Chechnya, was awarded the Right Livelihood Award, an alternative Nobel Peace Prize.

[Source: Memorial, Perpetuating the Memory of the Victims of Repression (WWW-text; Moscow [2004]).

RWANDA

On 7 April 2004, Rwanda commemorated the tenth anniversary of the 1994 genocide. Within Rwanda, 80,000 detainees awaited trial for their alleged participation in the genocide. Rwandese courts concluded fewer than 200 trials of genocide suspects in 2004. No executions were carried out. The nationwide establishment of the 8,140 gacaca jurisdictions - a community-based system of justice intended to try most genocide suspects - was delayed until 2005. The trial phase of the 746 gacaca jurisdictions in a pilot project which began in 2002 was similarly delayed. Gacaca was supposed to reduce the prison population, but persons confessing guilty had named tens of thousands of new suspects. Authorities estimate that another 500,000 to 600,000 persons may yet be accused, a number that raises questions about why so many persons waited until ten years after the 1994 crime to accuse suspected perpetrators. Authorities reformed the system in mid-2004, simplifying the procedure and reducing the number of judges for each jurisdiction. Gacaca jurisdictions were authorized to reopen cases of persons previously acquitted by the standard courts, thus violating the usual protection against double jeopardy. The gacaca system had no authority to consider war crimes committed by the ruling Rwandan Patriotic Front (RFP). Until late 2004, the government also opposed investigations of RFP crimes by the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in Arusha, Tanzania. Trials of leading genocide suspects continued at the ICTR which held 63 detainees at the end of 2004. The ICTR was working to a United Nations Security Council deadline to finish trials by the end of 2008 and appeals by 2010. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 152-54; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 212, 213.]

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

See also Kuwait.

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SERBIA AND MONTENEGRO

In 2004 in southern Serbia (a predominantly ethnic Albanian area bordering eastern Kosovo), the school curriculum reportedly continued to ignore Albanian culture and history.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 415.]

The government of Serbia and Montenegro was unwilling to cooperate fully with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) and efforts to prosecute war criminals before domestic courts were inadequate. Serbia and Montenegro's cooperation with the ICTY deteriorated after the December 2003 parliamentary elections and the establishment of a new Serbian government dominated by the nationalistic Democratic Party of Serbia. Serbian Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica openly opposed the arrests of suspects indicted by the ICTY, arguing that they should surrender voluntarily. In November 2004, ICTY President Theodor Meron reported to the United Nations General Assembly that apart from one case, Serbia and Montenegro had hardly at all cooperated with the ICTY. Similarly, ICTY Prosecutor Carla Del Ponte reported to the United Nations Security Council that Serbia was not willing to arrest those indicted, that networks supporting people accused were so powerful that they could interfere with judicial proceedings, and that both in Serbia and in Kosovo aggressive nationalistic rhetoric was being used against the ICTY and herself. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 412; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 218.]

In February 2004, the ICTY prosecution concluded its case against former President Slobodan Milosevic, who faced charges of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. The beginning of Milosevic's defense was frustrated by his refusal to cooperate with the lawyers assigned to him in September. In June 2004, ICTY rejected defense calls for the charge of genocide to be dropped. It ruled that there had been "a joint criminal enterprise" which had committed genocide in Brcko, Prijedor, Sanski Most, Srebrenica, Bijeljina, Kljuc and Bosanski Novi and that evidence implicated Milosevic in that joint criminal enterprise. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 416; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 58, 218.]

In February 2004, the trial began of Radomir Markovic, former head of Serbian state security, and other security officials accused of involvement in the murder of former Serbian President Ivan Stambolic in August 2000. The trial of those accused of involvement in the murder in March 2003 of Prime Minister Zoran Dindic continued. In May 2004, the prime suspect surrendered in Belgrade. In April the Serbian Minister of Internal Affairs called for a new inquiry into the assassination of Dindic.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 219.]

SIERRA LEONE

The United Nations-mandated Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), established to bring to justice persons who bear the greatest responsibility for atrocities during part of the war (1996-2001), indicted thirteen individuals, including former Liberian president Charles Taylor and former Sierra Leonean government minister Hinga Norman. In March 2004, the Appeals Chamber ruled that the general amnesty provided by the 1999 Lomé peace agreement and subsequently enacted in Sierra Leonean law did not apply to the SCSL and therefore did not prevent prosecution by it. The general amnesty, however, continued to prevent prosecutions for such crimes in Sierra Leonean courts. The first trials commenced in June 2004. In August 2003, Taylor had been offered a safe haven by the Nigerian government when rebels threatened to take the Liberian capital Monrovia. Nigeria refused to surrender Taylor to the SCSL. In May 2004, the Appeals Chamber ruled that Taylor, indicted for having actively supported the armed opposition, had no immunity from prosecution for crimes against humanity and war crimes by virtue of his status as a (former) head of state. Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo argued that he was acting in the interests of peace in Liberia. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 156-57; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 193, 221.]

In October 2004, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) released its final report. It had been established in 2000 to create an impartial historical record of human rights abuses committed during the conflict (1991-2001), provide a forum for victims and perpetrators to recount their experiences, and facilitate reconciliation. Among issues covered in the report were the years of bad governance, the endemic corruption, the brutal nature of the conflict, the role of external actors, and factors such as mineral resources which had fuelled the conflict. (See NCH #37.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 156-57; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 222.]

In October 2004, Paul Kamara, editor of the newspaper For di People, was convicted of seditious libel and sentenced to two concurrent two-year prison terms. In October 2003 the paper had claimed that a commission of inquiry in 1967 had “convicted” President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, then a ministerial official, of fraud.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 222.]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SPAIN

In his annual report in June 2004, the Spanish Ombudsman criticized the authorities' lack of response to individuals and associations attempting to exhume and identify remains from burial pits containing the bodies of some of the thousands killed during or after the Civil War (1936-39). In September the Spanish Council of Ministers approved a royal decree setting up an interministerial committee to investigate the "moral and legal rehabilitation" of thousands who had been victims of the Civil War and Franco dictatorship (1939-75). The committee began work in November. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 233.]

In the night of 16 to 17 March 2005, a statue of Franco was removed in Madrid after an official decree had stipulated that the symbols of the former dictatorship (1939-75) had to be removed. The only remaining statue of Franco, in Santander, was also scheduled for removal.

[Source: Keesings Historisch Archief, 2005: 210].

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #10 (1998).

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

SYRIA

In [March] 2004, at least 300 Kurds were reportedly arrested following unrest in the northeastern province where members of the Kurdish community were demonstrating to mark the anniversary of the March 1988 gas attack on the Iraqi town of Halabja (the Anfal campaign).

[Source: IOC 3/04: 122.]

On 15 April 2004, Aktham Naisse, member of the Committee for the Defense of Democratic Liberties and Human Rights in Syria, was arrested in Latakia after organizing a sit-in outside parliament in March to mark the 41st anniversary of the Baathist seizure of power (1963) and imposition of the state of emergency. At least thirty people were arrested at the time of the demonstration.

[Source: IOC 3/04: 121-22.]

See also Iraq.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

THAILAND

On 28 April 2004, Pattani insurgents took shelter inside the historic Krue Se Mosque, a symbol of Pattani's Islamic heritage. Security forces captured the mosque after killing 32 insurgents. A government-appointed commission investigated the incident, reportedly finding that the security forces had used force disproportionate to the threat, although their report was not made public.

[Sources: IOC 3/04: 11-13; Asian Centre for Human Rights, "Killings at Pattani's Krue Se Mosque and a Cover Up Enquiry," (WWW-text; New Delhi, 6 May 2004); AI, Report 2005 (2005) 250.]

TIMOR-LESTE

Efforts to bring Indonesian military and militia leaders to justice for the killing of an estimated 1,400 East Timorese after the 1999 referendum were frustrated in 2004 by lack of resources, poor cooperation on the part of Indonesia, and problems in East Timor's criminal justice system. East Timorese leaders, most notably President Xanana Gusmao, publicly stated their unwillingness to pursue justice through the courts, preferring instead a reconciliation-based approach. However, Foreign Affairs Minister and Nobel Prize Laureate José Ramos Horta publicly supported the idea of a United Nations (UN) commission to explore future options for justice. It was expected that by December 2004 or early 2005, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan would announce the establishment of a commission of experts to be charged with assessing the successes and failings of both the Jakarta ad hoc trials on East Timor and the parallel process at Dili's Special Panels for Serious Crimes. The Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation in East Timor (Comissao de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconcilio de Timor Leste) was reportedly largely successful in its initial efforts to promote national reconciliation. The governments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste announced the establishment of a bilateral Truth and Friendship

Commission. Although the terms of reference had not been finalized, there were concerns that it might provide impunity for perpetrators of serious crimes committed in Timor-Leste in 1999. (See NCH #37.)
[Sources: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 275-78, 291, 295-96; AI, Report 2005 (2005) 251.]

See also Indonesia.

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #27 (2002).

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #23 (2001).

TURKEY

In November 1998, an attempt by the Islamist group Hilafet Devleti (Caliphate State), led since 1995 by Turkish preacher Metin Kaplan (1953-) (living in exile in Germany since 1980), to bomb Atatürk's mausoleum in Ankara on the 75th anniversary of the Turkish Republic failed. Atatürk abolished the kalifate in 1924 and transformed Turkey into a secular republic. In October 2004, Kaplan was extradited to Turkey, where he was to be tried for treason, although in May 2003 a German court had rejected diplomatic assurances offered by the Turkish government as insufficient. His trial started in December 2004.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 380]

On 13 November 2004, Hakan Albayrak (see NCH #36, #37) was released.
[Sources: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 258; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 64; HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 430.]

In February 2005, when a 1980 court ban on the publication of the letters and diaries of Atatürk's wife Latife Usakligil (Latife Hanim; married 1923-25; died in the 1970s) was lifted, Turkish officials decided against making them public. Many feared that disclosure of private details might tarnish Atatürk's image. The head of the Turkish History Foundation Yusuf Halacoglu said that Latife Usakligil's family had demanded that the documents continued to be kept secret.

[Source: BBC News Online, 4 February 2005.]

In February 2005, charges were filed against Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk for “anti-Turkish” statements about the 1915 Armenian genocide in an interview with the Swiss daily newspaper Tagesanzeiger on 6 February 2005. Pamuk reportedly declared that 30,000 Kurds and one million Armenians had died in the genocide. He had to interrupt his tour of lectures in Germany. In April 2005 he was threatened by extremists calling for the removal of his books from public libraries. During a “Respect the Flag” rally in Bilecek, his books were burnt in protest at the burning a few days earlier of the Turkish flag during Kurdish new year festivities. In a demonstration in Isparta, trade unionists tore his photograph to pieces.

[Source: PEN, Rapid Action Network, 11/05 (5 April 2005).]

On 2 March 2005, Ragip Zarakolu (1948-), co-founder and owner of Belge publishers and one of the founders of the History Foundation, was taken to court on various charges formulated in December 2004, including publication of a translated version of The Truth Will Set Us Free: Armenians and Turks Reconciled, a book by Armenian writer George Jerjian about the 1915 Armenian genocide. The book was considered insulting to the State and to the memory of the founder of the Republic Atatürk, as it reportedly claimed that leading government figures close to Atatürk had been responsible for the mass deportation of Armenians in 1915. The trial was postponed until May 2005.

[Sources: PEN, PEN/IPA Observe Trials of Fikret Baskaya and Ragip Zarakolu (28 February 2005); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 63.]

A conference about the 1915 Armenian genocide, due to start on 25 May 2005 at Bosphorus University, Istanbul, was postponed after Minister of Justice Cemil Cicek had said in parliament on 24 May that the conference was a “stab in the back of the Turkish people” and that “We must end this treason, the spreading of propaganda against Turkey by the people who belong to it.”

[Source: A.J. Yackley, “Turkey Postpones Conference on Armenian Killings” (WWW-text; Reuters 25 May 2005).]

On 6 June 2005, the European edition of Time Magazine carried a dvd, sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce of Ankara, with a 70-minutes documentary entitled Sari Gelin (The True Story) in which the 1915 genocide was denied and Armenian atrocities against Turks emphasized.

[Source: Time Magazine, 6 June 2005.]

See also Greece.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

UGANDA

In January 2004, the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) announced that he would take steps to investigate and prosecute war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the conflict in northern Uganda. This followed a request from the Ugandan government at the end of 2003 for the ICC to investigate crimes committed by the armed opposition Lord's Resistance Army (LRA). In July the ICC Prosecutor indicated that he would investigate crimes by both the LRA and government forces. The government pledged its support for the ICC investigations and published the ICC Bill to implement the ICC Statute in domestic law. The Bill had not been enacted by the end of 2004. In November, during government efforts to resolve the conflict, officials announced that if LRA leaders were to stop fighting and engage in internal reconciliation mechanisms, the state could withdraw its case from the ICC. However, it is unclear whether a state party which has referred a case to the ICC can withdraw the referral.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 15-16, 261-62.]

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #5 (1996).

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

UNITED STATES

In 1996 human remains were unearthed near Kennewick, Washington. Initial radiocarbon dating indicated that the skeleton, nicknamed the Kennewick Man, was 9,200 years old and not American Indian but Caucasoid. The Army Corps of Engineers took custody of the skeleton and determined that, in accordance with the 1990 Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act (NAGPRA), the remains should be returned to the Umatilla tribe - which claimed to be culturally affiliated with the remains - for burial according to traditional beliefs without further scientific study. In 1997, a group of eight scientists, led by archeologist Robson Bonnichsen at Oregon State University, filed suit (Bonnichsen v. U.S. Department of the Army) to halt the repatriation. They claimed that NAGPRA was unconstitutional and violated their right to scientific inquiry. In 2004, a federal judge ruled that the Umatilla tribe could not show “cultural affiliation” to the Kennewick Man and therefore could not claim the remains.

[Sources: R., Dalton, “Law Change Imperils Studies of Ancient Human Remains”, Nature, 14 April 2005: 810; D. Nelkin & L. Andrews, “Do the Dead Have Interests? Policy Issues for Research after Life,” American Journal of Law and Medicine, 24, nos. 2-3 (summer-fall 1998), 272-73.]

In 2004, declassified government documents revealed the strong support given by former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger to the Argentinean military junta in 1976, at a time when the junta was responsible for massive human rights abuses.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 190.]

On 4 October 2004, Ralph Begleiter, CNN’s world affairs correspondent until 1999 and professor of journalism and political science at the University of Delaware, filed suit under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to make public photographs and videos of the honor guard arrival and transfer ceremonies at Dover Air Force Base for servicemen and women killed in the Afghanistan and Iraq wars since October 2001. The lawsuit challenged the censorship policy initiated by the Defense Department (Pentagon) in 1991, which reversed the traditional American practice of honoring the fallen in solemn public ceremonies centered on flag-draped caskets. Begleiter declared that he wanted the American people to be allowed to accurately and completely assess the price of war. He challenged the Pentagon’s claim that personal privacy was the reason to censor because the pictures did not identify individual soldiers and the Pentagon had selectively allowed or released pictures when it suited its political goals. In response to the FOIA request and the lawsuit, the Pentagon released more than 700 of these images in April 2005. Many of the images showed evidence of censorship, which the Pentagon said was intended to conceal identifiable personal information of military personnel involved in the ceremonies.

[Source: National Security Archive, Update (4 October 2004, 28 April 2005).]

On 22 December 2004, historian Larry Berman, professor at the University of California, Davis, and author of three books on the Vietnam war, filed suit against the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), seeking release of ten President's Daily Briefs (PDBs) given to President Lyndon Johnson during the war in Vietnam. Berman challenged the CIA's "blanket policy" of refusing to release any PDBs, even historical ones that risk no damage to national security. The CIA's denial of Berman's FOIA request claimed that the PDBs were predecisional documents protected by deliberative process privilege; but Berman's counsels pointed out that the CIA was precluded by law from giving the President policy advice and declared that "[T]he CIA policy distorts history and undermines the credibility of the secrets that should be kept." During the suit, CIA information review officer Terry Buroker did not explain why thirty PDB's or excerpts of PDB's already had been publicly released without any harm.

[Source: National Security Archive, Professor Sues CIA for President's Daily Briefs (update; Washington 17 December 2004, 6 May 2005).]

In January 2005, the National Security Archive commented on the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)'s decennial review of CIA record categories that, since 1984, have been exempt from search and review under the 1966 Freedom of Information Act (FOIA). It urged that the CIA open a number of histories about publicly acknowledged CIA activities and operations that concern CIA components that no longer exist, that it declassify records concerning eleven acknowledged covert operations, and that it adopt its own history staff's recommendation of 1994 that all operational files older than forty years be subject to FOIA search and review.

[Source: National Security Archive, Public Interest in Hidden CIA Operational Records Is High (update; Washington 21 January 2005).]

When in the spring of 2005 Nicaraguan historian Dora María Tellez wanted to take up her post as the Robert F. Kennedy visiting professor in Latin American Studies, Divinity Department, Harvard University, she was denied a visa on the grounds that she had been involved in "terrorism". As a young medical student in Nicaragua, she became a comandante of the leftwing Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional in its campaign to topple dictator Anastasio Somoza Debayle (reigned 1956-79). She became minister of health in the first elected Sandinista administration.

[Source: NEAR, "US Denies Visa to 'Terrorist' Nicaraguan Professor" (WWW-text 4 April 2005).]

See also Argentina, Belarus, Canada, Chile, Kuwait.

URUGUAY

In 2004, limited action was taken to bring to justice those responsible for past human rights violations.

President-elect Tabaré Vázquez Rosas promised to implement Article 4 of the 1986 Expiry Law. The article, which obliged the executive to order immediate investigations into any cases of “disappearance” referred to it by the courts, had never been enforced. However, taken as a whole, the Expiry Law sanctioned impunity by exempting from punishment police and military personnel responsible for human rights violations committed before March 1985, in blatant violation of Uruguay’s international obligations. (See NCH #37.)

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 272.]

Legal proceedings continued against former Minister of Foreign Affairs Juan Carlos Blanco for the unlawful imprisonment of Elena Quinteros Almeida who “disappeared” in 1976. Juan Carlos Blanco was also summoned to testify, together with former President Juan María Bordaberry, at the investigation into the murders of senator Zelmar Michelini and deputy Héctor Gutiérrez Ruiz in Argentina in 1976.

[Source: AI, Report 2005 (2005) 272.]

UZBEKISTAN

The 2004 list of topics to be banned reportedly included making “any critical comments about folk traditions, or express opinions about the history of Uzbekistan that in any way deviate from official ideology.”

[Source: IOC 1/05: 170-73.]

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

VIETNAM

In July 2004, military historian Pham Que Duong (see NCH #37) was convicted in a closed trial to nineteen months' imprisonment on charges of "abusing democratic rights to jeopardize the interests of the State, and the legitimate rights and interests of social organizations and citizens." Since he had already spent that time in pre-trial detention, he was released on 29 July 2004.

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué, 3 August 2004; Committee To Protect Journalists, "Writer Pham Que Duong Sentenced to 19 Months in Prison" (WWW-text; 14 July 2004); AI, Report 2005 (2005) 277.]

In November 2004, tensions escalated when authorities prevented Buddhist scholar Thich Quang Do (see NCH #37) from visiting Thich Huyen Quang (Supreme Patriarch of the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam) who was severely ill in hospital, and summoned him for questioning on allegations of "appropriating state secrets".

[Source: HRW, World Report 2005 (2005) 336.]

In January 2005, Nguyen Dinh Huy, a high school teacher of history and English, journalist, and editor (see NCH #23) was released as part of a general amnesty to mark Tet, the Lunar New Year.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 31 December 2004 (2005) 47-48.]

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #32 (2003).

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: see NCH #37 (2004).

See also Ethiopia.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

AFGHANISTAN

Little action was taken to bring to justice perpetrators of serious abuses in the past. Many of those holding central and regional government posts were allegedly responsible for human rights violations committed during the armed conflict (1978-2003). In February 2003, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial Executions proposed the establishment of an international commission of inquiry into abuses in Afghanistan since 1978, a proposal supported by the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC; formed in June 2002). However, the proposal was opposed by a majority of governments, and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights then failed to endorse the proposal. Despite this setback, the AIHRC continued their efforts to map past abuses. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 146.]

ALGERIA

No full, independent and impartial investigations were carried out into crimes against humanity committed by security forces, state-armed militias or armed groups since 1992. The crimes included thousands of cases of extrajudicial execution, deliberate and arbitrary killings of civilians, torture and ill-treatment and “disappearances”, most of which occurred between 1994 and 1998. The authorities continued to deny that state agents had been responsible for a pattern of “disappearances”. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 273-74.]

ARGENTINA

In May 2003, two judges of the Federal Court in La Plata declared that crimes against humanity are not subject to any statute of limitations. The judges revoked the dismissal of the case against a former police officer accused of destroying information from the morgue of the Buenos Aires Police Headquarters about the causes of death of people who had “disappeared”. The judges stated that crimes that occurred during military rule (1976-83) linked to crimes against humanity can be investigated and punished. In July, President Néstor Kirchner repealed Decree 1581/01 which prohibited the extradition of individuals allegedly involved in human rights violations in 1976-83. In August 2003, the Senate declared the 1986 Full Stop and 1987 Due Obedience Laws null and void. These laws had blocked the investigation of thousands of cases of human rights abuses committed in 1976-83. In October, the Supreme Court referred the issue of the constitutionality of these laws to the Appeal Court. A ruling was pending at the end of 2003. In December, a German prosecutor issued an international arrest warrant for former Argentine President Jorge Videla, who was accused of involvement in the killing of two German citizens in 1976 and 1977 respectively. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 14, 94-95, 97-98, 128.]

BAHRAIN

More than 30,000 people were reported to have petitioned King Hamd bin Issa Al Khalifa in May 2003 to repeal Decree No. 56 of October 2002. The decree effectively granted impunity to anyone who had committed human rights violations before February 2001. The petition also called on past allegations of torture to be investigated and for victims to be compensated.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 276.]

BANGLADESH

On 12 January 2004, a bomb blast killed at least two people and injured about thirty, while thousands of devotees were chanting Quran verses and singing Islamic songs during a festival at the 700-year old shrine of Muslim saint Hazrat Shah Jalal (d. 1346) in Sylhet. According to legend, the saint, who came from Yemen to preach Islam, transformed the evil followers of the local king into fish. In an incident at the shrine in December 2003, 500 fish were poisoned in a pond.

[Source: “Bangladesh Shrine Bomb Kills Two”, BBC News (12 January 2004.)]

On 27 February 2004, Humayun Azad (?1947-), leading writer and lecturer at Dhaka University, was stabbed by unidentified assailants. He went into a coma. The attack was reportedly connected to death threats he received following the publication of Pak Sar Zamin Saad Baad (the first line of the Pakistani national anthem), his novel about religious groups in Bangladesh who collaborated with the Pakistani army during the 1971 independence war. In December 2003, a group had called for his arrest. In January 2004, a member of Jamaat e Islami had demanded in parliament the introduction of a blasphemy law to ban such publications. (See NCH #35.)

[Sources: AI, Public Statement (4 March 2004); PEN, Rapid Action Network 7/04 (8 March 2004)].

See also Pakistan.

BELGIUM

Legislation enacted in 1993 and amended in 1999 made provision for Belgian courts to exercise universal jurisdiction over genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes in international and internal conflicts, wherever the crimes were committed and whatever the nationality of the accused and the victims. Those facing charges included past and present heads of state. Amendments to the law were made in April and July 2003 and approved by parliament in August; they limited the law to cases directly connected with Belgium through the accused or victims. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 71-72, 209-10.]

See also Chad.

BOSNIA HERZEGOVINA

Impunity for human rights violations remained endemic. Thousands of “disappearances” which occurred during the 1992-95 war remained unresolved. In March 2003, the Human Rights Chamber reached a decision in the case of 49 relatives of the “disappeared” from the former “protected area” of Srebrenica who had brought an application against the authorities of the Republika Srpska (RS; a semi-autonomous entity in Bosnia-Herzegovina). The Chamber expressly recognized the continuing pain of the relatives of the “disappeared” and concluded that the RS had done almost nothing to relieve their agony. It held that this inaction by the RS authorities amounted to a violation of the relatives’ fundamental human rights and ordered the RS to disclose all information relevant to establishing the fate and whereabouts of the “disappeared” without further delay. The RS was instructed to conduct a full and thorough investigation into the human rights violations at Srebrenica, to bring those responsible to justice and to pay two million euros in compensation for the collective benefit of all applicants and families of Srebrenica victims. Subsequently, the Chamber refused to consider over 1,800 further applications filed by other Srebrenica relatives, as it was decided that the March ruling would apply to all victims collectively. In September, the RS authorities sent a reply to the Chamber which proposed, inter alia, the establishment of an independent commission of inquiry into the events which took place in and around Srebrenica between 10 and 19 July 1995. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 211.]

In June 2003, the Peace Implementation Council (PIC; an intergovernmental body responsible for monitoring the implementation of the 1995 Dayton Peace Agreement) endorsed a proposal by the Office of the High Representative (nominated by PIC’s Steering Board) to abolish the Human Rights Chamber and to establish a special chamber for war crimes in the new State Court, to be operational from 2004. It was envisaged that the War Crimes Chamber would include international judges and prosecutors for a period of three to five years, after which it would be entirely staffed by local officials. The proposal did not take into account the regional nature of the war and the fact that many perpetrators, as well as material evidence relating to these crimes, remained in neighboring states, beyond the reach of the Bosnian criminal justice system.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 210-11.]

The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) continued to try alleged perpetrators of serious human rights violations, including Slobodan Milosevic, former president of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro). (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 211.]

See also Croatia, Serbia and Montenegro.

BRAZIL

See Paraguay.

BURKINA FASO

No progress was reported in the judicial investigation commission promised in early 2002, after the human rights organization Burkanibè Movement for Human and Peoples' Rights reported that 106 bodies had been found between October 2001 and January 2002. The organization alleged that the victims had been executed by security forces during an operation launched in October 2001.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 33.]

CAMBODIA

In 2003, the United Nations (UN) resumed negotiations with the Cambodian government on the establishment of a criminal tribunal to bring to justice suspected perpetrators of gross human rights violations during Khmer Rouge rule (1975-79). A revised draft agreement, endorsed by the UN General Assembly in May but not yet formally ratified by the Cambodian legislature, provided for the establishment of Extraordinary Chambers in Cambodian courts with international assistance. Amnesty International commented that serious flaws remained which threatened the integrity of the legal process and set a dangerous precedent for other future international or mixed tribunals. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 152.]

CHAD

In 2003, Belgian and Chadian courts continued judicial investigations into human rights violations including "crimes of torture, murder and enforced disappearance" allegedly committed by former President Hissene Habré and others (1982-90). A case against Habré (who lived in Senegal) proceeded in Belgium despite restrictions to the law on universal jurisdiction. Reportedly, related investigations in Chad did not result in charges against Habré. In 2001, Senegalese President Abdoulaye Wade had announced his readiness to hand over Habré to stand trial in a third country for gross human rights violations (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 40, 73.]

See also Belgium.

CHILE

In June 2003, the trial began of five former members of the armed forces charged with illegally exhuming the remains of fourteen people who had been taken from La Moneda presidential palace following the military coup of 11 September 1973. The remains were reportedly removed from a grave in the north of the Metropolitan Region in December 1978 and dumped in the sea. It was the first time that the crime of unlawful exhumation was prosecuted in Chile.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 106.]

In August 2003, President Ricardo Lagos announced plans for dealing with the legacy of human rights violations committed during the military government (1973-90). The proposals included possible immunity from prosecution for people currently not charged or on trial who present themselves before courts to supply information on the whereabouts of victims or the circumstances of their “disappearance” or death; possible immunity from prosecution for military personnel arguing they were acting under orders; the transfer to civil courts of all cases of human rights violations committed in 1973-90 currently under trial in military courts; and the establishment of a committee to examine cases of torture. The plans did not include the annulment of Decree Law 2191 of 1978, known as the Amnesty Law, which has obstructed the attainment of truth, justice, and full reparations for victims, but instead proposed that courts continue to decide on the Amnesty Law’s application. In October, three draft bills based on the proposals were submitted to Congress. Human rights organizations, victims and relatives rejected the plans, arguing that they would fail to bring a complete end to impunity. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 106.]

CHINA

In February 1998, Tohti Tunyaz (pen name: Tohti Muzart) (1959-), an Uighur historian and writer, was arrested in Urumqi, Xinjiang, when returning to China to visit his relatives, collect source materials, and do research. Tohti was born in Kashgar and graduated from the Central Institute of Nationalities history department, Beijing (1984). He was later assigned to work for the China National Standing Committee, and he was studying for a Ph.D. in Uighur history and ethnic relations in nineteenth- and twentieth-century China at Tokyo University Graduate School of Humanities, Japan (1994-). His works on Uighur history included one book published in China and several papers published in Japan. In November 1998, he was charged with “leaking confidential documents” because he had received a copy of a single fifty-years-old list of documents relating to the second East Turkestan (Xinjiang) Independence Movement of 1944 from a clerk working at the archives and officially authorized to do so. Tohti was also charged with “instigating national disunity” because he had allegedly published a book in Japan in 1998, entitled The Inside Story of the Silk Road, advocating “ethnic separatism”—but his Japanese supervisor Sato Tsugitaka insisted that no such book exists (although the Japanese publisher Sofukan had approached Tohti with a plan, not accepted by Tohti, to publish a book). In March 1999, Tohti was tried and, following an appeal, sentenced by the Supreme Court in March 2000 to eleven years’ imprisonment and two years’ deprivation of political rights. On 17 May 2001, the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention concluded that Tohti was “arbitrarily detained.” (See NCH #22, #22ii, #22iii.)

[Source: United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Civil and Political Rights, Including the Questions of Torture and Detention--Opinions Adopted by the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention: Opinion no. 7/2001 (China) (E/CN.4/2002/77/Add.1; Geneva 2001) 50-54.]

In June 2000, computer engineer Huang Qi (1964-), who in June 1998 had created a website to help find missing persons and reunite families, and which included information on the Tiananmen massacre of June 1989, was arrested on charges of separatism and inciting subversion against the state. In August 2001, he was secretly tried, but no verdict was announced. At a closed hearing in Chengdu, Sichuan, in May 2003, he was sentenced to five years’ imprisonment and one year of suspension of political rights for the crimes of “splitting the country” and subversion. He was reportedly ill-treated in prison. His sentence was upheld on appeal in August. (See NCH #32.)

[Sources: IOC 1/04: 136; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 155.]

In December 2002, Ouyang Yi (1968-), a former secondary-school teacher and a dissident from the banned China Democracy Party, was detained in Chengdu, Sichuan, after signing an open letter calling for political reforms, the reversal of the official condemnation of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, and the release of the students convicted after it. In January 2003, Ouyang was charged with “inciting the overthrow of state power” and in March 2004 sentenced to two years’ imprisonment.

[Sources: Ifex Communiqué 11-49 (17 December 2002); IOC 2/03: 149; IOC 4/03: 130; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003): 81-82; Human Rights in China, Internet Activist Ouyang Yi Formally Arrested (15 January 2003.)]

In August 2003, former history student and Xian-based dissident Zhao Changqing (1967-) was sentenced to five years' imprisonment (See NCH #32.)

[Source: IOC 4/03: 130.]

In November 2003, Liu Di (1979-) was released (See NCH #32.)

[Sources: PEN, Rapid Action Network, 1 December 2003; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 155.]

On 24 February 2004, Jiang Yanyong (?1932-), an army surgeon in Beijing who witnessed the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, wrote a 4,700-word letter to the National People's Congress describing the scenes he had seen and appealing for an official reevaluation of the massacre. Thousands signed the letter to support him. Some websites posting the Chinese version of the letter were blocked.

[Sources: Independent Chinese PEN Centre, "Petition Letter on Behalf of the Tiananmen Mothers Ding Zilin, Zhang Xianling and Huang Jinping" (WWW-text; 29 March 2004); IOC 2/04: 124.]

On 28 March 2004, Ding Zilin and two other so-called Tiananmen Mothers, Zhang Xianling and Huang Jinping, were arrested by the police for "their alleged involvement in activities to endanger national security." The reasons were, reportedly, that they had published video testimonies of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre and planned to submit a report on those missing after the massacre to the sixtieth session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights then in progress in Geneva. Their arrest also came shortly before the traditional grave-sweeping festival Qing Ming, in which families visit ancestral graves and commemorate the dead. The festival had been used by the Tiananmen Mothers (a group of around 124 relatives) in the past. (See NCH #17.)

[Sources: Independent Chinese PEN Centre, "Petition Letter on Behalf of the Tiananmen Mothers Ding Zilin, Zhang Xianling and Huang Jinping" (WWW-text; 29 March 2004); Radio Free Asia, "China Detains Tiananmen Mothers Ahead of Festival, Anniversaries" (WWW-text; 30 March 2004.)]

COLOMBIA

In September 2003, criminal investigations were reportedly initiated against five members of the non-governmental organization Comisión Inter-eclesiástica Justicia y Paz (Inter-ecclesiastical Justice and Peace Commission). These proceedings were the latest in a string of threats and harassment against commission members. They followed a Constitutional Court decision to allow the commission to participate in judicial proceedings into over 200 human rights violations committed by paramilitaries operating in conjunction with the army's XVII Brigade in 1997 and 1998.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 109.]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

The transitional Constitution established a number of civil institutions to support progress towards democracy, including a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). The TRC lacked sufficient independence, proper resources and a clear mandate. One individual suspected of involvement in human rights abuses was appointed to the TRC executive committee. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 42.]

CONGO (Republic)

In April 2003, the government asked the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in The Hague to rule that French courts have no jurisdiction over investigations or prosecutions of Congolese government and security officials, including President Denis Sassou-Nguesso. In a case lodged in a French court in late 2001, the officials were accused of responsibility for the May 1999 “disappearance” of at least 353 refugees returning from the neighboring Democratic Republic of the Congo. In June, the ICJ dismissed the government’s case. However, no official was brought to justice. Investigations in the country into the “disappearances” had not been concluded by the end of 2003. In November, the government had reportedly demanded that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees provide documents relating to the return of refugees in 1999.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 45.]

CROATIA

Both Serb and Croat war crimes suspects were transferred to the custody of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). Other suspects continued to evade arrest, some apparently protected by the Croatian authorities. The ICTY rejected a proposal (reportedly made by President Stipe Mesic) for retired Croatian Army General Ante Gotovina, charged with command responsibility for crimes against humanity and war crimes against the Krajina Serb population in 1995, to be surrendered in exchange for a revision of the indictment against him. Increasingly, Croats as well as Serbs were brought to trial on war crimes charges before national courts. However, witnesses remained at risk of intimidation and harassment. The Croatian Government Commission on Missing Persons was still searching for over 1,200 “disappeared” people. Those responsible remained unidentified. Cooperation continued between the Croatian government and neighboring Serbia and Montenegro in exhuming bodies buried in Serbia and returning them to Croatia for identification and final burial. In June the Government Commission said that a total of 200 bodies of Croats had been exhumed. The Bosnian Commission for Missing Persons was reportedly still searching for dozens of people missing in Croatia. (See NCH #23.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 214-16.]

See also Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia and Montenegro.

CYPRUS

See Greece.

EL SALVADOR

Those responsible for human rights violations during the armed conflict (1980-91) and since were not brought to justice. In January 2003, the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances reported on the lack of progress by the government in investigating “more than 2,000 [“disappearance”] cases pending”. The National Assembly did not support efforts by relatives of victims and non-governmental organizations to create a national committee to search for “disappeared” children. The success of the organization Pro-Búsqueda de Niñas y Niños Desaparecidos (Association for the Search for Disappeared Children), established by the relatives of “disappeared” children, in reuniting such children with their biological families provided strong evidence both of the violations and of the fact that many of the children were still alive. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 95, 115.]

In December 2003, a monument to the victims of human rights violations during the armed conflict (1980-91) was inaugurated as a result of the efforts of the families of the victims. The monument was a recommendation of the Truth Commission which the authorities had failed to implement.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 115.]

ETHIOPIA

In 2003 the trial continued of 33 senior officials of the former Dergue government (1974-91) for “genocide”, murder, torture and other crimes. The Zimbabwean government continued to refuse to extradite former President Mengistu Haile Mariam to face trial. Trials also continued of up to 1,000 less senior officials accused of killing members of former Emperor Haile Selassie’s government (1930-74) and thousands of “anti-revolutionaries” during the government’s “Red Terror” atrocities (1977-78). According to official figures in mid-2003, since the trials began in 1994, 1,017 defendants had been tried, 552 had been convicted, and 3,426 were still awaiting trial. During 2003, six were sentenced to death and others to prison terms. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 52.]

FIJI

Racial intolerance toward the mainly Indo-Fijian non-indigenous community was linked to an attack on a Hindu temple, the 44th Hindu temple reported to have been burned down, damaged, or desecrated since the 2000 coup.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 157.]

FRANCE

On 16 June 2004, it was sixty years ago that historian and co-founder of the Annales Marc Bloch (1886-1944) was executed by the Gestapo near Lyons.

[Source: A. De Baets, “Resistance to the Censorship of Historical Thought in the Twentieth Century”, in: S. Sogner, ed., Making Sense of Global History (Oslo 2001) 390.]

GERMANY

See Argentina, France.

GHANA

In January 2003, hearings began of the National Reconciliation Commission. Established by the government in 2002, its task was to compile a record of human rights abuses committed during Ghana's periods of unconstitutional rule since independence in 1957, and to make recommendations for reparations and reforms. The law establishing the commission did not require it to make its findings and recommendations public. Most of the people making statements in hearings before the commission were victims of human rights violations under the military government headed by Flight Lieutenant, later President, Jerry Rawlings (1979, 1981-2001). (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 53.]

GREECE

On 3 May 2004, Greek state television ET-3 canceled the scheduled showing of the documentary "The Other Side" (produced by journalist Fani Toupalgiki for ET-3), which presented the events of 1963-74 in Cyprus from the angle of Turkish-Cypriots. The documentary was reportedly seen as "anti-national" and "dangerous". Its cancellation was allegedly the result of an intervention from the prime minister's office, possibly in connection with the forthcoming visit of Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan to Greece. In January 2004, ET-3 withdrew its participation as co-producer of a documentary on a convicted war criminal.

[Source: Greek Helsinki Monitor, Ifex Alert (4 & 7 May 2004).]

GUATEMALA

During 2003, General Efraín Ríos Montt faced lawsuits both in Guatemala and abroad in connection with army-led massacres carried out while he was head of state (1982-83, one of the most repressive periods of the army's rural counter-insurgency campaign). In 1999 the United Nations-sponsored Comisión para el Esclarecimiento Histórico (CEH; Historical Clarification Commission) judged that these massacres had constituted genocide. Despite provisions in the Constitution barring those who gained office through a coup from contesting the presidency, the Constitutional Court ruled in July 2003 that Ríos Montt could stand as candidate for the Frente Republicano Guatemalteco (Guatemalan Republican Front), of which he was a founder member, in the presidential elections. He failed to make it through to the second round in December 2003. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 116-17.]

Suits for genocide and crimes against humanity filed in Guatemala and abroad against the former governments of General Romeo Lucas García (1978-82) and Efraín Ríos Montt (1982-83) continued to be accompanied by intimidation and reprisals against the human rights organizations and forensic experts in the cases. (See NCH #32.) In March 2003, the government signed an agreement to establish a commission to investigate clandestine structures responsible for attacks on human rights defenders, lawyers, judges, prosecutors, witnesses, journalists, and others. It was scheduled to be established in 2005 as soon as Congress had approved several important legal reforms.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 95, 117.]

In October 2003, the Constitutional Court rejected the 2002 reversal of guilty verdicts passed in 2001 against three military officers for the extrajudicial execution of Bishop Juan Gerardi. The bishop was killed in 1998, two days after presenting the Guatemalan Roman Catholic Church's findings on abuses during the conflict years (1960-96). One of the three officers convicted in 2001 was murdered in prison in January 2003, allegedly as he was about to implicate other officers in the murder. In October, Erick Urizar Barillas became the 14th witness to the bishop's death to be killed. An appeal in this case was pending at the end of 2003. (See NCH #13, #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 117.]

In October 2003, the Estado Mayor Presidencial (Presidential High Command), the military intelligence structure involved in human rights abuses during the country's armed conflict and implicated in high-profile human rights cases, was abolished, to be replaced by a civilian agency. Civil patrols, responsible for grave abuses while serving as the army's civilian adjuncts during the conflict years, remobilized and held violent demonstrations demanding compensation for their wartime service. Human rights groups and government officials opposing their demands were threatened. Payments were subsequently made to them by the government of President Alfonso Portillo. However, comprehensive reparations for the victims of violations by army and civil patrols had not been agreed by the end of 2003. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 116-17.]

HUNGARY

In October 2003, the deputy director of the municipal office of Piliscsaba, Pest county, after being presented with data on the number of Roma in the community, reportedly stated: "Oh Lord, there are so many of them here, I wish Hitler had started his project with Gypsies". She was suspended and a disciplinary procedure was initiated.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 226.]

On 21 January 2004, Andras Bencsik, chief editor of the weekly Magyar Demokrata, was imprisoned for ten months for defaming Democrat Member of Parliament Imre Mecs in articles alleging that he had betrayed Hungarian members of the resistance to the Soviet occupiers during the uprising of October-November 1956 and that four of them had been executed as a result. A second reporter, Laszlo Attila Bertok, was given an eight-month suspended sentence.

[Source: IOC 2/04: 130.]

INDIA

In 1996, the Supreme Court had ordered the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) to examine the findings of the Central Bureau of Investigations that 2,097 people had been illegally cremated by police officials in the Amritsar district, Punjab. The cremations took place following widespread “disappearances” in police custody and possible extrajudicial executions in the mid-1990s. In 2003, the state of Punjab had only just begun to file its affidavits on cases under examination by the NHRC. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 160.]

On 6 December 1992, a mosque in the sacred city of Ayodhya, Uttar Pradesh, built by Mughal emperor Babar in 1528 allegedly by destroying a temple that stood at the birthplace of the Hindu deity Rama, was demolished by Hindu nationalists. In March 2002, the Lucknow High Court ordered the government-controlled Archaeological Survey of India (ASI) to excavate the site. In August 2003, ASI’s report concluded that remnants of a tenth- or eleventh-century temple once stood on the place of the demolished mosque. The scientific quality of the report, however, was heavily criticized and ASI was accused of tampering with the evidence. The release of the ASI report was followed by car bombs in Mumbai (Bombay) in which more than a hundred people died. In October 2003, thousands of cadres of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (World Hindu Council) were prevented from staging a rally in Ayodhya in a government attempt to uphold the court order banning religious activity on or near the site. (See NCH #27, #32.)

[Sources: A. Charan, “Ayodhya: Digging Up India’s Holy Places”, History Today, January 2004: 4, 6; IOC 1/04: 140; “An Attempt to Mislead and Misuse the Evidence: Interview with Professor Irfan Habib”, Frontline, 2003, no. 19 (WWW-text.)]

Shivaji: Hindu King in Islamic India (2003), a book about Maratha King Shivaji (1627-80) by American scholar James Laine, professor of religious studies at Macalester College, St. Paul,

Minnesota, was withdrawn by its publisher, Oxford University Press, in November 2003, after some scholars in Pune protested against it. In late December, some members of the radical Hindu nationalist political party Shiv Sena blackened the face of Shrikant Bahulkar, a scholar of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute (BORI) in Pune, because he was mentioned in the book's preface. In protest, historian Gajanan Mehendale (?1928-), chief editor of the BORI Cultural Index of Mahabharata, tore up 400 unpublished pages of his Shivaji biography. Laine apologized for inadvertently causing offense. The latter's book was not a biography but a critical analysis of sources and stories that gave rise to the dominant narrative about Shivaji. On 5 January 2004, 250 members of the Sambhaji Brigade of the Maratha Mahasangh vandalized BORI, founded in 1917, in the belief that it contained a stock of the book. An estimated 30,000 ancient manuscripts, 18,000 ancient books and many palm leaf inscriptions were destroyed. The police rounded up around seventy activists. On 14 January, the Maharashtra Government banned Laine's book on public order grounds. On 18 March 2004, Gopinath Munde, former Maharashtra Deputy Chief Minister and Maharashtra president of the Bharatiya Janata Party, demanded that the State Government either banned Jawaharlal Nehru's Discovery of India (Calcutta 1946) or deleted its allegedly defamatory references to Shivaji. Congress Party spokesmen reacted saying that Munde misquoted the contents of the book and that Nehru had praised rather than criticized Shivaji. In his book, Nehru had written that Shivaji was "the ideal guer[r]illa leader of hardened mountaineers" and "the symbol of a resurgent Hindu nationalism drawing inspiration from the old classics, courageous, and possessing high qualities of leadership."

[Sources: The Hindu, 15 January, 19 March 2004 (WWW-text); J. Nehru, The Discovery of India (Calcutta 1946; 23rd ed., New Delhi 2003) 272-73; S. Raval, "Shivaji Spark", India Today International, 2 February 2004: 19; IOC 2/04: 130.]

INDONESIA

The trials of individuals charged with committing crimes against humanity in 1999 in what was formerly East Timor were described as a failure because they ended in acquittals or light prison sentences. (See NCH #32 under Timor-Leste.) Similar shortcomings emerged in other trials, such as the one dealing with the killing of Muslim protesters in Tanjung Priok, North Jakarta, in 1984, or with the killing of the leader of the Papuan civilian independence movement, Theys Eluay, in 2001.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 161-62, 163.]

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

On 14 July 2003, the death sentence for apostasy imposed on historian Hashem Aghajari (1957-) was commuted on appeal to four years' imprisonment. Aghajari also appealed against this sentence. On 15 February 2004, in an open letter from prison, Aghajari urged passive resistance in protest against the ruling by the Council of Guardians to bar some 2,500 pro-reform candidates from standing in the 19 February elections. On 3 May 2004, the Hamedan court reimposed the death penalty and sent the case back to the Supreme Court. On 1 June, the Supreme Court again revoked the sentence. (See NCH #28, #28ii, #28iii, #28iv, #28v.)

[Sources: AAAS Human Rights Action Network, IR0219-agh, 6 May 2004; IOC 4/03: 137; IOC 2/04: 131; "Iran Dissident Faces Death again", BBC News World Edition, 3 May & 1 June 2004.]

IRAQ

In April 2003, during the war with the United States and the United Kingdom, Iraqi ministerial archives, archeological sites and artifacts, and museum collections were damaged and looted, including the Iraq National Museum (some thousand art objects, especially of Mesopotamian origin, probably disappeared or were destroyed) and the Saddam Manuscripts Library (some 40,000 manuscripts were burned) in Baghdad, and museums in Mosul (housing finds from the ancient Assyrian capitals of Nimrud and Nineveh) and Tikrit. The national archives--including a collection of Qurans, rare books, and manuscripts, and archives from the Ottoman and independence periods and from the Iran-Iraq war--were burned during a fire which destroyed the National Library in Baghdad. University libraries in Mosul and Basra were looted.

[Sources include: "The Threat to World Heritage in Iraq: Heritage Destroyed" (WWW-text; Oxford March-April 2003); ICOMOS, Heritage At Risk: World Report on Monuments and Sites in Danger 2002-2003 (Munich 2003) 113-27.]

Mass graves containing thousands of bodies were uncovered in many parts of Iraq. The victims were believed to have been executed by security forces in the 1980s, in the aftermath of the 1991 uprisings, and in early 2003. Many bodies were exhumed by people desperate to locate missing relatives. Many new Iraqi human rights groups were formed and documented past and present human rights violations. They worked in difficult circumstances and lacked resources and training. Little action was taken to address past human rights violations, including mass "disappearances", or to investigate and bring to justice those found responsible for committing crimes against humanity, genocide and war crimes, or to provide for compensation and restitution to victims. However, in December, the Iraqi Governing Council (IGC) established the statute of the Iraqi Special Tribunal in order to try former President Saddam Husayn (1979-2003) and other former Iraqi officials. The tribunal may impose the death penalty. Also in December, the IGC set up a Committee on Truth and Reconciliation.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 281-82.]

See also Kuwait.

IRELAND

In December 2003, the report of Justice Henry Barron on the 1974 bombings in Dublin and Monaghan, which resulted in 33 deaths and many injuries, was published. The judge found that the bombings had been carried out by Loyalist paramilitaries from Northern Ireland and did not rule out the possibility that members of the British security forces had aided them. He found defects in the investigation by the Garda Síochána (police force.) He also found that numerous files were missing at the Department of Justice. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 228.]

See also United Kingdom.

IVORY COAST

Despite commitments by all parties to the conflict to accept an international inquiry into human rights abuses since the September 2002 uprising, impunity remained the rule and fuelled further human rights abuses.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 47.]

JAPAN

In 2003 Japan warned North Korea that it could not expect substantial Japanese aid until the sensitive issue involving the alleged abduction of several hundred Japanese citizens by North Korean secret agents in the 1970s and 1980s was resolved. During a visit by Prime Minister Koizumi Junichiro to

Pyongyang in 2002, North Korea admitted to abducting thirteen Japanese nationals. (See NCH #32.)
[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 164, 166.]

The Japanese state was directly involved in the sexual slavery of many thousands of so-called “comfort women” during World War II. In April 2003, the Supreme Court dismissed an appeal filed by a group of South Korean “comfort women” demanding compensation from the Japanese government. The Court upheld the decision of the Hiroshima High Court in March 2001, which overturned a lower-court ruling ordering the Japanese government to pay compensation to some of the women. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 19, 165.]

See also Peru.

JORDAN

On 16 January 2003, Muhannad Mubaideen, a journalist of the weekly magazine al-Hilal (The Crescent), was arrested following the publication on 14 January of his article entitled “Aisha in the Prophet’s Home” about the Prophet Muhammad’s wives (Aisha in particular) and his sexual life. He was charged with “insulting Islam”, “damaging the prestige of the state” (Jordan’s Hashemite rulers claim descent from the Prophet Muhammad’s family), and “destabilizing society by propagating perversity and false rumors”. On 17 February, Mubaideen, who maintained that his article was based on historical and religious references, was tried before the State Security Court and sentenced to eighteen months’ (later commuted to six months’) imprisonment, without recourse to appeal. Al-Hilal was banned for two months.

[Sources include: BBC News Online (WWW-text; London) 17 February 2003; Committee to Protect Journalists, Two Journalists Released in Jordan; One Remains in Jail (WWW-text; 2003 News Alert; New York 18 February 2003); PEN, Rapid Action Network 8/03 (London), 19 February 2003; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 288.]

KENYA

In April 2003, the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs appointed a task force to consider a possible mechanism for transitional justice. In August, the task force, after public consultations, recommended the establishment by presidential decree of a Truth, Justice and Reconciliation

Commission. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 56.]

In April 2003, the United Kingdom Military Police initiated criminal investigations into allegations that British soldiers had raped hundreds of Kenyan women during a period of 35 years in areas of central Kenya which were used as training grounds by the British army. In October, the allegations were debated in the Kenyan parliament.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 19, 57, 266.]

See also United States.

KOREA, NORTH

See Japan.

KOREA, SOUTH

See Japan.

KUWAIT

In March 2003, Iraqi and Kuwaiti officials held talks in Jordan with Saudi Arabian officials on the fate of at least 600 of their nationals missing since the 1991 Gulf War. Following the change of government in Iraq, forensic teams from Kuwait inspected mass graves in Iraq. By the end of 2003, the remains of at least 34 Kuwaiti prisoners of war were identified through DNA testing and returned to their families. The process of identifying remains was continuing at the end of 2003.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 290.]

On 30 November 2003, Kuwaiti writer, journalist and researcher Yasser al-Habib (?1973-) was abducted in a Kuwait City street by security forces, reportedly in connection with an audiocassette recording of a lecture he gave on Islamic historical issues to an audience of ten to twenty people in a private setting. His research reportedly relied heavily on Wahhabi references and texts and apparently angered hard-line Wahhabi groups who used their influence within the establishment, including the National Assembly, to bring about the maximum punishment against al-Habib. On 20 January 2004, he was sentenced to one year of imprisonment for “questioning the conduct and integrity of some of the ‘companions’ of the prophet Muhammad”. In frail health, he was reportedly subjected to orchestrated violent attacks in prison by Wahhabi inmates. Amnestied by the Emir on 25 February, Kuwaiti National Day, he was at risk of imminent re-arrest and went into hiding. On 9 March, new charges were brought against him of violating state security laws. On 5 May, he was sentenced in absentia by the Kuwait Criminal Court to ten years’ imprisonment on charges attempting to overthrow the regime. On 4 June, a group of some twenty armed security guards raided al-Habib’s family home in search of him and assaulted his father. (See NCH #33, #33ii, #33iii, #33iv, #33v).

[Sources: PEN, Rapid Action Network 56/03, 16 December 2003, 9 February, 2 & 10 March, 18 June 2004.]

LIBERIA

On 4 June 2003, the Special Court for Sierra Leone issued an indictment against President Charles Taylor for crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious human rights violations (killings, mutilations, rapes, and the use of child soldiers by Sierra Leone armed opposition forces RUF and AFRC that Taylor had supported in order to destabilize Sierra Leone and gain access to diamond resources) committed during Sierra Leone’s conflict. In August, Taylor went to Nigeria, which refused to extradite him.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 58, 70, 74-75.]

The August 2003 peace agreement provided for a Truth and Reconciliation Commission but also stated that the National Transitional Government of Liberia would consider a recommendation for general amnesty to all those engaged or involved in military activities during the conflict. (See NCH #17, #23.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 60.]

See also Sierra Leone.

MALDIVES

After his release in August 2002, Member of Parliament and historian Mohamed Nasheed continued to be harassed. On 13 June 2003, two days after its publication, all copies of the book Dhandikoshi, a history of the capital city's Dhandikoshi clan, were confiscated and the permit for its publication was revoked. (See NCH #27, #32.)

[Source: IOC 4/03: 141].

MEXICO

On 2 February 2003, the Ministry of Education Reyes Tamez Guerra announced that the textbook Historia de México 3: Un enfoque analítico (Esfinge Publishers, 1998?; History of Mexico: An Analytical Approach), written for third-year secondary school pupils by Claudia Sierra Campuzano (?1951-), historian and professor at the Escuela Nacional de Antropología e Historia of Cuernavaca, would be withdrawn from circulation after pressure from the National Union of Education Workers. The union had criticized the textbook, approved in 1998 and in use since 1999, after the newspaper Reforma had published some extracts in which the army was held responsible for the 1968 Tlatelolco massacre and three successive presidents were held accountable for having deepened poverty after introducing neo-liberal measures in 1982-2000. Two days later, amid much protest, the minister announced that the book was not withdrawn but that all textbooks would be revised. Initially banned from a Mexico City book fair, the book sold ten thousand copies in a few days after the minister's announcement. The attempt to ban the textbook was ascribed to the continuing influence of the PRI, the Institutional Revolutionary Party which had ruled Mexico from 1929 to 2000.

[Sources: R. Ponce, "Forcejeo por la historia", Proceso, 9 February 2003, 12-13; Reforma, 2, 4, 6, 8 February 2003; T. Weiner, "Mexico Digs at Last for Truth about 1968 Massacre", New York Times, 7 February 2003.]

The Special Prosecutor for past human rights violations, appointed in 2002, made limited progress in holding accountable those responsible for human rights violations from the 1960s to the 1980s. The Supreme Court made an important ruling against impunity. In April 2003, a judge in Nuevo León refused an arrest warrant for officials accused of kidnapping Jesús Piedra Ibarra in 1976 on the grounds that the crime was not imprescriptible. In November 2003, the Supreme Court reversed the decision, ruling that such crimes are continuous until the abducted person reappears, in agreement with international standards on "disappearances." The Special Prosecutor subsequently issued at least three arrest warrants for a number of former officials implicated in "disappearances". A Supreme Court ruling was still awaited on the constitutionality of Mexico's reservation to the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearance of Persons. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 127-28.]

MOROCCO/Western Sahara

In November 2003, King Mohammed VI approved a recommendation by the official human rights body to establish an Equity and Reconciliation Commission to look into “disappearance” and arbitrary detention cases in previous decades. The commission would follow up work already undertaken by the Arbitration Commission on Compensation, which had awarded compensation to some 4,500 victims or family members since its establishment in 1999. Several hundred people who “disappeared” after arrest between the mid-1960s and early 1990s remained unaccounted for. The vast majority were Sahrawis, arrested in the period immediately following Morocco’s annexation of Western Sahara in 1975. Not one person responsible for ordering or carrying out these “disappearances” has been prosecuted. (See NCH #23, #27, #32.)

[Sources: IOC 1/04: 148; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 294, 296.]

NETHERLANDS

In August 2003, R. Bresser-Dukker (?1938-) started summary proceedings against the Foundation Digital Monument Jewish Community in the Netherlands and its director, historian Isaac Lipschits. The foundation planned to publish the names of all Dutch Jews who perished in World War II (more than one million), their addresses, the names of their family members, and some other biographical data on a special Internet website. Bresser-Dukker, who as a Jewish child spent the war in hiding, asked not to include the data of her grandparents and her father for reasons of privacy and because it caused her psychological damage. In addition, she found collective registration of Jews on the Internet reminiscent of wartime practices and liable to provoke anti-Semitism, and, therefore, no respectful way of remembrance. On 11 December, the judge ruled that Bresser-Dukker’s privacy was not threatened because she herself was not identifiable on the website, that many of the summary data of her deceased relatives were already published elsewhere on the Internet, and that the foundation planned to present the data to honor, not to defame, the victims. The judge said that for all these reasons priority should be given to the foundation’s freedom of expression.

[Sources: Amsterdam Court, Kort Geding (Summary Proceedings) 03/1363 AB (11 December 2003); H.W. von der Dunk, “Een digitaal monument is een smakeloze banalisering,” Historisch Nieuwsblad, April 2004, 38-39.]

NIGERIA

The killing of civilians at Odi, Bayelsa State, in 1999 and in Benue State in 2001 remained uninvestigated. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 69.]

In 2003, the findings of the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission, known as the Oputa Panel, were still not made public. Established in 1999 to investigate human rights violations committed between 1966 and the return to civilian rule in 1999, it reported the findings of its public hearings and investigations in May 2002 to President Olusegun Obasanjo. The government had not published the report or its recommendations, and had made no public statement about plans for implementing the recommendations by the end of 2003. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 69.]

See also Liberia.

PAKISTAN

The 28 July 2003 issue of Newsweek magazine was seized by Pakistani customs over an article headlined “Challenging the Quran” that examines the theory of a German linguist that the Quran may have originally been written in Aramaic instead of Arabic. Newsweek’s local reporter in Peshawar fled the city in fear of reprisals after the magazine appeared. The magazine was also banned in Bangladesh.

[Source: IOC 4/03: 146].

PARAGUAY

Concerns continued to be expressed over the failure of the state to pay compensation to the victims of human rights violations under the government of former President Alfredo Stroessner (1945-89). In August, the new Procurator General declared that he would appeal to the Supreme Court to make payments possible. In October 2003, a law was passed to set up a Truth and Justice Commission to examine the human rights violations. The commission had not been established by the end of 2003. In October as well, a court in Asunción reissued a judicial order for the arrest of Stroessner, in exile in Brazil, to face charges for his alleged involvement in the torture and killing of Celestina Pérez in 1974 while in police detention. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 95, 129, 130.]

PERU

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), set up in 2001 to establish the circumstances surrounding human rights abuses committed by the state and by armed opposition groups between May 1980 and November 2000, delivered its final report to President Alejandro Toledo in August 2003. The Commission concluded that of the estimated 69,000 people who were killed or had “disappeared” during the twenty years, 54 per cent were the responsibility of the armed opposition group Shining Path and 46 per cent were the responsibility of armed forces. The commission also concluded that three quarters of the victims were Quechua native speakers, reflecting “the discrimination and marginalization against the Andean rural population which is impregnated in Peruvian society”. The commission said that it had submitted to the Public Ministry the identity of 24,000 victims in order that justice could be achieved. Its recommendations included proposals for institutional reform, an integrated plan for reparations, and a national plan for forensic anthropological interventions in light of the 4,644 burial sites the commission had recorded. In response, Toledo apologized in the name of the state to “all those who suffered”. He did not, however, offer the individual reparations that victims and their relatives had sought. On the issue of impunity, the President was criticized for stating that “some members of the security forces had committed painful excesses” and for not accepting that human rights violations committed by the security forces were widespread and systematic, as the TRC had concluded.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 131.]

In July 2003, the government submitted an extradition request to the Japanese authorities for former President Alberto Fujimori on charges of human rights violations and corruption. The Japanese authorities had not made a decision by the end of the year. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 132.]

POLAND

On 17 June 2004, historian Jacek Kuron (1934-2004) died. In 1961 Kuron, historian at Warsaw University, was expelled from the Polish Scouts Union, where he had been head of the Program Department (1960-61). In 1962, he founded with historian Karol Modzelewski (1937-) the “Political Debating Club” at Warsaw University, but the club was closed in 1963. In November 1964, Kuron was expelled from the Polish United Workers' Party (PUWP) and in July 1965 sentenced to three years' imprisonment. In [August] 1967 he was released. Active in students' circles in 1967-68, he was again arrested during the student demonstrations on 10 March 1968. In January 1969, he was sentenced to three and a half years' imprisonment on the charge of having inspired the riots. In September 1971, he was released. He became one of the most active dissidents. He was often harassed and arrested, inter alia for his activities for the Committee for the Defense of the Workers (KOR; later Committee for Social Self-Defense, KSS-KOR), of which he was a cofounder and spokesman (1976-81). He collected and published data about persecutions in Poland in the underground periodical Biuletyn informacyjny. In 1977-78 he helped found the Towarzystwo Kursow Naukowych (TKN, Society for Academic Courses; popularly known as the Latający Uniwersytet [Flying University]) and lectured for it. His book Principles and Ideas, about the strategy and political objectives of the democratic opposition in Poland, was published by NOWa (Niezależna Oficyna Wydawnicza; Independent Publishing House). In 1978 Kuron was a cofounder and editorial board member of the underground political quarterly Krytyka. In November he was arrested in Warsaw on his way to give a TKN lecture on education and social life. Many of his 1979 TKN lectures were disrupted and he was often beaten. He was a Solidarity member and a personal adviser to Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. In July-August 1980, he was founder and chief of the Bank of Strikes Informations during the protests. On 21, August Kuron and historian Adam Michnik (1946-) were among fourteen KOR members arrested after they had collected and disseminated information on the strike situation for several weeks. Their release (occurring on 1 September) was the final condition of the agreement between the government and Solidarity on 31 August. Kuron was interned under martial law (13 December). In September 1982, after widespread demonstrations against martial law on 31 August, four KOR members, including Kuron and Michnik, were arrested in the internment camp on charges of "making preparations for the violent overthrow of the Polish sociopolitical system". In November 1982, Kuron's wife Grazyna died after her release from detention in May because of ill health. In 1983, still under arrest, Kuron had turned down an offer to emigrate. The Kuron/Michnik trial, scheduled to open on 13 July 1984, was postponed but they were released under the 21 July amnesty for political prisoners. On 1 May 1985, Kuron was arrested after leading a demonstration on May Day to counter the official Labor Day parades and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. He was released on appeal. In 1988-89 he was a Solidarity delegation member at the Roundtable Negotiations. In June 1989, he was elected a member of Parliament for Solidarity (later for the Union of Freedom caucus). He was minister of labor and social policy twice (1989-91, 1992-93). In the first round of the November 1995 presidential elections he obtained nine percent of the votes.

[Sources include numerous AI Reports and IOC issues.]

RUSSIA

Thousands of Meskhetians living in Krasnodar Territory continued to be refused Russian citizenship on grounds of ethnicity. They remained effectively stateless. Meskhetians, most of whom are Muslims, were forcibly relocated from southwest Georgia in 1944 by the former Soviet regime. As Soviet citizens residing in the Russian Federation at the time the Law of Citizenship came into force in 1992, they are entitled to Russian Federation citizenship. The result of the authorities' failure to enforce this right was discrimination in almost every aspect of daily life. (See NCH #32 under Georgia.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 198, 245.]

In November 2003, deputy Education Minister Viktor Bolotov declared that the ministry considered withdrawing approval for Twentieth-Century History of the Fatherland, a high school textbook written by historian Igor Dolutsky. If withdrawn, the textbook could no longer be used in classes as an official textbook, although teachers could still set students to read it. An exercise in the textbook asking students to write passages supporting or refuting statements included one from a historian saying that a coup took place after the 2000 election of President Vladimir Putin and another from a lawmaker reportedly declaring that a police state took shape in Russia in 2001.

[Sources: IOC 1/04: 152; Associated Press, Russia May Revoke Approval of Textbook (28 November 2003)].

RWANDA

In 2003, approximately 80,000 individuals remained in detention, nearly all of them suspected of participation in the 1994 genocide. By the end of 2003, the Specialized Chambers had tried just over 8,000 suspects since they became operational in 1996. In many cases, trials did not meet international standards of fairness. The long awaited start of gacaca trials, a community-based system of justice, did not begin as planned. Community members and elected local magistrates continued pre-trial work in the 746 tribunals, which started operating in 2002. They listed victims and suspected perpetrators, and made an inventory of civil damage claims. The remaining 8,258 tribunals were planned to be operational in 2004. The tribunals were plagued by inaction by magistrates and community members, the unwillingness of communities to provide information, and public dissatisfaction that human rights abuses by members of the former armed opposition group Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPA) were excluded from their consideration. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 70, 71.]

Trials of genocide suspects also continued at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in Arusha, Tanzania. In December 2003, the ICTR sentenced historian Ferdinand Nahimana, a co-founder of Radio-Télévision Libre des Mille Collines (RTLM), to life imprisonment for inciting genocide in 1994. Arrested in 1996, he was charged with genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, and crimes against humanity. He pleaded not guilty. In the months before and during the genocide, RTLM incited Rwandans to hunt down Tutsis and moderate Hutus and murder them. They listed the names and addresses of targeted individuals and, in some cases, urged listeners to “eliminate the enemy”. (See NCH #32.) By the end of 2003, the ICTR had delivered 17 judgments since its first indictments in 1995. The ICTR accused the Rwandese government of frustrating investigations of war crimes allegations against former RPA members.

[Sources: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 210-12; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 70, 71; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 61, 63, 65; Ifex Communiqué 12-49 (9 December 2003); IOC 2/03: 164.]

SAUDI ARABIA

See Kuwait.

SENEGAL

Despite formal commitments by the authorities to investigate past human rights violations, no steps were taken to institute an inquiry into the large-scale violations committed by the security forces in the disputed region of Casamance in the past decade. As a result, dozens of women whose husbands “disappeared” after being arrested by security forces or abducted by alleged armed members of the Mouvement des Forces Démocratiques de Casamance (MFDC, Democratic Forces of Casamance Movement) had to cope with uncertainty about the fates of their husbands and with economic hardship. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 73.]

See also Chad.

SERBIA and MONTENEGRO (formerly Federal Republic of Yugoslavia)

In February 2003 the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in The Hague agreed to hear a case brought by Bosnia-Herzegovina against Serbia and Montenegro for genocide and aggression in connection with the 1992-95 war.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 248.]

There was limited progress in identifying those who had “disappeared” or had been abducted. Further exhumations of burial sites took place. In March 2003 the International Commission for Missing Persons announced that DNA analysis had identified 209 bodies. In May, the United Nations Mission in Kosovo announced the formation of a special police unit to investigate the hundreds and possibly thousands of unsolved killings in 1999 and 2000. In June and July, 65 bodies previously found in a mass grave in Serbia were returned to Kosovo. This brought the total number of repatriated bodies of ethnic Albanians from Kosovo to 110 out of 850 bodies exhumed from mass graves in Serbia. No suspects were indicted.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 248-49.]

Arrests and trials continued of ethnic Albanians accused of war crimes. In July 2003, former commander of the Kosovo Liberation Army Rustem Mustafa and three others were convicted in Pristina of war crimes connected with the illegal confinement, torture, and murder of ethnic Albanians suspected of collaboration with the Serbs. Trials and retrials continued of Serbs previously convicted of war crimes or genocide by panels with a majority of ethnic Albanian judges. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 248-49.]

In July 2003, Serbia approved legislation authorizing a Special War Crimes Prosecutor. In October, a Special War Crimes Court was established.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 248.]

The authorities claimed to have solved a number of murders and “disappearances”, including that of former Serbian President Ivan Stambolic who was assassinated and buried in a lime pit after “disappearing” in August 2000. Murder charges were filed against former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic and others, including members of a special police force said to have carried out the kidnapping and killing.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 247-48.]

The trial of Slobodan Milosevic, who had been accused of responsibility for war crimes committed in Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Kosovo, continued before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). Witnesses testified that his government controlled Serb “paramilitaries” responsible for atrocities. A number of suspects were transferred to the ICTY. Former Serbian President Milan Milutinovic, who had enjoyed immunity while in office, voluntarily appeared before the ICTY in January 2003 to face charges of crimes against humanity in Kosovo. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 247.]

See also Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia.

SIERRA LEONE

Progress was made to address impunity for past human rights abuses committed by both government and opposition forces during the conflict (1991-2001). Thirteen people were indicted by the Special Court for Sierra Leone, established in 2002 to try those guilty of grave human rights violations committed after 30 November 1996. In early May 2003, Sam Bockarie, former commander of the Sierra Leone armed opposition Revolutionary United Front (RUF) and closely associated with Liberian President Charles Taylor, was killed. In March, he had been indicted by the Special Court. Allegedly, he was killed to prevent him giving evidence to the Court which would implicate Taylor. In July, former RUF leader Foday Sankoh died. Those indicted also included Johnny Paul Koroma, an elected member of parliament and former leader of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), who remained at large, and Samuel Hinga Norman, Minister of Internal Affairs and former National Coordinator of the Civil Defense Forces, which had supported the government during the conflict. Trials were expected to begin in March or April 2004. Excluding the thirteen indicted by the court, most other people responsible for serious crimes committed during the conflict continued to benefit from an amnesty provided by the 1999 Lomé peace agreement. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission made progress toward providing a historical record of human rights abuses during the conflict and toward promoting reconciliation. More than 7,500 statements were collected, including from Sierra Leonean refugees in other West African countries. In August public hearings were completed. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 60, 74-75.]

See also Liberia.

SOUTH AFRICA

In October 1998, former State President F.W. de Klerk had challenged the report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) in court and was successful in having a short section removed (namely that he had been an accessory after the fact to the Khotso House bombing of August 1988). Volume six of the TRC report, handed over to President Thabo Mbeki in 2003, contained a version of the deleted passage about De Klerk after De Klerk had approved it. After a settlement in court, the TRC also agreed to include in Volume six the objections of the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) to the TRC findings. However, the settlement left intact the TRC's core findings that the IFP, the former KwaZulu homeland government, and the KwaZulu police were responsible for gross human rights violations. Volume six also summarized the work of the Amnesty Committee. It gathered evidence which substantiated allegations of state complicity in political violence in the late 1980s and early 1990s. In April 2003, the government announced that it would pay final reparations to 22,000 victims of gross human rights violations. Victim support groups and others criticized the offer as being far below the TRC's recommended amount. In October, President Mbeki assented to the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Amendment Act, which authorized use of the President's Fund not only for reparations to individual victims but also for "the rehabilitation of communities". In November, the government began one-off payments to individual victims.

[Sources: TRC, Report (London) volume 6 (2003) 58-62; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 78.]

In 2003, there was controversy over access to the TRC files, some of which were sent to the National Intelligence Agency. The government claimed that it could reclassify the "sensitive" documents in the files. The South African History Archive (SAHA) won an out of court settlement which stated that TRC files had to be moved to the National Archives and prepared for public access. SAHA also discovered the existence of many thousands of Military Intelligence files that had never been sent to the TRC. It used the 2000 Promotion of Access to Information Act to secure lists of these files.

[Sources: D. Banisar, The WWW.freedominfo.org Global Survey: Freedom of Information and Access to Government Record Laws around the World (WWW-text; September 2003) 76; D. Orentlicher, Independent Study on Best Practices, Including Recommendations, To Assist States in Strengthening Their Domestic Capacity To Combat All Aspects of Impunity (E/CN.4/2004/88; 27 February 2004), paragraph 20.]

See also Switzerland.

SPAIN

The United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances added Spain to its list of countries where people had “disappeared”. It was concerned about the period under the government of General Francisco Franco (1939-75) and asked the government to investigate two cases dating from after 1945, the date of the foundation of the United Nations. Efforts were continued to locate the bodies of some of the thousands shot during or after the 1936-39 civil war. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 254-55.]

SRI LANKA

A Commission of Inquiry, appointed by the National Human Rights Commission to investigate complaints of “disappearances” in the Jaffna, Kilinochchi and Vavuniya districts from 1990 to 1998, published its findings in October. The commission investigated the cases of 280 “disappeared” people, 245 of whom had been detained by the army and 25 by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE). Neither the army nor the LTTE cooperated fully with the inquiry. The commission found no evidence that “disappearances” had occurred in police custody, but it did find that the police had systematically hindered investigations into complaints by relatives of the “disappeared”. It recommended that officers with command responsibility be held criminally liable in “disappearance” cases and that the government consider compensating relatives of the “disappeared”. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 189.]

SURINAME

In 2003, the investigation continued into the 1982 “December murders” in which fifteen journalists, academics and labor leaders were extrajudicially executed at Fort Zeelandia, an army center in Paramaribo. The homes of the minister of justice and police and of the investigating judge were broken into in early 2003 and documents relating to the case were reportedly taken away. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 133.]

In 2003, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights review of the Moiwana massacre case began. The massacre, in which 35 people, mostly women and children, were killed during an attack by a specialized army unit, had occurred in November 1986. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 133.]

SWITZERLAND

In April 2003, the government decided to close previously open files on South Africa, including files from the 1960-73 era (outside the thirty-year embargo), reportedly out of fear for lawsuits in the United States against Swiss companies who had dealt with South Africa under the apartheid regime. Later the prohibition was slightly amended. The Swiss Society of History protested the move for reasons of principle and because it hampered current research. In 2002, South African victims of apartheid had brought a multi-billion dollar suit in the United States against American, Swiss and German banks as well as the IBM corporation, claiming that loans to the apartheid regime had helped prop it up in defiance of a United Nations embargo in the period 1985-93.

[Sources include: Correspondence between Swiss Society of History and Swiss President Pascal Couchepin (1 May, 28 May, 30 June, 12 August 2003); HRW, World Report 2003 (Washington) 74.]

SYRIA

In August 2003, fourteen human rights activists were arrested and charged with “affiliation to a secret organization and carrying out acts which could incite factional conflict within the nation” in relation to a lecture--which was canceled before it started--marking the fortieth anniversary of the declaration of the state of emergency in Syria.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 303.]

TIMOR-LESTE

By December 2003, indictments had been served against 369 individuals for serious crimes, including crimes against humanity, in connection with the independence ballot in 1999. Among those indicted were 281 people residing in Indonesia, including senior Indonesian military officials. However, Indonesia refused to transfer suspects for trial to Timor-Leste. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 163, 194.]

Human rights violations immediately before and during the Indonesian invasion in 1975 were the subject of an ongoing inquiry by the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation. (See NCH

#32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 194.]

See also Indonesia.

TURKEY

In June 2003, Fikret Baskaya (1940-) faced a new trial after publication of the eighth edition of his book Westernization, Modernization, Development--Collapse of a Paradigm; An Introduction to the Critique of the Official Ideology (Istanbul, April 1991) which described the social-economic evolution of Turkey since 1919 and criticized Turkey's policy of "colonizing Kurdistan". In August he was acquitted. In October, this was confirmed after new rules allowing retrial of cases heard by the European Court of Human Rights were adopted.

[Sources: European Court of Human Rights, Case of Baskaya and Okcuoglu versus Turkey: Judgment (WWW-text; Strasbourg, 8 July 1999); IOC 3/03: 162; IOC 1/04: 155.]

On 20 May 2004, the Supreme Court sentenced Hakan Albayrak, a former journalist for Milli Gazete, to fifteen months' imprisonment (of which he has to serve five), under a 1951 law criminalizing "insults to the memory of Atatürk". The conviction arose from a phrase in an article by Albayrak published in 2000, entitled "A Funeral Prayer", in which he criticized the recital of prayers at the funeral of writer Mina Urgan, a well-known atheist, and compared it with Atatürk's funeral. The contentious phrase was: "Mustafa Kemal Pasha was buried without a funeral prayer. And neither the State nor the public was disturbed by this". According to press reports, Albayrak wrote a subsequent article in which he claimed that he had been misinformed about Atatürk's funeral and apologized for any offence he had caused. (See NCH #36.)

[Source: PEN, Rapid Action Network 28/04 (London) 10 June 2004.]

TURKMENISTAN

On 23 February 2004, writer and Russian citizen Rakhim Esenov (?1926-) and two others were detained by Security Service officers in the capital Ashgabat. They were believed to be at risk of torture. Esenov, in bad health, was accused of "smuggling" 800 copies of his banned historical novel The Crowned Wanderer (written around 1994, published in Moscow in 2003), into Turkmenistan. The novel was set in the period of the Mogul Empire (1526-1803 CE) and featured the character of Bayram Khan, whom the book portrayed as a Turkmen poet, philosopher and army general who saved the empire from falling apart. In February 1997, President Saparmurad Niyazov had publicly criticized the book and denounced the author for making “historical errors”, but Esenov refused to make the “corrections” the president demanded. Esenov was charged with “inciting social, national and religious hatred”. On 9 March 2004, he was released on condition that he did not leave the country. (See NCH #34, #34ii.)

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 90/04 (2 March 2004); PEN, Rapid Action Network 06/04 (5 & 17 March 2004); HRW, World Report 2002 (Washington) 364; IOC 2/04: 146.]

UNITED KINGDOM

In April 2003, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, John Stevens, delivered a long-awaited report on the practiced collusion in Northern Ireland. It confirmed widespread collusion between state agents and Loyalist paramilitaries, including state agents being involved in murder. It also confirmed the existence of the British army’s secret intelligence unit known as the Force Research Unit which had actively colluded with Loyalist paramilitaries in targeting people for assassination.

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 265.]

See also Ireland, Kenya.

UNITED STATES

On 3 August 2003, Ali Mazrui (1933-), Kenyan-born historian and political scientist and permanent United States resident since 1974, author of many books on Islam and Africa, Albert Schweitzer professor and director of the Institute of Global and Cultural Studies at State University of New York at Binghamton, and member of the Board of Directors of the American Muslim Council, was detained and interrogated by immigration and custom officials, and agents from the Department of Homeland Security for six to seven hours in Miami after he returned from a working visit to Trinidad. Mazrui was asked what jihad was, what sect of Islam he believed in, and whether he had met a radical islamist leader in Trinidad. Mazrui declared that he did not know why he was singled out. In June 2003, Mazrui had been appointed Chancellor of the Jomo Kenyatta University of Agriculture and Technology in Nairobi, Kenya.

[Sources: Washington Post, 14 September 2003 (WWW-version.); K. Hasan, “US agencies paranoid about Muslims”, Daily Times (Pakistan), 15 September 2003 (WWW-version).]

URUGUAY

In April 2003, the Peace Commission, established by President Jorge Battle in August 2000 to clarify the fate of Uruguayans who had “disappeared” under military rule (1973-85), published its final report. The Commission stated that 26 Uruguayans had died as a result of torture in 1973-85. Nobody was brought to justice for these grave human rights violations. In the same month, there were signs that the authorities wanted to extend the 1986 Expiry Law which granted exemption from punishment to police and military personnel responsible for human rights violations committed in 1973-85. There were also serious concerns that the government was interfering with the judiciary after a judge was asked to stop investigating the possibility that the bodies of “disappeared” people were buried in military compounds. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 95, 138-39.]

VATICAN

In February 2002 and February 2003, the release of archival records on the Pope’s wartime role was announced. The release would be gradual between 2005 and 2009, and for historians only.

[Source: Keesings Historisch Archief, 2000: 677; 2003: 163, 490.]

VENEZUELA

In November 2003, the government committed itself to comply with the ruling of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to pay compensation to relatives of the victims of the widespread civil disturbances in 1989, known as the Caracazo. (See NCH #32.)

[Source: AI, Report 2004 (2004) 140.]

VIETNAM

In June 2001, Thich Quang Do (1927-), a Buddhist scholar and poet, author of several novels and studies of Buddhist history, was put under house arrest for two years because he had called for freedom of religion and democracy. In June 2003 he was released, but in October again placed under house arrest. (See NCH #10, #14, #17.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (Washington 2003) 272; AI, Report 2004 (2004) 195.]

On 28 December 2002, Pham Que Duong (?1933-), former colonel and military historian, was arrested in Ho Chi Minh City. It is believed that his trial will take place before the end of July 2004. In August 2002, he had been among 21 signatories of a petition sent to parliament calling for democratic reforms. (See NCH #32.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 272; AI, One Cyber-Dissident Released, Many Still Imprisoned, 14 June 2004.]

ZIMBABWE

On 18 November 2003, labor historian and political scientist Brian Raftopolous, advisory board member of the Journal of Southern African Studies and chair of the Zimbabwe Crisis Coalition, which brings together many civil society organizations, was arrested and detained with others in Harare, when they were taking part in a peaceful demonstration organized by the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions. After three days, the case was dismissed.

[Sources include: draft letter of Journal of Southern African Studies editorial board to The Guardian (22 November 2003.)]

See also Ethiopia.

Network of Concerned Historians	NCH
Annual Report 2003	http://www.concernedhistorians.org

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

AFGHANISTAN

Little action was taken to bring to justice perpetrators of human rights abuses committed over the past 23 years (1978-2001). Military commanders suspected of such abuses were integrated into the Transitional Administration that was in power between December 2001 and June 2002.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 26.]

ALGERIA

In 2002, no full, independent and impartial investigations were carried out into the mass human rights abuses committed since 1992, including thousands of cases of extrajudicial executions, deliberate and arbitrary killings of civilians, torture and ill-treatment, and “disappearances”. No progress was made in explaining the fate of the persons who “disappeared” at the hands of the security forces or state-armed militias between 1993 and 2000. The President’s National Consultative Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights reportedly received 4,743 dossiers submitted by families regarding persons presumably “disappeared” by state agents. Commission President Moustapha Farouk Ksentini said that he believed that the actual number of “disappearances” was “7,000 to 10,000, possibly even 12,000”. In March, June, July and November 2002, police broke up peaceful demonstrations by relatives of the “disappeared”. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Sources: IOC 4/02: 108; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 425, 428; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 31.]

On 1 July 2002, General Khaled Nezzar, former defense minister (1990-1993), sued former army officer Habib Souaïdia for defamation. Souaïdia, residing in France, was the author of The Dirty War 1992-2000 (2001; an eyewitness account of how soldiers disguised as Islamist rebels massacred civilians). He had declared on French television that the armed forces had killed “thousands of people” during the political violence of the 1990s. The trial featured some thirty witnesses, including historians, politicians, members of the military, and intellectuals of all political persuasions. On 27 September, the French court dismissed the case, stating that Souaïdia had uttered his allegations in good faith and that the dispute should be resolved by history rather than by the court. Meanwhile, on 30 April 2002, an Algerian court sentenced Souaïdia in absentia to twenty years’ imprisonment for having said in a press interview that he had been in touch with a dissident group of ex-officers in exile and that, if there were a revolt against Algeria’s rulers, he would come back “to take up arms against the generals”.

[Sources: IOC 4/02: 108; IOC 1/03: 114; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 408-9, 427; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 29-30.]

On 31 December 2002, cartoonist Ali Dilem was fined 10,000 dinars (240 US dollar) by a court for his satirical drawing on the 1992 murder of President Mohamed Boudiaf. It was the first conviction for “insult” under a May 2001 change in the criminal code.

[Sources: IOC 2/02: 100; IOC 2/03: 146; IOC 3/03: 138.]

See also France.

ANGOLA

In April 2002, a cease-fire was agreed, putting an end to the 27-year conflict (1975-2002) between government forces and those of the Uniao Nacional para a Independencia Total de Angola (UNITA). An amnesty law was passed to accompany the peace agreement, providing immunity from prosecution for all crimes against the security of the state and military crimes committed within the context of the armed conflict.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 32.]

ARGENTINA

A number of senior military officers implicated in abuses committed during the “dirty war” (1976-1983) was in detention or under house arrest, including former military ruler General Leopoldo Galtieri. In September 2002, Galtieri’s arrest was ordered for the “disappearance” in 1978 and 1980 of twenty members of the left-wing Peronist guerrilla group Montoneros, who had returned or were planning to return from exile. As of December 2002, the Supreme Court had yet to rule on appeals of two federal court decisions reversing Argentina’s amnesty laws (the 1986 Full Stop and 1987 Due Obedience laws). (See also United States; see NCH #10, #14, #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 100, 111-14; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 34-35.]

In September 2002, unidentified gunmen fired at the La Plata home of Estela de Carlotto, president of the Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo (Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo) and of the Comisión Provincial por la Memoria of La Plata (La Plata Provincial Commission for Memory), a nongovernmental group dedicated to the memory of the victims of military rule.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 112; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 35.]

In October 2002, the US-German car manufacturer Daimler-Chrysler set up a commission to examine the conduct of Mercedes Benz and its officials in Argentina between 1975 and 1978.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 35.]

On 30 October 2002, Fernanda Sanssone, an archaeology student at Tucumán University, and various others working in the area known as “Pozo de Vargas” (“Vargas’s Well”), Tucumán Province, received threats. They searched for remains of those “disappeared” during the military government (1976-1983). (See NCH #29.)

[Source: AI, Urgent Action Appeal 327/02 (5 November 2002).]

AUSTRALIA

In September 2002, the national Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission launched a report to mark the passing of five years since its national inquiry into the removal of indigenous children from their families under past government policies. Restoring Identity, a report on reparations for the so-called “stolen generations”, called for an all-encompassing tribunal process to provide a package of reparations measures to affected individuals and communities.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 38.]

BELGIUM

In 2002, the debate over the continuing validity of Belgium's universal jurisdiction law (enacted in 1993 and amended in 1999) continued. Under this legislation, between 1998 and the end of 2002 complaints were lodged against individuals, including many past and present heads of state and government, from some twenty countries who were residing outside Belgium. In February 2002, the International Court of Justice in The Hague found that a Belgian arrest warrant against the then-acting Foreign Minister of the Democratic Republic of Congo violated international law by refusing to recognize the minister's immunity from criminal jurisdiction. The ruling left intact the provisions of the Belgian law allowing prosecution of crimes against humanity in Belgium regardless of the connection of the crimes to Belgium or the presence of the accused on Belgian soil. During 2002, however, separate chambers of the Brussels Court of Appeal declared three such complaints inadmissible on the grounds that the law was not intended to permit a criminal investigation unless the suspect was in Belgium. As of July 2002, a political majority had formed to retain the law's essential features, but the Belgian Employer's Federation, with United States government support, was lobbying against the law. On 26 June 2002, a Belgian Court of Appeal ruled that the case against Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, and others, brought by 23 survivors of the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacres in Lebanon, was inadmissible because the defendants were not present on Belgian soil. On 3 July, lawyers for the plaintiffs appealed the decision, arguing that it was contrary to the letter and spirit of the law. The appeal was still awaiting judgment by the Court of Cassation at the end of 2002. A complaint filed against President Yassar Arafat of the Palestinian Authority had yet to be heard. (See also Chad, Israel; see NCH #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 409, 468, 518-19; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 49-50.]

BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA

In early September 2002, the Republika Srpska Government Bureau for Liaison with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia issued a report concerning the July 1995 events in Srebrenica, during which the Bosnian Serb Army was believed responsible for the killing of more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslim men and boys. The report claimed that only one hundred Bosnian Muslims were killed in violation of the law, and 1,900 died in combat or due to exhaustion. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 320.]

Thousands of cases of “disappearances” remained unresolved in 2002. Significant progress, however, was made on the DNA identification program, led by the International Commission on Missing Persons. By the end of 2002 the total number of human remains identified in this way in Bosnia-Herzegovina had reached 1,200, compared to 70 in the previous six years. However, it became increasingly difficult to locate the sites of mass graves, reportedly because of the failure of the armed forces and the authorities to disclose information. (See also Yugoslavia.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 55.]

BRAZIL

In September 2002, the federal government opened police archives from the 1964-1985 dictatorship, bringing to light information regarding the killing or “disappearance” of hundreds of activists who had opposed the military government. However, the archives were only made available to victims and their families, as well as to a special commission investigating the crimes committed during this period.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 114, 118.]

BURUNDI

During the transition under the terms of the 2000 Arusha Accord, the national legislature failed to ratify critical legislation on genocide, on provisional amnesty for persons accused of politically-motivated crimes, and on the establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission. (See NCH #23, #27)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 20.]

CAMBODIA

In February 2002 negotiations between the government and the United Nations (UN) about a “mixed tribunal” to try Khmer Rouge crimes (1975-1979) broke down. The UN withdrew, citing irreconcilable differences over provisions in the August 2001 Cambodian law. It became clear to the UN that it would be impossible to ensure that a mixed tribunal could act with sufficient independence and impartiality to ensure fair trials. In November 2002, however, the UN General Assembly passed a resolution calling for Secretary General Kofi Annan to resume negotiations with Cambodia. (See NCH #14, #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 185, 210, 518; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 64.]

The English-language Cambodia Daily newspaper was threatened with suspension when it called 7 January--the day that the Khmer Rouge were defeated by Vietnamese troops in 1979--"Vietnamese Liberation Day". The Ministry of Information later dropped the 15-day suspension order.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 209.]

CANADA

Canadian Jewish groups called for senior First Nations Chief David Ahenakew to be charged with incitement to hatred and be stripped of his Order of Canada medal after he reportedly claimed that Jews "damn near owned all of Germany" before World War II, as explanation for why Adolf Hitler "fried six million" of them.

[Source: IOC 2/03: 148-49.]

CHAD

In February and March 2002, a Belgian judge and police team with the cooperation of the Chadian government went to Chad in order to inspect prisons and mass gravesites of former President Hissène Habré's regime (1982-1990). In addition, the testimony of a number of Habré's associates was heard and former victims were allowed to confront their torturers. (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 518; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 70.]

CHILE

Although several courts made significant progress in prosecuting members of the military implicated in the "disappearances" committed during the regime of General Augusto Pinochet (1973-1990), Pinochet himself escaped trial. In July 2002 the Supreme Court ruled that Pinochet's mental infirmity was serious and irreversible, and exempted him from prosecution for human rights crimes. This closed the case against him indefinitely. Following the decision, Pinochet resigned from his position as Senator for Life. As a former president of the country, immunity was automatically granted to him.

An Argentine judge, however, continued to seek Pinochet's extradition in order to stand trial in Buenos Aires for the 1974 killing of General Prats, Pinochet's predecessor as army commander, but in November 2002 the Santiago Court of Appeal held that the Supreme Court ruling was applicable to this case as well. Lawyers acting for the Prats family appealed the decision. (See NCH #14, #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 100, 120-22; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 70-71.]

CHINA

The situation of imprisoned historians Tohti Tunyaz and Xu Zerong remained unchanged during 2002. (See NCH #17, #22, #23, #25, #27.)

[Sources: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 74; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 78-80.]

On 9 May 2003, Huang Qi was sentenced in Chengdu, Sichuan, to five years' imprisonment and one year of deprivation of political rights for the crimes of separatism and subversion. He was reportedly ill-treated in prison. In 2000 he had created a website to help find missing persons and reunite families which included information on the 1989 Tiananmen massacre. (See NCH #17, #23.) In November 2002, Liu Di (?1981-), a female psychology student at Beijing Normal University who had expressed sympathy for Huang Qi, was arrested, held at an unknown location and, in December, charged with "endangering state security."

[Sources: IOC 3/03: 143; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 74-75, 82.]

The tens of thousands of books burned in Xinjiang in mid-May 2002 in an effort to curb separatism among ethnic Uighurs included 128 copies of a Brief History of the Huns, Ancient Uighur Literature (published by the government-owned Kashgar Uighur Publishing House) and 32,320 copies of Ancient Uighur Craftmanship (Kashgar 1988).

[Sources include IOC 4/02: 111-12; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 224].

On 17 May 2003, student leader and freelance journalist Jiang Qisheng was released after completing his four-year prison term. (See NCH #17, #23.)

[Sources: IOC 3/03: 143; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 82.]

In November 2002, Xian-based dissident Zhao Changqing (1967-) was arrested after drafting an open letter (together with some 190 others) addressed to the 16th Congress of the Chinese Communist Party calling on its leaders, inter alia, to reverse its condemnation of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre and to pardon the students convicted after it. The letter included other political reform demands and was signed by 192 opposition activists. On 25 June 2003, Zhao was charged with inciting subversion of state power. He had previously been imprisoned in 1989 and 1999-2001. In November 2002, Internet writer Jiang Lijun was arrested on the same charges as Zhao for signing the latter's open letter. In December Ouyang Yi (1968-), a secondary school teacher and dissident from the banned China Democracy Party, and Liao Yiwu (?1960-), writer, poet and teacher, were detained in Chengdu, Sichuan, after signing Zhao's open letter. In January 2003, Ouyang was charged with "inciting the overthrow of the state power". If convicted, he could be sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. In 1990 Liao had already been sentenced to four years' imprisonment for circulating a clandestine video entitled The Massacre. In 1994, following pressure from the United States authorities, he was released for "good conduct" (one month before completing his sentence). Thereafter he resumed his activities but he was regularly harassed by the authorities. In 1999 Ouyang and his family had been evicted from their home and Ouyang had lost his teaching position.

[Sources include IOC 2/03: 149; Ifex Communiqué 11-49 (17 December 2002); Reporters without Borders, Liao Yiwu Falls Victim to Latest Crackdown on Cyber-Dissidents (19 December 2002); Human Rights in China, Internet Activist Ouyang Yi Formally Arrested (15 January 2003); PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 81-82.]

CONGO

The government called for the establishment of an international criminal tribunal to try crimes against humanity committed in Congo before the date when the International Criminal Court came into being (1 July 2002).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 26.]

See also Belgium.

CROATIA

In February 2002, the state-owned television station declined to air a program on the contemporary heritage of the Ustashas (who, as allies of Nazi Germany, established the Ustasha Independent State of Croatia in 1941-1945).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 326.]

EAST TIMOR

See under its new name, Timor-Leste.

EGYPT

A 41-episode television series drew international protests for incorporating elements of the so-called Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a fake document from the Russian tsarist era supposed to outline a plan for Zionist world domination.

[Source: IOC 1/03: 120.]

EL SALVADOR

In March 2002, the Office of the Human Rights Procurator (PDDH) published a report on the case of Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero, who was murdered in 1980. The PDDH recommended that the case should be reopened. The authorities had not taken up this recommendation by the end of 2002. The PDDH also asked parliament to annul the Amnesty Law, which prevented legal proceedings against those involved in human rights violations.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 96.]

ETHIOPIA

Several dozen former officials of the Derg regime (1974-1990) were brought to trial in 2002, about a third of whom were acquitted. Over 1,000 others were on trial or awaited trial. Between July 2000 and July 2001, 478 had been convicted and 328 acquitted. The Special Prosecutor said that all trials would be completed by 2004. (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 37; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 101-2.]

On 25 and 26 October 2002, Oromia police reportedly detained four students, members of the Gumii club of Nazret (Adama) related to a secondary school, and announced plans to arrest 36 more students, allegedly because the students had printed a textbook on Oromo cultural history.

[Source: HRW, Lessons in Repression: Violations of Academic Freedom in Ethiopia (Washington 2003) 17].

FRANCE

The French Minister of Army Veterans' Affairs Hamlaoui Mekachera rejected calls for a government inquiry into allegations that Algerian militants had been tortured by French soldiers during the 1954-1962 Algerian war of independence. Mekachera, himself one of the "harkis" (Algerians who fought for France during that war), also rejected reports that torture was widespread and committed with impunity. Earlier in 2002, retired Army General Paul Aussaresses was fined for condoning war crimes and defending torture by French forces in his memoirs. French veterans of the Algerian war are protected from war crimes prosecution by a 1968 amnesty law. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: IOC 4/02: 115].

In September 2002, Maurice Papon, a former high-ranking government official and Paris police chief, was released from prison, where he was serving a ten-year sentence for crimes against humanity. He was released under the humanitarian provisions of a new law of 4 March 2002 on the rights of persons in poor health.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 106.]

See also Algeria, Haiti, Morocco.

GEORGIA

A report published after a mission of the Council of Europe Directorate of Strategic Planning in December 2001, reminded Georgia of its obligation to provide for voluntary repatriation of Meskhetian Turks, deported from Georgia by Soviet leader Joseph Stalin in 1944.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 334.]

GERMANY

In 2002, publisher Bertelsmann AG admitted that its claim to have been closed down by the Nazis for "antigovernment tendencies" had been faked. In reality, Bertelsmann had been the German army's main printer and a leading producer of anti-Semitic material and Nazi propaganda during the war. The story had been invented in order to get a publishing license from the Allied occupying forces. An Independent Historical Commission (IHC), headed by historian Saul Friedlander from the University of California, investigated the case and worked on the report for over three years, at the request of Bertelsmann itself. Bertelsmann has opened the document archive compiled by the IHC to the public. [Sources: IOC, Bertelsmann's Nazi Past (WWW-text); IOC 1/03: 121].

In [2002], a Munich court stopped German sales of US historian Daniel Goldhagen's book A Moral Reckoning: The Role of the Catholic Church in the Holocaust and Its Unfulfilled Duty of Repair, which criticizes the Church's activities during World War II, after claims by church officials that the book was inaccurate. [Source: IOC 1/03: 121].

See also Argentina, South Africa.

GUATEMALA

In 2002, the intimidation of witnesses, the judiciary, and human rights defenders remained a serious problem. For example, anthropologist Victoria Stanford and journalists David González and Wesley Boxed received death threats for starting an investigation into mass graves exhumed in the Rabinal region of Baja Verapaz. They had published evidence of crimes against humanity committed during the Guatemalan civil war (1960-1996) in the New York Times. A written threat directed at a team of forensic anthropologists included the names of people who had not participated in exhumations since the mid-1990s, suggesting that the perpetrators had either been collecting information for several years--or at least had access to an institution that had collected information in the past. In September 2002, Manuel García Cruz, who participated in the efforts of the National Coordination of Guatemalan Widows (CONAVIGUA) to have mass graves exhumed in Guatemalan indigenous areas and to protect indigenous rights, was seized, tortured and killed in El Quiché Department. In March, April and May 2003, there were new incidents of threats and intimidation of members of the nongovernmental Fundación de Antropología Forense de Guatemala (FAFG; Guatemalan Forensic Anthropology Foundation), including its director Fredy Peccerelli, and their families. (See NCH #6, #14, #26, #31.)

[Sources: IOC 4/02: 116; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 101, 141, 144; AAAS, GU0207.for, 9 May 2003; AI, Urgent Action Appeal 127/03 (8 May 2003); AI, Report 2003 (2003) 114.]

By mid-2002, the Special Cases Department of the Public Prosecutor's Office had taken statements from some hundred eyewitnesses, completed four inspections at massacre sites and received forensic reports of exhumations at all the massacre sites in relation to charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes brought against the military high commands of former Presidents Romeo Lucas García (ruled 1979-1982) and Efraín Ríos Montt (ruled 1982-1983). The charges had been pressed by massacre survivors joining forces in the Asociación Justicia y Reconciliación (AJR; Association for Justice and Reconciliation), legally represented by the Center for Human Rights Legal Action (CALDH). (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 142; AI, Report 2003 (2003).]

In October 2002, the conviction of three military officers and a civilian in 2001 for the 1998 killing of Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera was reversed by a Court of Appeal, which accepted the claim of the defense team that a lower court had failed to conduct a proper review of evidence presented at the trial. The impartiality of one of the Appeal Court judges was also called into question. The Supreme Court, petitioned to overturn the ruling on the grounds that the Appeal Court had overstepped the rules of judicial review, granted an injunction temporarily suspending the ruling. Meanwhile, the Supreme Court evaluated the merits of these petitions. (See NCH #10, #14, #17, #23.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 142-43; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 115.]

At the end of 2002, a decision was still pending from the Spanish Supreme Court regarding the Spanish High Court's decision of December 2000 that it did not currently have jurisdiction to hear the Rigoberta Menchú Foundation's 1999 genocide suit against former Guatemalan officials, including former President General Efraín Ríos Montt. (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 115.]

HAITI

The Federal Justice Office in Switzerland rejected a Haitian extradition request dating back to 1986 for former President Jean-Claude Duvalier (ruled 1971-1986). In April 2002, a Haitian Court of Appeal ordered the release of former coup leader General Prosper Avril (ruled 1988-1990), detained on charges relating to the alleged torture of political prisoners in 1989. He was freed but immediately rearrested on charges related to the 1990 Piâtre massacre of peasant farmers.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 122.]

On 30 April 2002, Haitian journalist Lilianne Pierre-Paul received a letter containing a bullet and a written demand that she read a statement calling on France to pay Haiti an indemnity of 21.7 billion US dollar as compensation for the indemnity of 90 million francs France had demanded from Haiti in 1838 before recognizing the country's independence from French colonial rule in 1801.

[Source: IOC 3/03: 147.]

INDIA

On 27 February 2002, in the town of Godhra, Gujarat, a Muslim mob attacked a train on which Hindu activists were returning from Ayodhya, Uttar Pradesh, where they had supported the campaign to build a Hindu temple on the same site where Hindu militants had destroyed a mosque in 1992. On 21 August 2002, the Allahabad High Court banned news coverage of hearings on a proposed excavation at the disputed temple-mosque site at Ayodhya. (See NCH #27.)

[Sources: IOC 4/02: 117, 160-66; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 237; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 126.]

In September 2002, the National Council of Educational Research and Training released new history textbooks, following the lifting of a stay of publication by the Supreme Court. The court had rejected a public interest petition by historians and secular activists who protested the publication of the textbooks, because allegedly they merely glorified Hindu culture; the authors also accused the government of undermining India's secular constitution as the textbooks allegedly presented a biased account of Hindu and Muslim contributions to Indian history.

[Sources include IOC 1/03: 122; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 239.]

In 2002 in the Punjab, investigations entrusted to the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) in relation to the "disappearance" and possible extrajudicial execution by security forces of thousands of people in the 1980s and early 1990s, did not make any significant progress.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 126.]

Ten years after widespread communal riots in Bombay claimed 1,788 lives and five years after the Shrikrishna Commission of Inquiry indicted several police officers for having actively sided with violent Hindu groups during the riots, no significant progress had been made to prosecute the alleged perpetrators. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 126.]

INDONESIA

See Timor-Leste.

IRAN

On 5 August 2000, Iranian authorities had arrested Hojatoleslam Hassan Youssefi Eshkevari (1950-), director of the Ali Shariati Research Center, journalist and author of several books on Iranian history, after his return from Berlin where he had presented his paper Dictatorship and Its History at the Heinrich Böll academic and cultural conference entitled Iran after the elections, held in April 2000, at which political and social reform in Iran were discussed. He was held in solitary confinement until mid-July 2001 and secretly tried in October before a Special Court for the Clergy on charges of defamation, apostasy, being “at war with God”, and “being corrupt on earth”, which carry the death penalty. Some of the stronger charges were dropped and in November 2001, his sentence was reduced to two and a half years; in August 2002 it was overturned. New charges of “propaganda against the Islamic Republic” and “insulting top-rank officials” were filed against him, for which he received a sentence of seven years’ imprisonment on 17 October 2002. On 7 March 2003, his sentence was upheld by a Court of Appeal. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Sources include HRW, World Report (Washington) 2001 (2000) 354; 2002 (2002): 428; 2003 (2003): 407, 444; PEN, Rapid Action Network 28 October 2002; update #10 to RAN 11/00; AI Report 2001: 130, 2002: 129, 2003: 131; IOC 5/00: 100; IOC 3/01: 109; IOC 4/01: 124; IOC 1/03: 123; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 146.]

In August 2002, Hashem Aghajari (1957-), historian and head of the history department at Tarbiat Modares University, Tehran, member of the reformist Islamic Revolution’s Mujahideen Organization (IRMO), and close ally of President Mohammad Khatami, was arrested on charges of apostasy and blasphemy (defamation of religious figures and Shiite Islamic traditions), following an address he delivered in Hamedan, western Iran, the previous June. His speech, entitled Islamic Protestantism, commemorated the death in June 1977 of the ideologist of the Iranian Revolution Ali Shariati and called for a “religious renewal” in which Muslims should not “blindly follow religious leaders” (thereby challenging the Shiite doctrine of “emulation” or “taqlid”). During a closed trial in November 2002, he was sentenced to 74 lashes, eight years’ imprisonment--to be served in “internal exile”--and the death sentence. He also received a ten-year prohibition from teaching. Aghajari was amputated at the knee during the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war and needed medical attention. Hundreds of university students and lecturers protested against the sentence. On 2 December, Aghajari's lawyer appealed against the death sentence (against Aghajari's wish) after on 17 November Ayatollah Ali Khameni had ordered Iran's chief judge to review it. On 14 February 2003, the Supreme Court repealed the death sentence. On 17 February a retrial was ordered. Aghajari prepared a Persian edition of the travel diary of Ibrahim Beg, a late nineteenth century imaginary account of the travels of a reformer through Iran. (See NCH #28.)

[Sources include AI, Urgent Action Appeal 330/02 (7 November 2002, 14 February 2003); AAAS Human Rights Action Network, IR0219-agh, 12 November 2002, 20 February 2003; PEN, Rapid Action Network 55/02, 12 & 27 November & 10 December 2002, 19 February 2003; IOC 1/03: 123, 126; IOC 2/03: 155; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 407, 445; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 131; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 145-46.]

On 9 March 2003, Alireza Eshraghi, a journalist for the newspaper Hayat-e-No, was released on bail after 53 days' imprisonment in isolation. Eshraghi had been arrested on 12 January following the republication in the 8 January edition of Hayat-e-No of a 1937 United States (US) newspaper cartoon depicting a US Supreme Court judge under the thumb of then President Franklin Roosevelt. The cartoon represented the judge as a bearded, black-robed old man resembling the founder of the Islamic regime, the late Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (died 1989). The cartoon was printed alongside an article discussing "social collapse" in Iran, and was as such deemed insulting to Khomeini's memory. The Religious Court had ordered the newspaper's closure on 11 January. The editor subsequently apologized for the "misunderstanding" and then accused Eshraghi of being responsible for printing the cartoon.

[Sources: PEN, Rapid Action Network 20/03, 3 April 2003; IOC 2/03: 155; IOC 3/03: 148-49; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 152.]

IRAQ

In 2002, the Iraqi government continued to deny entry to Yuli Vorontsov, the United Nations Secretary General's high-level coordinator for the return of missing property and missing persons from Iraq to Kuwait. An estimated 605 Kuwaiti and third-country nationals were unaccounted for since the 1991 Gulf war. The Iraqi government renewed its demand for clarification of the fate of some 1,137 Iraqis whom it said had also been missing since 1991.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 456.]

In June 2002, Iraq acknowledged possession of Kuwaiti archives removed by its forces during the 1990-1991 occupation of the emirate. On 19 October 2002, the process of returning the archives started.

[Sources: IOC 1/03: 130; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 456.]

ISRAEL

In 2000, Teddy Katz (?1943-), a historian who had studied at Haifa University Middle Eastern History Department, was sued for libel by the Organization of Veterans of the Alexandroni Brigade (a militia of the Haganah, the forerunner of the Israel Defense Forces) after his highly graded MA dissertation, The Exodus of the Arabs from Villages at the Foot of Southern Mount Carmel in 1948 (1998)--dealing with a forgotten massacre in the village of Tantura on the night between 22 and 23 May 1948--had implicated the brigade in the killings of some two hundred unarmed villagers between the ages of thirteen and thirty (of a total of about 1,500 inhabitants), and excerpts from it were published in the Israeli press in January 2000. The Tantura case became the first in Israel's history in which the Nakbah (the "Catastrophe": the 1948 Palestinian expulsion and dispossession) was discussed in court. At an early stage of the trial in December 2000, Katz, not supported by his university, suddenly apologized and signed a compromise agreement with the veterans in which he repudiated his research and denied the massacre. However, he retracted the apology twelve hours later, saying that he had been under heavy pressure due to overwhelming media attention and the possible prospect of heavy damages (more than one million shekels), and had feared the relapse of a previous stroke. The judge decided in favor of the complainants. Katz appealed the decision and the case moved to the High Court. At the end of December 2000, the prosecutor urged the university to strip Katz of his title. Between April and June 2001, a Haifa University academic committee of four university lecturers examined the quality of the study and criticized it for four discrepancies between the taped interviews of 135 Arab survivors and Jewish veterans and the conclusions. In November 2001 the Haifa University Council for Advanced Studies decided on the basis of the committee's recommendations to disqualify the thesis and to withdraw Katz's degree, but the Middle Eastern History Department stopped this procedure, demanding that the measures be frozen until the court had issued a verdict and in anticipation of a wholesale revision of the thesis. During the same month, the High Court rejected Katz's appeal but overruled the decision that he had to publish an apology in the leading papers and decided that he was also allowed to explain his viewpoint publicly.

In May 2002, the expulsion from the university of historian Ilan Pappé (?1955-), senior lecturer at the Haifa University history (1992-1994) and political science (1994-) departments, author of The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947-1951 (London 1992), and former academic director of the Research Institute for Peace at Givat Haviva, was demanded before the university's disciplinary committee (called “academic disciplinary court”) on charges of defamation and “noncollegiality or deviation from ethics, such as appealing to organizations abroad, insulting colleagues, and damaging their academic integrity” for publishing an open letter in which he accused the university of moral cowardice in relation to the Katz case, but the committee suspended the case. Pappé maintained that other reasons for this attempt at expelling him (and for canceling one of his lectures and excluding him from conferences) were his independent research confirming the massacre of around 250 Palestinians in Tantura, an article written by him about the affair in Hebrew, his proposal to teach a course in 2003 on the Nakbah and “ethnic cleansing” during the 1948 war, and his support for a European financial and academic boycott of Israel’s universities for their alleged lack of independence.

[Sources include IOC 3/02: 207-9; IOC 3/03: 185.]

On 15 July 2002, the High Court rejected a petition from the family of an Israeli soldier killed in the 1982 invasion of Lebanon seeking public access to classified information relating to the 1982 Sabra and Shatila massacre. The judges ruled that it was for the government to decide whether the public’s right to know outweighed security needs. The issue will be re-examined in five years. (See also Belgium; see NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: IOC 4/02: 119].

ITALY

On 10 December 2002, a proposal by the parliament’s culture committee, drafted by members of Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi’s Forza Italia political party, called on the Ministry of Education to exercise direct control over the choice of history textbooks used in the school. Initiated by Member of Parliament Fabio Garagnani, it reportedly aimed at eliminating an alleged Marxist bias in certain textbooks. Among the textbooks was Elements of the History of the Twentieth Century, by Augusto Camera and Renato Fabietti, criticized for defending communism as an ideology in search of equality and freedom. Most Italian historians rejected the proposal.

[Sources: IOC 2/03: 157 and P. Willan, “Italian MP’s Threaten To Censor Textbooks”, Guardian, 18 December 2002.]

See also Libya.

JAPAN

In September 2002, a joint declaration of Japanese Prime Minister Koizumi Junichiro and North Korean leader Kim Jong Il in Pyongyang included an apology by Japan for its past colonial rule over Korea (1910-1945). During the meeting, Kim also admitted that North Korean agents had kidnapped thirteen Japanese citizens in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 143, 150.]

JORDAN

On 16 January 2003, Muhannad Mubaideen, a journalist of the weekly magazine Al-Hilal (The Crescent), was arrested following the publication on 14 January of his article entitled Aisha in the Prophet's Home about the Prophet Muhammad's wives (Aisha in particular) and his sexual life. He was charged with "insulting Islam", "damaging the prestige of the state" (Jordan's Hashemite rulers claim descent from the Prophet Muhammad's family), and "destabilizing society by propagating perversity and false rumours". Mubaideen, who maintained that his article was based on historical and religious references, was tried before a state security court and sentenced to eighteen months' (later commuted to six months') imprisonment, without recourse to appeal. Al-Hilal was banned for two months.

[Sources include PEN, Rapid Action Network 8/03, 19 February 2003].

In August 2002, the authorities closed the local office of the Qatar-based satellite television channel al-Jazeera, following the screening of a phone-in program deemed insulting to the royal family. It had included criticism of the late King Hussein (died 1999) in relation to the 1994 Jordan/Israel peace treaty.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 145.]

KENYA

President Daniel arap Moi refused to release a 1999 report by the presidential Commission on the Ethnic Clashes (known as the Akiwumi Commission) set up in 1998 to investigate politically motivated ethnic violence that occurred throughout Kenya between 1991 and 1998. In October, the High Court ordered publication of the report, which concluded that the clashes amounted to ethnic cleansing and implicated several high government officials and opposition leaders.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 42; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 149.]

In August 2002, a Nairobi court found publisher of Finance magazine and Kenyan Member of Parliament Njehu Gatabaki guilty of “publishing an alarming publication”. He had written an article linking President Daniel arap Moi to the deaths of 200 people in ethnic bloodshed in 1992. Sentenced to six months’ imprisonment, he was released by presidential decree five days later.

[Source: IOC 4/02: 120].

KOREA

See Japan, South Korea.

KUWAIT

See Iraq.

LEBANON

A government commission of inquiry on “disappearances”, set up in February 2001, concluded its work but its findings were not disclosed. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 159.]

See also Belgium.

LIBYA

On 26 October 2002, Libya closed its airports and cut international telephone lines with the outside world for a “Day of Mourning” to commemorate crimes committed by Italian colonial forces between 1911 and 1943. Italy said that it had honored its obligations in a one-off payment of $6.7 million in 1956 and a 1998 peace accord.

[Source: IOC 1/03: 130].

MALDIVES

In March 2002, Member of Parliament and historian Mohamed Nasheed lost his appeal. In late June, he was returned to Male after several months' exile in the Raa atoll, to serve the remainder of the sentence under house arrest. On 29 August, he was released but denied his parliamentary seat. (See NCH #27.)

[Sources: IOC 4/02: 121; IOC 1/03: 131; IOC 3/03: 153; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 171].

MEXICO

The government made the decision to publicly acknowledge acts of political violence committed by its security forces during the 1960s and 1970s, and to attempt to bring to justice those responsible for such crimes. In November 2001, the Comisión Nacional de Derechos Humanos (National Human Rights Commission) released a 3,000-page report on state abuses committed during that era. The report was largely based on information from secret government archives on more than 500 "disappearances" over the past three decades. It confirmed that at least 275 of these victims had been arrested, tortured, and killed by state security forces. After receiving the report, President Vicente Fox announced the creation of a special prosecutor's office charged with this task. Appointed in January 2002, the special prosecutor summoned former President Luis Echeverría Alvarez and others to answer questions about the massacres, but Echeverría chose not to respond to questions (exercising his constitutional right against self-incrimination). By late 2002, the office had received some 400 complaints of "forced disappearances", as well as eleven complaints related to the 1968 Tlatelolco massacre and four complaints related to the 1971 "Jueves de Corpus" massacre. In June 2002, the Fox administration also released 80 million pages of secret intelligence files compiled between 1952 and 1985. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 100, 153-54; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 175]

In 2002, several members of the paramilitary group Justicia y Paz (Justice and Peace) were detained and a further 19 people were sentenced to prison terms in connection with the 1997 massacre of 45 members of the indigenous community of Acteal. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 175.]

MOLDOVA

On 1 July 2001, some 500 teachers demonstrated in the capital Chisinau to protest the authorities' intention to replace the school textbook History of Romanians with a new textbook History of Moldova, thus replacing traces of “Romanianism” with “Moldovanism”, as was the case in historiography under the Soviet regime until independence in 1991. According to the intended compulsory book, the peoples of the two countries, Romania and Moldova, were historically different, as were their languages. The plan was opposed by the Academy of Sciences History Department, the State and Pedagogical Universities, and the Association of Historians, but not by the historians of the Association for the History of Moldova. After thousands of pro-Romanian Moldovans made the textbook case a central item in their almost daily antigovernment protests from January to April 2002., Minister of Education Ilie Vancea announced a moratorium on the plans. However, he was dismissed. On 24 April 2002, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe called for an extension of the moratorium. Culturally and historically linked with Romania, the territory of present Moldova was annexed by Russia and the USSR in 1812-1917 and 1940-1991; it was part of Romania in 1918-1939.

[Sources include AI, Report 2003 (2003) 176; and also M. Shafir, “Moldovan Teachers Protest History Manipulation Intention”, RFE/RL Newslines (WWW-text 3 July 2001).]

MOROCCO and Western Sahara

The process, begun in 1999, of compensating victims of “disappearances” and arbitrary detention in previous years and their families continued. However, the authorities failed to account for the cases of several hundred people, most of them Sahrawis, who “disappeared” between the 1960s and early 1990s. Investigations to establish responsibility for the grave and systematic human rights violations which occurred in the past were probably not started. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 177-78.]

On 16 December 2002, the authorities announced that a Moroccan magistrate would be appointed to record the testimony of retired security agent Ahmed Boukhari on behalf of a French judicial inquiry investigating the “disappearance” of opposition leader Mehdi Ben Barka, who was abducted in Paris in 1965. (See also United States; see NCH #17, #27.)

MYANMAR

The government continued its project to build new Buddhist temples and statues around the country, including on sites sacred to ethnic minorities. In the face of local objections, some monuments sacred to ethnic minorities were destroyed and replaced with new structures, such as hotels.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 204.]

Historian Ma Khin Khin Leh, sentenced to life imprisonment in 1999, remained in prison. (See NCH #18, #23.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 181.]

NETHERLANDS

See Suriname.

NEW ZEALAND

On 6 February 2003, so-called Pakeha (non-Maori) journalists were barred from the commemoration of the signing of the 1840 Treaty of Waitangi. Senior members of the Ngapuhi tribe, the site's traditional custodians, had complained about "adverse reporting" by these journalists in the past.

[Source: IOC 2/03: 162.]

NIGERIA

No one was brought to justice for the army raid in the town of Odi, Bayelsa State, in 1999, in which over 250 unarmed civilians were killed, nor for the killing of more than 200 civilians in Benue State in 2001. The federal government did not apologize officially for the killings and none of the victims or the families of those killed received information.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 190.]

In May 2002, the Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission, known as the Oputa Panel, inaugurated in June 1999 to investigate human rights violations committed between 1966 and the return to civilian rule in May 1999, submitted its final report to President Olusegun Obasanjo. The report was not made public and the government failed to disclose plans to implement recommendations made by the panel. (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 190.]

NORTH KOREA

See Japan.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

See Belgium.

PANAMA

In April 2002, a government-sponsored truth commission issued its final report on abuses committed during military rule.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 101.]

PARAGUAY

In August 2002, judicial authorities were asked to approach the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to seek clarification as to whether an extradition request against former President General Alfredo Stroessner (living in exile in Brazil), ordered by a judge in 2001 for his alleged role in the torture and killing of two brothers in 1974, had been submitted. (See NCH #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 197.]

PERU

Beginning in April 2002, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission held seven public and televised hearings in cities and rural areas across Peru, devoted to first-hand testimonies regarding massacres, extrajudicial executions, rapes, and other abuses committed by armed state and opposition groups between May 1980 and November 2000. The impartiality of the commission was repeatedly questioned by politicians belonging to the Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA, Popular American Revolutionary Alliance). APRA leader Alan García was Peru's president from 1985 to 1990, a period during which many of the abuses took place. In November 2002, the commission published a preliminary list of 7,000 cases of forced “disappearance”. The commission’s final report was scheduled for 2003. In April 2002, the attorney general appointed Felipe Villavicencio Terreros as Special Prosecutor on Forced Disappearances, Extrajudicial Executions and the Exhumation of Clandestine Graves. Since 2000 four mass graves were investigated. There were believed to be more than 500 clandestine burial sites across Peru. There was little progress in the government’s attempts to have former President Alberto Fujimori extradited from Japan to stand trial for crimes against humanity. In 2001, the attorney general had formally charged him with the murder of 15 people at Barrios Altos, Lima, in 1991, and with the forced “disappearance” and murder of nine students and a professor at La Cantuta University, Lima, a year later. (See NCH #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 100-101, 158-61; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 198-99.]

See also United States.

QATAR

See Jordan.

ROMANIA

From March 2001, Romanian citizens have the right to inspect their file kept by the former secret police Securitate, after those files were examined and cleared for breaches of national security by a joint commission of the current intelligence service (SRI) and the National Council for the Study of Securitate Archives (CNSAS). CNSAS attempts to make public the names of Securitate officers and informers met with sharp response from the SRI, which threatened CNSAS members with prison. (See NCH #10, #17.)

[Source: IOC 4/02: 54].

On 21 March 2003, the body of investigative journalist Iosif Costinas (?1941-) was found in a forest near Timisoara, eight months after he was last seen alive. He “disappeared” at a time when he was working on a book on Timisoara’s maffia and investigated the issues of unsolved murders during the 1989 anticommunist revolt and the presence of former Securitate members in positions of authority.

[Source: IOC 3/03: 157].

RWANDA

In 2002, the government launched “gacaca”, an innovative but controversial participatory, state-run justice system (with 254,162 lay magistrates) intended to speed up the trial of more than 100,000 detainees accused of genocide and to promote reconciliation. The government refused, however, to let gacaca courts hear allegations of war crimes by Rwandan Defense Force (RDF, formerly Rwandan Patriotic Army, RPA), and it tried to stop the United Nations International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) from investigating RDF suspects. In June 2002, the government imposed travel restrictions on ICTR prosecution witnesses and refused to provide access to documents needed by the prosecution, allegedly in order to delay trials.

On 16 January 2002, the ICTR restarted the trial of historian Ferdinand Nahimana, co-founder of Radio-Télévision Libre des Mille Collines. He pleaded not guilty to charges of genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, and crimes against genocide. (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: IOC 2/03: 164; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 61, 63, 65; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 210-12.]

SENEGAL

Despite pledges by the authorities to investigate past human rights violations, no steps were taken to institute an inquiry into the large-scale violations committed by the security forces in Casamance in the past decade.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 216.]

SIERRA LEONE

On 16 January 2002, the United Nations and the government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah signed an agreement that created the legal framework for the Special Court for Sierra Leone, an independent court using both international and Sierra Leonean law, judges, and prosecutors, established to try crimes committed from December 1996 onwards (although the internal armed conflict lasted from 1991 to January 2002). As the first mixed national and international tribunal of its kind, it was to operate for at least three years, beginning in mid-2003.

On 5 July 2002, Kabbah formally swore in the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) members, three international and four national. The TRC was expected to operate for fifteen months with a possible extension of a further six months. The general amnesty for all acts undertaken in pursuit of the conflict, which was provided by the 1999 Lomé peace agreement and subsequently passed into law, remained a serious impediment to addressing impunity comprehensively, although it was not a bar to prosecution by the Special Court. (See NCH #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 68-69, 517; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 12, 217.]

SOMALIA

In January 2002, the United Nations Independent Expert on Somalia called for independent investigations into past human rights abuses to assist the process of peace and reconciliation.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 223-24.]

SOUTH AFRICA

In 2002, South African victims of apartheid brought a multi-billion dollar suit in the United States against United States, Swiss and German banks as well as the IBM corporation, claiming that loans to the apartheid regime helped prop it up in defiance of a United Nations embargo which lasted from 1985 to 1993. (See NCH #14, #17, #23, #27.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 74.]

In 2000, the government failed to make arrangements for reparation payments to approximately 22,000 victims identified by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC). In March, the TRC was formally dissolved. Publication of its final volumes was, however, delayed when the Inkatha Freedom Party obtained a court order to prevent this. The army denied accusations that it had failed to turn over thousands of documents to the TRC. There was also concern that TRC documents relating to the previous government's chemical and biological weapons program had "disappeared" after having been handed to the National Intelligence Agency. (See NCH #14, #17, #23, #27.)

[Sources: IOC 3/02: 217; HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 74-75; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 226.]

SOUTH KOREA

On 14 November 2002, the two-year tenure of the Presidential Truth Commission on Suspicious Deaths was extended for a further year. The commission was established in October 2000 to "[find] the truth on suspicious deaths that occurred in relation to the Democratization Movement against past authoritarian regimes."

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 153.]

SPAIN

Among the six journalists detained and possibly tortured after the Basque-language daily newspaper Euskaldunon Egunkaria (Newspaper of the Basques; established 1990) in Andoain (northern Spain) was raided by the Civil Guard on 20 February 2003, was Juan Mari Torrealdai[i], its editor. Torrealdai[i] was also editor of the Basque literary magazine Jakin, and author of a number of books on Basque culture and literature, including three books on censorship under Franco, the latest of which was Artaziak--Scissors, Basque Books and Franco's Censorship 1936-1983 (2000). The newspaper, closed under antiterrorism legislation for allegedly being an instrument of the Basque armed group Euskadi Ta Askatasuna (ETA), denied any sympathy for ETA and referred to its frequent publication of articles critical of ETA. On 15 March, Torrealdai[i] was released. He claimed to have been subjected to ill-treatment.

[Sources: PEN, Rapid Action Network 13/03, 6 & 25 March 2003; IOC 2/03: 165; IOC 3/03: 159; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 120.]

In November 2002, the Spanish parliament for the first time condemned the regime of General Franco (1939-1975) and backed initiatives to uphold the memory of the victims of the 1936-1939 Civil War, including the exhumation of the common graves of over 30,000 people, most thought to be Republican.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 228.]

See also Guatemala, Turkey.

SRI LANKA

On 13 February 2003, all 23 Jaffna town council members resigned in protest after threats by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) over the reopening of the public library. LTTE wanted the library to remain closed until an annex documenting the destruction by fire of the library's Tamil-language books by Sinhalese mobs in June 1981 was built and the Tamil books replaced. The library's 95,000 volumes included many irreplaceable manuscripts.

[Source: IOC 2/03: 165-66].

In 2002, there were reports that members of the government were putting pressure on the Attorney General's Department not to proceed with investigations against members of the security forces suspected of involvement in past "disappearances". These investigations arose from recommendations of four presidential commissions of inquiry into "disappearances" which occurred from 1987 to 1994. (See NCH #14, #17, #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 230.]

SUDAN

In February 2002, the political association Republican Brothers was refused permission by the security services to hold a meeting in the capital Khartoum. It had planned to commemorate the anniversary of the execution of their spiritual leader, Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, in 1985.

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 234.]

On 17 March 2002, Edward Terso Lado, a reporter for the English-language daily Khartoum Monitor, was reportedly detained in Khartoum. Some linked the detention to his work on a history of Islam in Sudan.

[Source: IOC 3/03: 160.]

SURINAME

By mid-2002, reportedly more than 160 people had testified in the investigation into the 1982 "December murders". A team of forensic experts from the Netherlands played an advisory role during the exhumation of the bodies of the fifteen victims. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 234.]

In August 2002 the Public Prosecutor's Office ordered the reopening of the investigation into the killing of chief inspector Herman Gooding in August 1990, who was investigating the November 1986 Moiwana massacre of at least 35 people. In June 1997 the nongovernmental human rights organization Moiwana '86 had lodged a petition with the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights concerning the massacre. In December 2002, the Moiwana case passed to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. (See NCH #23.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 235.]

SWITZERLAND

See Haiti, South Africa.

TIMOR-LESTE (formerly East Timor)

In late 2002, President Xanana Gusmao announced his opposition to the Special Panel for Serious Crimes of the Dili District Court--set up by the United Nations to conduct trials in alleged cases of crimes against humanity committed by Indonesian military and local militias against at least one thousand civilians in Timor-Leste between 1 January and 25 October 1999, in the run-up to Timor-Leste's popular consultation and vote on independence in August 1999. According to Gusmao, the special panel did not address the more extensive crimes of the 1975-1999 period (during which tens of thousands of Timor-Leste's population were killed by Indonesian forces or died from disease or starvation as Indonesia, which had occupied Timor-Leste, attempted to defeat separatists led by Gusmao). On 21 January 2002, the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CRTR) was established; it was to work for two years to document human rights violations committed between April 1974 and October 1999 in Timor-Leste. The first public hearings took place in November. Prosecutions in Indonesia itself in relation to the 1999 events were described as a failure. On 14 August 2002, the Indonesian court found former East Timorese governor Abilio Osorio Soares guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced him to three years' imprisonment, well below the legal minimum of ten years. This and other verdicts triggered widespread international and domestic criticism. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 184-85, 230-33, 253-54, 517-18; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 128, 248.]

TURKEY

The state-supported Committee for the Coordination of the Struggle against Baseless Genocide Claims reportedly planned to open a museum to house and display documents designed to "counter" the historical records of the 1915 genocide in Armenia deployed by Armenians, and to collate and translate 20,000 documents from the Ottoman State archives and put them on the web.

[Source: IOC 4/02: 129].

In mid-December 2001 and mid-January 2002, a theology professor condemned Ömer Asan (?1963-) during a television discussion as being a traitor by associating with Pontic Greeks who wanted to seize the derelict Byzantine monastery of Panagia Soumela. Asan was the author of Pontus Kültürü (1996; The Culture of the Pontus), a study of the language, culture and history of a traditionally Greek-speaking, Muslim community on the Black Sea coast in Trabzon. On 19 January 2002 he appeared in a television program to defend himself, but the same accusations were made and the presenter accused him of insulting Atatürk's memory. Two days later, all copies of Asan's book were ordered to be seized. He was charged with writing "separatist propaganda". In March 2002, he was formally indicted for undermining state unity. He faced a penalty of between 14 months and 4 years in prison. The trial took place between July and November 2002.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 125-26.]

In September 2002, Pablo Neruda's poem Song to Mothers Whose Sons Have Died, a tribute to the bereaved of the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939), became the subject of a Turkish State Security Court prosecution after it was published in Turkey in the magazine Stance on Cultural Living. The magazine was banned and its owner and editor were accused of "spreading terrorist propaganda".

[Source: IOC 1/03: 140].

On 24 December 2002, the Istanbul state security court fined Abdullah Keskin, owner of Avesta publishing house, but found author Songül Keskin not guilty of separatist propaganda over the publication of the books Kurdish Uprisings and History of Kurdistan.

[Source: IOC 2/03: 167.]

In 2003, the National Security Council complained about the showing of a film called Ararat, claiming that the film was hostile to Turks and "propagated a genocide against Armenians".

[Source: IOC 3/03: 161.]

TURKMENISTAN

On 4 March 2002, President Saparmurad Niazov announced the creation of a commission to investigate crimes and human rights abuses by agents of the Committee for State Security (KNB, or secret police).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 372.]

UNITED KINGDOM

Several London boroughs removed the books of writer David Irving from their libraries, after a British court pronounced him an active Holocaust denier in April 2000. (See NCH #5, #6, #17.)

[Source: IOC 4/02: 131].

The Tribunal of Inquiry's hearings into the 1972 killing of 13 unarmed people by soldiers on Bloody Sunday were still continuing by the end of 2002. (See NCH #10, #14, #17, #23.)

[Sources: IOC 4/02: 93-98; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 263.]

UNITED STATES

When on 11 September 2001 Richard Berthold, history professor at the University of New Mexico, told his class "Anyone who can blow up the Pentagon gets my vote", state legislators threatened to cut the university's funding unless he was dismissed. Initially dismissed, Berthold was reprimanded after apologizing, but barred from teaching freshmen for a year.

[Sources include IOC 3/03: 64.]

On 7 January 2002, the State Department released 38 declassified documents in response to a request from a Peruvian congressional committee investigating charges of corruption and human rights abuses against Vladimiro Montesinos, the former de facto chief of the Servicio de Inteligencia Nacional (SIN; National Intelligence Service). Forty-one other documents, obtained under the Freedom of Information Act by the National Security Archive, were published during the same month. (See also Peru.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 163.]

On 21 August 2002, the State Department released 4,677 declassified documents about human rights abuses during Argentina's "dirty war" (1976-1983). Many documents proved relevant to cases under investigation in Argentine courts, especially the Galtieri case. (See also Argentina.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 106, 113-14.]

Human Rights Watch lobbied the authorities to release intelligence files on the 1965 "disappearance" of Moroccan opposition leader Mehdi Ben Barka. (See also Morocco, see NCH #17, #27.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 416.]

See also Argentina, South Africa, Yugoslavia.

URUGUAY

In October 2002, the Peace Commission, established in August 2000 to clarify the fate of Uruguayans who “disappeared” between 1973 and 1985, stated in a preliminary report presented to the President and to the public that, according to its findings, 26 political prisoners had died as a result of torture in Uruguay and 13 others in Argentina. The commission also stated that it believed that a further 41 Uruguayan political prisoners had suffered the same fate in Argentina. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003).]

VENEZUELA

In April and May 2002, Liliana Ortega, Executive Director of the Comité de Familiares de Víctimas de los Sucesos de Febrero-Marzo de 1989 (COFAVIC; Committee of Relatives of Victims of the Events of February-March 1989), received threats via telephone and electronic mail. During the 1989 events, known as Caracazo, security forces reportedly committed hundreds of killings after civil disturbances. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights ordered the Venezuelan State to compensate 44 of the victims.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 168; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 273.]

VIETNAM

In February 2002, colonel and military historian Pham Que Duong (?1933-) applied to run in the election, but local Vietnamese Communist Party officials rejected his candidacy, claiming he was a “dangerous element” and “guilty of twenty crimes”. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 272.]

The August 2002 edition of the Far Eastern Economic Review, published in Hong Kong, was banned because it reviewed a biography of Ho Chi Minh, which mentioned the leader’s alleged love affairs.

[Sources include HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 270.]

In October 2002, the Ministry of Culture and Information issued a reprimand to the state-operated printing houses, inter alia for publishing books that “distorted Vietnam’s history.”

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 271.]

YEMEN

In May 2000, Hisham Bashraheel, editor, and Hassan Ben Hassainoun, reporter of the independent daily Al-Ayyam, were reportedly charged with instigating “sectarian feuds” and “the spirit of separatism”, probably because an article by Hassainoun published in February 2000 which criticized the Yemeni authorities for their neglect and demolition of historical sites in Yemen.

[Source: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist (2003) 162.]

YUGOSLAVIA (Serbia & Montenegro)

The Swedish section of PEN awarded one of its Tucholsky awards to Yugoslav-born Roma poet Rajko Djuric, presently living in exile in Berlin. Djuric wrote on the culture and history of the Roma which had been preserved over centuries of displacement and persecution.

[Source: IOC 1/03: 144].

In February 2002, the trial of former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic--indicted when he was still a sitting head of state—in relation to crimes committed during the wars in Bosnia, Croatia, and Kosovo began. There were 66 counts of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. Milosevic conducted his own defense. The government also imposed severe restrictions on access by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia to archives, documents, and witnesses. In July and August 2002, the government freed a number of police officials from the obligation to guard state secrets while giving testimony in the Milosevic trial. (See NCH #23, #27.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 284, 297, 391-92, 395, 398; AI, Report 2003 (2003) 86, 278.]

As of November 2002, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, established by Yugoslav President Vojislav Kostunica, had failed to hold any hearings on war crimes and other abuses committed during the 1990s in Serbia and other parts of the former Yugoslavia.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 392.]

The governments of Serbia and Yugoslavia failed to protect freedom of expression when extreme nationalists repeatedly disrupted an exhibition of photographs by American artist Ron Haviv about the 1991-1995 war. The threats and violence forced the organizers to close down the exhibition in three places.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2003 (2003) 393.]

There were further exhumations of mass graves containing the bodies of ethnic Albanians transported from Kosovo to Serbia during the 1999 NATO campaign. The exhumations were monitored and aided by the International Commission on Missing Persons. Other exhumations of bodies of Croats and Bosnians from the wars of 1991-1995 began in March 2002 after years of intergovernmental negotiations. 223 Bodies were exhumed. A DNA laboratory was set up to assist with the identification of victims. In Kosovo, the International Civilian Police Force (CIVPOL) Missing Persons' Unit made limited progress in identifying the "disappeared" and abducted. There were some further exhumations of burial sites. However, few steps were taken to investigate the estimated 4,000 outstanding cases of "disappearance" and abduction, especially those of the estimated 1,200 Serbs, Roma and members of other minority groups abducted by the Kosovo Liberation Army or others after the entry of the NATO-led peacekeeping Kosovo Force (KFOR) into Kosovo. (See also Bosnia-Herzegovina; see NCH #23, #27.)

[Source: AI, Report 2003 (2003) 278-79.]

Network of Concerned Historians	NCH
Annual Report 2002	http://www.concernedhistorians.org

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

GENERAL

In August–September 2001 the third United Nations World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance was held in Durban, South Africa. The issue of reparations for slavery, the slave trade and colonialism provoked strong disagreements. The conference acknowledged that slavery and the slave trade “are a crime against humanity and should always have been so” and said that states have a “moral obligation” to “take appropriate and effective measures to halt and reverse the lasting consequences of those practices”. Human Rights Watch (HRW) argued that the descendants of victims of human rights abuses should be able to pursue claims for reparations and that the right to reparations was not extinguished with the death of the victim. Reparations should consist of compensation, acknowledgement of past abuses, an end to ongoing abuses, and, as much as possible, restoration of the state of affairs that would have prevailed had there been no abuses. To establish priorities for reparations, HRW proposed the establishment of national panels as well as one or more international panels to look at the effect of the slave trade and other international forms of systemic abuse. The panels would act as a kind of truth commission, aiming to determine how a government’s past racist practices had contributed to contemporary deprivation domestically and across world regions. (See NCH #23)

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 20, 25, 28, 495, 547, 615, 621–23, 627, 629, 638–39.]

See also Senegal, Suriname.

AFGHANISTAN

In October 2001, a new group, Citizens Against War Criminals, which included survivors of various civilian massacres, issued statements calling for a war crimes tribunal. Accountability for past abuses was demanded with respect to crimes by the Taliban, by commanders of the Northern Alliance (United Front), by mujahideen outside the alliance, and by Soviet commanders during their occupation of the country (1979–89).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 180, 190.]

ALGERIA

In 2001 the government provided no information about the investigations it claimed had been carried out into the massive human rights abuses committed since 1992, including thousands of cases of extrajudicial executions, killings, and torture, and some 4,000 “disappearances”. Similarly, no steps were known to have been taken to investigate information provided by families about the alleged burial place of relatives who had been abducted and killed by armed groups, but whose bodies were never found. (See NCH #23).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 30.]

ARGENTINA

In March 2001, a landmark decision by federal judge Gabriel Cavallo declared the country’s amnesty laws unconstitutional (the 1986 “full-stop law” and the 1987 “due-obedience law”, which granted immunity from prosecution for human rights violations committed under military rule during 1976–83). In November the ruling was affirmed in November by a Buenos Aires appellate tribunal. In September 2001, the Under-Secretary for Human Rights publicly acknowledged that 15,000 people had “disappeared” during the period 1976–83. Federal and provincial judges continued to investigate “disappearances” and extrajudicial executions of that period in so-called “truth trials” (hearings seeking to establish the truth about the crimes even though those responsible could not be prosecuted or convicted because of the amnesty laws). Former head of state Jorge Videla and others were among a dozen former retired officers held under house arrest on charges of ordering the theft of babies born to mothers in secret detention and their handover for adoption to military families. These crimes had been expressly excluded from the amnesty laws. In June 2001, Videla appeared in court to be questioned on charges of illicit association, illegal arrest and torture. He was accused of participating in Operation Condor (a secret criminal plan devised by Southern Cone military governments in the 1970s and 1980s to kidnap, exchange, or “disappear” political refugees from neighbouring states). Other judges sought the arrest and extradition of, among others, former dictators Alfredo Stroessner (Paraguay, 1954–89), Augusto Pinochet (Chile, 1973–90), and Hugo Banzer (Bolivia, 1971–79), for their alleged involvement in Operation Condor. In August 2001, the Chilean Supreme Court rejected the request for Pinochet’s extradition because of his parliamentary immunity from prosecution. (See NCH #14 and #23 under Chile).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) xvi, 105–106, 117–19, 131–32; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 34–35, 51, 72.]

See also United States, Uruguay.

BELGIUM

An increasing number of cases were filed in Belgian courts under its universal jurisdiction law (drafted 1993; revised 1999). Many of these charged current or former heads of state with war crimes, genocide, or crimes against humanity, including Paul Biya (Cameroon), André-Félix Patasse (Central African Republic), Hissène Habré (Chad), Augusto Pinochet (Chile), Fidel Castro (Cuba), Saddam Husayn (Iraq), Hashemi Rafsanjani (Iran), Ariel Sharon (Israel), Laurent Gbagbo (Ivory Coast), Yasser Arafat (Palestinian Authority), and Paul Kagame (Rwanda). On 14 February 2002, the International Court of Justice in The Hague ruled that officials still in power enjoyed diplomatic immunity. Amnesty International called on Belgium not to weaken its universal jurisdiction legislation in any way.

[Sources include HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 600; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 20, 48, 66, 83.]

In 2001 a parliamentary inquiry concluded that members of the Belgian government and other Belgian participants were “morally responsible” for the circumstances leading to the assassination of Congolese Prime Minister Patrice Lumumba in January 1961, but found no evidence that they had ordered his “physical elimination”. (See NCH #17 under Congo).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 47.]

See also Chad, Cuba, Israel, Palestinian Authority.

BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA

Tens of thousands of people were still missing after the war (1992–95). Many of those who “disappeared” were presumed killed by members of armed forces or paramilitary groups, including over 7,000 Bosnian Muslim men and boys detained and killed in mass executions by the Bosnian Serb army in Srebrenica in July 1995. In May and December 2001, new forensic laboratories in Tuzla and Sarajevo started their work, with the aim of accelerating the identification process by DNA analysis.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 54.]

In May 2001, an estimated 2,000 Bosnian Serb protestors violently disrupted a rebuilding ceremony for the sixteenth-century Ferhad Pasha mosque in Banja Luka, which had been destroyed in the war (1992–95).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 53.]

See also Yugoslavia (Serbia & Montenegro).

BRAZIL

In May 2001 thirteen men were convicted of ordering or carrying out an attack on around 100 Ticuna Indians at Capacete Creek, state of Amazonas, in 1988, in which fourteen people died, including six children. They were sentenced to between 15 and 25 years’ imprisonment. These were the first convictions for genocide handed down by a court in Amazonas.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 57.]

See Paraguay.

BULGARIA

In March 2001 a public prosecutor initiated a criminal investigation for incitement to racial or national hatred in connection with leaflets distributed by the United Macedonian Organization “Ilinden” (OMO “Ilinden”), calling on the residents of the region to declare themselves in the census as Macedonians. In July police prevented OMO “Ilinden” activists from holding a peaceful assembly to commemorate the foundation of the Republic of Macedonia. In October the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the authorities had violated the right to freedom of assembly and association when they prohibited OMO “Ilinden” activists from holding similar commemorative meetings in 1994–97. (See NCH #5).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 58, 60.]

BURUNDI

Trials related to the massacres of Tutsi civilians which followed the 1993 assassination of President Melchior Ndadaye continued in 2001. Thousands of Hutu, many of them supporters of FRODEBU (Front pour la démocratie au Burundi; Front for Democracy in Burundi), remained in detention awaiting trial. Few, if any, members of the security forces or Tutsi civilians were arrested and prosecuted by the Tutsi-dominated judiciary for their part in the reprisal killings of thousands of Hutu civilians. (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 40–41; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 63.]

CAMBODIA

In August 2001, the Cambodian King signed a law, passed by the National Assembly and Senate in July, to set up a tribunal to try some Khmer Rouge leaders of the former Democratic Kampuchea (1975–79). The law was criticized, inter alia because it did not contain the provision that prior amnesties would not be a bar to prosecution, a provision agreed upon earlier with the United Nations (UN). In November Prime Minister Hun Sen complained that the UN was causing delays in the process, and stated that the Cambodian side would proceed without the UN if necessary. In August, a seven-page letter by former Khmer Rouge leader Khieu Samphan was published, in which he offered an apology to the Cambodian people. (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 179, 199, 204; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 20, 64–65.]

CANADA

In January 2002, after six years of legal struggle, the Canadian Human Rights Commission ordered Holocaust denier Ernst Zündel to close his website of anti-Semitic propaganda. According to the commission, the social benefits of eliminating hate speech outweighed the issue of protection of free speech.

[Source: IOC 6/85: 30–31, 2/02: 104.]

CHAD

In March 2001 Senegal's Court of Final Appeal (Cour de Cassation) ruled that former Chadian President Hissène Habré (1982–90) could not be tried in Senegal for crimes allegedly committed in Chad. In September the government agreed to consider any future request for Habré's extradition on charges of crimes against humanity. Habré's one-party regime, supported by the United States and France, was marked by widespread abuse and campaigns against the ethnic Sara (1984), the Hadjerai (1987), and the Zaghawa (1989). In 1992, a truth commission had accused Habré's regime of 40,000 political murders and systematic torture. In October 2000, seventeen victims had lodged criminal complaints for torture, murder, and "disappearance" against named members of the Direction de la documentation et de la sécurité (DDS; Directorate of Documentation and Security; Habré's political police) in Chad itself. President Idriss Déby promised to clean up the administration by removing all former DDS agents and to grant full access to the truth commission files. In May 2001, the N'Djaména court of appeal ruled that, although a special court to try Habré and his collaborators, provided for in a 1993 law, had never been established, the ordinary courts had jurisdiction over the cases. A judge began to hear witnesses. More than twenty victims filed new cases. In November 2000, Chadian victims had already filed a criminal complaint against Habré in Belgium. (See NCH #17, #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 596–98; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 70, 213–14.]

CHILE

In December 2000, former President Augusto Pinochet was indicted in Chile. He was named as a suspect in 241 lawsuits. Although the indictment was confirmed by the Santiago appeal court in March 2001, it temporarily suspended criminal proceedings against Pinochet on medical grounds in July 2001. In August the Supreme Court decided to consider the legal action filed by the prosecution lawyers against the suspension, but in July 2002 it confirmed the July 2001 decision. (See NCH #14, #17, #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) xvi, 105, 127–32, 584; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 20, 71–72.]

In October 2001, the ban on journalist Alejandra Matus's book was lifted and Matus's prosecution was suspended. (See NCH #14, #23).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 130.]

See also Argentina, United States.

CHINA

In June 2000 historian Xu Zerong (anglicized name: David Tsui) (1954–), a specialist in the Chinese military intervention in the Korean War (1950–53), affiliated professor at the Southeast Asia Institute, Zhongshan University, Guangzhou (South China), and associate professor at the Provincial Guangzhou Academy of Social Sciences, Guangdong, was detained in Guangzhou and held incommunicado. In January 2002, he was sentenced to thirteen years' imprisonment on charges of "leaking state secrets" by sending photocopies of classified government documents related to the Korean War (concerning Chinese military operations and Chinese analysis of American and South Korean capabilities), obtained in 1992, to unknown parties overseas, and on charges of "economic crimes" by illegally publishing books and periodicals and selling book authorization numbers in China since 1993. His current place of detention is not known.

[Sources: HRW, Chinese Academics Detained (WWW-text; Washington 27 February 2002); International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Rapid Action Network 7/02 (London 20 February 2002); AAAS, Human Rights Action Network, Case CH0206_xuz (6 March 2002); NEAR; IOC 2/02: 105.]

A few weeks before Christmas 2000, hundreds of "illegal" Protestant and Catholic churches and Buddhist and Taoist temples and shrines in Wenzhou were demolished.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 210.]

In May 2001 "Today's Celebrities" was closed for printing articles about, inter alia, the Cultural Revolution (1966–76).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 207.]

Activists associated with the Southern Mongolian Democratic Alliance, which seeks to promote Mongolian traditions and cultural values, were monitored and in some cases arrested and sentenced on spurious charges.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 209.]

In May 2001, Wang Jinbo was arrested in Shandong after e-mailing out articles critical of official attitudes to the 4 June 1989 Tiananmen massacre. In November he was reportedly charged with subversion but his status has remained uncertain since. In mid-June, businessman Li Hongmin was detained after he had e-mailed a Chinese version of the Tiananmen Papers (a book published in New York and containing secret Chinese Communist Party documents from the period April-June 1989 concerning the Tiananmen massacre of 4 June 1989) to his friends. He faced a possible ten-year prison sentence for subversion. In September, Zhu Ruixiang, a former television editor who e-mailed texts from the book to twelve friends, was imprisoned for three years in Hunan Province on charges of subversion. In the same month, an Internet bulletin board at Huazhong University, Wuhan, Hubei Province, was reportedly closed after it carried items on the 1989 massacre. The authorities continued to refuse to hold a public inquiry into the Tiananmen massacre.

[Sources: IOC 1/02: 120–21, 4/01: 118, 1/02: 120; HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 206; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 74.]

In October 2001, after Pope John Paul had apologized for Catholic Church errors committed during the “colonial period” and expressed hope of establishing normal relations, Chinese religious officials responded by demanding that the Vatican first sever its ties with Taiwan, refrain from “using the pretext of religious issues to meddle in Chinese internal affairs”, and apologize for the 2000 canonization of “foreign missionaries and their followers who committed notorious crimes in China.” (See NCH #23).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 210.]

See also Japan.

CONGO

See Belgium.

CROATIA

See Yugoslavia (Serbia & Montenegro).

CUBA

In early October 2001, Cuban exiles filed a lawsuit in Brussels against President Fidel Castro and other high Cuban officials under the Belgian universal jurisdiction law. The complaint mentioned torture and other abuses inflicted upon political prisoners since 1960.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 112, 145–46.]

CYPRUS

In 2001 the Turkish Cypriot newspaper Avrupa was closed after the publication of an article by a Turkish Cypriot history schoolteacher (?1967–), in which she described Turkey as “an occupying force in Cyprus”. The teacher was dismissed and Avrupa raided.

[Source: IOC, 1/02: 123, 2/02: 106–7, 162–63.]

EAST TIMOR

In June 2001, a regulation establishing a national Commission for Truth and Reconciliation was adopted. The selection process for commissioners began in September. In the same month, East Timorese nongovernmental organizations (NGO’s) called for an international tribunal to try Indonesian officers and the militia commanders they had armed for the crimes committed in East Timor around the popular consultation on independence of 30 August 1999. In October the NGO’s also called for an international ad hoc tribunal to be set up to prosecute perpetrators of war crimes and crimes against humanity in East Timor occurring after Indonesia’s invasion of the country in 1975. By the end of 2001, over thirty indictments had been issued by the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) Serious Crimes Unit, responsible for the investigation and prosecution of cases relating to the 1999 violence. In Indonesia itself no one was brought to justice for the crimes; the ad hoc Human Rights Court on East Timor had not been established there by the end of 2001. UNTAET investigators continued to be denied access to witnesses and other evidence in Indonesia. (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 179–80, 218, 235; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 89, 90, 127.]

EL SALVADOR

In 2001 the Asociación pro-búsqueda de niñas y niños desaparecidos (Association for the Search for Disappeared Children) persisted with its requests to the government to create an official commission to locate children who had “disappeared” in the armed conflict (1980–92).

In November 2001 several NGO’s initiated the procedure for the case of Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero, murdered in March 1980, to be examined by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 94–95.]

ETHIOPIA

Trials of officials of the former Dergue government led by Mengistu Haile-Mariam (1974–91) on charges including genocide and extrajudicial executions proceeded slowly. Over 2,200 other former officials remained in prison awaiting trial. Several death sentences were imposed; no executions were reported. In March 2001, the special prosecutor for the trials said that they would be finished in 2004. (See NCH #17, #23).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 98, 99.]

EUROPEAN UNION

See Iraq.

FRANCE

In a book published in May 2001, General Paul Aussaresses, a high-ranking French military officer during the Algerian independence war (1954–62), admitted that he had personally taken part in torture and summary executions, claiming that they had been necessary, but maintained that the French government of the time had been directly implicated in them. In May and June, a number of legal proceedings against him and others were initiated. In July and September, an investigating judge refused to act on judicial complaints filed against Aussaresses for “crimes against humanity”. However, in November, Aussaresses appeared before a Paris court for “complicity in apology for war crimes”. Judgment was deferred until January 2002.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 103.]

Initial steps were taken to officially commemorate the 1961 massacre of up to 200 Algerians by mounting a plaque on the Pont Saint-Michel to the memory of “the many Algerians killed during the bloody repression of the peaceful demonstrations of 17 October 1961”. (See NCH #6, #23).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 103.]

Also see Morocco.

GHANA

In 2001 a debate was underway about the terms of reference, powers and composition of a Reconciliation Commission. In a bill introduced in Parliament in July, there was broad agreement with the government proposal that the commission should receive complaints and make recommendations about human rights violations committed between independence and the end of military rule (1957–93). President John Kufuor agreed to exhume for positive identification and proper reburial the bodies of eight generals who had been executed in 1979 on charges of corruption and treason. This was the first official step to deal with and resolve various extrajudicial executions which took place both before and during Jerry Rawlings’ regime (1979, 1981–2001).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 8; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 109.]

GUATEMALA

In 2000 “friendly settlements” had been agreed between the Guatemalan government and plaintiffs under the aegis of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, in which the government had accepted state responsibility for abuses.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 113.]

In December 2000 the Audiencia Nacional de España, Spain’s highest court, dismissed a 1999 suit by the Rigoberta Menchú Foundation against General Efraín Ríos Montt (who ruled 1982–83) and seven other military officials for genocide and crimes against humanity on the grounds that the petitioners had not exhausted the possibility of prosecuting the defendants in Guatemala. The foundation appealed the decision. In March 2001, the Guatemalan Constitutional Court had lifted the immunity of members of the Congress, including its current President Ríos Montt, so that they could face prosecution for illegally altering the text of a law after it had been voted on by Congress. In June a group of indigenous Maya Indians sued Ríos Montt and others in Guatemala for crimes committed during military rule. All those involved in the charges against Ríos Montt were intimidated.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 111–12, 149, 151; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 113.]

In October 2001, Matilde Leonor González Izas, a historian working for the Asociación para el Avance de las Ciencias Sociales (AVANCSO: Research Centre for the Advancement of Social Sciences), was kept under surveillance and, after having gone into hiding, received a number of threatening telephone calls. Her laptop computer, containing information on her research, was stolen. González believed the Estado Mayor Presidencial (EMP; Presidential Chiefs of Staff)--known to have played a key role in army intelligence operations and frequently cited as implicated in some of Guatemala's notorious human rights abuses--to be responsible. She had investigated and published controversial information on the mechanisms used by the military to manipulate and control local communities, such as San Bartolomé Jocotenango, El Quiché, and San Ildefonso Ixtahuacán, Huhuetenango, revealing military complicity in mob violence and lynchings taking place in rural communities throughout Guatemala. Since the beginning of her research in 1998–99 she has received numerous threats and intimidations. (See NCH #24).

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action Appeal 266/01 (19 October 2001) & 89/02 (22 March 2002); AI, Report 2002 (2002) 113; AAAS Human Rights Action Network, GU0113.Gon, 25 October 2001; PEN in Ifex Communiqué 11–9 (5 March 2002); NEAR].

In February, March and May 2002, anonymous threatening letters and phone calls were made against current or former employees of the nongovernmental Fundación de Antropología Forense de Guatemala (FAFG; Guatemalan Forensic Anthropology Foundation), the Oficina de Derechos Humanos del Arzobispado de Guatemala (ODHAG; Human Rights Office of the Archbishopric of Guatemala), the Centro de Antropología Forense y Ciencias Aplicadas (CAFCA; Centre of Forensic Anthropology and Applied Sciences), and the Asociación para el Desarrollo Integral de las Víctimas de la Violencia en las Verapaces Maya Achi (ADIVIMA; Association for the Integral Development of Victims of Violence in the Verapaces Maya Achi), all involved in carrying out exhumations of individuals massacred during the counter-insurgency campaign by the Guatemalan military in the early 1980s. It is believed that those behind the threats had ties to the military during Guatemala's civil war. At the time of the threats, there was a fire in a church in Nebaj, El Quiché, destroying most of the documents stored there, including information on 35 massacres recorded by the Catholic church between 1980 and 1983 in Nebaj alone. Since 1992, FAFG had carried out 191 exhumations of more than 2,000 victims of the armed conflict. Several of those threatened have given key forensic testimony in proceedings against former government officials for past human rights violations. Exhumations are also being carried out to provide further evidence in two genocide suits filed in Guatemala, by the Asociación Justicia y Reconciliación (AJR; Association for Justice and Reconciliation) and the Centro de Acción Legal en Derechos Humanos (CALDH; Centre for Legal Action in Human Rights), against officials in the administrations of former Presidents Romeo Lucas García (1978–82) and Efraín Ríos Montt (1982–83). (See NCH #26, #26 ii).

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 68/02 (5 & 13 March 2002); AI, Report 2002 (2002) 112–113; AAAS Human Rights Action Network, GU0207.for, 21 March & 16 May 2002.]

HAITI

On 26 May 2001, former General Prosper Avril, head of state after the 1988 coup (1988–90), was arrested on charges of assault, torture and illegal arrest. The circumstances and timing of the arrest suggested that it was politically motivated. It was made on the basis of a 1996 warrant ignored for years, but acted upon only after Avril attended a highly-publicized meeting of the main opposition coalition.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 155–56; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 120.]

In September 2001--on the tenth anniversary of the 1991 coup that drove him out of power--President Jean-Bertrand Aristide announced that the United States had returned thousands of pages of documents gathered from the offices of the Haitian military and the paramilitary Front Pour l'Avancement et le Progrès d'Haiti (FRAPH). The documents detailed paramilitary abuses after the 1991 coup and were seized by US forces in September 1994. It was believed, however, that the names of US citizens had been erased from the returned documents, a provision that previous Haitian administrations had publicly rejected. (See NCH #6, #17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 157; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 120.]

HONDURAS

There was no significant progress in the investigation or judicial proceedings regarding cases of “disappearance” in the 1980s. During exhumations in a specific location no remains of known “disappeared” people were found.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 121.]

INDIA

In July 2001 a crowd of 300 people demolished a sixteenth-century mosque at Asind near Bhilwara, Rajasthan, and built a makeshift Hindu temple in its place. The mob was encouraged by activists of two right-wing Hindu groups, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 223.]

In the hope of achieving a comeback victory in the February 2002 assembly elections in Uttar Pradesh, the Bharatiya Janata Party (ruling since 1998) and its allies amplified calls to build a temple to the Hindu god Rama at the site of the Babri Masjid, a mosque in the city of Ayodhya demolished by Hindu rioters in December 1992. The 1992 demolition had sparked the 1992–93 Mumbai (Bombay) riots, which claimed 1,788 lives, mostly Muslims. There was little progress, however, in the cases of individuals indicted by the Shrikrishna Commission for their role in the riots.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 223–24; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 124.]

INDONESIA

In late 2001 a bill in parliament to set up a National Truth and Reconciliation Commission along the lines of the South African model was not discussed.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 231.]

See also East Timor.

IRAN

In September 2001, Hassan Youssefi Eshkevari was allowed to leave prison for two days but it was unclear whether he remained under sentence of death. In November it was reported that his sentence had been reduced to thirty months' imprisonment and removal of his status as a cleric. (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 428; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 129.]

IRAQ

In a resolution adopted on 30 November 2000, the European Parliament urged the European Council and Member States to take the initiative at the United Nations and propose the formation of an ad hoc International Tribunal on Iraq to investigate the responsibility of Saddam Husayn's regime for war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 394, 438.]

IRELAND

The Independent Commission of Inquiry into the 1974 bombings in Dublin and Monaghan, which resulted in 33 deaths and many injuries, continued to collect evidence about the circumstances of the bombings.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 133.]

ISRAEL

In June 2001, lawyers representing 28 survivors of the September 1982 massacre by Lebanese Phalange militia of hundreds of Palestinian and other civilians at the Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila in Beirut lodged a complaint in Brussels against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israel's defence minister in 1982 who permitted the militia to enter the camps. Sharon was accused of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide. In November 2001, a court heard opening arguments from the Belgian prosecutor and from Sharon's attorney. In January 2002, Elie Hobeika, whose militiamen carried out the massacre, was assassinated after he had declared to testify in the case. The Israeli Government's Kahan Commission that had investigated the massacre in 1983 concluded that Sharon bore "personal responsibility". (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 394, 450, 599; IOC 2/02: 115.]

In July 2001 the Israeli Ministerial Committee for Legislation approved an application for continuity of an intifada law that would end compensation payments to Palestinians whose property was harmed during the 1987–93 intifada and preclude compensation suits by Palestinians injured during the current clashes.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 444.]

In August 2001 the Israeli authorities shut Orient House, the headquarters of the Palestine Liberation Organization in East Jerusalem, and confiscated its archives.

[Source: IOC, 2/02: 119.]

See also Palestinian Authority.

JAPAN

In December 2000, the issue of “comfort women” (women forced to provide sexual services to Japanese soldiers during the Pacific War of 1931–45) returned to centre stage when a people’s tribunal convened in Tokyo. In August, China and Korea were outraged by the new Japanese Prime Minister Koizumi Junichiro’s visit to the Yasukuni shrine honouring Japanese war heroes. (See NCH #23).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 180, 216.]

In March–April 2001, South Korea, North Korea, China, and Taiwan protested against a Japanese high school history textbook, New History Textbook, written for schoolchildren aged 13 to 15 and to be used in the classes from 2002, before and after its approval by Japan’s Ministry of Education. They demanded 35 revisions to the book, but only two changes were made. The textbook reportedly glossed over Japan’s militaristic past. The original draft of the textbook, written by the Japanese Society for History Textbook Reform—a group of nationalist historians including Nobukatsu Fujioka and Kanji Nishio—described the “unopposed” annexation of the Korean peninsula (1910) as “necessary for Japan’s security” and referred to the 1937 Nanjing Massacre as “nothing like a holocaust”. No reference was made to the question of “comfort women”. The approved version, containing more than 130 revisions, acknowledged that an “armed struggle” took place in Korea and had removed the attempt to downplay the Nanjing Massacre. Controversial sections were left in, including a description of Japanese soldiers braving “death with honour”. In a joint declaration, 900 historians condemned the textbook as a distortion of history. On 8 August an arson attack claimed by a radical left-wing group caused minor damage to the society’s offices. Almost all school districts in Japan reportedly rejected the textbook.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 180, 216; IOC, 3/01: 102; and also BBC News Online (WWW-text; London) 2001: 15 March; 3, 4, and 9 April; 8, 10, and 15 August.]

See also Peru.

KENYA

A motion in parliament to establish a Truth and Reconciliation Commission to explore human rights violations since 1966 was defeated.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 60.]

In July 2001 a number of opposition activists were detained, following a tree-planting ceremony to commemorate the killing of protestors against one-party rule in 1990. The police, armed with anti-riot gear, used batons and tear gas to disperse the gathering, which had been authorized.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 146.]

In October 2001, 71 members of the nongovernmental group Release Political Prisoners were detained for several days and charged with holding an illegal meeting, because they commemorated Mau Mau day to honour those who had fought for Kenya's independence from British colonial rule (1952–56).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 62.]

KOREA

See Japan.

LEBANON

In February 2001, a Commission of Inquiry to investigate the fate of thousands of Lebanese who went missing or “disappeared” during the civil war (1975–90) started its work. The commission, headed by the Minister of State for Administrative Development, was said to have received information on at least 700 cases from relatives of “disappeared” people by the end of 2001. The commission's mandate was reportedly extended for a further six-month period.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 156.]

Also see Israel.

MALAYSIA

In [January] 2001 police stopped a book launch party at a restaurant attended by more than 1,000 former Labour Party members. The book was a historical account of the party disbanded three decades ago.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 240.]

MALDIVES

In November 2001 politician, writer and historian Mohamed Nasheed was found guilty of the theft of unspecified government property from the home of ex-president Ibrahim Nasir and sentenced to thirty months of internal exile. The real reason for his exile was believed to be his support for a political party system and his attempts to make government ministers accountable to the Majlis (parliament).

[Sources: IOC, 2/02: 116; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 167–68.]

MAURITANIA

Despite official abolition in 1981, slavery or practices analogous to slavery continued.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 168.]

MEXICO

In December 2000, during his inaugural address, President Vicente Fox promised to establish a truth commission to examine past human rights abuses, such as the 1968 Tlatelolco massacre and the 1997 massacre of villagers in Acteal, Chiapas. By the end of 2001, no such commission had been established. Fox did, however, order his government to grant public access to files on “disappearances” of hundreds of suspected leftists in the 1970s and 1980s. In November 2001, after the Comisión Nacional de Derechos Humanos (CNDH; National Human Rights Commission) produced a report documenting 532 “disappearances” from the 1970s and 1980s, Fox ordered the creation of a Special Attorney to investigate these crimes. The commission report represented the Mexican government’s first official acknowledgement of responsibility for the abuses, but it did not name the estimated 74 public officials said to be personally implicated in them. Also in November, several of those reportedly responsible for the 1997 Acteal massacre were acquitted and released. New photographic evidence of the 1968 Tlatelolco massacre emerged, which increased pressure for investigations into the case to be reopened.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 106, 160; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 171-72.]

MOROCCO

For much of 2001 there were revelations in the media about the “dirty war” carried out against dissidents during the 1960s and 1970s and about the situation at the secret Tazmamert prison. While torturers were named, a taboo remained against implicating King Hassan II in the repression of those years. The memoir of Malika Oukfir, Stolen Lives: Twenty Years in a Desert Jail, was banned in Morocco. The book described how her entire family was imprisoned for nearly two decades in reprisal for a failed coup attempt by her father, Interior Minister Mohamed Oukfir, in 1972. Official steps were taken to compensate some victims. An arbitration commission, created in 1999 at King Mohamed VI’s request within the official Conseil Consultatif des Droits de l’Homme (CCDH; Human Rights Advisory Board), determined the amount to be paid to victims of prolonged illegal detention and to the relatives of “disappeared” persons who had applied for compensation. Critics pointed out that the process of compensating victims was neither transparent nor accompanied by any larger truth-seeking project. Some relatives of persons who “disappeared” said that they would accept no money so long as the fate of their loved ones was not revealed or their abusers either identified or held accountable. Despite the authorities’ stated commitment to address all past human rights violations, no additional steps were taken to adequately resolve the cases of grave abuses committed between the mid-1960s and the early 1990s, notably the “disappearance” of several hundred people, the majority of them Sahrawis. By the end of 2001, the deaths of scores of “disappeared” had still not been acknowledged by the authorities. Their families had not been told the whereabouts of the remains or received the bodies for burial. Among them were some 70 Sahrawis who “disappeared” in secret detention centres between 1976 and 1991. (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 394, 454–56; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 174.]

In June 2001, former secret police officer Ahmed Boukhari published an article in Le Journal Hebdomadaire and the French daily Le Monde about the 1965 “disappearance” of the exiled opposition leader of the Moroccan Left Mehdi Ben Barka, who “disappeared” in Paris in October 1965. According to Boukhari, Ben Barka died in France while under interrogation by Moroccan agents, who secretly arranged to fly his body back to Morocco where it was dissolved in acid. Twice, in September and December, Boukhari was unable to appear as a witness at a French judicial inquiry into the Ben Barka case as he was sentenced in two different trials to several months’ imprisonment. The handling and timing of the case suggested that the Moroccan authorities were trying to prevent him from testifying. Also in June 2001, Alain Chabod, deputy chief editor of France 3 television station, was harassed by the Moroccan Secret Service (DST) as he tried to investigate new evidence regarding the Ben Barka case. DST officers also demanded a halt to the printing of the weekly Demain, which contained some of the new evidence. The weekly’s editor Ali Lmrabet was photographed and verbally threatened, but the printing restriction was later lifted. A coalition of international human rights groups urged the United States and French governments to declassify and release all official documents related to the case. By the end of 2001, no judicial investigation had been launched in Morocco into alleged state involvement in Ben Barka's death. (See NCH #17).

[Sources: IOC 4/01: 127; HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 394, 456; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 174.]

NETHERLANDS

See Suriname, Yugoslavia (Serbia & Montenegro).

NIGERIA

The Human Rights Violations Investigation Commission appointed by President Olusegun Obasanjo in June 1999 to investigate human rights abuses between 1966 and the return to civilian rule in May 1999 (including during the civil war of 1967–70) and named the Oputa Panel after its chairman, received over 10,000 submissions, of which it was only able to consider around 200; these included numerous testimonies of killings, rape, and other abuses by the security forces against Ogoni civilians in the oil-producing Niger Delta region in 1993–94. The commission held public hearings in Lagos, Abuja, Port Harcourt, Kano, and Enugu, that were televised and closely followed by the public. By October 2001, when the commission concluded its hearings, former heads of state Muhammad Buhari (1983–85), Ibrahim Babangida (1985–93) and Abdulsalami Abubakar (1998–99) had refused to testify. President Obasanjo himself appeared several times before the panel in connection with events during his first presidency as military ruler (1976–79). The Oputa Panel was underresourced and had limited powers: it could make recommendations but not ensure arrests or prosecutions. In May 2002 it presented its results. (See NCH #17, #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 70; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 185.]

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

In late November 2001, lawyers representing some thirty Israelis lodged a complaint in Brussels against Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and other Palestinian officials and leaders, accusing them of murder, crimes against humanity, and genocide. The complaint named Arafat as the “principal conspirator” in a number of attacks on civilians carried out by Palestinians since 1996 in both Israel and other countries.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 394, 450.]

See also Israel.

PARAGUAY

In December 2000, a Paraguayan judge submitted a request for the extradition from Brazil of former General Alfredo Stroessner, whose rule (1954–89) was characterized by human rights abuses such as political killings and “disappearances”. Following the third periodic report on Paraguay of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights in March 2001, the government stated that a National Plan for the Protection and Promotion of Human Rights had been devised and would include the creation of a Truth and Justice Commission. No information had been received on the operation of this commission by the end of 2001.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 125; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 193.]

See also Argentina.

PERU

In November 2000, the Human Rights Ombudsman’s office published a report on “disappearances” between 1980 and 1996, documenting 4,022 cases of victims whose fate was still unknown. In a November 2001 update, the ombudsman put the total number at 6,362. Dozens of mass graves were discovered during 2001; reports indicated that they dated from the same period. There were concerns from the Ombudsman and others that the investigations into the hundreds of bodies found in these graves were at risk because the evidence had been interfered with, in part because the authorities had failed to properly protect the sites. In June 2001 a Truth Commission headed by the rector of the Catholic University Salomón Lerner, was established by interim President Valentín Paniagua to investigate responsibility for the systematic human rights violations committed by the state and by armed opposition groups between May 1980 and November 2000. The government of Alejandro Toledo changed the commission’s title to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. At the end of October, the commission published its “Rules on Organization and Functions” which established that the Commission would have access to all official files in the hands of the judiciary, public ministries and the military justice system. The commission was mandated to investigate violations of collective rights of Peru’s Andean and native communities as well as violations of individual rights. It was also empowered to hold public hearings and to name those responsible for human rights violations, but not to subpoena government officials to testify.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 106, 164–65, 167; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 194–95.]

In August 2001 Congress voted unanimously to remove former President Alberto Fujimori's immunity from prosecution. In September the attorney general filed charges of murder, causing grave injuries, and "disappearances" against him and Vladimiro Montesinos, the former de facto chief of the Servicio de Inteligencia Nacional (SIN; National Intelligence Service). It was believed that Fujimori had full knowledge of the existence of the Grupo Colina death squad attached to SIN and thought to be responsible for the crimes. The same month, an international warrant was issued to Interpol for Fujimori's arrest, pending the submission to Japan of a formal extradition request. The Japanese government, which had recognized Fujimori's claim to Japanese nationality, stated repeatedly that its laws prohibited the extradition of its citizens.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 164–5; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 141.]

See also United States.

RWANDA

In March 2001 the attorney general issued a revised list of category-one suspects of the 1994 genocide. Some 800 persons had been added to the previous list issued in 1999, bringing the total to nearly 2,900. Among the additions was Pierre-Célestin Rwigema, a former prime minister (1995–2000) living in exile. In 2001 approximately 1,300 people were tried and at least 120 people were sentenced to death for crimes committed during the genocide, some after unfair trials. An estimated 111,000 people continued to be detained, 95 per cent of them had been accused of taking part in the genocide. The Public Prosecutor's Office continued the procedure begun in October 2000 of bringing such detainees before their local communities in order to gather testimony for the prosecution before gacaca tribunals (a controversial, community-based system of justice). Trials of leading genocide suspects continued at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in Arusha, Tanzania. Fifty-two suspects were detained awaiting trial at the end of 2001. In early 2001, the Rwandese Patriotic Front (RPF)-led government agreed to cooperate with the ICTR's investigation into crimes against humanity allegedly committed by RPF members in 1994. (See NCH #17, #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 79; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 207–9.]

SENEGAL

In August 2001 human rights activist Alioune Tine was briefly detained for interrogation after declaring publicly that President Abdoulaye Wade's view that reparations for slavery would be "absurd and insulting" was "scandalous and inopportune."

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 214.]

See also Chad.

SIERRA LEONE

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission, mandated under the 1999 Lomé Peace Accord, was yet to be set up. In July 2001 the United Nations Security Council approved plans to go ahead with the Special Court for Sierra Leone despite financial problems. Issues which remained unresolved included whether the court would have jurisdiction over crimes committed since the civil conflict began in 1991 or only from 1996, and the court's relationship with the prospective Truth and Reconciliation Commission. (See NCH # 17, #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 84–85; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 19, 216.]

SLOVAKIA

On 8 November 2001, parliament amended the Penal Code to make it a criminal offence to deny the Holocaust or belittle its crimes.

[Source: IOC 1/02: 136.]

SOMALIA

In May 2001 the Transitional National Government announced that it was appointing a 25-member National Commission for Reconciliation and Property Settlement. However, the chairperson resigned in July, citing a lack of government support.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 221.]

SOUTH AFRICA

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) continued hearing amnesty applications until 31 May 2001, when its work was formally ended. The government stated that legislation setting the framework for reparations to the victims would be introduced to parliament in 2002. The court case brought against the TRC by Inkatha Freedom Party leader, Chief Mangosuthu Buthelezi, to compel it to reverse its finding that he was complicit in large-scale human rights abuses had not concluded by the end of 2001. In August 2001 the minister of justice told parliament that the government had committed funds for “final reparations” for victims of human rights violations, but that the details would not be discussed in parliament until the President received the final volumes of the TRC report.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 89; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 222, 223.]

In March 2001 the Promotion of Access to Information Act came into effect, giving substance to the constitutional right to access government and privately held information.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 89.]

See also “General”.

SPAIN

In 2000 contemporary historian Txema (=José María) Portillo (?1962–) and social anthropologist Mikel Azurmendi (?1943–), both working on the history of Basque nationalism at the Universidad del País Vasco, Vitoria, and involved in protests against terrorism, went into voluntary temporary exile in the United States after three years of ETA harassment and threats. Azurmendi had been an ETA member until 1970, but after ETA’s violent attacks on the Franco regime, he left to join the Basque prodemocracy movement. (See NCH #14, #17, #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 560, 646; and also El País (WWW-text) 15 June 1998; 18 August 2000; 13 July 2001.]

See also Guatemala.

SRI LANKA

Sri Lankan authorities appeared more willing than in the past to acknowledge official responsibility for atrocities. In February 2001, the attorney general reportedly issued indictments against more than 600 police and armed forces personnel implicated in pre-1994 “disappearances”. In July President Chandrika Kumaratunga announced the formation of a three-member Truth Commission to investigate incidents of ethnic violence between 1981 and 1984, including anti-Tamil riots in July 1983 in which nearly 600 people were killed.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 252, 255; but see also AI, Report 2002 (2002) 228.]

After the state-run Sunday Observer had published an article questioning the authenticity of the Buddha’s tooth relic housed in a temple in Kandy, 97,000 copies of the 6 January 2002 edition were destroyed by the government.

[Source: IOC 2/02: 123–24.]

SUDAN

In [August] 2001 professor Bona Malwal, a senior research fellow at Oxford University, filed a court action in Nairobi against Michael George Garang Deng, editor of Update magazine (a publication supporting the Sudanese People’s Liberation Army), which according to Malwal falsely linked him to the assassination of southern Sudanese leader William Deng Nhial in 1968.

[Source: IOC 4/01: 133.]

SURINAME

In March 2001, an Amsterdam appeal court issued a ruling allowing Dutch prosecutors to investigate the “possible involvement” of former Suriname military leader Desi Bouterse in the December 1982 assassinations of leading members of the Suriname society (called the “December murders”). The appeal court authorized the retrospective application of Dutch legislation that implemented the 1984 Convention against Torture. The judges found that because the acts had been prohibited by preemptory norms of international law, it was permissible to apply the 1988 Dutch enabling legislation to the 1982 acts. In September the Dutch Supreme Court reversed this decision. Prosecution efforts continued in Suriname. Trade unionist and political leader Fred Derby, sole survivor of the massacre, died in May 2001.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 600; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 231.]

During the follow-up of the United Nations World Conference against Racism in September 2001, the government of the Netherlands expressed regret for past Dutch involvement in slavery in Suriname, its former colony.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 231.]

See also "General".

SYRIA

Following his release from prison in May 2001, human rights activist Nizar Nayouf campaigned for accountability for past abuses, including torture, deaths in detention (including the 1980 summary execution of as many as 1,100 Islamist inmates at the Tadmor military prison in retaliation for an assassination attempt on the then President Hafez al-Asad), and extrajudicial executions. He formed the National Council for Truth, Justice and Reconciliation to document abuses, press for perpetrators to be brought to justice, and assist former political prisoners who were stripped of their civil and political rights and denied reemployment in their former jobs.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 394, 470.]

THAILAND

In September 2001, the government appointed a new committee to investigate the military crackdown against prodemocracy demonstrators in May 1992, which resulted in over thirty "disappearances", more than fifty deaths, and hundreds of injuries. However, by the end of 2001, no one had been brought to justice and there was no information about the fate of the "disappeared".

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 242–43.]

TOGO

Impunity for those responsible for human rights violations in the last two decades continued. In February 2001 an International Commission of Inquiry on Togo, set up by the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity to verify allegations made by Amnesty International in 1999 of hundreds of extrajudicial executions at the time of the 1998 presidential elections, published its report. It concluded that those killed were mostly opposition supporters. At least a dozen of those who testified before the commission were intimidated and harassed during its visit and after publication of its report.

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 243, 244.]

TURKEY

In March 2001 plainclothes police officers arrested archeology student Emrullah Karagoz (?1978-) and held him at the Diyarbakir Police Headquarters, where he was reportedly tortured. In early July he was released. On 28 October he was rearrested and on 1 November brought before a judge, charged with “aiding and abetting an illegal organization”, and remanded to Diyarbakir prison. Before arriving there on 11 December, he was allegedly intimidated and severely tortured at the gendarmerie headquarters for forty-four days. Karagoz, who worked for the youth wing of the legal pro-Kurdish political party HADEP, was previously detained in June 1999 and November 2000 for political reasons. Plainclothes police apparently raided his house several times shortly before Newroz (the Kurdish New Year which is celebrated on 21 March). (See NCH #21, #21[ii], #21[iii], #21[iv], #23).

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 22/01 (28 March & 16 August, 2001), 280/01 (5 & 20 November 2001; 3 January 2002)].

In January 2002, publisher Ayse Nur Zarakolu (1947–2002) died. She was the director of Belge publishers, known for her books on minority rights and Turkey’s military history. Zarakolu had served prison terms in 1982 (for publishing documents from the Turkish Communist Party’s founding congress), 1984, 1994 (for publishing a book on Kurdish history of Ismail Besikci), and 1996. She lived under constant harassment. Her offices were bombed in 1995. She published, inter alia, Genocide As a Question of National and International Law: The 1915 Armenian Event and Its Consequences, by Vahakn Dadrian, The Armenian Taboo, by French historian and surgeon Yves Ternon, and “Disaster of Dersim”, by Haydar Isik.

[Sources include: PEN in Ifex Communiqué 11–9 (5 March 2002); IOC, 2/02: 126].

In February 2002 the National Security Court of Diyarbakir started an investigation into American linguist and philosopher Noam Chomsky’s speech at the city’s theater hall. Chomsky had spoken about “the noble and tragic history of the Kurds”.

[Source: IOC, 2/02: 125–26.]

TURKMENISTAN

In March 2001 state libraries were instructed to confiscate the works of about twenty authors, some of whom had “inaccurately depicted” the country’s history.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 364.]

UNITED STATES

Within the framework of the Clinton Administration Chile Declassification Project, initiated after General Augusto Pinochet’s arrest in London in October 1998, 16,000 secret US documents on political violence in Chile in 1968–90 were declassified by November 2000. They included 700 heavily censored controversial CIA records of US covert operations in 1968–75, which the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) Directorate of Operation had initially refused to release. On 31 July 2000 Archivist of the United States John Carlin had written a letter to national security adviser Samuel Berger, denouncing the refusal. Much of the released information had already been summarized in the 1975 reports of the Senate Select Committee to Study Government Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 131; and also: National Security Archive, History Held Hostage: The CIA’s Refusal to Declassify the Covert Record on Chile (WWW-text by P. Kornbluh; 17 August 2000), and idem, Chile: 16,000 Secret US Documents Declassified (Press release; 13 November 2000).]

In November 2000 the then Secretary of State Madeleine Albright promised to declassify State Department documents on “disappearances”, the theft of babies, and Operation Condor in Argentina. The documents, which would probably not include CIA or Defense Department files, were still awaited in November 2001. In July and August 2001 an Argentine and a Chilean judge sent letters rogatory to the State Department requesting depositions by former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger on several cases. Declassified documents showed that Kissinger had been informed about Operation Condor. See Argentina.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 120–21, 131.]

In 2001 proposed legislation that could criminalize the disclosure of classified information was presented again by senator Richard Shelby. The original bill, vetoed under the Clinton administration, included sanctions against leaks of information not of national security interest and could be used to force journalists to reveal their sources.

[Source: IOC 4/01: 137.]

In June 2001 the nongovernmental National Security Archive published documents declassified under the Freedom of Information Act about the early links of the United States with Vladimir Montesinos in the 1970s. See Peru.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 169.]

In [2002], following a parent's complaint, Sophie's Choice, a book about the Holocaust by William Styron, was withdrawn from La Miranda High School library for containing sexual references. The National Coalition against Censorship (NCAC) appealed to the school official on the grounds of students' First Amendment rights.

[Source: IOC 2/02: 129.]

See also Argentina, Haiti, Morocco.

URUGUAY

In August 2001 the Peace Commission, established in August 2000 to clarify the fate of Uruguayans who "disappeared" between 1973 and 1985, reported that it had shed light on 15 out of 34 cases of "disappeared" persons. It established that they died in custody as a result of torture but that their bodies had not been found. It also uncovered information about five out of hundred who "disappeared" in Argentina. The commission would reportedly extend its working period until it had been able to clarify more cases. However, the 1986 Expiry Law prevented perpetrators from being brought to justice; the law granted exemption from punishment to police and military personnel for human rights violations committed for political motives or when obeying orders before 1 March 1985. (See NCH #23).

[Source: AI, Report 2002 (2002) 261]

See also Argentina.

VATICAN

See China.

VIETNAM

In September 2001 military historian and dissident Pham Que Duong (?1933–) was arrested after he and others had submitted a request to the government to form an independent anti-corruption organization and campaigned for the repeal of decree 31/CP, which authorized detention for up to two years without trial. (See NCH #23).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) 260, 649.]

YUGOSLAVIA (Serbia & Montenegro)

On 28 June 2001, former Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic was surrendered for trial at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. In May 1999 and in October 2001, he was charged with responsibility for crimes against humanity, war crimes, and sexual violence committed in Kosovo in 1998–99; for war crimes and crimes against humanity in Croatia in 1991–92; and for genocide and crimes against humanity in Bosnia-Herzegovina in the 1992–95 conflict, either by giving direct orders or through omission as effective commander of Serbian police, army and paramilitary groups. The prosecution of a former head of state, initially indicted when he or she was a sitting president, by an international tribunal was a groundbreaking precedent. In his first appearance before the tribunal in July, Milosevic refused to accept its jurisdiction. Apart from Milosevic's transfer, the authorities largely failed to address impunity for alleged war crimes in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Croatia and Kosovo. Little progress was made in investigating the alleged abductions of some 1,300 Serbs and Roma by the Kosovo Liberation Army since 1999, or the "disappearance" of around 3,000 ethnic Albanians probably arrested by Serbian security forces in 1999. Between June and September 2001, the police exhumed five unmarked mass graves in Serbia, containing more than 300 bodies thought to be ethnic Albanians transported from Kosovo and reburied in Serbia to avoid detection during the 1999 NATO Operation Allied Force. In December 2001 the European Court of Human Rights ruled inadmissible a complaint brought in October 1999 against seventeen NATO member states by a survivor and five relatives of people killed in the bombing of Serbian television station RTS during NATO's 1999 military operation. In an unprecedented move, the state-run television showed a BBC documentary about the 1995 killings of more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica. (See NCH #23).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2002 (2002) xvi, xxi, 271, 275, 278, 280, 306, 378–79, 383, 386, 548, 589–91; AI, Report 2002 (2002) 19, 53, 84, 268, 269, 270.]

See also Bosnia-Herzegovina.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

GENERAL

In March 2001 Japanese historian Ienaga Saburô (1913–) (see NCH #10) was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize.

In May 2000 the Preparatory Committee for the September 2001 World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance discussed five themes for the provisional conference agenda, including the provision of effective remedies. Dissent turned primarily on the reference to compensation, with former European colonial powers and the United States opposed to language that implied their acknowledgment of material obligations to remedy past abuses. This was an echo of debates within the United States on the issue of reparations to address the heritage of slavery and segregation. See also United States.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 501–2.]

AFGHANISTAN

On 26 February 2001, in breach of a pledge made in 1999, the Taliban issued an edict to destroy pre-Islamic and Buddhist objects, including the world's largest standing Buddha statues at Bamiyan. The destruction went ahead in the days before 12 March. On 14 March BBC correspondent Kate Clark was given 36 hours to leave the country after she had interviewed Afghans who said they disapproved of the planned destruction.

[Sources: UNESCO International Petition to Safeguard Afghanistan Cultural Heritage, February 2001; IOC 2/01: 5, 3/01: 96.]

ALGERIA

When asked in November 1999 at a press conference in Italy about investigations into responsibility for killings, President Abd al-Aziz Bouteflika replied that “politics are one thing and history another. Now I am extinguishing a fire and tackling political issues, with priority given to the present.” In May 2000, Ministry of Interior officials declared that the problem of 3,000 “disappearances” and missing persons out of a population of 30 million since 1993 did not compare unfavourably with Algeria’s war of independence (1954–62), which had left some 50,000 individuals out of a population of around 9 million unaccounted for. The Ministry of Justice stated that out of the 3,019 complaints of “disappearances” received, 1,146 had been “clarified”, but only a list of seven names was provided.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 367–68, 371; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 29.]

See also France.

ARGENTINA

Nine people, including former presidents Brigade General Reynaldo Bignone and General Jorge Videla, and former junta member Admiral Emilio Massera, remained under house arrest in relation to the alleged kidnapping of over 200 children during the military dictatorship (1976–83). In 1996 the case had been brought by the Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo (Grandmothers of Plaza de Mayo), because it was not excluded by Argentina’s amnesty laws. It involved the armed forces’ practice of taking babies who were forcibly “disappeared” with their parents or who were born in captivity after the detention of their parents, and of handing them over to military families and others not considered subversive (see NCH #17).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 92, 102–3, 137, 484.]

Investigations into the fate of nationals under the dictatorship took place in Italy, Spain and Germany. In August 2000, the Israeli Parliament announced that it had formed an interministerial commission to investigate the fate of some 1,800 Jewish Argentines who had “disappeared” in 1976–

83, in order to establish the whereabouts of their bodies and bury them with the appropriate religious rites.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 103; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 33, 139.]

In October 2000, an Argentine judge requested the extradition of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet and six former members of the Chilean secret police for their alleged involvement in the 1974 Buenos Aires car-bombing that killed former Chilean commander-in-chief General Carlos Prats and his wife. In November in the same case, the court found Enrique Arancibia Clavel, a former member of the Chilean secret police, guilty of double homicide and sentenced him to life imprisonment. See also Chile.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 102, 109; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 33, 69.]

AUSTRALIA

In May 2000, Prime Minister John Howard failed to participate in public events to recognize past human rights violations against indigenous peoples and indicated his opposition to proposals for reconciliation and racial tolerance developed by the government-funded Council for Aboriginal Reconciliation over the past ten years.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 35.]

See also Indonesia.

AUSTRIA

An international team of historians is at work to establish an accurate record of certain aspects of Austria's history in the period 1938–45.

[Source: IOC 1/01: 61.]

On 26 September 2000, the far-right Freedom Party leader Jörg Haider lost a defamation trial against Kurier newspaper. The journal had criticised his reference to Nazi concentration camps as “punishment centres”. The judge said that “The term ‘punishment centre’ comes from a single document from the Third Reich in 1941 which referred to mass extermination camps as punishment centres. That is the only place the term has come from.” (see NCH #17).

[Source: IOC 6/00: 166, also 9.]

On 18 April 2001 political scientist Anton Pelinka won his appeal in the defamation trial started by Jörg Haider over Pelinka's comments in a May 1999 interview (see NCH # 17)

[Source: IOC 3/01: 96–97.]

BANGLADESH

In 2000 the government did not bring to justice those responsible for past human rights violations during the armed conflict in the Chittagong Hill Tracts which lasted from the mid-1970s until 1997.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 43.]

On 30 November 2000, Pakistan recalled Irfanur Raja, its deputy high commissioner, from Dhaka, three days after Raja had alleged that the ruling Awami League—and not the Pakistani army—was responsible for starting atrocities in Bangladesh's 1971 war of independence.

[Source: IOC 1/01: 101.]

On 14 December 2000, the High Court upheld the death sentences on ten of the fifteen people sentenced to death by a lower court in November 1998 for the killing of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman and his family in August 1975. A split judgment in the case of the other five was to be clarified by a judicial panel.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 43.]

BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA

Most perpetrators of the massive and grave human rights abuses committed during and in the wake of the civil war continued to enjoy immunity in 2000, although some were prosecuted domestically or by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. According to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) more than 17,5000 people remained unaccounted for, including 280 detained prisoners registered by the ICRC during the war who subsequently “disappeared”. Exhumations continued by both Muslim/Croat Federation and Republika Srpska commissions on missing persons. Some local authorities actively obstructed the preservation of sites thought to contain mass graves. See also Croatia; Yugoslavia.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 51–53.]

BRAZIL

In April 2000, a police decision to impede a march organized by 2,000 indigenous leaders from all over Brazil during celebrations of the arrival of the first Portuguese explorers to Brazil in 1500, and the violence employed by the Bahia state military police against indigenous activists, led the president of the government's indigenous institute FUNAI to resign in protest.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 105; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 56.]

BURKINA FASO

The widow of former President Thomas Sankara lodged a complaint against persons unknown before the Criminal Appeal Court concerning her husband's death. Sankara and at least twelve others were killed during the coup in 1987 which brought President Blaise Compaoré to power. In January 2000, the Court rejected the case saying that it was a military matter. The family intended to pursue the case before the Supreme Court.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 59.]

BURUNDI

Trials related to the political violence and massacres of Tutsi which followed the 1993 assassination of President Melchior Ndadaye continued in 2000. The subsequent reprisal killings of Hutu have not been investigated. Several thousand people remained in detention awaiting trial, some since 1993.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 61.]

CAMBODIA

In July 2000, a Memorandum of Understanding between the Hun Sen government and the United Nations over the establishment of a tribunal under Cambodian law with international participation to bring to justice those suspected of responsibility for gross human rights violations during the period of Khmer Rouge rule (1975–79) was drafted but not signed. At the end of December, debate on the draft law to establish the tribunal began in the National Assembly, but the law raised serious human rights concerns, casting doubt on the government's resolve. (see NCH #17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) xxiv-xxv, 166, 176-77, 182; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 62-63.]

CHAD

No one was brought to justice for serious human rights violations, including thousands of extrajudicial executions, which occurred under the government of Hissène Habré (1982-90). In 1992 a government Commission of Inquiry had identified the Direction de la Documentation et de la Sécurité (DDS; Directorate for Documentation and Security), which was directly responsible to Habré, as one of the main units responsible for violations. In November, a judge investigating several cases ruled that he did not have jurisdiction to try the cases because a special court to try Habré and his collaborators, provided for in a 1993 law, had never been established.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 67.]

On 3 February 2000, a Senegalese court, acting at the request of Chadian victims, indicted Habré on charges of complicity with torture and ordered his arrest. Habré had taken refuge in Senegal in 1991. On 4 July 2000, a court of appeal dismissed the indictment on the grounds that it could not prosecute crimes committed in Chad. An appeal against this verdict to the Court of Cassation was pending at the end of 2000. The Chadian Association of Victims of Political Repression and Crime (AVCRP) compiled information on each of 792 victims of the repression in 1982-90. The 1992 commission report had accused Habré's regime of 40,000 political murders and systematic torture. With many ranking officials of the current Idriss Déby government, including Déby himself, involved in Habré's crimes, however, the government did not pursue Habré's extradition from Senegal (see NCH #17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) xxv-xxvi, 7, 482-84; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 18, 67, 208-9.]

CHILE

In May 2000 right-wing parliamentarians (unsuccessfully) tried to persuade the Ricardo Lagos government to withdraw a Ministry of Education primary school history textbook which covered the 1973 military coup. They complained about nineteen "tendentious" or "biased" assertions, including use of the word "coup" instead of "pronouncement" to describe the events of 11 September 1973 and the statement that the 1925 Constitution recognized a "lay society" instead of freedom of religion.

[Source: HRW, Chile: Progress Stalled; Setbacks in Freedom of Expression Reform (March 2001)].

On 8 August 2000, the Chilean Supreme Court stripped former President (1973–90) Augusto Pinochet of his parliamentary immunity (desafuero). Under the 1980 constitution, Pinochet had awarded himself the non-elected post of lifetime senator when he stepped down as President in 1990. The desafuero allowed judge Juan Guzmán Tapia in December to prosecute Pinochet for his role in the so-called Caravana de la Muerte (Caravan of Death, a helicopter flight during which 75 suspected leftists were dumped into the sea in October 1973). The court held that, since the fact of death for several of the “disappeared” in the case could not be established, it was impossible to be sure that they had been killed during the 1973–78 period covered by the amnesty law, and the amnesty was therefore found to be inapplicable. The Supreme Court overturned the order, ruling that the judge had failed to interrogate Pinochet before issuing the order, and that mental and physical tests should be carried out to determine his fitness to stand trial before the interrogation could take place. On 7 February 2001, a previously unpublished document directly incriminating Pinochet in the “Caravana” case was published by the electronic newspaper El Mostrador. The presentation included a handwritten note by Pinochet, proposing ways of hiding one of the executions. By the end of 2000, a total of 202 criminal complaints had been filed against Pinochet in Chile. In June 2000, members of the Mesa de Diálogo, a dialogue set up in 1999 to deal with the issue of “disappearances” during 1973–90, signed a declaration. For the first time, the armed forces acknowledged “the responsibility of agents of organizations of the State” for grave human rights violations during 1973–90. In July Congress passed legislation to grant anonymity to those who came forward with information on the location of the remains of the “disappeared” (see NCH #14, #17). See also Argentina; United States. [Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) xxv-xxvi, 92, 99, 109-11, 482, IOC, 02/01: 99; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 10, 18, 68-69, 257.]

In November 2000, several Mapuche indigenous organizations filed a libel suit against historian Sergio Villalobos for a newspaper article which they called defamatory for the honor of the Mapuche people. The article, “Araucania: Errores Ancestrales” (Araucania: Ancestral Errors), appearing in the 14 May 2000 edition of El Mercurio, dealt with events that took place during the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century colonization of the Araucanians (the ancestors of the Mapuche) by the Spanish conquistadores.

[Source: HRW, Chile: Progress Stalled; Setbacks in Freedom of Expression Reform (March 2001)].

In December 2000, a Chilean judge upheld the conviction of Alejandra Matus on contempt charges, but in July 2001 the Santiago Appeals Court annulled the arrest order against her. Her book is still prohibited (see NCH #14).

[Sources include: IOC 1/00: 92; PEN, Centre to Centre, 2001, no.1: 2; HRW, World Report 2000

(1999) 112, 114, 2001 (2000) 527.]

CHINA

In February 1998 Tohti Tunyaz (pen name: Tohti Muzart), an Uighur historian and writer graduated from the Central Institute of Nationalities history department, Beijing (1984), later assigned to work for the China National Standing Committee, and studying for a Ph.D. in Uighur history and ethnic relations at Tokyo University, Japan (1996–), was arrested when returning to China to visit his relatives. Charged in April 1998 with “inciting national disunity” and “stealing state secrets for foreign persons” (later “illegally acquiring”), he was tried, and after an appeal, sentenced by the Supreme Court in February 2000 to eleven years’ imprisonment and two years’ deprivation of political rights for reasons believed to be linked to his historical research on Uighur history (which also included one published book and several papers). He is probably detained in Urumchi, Xinjiang (see NCH #17, #22).

[Sources: AI, China: Gross Violations of Human Rights in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (1999); PEN, Ifex Alert, 9 May 2001, & Rapid Action Network, 3 October 2001.]

The central government’s Liaison Office warned Hong Kong Catholics to keep celebrations “low key” over the canonization of 120 victims of the 1900 Boxer Rebellion.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 187.]

In September 2000, relatives of 1989 Tiananmen Square victims filed a civil complaint in a New York court against Li Peng, head of the National People’s Congress in Beijing (and in 1989 Chinese premier), for human rights violations, including crimes against humanity and torture.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 166; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 70.]

A blacklist of eleven banned journalists and academics, given to senior editors in Guangdong on 12 December 2000, included the names of historians Liu Junning and Qian Liqun. Earlier, in April, Liu’s writings, frequently on issues of political and economic reform, had been banned from appearing in official publications and branded as “objectionable bourgeois-liberal” by the state propaganda department.

[Source: IOC 03/00: 91, 02/01: 99.]

In December 2000, riots took place in Nanjing during the commemoration of the 1937 Nanjing massacre. See also Japan.

[Source: IOC 02/01: 11.]

On 27 December 2000, 1989 student leader Jiang Qisheng (?1948–) was sentenced to four years' imprisonment. He had been detained in the run-up to the tenth anniversary of the Tiananmen massacre (1999). In April 1999 he had written and distributed an open letter, advocating a reassessment of the 1989 events (see NCH #17).

[Sources: PEN, Ifex Alert, 8 June 1999, 23 January 2001].

On 5 January 2001 The Tiananmen Papers, a book translated by Andrew Nathan and Perry Link, was published in New York. It allegedly contained secret CCP documents from the period April-June 1989 concerning the Tiananmen massacre of 4 June 1989. They were collected and smuggled abroad by Zhang Liang (a pseudonym), who said he was a CCP member.

[Sources include: IOC 02/01: 100.]

On 13 February 2001 the trial of Huang Qi, founder of a website with information on the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, began in Chengdu, Sichuan. In August 2001 he was secretly tried, but no verdict was released (see NCH #17).

[Sources: IOC 02/01: 101; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 71; HRW, Ifex Alert Update, 9 February 2001.]

CROATIA

The new government of Ivica Racan made immediate efforts to ensure fuller cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. The fate and whereabouts of thousands of people who “disappeared” during the war years remained unknown. Despite large-scale exhumations, mostly of mass graves in eastern Slavonia, more than 1,500 Croats were still unaccounted for. Some 600 Croatian Serbs were still missing since operations Flash and Storm in 1995. The slowness with which cases were resolved was largely due to the lack of progress in negotiations between the government commissions on missing persons of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Croatia, which met twice during 2000. See also Bosnia-Herzegovina; Yugoslavia.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 83-84.]

CUBA

In April 2000 Orestes Rodríguez Horrúitiner (see NCH #17) was conditionally released.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 86.]

EAST TIMOR

With the support of the UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), a Special Crimes Unit was established to investigate the hundreds of extrajudicial executions and other human rights violations by the Indonesian security forces and pro-Indonesian militia during 1999. UNTAET also provided assistance to Indonesia in its investigations into crimes committed in East Timor during 1999, but. In both cases, progress was slow.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 89–90, 127.]

On 15 September 2000, the United Nations announced that it would reinvestigate the killing of five Australian reporters in Balibo on 16 October 1975 in the run-up to Indonesia’s full-scale invasion of the former Portuguese colony of East Timor. They had gone into East Timor to examine rumours about an impending Indonesian attack. According to several sources, they were executed by the Indonesian army. The case of Roger East, a free-lance Australian journalist, executed during the actual invasion on 7 December 1975, may also be opened.

[Source: IOC 6/00: 173.]

EGYPT

In January 2001 the Ministry of Culture incinerated 6,000 books of poetry by medieval poet Abu Nawas, because they allegedly “violated public decency” and “threatened moral norms” by celebrating homosexuality, revelry and carousing.

[Source: IOC 02/01: 103–4.]

Islamist groups failed to publicly revoke death threats issued in previous years against civilians whom they considered political and ideological enemies, including Nasr Hamed Abu Zeid (see NCH #6, #14).

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 94.]

EL SALVADOR

In September 2000, the work of the non-governmental Asociación Pro-Búsqueda de Niñas y Niños

Desaparecidos (Association for the Search for Disappeared Children) suffered a setback when its proposal that the Legislative Assembly create a commission to investigate the whereabouts of children who “disappeared” during the armed conflict (1980–92) was rejected. The army, which had initially expressed its willingness to participate, changed its position. The commission would have had power to summon people to provide information and would have had access to archives which were not open to Pro-Búsqueda. In October 2000, efforts to end impunity for past human rights violations, including massacres in which hundreds of civilians were killed, suffered a serious setback when the Supreme Court of Justice declared the 1993 General Amnesty Law to be constitutional. The judicial authorities failed to implement the recommendations of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 94–95.]

ETHIOPIA

The South African government did not accede to a request by the Ethiopian government for the extradition of former Ethiopian President Mengistu Haile Mariam (who ruled in the period 1974–91). Mengistu visited South Africa from Zimbabwe, where he was living in exile, for medical treatment in late 1999. The trials of 46 officials of the former Dergue government led by Mengistu proceeded slowly on charges including genocide and extrajudicial executions. Some trials began of more than 2,200 other former officials, most of whom had been held since 1991 and were facing lesser charges (see NCH #17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 77; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 98, 100.]

On 22 December 2000, up to two hundred Oromo students from Addis Ababa University were beaten by police when they were arrested after a fight between Oromo and other students, which started after a Tigrayan student had presented a paper in his sociology class about the Oromo which offended Oromo students. Among the arrested was fourth-year history student Badada Bayene. Up to 150 students, including Badada, were taken into police custody and were reportedly at risk of torture. Later they were released (see NCH #20, #20[ii]).

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 07/01 (12 & 19 January 2001); AI, Report 2001 (2001) 100.]

In May 2001 Garuma Bekele was released (see NCH #10, 12, 14, 17).

[Source: HRW, Ifex Alert, 29 May 2001.]

EUROPEAN UNION

See United States.

FRANCE

Pressure grew on the Paris police authorities to grant access to its archives on the October 1961 massacre by police officers of Algerians at a peaceful demonstration in Paris during the Algerian war of independence (1954–62). Disagreement persisted about the number of demonstrators killed; figures varied between 32 and 200 (see NCH #6, #14). In October 2000 twelve public figures appealed to the authorities to acknowledge and condemn torture committed during the war. Generals Jacques Massu and Paul Aussaresses both admitted their direct involvement in torture and extrajudicial executions during the war. In May 2001 Aussaresses claimed that details of these abuses were regularly transmitted to François Mitterand, minister of justice at the time. He also reported that the government acquiesced in the use of torture during the 1957 Battle of Algiers.

[Sources: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 21–22, 103; IOC 3/01: 106.]

See Haiti.

GUATEMALA

In March 2000 the new President Alfonso Portillo declared a national day in honour of the estimated 200,000 victims of Guatemala's civil conflict (1960–96), ratified the Inter-American Convention on Forced Disappearances, and admitted state responsibility for past violations. Impunity continued to prevail, however, for most human rights violations perpetrated during the conflict. Portillo also called the 1998 murder of Juan Gerardi and its botched investigation a “national embarrassment”, publicly committing himself to bringing those responsible to justice. Witnesses, prosecutors, and judges continued to receive threats related to the case. In October a long-promised report on the case was made public by Portillo but provided no new information. In June 2001 three army officers and a priest were sentenced to between twenty and thirty years' imprisonment in the Gerardi case (see NCH #10, 13, 14, 17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 93, 126–27; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 113–14; AI, Guatemala: Human Rights Community under Siege (2001).]

In April 2000 a lawyer filed a suit against Nobel Peace Prize winner (1992) Rigoberta Menchú for treason for filing her case (see NCH #17) in Spain, a charge that carries a ten to twenty year prison term. General Ríos Montt, former president, founder of President Portillo's political party, and current president of Congress, was among those named in Menchú's suit as being responsible for genocide and torture during the period when he ruled Guatemala (March 1982–August 1983). In December the Spanish High Court ruled that it did not currently have jurisdiction to judge the crimes. The plaintiffs immediately appealed; judgment on their appeal was pending at the end of 2000.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 128; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 114.]

In May 2000, a database of 650,428 names, apparently compiled by military intelligence during the 1980s, was made public by a government official. Guatemalan analysts believed the coded number against each name contained information on their fate.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 113–14.]

In May 2000, the Centre for Legal Action in Human Rights (CALDH) assisted survivors of ten massacres to file genocide charges before the Guatemalan courts against former Head of State General Romeo Lucas García (1978–82) and several officials from his administration.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 114.]

In September 2000, gunmen entered the offices of the Families of the Detained and Disappeared of Guatemala (FAMDEGUA) and HIJOS (children of the “disappeared” who want their parents' fate clarified), forcing three staff members to the floor at gunpoint. The gunmen repeatedly threatened to kill the three. Office equipment and case records, including some concerning the 1982 Dos Erres massacre (in which 350 indigenous villagers were killed), were stolen.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000); AI, Report 2001 (2001) 113–14.]

See also United States.

HAITI

In November 1999 a French court dismissed a lawsuit filed by several Haitians against former dictator Jean-Claude Duvalier (ruled 1971–86), exiled in France since 1986. The suit accused him of crimes against humanity, but the court ruled that French law does not cover such crimes committed prior to 1994, except those that occurred during World War II (see NCH #17).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 133.]

HONDURAS

In June 2000, the Supreme Court ruled that two amnesty decrees on a 1982 case of “disappearance” and torture were unconstitutional. In July the Attorney General’s Office, who had filed the appeal against the decrees in January 1999, requested clarification, as it considered that the decision should be applicable to all military personnel suspected of human rights violations in the 1980s, especially 184 “disappearance” cases, and not just one specific case.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 121–22.]

INDIA

In May 2000 a new one-man Commission of Inquiry was established to investigate the 1984 riots in Delhi which claimed the lives of more than 2,500 people, mainly Sikhs. In October the retired judge presiding over the inquiry was reported to have already received over 10,000 affidavits (sworn written statements). An earlier inquiry in 1985–86 had led to proceedings against only twenty of 147 police officers found guilty of dereliction of duty. In Mumbai (formerly Bombay), recommendations made by the Srikrishna Commission of Inquiry into riots which took place in the city in 1992–93 remained unimplemented.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 124.]

INDONESIA

In 2000 The Year of Living Dangerously, a banned 1982 film about the 1965–66 killings, was screened in a sold-out theatre at the Jakarta International Film Festival. The Censorship Board released the film on the condition that its single showing would be to a private audience only (see NCH #10, under Singapore).

[Source: IOC 1/01: 109.]

On 1 January 2000, President Abdurrahman Wahid changed the name of Irian Jaya into Papua to signal a change in policy toward the rebellious province. The name change had not been approved by parliament by the end of the year. In December 1999, tens of thousands of Papuans had celebrated the thirty-eighth anniversary of “West-Papuan independence” in ceremonies throughout the province, the first time that such coordinated pro-independence demonstrations were permitted. In a compromise with the authorities, both the Indonesian and West Papuan flags were raised in the 1 December ceremonies. Tension and conflict over flag raisings continued throughout 2000.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 202–3.]

On 14 March 2000, President Wahid asked for forgiveness on television for the 1965–67 massacre of suspected members of the banned Partai Komunis Indonesia (PKI; Indonesian Communist Party), and for the role of his own organization, Nahdlatul Ulama, in the killings. He also called for repeal of a 1966 decree that instituted a pattern of discrimination against families of suspected PKI followers down to the third generation. The President’s call, however, was greeted with noisy street protests from some Muslim groups and, in August, the Majelis Permusyawaratan Rakyat (MPR; People’s Consultative Assembly) set aside the proposal, leaving the 1966 decree in effect.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 204–5.]

See also East Timor.

IRAN

On 5 August 2000, Iranian authorities arrested Hojatoleslam Hassan Youssefi Eshkevari, director of the Ali Shariati Research Center and author of several books on Iranian history, after his return from Berlin where he had presented a paper on “Dictatorship and its History”. He was held in solitary confinement for two months and tried in October before a Special Court for the Clergy on charges of apostasy and “being corrupt on earth”, which carry the death penalty. By the end of 2000, his sentence had not been made public.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 354; PEN, Centre to Centre, 2001, no.2: 3, 4; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 130; IOC 3/01: 109.]

IRAQ

On 27 March 2001, Kurdish scholar and historian Muhammad al-Ruzbayani (?1913–) was murdered with an axe in his Baghdad home. A former adviser on Kurdish affairs to the government, he was reportedly receiving financial support from institutions in Iraq’s Kurdish-controlled areas, a factor which may have aroused the suspicion of the authorities.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 110.]

ISRAEL

In December 1999, Human Rights Watch wrote to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak to condemn the appointment of Major General (Reserves) Amos Yaron as director-general of Israel's Ministry of Defense, urging his immediate dismissal from public service. While serving as an Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) division commander during Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982, his actions and omissions facilitated the September massacre in the refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila in Beirut. In the massacre at least 700 to 800 Palestinians, and possibly as many as several thousand, were killed by the Israeli-armed and -allied Lebanese Phalange (Kata'eb) militia while nearby IDF personnel looked on and did nothing to stop the sixty-two-hour indiscriminate killings.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 360–61.]

See also Argentina, Lebanon, Palestinian Authority.

ITALY

On 9 November 2000, Francesco Storace, a member of the far-right Alleanza Nazionale, voted for the creation of a commission to evaluate history textbooks in the Lazio region. This sparked a controversy because professional historians feared that it was the first step in a process in which right-wing political parties would demand the end of the anti-Fascist paradigm, a condemnation of the Communist experience and a re-evaluation of Mussolini's Nazi-backed Republic of Salò (1943–45) which fought against the partisans after the 1943 armistice.

[Sources include: IOC 1/01: 13–14.]

JAPAN

Throughout the countries occupied by Japan during World War II, women forced into sexual slavery as “comfort women” were still campaigning for individual compensation from the Japanese government. (see NCH #5, 6, 10, 14).

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 166.]

On 28 November 2000, a Chinese survivor of the 1937 Rape of Nanking, Xia Shuqin (?1929–), filed a libel suit against two Japanese writers who claimed that Ms. Xia's testimony of the massacre was false. The writers, Higashinakano Osamu and Magsumura Goshio, also claimed in their books, "Thorough Review of Nanjing Massacre" and "Big Question in Nanjing Massacre", that all historical data about the massacre are not true. See also: China.

[Source: IOC 1/01: 104.]

In March–April 2001 South Korea, North Korea, China and Taiwan protested against a Japanese high school history textbook before and after its approval by Japan's Ministry of Education. The textbook reportedly glossed over Japan's militaristic past. The original draft of the textbook, written by the Japanese Society for Textbook Revision, a group of nationalistic historians including Nobukatsu Fujioka, reportedly described the "unopposed" annexation of the Korean peninsula (1910) as "necessary for Japan's security" and referred to the 1937 Nanjing Massacre as "nothing like a holocaust". No reference was made to the question of "comfort women". The approved version, containing more than 130 revisions, reportedly acknowledged that an "armed struggle" took place in Korea and had removed the attempt to downplay the Nanjing Massacre. Controversial sections were left in, including a description of Japanese soldiers braving "death with honour". In a joint declaration, 900 historians condemned the textbook as a distortion of history.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 102. Also consulted: BBC News Online (WWW-text; London) 2001: 15 March, 3 April, 4 April, 9 April]

See also: General (Ienaga Saburo).

KAZAKHSTAN

On 6 July 2000, retired historian and dissident Karishal Asanov wrote an article criticising President Nursultan Nazarbayev in the opposition weekly SolDat, printed in Russia. Although the issue containing the article was seized by Kazakh customs police and never distributed within Kazakhstan, a trial for defamation of the president was started against Asanov and SolDat's chief editor in March 2001. On 3 April Asanov was acquitted for lack of evidence. The chief editor was sentenced to one year' imprisonment, but immediately pardoned under a presidential amnesty. The court ordered that the 6 July print run of SolDat should be burned. In 1992–93 Asanov had already been charged with insulting the president. After a trial, retrial and appeal, he had been acquitted.

[Sources include: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 300–301; AI, Report, 1993: 178, 1994: 181; IOC 3/01: 111.]

LEBANON

Human Rights Watch sent a letter to Lebanese President Emile Lahoud inquiring about legal or administrative measures that the government of Lebanon initiated or was contemplating with respect to investigation and prosecution of Lebanese citizens who were known or suspected to have had direct responsibility for the September 1982 Sabra and Shatila killings. See also Israel.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 360.]

In January 2000 the government set up an official Commission of Inquiry into the fate of those missing and kidnapped during the civil war (1975–90). A committee for the Relatives of the Kidnapped and Missing held vigils near the premises of the weekly cabinet meetings outside the Beirut museum. In July the commission made public the conclusions of its report stating that none of the “disappeared” was alive in Lebanon and recommending that those missing for at least four years should be considered dead. Lists with names of “disappeared” were sent to Israel and Syria, who denied all knowledge of the whereabouts of those on the lists.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 156.]

On 23 May 2000 local residents stormed the Khiam prison, which since its opening in 1985 had been a joint enterprise of Israel and the South Lebanon Army. Within days, the facility was transformed into an informal museum, drawing thousands of Lebanese who toured the cramped cells and solitary confinement rooms, and read the names of torturers which were prominently posted on a large handwritten list near the entry gate.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 351.]

In September and October 2000, at least 90 suspected members or supporters of the unauthorized Lebanese Forces (LF) party were arrested after a church mass and demonstration in Mount Lebanon to commemorate the death of Bashir al-Gemayel, President–elect and LF founder killed in 1982. Most were detained for a few hours or days and released without charge.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 155.]

See also Syria.

LIBERIA

In 2000, no progress was made by the authorities in bringing to justice the perpetrators of massive human rights abuses carried out during the civil war (1990–97) or later, including in September 1998 against members of the Krahn ethnic group.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 159.]

In late March 2000, James Torh, the executive director of a children’s rights organization who had been detained and charged with sedition for a speech he had made about the need for a truth commission to be established in Liberia to investigate violations committed during the civil war (see NCH #17), was released on bail after [three or five] days and fled the country.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 16, 57; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 159.]

MAURITANIA

The government of President Maaouiya Ould Sid’Ahmed Taya, which came to power in December 1984 following a military coup, has consistently prevented investigations into widespread human rights violations, including political killings, “disappearances” and torture, during the late 1980s and early 1990s.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 167–68.]

MEXICO

The full circumstances surrounding the massacre of dozens of students on Tlatelolco Square, Mexico City, on 2 October 1968 and other political killings remained unclear.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 170.]

MOROCCO

In July 2000, the arbitration commission, established in 1999 to decide on compensation for the victims of “disappearance” and arbitrary detention and their families, announced that it had examined 148 of the 5,849 claims. However, the authorities failed to clarify the cases of several hundred who “disappeared” between the mid-1960s and early 1990s, most of them Sahrawis, or to acknowledge the deaths of some 70 Sahrawis who “disappeared” in secret detention between 1976 and 1991.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 171–72.]

In October 2000, Moroccan activists protested at Tazmamert prison (officially closed in 1991), carrying candles and red roses to commemorate those who died under horrific conditions at the secret facility in the 1970s and 1980s. The demonstrators were not permitted access to the prison itself. They called for the trial of those responsible for “disappearances”, deaths in custody, and arbitrary detention, and the return to the families of the bodies of those perished.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 350; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 172.]

On 2 December 2000, Communications Minister Mohamed Achaari announced a permanent ban on three weekly newspapers after they published a letter written by exiled opposition leader Mohamed Basri, in which he directly implicated Prime Minister Abderrahmane Youssoufi in an attempted coup against King Hassan II in 1972.

[Sources: IOC 1/01: 112; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 172.]

MYANMAR

In July 1999 history teacher Ma Khin Khin Leh (?1965–) was detained with eighteen others in Pegu, on suspicion that they were planning a prodemocracy march scheduled for 19 July (Martyrs’ Day, commemorating the 1947 assassination of General Aung San, independence leader and father of opposition politician and Nobel Peace Prize winner Daw Aung San Suu Kyi). The local Military Intelligence arrested her and her three-year old daughter after officials from the State Peace and Development Council (military junta) attempted to detain her husband, Kyaw Wunna, a political activist and one of the organizers of the march, but could not locate him. The child was released after five days’ detention. In December 1999, a Special Court sentenced Ma Khin Khin Leh to life imprisonment. In January 2000, she was transferred to an unknown location (see NCH #18).

[Source: AAAS, Human Rights Action Network, BU0009.Daw, 5 December 2000.]

NIGERIA

The seven-member Human Rights Violations Commission chaired by retired judge Chukwudifu Oputa, appointed by President Obasanjo in June 1999 to investigate human rights abuses between 1966 and May 1999, began hearing evidence from witnesses. From the more than 11,000 petitions received, it selected about 150 of the most serious cases for public hearing in sessions in five cities. Witnesses described killings and torture by agents of the military government of General Sani

Abacha (1993–98). Security officials denied the most serious accusations or refused to appear before the commission. In December former head of state General Ibrahim Babangida and former military and police security chiefs obtained a High Court injunction restraining the commission from compelling them to appear before it, on the grounds that their personal security would be at risk (see NCH #17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 60; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 182, 184.]

NORTH KOREA

In April 2000, North Korea and Japan resumed talks, including on key issues such as Japanese compensation for its occupation of the Korean peninsula (1910–45). North Korea also returned the remains of 26 United States servicemen lost in action during the Korean war (1950–53).

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 148.]

See also Japan; South Korea.

PAKISTAN

On 14 May 2000 it was reported that dr. Younis Shaikh was imprisoned on blasphemy charges. He had asserted that Mohammed was not a Muslim until the age of 40; that his parents were not Muslims; that his first marriage, at 25, was made without an Islamic marriage contract; and that, therefore, he had never removed his underarm hair or been circumcised. He faced the death penalty.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 114.]

See also Bangladesh.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Although the High Court of Justice ordered the immediate release of Abd al-Sattar Qassim on 11 July 2000, he remained in detention until 28 July (see NCH #15, 17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 353, 358. 396; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 187.]

See also Israel.

PERU

In October 2000, the Alberto Fujimori government proposed to extend from 1995 to 2000 two 1995 amnesty laws granting immunity for those who had committed human rights violations since 1980. The proposal was refused by the opposition and members of civil society.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 190.]

POLAND

President Aleksander Kwasniewski acknowledged Polish responsibility for the massacre of about 1,600 Jews in Jedwabne on 10 July 1941. Cardinal Jozef Glemp issued an apology. The massacre, formerly ascribed to the Nazis, was the subject of new research by Jan Tomasz Gross (1947–), a Polish political science lecturer at New York University.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 76–85.]

RUSSIA

Memorial, a leading human rights group investigating past and present abuses, continued to face difficulties while working inside Chechnya.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 318.]

On 28 August 2000, masked police commandos stormed the office of the Glasnost Foundation, a human rights organization, without any apparent reason. The police carrying out the raid taunted Sergei Grigoryants, historian and head of the organization, with the knowledge that he was a former dissident (see NCH #5).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 318; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 200.]

RWANDA

During 2000, an estimated 125,000 people continued to be held in detention, the overwhelming majority on charges of participation in the 1994 genocide. At least 2,283 people were tried and at least 140 sentenced to death, some after unfair trials, but there were no judicial executions. Trials of genocide suspects also continued at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda in Tanzania, where 46 leading genocide suspects were held. Since the launch of genocide trials in 1996, only 4,875 suspects had been tried. In Switzerland, ex-mayor Fulgence Niyonteze, was tried for war crimes. This was the first trial of a Rwandese genocide suspect under the national jurisdiction of a foreign country. In May 2000 the Organization of African Unity's International Panel of Eminent Personalities submitted the report of its investigation into the 1994 genocide and made recommendations to prevent conflict in the region.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 202–4.]

SAUDI ARABIA

Among the discriminatory measures taken against Shia Muslims was the discouragement of the traditional annual Shia mourning procession of Ashura.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 403–4.]

Saudi Arabia continued to provide refuge and financial support to Idi Amin, the exiled Ugandan leader whose regime (1971–79) was responsible for a reign of terror. Invited by the late King Faisal, Amin has been protected by government-paid Saudi guards since 1979.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 405.]

SENEGAL

See Chad.

SIERRA LEONE

Following the hostage crisis in May 2000, in which rebel forces captured UN peace-keeping troops, activity towards establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, mandated to be established within 90 days of the signing of the Lomé Peace Accord (July 1999), was officially frozen by the United Nations Office of Human Rights (see NCH #17). On 14 August 2000, United Nations Security Council Resolution 1315 authorized to set up a Special Court for Sierra Leone with a mix of local and foreign prosecutors and judges to try crimes against humanity, war crimes, and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. The tribunal will effectively overturn the July 1999 amnesty and make possible the prosecution of those responsible for crimes during the civil war (1991–99).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) xxiv, 23, 71–72; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 212]

SOMALIA

In no part of the collapsed state of Somalia were public officials known to have been prosecuted for human rights violations, past or present. Several held public office now, including some prominent alleged war criminals of the former Siad Barre government (1969–91) who were nominated to the transitional national assembly by their clans.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 219.]

SOUTH AFRICA

Further evidence emerged about past human rights violations during trial proceedings against the former head of the chemical and biological warfare program, dr. Wouter Basson, and in hearings held by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) amnesty committee. By the end of 1999, the TRC amnesty committee had granted amnesty in 568 cases and refused amnesty in 5,287 cases, while 815 matters remained outstanding (see NCH #14).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 76; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 219–21.]

See also Ethiopia.

SOUTH KOREA

Efforts were underway to hold the United States accountable for the No Gun Ri massacre in July 1950, during the Korean War (1950–53), in which some four hundred civilians may have died.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 166.].

See also Japan; North Korea.

SPAIN

See Guatemala.

SRI LANKA

Impunity for the perpetrators of human rights abuses remained a major concern during 2000. Victims who sought justice through the courts received death threats. The report of a presidential commission of inquiry, set up in 1998 to investigate complaints of past “disappearances” not examined by three earlier commissions, was handed over to president Chandrika Bandaranaike Kumaratunga in late August 2000. The implementation of the recommendations of previous commissions and of the UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances, which visited the country in 1999, proceeded slowly. (see NCH #14, #17).

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 225.]

SURINAME

On 31 October 2000, after the government of President Ronald Venetiaan took power, the Court of Justice ordered the prosecution of former military leader Desi Bouterse and others in connection with the so-called 1982 December murders, when fifteen journalists, academics and labour leaders were extrajudicially executed at Fort Zeelandia in Paramaribo. At the end of 2000, the Public Prosecutor’s Office was working on a summons to start a preliminary judicial investigation. Bouterse denied charges that he presided over the murders, saying that he took responsibility only because he was head of government and the military at the time. Also unresolved remained the case of the 1986 massacre of civilians at the village of Moiwana.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 228.]

SYRIA

Despite the presidential succession, the fate of hundreds of people who “disappeared” in connection with their involvement with the Muslim Brotherhood in the late 1970s and 1980s remained unknown. Unresolved remained the massacre of possibly as many as 1,100 unarmed prisoners at Tadmor in 1980 and the military assault on the city of Hama in 1982 in which thousands were killed. Among the 99 signatories of a September 2000 statement in the Lebanese newspaper al-Safir calling for the lifting of martial law (in place since 1963) and the release of political prisoners was researcher and historian Abdullah Hanna (1932–). From Beirut, a Lebanese member of parliament, Boutros Harb, called for an “opening of the files” on some two hundred Lebanese known or suspected of being imprisoned in Syria, some of whom had been detained without trial for over fifteen years.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 409–10; IOC 6/00: 189; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 233–34.]

SWITZERLAND

See Rwanda.

TAIWAN

On 3 March 2001 Japanese cartoonist Yoshinori Kobayashi was barred entry following publication of a non-fiction comic in which he said that comfort women in Taiwan had volunteered to associate with occupying Japanese forces as a way out of poverty. Yoshinori was censured on the grounds that he had “insulted national dignity”.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 118–19.]

See also Japan.

THAILAND

In May 2000, after pressure from victims’ families, the government released a classified 605-page Defense Ministry report on the army’s shooting of prodemocracy demonstrators in Bangkok in May 1992, in which at least 52 people were killed. A summary had been made public in June 1999. The government censored about ten per cent of the report, however, and the May 92 Relatives Committee, an organization of families of 38 people whose fate has still not been clarified, demanded that the remaining material be revealed. The committee also called for the release of two other official reports on the incident. In June 2000 the government released a largely uncensored version, but calls to bring to justice those found responsible remained unanswered.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 166, 223; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 240.]

TUNISIA

On 23 October 2000, a double issue of the French weekly Jeune Afrique—L'Intelligent was impounded, presumably because President Zine al-Abidine Ben Ali took umbrage at a lengthy profile, “The Tunisian Sakharov”, of historian and human rights activist Mohamed Talbi (?1920–), specialist in medieval islamic history, former dean of Tunis University, and author of works on the medieval historian Ibn Khaldun.

[Sources include: IOC 1/01: 124.]

TURKEY

Reporter Julide Kalic of the daily Yeni Evrense was beaten and interrogated after photographing a police attack on a remembrance day meeting for Haci Bektas Veli (?1248–?1337), a dervish and scholar who founded a Sufi order. She was driven to a far-off police station and her film was confiscated.

[Source: IOC 6/00: 191.]

Officials put pressure on the Microsoft management to modify an article in its digital encyclopedia Encarta, that calls the 1915 murder of thousands of Armenians “the first genocide of the twentieth century”. The authors, including professor of political science and Armenian history Ronald Grigor Suny, were asked to “tone down” the article and remove the word “genocide”.

[Source: IOC 6/00: 191.]

In October 2000, officials warned the United States that it risked losing the use of a military base for launching air patrols over northern Iraq if the American House of Representatives approved a resolution accusing Turkey of genocide against Armenians in 1915. The resolution was not put to the vote.

[Sources include: IOC 6/00: 192.]

On 23 October 2000, Istanbul State Security Court charged Akin Birdal, vice president of the International Federation for Human Rights and former president of the Turkish Association for Human Rights, with “incitement to hatred” for his criticism of Turkey’s stance on the 1915 genocide of the Armenians. Birdal, who had also called for Turkey to apologise for the events, was accused of having openly insulted “Turkishness”.

[Source: IOC 1/01: 125, 3/01: 119.]

On 22 December 2000, it was reported that the Istanbul State Security Court ordered the confiscation of all copies of the book “Famous Kurdish Scientists and Intellectuals of the First Generation”, by Mehmet Kemal Isik, describing it as “separatist propaganda”.

[Source: IOC 02/01: 120.]

On 27 March 2001, plainclothes police officers arrested archeology student Emrullah Karagoz (?1978–) and two others, and held them at the Diyarbakir Police Headquarters, where they were at risk of torture. Karagoz was previously detained in June 1999 and November 2000 for political reasons. Plainclothes police apparently raided his house several times shortly before Newroz (the Kurdish New Year which is celebrated on 21 March) (see NCH #21).

[Source: AI, Urgent Action 22/01 (28 March 2001).]

TURKMENISTAN

President Saparmurad Niazov ordered that the entire printing of a new Turkmen history textbook be burned.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 331.]

UGANDA

See Saudi Arabia.

UNITED KINGDOM

On 27 March 2000, the Bloody Sunday Inquiry—a new tribunal of inquiry into the British army killings of fourteen people in Derry on 30 January 1972—opened. It was expected to last at least two years. The original tribunal, finding the army not liable for any of the deaths, was discredited. In November 2000, hundreds of soldiers were arguing that their safety was compromised by the disclosure of their identities, and that they should not have to give evidence in Londonderry. Although the decision of the inquiry chairman to disclose their names was overturned by the courts, the men were worried that their faces could be linked with previously leaked details (see NCH #10, 14, 17).

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 334; IOC 1/01: 103; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 255.]

UNITED STATES

In June 2000, the National Security Archive, an NGO in Washington, released a report entitled The Guatemalan Military: What the U.S. Files Reveal. The report named 232 Guatemalan officers and contained information on their activities and command responsibilities, thus assisting NGOs and victims in their efforts to identify and bring to justice those responsible for gross abuses during Guatemala's civil war (1960–96). See also Guatemala.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 130.]

In accordance with a 1999 declassification directive, some 7,500 confidential documents on Chile in the 1968–90 period from the State and Defense Departments and other United States (US) agencies, including the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), were released by mid-2000 (see NCH #17). Hundreds of documents, believed to reveal details of US covert action in Chile prior to and following the 1970 election of the Salvador Allende government and of US support for the military junta, were held back on the order of CIA director George Tenet. Of particular concern was the fact that the missing documents might contain information crucial to Pinochet's trial in Chile, such as the functioning of his secret police DINA, and the CIA's liaison with it. In September 2000, the Intelligence Authorization Act required the CIA to submit a report to Congress on its relations with Pinochet's military government (1973–90). In the report the CIA revealed that it had maintained a liaison with DINA head Manuel Contreras in 1974–77. Later in 2000, the CIA and other agencies were preparing for the release of 16,000 declassified documents related to the US role in Chile. See also Chile.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 98, 113.]

On 19 September 2000, it was reported that newly declassified government documents showed that at least in 1950–65 United States intelligence funded and directed a campaign to bring about a federal Europe.

[Source: IOC 6/00: 192.]

In March 2001 students at Brown University, Rhode Island, stole nearly 4,000 copies of the campus newspaper Brown Daily Herald in protest to its publication of an advertisement denouncing reparations for slavery, placed by the conservative columnist David Horowitz. Later in April, when Princeton's Daily Princetonian ran the advert opposite an editorial describing Horowitz's views as "racist", the writer withdrew his payment pending an apology, describing himself as the victim of a "left-wing witch hunt". See also General.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 120.]

On 6 June 2001 Random House agreed to stop distributing copies of a memoir by Bryan Magee, Confessions of a Philosopher: A Personal Journey Through Western Philosophy from Plato to Popper (1998). In the book Magee accused lecturer Ralph Schoenman of being a CIA operative who had been planted to spy on philosopher Bertrand Russell, a noted 1960s opponent of the Vietnam war.

[Source: IOC 3/01: 121.]

See also Chile, China, Guatemala, South Korea, Turkey.

URUGUAY

In 2000, after President Jorge Battle took office in March, steps were taken to establish the fate of people who “disappeared” or were tortured under military governments between 1973 and 1985. In August the government established a Comisión para la Paz (Peace Commission) to clarify the fate of the “disappeared”. However, the 1986 Expiry Law, which granted exemption from punishment to all police and military personnel who committed human rights violations for political motives or to obey orders before 1 March 1985, prevented the perpetrators from being brought to justice. The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights stated that the Expiry Law violated the American Convention on Human Rights.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 261.]

VENEZUELA

Of some 300 cases of human rights abuses registered by local non-governmental organizations between 1985 and 1999, only 40 had been resolved as a result of judicial proceedings.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 265.]

VIETNAM

In December 1999, members of the Buddhist Hoa Hoa sect in An Giang province clashed several times with police, who reportedly blocked a pilgrimage to their prophet’s birthplace, and detained and beat some adherents.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 229.]

In 2000 Nguyen Dinh Huy (see NCH #6, #17) continued to be held in prison.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 266.]

In March 2000 the Ministry of Culture and Information ordered the confiscation and withdrawal from circulation of a book by Hanoi author Bui Ngoc Tan. The only book to be banned during the year, Chuyen Ke Nam 2000 (An Account of the Year 2000) described the author's experience in North Vietnamese prisons between 1968 and 1973.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 228.]

In August 2000 the Ministry of Culture proposed new regulations (not yet officially adopted as of October), which would impose fines for the production or possession of "culturally inappropriate" materials, including those which "distorted Vietnam's history or defamed its national heroes".

[Source: HRW, World Report 2001 (2000) 227.]

In September 2001 Pham Que Duong (?1933–), colonel, military historian, was arrested while campaigning for reform. In 1987 he had been dismissed as chief editor of "Military History Journal" (1982–87) because he had refused to obey orders not to mention exploits of dismissed officers. Investigated and accused of supporting advocates of pluralism in 1990, he resigned from the CPV in solidarity with a dissident in 1999 and became an (often harassed) pro-democracy activist.

[Sources include: HRW, Ifex Alert, 29 May 2001.]

YEMEN

The fate of hundreds of people who had "disappeared" in Yemen since the late 1960s remained unknown. Undertakings made by the government to investigate the cases of those who had "disappeared" since 1994 were apparently not implemented.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 268.]

YUGOSLAVIA

The Serbian and federal governments failed to cooperate with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in arresting and handing over individuals, indicted for violations of international humanitarian law, including former Federal President Slobodan Milosevic. On 28 June 2001, however, Milosevic was arrested and brought to the tribunal in The Hague.

[Sources include: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 270.]

Exhumations of grave sites led to the identification of around 260 mortal remains during 2000, but some 1260 bodies which were exhumed in 1999 and 2000 remained unidentified. Not all grave sites had been examined by the end of 2000. See also Bosnia-Herzegovina; Croatia.

[Source: AI, Report 2001 (2001) 271.]

ZIMBABWE

In February 2000, a Supreme Court order granted two human rights organizations the right to sue the President's office to obtain the release of the Dumbutshena and Chihambakwe reports, both the result of commissions of inquiry, the first into clashes between guerrillas of the two former liberation armies in Bulawayo in 1981, the second into killings in Matabeleland in 1983. Neither report had ever been published. The government's response on the first of these was that only one copy of the report had ever existed, and that it had been lost. In the past, wide-ranging amnesties had been granted for human rights violations committed during the war of independence and after the large-scale atrocities in Matabeleland in 1983.

[Sources: A19, 'Who Wants to Forget?' Truth and Access to Information about Past Human Rights Violations (2000) 9–14; AI, Report 2001 (2001) 275.]

See also Ethiopia.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

AFGHANISTAN

The public library of Pol-I-Khomri, which contained 55,000 books and old manuscripts, was burned to the ground by Taliban militia.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 503.]

ARGENTINA

In 1999 investigations and judicial proceedings concerning cases of human rights violations committed during the period of the military government (1976-83) were initiated in Spain, Italy and Germany. Investigations into cases of “disappeared” children continued in Argentina. Investigations by the Federal Court of La Plata, Buenos Aires Province, into past “disappearances” continued in proceedings known as Juicio por la Verdad (the Truth Trial).

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (London 2000) 34-35, 140-41.]

In April 1999, journalist Eduardo Krimel received a suspended one-year prison sentence and a fine in connection with his book The Massacre of San Patricio - about the 1976 murder of five priests and seminarians - after a former judge sued him for slander over statements about the latter’s role as investigating judge in the case.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 103.]

On 30 August 1999, the Supreme Court upheld a lower court decision that former junta member Admiral Emilio Massera must pay compensation of $120,000 in a civil lawsuit brought by Daniel Tarnapolsky regarding the 1976 disappearance of his parents and two brothers during the dictatorship (1976-83). The court also ordered the state to pay $1,000,000 to Tarnapolsky.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 103.]

In November 1999 in the Lapacó case (see NCH #14), the government acknowledged and guaranteed the right to the truth as a right unaffected by statutes of limitations.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 35.]

AUSTRIA

In May 2000 a Vienna court found political science professor Anton Pelinka (1941-) of Innsbruck University guilty of “defaming the character” of Jörg Haider, former leader of the far-right Freedom Party, because in an interview in May 1999 he had declared that Haider trivialized Nazism. Pelinka was fined. Haider’s former lawyer, Dieter Böhmendorfer, who had initiated the case, was serving as Austria’s Minister of Justice at the time of the court’s ruling. In another case (about statements Pelinka had made to Cable News Network (CNN) in the spring of 1999 comparing the link Haider made between Austria’s level of unemployment with the number of foreigners in the country to the way the Nazis linked high unemployment rates to the size of the Jewish population), the court dismissed the defamation charge in October.

[Sources include: AAAS, Human Rights Action Network Case AU0003.pel, 17 July 2000; IOC 4/00: 86.]

BELARUS

On 27-28 February 1998, the Belarusian Helsinki Committee (BHC) held a conference on “Political Repression in Belarus in the Twentieth Century” in Minsk. Among the historians attending were Nina Stuzhinskaya, Igor Kuznetsov, V. Karbalevich, and possibly A. Zalessky, chair of the Belarusian Republican Association “Historical Knowledge”. They also wrote articles later published by the BHC in a collection entitled “Political Repression in Belarus in the Twentieth Century: Materials from the Conference". In October 1998 the state newspaper Slavyansky Nabat (The Slavic Alarm Bell) published an article encouraging criminal charges against the conference organizers and the authors of the book because they were "guilty of humiliating the honor and dignity of the President". Despite their repeated attempts, the accused academics were denied the opportunity to respond to the article in the state newspapers.

[Source: HRW, Republic of Belarus: Violations of Academic Freedom (1999) 14.]

In March 1998, the publication of the first issue of the newspaper of the Belarusian Association of Students contained an article on the front page about the uprising in Kalinovsky in April 1863, in which students seized power in the town. In April 1998, one of the students responsible for the publication was questioned by, among others, a KGB (secret police) officer.

[Source: HRW, Republic of Belarus: Violations of Academic Freedom (1999) 26-27.]

CAMBODIA

In March 1999, a United Nations (UN) Group of Experts produced a report recommending the formation of a special international tribunal to bring to justice those suspected of responsibility for gross human rights violations during the Khmer Rouge period (1975-79). The Cambodian authorities rejected the report and stated their intention to hold trials in Cambodia under domestic law. Several Cambodians, however, expressed concern about standards of fairness and judicial independence in Cambodia. In August, the UN sent a second group of experts to Cambodia to assess options for bringing the Khmer Rouge leadership to justice through a tribunal that met international standards.

[Sources: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 64-65; HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) xxii-xxiii, 163.]

CANADA

On 15 September 1999, 3,000 Quebec orphans who were sexually and physically abused in church-run institutions in the 1940s and 1950s were told that they would receive no apology from the Roman Catholic church on the grounds that to do so would "constitute a denial of the historic work accomplished under difficult conditions by the religious communities involved".

[Source: IOC 6/99: 235.]

CHAD

On 3 February 2000, former President Hissene Habré was indicted for torture. Much of the evidence was supplied by Senegalese journalist Daniel Bekoutou, who began to receive death threats and fled to Paris. He wrote an account about his experience, Hunting the Dictator.

[Source: IOC 3/00: 89.]

CHILE

In 1999, the case against General Augusto Pinochet, the first international prosecution of a former head of state since Nuremberg, went ahead (see NCH #14). On 8 October 1999, a magistrate ordered Pinochet's extradition for thirty-five cases of torture or conspiracy to torture committed after 8 December 1988, and on cases of torture resulting from 1,198 "disappearances". He ruled that Pinochet's conduct before 1988 could be examined when finding evidence for the cases. The Chilean government maintained that only Chilean courts had the right to try Pinochet (justifying its endeavours in the name of national sovereignty, the right of Chileans to deal with their own past, and national reconciliation). Judge Juan Guzmán Tapia was investigating forty lawsuits filed in Chilean courts against Pinochet and other members of the military junta (1973-90). On 20 July 1999, the Chilean Supreme Court had upheld the doctrine underlying Guzmán's decision, namely that "disappearance" is a permanent crime until the victim's death is legally certified. On 2 March 2000, Pinochet returned to Chile after he was released on humanitarian grounds.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) xiii, xx, xxiv, 93, 96, 99-100, 110-13, 479-80; AI, Report 2000 (2000) 14-17, 70-71.]

Also see: United States.

CHINA

In June 1992, Wang Wanxing was arrested on Tiananmen Square, Beijing, for unfurling a banner commemorating the 4 June 1989 massacre. In July 1992, he was confined to a psychiatric hospital and forcibly given drugs. After a brief period of release in 1999, he was confined to the hospital again in November 1999.

[Sources: AI, Report 1993 (1993) 94; IOC 1/00: 91-92.]

In 1998, Tohti, a Uighur scholar who had been a visiting scholar in Japan, was reportedly arrested when returning to China to visit his relatives. Prior to visiting Japan, he had worked at the Minorities Institute in Beijing. After his arrest, he was reportedly tried and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment for publishing a Chinese-language book on Uighur history while in Japan.

[Source: AI, China: Gross Violations of Human Rights in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region (WWW-text of ASA 17/18/99; 1999).]

In 1999, police in several cities prevented those wishing to publicly commemorate the tenth anniversary of the 4 June 1989 crackdown from laying wreaths or visiting cemeteries. Jian Qisheng, a student leader in 1989, was formally arrested for calling on people to remember the crackdown with a candlelight vigil. In June an estimated 60,000 people joined the annual vigil. Exiled history student and former student leader Wang Dan did not receive a visa for Hong Kong to attend a commemorative conference there in May (for Wang, see NCH #4, #5, #6, #10). In June 2000, Huang Qi, founder of a website with information on the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, was arrested on charges of subversion. Ding Zilin (?1937-) issued a letter signed by 108 families of victims of the massacre. From 1991 Ding had campaigned for an independent investigation into the killings. She compiled a list of those killed and wounded (220 names in March 1999), wrote The Factual Account of a Search for the June Fourth Victims (1994), and tried to persuade the government to reverse its opinion that the 1989 demonstrations were counter-revolutionary. She was frequently harassed by the police.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 182; AI, Report 2000 (2000) 73, 75; IOC 4/00: 91-92, 5/00: 92.]

On 7 August 1999, Song Yongyi (1949-), a Chinese-born librarian and historian working at Dickinson College, PA, United States, since 1989 and specialized in contemporary Chinese history, was detained when he was in Beijing to collect published documents on the Cultural Revolution (1966-76). He was confined and on 24 December officially charged with "the purchase and illegal provision of intelligence to foreign people" and arrested. On 28 January 2000, he was released. One source suggested that he was arrested because his research seemed to indicate that former Premier Zhou Enlai - admired by Premier Li Peng - had played a more ruthless role in the Cultural Revolution than was generally accepted. During the Cultural Revolution, Song had to interrupt his education and became a dockworker. From 1971 to 1976, he was imprisoned for organizing a book club with others interested in discussing political ideas. After the Cultural Revolution, he was cleared of all criminal charges (see NCH #16).

[Sources include: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 180.]

On 23 July 2000, it was reported that Devils on the Doorstep, a tragi-comic film by Jiang Wen (winner of the 2000 Grand Prix Jury Prize at Cannes, France) about villagers capturing and collaborating with Japanese soldiers during the Sino-Japanese war (1931-45), had been banned by the Film Censorship

Committee of the State Administration of Radio, Film and Television, allegedly because it “severely distorted history” and depicted the Chinese as “ignorant” and “not hating the Japanese troops as they should”.

[Source: IOC 5/00: 92-94.]

Also see: Japan.

COLOMBIA

On 2 September 1999, the remains of historian Darío Betancourt Echeverry were found in a rural area outside the capital Bogotá. He had been abducted by gunmen on 30 April 1999. A specialist on political violence, Betancourt had headed the social sciences department at the Universidad Pedagógica Nacional (National University of Educational Sciences), Bogotá. Military intelligence files reportedly linked his name to armed opposition groups. In 1998, the Twentieth Brigade of the Colombian army, responsible for military intelligence, was disbanded after it was implicated in human rights violations against people on whom they had filed false information. The government repeatedly stated that it was committed to revising military intelligence archives in order to prevent further human rights violations, but such revisions had not taken place.

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 103/99 (11 May & 15 September 1999); AAAS, Case CO9908.Bet, 23 June 1999, 8 October 1999; HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) xxvii, 458.]

CONGO

On 26 July 2000, BBC television producer Caroline Parr was detained in Kinshasa by the security services, along with her assistant Pierre Mombele and Jonas Munkamba, whom she was interviewing about the 1961 assassination of former Prime Minister Patrice Lumumba (1925-61).

[Source: IOC 5/00: 96.]

CROATIA

In October 1999, a court found Nazi-era concentration camp commander Dinko Sakic guilty of crimes against humanity.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 262.]

The contents of the documents in possession of former President and historian Franjo Tudjman (1922-1999) were to be made public by the new President Stipe Mesic, who said on 14 March 2000 that only documents containing military secrets would remain classified.

[Source: IOC 3/00: 92].

CUBA

On 14 January 1999, about a dozen people were reportedly detained, allegedly to stop them from participating in a march to commemorate the anniversary of the birth of United States civil rights activist Martin Luther King.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 88.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

In October 1999, the European Union pressured the government to declare obsolete the 1945 “Benes decrees”, which revoked the citizenship and property rights of Germans and Hungarians in Czechoslovakia and expelled most Germans from Sudetenland.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 267.]

The classified police file from the Communist era on Minister of Foreign Affairs Jan Kavan was leaked and made into a book.

[Source : IOC 4/00: 93.]

EGYPT

Among the books banned in 1999 at the American University of Cairo at the request of government censors was The Prophet and Pharaoh: Muslim Extremism in Egypt (originally French 1984; London 1985), a history of the Muslim Brotherhood by Giles Kepel.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 325, 347.]

ETHIOPIA

In 1999 the prosecution case against forty-six members of the former military government (known as Dergue, ruled 1974-91) for genocide and other crimes against humanity, which started in 1994, continued. There were international demands for former President Mengistu Haile-Mariam to be tried. He lived in exile in Zimbabwe.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 102.]

On 23 December 1999, Abera Wogi, chief editor of the weekly Maebe, was sentenced to a year's imprisonment on charges of defamation and "fabrication and dissemination of false information" in connection with an article on a General exiled in Sudan, who accused Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of having killed eighty people with cyanide when he fought the government of former President Mengistu.

[Source: IOC 2/00: 99.]

On 28 April 2000, Gamachu Malka Fufa (?1957-) (pen name: Moti Biya) was unexpectedly released on bail (see NCH #10, #12). He had been held since October 1997.

[Source: Centre to Centre: Newsletter of the Writers in Prison Committee of International PEN, 3/2000: 6.]

GERMANY

On 5 November 1999, it was reported that a controversial exhibition detailing crimes committed by the German army (Wehrmacht) during World War II was to be closed for about three months following accusations by independent historians that some photographs in the exhibition were labelled incorrectly, attributing murders committed by Soviet forces to the Wehrmacht. The exhibition provoked demonstrations among those incensed at its implicit rejection of the popularly held belief that the Wehrmacht fought a honourable war while the SS (Schutzstaffel, Defense Corps; special NSDAP security force) retained sole responsibility for war crimes and the Holocaust.

[Source: IOC 1/00: 95.]

In 2000, historian Ernst Nolte receive the Konrad Adenauer Prize, a fact that many German historians found controversial because since the mid-1980s Nolte had been suggesting that National Socialism was a response to and an imitation of Bolshevism, a thesis that sparked the so-called Historikerstreit (Historians' Battle).

[Source: IOC 4/00: 13.]

Also see: Czech Republic, United States.

GUATEMALA

In December 1999, Nobel Peace Prize winner (1992) Rigoberta Menchú filed charges against eight former Guatemalan officers, for genocide, state terrorism, torture and extrajudicial executions, carried out while they were in office. They included former President General Efraín Ríos Montt, who was elected to Congress in the 1999 elections and served as its President. The charges were filed in Spain.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 115.]

The Juan Gerardi case (see NCH #10, 13, 14) remained unresolved. Four people were arrested at various points in connection with the murder of Gerardi, but none remained in custody at the end of 1999. A number of people involved in the case fled abroad after death threats; they included members of the Archbishop's Human Rights Office; two former judges; a prosecutor who had asked for DNA blood tests of twelve military officers and five others to be compared with tests on blood samples found at the murder scene; a witness; and a member of the Presidential High Command who had accused some of his colleagues of involvement in the murder.

[Sources: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 115; AI, News, January 2000.]

HAITI

On 10 September 1999, four Haitians who had been imprisoned and tortured in the 1970s filed complaints in a Paris court against former Haitian dictator Jean-Claude Duvalier for crimes against humanity. They received the support of the Committee to Bring Duvalier to Justice.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 135.]

Also see: United States.

INDIA

In December 1999 (or earlier), the Indian Council of Historical Research (ICHR) allegedly decided to order Oxford University Press to suspend publication of two volumes in its Towards Freedom series (a documentation project on the 1938-47 period) by social historians Sumit Sarkar, Delhi University, and

K.N. Panikkar, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi, and return them to the ICHR for review. The volumes, about the years 1940 and 1946, had been submitted in 1995 and 1996 and already in press. The authors and general series editor Sarvepalli Gopal (1923-) were informed of the suspension by the ICHR on 11 February 2000. On [15] February dozens of historians and academics from the four New Delhi universities protested in front of the ICHR office. A statement signed by over thirty academics, including three former ICHR chairpersons (Ram Sharan Sharma, Irfan Habib, and Ravinder Kumar), denounced the withdrawal of the volumes as “the grossest form of censorship”. Panikkar declared that the volumes were withheld because the militant Hindu organization Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh, close to the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (ruling since 1998), claimed a prominent place in the freedom movement for themselves by emphasizing that Sangh leaders like (Prime Minister) Atal Vajpayee and organizations like Hindu Mahasabha played an important role in the freedom struggle. On 3 March the Rajya Sabha (Council of States) discussed the affair.

[Sources include: IOC 3/00: 95.]

IRAN

After his release in December 1998 (see NCH #10, #14), hojatoleslam Sayed Mohsen Saidzadeh’s status as a clergyman was rescinded. In October 1998, the Culture and Islamic Guidance Ministry refused to allow publication of his new book, Freedom of Women During the Time of Muhammad, charging that the book showed disrespect to the Prophet.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 504.]

A plan of documentary maker Rob Gardner to film a history of Islam met with the support of the Iranian government, which offered a permit without inspection of the script. In the United States, the venture was initially rejected because of economic sanctions imposed following the 1979 occupation of the United States embassy in Tehran, but an exemption was found.

[Source: IOC 1/00: 12-13.]

IRAQ

In early December 1998, Ayatollah Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr, the leading Shi’a cleric in Iraq, reportedly called off a march to the shrine of Imam Hussein in Kerbala after the government massed security forces around the city to enforce its ban on the march. In February 1999, the Ayatollah was assassinated, probably because of his criticism of the government.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 358.]

IRELAND

On 7 March 2000, the Irish Censorship Board unbanned 420 books, including Marriage Past, Present and Future: An Outline of the History and Development of Human Sexual Relationships (London 1930), by Ralph De Pomerai, banned in 1931.

[Source: IOC 3/00: 15, 97.]

ISRAEL

Education Minister Yossi Sarid stepped up a controversial campaign to change the way in which modern history was taught in schools. He urged teachers to incorporate the 1956 Kafr al-Qassem massacre in the curriculum and to commemorate an event in which fifty Arab villagers were gunned down by troops.

[Source: IOC 6/99: 244.]

JAPAN

The Chinese government repeatedly expressed indignation to Japan for allowing a conference entitled “The Biggest Lie of the Twentieth Century: Documenting the Rape of Nanking” to proceed on 21 January in Osaka. Osaka officials refused to halt the conference “because it would infringe the constitutional right of free speech”. The government confirmed the fact that the massacre had taken place but said it was a matter for Osaka authorities to decide.

[Source: IOC 2/00: 104.]

KAZAKHSTAN

In April 1999, police in Almaty stopped members of the Union of Semirechie Cossacks from entering an Orthodox cathedral for Easter services, claiming that the traditional military uniforms worn by the Cossacks violated the ban on creating “military organisations with uniforms and insignia”.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 276.]

KENYA

In [February] 2000, the court charged reporter Johann Wandetto, among other things, with publishing false news in connection with an article in which he quoted a minister in President arap Moi's government who had called for the posthumous trial of Kenya's first President (1963-78) Jomo Kenyatta for alleged "crimes" committed during his presidency. The minister denied having called for such a trial. The court granted bail on this charge.

[Source: IOC 3/00: 99.]

KUWAIT

Political scientist Ahmad al-Baghdadi and historian Sulaiman al-Badr from Kuwait University were criticized by some clerics because in 1996 they had written in a student magazine that the Prophet Muhammad had failed to convert non-believers during his time in Mecca. Al-Badr publicly apologized but al-Baghdadi was found guilty of blaspheming Islam and given a suspended six-month sentence in May 1999. On appeal his sentence was reduced to one month. He was imprisoned on 5 October. The court had found him guilty of "spreading views that ridicule, scorn, or belittle religion." He went on hunger strike. After the Emir, Sheik Jaber al-Ahmad al-Sabah, pardoned him, he was released on 18 October.

[Sources include: IOC 6/99: 245, 1/00: 99; HRW Academic Freedom Committee, Letter to the Emir of Kuwait, 13 October 1999; HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 276; AI, Report 2000 (2000) 151.]

LEBANON

In October 1999, A Civilized People, a film about the civil war (1975-90) by Chahal Sabbag, was cut by fifty minutes by the government censor because of "inflammatory remarks" against Christ, the Virgin Mary, and Islam. None of Sabbag's previous films about the conflict were screened in Lebanon.

[Sources: IOC 1/00: 173, 2/00: 106.]

LIBERIA

On 15 December 1999, police arrested James Torh on charges of sedition after criticising the government in a talk to secondary-school students. Torh had a record of speaking out about human rights concerns in Liberia. In the weeks leading up to his arrest, he publicly clashed with President Charles Taylor about the need for a truth commission to be established in the country to investigate violations committed during the seven-year civil war (1990-97). He was released on bail after three days. He may face up to five years in prison.

[Sources: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 159; AI, News, May 2000.]

LIBYA

See: United Kingdom.

MOROCCO

The 4 March 2000 edition of the French daily Le Figaro was blocked from distribution for carrying an article based on the book Secrets of the King's Friend, written by the late King Hassan's personal doctor François Cleret. The article revealed that "[leader of the Moroccan Left] Mehdi Ben Barka's body was cut into pieces under orders of King Hasan and brought to Morocco in diplomatic suitcases".

[Source: IOC 3/00: 101.]

During a visit to Morocco from 3 to 9 June 2000, Joseph Tual, a journalist for France 3 television station, was continually harassed by security services because he had been reporting on the ongoing investigation into Ben Barka's assassination.

[Source: IOC 5/00: 102-03.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

U Ohn Myint (?1917-) (see NCH #14, also NCH #8, #10) was released in January 1999 following the visit of United States Congressman Tony Hall.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 170.]

NIGERIA

In May, President Olusegun Obasanjo announced the appointment of a seven-member judicial commission of inquiry to investigate “mysterious deaths”, assassinations and other human rights abuses under the military governments in office between 1984 and May 1999. In October 1999, the scope of the investigation was extended back to 1966, thus including the abuses of the Biafran war (1967-70). The commission received more than 11,000 submissions, many related to human rights violations in Ogoni-land in the mid-1990s. Hearings had not yet started by the end of 1999.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 58-59; AI, Report 2000 (2000) 182.]

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

During 1999, history student Wael Ali Farraj (see NCH #9, #10, #14) remained in prison.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 187.]

Among eleven academics and critics arrested on 28 November 1999 for signing a petition which accused the Palestinian political leadership of corruption and political mismanagement, was Abd al-Sattar Qassim (?1949-), professor of history or political science at An-Najah National University, Nablus. He was arrested by Palestinian General Security Services and held in Jericho. On 16 December, documents and papers were confiscated during a search of his house. On 6 January 2000, he was released without charge. On 18 February, he was rearrested. In 1995, Qassim had also been shot after writing an article criticising President Yasser Arafat (see NCH #15).

[Sources: AAAS Human Rights Action Network, Case Number PA9915 (9 December 1999); AI, Urgent Action 319/99 (London 15 and 20 December 1999, 10 January 2000), 50/00 (25 February 2000); IOC 1/00: 100, 2/00: 108, 3/00: 102-03.]

POLAND

According to Rafal Pankowski, editor of the anti-Fascist magazine Nigdy Wiecej (Never Again), Warsaw, historical revisionism was flourishing in Poland and incorporated the denial of the Holocaust, which was officially forbidden. David Irving’s work was translated and issued by Bellona, the Ministry of Defense publishing house, and in 1999 Dariusz Ratajczak, a research historian at the University of Opole, published a monograph questioning the existence of the gas chambers in Auschwitz extermination camp.

[Source: IOC 2/00: 148.]

Also see: United Kingdom.

ROMANIA

A law passed by the Chamber of Deputies in June 1999 allowed Romanians access to their secret police files and requires that the Romanian Information Service reveal if candidates for public office had been members of the Securitate.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 285.]

RWANDA

In 1999, at least 1,420 people were tried in Rwandese courts on charges of participation in the 1994 genocide. At least 180 people were sentenced to death. There were no judicial executions. The quality and conduct of trials varied. Tens of thousands of genocide suspects remained in detention without trial. Trials also continued at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda in Arusha, Tanzania. By the end of 1999, 38 people were detained in Arusha.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 203-04.]

SENEGAL

See: Chad.

SIERRA LEONE

A Human Rights Manifesto for Sierra Leone adopted during a visit by the United Nations (UN) High Commissioner for Human Rights in June 1999, pledged UN support for a Truth and Reconciliation Commission which would examine human rights abuses committed during the civil war (1991-99). The UN did not recognize the general amnesty which provided impunity for human rights abuses.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 208, 210-11.]

SOUTH AFRICA

The National Director of Public Prosecutions established a unit to investigate possible prosecutions of perpetrators of past human rights violations who had failed to receive amnesty (more than 5000 by the end of 1999) or to cooperate with the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) (see NCH #14). In October 1999, survivors of past human rights violations publicly protested against the government's failure to implement the TRC's recommendations for financial and other reparations to thousands of victims.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 217.]

SOUTH KOREA

At his trial in September 1999, Suh Joon-sik (see NCH #14) was found guilty of violating the Security Surveillance Law and put on probation.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 474.]

SPAIN

See: Chile, Guatemala.

SRI LANKA

Official efforts continued to account for the tens of thousands of persons who "disappeared" at the hands of the security forces since the conflict between the Sri Lankan government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam began in 1983 (see NCH #14). In January 1999, the Presidential Commission on Disappearances, set up in May 1998 to investigate complaints which three earlier presidential commissions of inquiry into involuntary removal and disappearances had not examined, submitted an interim report based on investigations since June 1998. The commission received more than ten thousand complaints. The report provided details on about one hundred court cases filed against perpetrators of "disappearances". More than 18,000 people applied for death certificates for "disappeared" relatives (a necessary prerequisite for obtaining government compensation). In June 1999, the exhumation of mass graves in Jaffna began. The remains of fifteen people who allegedly "disappeared" in mid-1996 were exhumed and investigations into the circumstances of their deaths continued. After taking Jaffna in 1996, the army had allegedly killed Tamil civilians and buried them in some twenty-four graves.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 213; AI, Report 2000 (2000) 221.]

SWITZERLAND

On 10 April 2000, far-right editor and publisher Gaston-Armand Amaudruz (1921-) was imprisoned for one year for his denial of the Holocaust.

[Source: IOC 4/00: 109.]

TURKEY

On 5 February 2000, The Chronological Album of the Kurds: 1900 to 2000, a book distributed by the pro-Kurdish daily Ozgur Bakis, was banned on the grounds that it was “separatist propaganda”.

[Source: IOC 3/00: 109.]

UNITED KINGDOM

The new inquiry into the killings of thirteen unarmed people by the army on “Bloody Sunday” was delayed by arguments over whether security force witnesses would be allowed to remain anonymous (see NCH #10, #14). The inquiry judges continued to collect and process large amounts of evidence. The Independent Commission on Policing failed to recommend a mechanism to deal with the legacy of past human rights abuses.

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 250.]

In the autumn of 1996 Deborah Lipstadt (1947-), Dorot professor of modern Jewish and Holocaust studies, Emory University, Atlanta GA, and Penguin Books were sued for libel by the extreme right-wing historian David Irving because in her book Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (1993) she had characterized him as a Holocaust denier. During the trial (January-April 2000) Irving rejected the accusation although he did question the number of Jewish deaths and denied the systematic extermination of the Jews in concentration camps. He charged that the book had irrevocably damaged his reputation. He was forced to subpoena two witnesses, historians John Keegan and Donald C. Watt, who would not give evidence voluntarily. On 10 April 2000, the judge ruled that Irving had “for his own ideological reasons persistently and deliberately misrepresented and manipulated historical evidence” and that he was “an active Holocaust denier”. He also said “that no objective, fair-minded historian would (...) doubt that there were gas chambers at Auschwitz and that they were operated on a substantial scale to kill hundreds of thousands of Jews.” Overall, he said, he said, Irving had “treated the historical evidence in a manner which fell far short of the standard to be expected of a conscientious historian”. Under British libel laws, the burden of proof falls on the defendant. Among the evidence submitted by the defence were the testimony by Holocaust historian Robert Jan van Pelt and a 700-page report on Irving’s historical methods written by Richard Evans, professor of modern history at Cambridge University. In 1996 Irving also sued The Observer and writer Gitta Sereny because, in a review of his Goebbels biography, she had accused him of deliberately falsifying history. In the course of the Lipstadt-Irving trial, the Israeli government released the complete memoirs of Adolf Eichmann, which were written in an Israeli prison cell.

[Sources include: IOC 2/00: 5, 32, 120, 128-29, 3/00: 98, 111.]

On 23 May 2000 it was revealed that MI5 (domestic security service) officers had destroyed a secret tape containing potentially vital evidence of a murder during an operation by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Lurgan County, Armagh (Northern Ireland) in October 1982.

[Source: IOC 4/00: 88.]

On 21 August 2000, former MI5 officer David Shayler was arrested on his return to the United Kingdom and charged with breaching the Official Secrets Act. Shayler fled to mainland Europe after publicly revealing MI5’s mishandling of an investigation into IRA (Irish Republican Army) terrorist activity and alleging that the Secret Intelligence Service MI6 had played an instrumental part in a 1996 plot to assassinate Libyan leader Colonel Moammar Qaddafi. Shayler plans to confirm the veracity of his allegations in court. (see NCH #10.)

[Source: IOC 5/00: 90-91.]

Also see: Chile, Poland.

UNITED STATES

Washington continued to hold 160,000 documents seized from the Haitian military and the paramilitary group FRAPH during its 1994 intervention, maintaining that it wanted to hand them over to the Haitian government but only after blacking out the names of American citizens, a condition the Préval government rejected (see NCH #6.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 137; IOC 1/00: 95.]

On 1 February 1999, the White House issued a directive ordering United States agencies to collect and review for release documents “that shed light on human rights abuses, terrorism, and other acts of political violence in Chile.” On 30 June 1999, the government declassified and made public an estimated 5,300 documents related to events during 1973-78, from agencies including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the Defense Department. Thousands more documents from the pre-coup period were promised later in 1999. Although heavily censored, the released documents confirmed the direct chain of command between General Augusto Pinochet and the head of the secret police DINA, Manuel Contreras. They also showed that United States Secretary of State Henry Kissinger had received detailed intelligence about the human rights violations.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 115-16; AI, Report 2000 (2000) 70.]

On 8 October 1999, it was reported that George Washington’s fob watch had to be censored from a nineteenth-century portrait in a school textbook because it risked being mistaken for his genitals. The watch, hanging down the president’s thigh, was painted out by hand from over two thousand copies of The United States in Modern Times.

[Source: IOC 6/99: 256.]

On 5 November 1999, Kansas teacher Stan Roth was dismissed after forty years’ service for calling the teaching of creationism “non-scientific crap”. The decision came a few weeks before the state board of education was due to remove the teaching of evolution from the compulsory curriculum.

[Source: IOC 1/00: 111.]

On 18 November 1999, it was reported that the mail order Internet company Amazon.com had been shipping huge numbers of copies of Adolf Hitler’s book Mein Kampf to customers in Germany. While it is illegal to publish or sell the book in Germany, ordering it by mail is legal and resulted in the book reaching Amazon’s top ten best-seller list for Germany during the summer. Following pressure from the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Amazon ceased shipping the book outside of the United States.

[Source: IOC 1/00: 112.]

A 25-feet-high ceramic mural by artist Mike Alewitz representing Harriet Tubman who, armed with a musket, leads slaves to liberation upset the Associated Black Charities Inc. that had planned to display it in Baltimore. The group, fearing that the piece could be interpreted as “racist and violent”, asked Alewitz to replace the musket with a staff, but he refused.

[Source: IOC 4/00: 10.]

On 12 May 2000, it was reported that Louis Farrakhan had admitted that his words could have contributed to the 1965 assassination of his rival Malcolm X. In December Farrakhan had written “Such a man is worthy of death”, after Malcolm X had criticized the Nation of Islam’s spiritual leader Elijah Muhammad.

[Source: IOC 4/00: 112.]

Also see: Chile, China, Cuba.

VATICAN

On 5 November 1999, it was announced that the beatification of Pope Pius XII would be delayed. According to some, the controversy over his role during World War II was responsible for the delay.

[Source: 1/00: 113.]

VIETNAM

Nguyen Dinh Huy (1932-), a high school teacher of history and English, journalist, and editor of The Progressive and Human Rights, continued to be detained in a prison camp. Around 13 November 1993, he had been arrested with eight others for planning to hold an “illegal” international conference on economic development and democracy in Ho Chi Minh City. After an unfair trial on 11-12 August 1995, he was found guilty of “acting to overthrow the people’s government” and sentenced to fifteen years’ imprisonment for his leadership of the “Movement to Unite the People and Build Democracy”, a non-violent political group advocating political change which had organized the conference. He was permitted only brief, infrequent family visits and his health was deteriorating rapidly. Nguyen Dinh Huy had previously been imprisoned in 1957-59 (under the Ngo Dinh Diem government) and in 1975-92 (under the Communist government) for his alleged “counter-revolutionary” political beliefs (see NCH #6.)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1996 (1995) 182-83; AI, Report 1996 (1996) 323, 1998: 359, 1999: 360, 2000: 261; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-Yearly Caselist (London 1997) 41-42.]

In March 1999, six months after his release from prison (see NCH# 10), Buddhist scholar and author of several studies of Buddhist history Thich Quang Do was summoned for questioning and ordered to return to Ho Chi Minh City after he had traveled to central Vietnam to visit the Supreme Patriarch of the unofficial Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam. On 6 August he was interrogated about his letter to European Union ambassadors in Hanoi calling for human rights and religious freedoms. On 13 August he was intimidated at his pagoda. In September 1999, he was again threatened with arrest.

[Source: HRW, World Report 2000 (1999) 216-17.]

ZIMBABWE

In April 1999, two non-governmental organisations issued a summary of the report Breaking the Silence, Building True Peace, about atrocities committed in Matabeleland during the armed conflict that followed Zimbabwe's independence (1980-88).

[Source: AI, Report 2000 (2000) 269.]

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; the Network of Education and Academic Rights [NEAR, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

ARGENTINA

In 1998, the government consistently refused to collaborate with the judicial investigation opened by Spanish judge Baltasar Garzón into the “disappearance” of 600 Spanish citizens under the military government (1976-83), claiming that the Spanish courts did not have jurisdiction.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 100-01.]

In 1998, one of the groups that faced increasing official pressure was Hijos por la Identidad y la Justicia contra el Olvido y el Silencio (Children for Identity and Justice Against Oblivion and Silence), a group formed by children of “disappearance” victims.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 102.]

On 13 August 1998, the Supreme Court refused Carmen Aguiar de Lapacó’s petition for access to the military and civilian archives in an attempt to trace her daughter Alejandra, who “disappeared” under the military government. The court denied access on the grounds that the case had been legally closed, although prosecution was stated not to be the aim of the plaintiff. In late September 1998, the Supreme Court upheld the right of a man to access to government files in order to determine the whereabouts of his brother (a guerrilla leader killed in a confrontation in 1976 and whose body was subsequently hidden by the military government).

[Sources: IOC 6/98: 88; HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 101.]

BANGLADESH

On 27 July 1999, a mass grave, apparently from the 1971 liberation war, was discovered by workers extending a mosque in Dhaka, close to an alleged site of massacres committed by the Pakistani military and their collaborators. Once forensic investigations are completed, the Liberation Museum intends to file a case with the International Court of Justice, The Hague.

[Source: IOC 5/99: 124.]

BELARUS

In [January] 1998, Liubov Lunyova, who since 1992 had worked as a lecturer of ancient and medieval history on a fixed-term contract in the history department at the Belarusian State University in Minsk, was dismissed, most likely for being an activist for the human rights organization Minsk Spring 96. When she applied for a job at another school, the principal told her that he “would be fired within half an hour”, if he gave her a job.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 453; HRW, Republic of Belarus: Turning Back the Clock (W.W.W.-summary; 1998) 4-5.]

On 22 March 1998, up to fifty men and women were arrested and beaten by the police following a peaceful demonstration in the capital, Minsk, to mark the eightieth anniversary of the independence of Belorussia (the former name of Belarus).

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 92.]

BRAZIL

In April 1998, a series of articles in the Rio daily O Globo based on security force documents from 1970 to 1981 shed light on the conduct of the military campaign to eliminate the Araguaia guerrilla movement in the 1970s, demonstrating state responsibility for the detention and death of persons whose whereabouts the military had consistently denied knowledge of. The revelations prompted new calls for the release of all documents held by governmental authorities concerning the abuses by security forces and the military under the military government (1964-85).

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 107.]

In April 1998, members of the Rio de Janeiro-based Grupo Tortura Nunca Mais (Group Torture No More) received a number of anonymous death threats and suffered other forms of intimidation, following the group's public campaign against the promotion of an army doctor alleged to have participated in torture under the military government.

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 106.]

BURUNDI

The calls to end impunity for human rights violations, originally focusing on recent events, grew to include demands for justice for the massacres of 1972 and of even earlier years.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 33.]

CAMBODIA

The government chose to allow senior former Khmer Rouge leaders Khieu Samphan and Nuon Chea to escape justice despite the fact that the two men were believed to be the key surviving architects of the deaths of over one million Cambodians during the Khmer regime.

[Source: IOC 2/99: 102.]

CHILE

In September 1998, marches in Santiago to mark the 25th anniversary of the military coup led by General Augusto Pinochet Ugarte, former head of state (1973-90), former head of the army (-1999) and senator for life (1999-), were met with large-scale repression by the Carabineros. Hundreds of demonstrators were arrested.

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 126.]

On 16 October 1998, General Pinochet was placed under restraint in the United Kingdom on request of Spain, which demanded his extradition because it sought justice for the Spanish citizens tortured and murdered under his regime. Several other governments supported this request for extradition. On 25 November, the Law Lords ruled by a three to two majority that he was not immune from extradition to Spain, thereby reversing a decision of the High Court. On 18 December, it ruled to overturn this decision, because one of the Lords who cast the deciding vote failed to declare an affiliation with Amnesty International. The arrest emanated from an investigation by Spanish judges into the so-called Operation Condor, in which military rulers of Chile, Argentina, and Uruguay cooperated in the assassination of leftists during the 1970s. On 24 March 1999, the Law Lords finally ruled that the extradition could go ahead though only with the charges limited to crimes committed after 1988 (when the United Kingdom ratified the International Convention on Torture). On 15 April Home Secretary Jack Straw allowed extradition proceedings to go ahead, but General Pinochet's lawyers appealed against the decision.

[Sources: IOC 6/98: 87, 82, 114, 1/99: 5, 103, 2/99: 104, 124, 3/99: 118; HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) xviii-xix, 95; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 24, 27, 51-52, 125-26, 308, 347, 350.]

On 14 April 1999, the entire print run (1,200 copies) of "The Black Book of Chilean Justice" (Santiago), launched the day before and written by Alejandra Matus Acuña, a journalist based in Miami, was seized by the police, on the instruction of the Santiago High Court, and banned. It was considered insulting to the authorities. The book, the product of six years' research, examined the conduct of the Chilean High Court between its inception in 1826 and 1998, with special emphasis on the military government of President Pinochet (1973-90). A. Matus immediately flew abroad to avoid arrest; the two publishers were briefly detained.

[Sources: IOC 4/99: 130-31, 5/99: 23-24, 126-27.]

CHINA

During 1998, a "patriotic education campaign" continued to force Tibetans, especially monks and nuns, to admit, inter alia, that Tibet had always been a part of China. Authorities reported that 76 per cent of Tibetan monasteries and nunneries had been "rectified". On 3 March 1999, the fortieth anniversary of the failed Tibetan uprising against Chinese rule, two monks were arrested for shouting pro-independence slogans in the Tibetan capital Lhasa. (see NCH #6, #10)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 180, IOC 3/99: 99.]

Liu Nianchun (see NCH #10) continued to be held in a labour camp beyond the expiration of his three-year sentence on 21 May 1998. On 20 December 1998, he was expelled to the United States. He had been arrested with others for taking part in events commemorating the June 1989 Tiananmen massacre.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 178; IOC 2/99: 103.]

Two Guangdong (Canton) magazines, “New Weekly” and “Shenzen Pictorial Journal”, were banned by the propaganda department for mentioning the Tiananmen massacre.

[Source: IOC 2/99: 103.]

On 26 March 1999, the China News Publishing Agency banned further sales of a biography of Fidel Castro, “The Last Revolutionary of the Twentieth Century”, by a historian of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, after a complaint from the Cuban embassy that it “hurt” Cuba’s image.

[Source: IOC 4/99: 131.]

On 9 April 1999, the police warned reformist political thinker Bao Tong, former chief-of-staff of Premier and Chinese Communist Party secretary-general Zhao Ziyang, that his letter to the leadership, calling for an official reassessment of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre (officially an “appropriate response to a counter-revolutionary rebellion”), “endangered state security”. An estimated fifty activists were reportedly detained in the run-up to the tenth anniversary.

[Source: IOC 4/99: 131-32.]

Also see: United States.

COLOMBIA

Error: “Jorge Eliécer Gaetan” (NCH #10) should read: “Jorge Eliécer Gaitán”.

CONGO

In April 1998, the United Nations discontinued its most ambitious human rights investigative mission in Africa, the Secretary General’s Investigative Team (SGIT) into the alleged massacres of tens of thousands Rwandan Hutu refugees in Congo (then Zaire) during 1997, after the team had been persistently blocked by the Kabila government from examination of massacre sites. The obstruction also included the harassment of witnesses and the detention of an investigator. On 13 July 1998, the Security Council, debating SGIT’s report, condemned the massacres but did not authorise an independent investigation and prosecution of perpetrators. (see NCH #10)

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) xvii-xviii, 13-14, 20, 34, 37.]

CROATIA

On 22 December 1998, Victor Ivancic, chief editor of the satirical Split weekly Feral Tribune, and commentator Marinko Culic (see NCH #5, #6, #10) were acquitted again.

[Sources: IOC 2/99: 104; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 143.]

CUBA

On 11 November 1997, Orestes Rodríguez Horruitiner, a leader of two opposition groups in Santiago, was sentenced to four years for enemy propaganda. In July 1997, he was arrested when during a house search books by prominent independence leaders - José Martí, Máximo Gómez and Antonio Maceo - were seized. They later served as evidence in his lawsuit.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 118.]

EGYPT

During 1998, Nasr Hamed Abu-Zeid remained under threat of death from al-Gihad (Holy Struggle). He and his wife continued to live in The Netherlands, fearing for their safety if they returned home. (see NCH #6)

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 157.]

On 13 May 1998, the Minister of Higher Education officially requested that the American University in Cairo remove from its curriculum Mahomet, a biography of the Prophet written by French orientalist and historian Maxime Rodinson, because it allegedly contained “fabrications harmful to the respected Prophet and to the Islamic religion.” The book, available in Egypt since the 1970s, was withdrawn from the reading lists and removed from the library and campus bookstore.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 349, 453; IOC 2/99: 56.]

ETHIOPIA

In 1999, Moti Biyya was in bad health following a prison transfer. In July 1999, Garuma Bekele was charged with violating the press law and with engaging in “terrorist activities”. (see NCH #10, #12)

[Sources: PEN Rapid Action Network 23 July 1999; IOC 5/99: 130.]

FRANCE

On 10 June 1999, the National Assembly acknowledged having fought a “war” against Algerian nationalists (1954-62), when unanimously it abandoned the official viewpoint that the event had only been “an operation for keeping order”.

[Source: IOC 5/99: 130.]

GERMANY

On 15 January 1999, it was reported that media giant Bertelsmann launched an internal but independent inquiry led by American-Israeli historian Saul Friedlander (b. 1932) into its own activities during the Nazi era.

[Source: IOC 2/99: 107.]

GREECE

In 1998, a leader of the ethnic Macedonian Rainbow party was awaiting trial on charges of incitement for having brought calendars from Macedonia bearing the names of Greek towns in Macedonian and praising the interwar pro-Macedonian policy of the Communist party. Many ethnic Macedonians who fled Greece as a result of the 1946-49 Civil War were not allowed to enter Greece in 1998, even for brief visits, or to attend events related to the fiftieth anniversary of their exodus in July.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 266.]

GUATEMALA

In February 1997, the Interamerican Commission on Human Rights admonished the Guatemalan government to actively investigate the 1982 Plan de Sánchez massacre of 268 people. In response, forensic reports and ballistic evidence disappeared from the Public Prosecutor’s Office. The entire file of another massacre of 35 men at Chichupac, Rabinal, also disappeared in 1998.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 125.]

On 25 February 1999, the official Comisión de Esclarecimiento Histórico (CEH; Commission to Clarify Past Human Rights Violations and Acts of Violence That Have Caused the Guatemalan Population to Suffer), set up by the United Nations in June 1994 and which in August 1997 started its work, submitted its 3,400 page report, “Guatemala: Memories of Silence”. Based on evidence from more than 9,000 witnesses and survivors on the cases of some 42,000 victims during the Civil War (1960-96), it concluded that the Guatemalan state had been responsible for acts of genocide against indigenous Mayan communities as well as massive human rights violations, that more than eighty per cent of the estimated 200,000 victims were Mayans, and that the military and their civilian adjuncts bore the main responsibility. It referred to the direct and indirect role of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) in supporting a number of illegal operations. The Guatemalan authorities withheld information requested by the CEH and restricted access to certain military installations. In a reaction, former President Vinicio Cerezo (1986-91) said that the United States government knew about the extrajudicial executions carried out by army death squads and that they prevented him from revealing the facts while he was in office. During his visit to Guatemala in March 1999, President Bill Clinton made a limited apology for the role of the United States in the Civil War. (see NCH #10)

[Sources: AI, Is Guatemala Falling Back To Its Tragic Past? (London 13 May 1998); IOC 2/99: 108; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 178; IOC 4/99: 135; AI News, May 1999: 1.]

Following the murder of Bishop Juan Gerardi in April 1998 (see NCH #10, #13), several other supporters and collaborators of the Recuperation of the Historical Memory Project REMHI, including researcher Pietro Notta, forensic anthropologist Carlos Federico Reyes López (see NCH #5) and the Archbishop, received death threats.

[Sources: AI, Urgent Actions 139/68 (1 & 15 May 1998, 1 December 1998, 7 January 1999) and 142/98 (1 May 1998); IOC 2/99: 108; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 178-80.]

On 20 May 1999, a document released by human rights organisations revealed that military death squads kept detailed records of their operations. The document contained photos and names of 183 victims between August 1983 and March 1985. It was smuggled out of army intelligence files and handed to human rights advocates in February 1999.

[Source: IOC 4/99: 134-35.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

During the armed rebellion from 7 June to 25 August 1998, the Instituto Nacional de Estudos e Pesquisa (INEP; National Institute of Studies and Research) was heavily damaged. The National Archives and Audiovisual Archives at INEP were scattered, shredded and exposed to rain and dirt. Hundreds of audio cassettes which recorded the history of the national liberation struggle and of the different regions had disappeared. This loss of sources would seriously hamper the writing of a first general history of Guinea-Bissau. After the 25 August ceasefire INEP continued to be a military camp. INEP staff was forbidden to engage in work to rehabilitate or save it from further destruction.

[Sources include: IOC 2/99: 81-82.]

IRAN

On 29 July 1998, Mohammed Reza Zaeri, publisher of Khaneh, was arrested and released on bail for publishing an anonymous letter criticising Ayatollah Khomeini (d. 1989) for being responsible for the deaths of hundreds of thousands of youths during the Iran-Iraq war (1980-88) and causing Iran's international isolation by issuing a fatwa against writer Salman Rushdie. He was fined and given a six-month suspended sentence.

[Sources: IOC 5/98: 88, 6/98: 97.]

On 24 September 1998, the government announced that it was dissociating itself from the fatwa imposed on Salman Rushdie in February 1989 after the publication of The Satanic Verses, and from the reward offered for killing him, but several senior religious figures and members of parliament continued to support the fatwa. In October the 15 Khordad Foundation augmented the bounty on S. Rushdie. (see NCH# 5)

[Sources: IOC 6/98: 97, 1/99: 87; HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 357.]

Student rallies on 2 November 1998 commemorating the 1979 takeover of the United States embassy did not include the traditional burning of the United States flag and included welcoming invitations to the ex-hostages.

[Source: IOC 1/99: 87.]

On 24 November 1998, the translator and author Majid Sharif, a key member of the Committee for Research into the Books of Dr. Shariati, was found dead. [On sociologist and historian 'Alī Sharī'atī (1933-1977), once called "the Ideologue of the Iranian Revolution", see NCH #5 & #6].

[Source: IOC 1/99: 87.]

On 26 November 1998, the funeral in Tehran of veteran opposition leader Dariush Forouhar and his wife Parvaneh, both assassinated on 22 November, turned into a nationalist rally with some of the tens of thousands of mourners chanting liberation slogans and praising former Prime Minister Mohammed Mossadegh (1880-1967; dismissed in 1953) who had helped inspire D. Forouhar and his Iran Nation Party.

[Source: IOC 1/99: 87.]

In December 1998, Sayed Mohsen Saidzadeh, arrested in June (see NCH #10), was released.

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 199.]

On 5 January 1999, it was announced that the weekly Shalamcheh was banned after publishing information regarding the relationship between the late Ayatollah Abolqassem al-Khoei and the Shah's secret police.

[Source: IOC 2/99: 110.]

JAPAN

On 27 April 1998, in a landmark ruling, a district court ordered the government to pay damages to three South Korean "comfort women" forced into sexual slavery by Japanese soldiers during World War II. The ruling was a rejection of existing policy denying government compensation to individuals. During the visit of South Korean President Kim Dae-jung to Tokyo in October 1998, the Japanese Emperor, Akihito, and Prime Minister Obuchi made the strongest official apology thus far for the abuses of the past, expressing Japan's "remorseful repentance" for "the unbearable damage and pain" inflicted on the Korean people during colonial rule (1910-45). But the government announced no changes in its policy on "comfort women". A report by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on systematic rape and sexual slavery, Radhika Coomaraswamy, criticised Tokyo for failing to acknowledge any legal responsibility for the "comfort women" issue, but gave the government credit for apologising and expressing remorse to the women and for including reference to the sexual slavery in Japanese textbooks. (see NCH #5, #6, #10)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 196, 197; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 215.]

KAZAKSTAN

In May 1998, the procuracy opened an investigation alleging that the Kazak mass media had committed 273 violations of the Press Law in 1997, including "incitement of national enmity...aimed at instigating disputes and controversy over the country's history and sovereignty."

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 270.]

KENYA

On 15 November 1998, Kenya: Return to Reason (1993), a book by opposition leader Kenneth Matiba, containing a concise record of Kenya's political, economic, and human rights history, was unbanned. It had been banned since 14 January 1994.

[Sources: IOC 1-2/94: 242, 1/99: 90.]

KUWAIT

On 18 August 1998, forty men of the Salab tribe ransacked the offices of the daily Al-Qabas in Kuwait City in response to the republication of a picture from the 1940s showing Salab women dancing without veils in front of men. The caption explained that the Salab acted this way because they were "a mix of Arabs and other peoples who came to Islam later".

[Source: IOC 6/98: 100.]

MACEDONIA

In January 1999, radio reporter Gorica Popova of the state-owned Macedonian Radio and Television was demoted from her editorial position to that of a "junior associate" as punishment for her commentary on a memorial service held in Novo Selo in honour of the controversial interwar historical figure Todor Aleksandrov.

[Source: IOC 2/99: 113.]

Also see: Greece.

MEXICO

On 3 May 1994, two unidentified men tried to enter the Institute of Anthropological Advice for the Maya Region in San Cristóbal de las Casas, Chiapas, in order "to take away the computer". The Institute had compiled important historical archives which were widely consulted by representatives of non-governmental organisations and journalists covering the Chiapas uprising which began in January 1994. The Institute's coordinator, Andres Aubry, French historian and anthropologist, had received several death threats accusing him of sympathising with the Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional (EZLN) rebels. He and his wife, Angélica Inda, an archivist and writer, assisted the Comisión Nacional de Intermediación, which was conducting peace talks between the Mexican government and the EZLN. In 1998, they and other scholars were intimidated and harassed. Attacks against them included attempted detention by unidentified security forces, theft of computers, notes, and manuscripts, break-ins and vandalism of their home, and attempted break-ins at their archives. (see NCH #11)

[Sources: IOC 3/94: 179; Analysis of the AAAS Human Rights Action Network Alerts: October 1993 to June 1996 (W.W.W.-text); AAAS Human Rights Action Network, Case Me9815.Chi, 16 November 1998.]

MOLDOVA

On 22 February 1999, the offices of the daily Flux were attacked by a group of veterans from the war in Afghanistan (1979-89), because it had published a critical article regarding the tenth anniversary of the withdrawal of Soviet troops.

[Source: IOC 3/99: 108]

MYANMAR

A third author possibly involved in writing and distributing a history of the student movement in Myanmar (see NCH #8, #10) was U Ohn Myint (?1917-), an unofficial National League for Democracy adviser. He was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment.

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 258.]

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Updated information of NCH #9 & #10: On 24 April 1996, Wa'el 'Ali Farraj, history student (?1975-) at the Islamic University in Gaza, was arrested by members of the General Intelligence Services. He had his house searched. He was interrogated about membership of Hamas and possession of weapons. During the first three days of his detention, he was hooded, severely beaten, and deprived of sleep and food. He was detained in solitary confinement without charge or trial. In August 1997, he was moved to Gaza Central Prison where his treatment improved. The Attorney General's office informed his father that it could not intervene on the grounds that the case was a political one. On 20 February 1999 the High Court of Justice ordered his immediate release, but his arrest continued.

[Sources: AI News, November 1998: 7; AI, Palestinian Authority Defying the Rule of Law: Political Detainees (Document MDE 21/03/99, April 1999) 14.]

On 23 April 1999, it was reported that a postage stamp commemorating the October 1998 Wye Accords had cropped Benjamin Netanyahu out of a picture of Yasser Arafat and Bill Clinton. The postal services explained that it was a stamp "commemorating those who have invested a lot of effort in peace".

[Source: IOC 5/99: 138]

SOUTH AFRICA

In June 1998, a former agent of the Civil Co-operation Bureau was sentenced to life imprisonment for the 1989 murder of historian and anthropologist D. Webster. (see NCH #5, #10)

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 307]

The release of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) report in October 1998 provoked strong reactions. Former President F.W. de Klerk reached an agreement with the TRC to remove findings against him (namely that he had been an accessory-after-the-fact to two bombings in the late 1980s) from the report, pending a further court hearing in March 1999. The African National Congress (ANC) claimed that its own abuses were justified because it was fighting a war of national liberation against an abusive regime. A court injunction, intended to delay the disclosure of some of its findings on ANC human rights violations such as the targeting of civilians and indiscriminate use of landmines, failed.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) xix, 70; AI News, January 1999: 1; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 304.]

In mid-November 1998, a Jewish extremist group threatened to take action against the Muslim family of Layla Cassim, a grade-ten pupil at Crawford College. Her article, written as a history assignment and pasted on the school's notice board, reportedly "reflected the Palestinian Liberation Organisation's political philosophy. The South African Jewish Board of Deputies said that there was no evidence of anti-Semitism. On 20 November, however, L. Cassim was suspended from the college.

[Sources include: IOC 1/99: 99.]

SOUTH KOREA

In November 1997, Suh Joon-sik, Korean editor and columnist, director of the human rights group Sarangbang (1988-), was arrested. During his trial, he was charged, inter alia, with violating the National Security Law for showing the documentary “Red Hunt” at the 1997 Korean Human Rights Film Festival. The film detailed government collusion in a 1948 massacre of suspected pro-Communist sympathisers on Cheju Island, off South Korea. Although he was released on bail in February 1998 after protests, the charges against him were not dropped. He had already served seventeen years as a political prisoner (until 1988).

[Sources: IOC 2/98: 101; HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 467, 493.]

Also see: Japan.

SPAIN

In 1998 Spain’s public television channel withdrew a 1997 drama series on Philip II (1527-1598) because “it made more sense to combine it with a series on his father, Charles V, which was scheduled to be completed in 2000”. The original script included critical material on Philip’s role in inquisition trials, anti-Semitism, and the 1572 Paris Massacre. The Spanish State Memorial Society for the Philip II and Charles V Anniversaries rejected the passages and issued guidelines that Philip be portrayed as a family man of high moral standing. Academics were disturbed by what was seen as an “an attempt to brush up the darkest sides of a ruler who always preferred the brute suppression of dissidents over diplomacy or negotiations, whether it involved the Protestants in the Netherlands or the conversos (Jews converted to Christianity) in Spain.”

[Sources include: IOC 2/99: 10.]

Also see: Argentina, Chile.

SRI LANKA

In January 1998, the government made good its promise to release the reports of three regional commissions of inquiry into 16,742 “disappearances” dating back as far as 1988. In July 1998, a new commission with islandwide jurisdiction was appointed to investigate and report on about 11,000 complaints left uninvestigated by these earlier commissions. The Board of Investigation which inquired into more than 700 “disappearances” reported in Jaffna in 1995-97, submitted its report to the President in April 1998. The Civil Rights Movement of Sri Lanka criticised the government’s failure to address the many “disappearances” of Tamils in eastern Sri Lanka from 1984 to 1988. On 14 January 1999 the police sought a court order to exhume the alleged mass graves site in Jaffna.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 206, 208; IOC 5/98: 98, 6/98: 110, 2/99: 120; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 311-12.]

SWITZERLAND

On 12 August 1998, Credit Suisse and Union Bank of Switzerland, the two largest Swiss banks, agreed terms on a compensation deal with Jewish Holocaust groups over monies left in Swiss banks by victims of the Holocaust. They will pay US $1.25 billion to survivors over a three-year period.

[Source: IOC 6/98: 110.]

THAILAND

In [November] 1998, the film board rejected two revised scripts for the new version of the film The King and I (Twentieth-Century Fox), about King Mongkut [Rama IV] (reigned 1851-68), on the grounds that he was depicted as a tyrant rather than a scholar.

[Source: IOC 1/99: 100-01.]

UNITED KINGDOM

On 29 January 1998, Prime Minister Tony Blair announced the establishment of a new inquiry into the events of Bloody Sunday (30 January 1972) when British paratroopers in Derry, Northern Ireland, fired on civil rights marchers killing thirteen unarmed people. He noted that recently recovered evidence deserved a fair and impartial adjudication. Hearings were planned to begin in February 1999. On 28 July 1999, the Appeal Court in London ruled that seventeen soldiers should be granted anonymity when giving evidence to the inquiry. Relatives of the victims protested against the decision. (see NCH #10)

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 226, 304, 305; AI, Report 1999 (1999) 348; IOC 5/99: 146.]

Also see: Chile.

UNITED STATES

According to State Department documents published in September 1998, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) gave the Dalai Lama over one million dollars a year for most of the 1960s for operations against China. The money supported Tibetan guerrillas in Nepal, a training base in Colorado, “Tibet Houses” to publicise the Tibetan cause, and university education for Tibetan operatives.

[Source: IOC 6/98: 114.]

In October 1998, the Clinton administration released heavily edited excerpts from a 1995 CIA investigation into death squad activities in Honduras in the 1980s. The investigation was ordered after allegations of CIA complicity in atrocities committed by a secret Honduran military intelligence unit. (see NCH #10)

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 95-96.]

Also see: Guatemala.

VIETNAM

In September 1998, Le Manh That (known as Thich Tri Sieu) (b. 1943), a Buddhist monk of the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBCV) and professor of Vietnamese Buddhist history and literature at Van Hanh University, Saigon, author of, inter alia, A Short History of Vietnamese Buddhism, was released. On 2 April 1984, he was arrested with many others. He had worked for several years to compile a Vietnamese Buddhist Encyclopaedia. Held without charge for four years, he was sentenced to death at a closed trial on 30 September 1988, for membership of an illegal organisation and attempting to overthrow the government. The sentence was commuted to twenty years’ imprisonment. In 1989, he was transferred to a “re-education’ camp. In 1995 at a political indoctrination session, he spoke out for democracy and human rights and was put in solitary confinement. (see NCH #10)

[Sources: IOC 4/84: 44, 7/90: 24; AI, Report 1986 (1986) 267, 1987 (1987) 275-76, 1989 (1989) 206-07, 1990 (1990) 257-58, 1991 (1991) 247, 1992 (1992) 275, 1993 (1993) 309, 1999 (1999) 361; AI Newsletter, January 1993: 4; HRW, World Report 1990 (1991) 337, 1999 (1998) 214, 493; A19, Information, Freedom and Censorship: World Report (1991) 239; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 (1998) 42.]

Also released under the September 1998 amnesty was Thich Quang Do (see NCH #10).

[Source: AI, Report 1999 (1999) 360.]

YUGOSLAVIA (Serbia & Montenegro)

In 1998, government officials stated that they intended to disband the Faculty of Philosophy (including the History Department) at the University of Belgrade, and move its component departments to other faculties, because over seventy professors (nearly one-third of the staff) refused to sign contracts under the new University Act. The act, approved in May 1998, was widely thought to remove basic protections for academic freedom and university autonomy.

[Source: HRW, Deepening Authoritarianism in Serbia: the Purge of the Universities (1999) 14.]

On 11 April 1999, historian Branka Prpa was knocked unconscious when her companion, Slavko Curuvija, publisher and chief editor of Dnevni Telegraph, a daily critical of the Slobodan Milosevic government, was assassinated in Belgrade.

[Source: IOC 3/99: 95, 114]

ZIMBABWE

The government continued to deny the alleged massacres of thousands of non-combatants in Matabeleland during the early 1980s.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1999 (1998) 15.]

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; World University Service [WUS, Amsterdam]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

ARGENTINA

On 8 March 1998, the offices of Amnesty International and the Association for the Relatives of the Detained and Disappeared were targeted by arsonists, with the loss of valuable documents related to the disappearance of Italian and Spanish nationals during the dictatorship (1976-83). On 21 June 1998, the Italian government became the plaintiff in a trial of military officers involved in the disappearance of eight Italian nationals.

[Sources: IOC 3/98: 102, 5/98: 81.]

On 9 June 1998, ex-dictator Jorge Rafael Videla was arrested for offering for adoption to families with links to the armed forces children born in captivity to kidnapped pregnant women. The impunity laws preventing the prosecution of military personnel for human rights abuses excluded the crime of 'appropriation of minors' with which Jorge Videla is being charged.

[Source: IOC 5/98: 80-81.]

AZERBAIJAN

The Ganja local government confiscated all 2,400 copies of a book about the 19th-century Russian occupation of Ganja.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 233.]

BELARUS

In May 1997, the Prosecutor-General issued a warning to the independent newspaper Nasha Niva because it published an article by an historian [name unknown] about the killing of civilians by Soviet partisans during World War II. This allegedly 'infringe[d] the morality, honour and dignity of citizens', although, according to the newspaper, the facts as stated in the article were verified by the former secret police KGB.

[Source: A19, IFEX Alert, 5 August 1998: 3.]

In [November] 1997, Pavel Zhuk, publisher of the Minsk opposition newspaper Svaboda, received warnings from the State Press Commission that the paper could face criminal prosecution for publishing a series of articles which compared the government to that of Joseph Stalin.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 79-81.]

BULGARIA

See Vietnam.

Following legislation passed in July 1997, over 15,000 citizens registered to check whether secret files had been kept on them by Communist intelligence services. On 22 September 1997, the Constitutional Court rejected an appeal to declare the law unconstitutional, but also ruled that the files of court members would not be opened. On 18 November 1997, eleven citizens became the first persons to read their files. On 6 November 1997, the two Bulgarian Orthodox Synods requested that the secret police files on the clergy also be opened to the public [see NCH #6].

[Sources: IOC 6/97: 105, 1/98: 82.]

CANADA

In a case that begun in mid-October 1997, Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel is being tried before the Canadian Human Rights Commission for allegedly creating and maintaining a San Diego Internet website.

[Sources: IOC IOC 6/85: 30-31, 6/88: 35, 7/92: 10, 1/98: 83.]

CHILE

On 17 September 1997, the military prosecutor-general presented a new petition to the Supreme Court of Justice calling for all appeal courts and judges to close legal proceedings into cases of human rights violations, extrajudicial executions and 'disappearances' during 1973-78.

[Source: IOC 6/97: 106.]

CHINA

In 1994, Tibetan Lukhar Sham was sentenced to seventeen years for collecting information and starting a pro-democracy group. He received eight years for purchasing classified documents and was accused of planning to send history and economy books abroad. The details of the case emerged on 7 November 1997.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 101.]

On 21 May 1995, Liu Nianchun (born [1950]), former editor of the Democracy Wall Movement's Today magazine, was arrested with others for taking part in events commemorating the June 1989 Tiananmen massacre. He was sentenced to three years' re-education through labour plus seven months for 'refusing to reform'. In December 1996, his sentence was upheld on appeal. A second appeal in January 1997 led to an additional 216 days' detention for 'refusing to reform'. He has reportedly been held in isolation and subject to torture.

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 (1998) 26, PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June (1998) 25.]

In 1997, Wang Dan [see NCH #4, #5, #6] was in poor health. On 19 April 1998, he was released on medical parole and expelled to the USA, reportedly as part of a deal between China and the USA.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 172; AAAS Human Rights Network, Case CH9621.Dan, 22 April 1998.]

In 1997, the re-education campaign for Tibetan monks and nuns continued [see NCH #6]. They were supposed to accept, inter alia, that Tibet had been part of China for centuries.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 177.]

In June 1997, on the eight anniversary of the Tiananmen massacre, dissident Shen Liangqing, a former state prosecutor and political prisoner, sent a petition to the National People's Congress demanding, inter alia, an official reassessment of the 1989 events (officially, a 'counter-revolutionary rebellion'). Two months later, he was ordered to evacuate his private residence and surrender it to the local authorities. The following month, he was taken into police detention after he signed a letter expressing solidarity with demonstrating workers. He was held incommunicado. In September 1997, Lin Mu issued a public appeal to senior delegates to the Fifteenth Chinese Communist Party (CCP) Congress, urging them, inter alia, to reverse the official verdict on the 1989 events.

In the same month, a letter, supposedly written by ousted politician Zhao Ziyang, was sent to the fifteenth Communist Party Congress in September 1997, demanding that the official verdict of the 1989 Tiananmen Massacre be rewritten. The Foreign Ministry denied that remarks made in mid-November 1997 by President Jiang Zemin at Harvard University were a 'rewriting' of the official verdict.

[Sources: IOC 6/97: 106, 1/98: 83; HRW, World Report 1998 (Washington 1997) 172-73.]

In June 1997, Yu Zhenbin (born [1962]) was released. A staff member of the Qinghai Provincial Archives Bureau, he had been detained in Xining, the capital of Qinghai Province on 27 June 1989. In January 1991 he was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment. He was convicted of setting up the Democratic Opposition Parties' Alliance, an organisation that the authorities claimed to be 'counter-revolutionary' and aimed at overthrowing the CCP. He was also accused of having made 'reactionary speeches' and of having distributed leaflets in which current policies and leaders were criticised and political reforms called for. He was released after his twelve-year sentence was reduced by four years.

[Sources: AI, People's Republic of China: Preliminary Findings on Killings of Unarmed Civilians, Arbitrary Arrests and Summary Executions Since 3 June 1989 (ASA 17/60/89, 1989); AAAS, Directory of Persecuted Scientists, Engineers, and Health Professionals (1992) 15 and (1994) 39; AI, Report 1998 (1998) 131.]

In August 1997, Hong Kong textbook publishers revised modern history texts for primary and secondary schools, removing references to the Tibet conflict, the 1957 Anti-Rightist campaign, the Cultural Revolution (1966-69), 1976 dissident protests and the 1989 Tiananmen massacre and its aftermath.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 433.]

Plans by the Kunqu Opera company to perform the Peony Pavilion, a 20-hour opera based on a 400-year-old Chinese love story, in New York, Paris, Caen, Sydney and Hong Kong, failed after censors in Shanghai called the opera 'feudal, superstitious and pornographic', impounded the sets and refused to let the cast leave the country.

[Source: IOC 4/98: 11.]

COLOMBIA

On 18 April 1998, lawyer and legal professor José Eduardo Mendoza was killed at home by two unidentified persons. The assassination is thought to be linked to his attempts to reopen the inquiry into the 1948 murder of liberal presidential candidate Jorge Eliécer Gaetan.

[Sources: IOC 3/98: 88, 4/98: 109-10.]

CONGO

In early April 1998, forensic experts looking for mass graves left by the rebels led by Laurent-Désiré Kabila in 1996-97, were forced to leave the northwestern town of Mbandaka after facing hostilities from the local population for allegedly 'disturbing traditional burial sites'.

[Source: IOC 3/98: 106.]

CROATIA

The September 1996 acquittal of Feral Tribune journalists Victor Ivancic and Marinko Culic [see NCH #5] was annulled by the Supreme Court on 5 May 1997. A retrial on the same charges, adjourned in December 1997, was resumed on 18 May 1998.

[Sources: IOC 6/96: 172, 4/97: 110, 1/98: 86, 2/98: 87; A19, Bulletin, October-November 1996: 3; HRW, World Report 1997 (1996) 212; AI, Report 1997 (1997) 131, Report 1998 (1998) 146; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 ([1998]) 45, PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June (1998) 42.]

After protests from their parents in November 1997, ethnic Serbian students in eastern Slavonia were not required to study Croatian history from 1990 onwards.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 86.]

CUBA

On 7 April 1997, Cuban authorities briefly detained Fidel Emilio Abel Tamayo, the father of one of several school children who had refused to sign the Declaración de los Mambises del Siglo XX (Declaration of the Mambises of the Twentieth Century) in March. The declaration, named after the mambises who fought for Cuban independence, was meant to support the Ley de Reafirmación de la Dignidad y Soberanía Cubanas (Law Reaffirming Cuban Dignity and Sovereignty), which created broad restrictions on free expression and was a response to the Helms-Burton law (which tightened the U.S. embargo of Cuba).

[Source: IOC 1/98: 110.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

On 23 January 1998, a Prague court acquitted ultra-nationalist leader Miroslav Sladek of incitement to racial hatred. During a demonstration against the signing of the reconciliation agreement with Germany in early 1997, he said: 'We can only be sorry that during World War II we slaughtered so few Germans.' The court ruled that his remarks should 'be judged in the context of his entire speech'. He was immediately released from prison, where he had been detained for over two weeks.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 88.]

EGYPT

On 7 January 1992, the Committee of the Koran and its Sciences, an organ of the Al-Azhar University Islamic Research Academy confiscated five books of Mohammed Said al-Ashmawi, author, retired judge and former head of the Supreme State Security Court, at the Cairo Book Fair. All books were published by the Sinai publishing house. The author subsequently threatened with issuing a writ against Al-Azhar and suing its sheikh for damages. In March 1992, the Committee severely criticised him for distorting Islamic history. There was considerable concern for his safety. He wrote widely and critically on the rise of militant political Islam. In 1997, he was reported living under 24-hour protection.

[Sources: IOC 3/92: 35, 6/92: 27, 1-2/94: 119-121, 124, 129, 237, 255, 5/96: 88; WUS & Human Rights, June 1992: 5; A19, Bulletin, December 1997: 8.]

On 14 January 1998, the artistic production police raided the Sinai publishing house and confiscated fifteen copies of two books by Khalil Abdel Karim, The Yathrib Society (Yatrib being the pre-Islamic name for Medina) and The Rabaa Songs on the Companions of Prophet Mohammed, apparently in relation to a ruling from Al-Azhar Islamic Research Academy saying they were blasphemous.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 89.]

ETHIOPIA

In October 1997, two writers were arrested, allegedly for their involvement as journalists for the Oromo newspaper Urji and their activism as members of the Ethiopian Human Rights League. During the first ten months of their detention, they were held in solitary confinement and denied any visits from their family. They are held without charge or trial. Moti Biyya (pen name) (born [1957]) is a journalist and social anthropologist interested in the Oromo identity and through his books he provides Oromo society with historical background and coherence. In 1995, he published Oromyan Befereqa (Oromia, the Hidden Atrocities), a political analysis of the colonisation of the Oromo people by successive Abyssinian groups. In 1997, he published Abyssinocracy or Democracy?, in which he compared the situation of the Oromo minority under the socialist government of Menghistu and the current government. Garuma Bekele (born [1960]) is a journalist who published, inter alia, a historical novel, One Day, on the Oromo experience of the 1950s and 1989.

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 (1998) 6; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June 1998 (1998) 7; Centre to Centre: Newsletter of PEN, October 1998: 4.]

FRANCE

On the eve of Rosh Hashana, the Jewish festivals of New Year and atonement, the Bishop of Saint-Denis, Olivier de Berranger, apologised at the site of a former deportation camp for the Church's complicity in the wartime deaths of 73,000 French Jews.

[Source: IOC 6/97: 110.]

The author of the introduction and conclusion of Le Livre Noir du Communisme (The Black Book of Communism), historian Stéphane Courtois was forced to drop the original title for the work, Le Livre des Crimes Communistes (The Book of Communist Crimes), when two of the six contributing historians threatened to withdraw.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 88.]

In mid-December 1997, National Front leader Jean-Marie Le Pen repeated the statement he made ten years previously that the Nazi gas chambers were a 'mere detail' of history. The last time he made such a claim, he was fined under the anti-racist laws.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 89.]

GEORGIA

In [December] 1997, President Eduard Shevardnadze categorically opposed the opening of former KGB archives, arguing that it would give rise to ‘a new wave of resistance, mistrust and hatred’ and would ‘reopen old wounds’.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 90.]

GERMANY

Since 1995, specific legislation relating to the internet has been passed, outlawing, inter alia, Nazi propaganda and Holocaust denial.

[Source: IOC 4/98: 113.]

On 31 May 1998, Welt am Sonntag published classified German government papers, intended to be kept secret until 2019, relating to the reunification of West and East Germany. They revealed that the then Prime Minister of Great Britain Margaret Thatcher was opposed to an immediate reintegration of East Germany.

[Source: IOC 4/98: 113.]

In late July 1998, the Bundesbank and state archive in Koblenz issued a report stating that documents detailing the property stolen from Holocaust victims had been ‘misplaced’. Jewish activists, who did not accept the official explanation that the loss of the files was purely accidental, demanded an official investigation.

[Source: IOC 5/98: 86-87.]

GUATEMALA

See United States.

Those involved in the exhumations of mass burial sites, of which there were an estimated 500 throughout the country, continued to be intimidated, threatened and harassed, apparently by those seeking to prevent naming those responsible for the massacres, such as former military commissioners and local civil patrol members. [see NCH #5 and #6].

[Source: AI, Report 1998 (1998) 181.]

In September 1997, the Historical Clarification Commission requested the US government to declassify records concerning human rights abuses committed during the armed conflict. US government archives most likely contain much information essential to the truth-seeking process underway in Guatemala. The release of US documents is also likely to expose important aspects of US policy that contributed to human rights violations in Guatemala.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 120.]

Two days after the publication of the voluminous episcopal report Guatemala: Nunca Más on 24 April 1998, bishop Juan Gerardi (born [1923]), who had presented it to the press, was murdered. The report, based on thousands of testimonies, identified the army as responsible for at least eighty per cent of the human rights violations counted in the 36-year civil war. It remained uncertain, however, whether the murder was politically inspired or not [see NCH #2].

[Sources: IOC 4/98: 113; HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 118; AI, Report 1998 (1998) 179.]

HONDURAS

See United States.

On 10 March 1998, the Committee of the Relatives of Detained and Disappeared (COFADEH) denounced a draft law which would halt investigations into disappearances during the last decade.

[Source: IOC 3/98: 109.]

INDIA

See Sri Lanka.

INDONESIA

On 13 April 1994, Wimanjaya K. Liotohe, a writer and Protestant teacher of religion, was interrogated by the police in connection with Prima Dosa (Prime Sin), a collection of documents for submission to the courts in the context of a lawsuit in which he accused President Suharto of being behind the move in 1965 to overthrow President Soekarno. The collection was banned in January 1994 and Wimanjaya K. Liotohe, under arrest for a while, faced up to seven years and four months in prison for insulting the President, but in the end he was released. In September 1997, he nominated himself for Vice-President for the 1998 elections, but he was arrested on charges of insulting the President.

[Sources: IOC 3/94: 176; AI, Power and Impunity: Human Rights Under the New Order (1994) 22; AI, Report 1998 (1998) 197.]

On 11 November 1997, Lynn Fredriksson, an American freelancer covering a ceremony commemorating the 1991 massacre of civilians by the military, was expelled from East Timor.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 90.]

IRAN

From about September 1995, militant students from the Ansar-e Hezbollah (Supporters of the Party of God) intimidated Abdolkarim Soroush (born 1945), philosopher and historian of philosophy and science, research fellow at the Institute for Research in Humanities and lecturer at Tehran University. They interrupted his lectures or prevented him from delivering them, including a May 1996 lecture in a seminar commemorating the martyrdom of Professor Motahhari at Amir Kabir College. The Intelligence Ministry repeatedly summoned and threatened him. He was attacked by the clergy and in the press. His passport was withdrawn. In an open letter of 9 May 1996 to President Rafsanjani, he denounced this situation and wrote that no-one dared offer teaching posts to him and that he was allocated only one course (the philosophy of social sciences) at Tehran University. In one of his articles, he argued that religious jurisprudence did not suffice for the organisation of society. Reputedly a moderate in the Shi'ite world, called by some the 'Luther of Islam', he is accused by militants of undermining religion under the guise of scientific discourse. In 1997, the Ministry of Information seized his passport, preventing him from attending academic seminars to which he was invited in Germany, Malaysia and the UK. He was banned from teaching and warned that he faced possible imprisonment if he continued to speak his mind.

[Sources: IOC 4/96: 104, 165-78; HRW, World Report 1997 (1996) 283, World Report 1998 (1997) 332, 436.]

In 1996, Karamollah Tavahodi (born [1927]), a Kurdish writer, historian, and retired director of the University Library of Mashhad, was arrested and held incommunicado until his trial. In January 1997, he was sentenced to one or two years' imprisonment for 'propagating non-Islamic ties', following official objections to the content of volume five of his Historical Movement of Kurds in Khorasan, a book based on research concerning Kurdish tribal migrations from Kurdistan to other regions of Iran over four hundred years ago. His files, the product of thirty years of research, were reportedly confiscated.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 330; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 (1998) 60; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June 1998 (1998) 56.]

On 30 October 1997, poetess Simin Behbani's speech about, inter alia, 'Ali Akbar Sa'idi-Sirjani, a liberal writer and historian who died in prison in 1994, was interrupted at the Grand Hall of Art in Teheran when the sound system was disconnected and lights switched off before she could finish.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 90.]

On 6 December 1997, Akbar Ganji, managing editor of the journal Rah-e Now (New Way), was arrested and in 1998 he was tried in camera. The charges against him were not known, but his trial was believed to relate to a research paper entitled Shariati and Fascism, presented to university students in Shiraz on 10 June 1997. An edited text of the paper was published in Teheran in November 1997 by the journal Kiyan under the title Satan Is the First Fascist. [On Ali Shariati, see NCH #5 and NCH #6].

[Source: IOC 2/98: 93.]

On 30 June 1998, Hojatoleslam Sayyid Mohsen Sa'idzadeh (born 1958), a cleric and writer, was arrested and taken to an unknown destination, presumably for advocating equal opportunities for women and for writing an article for the newspaper Jameah in which he constructed legal arguments for a progressive view of Islam. A judge in the revolutionary courts of Kermanshah until 1986, he became a scholar, of Islamic law and, in 1995, an adviser and researcher to the Ministry of Justice. He is the author of a two-volume local history of his home town Qa'en, and of a study of resurrection.

[Sources: IOC 5/98: 88; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June 1998 (1998) 56; Centre to Centre: Newsletter of PEN, October 1998: 1, 6.]

IRAQ

In June 1997, Iraqi forces set up roadblocks outside Karbala, turning back some Shi'a pilgrims making the annual walk to the tomb of Imam Husayn (who died there in AD 680). Some Shi'a opposition groups also reported clashes between pilgrims and security forces resulting in many arrests.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 334.]

ISRAEL

In March and April 1998, Ronit Weiss-Berkowitz received death threats from Jewish extremists for her contribution to a 22-part television series Tkuma (Rebirth) marking Israel's fiftieth anniversary and analysing Israel's history from 1936 to 1995. Her views on the fate of the Arab population in Israel after its foundation in 1948, the confiscation and administration of their territories, and the Palestinian refugee problem since 1948 challenged the traditional Israeli view of history.

[Sources: IOC 3/98: 76-77, 4/98: 115; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June 1998 (1998) 58.]

ITALY

In early July 1998, art experts criticised Artemisia: the Untold True Story of an Extraordinary Woman, a film about 17th-century Florentine painter Artemisia Gentileschi. The film depicts her as the willing lover of perspective teacher Agostino Tassi, whereas the historical view is that Gentileschi was raped by Tassi. During his trial, she underwent torture to validate her accusations.

[Source: IOC 5/98: 89.]

JAPAN

In 1993, Takashima Nobuyoshi (born [1942]), former teacher of social studies in Tokyo and writer of many textbooks, later professor at Ryuku University, sued the state because the Ministry of Education had thoroughly revised his four-page manuscript about Emperor Hirohito, the Japanese army, the Gulf War and Japanese colonialism (inter alia in Malaya), to be included in a reader. He had already faced problems concerning textbook certification in 1989 and 1992. On 22 April 1998, a district court ruled that two changes to a textbook demanded by the ministry were illegal. One passage quoted philosopher Yukichi Fukuzawa who described other Asian nations as 'savage', the other stated that Japan should have consulted other Asian countries before sending minesweepers to the Persian Gulf in 1991. The court ordered the ministry to pay damages to Takashima Nobuyoshi.

[Sources: IOC 3/98: 49, 4/98: 115.]

The government rejected the 1996 recommendation of the United Nations special rapporteur on violence against women that it provide individual compensation to 200,000 women forced into sexual slavery by the Japanese army during World War II; instead it established a voluntary fund. In early April 1998, it was announced that women who served as ‘comfort women’ during World War II will receive compensation from the government. Each of the 155 women registered for compensation will get 25,000 US dollars.

[Sources: AI, Human Rights are Women’s Right (1995) 53-56; HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) xxxii, 197; AI, Report 1998 (1998) 215, IOC 3/98: 113.]

On 29 August 1997, the Supreme Court ruled as illegal the deletion from history textbooks of references to Unit 731 (a camp where germ experiments were carried out on live prisoners in China during World War II) and to the 1937 Nanking Massacre. At the same time, it upheld the Ministry of Education’s constitutional right of textbook screening, saying that it did not constitute censorship, because it did not prohibit the book from being published commercially. The other claims against textbook screening brought by history professor Ienaga Saburô (born 1913) against the ministry were dismissed. The court declared that the ministry’s power had been abused in expunging cases of well-documented atrocities from textbooks.

[Sources: IOC 3/83: 35, 5/86: 6, 1/90: 38, 3/94: 177, 6/97: 114, 3/98: 48-52; A19, Information, Freedom and Censorship: World Report (1991) 181-82; HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 197.]

In September 1997, the government announced that it would not issue an apology or provide compensation to more than 16,000 mentally or physically disabled Japanese women who were forcibly sterilised under a government programme that began in 1948.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) xxxii, 197.]

In [December 1997], no cinema in Tokyo was willing to screen the film Don’t Cry Nanjing, a 1995 China-Hong Kong co-production depicting the December 1937 Nanking massacre. The first showing went ahead in Nagoya on 8 December to an audience of thirty.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 94.]

On 23 May 1998, a film about General Tojo Hideki (Prime Minister during World War II), entitled Pride: the Fateful Moment, was released. It prompted criticism from North Korea and China.

[Source: IOC 4/98: 116.]

LATVIA

On 10 March 1998, the prosecutor-general filed criminal charges against publicist Juris Rudevskis for a series of articles in the political weekly Nacionala Neatkariba (National Independence) in which he criticised Russia, citing numerous examples of massacres, court treachery and murder from Tsarist times to the Communist era and discussing the role of the Russian Orthodox Church in supporting 'state tyranny' through the ages. The charges - incitement of racial or ethnic hatred - carry a three-year sentence.

[Source: IOC 3/98: 180.]

On 16 March 1998, the SS Legion held a memorial day rally for its fifty-fifth anniversary. Russia's foreign ministry expressed indignation saying that the legion '(...) destroyed thousands of Jews, Russians and Belarusians.'

[Source: IOC 3/98: 114.]

MYANMAR (Burma)

In February 1998, Ko Aung Tun (b. 1967) was arrested and sentenced to a total of seventeen years' imprisonment under various acts, including the 1962 Printers and Publishers Registration Act. The State Peace and Development Council, Myanmar's military government, claimed that he was collaborating with 'terrorist groups'. Opposition sources stated, however, that the real reason for his arrest was because he had written a history of the student movement in Myanmar. Ko Aung Tun was active in the student-led 1988 pro-democracy movement and was imprisoned from 1990 to 1994. U Myo Htun assisted Aung Tun in writing the book, which the authorities claim was distributed 'illegally'. He was reportedly sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Both were held incommunicado in solitary confinement and tortured. Their health was precarious [see NCH #9].

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 163/98 (26 May 1998); Centre to Centre: Newsletter of PEN, July 1998: 6; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June 1998 (1998) 31-32.]

NICARAGUA

On 24 October 1997, students at the former Instituto Autónomo Rigoberto Lopez Perez, named after the Sandinista fighter who assassinated former President Somoza, went on strike after it was announced that the school was to be renamed after a poet. The episode followed a government decision to wipe out the last vestiges of Sandinismo by changing the national symbols. The most notorious action so far has been the replacement of Sandino's image on the banknotes by that of the 19th-century general José Santos Celaya.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 93.]

PAKISTAN

On 22 January 1998, Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif promised to punish those responsible for the ‘tragedy’ when East Pakistan broke away to become Bangladesh in 1971. He did not specify whom he blamed for the disintegration of the country.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 98.]

PALESTINE

On 24 April 1996, Wa’el ‘Ali Farraj, a history student (b. [1972]), was arrested by members of the Palestinian Authority’s General Intelligence. During the first few days of his detention, he was hooded, severely beaten and deprived of sleep and food. He was then interrogated for another month. He is detained without charge or trial. The Attorney General’s office informed a relative that it could not intervene on the grounds that the case was a political one. He was a suspected supporter of Islamist groups [see NCH #9].

[Source: AI, News, November 1998: 7.]

On 19 January 1998, intellectuals and officials marched through Gaza to condemn the prosecution of Roger Garaudy, a French writer accused of denying the Holocaust, in France. In his book The Founding Myths of Israeli Politics, Roger Garaudy maintained that the killing of Jews during World War II amounted to ‘pogroms’ or ‘massacres’ and not ‘genocide’ or ‘Holocaust’. The protesters denounced ‘Zionist cultural terrorism’ as the enemy of free expression.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 99.]

POLAND

On 13 November 1997, Prime Minister Aleksander Kwasniewski said that he wanted to make Communist-era secret service files public and that he had submitted a bill to parliament to that effect.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 96.]

ROMANIA

On 1 October 1997, the National Peasant Party Christian Democratic's Disciplinary Commission suspended Senator Ticu Dumitrescu's membership for one year after he repeatedly criticised the leadership's lethargy in drafting a law to open the Communist era secret police files. On 25 June 1998, the Senate approved such a law by 109 to 7 on the condition that it would not affect 'national security'. The law has yet to be approved by the Chamber of Deputies. It will establish a National Council for the Study of the Archives of the Former Securitate, but leaves files with the Intelligence Service and the ministries of defence and justice.

[Sources: IOC 6/97: 120, 5/98: 95.]

On 16 December 1997, the Senate approved amendments to the education law making the teaching of history and geography in the Romanian language compulsory. It also forbade separate universities in the language of minorities.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 100.]

RUSSIA

On 30 October 1997, the Voronezh Oblast Duma adopted a non-binding recommendation urging teachers not to use an allegedly 'anti-Russian' textbook on 20th-century European history. Deputies claimed that the book, written by professor Aleksandr Kreder of Saratov University, was 'unpatriotic and tendentious', belittling and distorting Russian history, although these claims were not supported by the federal education ministry.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 97.]

RWANDA

On 19 December 1997, Philomène Mukabarali (born [1942]), a director of a catering and tourism training college at Gikondo in the capital Kigali, who was threatened several times in 1997, was arrested and held first at Nyamirambo brigade, then at the Criminologie (a detention center of the Gendarmerie), and, on 8 January 1998, at Kigali Central Prison. She was reportedly charged with endangering state security for possessing leaflets, allegedly found in her home at the time of her arrest, which expressed support for the monarchy of Rwanda. Philomène Mukabarali was a member of Abatangana ('those who do not hate each other'), which organised cultural activities, including traditional songs and dances, with the objective of promoting reconciliation. Some of its activities referred to the pre-1959 history when Rwanda was ruled by a monarchy. This was reportedly viewed as a political threat by some elements in the current republican government. Philomène Mukabarali was released later [see NCH #7].

[Source: AI, Urgent Action 405/97 (22 December 1997; twice re-issued 6 and 14 January 1998).]

SINGAPORE

On 13 July 1998, the Film and Publicity Department announced a review of, inter alia, the long-banned film The Year of Living Dangerously, about the 1965-66 killings in Indonesia.

[Source: IOC 5/98: 97.]

SOUTH AFRICA

In September 1997, a former agent of the Civil Cooperation Bureau was remanded in custody to stand trial for the murder of David Webster [see NCH #5].

[Source: AI, Report 1998 (1998) 308].

SOUTH KOREA

On 30 January 1998, the trial of Suh Joo-sik, representative of human rights group Sarangbang, began. He was charged, inter alia, with violating the National Security Law for showing a documentary at the 1997 Human Rights Film Festival about a 1948 civil uprising on Cheju Island, which authorities claimed was subversive.

[Source: IOC 2/98: 101.]

On 13 March 1998, historian Park Chang-hee [see NCH #2] was released under a presidential amnesty.

[Sources: AI, Report 1998 (1998) 226; Centre to Centre: Newsletter of PEN, April 1998: 2; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June 1998 (1998) 38.]

The recently published book Eroticism in Korean Art History, by professor Lee Tae-ho, finds that, unlike contemporary attitudes towards sex, ancient Koreans had a candid attitude towards sex, which they expressed openly. Other compilations of art eroticism were usually censored.

[Source: 5/98: 98.]

SRI LANKA

BBC plans in 1997 to make a five-part television serial, Saleem's Story, based on Salman Rushdie's historical novel Midnight's Children, were unsuccessful, because Indian and Sri Lankan authorities did not allow shooting the film on their territory, after Muslims had protested against earlier permissions.

[Source: IOC 1/98: 100.]

SWEDEN

The government could face thousands of legal claims for compensation because of a secret programme of forced sterilisation of more than 60,000 women (1935-76), revealed in August 1997.

[Source: IOC 6/97: 125.]

TAIWAN

The anniversary of a massacre of mainly Taiwanese civilians by government troops in February 1948 was made a national holiday. A government proposal to 'pardon' the Taiwanese leaders of the protests which led to the massacre was opposed by survivors on the grounds that the protesters had committed no offence and therefore needed no pardon.

[Source: AI, Report 1998 (1998) 325.]

TURKEY

In December 1991, Dersim: Folk Song of an Insurrection, a book by poet Hüseyin Karatas, was confiscated. On 1 April 1993, the author was sentenced to 20-months' imprisonment and a fine for 'disseminating separatist propaganda'. He was, however, not imprisoned as he was appealing to the European Human Rights Court. His sentence was reduced to sixteen and later to thirteen months' imprisonment, which he began on 18 March 1998. The book refers to a Kurdish revolt which took place in the Dersim (renamed Tunceli) area in 1930-38.

[Sources: PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 (1998) 53; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To

30th June 1998 (1998) 49.]

In April 1994, journalist Ragip Duran (born [1954]) wrote an article for the journal Ozgur Gundem entitled 'Apo 91/Ocalan 94', in which he analysed two interviews he had conducted with PKK (Workers' Party of Kurdistan) leader Abdullah Ocalan, also known as Apo. In the article he made a casual comparison between Abdullah Ocalan and the Italian hero of independence Giuseppe Garibaldi. On the basis of this comparison, he was accused of separatist propaganda and sentenced to ten months in prison. In October 1997, the Supreme Court confirmed the sentence, which he began on 16 June 1998.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 454; Centre to Centre: Newsletter of PEN, July 1998: 1; A19, Bulletin, September 1998: 4.]

In February 1997, the second Turkish-language edition of Leo Muller's book Gladio: Das Erbe des Kalten Krieges (Gladio: The Legacy of the Cold War) was confiscated and both the publisher and the translator were tried, inter alia for 'inciting racial hatred'. In September 1997 they were given a suspended sentence and a fine. Both sentences are under appeal.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 286.]

On 17 February 1997, the centre-left daily Radikal was seized because it reprinted an article from the French weekly Figaro Magazine, entitled 'Turkey: Army Against the Islamists' and written by Islamist intellectual Abdurrahman Dilipak. The article described Kemal Ataturk, Turkey's first president, as an 'authoritarian military ruler'.

[Source: IOC 2/97: 100.]

The University of California at Los Angeles refused to allow the Turkish government to fund a chair in Ottoman studies because the Turkish government attached conditions to their offer of one million US dollars that would have forced scholars to ignore the 1915 massacre of Armenians.

[Source IOC 2/98: 104.]

UNITED KINGDOM

New revelations regarding the conduct of British paratroopers and soldiers who opened fire on unarmed civilians killing thirteen people on Bloody Sunday (30 January 1972), and the tampering with evidence submitted to the 1972 Widgery Tribunal - tasked with investigating the events of that day - led to calls for a fair and transparent public inquiry.

[Sources: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 291, 293; AI, Report 1998 (1998) 347, 349.]

On 26 August 1997, former journalist and staff member of the domestic Security Service MI5, David Shayler, alleged that the MI5 had kept thousands of secret files on individuals. An injunction was placed on the Mail on Sunday, preventing it from publishing any further allegations. On 4 September 1997, the injunction was extended. On 29 July 1998, Home Secretary Jack Straw revealed that MI5 had amassed files on nearly 500,000 people since its inception in 1909. The files would not be made available to the public.

[Sources: IOC 6/97: 127, 5/98: 103.]

In 1998, Greater Manchester's obscene publications squad confiscated 535 video tapes from David Flint, the publisher of a magazine called Sexadelic commissioned by Creation Press to write a history of pornographic film.

[Source: IOC 3/98: 127.]

On 8 June 1998, the third edition of Lord Elgin and the Marbles, a book about Lord Elgin who removed the Parthenon sculptures from the Acropolis of Athens at the end of the eighteenth century was published. Its author, William St Clair, He claimed that, in the late 1930s, the Marbles were irreparably damaged when scrubbed with metal scrapers. The British Museum denied suppressing the facts surrounding this incident, but, in 1994, William St Clair was denied access to its records.

[Source: IOC 4/98: 132.]

UNITED STATES

See Turkey.

In May 1997, the Clinton administration declassified 1,400 pages of Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) documents about its involvement in a coup that overthrew the elected government of Guatemalan President Jacobo Arbenz in 1954 [see NCH #6]. The documents revealed the CIA's encouragement of political assassination and murder. In August 1997, the CIA released documents confirming that in the 1980s it had known about the interrogation and torture of civilians by a military death squad in Honduras.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) xxxii, 90, 120-21.]

On 17 March 1998, the Mississippi Department of Archives and History opened some 124,000 documents from the files of its now defunct Sovereignty Commission, responsible from 1956 to 1977 for spying and plotting against civil rights activists thought to be supportive of desegregation. This ended a 21-year legal battle between Mississippi and the American Civil Liberties Union.

[Source: IOC 3/98: 127-28.]

VATICAN

In mid-March 1998, the Vatican issued a statement expressing 'deep sorrow' at the involvement of some Roman Catholics in the Holocaust. Jewish leaders and Holocaust historians criticised the statement on the grounds that it did not implicate the Church itself in Nazi extermination programmes.

[Source: IOC 3/98: 128.]

VIETNAM

On 4 January 1995, Dang Phuc Tue (religious name: Thich Quang Do) (born 1927), a Buddhist scholar and poet, author of several novels and studies of Buddhist history, lecturer at the Buddhist university of Van Hanh, Saigon until April 1975, General Secretary of the Unified Buddhist Church of Vietnam (UBCV), was arrested and sentenced to five years' imprisonment on the charge of 'undermining national security' for writing a letter in November 1994 protesting the arrests of UBCV monks who had distributed relief to flood victims without government approval. He was in very poor health. He benefited from an amnesty on 2 September 1998. He had been arrested several times before. In 1982, he had been placed under surveillance, in virtual isolation and confined to his home village because his presence in Ho Chi Minh City was deemed 'dangerous for the well-being of the people'.

[Sources: AI, Report 1985 (1985) 252, Report 1986 (1986) 267, Report 1987 (1987) 276, Report 1988 (1988) 189, Report 1989 (1989) 206; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist June to December 1997 (1998) 41; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June (1998) 38-39; Centre to Centre: Newsletter of PEN, October 1998: 6.]

In December 1997, writer Pham Van Viem was kidnapped by the Vietnamese secret police in Bulgaria and returned to Hanoi after he had translated a book entitled Fascism, written by Zhelyu Zhelev before he became the first President of post-Communist Bulgaria. Pham Van Viem has not been seen nor heard from since.

[Sources: PEN, IFEX Action Alert (27 May 1998) 2, PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist To 30th June (1998) 40-41.]

ZIMBABWE

In January 1996, the film Flame, a fictional account of the struggle of two women against white minority rules in Rhodesia, by script writer and film director Ingrid Sinclair, was almost banned before its completion because of a short scene in which one of the women is raped by her commander in the freedom fighters camps in Zambia and Mozambique. The film was based on seven years of research with women ex-fighters.

[Source: HRW, World Report 1998 (1997) 410.]

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; World University Service [WUS, Amsterdam]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

GENERAL

Among the 45 recipients of the 1997 HRW Hellman/Hammett grants (a program for writers who have been victims of political persecution and are in financial need) were the following:

- China: Su Xiaokang, living in exile in the United States, author of works on the history of the Great Leap Forward (1958-60) and co-author of Heshang (River Elegy), a controversial but very popular 1988 television documentary series in which the Chinese cultural traditions were criticised; former history student Wang Dan, imprisoned (see NCH #5); Zhang Xianliang, veteran human rights campaigner living in exile in the United States, after having served a sentence for attempting to organise a commemoration of the June 1989 events in June 1993.

- South Africa: Gertrude Fester, poet and short story writer, who spent two years in prison for African National Congress (ANC) activities under the apartheid regime and who was writing a history of the South African women's movement within the ANC.

- Turkey: Aysenur Zarakolu (see NCH #5); Ahmet Altan, a journalist dismissed in April 1995, charged with 'inciting racial hatred' and given a twenty-month suspended sentence, because he had written a satirical article suggesting that the Turkish war of independence that followed the First World War had been led by Kurds rather than Turks.

- Vietnam: Nguyen Dinh Huy, a high school history teacher, journalist, and editor, sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment for his involvement in the Movement to Unite the People and Build Democracy, a non-violent political group which advocated political change and attempted to organise a conference on economic development and democracy in November [1994].

[Source: HRW, Ifex Alert: 45 Writers from 16 Countries Receive Hellman/Hammett Grants (7 July 1997)].

ARGENTINA

In July 1996, eleven young people were arrested in Buenos Aires and allegedly beaten in a police station. Some were held incommunicado for 17 hours and interrogated about their attendance at a public meeting organised by Hijos por la Identidad y la Justicia contra el Olvido y el Silencio (Children for Identity and Justice Against Oblivion and Silence), a group formed by children of the 'disappeared'.

[AI Report 1997 (London 1997) 75.]

AUSTRALIA

In a speech on 23 September 1996, the prime minister, John Howard, said that his government would lift 'the pall of censorship' created by the previous government's adherence to 'political correctness'. Shortly after this speech the British revisionist historian David Irving (see NCH #5 under USA) announced that he would apply for a visa to enter the country. David Irving has been denied entry since 1992, because of his denial of the Holocaust. On 8 November 1996, Federal Government decided to deny entry to him, as he failed to meet the good character requirement under the Immigration Act.

[Source: IOC 6/96: 167, 1/97: 104.]

At the end of October 1996, Federal Parliament decided to ban photographs of the 1991 Dili massacre in East Timor from an exhibition about the island to be held at Parliament House because they were 'offensive'.

[Source: IOC 1/97: 103.]

AZERBAIJAN

On 18 February 1995, a historian, Movsum Aliyev, was released (see NCH #2).

[Source: AI Country Report, Azerbaijan: Allegations of Ill-Treatment in Detention (document EUR 55/01/96; London 1996: 4).]

BELARUS

In early 1996, the printing of the third volume of the official Encyclopedia of Belarussian History was brought to a halt, reportedly to be purged of all material which represented a 'negative' attitude to the USSR and Tsarist rule. Belarussian historians were considering a boycott of all future volumes of the Encyclopedia.

[Source: IOC 3/96: 102.]

During a march on 26 April 1996 commemorating the tenth anniversary of the Chernobyl disaster, more than 200 of the close to 50,000 marchers were arrested and, after summary trials usually held inside their prison cells, given administrative sentences of three to fifteen days. Many demonstrators and passers-by were beaten, and two members of the opposition Belarussian Popular Front, which had sponsored the march, were arrested and charged with organising a mass disturbance.

[Sources: IOC 4/96: 93; HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 202.]

On 7 May 1997, President Lukashenka reportedly criticised the institutes of history and economics for destabilising the country.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 105.]

In 1997, Belarus's official independence day was moved from 27 to 3 July by President Lukashenka to coincide with the Soviet expulsion of the Germans during World War II. Demonstrators celebrating independence on 27 July were detained.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 165.]

BULGARIA

On 30 July 1997, Parliament approved a bill permitting secret police files to be opened. The new law meant the exposure to public scrutiny of all those who may once have collaborated with the Communist intelligence services. On 8 August 1997, opposition parties appealed to the Constitutional Court to block the law, saying it would jeopardise the normal functioning of the state.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 166.]

CHINA/TIBET/HONG KONG

See GENERAL: Su Xiaokang, Wang Dan, Zhang Xianliang.

On 25 October 1996, Ngawang Tharchin, a monk, was administratively sentenced to three years' 're-education through labour', because he had interrupted a lecture by a well-known Tibetan historian (name unknown) during a re-education campaign at the Drepung monastery, near Lhasa, and contradicted the claim that Tibet had been an integral part of China since the thirteenth century.

[Sources: IOC 5/96: 104-105, 1/97: 69, 124; HRW, Ifex Action Alert, 15 January 1997: 3; AI Report 1997 (London 1997) 119.]

It was reported that Wild Swans: Three Daughters of China (New York 1991), a bestselling memoir written against the background of Chinese history (1909-1978) by Jung Chang (b. 1952), is currently banned.

[Source: IOC 1/97: 76.]

Under the new regulations governing control of society and media in Hong Kong, revealed by China in October 1996, anti-China activities such as the annual Tiananmen massacre demonstrations were prohibited, and institutions were forbidden to organise events advocating 'two Chinas'. Restrictions imposed on the media included a ban on references to 'Taiwan's independence' or 'self-determination for Hong Kong'.

[Source: IOC 1/97: 114.]

On 10 March 1997, Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen suggested that Hong Kong schoolbooks that 'do not accord with history or reality' and 'contradict the spirit of "one country, two systems" and the Basic Law' should be revised after 1 July 1997.

[Source: IOC 3/97: 121.]

On 20 May 1997, Hong Kong's Urban Council rejected the request of the Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Democratic Movement in China to display a statue commemorating the 4 June 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre in a local park from June to September. In early June 1997, posters commemorating the massacre were banned from a Kowloon technical institute. On 14 June 1997, Tung

Chee-wa, Hong Kong's new chief executive, said that protest rallies similar to the annual 4 June demonstration would still be tolerated, but had to be more subdued.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 7, 114.]

On 11 July 1997, a guidebook on seventeenth-century Tibetan history was officially banned at the start of a new literature campaign.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 185.]

COLOMBIA

On 24 June 1997, files and archives of the Association of Relatives of the Detained and Disappeared in Medellín were destroyed in a bomb attack, just as key cases, in which members of the armed forces and paramilitary organisations were implicated, reached the courts.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 168.]

CROATIA

On 26 September 1996, Victor Ivancic, chief editor of the satirical weekly Feral Tribune, and commentator Marinko Culic (see NCH #5) were acquitted, but, on 10 October, the state prosecutor appealed against the acquittals.

[Source: IOC 6/96: 172.]

On 7 December 1996, the historian Ivo Banac (b. 1947), a former professor of history and Master of Pierson College at Yale University, a corresponding member of the Croatian Academy of Sciences and Arts, and a member of the human rights organisation Croatian Helsinki Committee, was reportedly labeled an 'internal enemy' by President and historian Franjo Tudjman. In the autumn of 1993 he wrote an open letter to Tudjman in the journal Erasmus, together with five other Croatian intellectuals, including the historian Krsto Cviic, an editor for the BBC World Service (1964-69), a journalist for The Economist (1969-90) and an editor of the periodical The World Today (1984-). In the letter, Tudjman was criticised for his policies and asked to resign.

[Source: HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 213.]

CUBA

In August 1996, the Cuban government refused to renew the visa of Robin Diane Meyers, the United States Interests Section human rights officer, complaining, inter alia, that she had distributed 'anti-government literature', including writings about José Martí. Martí, the independence leader, could reportedly not be criticised either in Cuba or among Miami exiles.

[Sources: HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 95; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, "Dangerous Writers": Freedom of Expression in Cuba (London 1997) 16.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

On 1 June 1997, new regulations came into force allowing Czech citizens to examine any files kept on them by the StB, the former secret police. Names of any third parties mentioned in the files will be deleted before the documents are released.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 110, 112.]

EGYPT

In the beginning of April 1996, thirteen members of the Muslim Brothers, including dr Gamal 'Abd al-Hadi, a lecturer in Islamic history at the University of al-Azhar, were arrested, tried by a military court in June and charged with membership of an illegal organisation (the Muslim Brothers) which 'aims to overthrow the regime'. Eight of them were sentenced to three years' imprisonment, but dr Gamal 'Abd al-Hadi was acquitted.

[Source: AI News Release (document MDE/12/96; London, 20 August 1996).]

In March 1993, Nasr Hamid Abu-Zeid (b. 1943), a professor of Arabic Literature at the University of Cairo, was denied a promotion to full professor after a member of the review committee, Abd el-Sabour Shahin, called his writings an insult to Islam. Despite protests of the department professors, this minority report was endorsed by the university. In a mosque on 2 April 1993, he publicly accused Abu-Zeid of apostasy. In May 1993, seven Islamist lawyers accused Abu-Zeid of apostasy under the Hisbah rule (Islamic personal status law allowing Muslims to file suits against those alleged to have violated religious law) because he had called for an historical interpretation and recontextualisation of the Koran in his writings, in particular in Naqd Al-Khitab Al-Diny (1992, 1996, Criticism of Islamic Discourse), a semantic study of Islamic texts (in which he also repeated a 1988 attack against Islamic investment companies on behalf of one of which Shahin had acted as a religious adviser before its collapse). On 27

January 1994, the Giza Family Court ruled the case inadmissible, but, on 14 June 1995, the Cairo Court of Appeals overturned the decision, declared Abu-Zeid an apostate, and ordered the divorce from his wife. On 5 August 1996, this was confirmed by the Court of Cassation. After the 1995 verdict, the militant Islamist group Al Jihad issued a death threat against Abu-Zeid, and, in September 1995, he and his wife subsequently went into exile in Spain, and then the Netherlands to teach at Leiden University. On 25 September 1996, the Giza Court of Urgent Cases suspended implementation of the divorce order (this was confirmed in December 1996).

[Sources: Letter from HRW Committee for International Academic Freedom to the President of Cairo University, 1 July 1993; Writers in Prison Committee, International PEN, Ifex Action Alert, 20 June 1995 and 6 August 1996; AI Report 1996 (London 1996) 143, 1997 (London 1997) 143; HRW, World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 267, 279, 353; IOC 7/93: 33, 36, 4/96: 30-39 (written by Nasr Hamid Abu-Zeid), 43, 157; 5/96: 88; Article 19 Bulletin, October/November 1996: 6.]

FRANCE

The 17 October 1996 issue of the Algerian daily Liberté was seized by the French police. No official reason was given, but the seizure was thought to be associated with an article, entitled ‘When the Seine Rolled With Corpses’, commemorating the 35th anniversary of a demonstration by Algerians in Paris, and indicating that there may have been as many as 200 deaths instead of the official three deaths and 64 injured.

[Source: IOC 1/97: 113.]

GERMANY

Simon Wiesenthal criticised plans to close the Central Agency, Ludwigsburg, Germany’s main institution for investigating crimes committed under the Nazi regime. Some of Germany’s states wanted the storage of hundreds of thousands of files and 1.5 million index cards moved to the federal archives as a cost-cutting measure. The Agency’s director, Willi Dressen, expressed concern that many of the files it held would fall apart, and endanger the task of reminding younger Germans about the Third Reich.

[Source: IOC 1/97: 113.]

On 17 August 1997, the Federal Constitutional Court upheld a ban on a rally commemorating the death of Rudolf Hess.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 170.]

GUATEMALA

In early September 1996, former military commissioners threatened with mass killings on 15 September, the day that a group of widows planned to commemorate the massacres of their husbands by the army and civil patrols in the Rabinal area in the early 1980s.

[Source: HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 102.]

In [October 1996], several students from the School of Anthropology and History Association were threatened and intimidated.

[Source: IOC 1/97: 113.]

In 1997, it was reported that government officials obstructed efforts to exhume the bodies of victims of human rights violations buried in mass graves. Those conducting exhumations were also subjected to death threats and intimidation. In no case had exhumations led to the trial of those responsible for authorising, planning or carrying out the killings.

[Source: AI Report 1997 (London 1997) 165; also see NCH #5.]

GUYANA

In June 1996, Gregory Smith, a former soldier in the Guyana Defence Force living in French Guiana was charged with the 1980 murder of historian Walter Rodney.

On 15 October 1968 Walter Rodney (1942-1980), a Guyanese Marxist history lecturer at the University of the West Indies in Kingston since January 1968, was refused re-entry in Jamaica, after having attended a Black Writers' Conference in Montreal, and was sent back to Canada. As a history lecturer he had organised many off-campus lectures for nonacademic audiences, including Rastafarians and the urban poor, in which he had discussed African history and the concept of Black Power. This was considered a security threat to the government, and after the vice-chancellor refused to terminate his contract, he was served with a banning order. In the wake of the ensuing student protests, serious rioting (known as The Rodney Riots) took place on 16 and 17 October 1968. The university was kept under a state of siege for over a week. In an emergency debate in the House of Representatives, broadcast live throughout Jamaica on radio and television, Prime Minister Hugh Shearer accused Rodney of Communist views. He returned to University College, Dar es Salaam (Tanzania), where he had already been teaching from July 1966 to January 1968, and worked there until 1974. In 1974, he returned to Guyana because he was offered a history professorship by the Senate of the University of Guyana. However, the appointment was withdrawn by the Board of Governors as a result of political intervention by the government of President Forbes Burnham. At the same time, he and his wife were blocked from all employment. It was assumed that he had been denied the right to work because of his reputation as an activist. In 1975, he became a founder and leader of the left-wing opposition party Working People's Alliance (WPA) in Guyana, with a revolutionary and multiracial programme. On 11 July 1979, several WPA leaders, including Rodney, were arrested by the security forces and charged with arson and possession of arms. The day before an anti-government demonstration had taken place and, during the night, an explosion and fire had destroyed several government buildings and the headquarters of the ruling party. The trial was adjourned three times for lack of evidence and Rodney was released on bail. In April 1980, the authorities tried to prevent his presence at the Zimbabwe independence celebrations. On 13 June 1980 he was killed by a bomb concealed in a walkie-talkie in his brother's car in Georgetown. His brother Donald survived but was implicated in his death by the government. It was generally believed that the government itself was involved in the death. On 7 January 1981, the government terminated the state press agency's contract with a Barbados-based firm because its reporting of Rodney's death was deemed unsatisfactory. In the same year his book, A History of the Guyanese Working People 1881-1905, published posthumously, was banned. Four academics faced disciplinary charges as a result of remarks in their reports for the 1979-80 academic year in which they referred to Rodney's death. In October 1987, an inquest into his death was ordered by the government. In February 1988, the final verdict of the inquest was 'death by accident or misadventure'.

[Sources: 'Guyana: Suspicious Death of Leading Opposition Intellectual', IOC Briefing Paper, 26 June 1980; IOC 6/79: 66, 5/80: 32, 3/81: 75, 4/81: 46, 6/81: 26-30, 6/85: 52-54, 5/88: 127; AI Report 1980: 145, 1981: 156, 1982: 144, 1988: 117, 1989: 128, 1997: 169.

HAITI

In October 1994, the US Government transferred 160,000 documents seized from Haitian army headquarters and from the offices of the paramilitary organisation Front Pour l'Avancement et le Progrès d'Haiti (FRAPH) to its embassy, reportedly after having removed the names of US nationals. They were believed to contain information relating to human rights violations committed by both the military and FRAPH under the military government, including the possible collusion of the US government in such activities. The US authorities agreed to hand over the documents to the Haitian Government on condition that the safety of any Haitian nationals mentioned in the documents was ensured. However, the Haitian Government refused to accept the documents unless they were returned in their original form.

[Source: AI Report 1997 (London 1997) 171-72.]

HONG KONG

See CHINA

HUNGARY

In early September 1996, Budapest's 137-year-old Great Synagogue, destroyed during World War II, was reopened.

[Source: IOC 6/96: 175.]

On 18 April 1997, the data protection commissioner said that documents relating to a Hungarian-Slovak dam dispute were not classified and that, therefore, the Foreign Ministry had acted illegally when it had denied access to the documents for thirty years.

[Source: IOC 3/97: 121.]

On 18 June 1997, the Municipal Court of Budapest banned Mein Kampf under the provisions of the press law. In November 1996, the prosecutor-general's office had suspended publication of the book and advised the courts to ban it.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 171.]

On 13 August 1997, it was announced that state security files would be opened from 1 September 1997 to researchers and Hungarian citizens who believed that they were under surveillance by the state during the Communist era. It was estimated that the security services had files on 160,000 people.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 171.]

INDIA

On 15 August 1997, Independence Day, the film Train to Pakistan, by Pamela Rook, was denied broadcasting permission, shortly before its scheduled showing. The story, based on a novel by Khushwant Singh, concerns communal tension in a Punjabi village during India's 1947 partition. The Central Board of Film Certification asked the director to remove the word 'Muslim' (recurring throughout the screenplay) and all indirect references to Mahatma Gandhi.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 171.]

IRAN

In 1995, at least ten followers of the sociologist and historian 'Alî Sharî'atî (1933-1977), once called 'the Ideologue of the Iranian Revolution', were still serving long prison terms after unfair trials [see NCH #5].

[Source: AI Report 1997 (London 1997) 185.]

JAPAN

In a 31 January 1997 article, the newspaper Yomiuri-Shinbun accused the Kanagawa Human Rights Centre of 'oppressing freedom of speech', because it had criticised local politicians' distorted statements on Korean comfort women and the Japanese colonisation of Korea, and it had protested against the invitation of one of them to address a local business community meeting.

[Source: IOC 2/97: 9.]

In early May 1997, it was reported that an elementary school history textbook was banned in the Miyagi prefecture, because of its presentation of the 1937 Nanking massacre and the Sino-Japanese war.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 116.]

KAZAKSTAN

Karasaev Khusein, who writes about the epic storytellers of Kazakstan, was imprisoned as a member of the Social Turan Party, a party which was reported not to exist.

[Source: HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 365.]

MEXICO

On 2 May 1996, Javier Elorriaga Berdegué, a historian and journalist who made video reports of the 1994 rebellion of the Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional (EZLN), was sentenced to thirteen years' imprisonment on the charge of terrorist activities because of his alleged EZLN membership. He was held in the Cerro Hueco prison in Tuxtla Gutierrez. The trial was widely believed to be unfair. On 6 June 1996, he was acquitted on appeal.

[Source: HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 111.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

On 27 January 1996, six members of the opposition political party National League for Democracy were arrested for having written a poem to commemorate the 1991 death in detention of their colleague U Tin Maung Win.

[Source: HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 138.]

NEW ZEALAND

In late February 1997, Salo - 120 Days of Sodom, a film by Pier Paolo Pasolini about the wartime Fascist Republic of Salo in North Italy, and banned for more than twenty years, was seized at the Wellington customs.

[Source: IOC 3/97: 127-28.]

POLAND

In the spring of 1997, US publishers Doubleday claimed that the Polish version of a papal biography, His Holiness, by journalists Carl Bernstein and Marco Politi, was doctored by its Polish partners, Amber Publishing, to avoid giving offence to Roman Catholics in Poland as well as to the (Polish) Pope. Controversial references to Polish history, particularly passages referring to the Auschwitz concentration camp, were reportedly removed.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 11.]

RUSSIAN FEDERATION

On 19 September 1996, the commission responsible for declassifying documents of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union permitted the release of information about, inter alia, the origin of the Strategic Missile Troops, political censorship in the USSR, and the history of the Communist International.

[Source: IOC 6/96: 184.]

In early December 1996, it was announced that the Academy of Sciences and the Centre for Gender Studies were seeking damages for the publication in the Moscow edition of Playboy of provocative portraits of famous women from Russian history, such as Catherine the Great, 17th-century religious dissident Feodosiva Morozova and 19th-century mathematician Sofia Korvalevskaya.

[Source: IOC 2/97: 95.]

SLOVAKIA

On 2 July 1997, the government announced that it would withdraw a controversial history textbook, The History of Slovakia and the Slovaks, by Catholic priest Milan Durica, following an outcry from, inter alia, Slovak historians, that it denied the persecution of Slovak Jews during World War II (less than 10,000 of 70,000 Jews survived). The textbook was written and published with funding from the European Union (EU), but its treatment of the wartime Fascist Slovak state persuaded EU external relations commissioner Hans van den Broek to press the government to ban it. Prime Minister Vladimir Meciar conceded that parts of the book were historically inaccurate, but initially he refused to ban it from the bookstores. Deputies from the ultra-right Slovak National Party, a partner in the governing coalition, condemned the EU's 'censorship order'.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 181.]

SOUTH AFRICA

See GENERAL: Gertrude Fester.

SPAIN

On 14 February 1996, Francisco Tomás y Valiente ([1933]-1996), former judge and president of the Constitutional Court (1986-92) and professor of legal history at the Universidad Autónoma de Madrid (1992-96), was murdered by an alleged member of the Basque separatist movement ETA.

[Source: AI Report 1997 (London 1997) 290.]

In late March 1997, the Supreme Court ruled that secret military intelligence documents detailing the operation of covert government actions against the Basque separatist movement ETA (1983-87), when 28 suspected militants died, should be declassified.

[Source: IOC 3/97: 132.]

SWITZERLAND

In December 1996, amidst a large-scale controversy on dormant accounts of Holocaust victims, Christoph Meili, a night watchman of the Union Bank of Switzerland (UBS), discovered in its shredder room documents related to property sold by Jews in Germany under the Nazis. In April 1997, he went into exile with his wife and children in the United States, because he said he felt their lives were in danger. They were given permanent resident status there.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 126.]

On 23 July 1997, the Swiss Bankers Association released a list of dormant bank accounts dating back to World War II, in an attempt to trace the survivors of the Holocaust or their families. In response to an international outcry that banks had been blocking claims on these accounts, the Swiss government had lifted the secrecy laws, forcing the banks to allow their files to be searched.

[Source: IOC 5/97: 185.]

TURKEY

See GENERAL: Aysenur Zarakolu, Ahmet Altan.

On 22 August 1996, a trial against writer and Human Rights Association Deputy Secretary Erol Anar began. He was the author of Insan Haklar Tarihi (The History of Human Rights) and was charged with 'separatist propaganda' under the Anti-Terror Law for a four-page chapter in the book entitled Kurt Sorunu (The Kurdish Question), which discussed state relations with Turkey's Kurds in both the Ottoman and Republican periods.

[Source: HRW, Ifex Action Alert, 23 August 1996; HRW World Report 1997 (New York 1996) 244-245.]

On 17 February 1997, the centre-left daily Radikal was seized because it reprinted an article from the French weekly Figaro Magazine, entitled ‘Turkey: Army Against the Islamists’ and written by Islamist intellectual Abdurrahman Dilipak. The article described Kemal Ataturk, Turkey’s first president, as an ‘authoritarian military ruler’.

[Source: IOC 2/97: 100.]

UNITED STATES

In 1997, George C. Herring, a historian at the University of Kentucky and a former member of the official CIA Historical Review Panel (1990-96), accused the CIA of not releasing records on its covert operations (including the 1953 Iranian coup, the 1954 Guatemalan coup, the 1961 invasion of Cuba), despite the policy of openness promised in 1984. CIA officials replied to this accusation that various files on the operations in the 1950s had been destroyed in the early 1960s, among others nearly 100 percent of the files on the Iranian coup. At the same time, they released 1,400 pages of documents on the Guatemalan coup (less than one percent of the CIA files on the incident). In August 1996, George Herring and two other historians were removed from the panel, possibly because of their criticism of the low levels of declassification of CIA materials.

[Source: IOC 4/97: 15.]

VIETNAM

See GENERAL: Nguyen Dinh Huy.

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; World University Service [WUS, Amsterdam]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

ALBANIA

In September 1995 Elvira Shaplo, a historian, Vladimir Qiriaqi, an archeologist, and two others were briefly detained on charges of ‘distributing anti-constitutional writings’, an offence punishable by up to three years’ imprisonment. They were the authors of a guide book to Gjirokastër which apparently contained a photograph of former Communist ruler Enver Hoxha, a native of the town. In February 1996 they went on trial in Gjirokastër, but the trial was adjourned. The court was due to reconvene in March 1996. It appeared that the four defendants were not in detention.

[AI Report 1996: 70; AI, Further Information on Urgent Action 50/96, 11 March 1996; IOC 3/96: 98; see also NCH #3.]

In November 1995 police in Vlora and Durrës arrested and briefly detained some fifty people who tried to lay wreaths on the graves of partisans who died in the Second World War.

[AI Report 1996: 70.]

On 30 November 1995 parliament passed a law allowing selective access to the files of the Sigurimi, the secret police under the Communist regime. Under the so-called Verification Law a committee will examine the files of all those seeking public office, as well as those working in the state media and newspapers with a wide circulation. Those found to have collaborated with the Sigurimi will be barred from office until 2002. The files of all other citizens will be closed for thirty years. In January 1996 appeals against the Law were rejected as 'groundless' by the Constitutional Court.

[Source: IOC 1/96: 169, 2/96: 80.]

On 9 June 1996 historians Jorgo Balo, Pullemb Xhufi and Fatos Baxhaku were among a group of 27 Albanian writers, scientists, artists, journalists and editors who wrote an open letter about free speech and democracy in Albania after the elections of 26 May 1996.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 91.]

ALGERIA

On 13 January 1996 Khaled Aboukacem, archivist at L'Indépendant newspaper, was killed, and a colleague of his was wounded, in a gun attack as they left their offices.

[Source: IOC 2/96: 80.]

BELARUS

On 26 April 1996 a 50,000-strong memorial rally commemorating the tenth anniversary of the Chernobyl disaster was attacked by the police, who arrested over 200 people.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 93.]

BULGARIA

At least since 1990 organizations of ethnic Macedonians, such as Obedinena Makedonska Organizatsiya 'Ilinden' (OMO Ilinden; United Macedonian Organization 'Ilinden'), named after the Ilinden Uprising of 12 August 1903, were denied registration by the government because they were considered separatist organizations that threaten the security of Bulgaria. In April 1993, 1994 and 1995 police used force to prevent assemblies of OMO Ilinden at Rozhen Monastery. The annual gathering commemorating the death of Yane Sandanski, a prominent figure in the struggle against Ottoman rule, was deemed anti-Bulgarian. In July 1995 the members of OMO Ilinden were forbidden to meet at Samuil Castle to commemorate the foundation of the Republic of Macedonia. It was widely reported that a Bulgarian court upheld the ban stating that 'the territory of Bulgaria cannot be used as a place to celebrate events that have no relation to Bulgarian history'.

[Sources: HRW World Report 1990: 352, 1992: 499, 1993: 211, 1994: 208, 1995: 199, 1996: 208-209; IOC 3/94: 166-167; AI Report 1994: 82-83, 1995: 82, 1996: 102.]

CHINA

On 30 October 1996 Wang Dan (b. [1969]), a former history student from Beijing University and cited as number one on the list of the most wanted student leaders issued by the government on 13 June 1989, was sentenced to eleven years' imprisonment. On 6 July he 1989 was arrested when he made preparations to leave the country. He was charged with 'counter-revolutionary propaganda and incitement' and held in solitary confinement for four months. Then he was sent to Beijing Prison No. 2, a 'reform through labour camp' and reportedly held in a cell with five common criminals. He was tried on 23 January 1991. On 26 January 1991 he was sentenced to four years' imprisonment and one year's deprivation of political rights. According to official sources, 'he had shown repentance such as confessing his own crimes and exposing others'. On 17 February 1993 he was released on parole for good behaviour. He stated that he had no regrets. He peacefully resumed his activities to promote human rights, contributed articles on democracy and human rights to domestic and overseas Chinese media, as well as to international media, and raised funds to help people suffering repression. On 16 February 1994 his civil and political rights were officially restored, but he has been harrassed and arrested for short terms by the police ever since his release. He was denied permission to reregister at Beijing University and in January 1994 he began taking a correspondence course from the University of California. In March 1994 he was sent on 'vacation' outside Beijing to prevent 'disruption' during the visit of US Secretary of State Warren Christopher. After he received death threats from the police in December 1994, he filed a lawsuit against the Public Security Bureau to protest police harassment. In May 1995 he was detained again as a leading signatory of pro-democracy petitions. Crew members from the US television network National Broadcasting Company were questioned for several hours after interviewing him. After holding him in incommunicado detention for 17 months, the authorities indicted Wang Dan on 11 October 1996 for 'conspiring to subvert the government'. The three charges against him were 'accepting a scholarship from the University of California', 'publishing anti-government articles abroad', and 'joining other dissidents to set up a mutual aid plan.' Wang Dan's parents were given only one day to choose a lawyer. On 30 October 1996 he was sentenced to eleven years' imprisonment. In 1988-1989 Wang Dan had taken the lead in organizing seventeen unofficial open-air 'democracy salons' at Beijing University, at which participants were urged to discuss controversial political issues. In April 1989 the government attempted to close down the salons, and officials later cited them as evidence that Wang Dan had incited the student unrest. During the student uprising in the spring of 1989, he had been one of the top student leaders and chairman of the Autonomous Federation of Beijing University Students.

[Sources: IOC 1/91: 17, 2/91: 36, 3/91: 37, 4/93: 35, 5-6/93: 43, 1-2/94: 235, 3/94: 169, 6/95: 172, 4/96: 97; AAAS, Directory of Persecuted Scientists, Engineers, and Health Professionals 1992: 13, 1994: 36-37; AI Report 1991: 65, 1994: 99, 1996: 118; HRW World Report 1995: 143, 144; AAAS Human Rights Network, Case 9621.dan, 28 October 1996; see also NCH #4].

In early December 1995 historian Chen Xiaoya (b. [1955]) was dismissed from the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences (CASS) in connection with the publication of her manuscript, 'The History of the 1989 Democracy Movement' (in Chinese). The expulsion of Chen Xiaoya and some of her colleagues came after a secret conference in Xibobo, attended by CASS commissars, held to discuss the growth of rightism. Scholars who attempted to revive traditional Chinese culture, such as Cheng Ming, publisher of the neo-Confucianist journal The Original Way, have also been subject to official criticism.

[Source: IOC 2/96: 84.]

CROATIA

On 3 May 1996 Victor Ivancic, chief editor of the satirical weekly Feral Tribune, and reporter Marinko Culic were charged with 'rudely and falsely slandering' President (and historian) Franjo Tudjman, because they published an article criticising the plans to rebury the remains of Croatian fascists at the Jasenovac concentration camp where between 100,000 and 150,000 Serbs, Gypsies, Jews and Croat partisans were killed during World War II. Their trial began on 14 June 1996 but was adjourned until 25 September. If convicted they could face up to three years' imprisonment.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 22-24, 97.]

EGYPT

In early June 1996 police raided an Alexandria bookshop and confiscated copies of 'The Truth of the Veil', a book by Said al-Ashmawi, author, retired judge and former head of the State Security and Higher Criminal Courts. In March 1992, he was reported to be severely criticised for distorting Islamic history by the Committee of the Koran and its Sciences, an organ of the Islamic Research Academy of Al-Azhar, Egypt's Islamic university. There was considerable concern for his safety. He wrote widely and critically on the rise of militant political Islam. On 7 January 1992 the Committee confiscated five of his books at the Cairo Book Fair.

[Sources: IOC 1-2/94: 119-121, 124, 129, 237, 255, 5/96: 88; WUS & Human Rights, June 1992: 5.]

FRANCE

Among the books that the far-right mayor of Orange, Jacques Bompard, had refused to purchase for the new municipal library in July 1996 because they ‘offended good morals’, was a history of World War II.

[Source: IOC 5/96: 89.]

GUATEMALA

On 12 and 19 June and on 2 August 1996 Carlos Federico Reyes Lopez (b. [1970]), the coordinator of the Equipo de Antropología Forense de Guatemala (Guatemalan Forensic Anthropology Team, established 1992), and his family received death threats. In March 1996 Carlos Federico Reyes Lopez participated in the exhumation of one of the clandestine cemeteries in the country. Thousands of noncombatant civilians are believed to be buried in these cemeteries after they were massacred during counterinsurgency operations conducted by the armed forces in the late 1970s and early 1980s. The team of anthropologists, established in 1992, collected important and substantial evidence for use in future investigations into the massacres.

[Sources: AI, Urgent Action 173/96, 8 July 1996; AAAS Human Rights Network, Case GU9615.LOP, 10 July 1996 and 11 October 1996.]

HONG KONG

In mid-November 1995 a delegation of educationalists visited Beijing and learned of forthcoming revisions of history and geography textbooks. On 11 June 1996 the Hong Kong Educational Publication Association announced that school textbooks would be revised after 1997 to reflect the official Chinese view of history. More emphasis would be placed on Hong Kong’s past within China. References to the Opium War (1840-1842) were to be purged of ‘western bias’, Taiwan would no longer be a ‘country’ and there would be a ban on the expression ‘mainland China’, with its implication that there is more than one China. Details of the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre would be left to the discretion of individual editors, but fears were expressed by the Teachers’ Union Resource Centre that schools were already dropping the use of teaching materials on the massacre in anticipation of a possible ban.

[Source: IOC 1/96: 178, 4/96: 103.]

INDIA

In 1996 it was reported that the following books were banned: ‘Nine Hours to Rama,’ by Stanley Wolpert, a reconstruction of the plot to kill Gandhi in which the killer is reportedly sympathetically portrayed; ‘The History of Sexuality’, by historian Michel Foucault (1926-1984); ‘Reclaiming the Past? The Search for Political and Cultural Unity in Contemporary Jammu and Kashmir’, by Vernon Hewitt, a book on Kashmir critical of Pakistan and India. The second and the third book were held up at customs; Michel Foucault’s book had previously been freely available.

[Source: IOC 2/96: 90, 166, 168.]

INDONESIA

In May 1996 it was reported that the government had banned the book ‘Bayang Bayang PKI’ (In the Shadows of the PKI), published by the Institute for Studies on the Free Flow of Information (ISAI). The book focuses on the 1965-1966 events leading to the assumption of power by President Soeharto.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 103.]

IRAN

In 1995 at least ten followers of the sociologist and historian ‘Alî Shari’atî (1933-1977), once called ‘the Ideologue of the Iranian Revolution’, were still serving long prison terms after unfair trials.

[Sources: AI Report 1996: 179, IOC 4/96: 152.]

The threat of extrajudicial execution extended to many Iranian nationals abroad, as well as to non-Iranians such as Salman Ahmed Rushdie (b. 1947), a British writer who studied history at Cambridge University (1965-1968) and showed special interest in the history of early Islam and the history of independent India, and whose killing has been called for in a fatwa (religious edict) in 1989 for writing and publishing an allegedly blasphemous novel, ‘The Satanic Verses’ (1988).

[Sources: AI Report 1996: 180; IOC 4/96: 8.]

ISRAEL

In 1995 Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin rejected calls for an investigation into allegations that Israeli soldiers killed Egyptian prisoners during the 1956 and 1967 wars with its neighbours. Egypt demanded a full enquiry.

[Source: IOC 6/95: 177.]

JAPAN

In June 1995 the Diet (parliament) adopted a resolution in which 'deep remorse' was expressed to the victims of Japanese aggression during the Second World War. In August 1995 the Prime Minister made a public apology. The victims included up to 200,000 women, known as 'comfort women', mostly from Korea and several other countries in East and Southeast Asia, who had been forced into prostitution by the Japanese armed forces. The government was criticised for its decision to set up a private fund for the 'comfort women' instead of paying individual compensation to the victims.

[Source: AI Report 1996: 191.]

In mid-February 1996 New Zealand author James Mackay received a death threat from an anonymous man, in an apparent attempt to prevent publication of his forthcoming book on Japanese war crimes. In late 1995 the author reportedly refused bribes to scrap the book.

[Source: IOC 3/96: 111.]

In March 1996 curators of an exhibition at the Atomic Bomb Museum, Nagasaki, removed controversial photographs and texts from display. Items depicting the 1937 Rape of Nanking and the Bataan Death March were replaced by pictures of victorious Japanese soldiers and the 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor. The items, introduced at a late stage to give a balanced overview of the war, were removed after a formal protest from conservative members of the city council. In late June 1996 the Museum replaced a picture of the Nanking massacre by order of the mayor. The Prime Minister instructed the Foreign and Education Ministries to investigate whether photos of Japanese military aggression in museums around Japan were real or fabricated.

[Source: IOC 3/96: 111, 5/96: 94.]

MALAYSIA

On 19 October 1995 the Prime Minister ordered a review of the 20-year-old ban on television programmes featuring people in Chinese historical costumes after two such programmes had to be withdrawn that month.

[Source: IOC 6/95: 179.]

In early August 1996 the Terenggau Umno Youth Movement called upon the religious authorities to ban a book on Islamic history which, it claimed, promoted Shi'ism. The first edition of the book, 'Fitnah Terbesar Dalam Sejarah Islam', by the Egyptian poet and historian Taha Hussain (1889-1973), was published by a state-owned press in 1992 but sold out. Malay authorities are campaigning to curb the influence of Shi'ism.

[Source: IOC 5/96: 96-97.]

PALESTINE (AREAS UNDER THE JURISDICTION OF THE PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY)

On 24 or 25 December 1995 Maher al-Alami, a senior editor at the Arabic-language daily al-Quds was summoned for questioning in Jericho and detained for six days, apparently because he put a story on page eight and not on the front page. The story was about the Greek Orthodox Patriarch granting President Yasser Arafat, Chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization and head of the Palestinian Authority, symbolic custody of Christian holy sites in Jerusalem by likening him to the seventh-century Arab caliph Umar, who delivered Jerusalem to Islam. After a personal reprimand from President Arafat, he was released.

[Sources: IOC 2/96: 73, 98; AI Report 1996: 187.]

POLAND

On 15 October 1995 President Lech Walesa accused historian Adam Michnik, editor-in-chief of the daily 'Gazeta Wyborcza', of 'highly unethical manipulation' in publishing the 'unauthorised text' of an interview with him, which, President Walesa said, was 'too frank'.

[Source: IOC 1/96: 183.]

On 6 February 1996 Jerzy Urban (b. 1933), editor-in-chief of the satirical weekly 'Nie' ('No'), former government spokesman (1981-1989), former Minister of Information (1989), was fined and barred from managing a publication or working as a journalist for one year, after he was found guilty of publishing classified documents. He was also given a one-year suspended sentence. The charge arose from a 1992 article which contained extracts from the former Communist political police archives, revealing, among other things, an undertaking to co-operate with the secret police, signed in 1958 by Zdzislaw Najder, who later became director of the Polish section of Radio Free Europe and an adviser to premier Jan Olszewski (1991-1992).

[Source: IOC 2/96: 99-100, 152.]

ROMANIA

During 1995 local authorities in Transylvania attempted to remove all traces of Hungarian history and culture from several towns. The mayor of Cluj had sought to remove the statue of King Mathias in 1994, and in mid-April 1995, announced that he would place a Romanian and English-language inscription at King Mathias' birthplace, explaining that the greatest Hungarian king was a Romanian.

[Source: HRW World Report 1996: 226.]

RUSSIA

On 15 December 1995 Sergei Grigoryants, a historian and literary specialist, chairman of the organizing committee of the International Public Tribunal on Chechnya, was detained with two colleagues at Moscow airport as they were about to leave for the tribunal's hearings in Stockholm. Books, computer disks, videotapes and documents were confiscated. From 1975 to 1980 Sergei Grigoryants had been imprisoned. On 25 February 1983 he and Viktor Beskrovnykh were arrested in the Kaluga region, apparently in connection with the publication of a samizdat human rights bulletin, probably 'Bulletin V'. In early February 1987 he was released. Shortly afterwards, a group of former prisoners, led by Sergei Grigoryants, asked permission to publish an unofficial current affairs journal, 'Glasnost'. On 9 May 1988 he was detained at the headquarters of 'Glasnost', where the third session of the founding conference of a new political party, the Democratic Union, was due to take place. He was put under administrative arrest for seven days for allegedly 'resisting the police'. As the chief informant for the western press on the situation in Armenia and Karabakh, he came under attack in the official press because of his regular contact with Western correspondents. While he was in prison, the magazine's equipment was confiscated and its archives destroyed. On 28 November 1988 he and Andrei Shilkov, another editor of 'Glasnost', were detained in Yerevan, Armenia's capital, charged with taking photographs in contravention of emergency regulations, and sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment. On 26 February 1990 Sergei Grigoryants was refused permission to travel to Paris for a UNESCO conference on the press in Eastern Europe.

[Source: IOC 4/83: 43, 3/87: 40, 5/87: 41, 7/87: 40, 1/88: 6, 6/88: 41, 7/88: 40, 2/89: 41, 6/90: 43, 2/96: 99.]

SAUDI ARABIA

In 1995 it was reported that the authorities prohibited, among other subjects, the study of evolution.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 79.]

SOUTH AFRICA

In 1995 it was reported that possibly ‘tens of thousands’ of classified documents had been destroyed since the unbanning of the African National Congress in 1990.

[Source: IOC 6/95: 184.]

On 3 May 1996 Maggie Friedman testified to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in Johannesburg on the murder of her companion, David Webster. She denounced the many investigations and inquiries into his death that had remained without results, and the destruction of some of the documentation. On 1 May 1989 David Joseph Webster (1945-1989), lecturer of social anthropology at the University of the Witwatersrand, editor of ‘Essays in South African Labour History’ (1978) and a member of the History Workshop, was shot dead in Johannesburg by three unidentified gunmen believed to belong to a hit squad of the Civil Co-operation Bureau, a secret wing of the South African Defence Force. As an anthropologist, he conducted research into the culture of the Thembe-Tonga people of the Kosi Bay region. As a human rights activist, he was possibly involved in the opposition against removals due to take place as a result of conservation policies in the region; he was also interested in the secret South African aid to Renamo rebels in Mozambique passing through the region. As a member of the Detainees’ Parents Support Committee (an organization publicising the situation of thousands of detainees held without charge or trial, itself banned in 1988), he was engaged in research into the death squads.

[Sources: AI Report 1990: 215; Africa Watch, Academic Freedom and Human Rights Abuses in Africa 1991: 81-82; IOC 6/92: 31, 5-6/93: 22, 5/96: 58-60.]

TURKEY

In January 1995 the Turkish author and journalist Günay Aslan (see NCH #2) was released.

[Source: AI Report 1996: 20.]

In the spring of 1995 the book 'Genocide as a Question of National and International Law: The 1915 Armenian Event and its Consequences', written by US historian Vahakn Dadrian, was banned. The publisher of the Turkish translation of this book, Ayse Zarakolu, already serving a two-year prison sentence for publishing 'The Armenian Taboo', another book on the Armenian genocide by French historian Yves Ternon, faced prosecution for separatist propaganda. On 29 December 1995 she was acquitted for this book (but charges for other books were upheld).

[Source: IOC 4/95: 188; 6/95: 186, 2/96: 104.]

In early June 1996 the Islamist-run town council of Kayseri in central Turkey banned 'Istanbul Beneath My Wings', a popular Turkish film which portrays seventeenth-century Sultan Murat IV (1623-1640) as bisexual. The mayor declared that the film 'approaches our history from a distorted viewpoint'.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 113.]

UKRAINE

In August 1996 the Hungarian community was refused permission to erect a monument and hold a religious service in the Verecke pass. The monument and service were intended to mark the 1,100th anniversary of the crossing of Hungarian tribes through the Verecke pass into the Carpathian basin in the year 896.

[Source: IOC 5/96: 105.]

UNITED KINGDOM

In 1995, among the subjects surrounded by secrecy, according to historian and Conservative Member of Parliament Alan Clark, were the following: the cabinet discussion of peace terms with Adolf Hitler; the contents of Rudolf Hess' brief which he brought on his mission in 1941; the wartime antics and financial speculations of the Duke of Windsor; the full degree of pressure applied by the Americans over Suez; the text of the consultations during the Cuban missile crisis.

[Source: IOC 2/95: 32.]

In February 1995 the Imperial War Museum withdrew permission to use its film archive of war crimes, given previously to the company Still Movements. The company wanted to produce a commercial video, 'Executions', a history of capital punishment in the twentieth century, but the Museum expressed concern over the possibility of the subject being sensationalised. Earlier Amnesty International, who campaigns for the complete abolition of capital punishment, had withdrawn from the project. The disputed footage was eventually acquired from US archives and from private collections in the UK, and the video was released in June 1995.

[Source: IOC 4/95: 21-23.]

UNITED STATES

In a 1995 interview the Ethiopian film-maker and professor of cinematography at Howard University, Washington, Haile Gerima claimed that he could not get funding for his film 'Sankofa', about slavery, and that, after its release in 1993, it was ignored by the big distributors, because the topic was still too sensitive.

[Source: IOC 6/95: 137, 191.]

On 6 December 1995 an exhibition of the Library of Congress, 'Sigmund Freud: Conflict and Culture', was postponed after protests from academics who said that Sigmund Freud's theories were now widely discredited. On 19 December 1995 the Library of Congress scrapped 'Back of the Big House: the Cultural Landscape of the Plantation', after complaints from black staff members and officials that the display lacked a proper historical context.

[Source: IOC 2/96: 105.]

In 1996 the US publisher of revisionist historian David Irving suddenly canceled publication plans for his biography of Goebbels.

[Source: IOC 3/96: 7.]

VATICAN/GERMANY

Pope John Paul II was censored by his own bishops on a visit to Germany in June 1996. They excised from his homily, which was delivered at the stadium built by Adolf Hitler for the 1936 Olympics, a passage praising the Catholic hierarchy's 'glorious' record of resisting Nazism.

[Source: IOC 4/96: 6.]

VIETNAM

On 8 November 1995 it was reported that two veterans of the Vietnamese revolution, Hoang Minh Chinh and Do Trung Hieu, were sentenced to twelve and fifteen months respectively, for 'anti-socialist propaganda'. They had written articles calling for the rehabilitation of about thirty senior party officials purged during the 1960s for revisionism and opposing the party line.

[Source: IOC 1/96: 192.]

INTRODUCTION

The Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) forwards to its participants news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, as reported by the American Association for the Advancement of Science [AAAS, Washington]; Amnesty International [AI, London]; Article 19 [A19, London]; Human Rights Watch [HRW, Washington/New York]; Index on Censorship [IOC, London]; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee [PEN, London]; Scholars at Risk [SAR, New York]; World University Service [WUS, Amsterdam]; and other sources. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

AZERBAIJAN

According to an Azeri publication dated 7 December 1994, historian Movsum Aliyev was arrested for insulting the president in an article he wrote for the publication 'Azadlyk', entitled 'The Answer to the Falsifiers of History'.

[Source: IOC 1/95: 233]

BULGARIA

In August 1995 British archaeologist Dr Douglas Bailey was deported after taking part in an excavation project at Podgoritsa, north-east Bulgaria. Fourteen of his students were searched and interrogated at Sofia airport and accused of military espionage. When Douglas Bailey later returned to Bulgaria to reclaim confiscated equipment, his passport was seized and he was interrogated for three days before being deported on 24 August. Bulgarian project members have had their offices and homes searched and documents confiscated.

[Source: IOC 5/95: 171-172]

CHINA

In May 1995 Xu Liangying (b. [1920]), a retired physicist, translator of Einstein's collected works and formerly working in the Institute of the History of Science of the Chinese Academy of Sciences, and one of the intellectuals publicly calling for an end to repression of free speech and for the release of political prisoners, was harassed by government officials, after drafting and initiating a petition, signed by forty-five intellectuals, including historian Bao Zunxin and former history student Wang Dan, appealing to the government to free all political prisoners. In March 1994 he was placed under surveillance and virtual house arrest during the visit of foreign dignitaries to China. In October 1992 copies of the scientific journal 'Future and Development' containing several articles dealing with political and economic reform, including one by Xu, had been confiscated.

[Sources: American Association for the Advancement of Science, Directory of Persecuted Scientists, Engineers, and Health Professionals (Washington 1994) 37-38; American Association for the Advancement of Science Human Rights Action Network (AAASHRAN), Case CH9539: 23 May 1995 (and update 5 June 1995); IOC 4/95: 173]

CROATIA

On 2 February 1995 Members of Parliament launched a Croatian Statehood Campaign, in which they accused the media of being anti-Croatian and of falsifying Croatian history.

[Source: IOC 2/95: 173]

GERMANY

In early January 1995 it was reported that customs officials in Wuppertal seized the entire print run of a book by the left-wing author and historian Karl-Heinz Jahnke. The book was printed in Hungary and banned in Germany for 'reasons of national security'.

[Source: IOC 1/95: 239]

On 17 February 1995 the book 'Eye for an eye' by John Sack was withdrawn by the publisher before any copies had been sold. It argued that Stalin deliberately chose Jews to oversee concentration camps in post-war Poland, and has been labelled 'anti-Semitic fodder' by a literary critic.

[Source: IOC 2/95: 175]

On 29 August 1995 Bela Ewald Althans was sentenced to three-and-a-half years in prison for denying the Holocaust. In 1992 he had told tourists queueing up to visit Auschwitz that it had not been a death camp.

[Source: IOC 5/95: 177]

GREECE

On 28 April 1995 President Costis Stephanopoulos accused Macedonia of claiming the entire Macedonian region, which includes areas in Greece and Bulgaria, because of its refusal to remove an ancient Greek symbol from its flag. On 27 January 1995 the Foreign Minister had refused to attend the commemoration of the liberation of Auschwitz in protest at the Polish government's plan to raise the Macedonian flag during the ceremony.

[Source: IOC 2/95: 175, 5/95: 178]

GUATEMALA

On 24 April 1995 the Catholic bishops launched an alternative Truth Commission under the slogan 'Recovering the Historic Memory'. The project is in response to popular frustration with the official Truth Commission, set up by the UN, which is scheduled to spend only six months investigating 35 years of violence.

[Source: IOC 4/95: 176]

HONDURAS

On 28 June 1995 the national human rights commissioner Leo Valladares said that he would ask the US embassy to declassify documents relating to the disappearance of 184 Honduran civil leaders during the 1980s. The Honduran Armed Forces have burned all their files on the disappearances.

[Source: IOC 4/95: 177]

HUNGARY

On 22 December 1994 Radio Budapest reported that the Historical Investigation Committee had been abolished by the government. Part of the Committee's role was to account for the omissions in history books left by censors under the Communist regime. The investigations had reportedly proved uncomfortable for some of the politicians who were returned to power in the spring 1994 elections.

[Source: IOC 1/95: 240]

JAPAN

In January 1995 the popular youth magazine Marco Polo was closed down and its editor dismissed by the publishers after it carried an article denying the Holocaust.

[Source: IOC 2/95: 178]

NAMIBIA

In early 1995 Nazi sympathisers distributed information in which the Holocaust was claimed to be a hoax. It had to be decided whether or not they would be prosecuted under the Racial Discrimination Prohibition Act.

[Source: IOC 3/95: 181]

In August 1995 an ex-editor and ex-director were charged under the Racial Discrimination Prohibition Act for publishing a full page advertisement commemorating the death of Nazi leader Rudolf Hess, in which he was referred to as a 'martyr of peace'.

[Source: IOC 5/95: 182]

NETHERLANDS

On 9 June 1994 author Graa Boomsma was found not guilty of insulting Dutch war veterans. The charges arose over comments Boomsma made in an interview about his novel 'The Last Typhoon'. In it he compared the Dutch army's conduct in Indonesia in the late 1940s to that of the Nazi's during World War II. In late July 1994 the government launched an appeal against the Groningen Court decision but it was dismissed on 26 January 1995. Graa Boomsma reported having received threatening telephone calls throughout January.

[Source: IOC 3/94: 179, 4-5/94: 245, 2/95: 181]

POLAND

On 11 December 1994 several dozens of writers and intellectuals issued an appeal, calling for the opening of the Security Administration Archives covering the Stalinist period (1944-1956).

[Source: IOC 1/95: 245]

On 30 March 1995 the Interior Ministry announced that many more files from the Communist secret police archive would be made available to historians. Journalists seeking access to the archive will still have to apply directly to the interior minister for permission.

[Source: IOC 3/95: 184]

SOUTH KOREA

On 21 March 1995 Kim Mu-yong [b. 1961], a history lecturer at Bangsong Tongshin University, was arrested under the National Security Law for possessing, distributing and producing writings on the Korean guerrilla movement (1948-1953). He was awaiting trial in Seoul Prison.

[Sources: IOC 3/95: 187; WUS Human Rights Bulletin, August 1995: 4]

On 26 April 1995 history professor Park Chang-hee [b. 1932] was arrested under the National Security Law at his home in Seoul and reportedly ill-treated since then. On 9 June 1995 he was charged for meeting an alleged North Korean agent in Japan, for passing state secrets and for praising North Korea.

[Sources: IOC 4/95: 186; WUS Human Rights Bulletin, August 1995: 4]

THAILAND

On 5 August 1984 Ajahn Sulak Sivaraksa (b. [1933]), noted social critic and Buddhist writer, was arrested while his book 'Interviews with S. Sivaraksa: Unmasking Thai Society' was banned. Thousands of copies of the book were seized by the police. The arrest centred around an article on the history of Thai education in which he criticised kings and princes of the last two hundred years for their ignorance of Buddhist teaching and tradition. On 30 November 1984 the charges of lèse majesté (defamation of the monarchy) were withdrawn. In September 1991, he fled to Sweden after an arrest warrant had been issued for similar reasons, but on 14 December 1992 he was arrested again after his return from exile. He was put on trial in June 1993, but the court dismissed his case on 26 April 1995.

[Sources: IOC 6/84: 43, 48, 1/85: 65, 2/85: 36, 4/85: 4, 10/91: 56, 3/93: 40, 3/95: 187; AI Report 1985:

248-249, 1992: 251, 1993: 282, 1995: 283]

TURKEY

On 5 October 1993 Günay Aslan, a writer and television journalist, was arrested and imprisoned when he tried to leave Turkey, detained and condemned to serve a two years' sentence (reduced to eighteen months after appeal) for 'separatist propaganda' on the basis of the Anti-Terror Law. In 1989 he had written a book, 'Thirty-Three Bullets: History in Mourning', about the 1943 execution of thirty-three Kurds suspected of stealing horses and about contemporary events in southeastern Turkey against this historical background. Following publication, the book was confiscated and the writer accused on the basis of a Penal Code Article that was revoked in April 1991. Subsequently, the charge was dropped and the book reprinted, but Günay Aslan was prosecuted again under a new law and condemned in January 1993. At the end of 1994, he was still in jail.

[Source: AI Report 1995: 291]

In the spring of 1995 the book 'Genocide as a Question of National and International Law: The 1915 Armenian Event and its Consequences', written by US historian Vahakn Dadrian, was banned. The publisher of the Turkish translation of this book, already in prison for publishing another book on the Armenian genocide, faced prosecution for separatist propaganda.

[Source: IOC 4/95: 188]

UNITED STATES

In mid-November 1994 the federal government declassified 44 million official secrets, nearly half of which related to World War II.

[Source: IOC 6/94: 252, 1/95: 253]

In January 1995 the Smithsonian Institution decided to eliminate text and pictures of Japanese victims of the atomic bomb in a planned exhibition. Only the fuselage of the Enola Gay, the aeroplane that dropped the bomb, a plaque and a film of the plane's crew would be displayed. The change came after criticism from Congress and veteran groups in September 1994. Some found the the portrayal of the Japanese in the aftermath of the war too sympathetic.

[Source: IOC 6/94: 252, 2/95: 190]

On 17 April 1995 President Bill Clinton signed an executive order requiring that all top secret, secret and confidential documents 25 years or older be automatically declassified. The order reverses a system of intense classification that has been in place for the past decade. In January 1994 a draft report on the new governmental classification had proposed a 40 years term.

[Source: IOC 3/95: 190]