⁹² Lorenzo Tondo, "Teacher Suspended after Her Pupils Criticise Italian Far-Right Law," Guardian (19 May 2019); Valerio Alfonso Bruno, "Why Freedom of Expression Is At Stake In Italy: The Suspension of a Teacher Is Sparking Debate across the Country," Public Seminar (6 June 2019).

See also Vatican.

IVORY COAST (Côte d’Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2018.

Ivory Coast’s Special Investigative and Examination Cell continued its investigations into the human rights abuses of the 2010–2011 post-election crisis, which left more than 3,000 dead and more than 150 women raped. The cell, established in 2011, had charged more than two dozen senior military officers and political leaders with crimes against humanity or war crimes. However, the August 2018 amnesty announcement “for national reconciliation” for 800 people implicated in crimes related to the post-election crisis and subsequent political violence raised major doubts about whether those responsible for the crisis’ worst abuses would be tried in Ivorian courts. A government order implementing the amnesty stated that it would not apply to individuals who were “members of the military and armed groups.” But the list of people released or exonerated under the amnesty included individuals accused of serious human rights violations during the 2010–2011 crisis, both from pro-Ouattara and pro-Gbagbo forces.

Those released due to the amnesty included former first lady Simone Gbagbo. Her acquittal in an Ivorian court for crimes against humanity during the post-election crisis was overturned by the Supreme Court on 26 July 2018, but the amnesty meant that she would not now be retried. Simone Gbagbo was also wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) on four counts of crimes against humanity, but the Ivorian government had refused to transfer her to The Hague. The amnesty did at least result in the release of hundreds of pro-Gbagbo sympathizers who had languished for years in pretrial detention without trial, or who had been convicted of “threats against state security” in trials that often lacked basic due process. The ICC continued the trial of Laurent Gbagbo, former President and historian, and Charles Blé Goudé for crimes against humanity committed during the 2010–2011 crisis. The prosecution closed its case in early 2018, and the defense filed a no-case-to-answer submission in July, arguing that the charges against the two should be dismissed. In early 2019, both defendants were acquitted.

The ICC continued its investigations into crimes committed by pro-Ouattara forces during the crisis, but had yet to issue arrest warrants. President Alassane Ouattara said that no further individuals would be transferred to The Hague. Neither Ivory Coast’s Special Cell nor the ICC were investigating crimes committed during election-related violence in 2000 or the 2002–2003 armed conflict.⁹³

⁹³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 159–160.

JAMAICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2017–2018.

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2018.

Persons forcibly sterilized under the Eugenic Protection Act between 1948 and 1996 sued the government for compensation. Under the law, approximately 84,000 persons, mostly with genetic disorders (including at least around 16,500 persons forced to have sterilization surgery), were victimized. In May 2018, a bipartisan committee was established to create a law that was expected to address both compensation and apologies to the victims.⁹⁴

Hirofumi Yoshimura, mayor of Osaka, ended its “sister city” ties with San Francisco over the display of a statue entitled “Women’s Column of Strength,” depicting women forced to work as sex slaves for Japanese soldiers during World War Two. He said that the “comfort women” monument “destroyed the relationship of trust between the two cities (which had existed since 1957). In a letter, Yoshimura explained that part of the “problem” was the monument’s inscription, which he said “present[ed] uncertain and one-sided claims as historical facts.” The inscription read: “This monument bears witness to the suffering of hundreds of thousands of women and girls euphemistically called ‘comfort women,’ who were sexually enslaved by the Japanese Imperial armed forces in thirteen Asian-Pacific countries from 1931 to 1945.”⁹⁵

On 30 November 2018, Japan’s oldest English-language newspaper, Japan Times (founded 1897), sparked anger among staff and readers after revising its description of wartime sex slaves and forced laborers from the Korean peninsula: “forced laborers” would become “wartime laborers,” “women who were forced to provide sex for Japanese troops before and during World War II” would become “women who worked in wartime brothels, including those who did so against their will, to provide sex to Japanese soldiers.” Reporters and editors were not consulted about the change.⁹⁶

⁹⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 315.

⁹⁵ “Osaka Cuts San Francisco Ties over ‘Comfort Women’ Statue,” BBC News (4 October 2018); Hirofumi Yoshimura (Mayor of Osaka), Letter to London Breed \(Mayor of San Francisco\) re Termination of Sister City Relationship (2 October 2018).

⁹⁶ Justin McCurry, “‘Comfort women’: Anger as Japan Paper Alters Description of WWII Terms,” Guardian (30 November 2018).

See also China, Korea (North).

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004, 2015, 2018.

See Iraq.

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2018.

See United Kingdom.

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011, 2013–2015, 2017.

Japan continued to demand the return of 12 Japanese citizens whom North Korea abducted in the 1970s and 1980s. Some Japanese civil society groups insisted that the number of abductees was much higher. On 19 August 2018, five victims of the “Paradise on Earth” campaign, which used false promises to recruit approximately 93,000 ethnic Koreans (Zainichi) and Japanese nationals in Japan to go to North Korea between 1959 and 1984, sued the North Korean government for damages.⁹⁷

See also Japan, Korea (South).

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012–2013, 2016–2018.

A Center for North Korean Human Rights Records was created under the Ministry of Unification to act as an archive of North Korean human rights violations for possible use in future prosecutions.⁹⁸

In October and November 2018, the Supreme Court ordered two Japanese companies (Nippon Steel & Sumitomo Metal and Mitsubishi) to compensate South Koreans forced to work in their factories during ⁹⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 317, 442.

⁹⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 534.

World War II. Japan insisted that all matters concerning allegations of forced labor were settled under 1965 agreements that established bilateral diplomatic ties, but the Supreme Court ruled that those agreements should not impede individual victims' rights to seek redress. The rulings could open the floodgates for other victims and their families to file class-action lawsuits against 300 Japanese companies still in operation that were believed to have used forced labor at the time. Hundreds of thousands of Koreans were forced to work for Japan's war efforts in Japan, China, and elsewhere, according to South Korean historians. Only a few thousand were still believed alive. Japan reportedly intended to bring the case before the International Court of Justice.⁹⁹

On 21 November 2018, the minister of gender equality and family shut down the Japanese-founded Reconciliation and Healing Foundation (created in July 2016), effectively shelving the 2015 agreement, in which Japan had apologized for the wartime sexual slavery system and promised to give 1 billion yen ($8.6 million) to a fund for Korean women. [See NCH Annual Reports 2017–2018.]¹⁰⁰

See also Japan, Korea (North).

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005, 2018.

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2013, 2016–2017.

⁹⁹ Choe Sang-Hun & Rick Gladstone, "How a World War II-Era Reparations Case Is Roiling Asia," New York Times (30 October 2018); Choe Sang-Hun, "South Korean Court Orders Mitsubishi of Japan to Pay for Forced Wartime Labor," New York Times (29 November 2018).

¹⁰⁰ Choe Sang-Hun, "South Korea Signals End to 'Final' Deal with Japan Over Wartime Sex Slaves," New York Times (21 November 2018).

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008, 2015–2016.

In [June] 2018, the Commission for the Study of KGB Materials (established in 2015 with a three-year mandate) recommended making the list with names of 30,000 KGB agents and informers available; its report had been “conceptually” accepted by the parliament, but the final decision had not been made. In previous years, the parliament had voted three times to open the archives (once in 2004 and twice in 2006), but each time then President Vaira Vīķe-Freiberga had vetoed the decision. In contrast, her successor Valdis Zatlers (serving in 2007–2011) argued that the list should be published. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]¹⁰¹

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2018.

An estimated 17,000 Lebanese were kidnapped or “disappeared” during the civil war (1975–1990). On 12 November 2018, parliament passed a landmark law creating an independent national commission to investigate the fate of the disappeared. Article 27 of the law stated that those found responsible for the disappearances would be held accountable.¹⁰²

In 2018, a street in Beirut’s suburb of Ghobeiry—known for its strong support for Hezbollah—was named after Hezbollah military leader Mustafa Badreddine (1961–2016). Badreddine allegedly masterminded the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005. The street itself led to Rafik Hariri University Hospital. Hariri’s son, Saad Hariri, Lebanon’s prime minister, called the move “seditious.” Badreddine had been designated a terrorist by the United States; he was killed in Syria, where he allegedly led Hezbollah units fighting in support of President Bashar al-Assad.¹⁰³

¹⁰¹ Gordon Sander, “Why a Nearly 30-year-old List of Names Is Roiling Modern Latvia,” Christian Science Monitor (12 July 2018).

¹⁰² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 356.

¹⁰³ “Mustafa Badreddine Street Sparks Outrage in Lebanon,” BBC News (19 September 2018).

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2015, 2018.

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2018.

In April 2017, the International Criminal Court (ICC) unsealed an arrest warrant that it had issued in 2013 for Mohamed Khaled al-Tuhamy, who, under ousted leader Muammar Gaddafi, headed the Internal Security Agency, for serious crimes committed during the 2011 uprising. His whereabouts were unknown at the end of 2018. Saif al-Islam Gaddafi, a son of Muammar Gaddafi, who was sentenced to death in absentia by a Libyan court in 2015, continued to be subject to an ICC arrest warrant to face charges of crimes against humanity. Saif al-Islam Gaddafi's current whereabouts cannot be confirmed; independent international observers had not seen or heard from him since 2014. In her November 2018 update to the Security Council, ICC Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda responded to a challenge brought by Saif al-Islam Gaddafi disputing the admissibility of his case in front of the ICC and she affirmed that he should be arrested and surrendered to the court.¹⁰⁴

Since 2011, militias and forces affiliated with several interim authorities, as well as Islamic State fighters, have attacked religious minorities, including Sufis, Ibadis, and Christians, and destroyed religious sites in Libya with impunity. On 28 November 2017, unidentified assailants set fire to Zawiyat Sheikha Radiya, a historic Sufi mosque in Tripoli, heavily damaging it. This attack followed the destruction by unidentified assailants in October 2017 of Sidi Abu Gharara, another historic Sufi mosque in Tripoli. In July 2018, unidentified armed groups attacked and damaged at least four Sufi sites in the Al-Majouri and Al-Kish neighborhoods of Benghazi.¹⁰⁵

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009, 2015, 2018.

¹⁰⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 360.

¹⁰⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 362.

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2015, 2017–2018.

See Greece.

MADAGASCAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2018.

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011, 2016–2017.

On 10 January 2019, in her report about Malaysia, the UN Special Rapporteur on Cultural Rights Karima Bennouna wrote that: “Islamization has also affected official views of the past, with reports that the pre-Islamic history of Malaysia, as well as non-Muslim cultural heritage, are being omitted from textbooks so that the contributions of Malaysians of Chinese and Indian descent and of indigenous peoples are marginalized. Certain contributions by indigenous peoples, such as stories, are progressively modified to make them more ‘Malay,’ thereby erasing their origins.”¹⁰⁶

On 13 May 2019, the fiftieth anniversary of the 1969 riots, Kua Kia Soong, the author of May 13: Declassified Documents on the Malaysian Riots of 1969 (2007), urged the government to declassify secret Cabinet and Special Branch files on the riots and establish a truth commission. The official death toll was 196, mainly Chinese Malaysians, but Kua Kia Soong believed that it was substantially greater. The thesis of his book was that the pogrom against the Chinese in Kuala Lumpur in 1969 was an attempt orchestrated by the “emergent Malay state capitalist class” to create a situation to justify the coup d’etat against Tunku Abdul Rahman in the state of emergency that followed.¹⁰⁷

See also Yemen.

¹⁰⁶ UN Special Rapporteur on Cultural Rights, Visit to Malaysia (UN Doc. A/HRC/40/53/Add.1) (10 January 2019), paragraph 80.

¹⁰⁷ Kua Kia Soong, “50 Years On, It’s Time to Declassify the Secrets of May 13,” Malaysiakini (13 May 2019).

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

In October 2018, the High Court in the capital Blantyre granted an injunction temporarily suspending work on a statue for the Indian non-violent resistance leader Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948). The case had been initiated by the Gandhi Must Fall group, which accused Gandhi of using racial slurs. It cited quotes from his writings, in which he described Africans as “savages or the Natives of Africa” and “kaffirs” (an insulting racial slur for a black African). In 2015, a Gandhi statue in South Africa was vandalized by a man who painted it white.¹⁰⁸

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2013.

MALI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013–2018.

Judicial authorities made scant progress in investigating over 100 complaints filed by victims of alleged abuses during the armed conflict (2012–2013), and few investigations into more recent communal violence and security force abuse were opened. In June 2018, the government passed a “national consensus” law extending amnesty to members of armed groups involved in the 2012–2013 hostilities who had not been accused of violent crimes. Human rights groups called for the postponement of the law’s passage pending impartial investigations into abuses committed since 2012. The trial of former coup leader General Amadou Haya Sanogo and 17 other members of the security services for the 2012 killing of 21 elite “Red Beret” soldiers was suspended in December 2016.¹⁰⁹

In 2018, the National Commission for Human Rights (CNDH) made significant progress in fulfilling its mandate. With improved funding and personnel, the CNDH investigated abuses, issued numerous communiqués, and visited detention centers to advocate on victims’ behalf. The Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission, established in 2014 with a mandate to investigate crimes and root causes of violence dating back to 1960, made meaningful progress. The 25-member commission had taken over 9,300 victim and witness statements, but its credibility had been weakened by the inclusion of nine armed group members and the exclusion of victims' representatives.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁸ “Malawi Court Halts Work on Gandhi Statue after Critics Brand Him Racist,” BBC News (31 October 2018).

¹⁰⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 381.

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015.

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011, 2017.

Mauritania abolished slavery in 1981 and criminalized it in 2007. The government claimed that there was no longer any slavery, only its legacy, in the form of extreme poverty and exclusion, which it was addressing. The Global Slavery Index estimated that there were 90,000 slaves in Mauritania, or 2 percent of the population, including those who endured “modern” forms of the practice, such as forced or bonded labor. Three special courts that prosecuted slavery-related crimes had tried a handful of cases since their creation under a 2015 law. In March 2018, the special court in Nouadhibou reportedly sentenced a father and son to 20 years in prison and, in a separate case, a woman to ten years in prison for enslaving others.¹¹¹

On 7 August 2018, authorities arrested politician Biram Dah Abeid [Biram Ould Obeidi], a historian and lawyer by training again. [See also NCH Annual Report 2017.] Abeid, who while imprisoned won a seat in the 2018 National Assembly elections, remained in pre-trial detention as of the end of 2018, under investigation for reportedly insulting and threatening a journalist. In the June 2019 presidential elections, he ended second with 18,58 percent of the votes.¹¹²

¹¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 382.

¹¹¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 389.

¹¹² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 387.

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2018.

Since 2006, enforced disappearances by security forces has been a widespread problem. Criminal organizations have also been responsible for many disappearances. In October 2018, the interior minister stated that the whereabouts of more than 37,400 people who had gone missing since 2006 remained unknown. According to the National Human Rights Commission (CNDH), more than 3,900 bodies had been found in over 1,300 clandestine graves since 2007. Prosecutors and police routinely neglected to take basic investigative steps to identify those responsible for enforced disappearances, often telling the missing people's families to investigate on their own. Since 2013, the Attorney-General's office has had a specialized office to investigate and prosecute disappearances. As of August 2018, it had opened 1,255 investigations but only pressed charges in 11 cases. It did not report any convictions. In November 2017, Congress passed a law on disappearances that established a single nationwide definition for the crime and mandated the creation of entities to facilitate their investigation and prosecution. These included the National Search Commission (CNB) that was created in March 2018 to coordinate search efforts in the field, and the National Search System (SNB), established in October 2018 to coordinate state institutions involved in the search for the disappeared. However, at the end of 2018 these entities were not yet fully operational. In July 2018, the Citizen Council of the National Search System, an advisory body created by the disappearances law, reported that the CNB was not receiving the resources it needed to fulfill its mandate. The council also criticized the lack of coordination between institutions, and expressed its concern that most states lagged behind in implementing the law. Only 13 out of 32 states had created a specialized prosecutor's office and only nine out of 32 states had local search commissions or offices, even though the law mandated the creation of those entities by February and April 2018, respectively. Victims' families have repeatedly denounced serious shortcomings regarding the identification and storage of bodies.¹¹³

On 2 October 2018, the anniversary of the Tlatelolco massacre of 2 October 1968 in which at least 44 students died, it was reported that the government had removed, censored, or reclassified thousands of previously accessible documents from the era of the Dirty War (which between 1964 and 1982 had left an estimated 2,000 people disappeared and an unknown number of political dissenters dead) from a special collection which had been in the General Archive of the Nation (AGN) since 2002. The records came from the political intelligence branch of the Interior Secretariat, the old domestic intelligence agency Dirección Federal de Seguridad (DFS), and the Secretariat of Defense (Sedena). AGN director Mercedes de la Vega defended her actions by citing a 2012 Archives Law and new, stricter requirements to protect personal privacy. Even the most widely known and published records had been rendered illegible.¹¹⁴

¹¹³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 394–395.

On 1 March 2019, President Andrés Manuel López Obrador announced that within days he would open files of the National Center for Investigation and Security (CISEN) showing how intelligence agencies targeted activists and opposition groups during the “Dirty War” (1964–1982). The files were housed in the Lecumberri national archive, a former prison in the capital where numerous opposition figures were once incarcerated.¹¹⁵

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2013.

See also China.

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2017.

¹¹⁴ Kate Doyle, “Fifty Years After Tlatelolco, Censoring the Mexican Archives: Mexico’s “Dirty War” Files Withdrawn from Public Access,” National Security Archive (2 October 2018); Elisabeth Malkin, “50 Years After a Student Massacre, Mexico Reflects on Democracy,” New York Times (1 October 2018).

¹¹⁵ AFP, “Mexico’s President to Open Archives on ‘Dirty War’ Period,” The Globe Post (3 March 2019).

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013, 2015–2018.

MOZAMBIQUE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2018.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2018.

In July 2018, the department of public relations and psychological warfare of the Myanmar Army published a 117-page book on the Rohingya crisis, entitled “Myanmar Politics and the Tatmadaw: Part I,” relating the army’s narrative of August 2017 when some 700,000 Rohingya fled Rakhine to Bangladesh. In the book the military denied the allegations of abuses, blaming the violence on “Bengali terrorists” reportedly intent on carving out a Rohingya state named Arkistan. Upon investigation, however, Reuters found that three of the eight historical “documentary photos” from the book were faked: “The book purports they were taken in the western state of Rakhine,” when in fact one was taken in Bangladesh in 1971, another was of Rwandans fleeing into Tanzania in 1996, and a third, whose caption says it shows ‘Bengalis’ entering Myanmar, actually showed Rohingya and Bangladeshis leaving Myanmar in 2015.” Reuters called this a “chilling rewriting of history in what appears to be an attempt to justify the killing of thousands of Rohingya over the last year in attacks by the army that the UN has condemned as genocide.”¹¹⁶

In July 2018, police violently quelled a demonstration in Karenni State, tasing and baton-charging protesters who were marching against plans to erect a statue of Myanmar’s independence leader, General Aung San (1915–1947). Ten Karenni youth activists were arrested and charged with alarming the public and incitement.¹¹⁷

¹¹⁶ Reuters, “Myanmar Army Fakes Photos and History in Sinister Rewrite of Rohingya Crisis,” The Guardian (31 August 2018).

¹¹⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 418.

In August 2018, a United Nations-mandated fact-finding mission found that the military abuses committed in Kachin, Rakhine, and Shan States since 2011 “undoubtedly amounted to the gravest crimes under international law,” and called for senior military officials, including Commander-in-Chief Senior General Min Aung Hlaing, to face investigation and prosecution for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes.¹¹⁸

¹¹⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 413.

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011, 2016–2018.

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2018.

The Attorney-General, appointed by the new Prime Minister Khadga Prasad Oli, promised to amend flawed legislation on transitional justice mechanisms to bring them in line with Supreme Court directives and international law.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and the Commission of Investigation on Enforced Disappeared Persons (CIEDP) held extensive hearings throughout Nepal during 2018, meeting victims of the country's decade-long conflict between government and Communist Party of Nepal–Maoist (CPN–M) forces (1996–2006). Although the terms of the two commissions were extended in 2018, concerns lingered over their independence and impartiality, particularly with the CPN–M, a vested party in the conflict, joining the ruling party in the new government in early 2018.

Due to flaws in the legislation setting up the transitional justice mechanisms, the international community had withdrawn support for the commissions, beginning in 2014. In June 2018, the Attorney-General pledged to amend the laws to bring them into compliance with international law, and in particular to withdraw clauses allowing amnesties for perpetrators credibly accused of war crime violations. However, the proposed amendments did not properly address concerns around entrenched impunity. Perpetrators who faced credible allegations against them continued to remain in positions of power. Cases filed before the courts remained stalled as the police and relevant authorities refused to conduct investigations that would enable indictments and prosecutions to proceed. The main political parties continued to insist that these were political cases and should not be handled by regular courts.¹¹⁹

¹¹⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 421–422, 424.

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2018.

When on 17 January 1969 Joop [=Johan] Hueting (1927–2018) on television denounced the war crimes committed by the Dutch army in Indonesia during the police actions of 1947–1949, he received death threats from veterans and with his family moved to a hidden location for some time. Hueting had been a soldier at the time who had witnessed the crimes, which as a whistleblower he said were structural and ordered. Later that year, an official report confirmed 110 cases of “exceptional violence.” Journalists who subsequently interviewed veterans about the crimes were also threatened.¹²⁰

In February or March 2018, Sax, the magazine of Saxion University in Enschede, refused to publish an article about a film on the 1915 Assyrian genocide in the Ottoman Empire made by fourth-year media student Shayno Numansen ([1994–]) on the grounds that the topic was too sensitive and that threats and hate mail would endanger the student’s safety—a reason dismissed by Numansen.¹²¹

In August 2018, historian Coen Cornelissen was sued for posthumous defamation and for defamation by five members of the Ottema family in Almelo over his book De Ottema’s, het relaas over een NSB-familie (The Ottema’s, the Story of a NSB Family) (Denekamp: Heinink, 2018). The publisher was ordered to withdraw the remaining 69 unsold copies from circulation. During World War II, contractor Otte Ottema (1889–1981) belonged to the NSB (National-Socialistische Beweging, National-Socialist Movement) and his daughter Aly Ottema (deceased) belonged to the Nationale Jeugdstorm (NSJ; National Youth Storm, closely linked to the NSB). The complainants were Aly Ottema’s children.¹²²

On 4 October 2018, lawyer Bram Moszkowicz announced that he would sue historian Paul Bronzwaer from Maastricht for defamation of his ill father, Max Moszkowicz (1926–), and, possibly, for anti-Semitism. As a child, Moszkowicz had spent a thousand days in four concentration camps. In his biography, De Bokser—het leven van Max Moszkowicz (2018; The Boxer—The Life of Max Moszkowicz), journalist Marcel Haenen had quoted extracts from an interview with Bronzwaer, in which the latter had said that Moszkowicz exploited the Holocaust by posing as a martyr. When Bronzwaer publicly doubted the quote, Haenen replied that he had taped the interview and that

¹²⁰ Kester Freriks, “Overleden: Joop Hueting (1927–2018): Indië-veteranen jaagden hem zijn huis uit,” NRC Handelsblad (14 November 2018), 8; Kester Freriks, “Na zijn bekentenis kanelde het beeld over Indië,” NRC Handelsblad (20 January 2016), 12–13.

¹²¹ “De Aramese genocide lag te gevoelig, kreeg ze te horen,” NRC Handelsblad (10 juli 2018), 11.

¹²² Sander van Walsum, ““Verscheurde” familie wil boek over NSB-verleden uit de handel,” Volkscrant (23 August 2018); Lucien Baard, “Tweents oorlogsboek uit de handel: ‘Vecht niet tegen het boek, maar tegen het taboe’,” Tubantia (23 August 2018).

Bronzwaer had approved the text before publication. The president of the Jewish community of the province of Limbourg, Benoit Wesly, demanded Bronzwaer's apology, but when Bronzwaer issued a brief one, the Moszkowicz family did not accept it.¹²³

On 18 December 2018, the District Court in Amsterdam ruled that the National Archives had to re-examine the request by the Stichting Onderzoek Oorlogsmisdaden (Foundation Research War Crimes) to search the Centraal Archief Bijzondere Rechtspleging (CABR; Central Archives for Special Criminal Jurisdiction) for information about alleged Nazi camp executioners who were still alive. The archive's refusal to grant access was negligent and insufficiently substantiated, the judge found. The archive appealed the verdict, saying that it would not review the 300.000 relevant files for names of camp executioners still alive for three reasons: it was not its task, it was not practically possible, and it violated the European General Data Protection Regulation.¹²⁴

On 29 June 2019, Dutch-Surinamese journalist Sandew Hira was to give the annual Ketu Koti lecture in Amsterdam in commemoration of the abolition of slavery in the Dutch colony of Surinam (on 1 July 1863). After opponents, including Theo Para, charged on the Suriname online platform Waterkant that Hira was a supporter of Suriname's President Desi Bouterse and of an amnesty for the crimes against humanity committed under the latter's military dictatorship (1980–1987), the organizing institution, Ninsee (The National Institute Dutch Slavery Past and Legacy), canceled the lecture on 15 June 2019.¹²⁵

See also South Africa, Syria.

¹²³ Paul van der Steen, "Excuus geëist na uitlating over Max Moszkowicz," NRC Handelsblad (4 October 2018); Paul van der Steen, "Moszkowicz: aangifte tegen historicus die vader 'Holocaust-exploitant' noemde," NRC Handelsblad (12 October 2018); Paul van der Steen, "Excuses na uitlatingen over Max Moszkowicz vallen verkeerd," NRC Handelsblad (26 October 2018).

¹²⁴ District Court Amsterdam, Stichting Onderzoek Oorlogsmisdaden versus Algemene Rijksarchivaris (18 December 2018); District Court Amsterdam, X versus Algemene Rijksarchivaris (27 May 2016); Marcel Haenen, "Stichting eist toegang tot dossiers oorlogsmisdadigers," NRC Handelsblad (12 October 2018), 8; Ministerie van Justitie en Veiligheid, "Antwoorden Kamervragen inzake de beperkte openbaarheid van het Centraal Archief Bijzondere Rechtspleging" (letter no. 2396058; 4 pages; 31 October 2018); Marcel Haenen, "Nationaal Archief weigert kampbeulen op te sporen," NRC Handelsblad (28 February 2019), 2.

¹²⁵ Elsbeth Stoker, "Ketu Koti-lezing gaat niet door na onenigheid over de spreker," Volkscrant (16 June 2019).

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007, 2017.

In 2019, pressure from the New Zealand Māori Council and the Māori screen industry organisation Ngā Aho Whakaari resulted in TV New Zealand (TVNZ) ruling out the sale of Māori archival material through its distribution deal with United States company Getty Images. TVNZ would vest access of its Māori material with a Māori body.¹²⁶

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2013.

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2013, 2016–2018.

Decades-old communal conflict between nomadic herdsman and farmers in the Middle Belt intensified in 2018 and further exacerbated the security situation in the country. At least 1,600 people were killed and another 300,000 displaced as a result of the violence.¹²⁷

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012, 2016–2017.

See Israel.

¹²⁶ “TVNZ to Hand Over Control of Māori Archive,” WaateaNews.com (21 March 2019).

¹²⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 431.

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2017.

On 13 June 2018, writer and online activist Abdullah Habib [see NCH Annual Report 2017] was released from Samail Central Prison while serving a six-month prison sentence on charges under article 19 of the Information Technology Crimes Act for “using the internet in what would prejudice the state public order” in addition to “contempt of religions.” Habib was due for release in October 2018, however was pardoned under Sultan Qaboos’ amnesty on the occasion of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr.¹²⁸

¹²⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 443–444.

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012, 2014, 2016, 2018.

In May 2018, a mob led by anti-blasphemy clerics attacked and destroyed two historic Ahmadiyya religious buildings.¹²⁹

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2013–2015, 2018.

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2013, 2015–2017.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012, 2015.

On 24 March 2019, historian Milda Rivarola was attacked with eggs by a mob in her residence because she had denounced the asphaltting of a central zone of historical patrimony in her town, Quyquyhó, Paraguari Department, because it would destroy its colonial architecture and cobbled outlook. Rivarola is a member of the Academia Paraguaya de la Historia (Paraguayan Academy of History). She had been a journalist for the TV Pública Paraguay.¹³⁰

¹²⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 448.

¹³⁰ Comité paraguayo de ciencias históricas, “Comunicado” (Asunción 25 March 2019); “Atacan vivienda de la historiadora Milda Rivarola en Quyquyhó,” Última hora (25 March 2019).

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2018.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission had estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents. Authorities have made limited progress in prosecuting wartime abuses by government forces, in part due to lack of collaboration from the Defense Ministry. According to human rights groups, prosecutors had only achieved rulings in 78 cases related to abuses committed during the armed conflict, as of May 2017, and only 17 convictions.

Although then-President Pedro Pablo Kuczynski granted former President Alberto Fujimori an “humanitarian pardon” in December 2017 based on claims of illness, on 3 October 2018, a Supreme Court judge overturned the pardon and ordered Fujimori’s imprisonment. An appeal remained pending at the end of 2018, and Fujimori had not been sent back to prison. On 12 October 2018, Fujimori supporters in Congress passed a bill that would have granted prisoners who are over a certain age and have served a third of their sentences the right to serve the remainder under “electronic surveillance.” Proponents of the bill said it was intended to ease prison conditions for elderly prisoners, but the timing and language in the bill showed its objective was to ensure Fujimori’s freedom. On 22 October 2018, President Martín Vizcarra vetoed the bill.

In April 2018, a senior prosecutor ordered that Fujimori and three of his health ministers be indicted in connection with forced sterilizations of mostly poor and indigenous women. At the end of 2018, Fujimori and his ministers had not been charged. In 2015, the government had created a national registry of victims of forced sterilizations committed between 1995 and 2001. More than 5,000 victims had been registered at the end of 2018.

In September 2018, the National Penal Chamber of Peru sentenced leaders of Shining Path, including its founder Abimael Guzmán, to life in prison for terrorist acts. Guzmán was already serving life in prison for the 1983 killing of 69 peasants in the town of Santiago de Lucanamarca.

In 2017, new evidence surfaced corroborating longstanding allegations that former President Ollanta Humala ordered egregious human rights violations, including torture, enforced disappearances, and killings, committed by security forces in the early 1990s at the Madre Mía military base in the Alto Huallaga region. In September 2018, a commission of lawmakers charged with investigating allegations of extrajudicial killings at the Madre Mía base in 1992 concluded there was sufficient evidence against Humala to warrant reopening criminal investigations.

Courts made much less progress in addressing violations, including extrajudicial killings, disappearances, and torture, committed during the earlier administrations of Fernando Belaúnde (1980– 1985) and Alan García (1985–1990). In August 2018, the National Criminal Chamber sentenced two retired military agents to up to 30 years in prison for their role in the forced disappearances and extrajudicial killings of 53 people at the Cabitos military base, in Ayacucho, in 1983. In the same month, the remains of several victims were exhumed from a nearby clandestine cemetery and given to their relatives. The authorities estimated that some 20,000 people disappeared during the armed conflict. In September, President Vizcarra ordered the establishment of a genetic profile bank that would help in the search for those disappeared.¹³¹

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2015.

In April 2019, the Concerned Artists of the Philippines said that the presence the Marcos family—Imelda Marcos (1929–) and her three children, wife and offspring of former President (1965–1986) Ferdinand Marcos (1917–1989)—in any art event was a manifestation of the culture of impunity and forgetfulness as they continued to “move in cultural circles without the benefit of any recognition of or remorse for their crimes against the Filipino people” and “It is every Filipino artist’s duty to wage a cultural boycott on a family that advocates disinformation, historical revisionism, patronage and cronyism, dynastic politics, and outright suppression.” The remarks came as the President of the Ateneo de Manila University (a private Jesuit research university in Quezon City, founded in 1859), Jose Ramon Villarín, apologized for the “hurt” that the presence of Irene Marcos-Araneta (of Marcos’s youngest daughter, 1960–) in the Areté creative hub event on campus in early April brought to the victims of Martial Law (1972–1981). He also reaffirmed Ateneo’s commitment to the call for justice to the victims and the university’s stance against historical revisionism.¹³²

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011, 2014–2018.

On 15 November 2018, Jan Grabowski, a Holocaust historian working at the University of Ottawa, Canada, sued the Polish League Against Defamation, which was allied to Poland’s ruling nationalist ¹³¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 461–463.

¹³² “Universities Challenged to Declare Marcoses ‘Personae Non Gratae,’ Barred from ‘All Events,’” Manila Times (14 April 2019).

party, for libel after a campaign against him for his studies of Polish violence against Jews during World War II. In 2017, the league had said that Grabowski “falsifie[d] the history of Poland, proclaiming the thesis that Poles [were] complicit in the extermination of Jews.” Grabowski’s Hunt for the Jews: Betrayal and Murder in German-Occupied Poland documented the involvement of Poles in one rural area in finding and killing Jews who had escaped from ghettos and were trying to survive by hiding among gentiles. It was awarded the 2014 Yad Vashem International Book Prize for Holocaust Research. Grabowski said that he received death threats after its publication. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2017–2018.]¹³³

In early December 2018, the government closed down the Instytut Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej (IEŚW; iesw.lublin.pl; Institute of East-Central Europe) in Lublin. Its director, historian Mirosław Filipowicz (1963–), and most of the staff were dismissed. Founded as a NGO by historian Jerzy Kłoczowski, the IEŚW published a two-volume synthesis of Belarusian and Ukrainian history written by Belarusian and Ukrainian authors (Genad’ Sahanovich, Zakhary Shybieka, Natalia Jakovenko, and Jaroslav Hrytsak), which was never published in Belarus. An official research institute supervised by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs since 2001, IEŚW recently published a three-volume bilingual Polish-Russian companion to history for history teachers, prepared in cooperation with the Russian Academy of Sciences. A new institute supervised by the Prime Minister was founded to replace IEŚW, focusing on the so-called Three Seas Initiative (a forum of European Union member states in Central and Eastern Europe). Filipowicz also resigned his position as Polish co-chairman (2016–2018) of the Polish-Russian Group for Difficult Issues (founded 2002), as a consequence of which the group ceased to exist.¹³⁴

On 21–22 February 2019, a French-Polish conference on “La nouvelle école polonaise d’histoire de la Shoah” (“The New Polish School of History of the Holocaust”) organized in Paris by the École des hautes études en sciences sociales and the Centre national de recherche scientifique was interrupted by Polish “patriots” in the audience. In its main evening broadcast, the Polish State Television TVP called the conference “a festival of anti-Polish lies.” In early March 2019, a publication of the Polish Center for Holocaust Research, the two-volume Dalej jest noc: Losy Żydów w wybranych powiatach okupowanej Polski (Night Without an End: The fate of Jews in Selected Counties of Occupied Poland) was attacked in the Polish press.¹³⁵

¹³³ “Holocaust Expert Jan Grabowski Sues Polish League for Defamation,” Times (17 November 2018); AP, “Holocaust Scholar Sues Group That Said He ‘Slandered’ Poland,” New York Times (16 November 2018).

¹³⁴ Mirosław Filipowicz, personal communications (3 December 2018; 22 March and 4 April 2019).

¹³⁵ Polish Center for Holocaust Research, “Declaration Concerning the Conference in Paris” (24 February 2019); Polish Center for Holocaust Research, “Regarding Attacks on ‘Night without End’ and the Center’s Academic Credibility” (12 March 2019); Mirosław Filipowicz, personal communication (22 March 2019).

On 1 March 2019, the Minister of Culture Piotr Gliński did not extend the mandate of historian Dariusz Stola, the first director of the POLIN Museum of the History of Polish Jews (2014–2019). Stola was a professor at the Institute of Political Studies of the Polish Academy of Sciences, specializing in Polish-Jewish relations, the Holocaust, the Communist regime in Poland, and international migrations in the twentieth century. He came under attack from the politicians and media associated with the Law and Justice (PiS) government because he criticized the Amendment to the Institute of National Remembrance Act. [See NCH Annual Report 2018.] He then organized an exhibition entitled Estranged: March '68 and Its Aftermath, about the 1968 anti-Semitic campaign in Poland, which also mentioned cases of contemporary hate speech (with examples of online hate speech propagated by journalists of Polish State Television TVP). Stola was accused of slandering Poland. The new POLIN director would be selected by a committee vote.¹³⁶

In 2019, Jarosław Szarek, President of the National Remembrance Institute (IPN), at the request of Marcin Krzysztofik (chairman of the IPN department in Lublin), dismissed Grzegorz Kuprianowicz from the Lublin Commission in the IPN Office for Commemorating the Struggle and Martyrdom. On 8 July 2018, during anniversary celebrations of the 1944 Sahrń massacre, historian Kuprianowicz, president of the Ukrainian Association in Poland, had declared in the presence of Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko that on 10 March 1944 some 230–600 Ukrainian Orthodox civilians died in Sahrń at the hands of Home Army (Armia Krajowa) partisans as a retaliation for Ukrainian crimes on Polish civilians in the Wołyń / Volhynia region. Kuprianowicz was accused of offending the Polish nation. The Wołyń massacre had been recognized by the Polish parliament as a genocide in July 2016. Kuprianowicz was charged with insulting the Polish nation. Polish historians agree that the Sahrń massacre was the responsibility of the Home Army and the Bataliony Chłopskie (Farmers' Soldiers).¹³⁷

See also Israel.

PORTUGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2017.

¹³⁶ “Dariusz Stola, Head of the POLIN Museum, in the Midst of a Political Storm” (16 February 2019); “Statement of Professor Dariusz Stola, Director of POLIN Museum of the History of Polish Jews” (22 February 2019); Sławomir Grunberg and Others, “Petition for Stola” (no date [February 2019]).

¹³⁷ “Grzegorz Kuprianowicz Dismissed from the Commission for the Protection of the Memory of Combat and Martyrdom” (no date [2019]); “Statement by the President of the Ukrainian society: Grzegorz Kuprianowicz” (no date [2019]); Mirosław Filipowicz, personal communication (22 March and 4 April 2019).

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

Randolph Braham (born Adolf Abraham) (1922–2018) was among the young Jewish refugees who became historians in their new country (in his case the United States). He specialized in the history of the Hungarian Holocaust.¹³⁸

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2018.

On 3 July 2018, historian Yuri Dmitriev was charged with “violent acts of a sexual nature committed against a person under 14 years of age,” in what was widely seen as a trumped-up charge. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2017–2018.] This charge of sexual assault against his adopted daughter followed the earlier acquittal on child-pornography charges. On 18 December 2018, a new trial began behind closed doors.¹³⁹

On 18 March 2019, a court in Shali (near Grozny) sentenced historian Oyub Titiev to four years’ imprisonment for possession of 200 grams of marihuana. [See also NCH Annual Report 2018.] Titiev decided against appealing the sentence in order to retain his right to apply for a conditional release. On 1 April 2019, Titiev’s sentence entered into force. On 10 June 2019, the Shali City Court approved Titiev’s conditional release (release on parole) on 21 June 2019. In October 2018, Titiev had received the sixth Václav Havel Human Rights Prize of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.¹⁴⁰

¹³⁸ Kelly Boyd, ed., Encyclopedia of Historians and Historical Writing (London/Chicago 1999) 112–13.

¹³⁹ “Yury A. Dmitriev,” Wikipedia (2 July 2018); “Russian Stalin Historian Charged With Sexual Assault,” RFE / RL (3 July 2018); Halya Coynash, “Russia Arrests Second Historian of Stalin’s Terror,” Human Rights in Ukraine (3 October 2018); PEN International, Russia’s Strident Stifling of Free Speech, 2012–2018 (London: PEN International, 2018), 20; “Historian of Stalin-Era Crimes in Court for Sexual Assault, his Second Trial this Year” RFE/RL News (18 December 2018); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 485; Frontline Defenders, Global Analysis 2018 (Blackrock: Front Line, the International Foundation for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, 2019), 23; EU Statement on Violations of the Rights of Human Rights Defenders in the Russian Federation (EU Doc. PC.DEL/397/18) (13 April 2018).

¹⁴⁰ PEN International, “Oral Statement on Freedom of Association and Peaceful Assembly in Russia for the United Nations Human Rights Council 38th Special Session, Item 3: Interactive Dialogue with the UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and of Association” (18 June 2018); “Václav Havel Human Rights Prize 2018 awarded to Oyub Titiev,” PACE (8 October 2018); Michel Forst, United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders, World Report on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders (December 2018), 427; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 481, 485; Frontline Defenders, Global Analysis 2018 (Blackrock:

On 2 December 2018, Culture Minister Vladimir Medinsky claimed to possess historical records that prove the authenticity of the Panfilov story [see NCH Annual Report 2016] in an article in the government newspaper Rossiiskaya Gazeta, citing passages from wartime accounts declassified by the secret services in the spring of 2018.¹⁴¹

In the spring of 1968, Ludmila Alexeyeva (1927–2018), historian and editor of the Nauka publishing house (1959–1968), was dismissed and expelled from the Communist Party of the Soviet Union after she had protested against the unfair trial of dissidents Aleksandr Ginzburg, Yuri Galanskov and others. From 1968 to 1972 she helped produce the Chronicle of Current Events as an editor. She was frequently interrogated by the KGB and had to undergo several home searches. In 1976 she became a co-founder of the Moscow Helsinki Group (together with Yuri Orlov and Andrei Sakharov). From 1977 to 1993 she lived in exile in the United States. Alexeyeva eventually became president of the International Helsinki Federation for Human Rights (1998–2004). In 2009, she received the Sakharov Prize of the European Parliament (on behalf of Memorial), in 2015 the Václav Havel Human Rights Prize of the European Parliament. She was a member of the Presidential Council for Human Rights.¹⁴²

See also Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Georgia, Poland.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2017.

In June 2017, the United Nations (UN) International Residual Mechanism for Criminal Tribunals (IRMCT) in Arusha granted Augustin Ndirabwire's request for a review of his appeals judgment. His request was based on the grounds of "new information of an evidentiary nature" of relevance to the case. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) sentenced Ndirabwire, a former planning minister in the government of former Rwandan President Juvénal Habyarimana, to 35 years' imprisonment in 2012 for genocide, incitement to commit genocide, and rape as a crime against Front Line, the International Foundation for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, 2019), 23; "Russia: Release Human Rights Defender Oyub Titiev, Urge UN Experts" (Press release; 7 March 2019); Steven Derix, "Tsjetsjeniës laatste activist de cel in," NRC Handelsblad (20 March 2019), 14; "Russia Human Rights: Chechnya Court Jails Memorial Activist," BBC News (18 March 2019); "Oyub Titiev Granted Parole," Frontline Defenders ([June] 2019).

¹⁴¹ Matthew Luxmoore, "Russian Minister Says Authenticity of War Legend Beyond Dispute, 'Amoral' To Dig Further," RFE/RL News (3 December 2018).

¹⁴² S. P. de Boer, E. J. Driessen, & H. L. Verhaar, eds., Biographical Dictionary of Dissidents in the Soviet Union 1956–1975 (The Hague 1982), 12–13; Index on Censorship (2014 no. 1), 138–139.

humanity.

In 2014, the ICTR's appeals chamber had reduced his sentence to 30 years' imprisonment. The review of the appeals judgment, previously slated to begin on 24 September 2018, was adjourned until further notice.

In June 2018, an appeals court in Brussels, Belgium, ruled that the Belgian state was not responsible for the massacre of some two thousand ethnic Tutsis at Kigali's Ecole technique officielle (Official Technical School, ETO) during the 1994 genocide. The court said that the United Nations (UN) was responsible, given that the Belgian soldiers who evacuated the site and failed to protect the Rwandan civilians were serving as part of a UN force. The Rwandan National Commission for the Fight against Genocide (Commission nationale de lutte contre le génocide, CNLG) denounced this ruling as politically motivated.¹⁴³

On 15 September 2018, Victoire Ingabire [see NCH Annual Reports 2011 and 2013] received a presidential pardon.¹⁴⁴

See also Myanmar.

¹⁴³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 494.

¹⁴⁴ "Victoire Ingabire: Rwanda Frees 2,000 People Including Opposition Figure," BBC News (15 September 2018).

SAINT VINCENT

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

SÃO TOMÉ

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011, 2013, 2017–2018.

On 24 June 2018, in the lead-up to the lifting of the driving ban, Hatoon Al-Fassi, an associate professor of women's history at King Saud University, Riyadh, human rights activist, and contributor to al-Riyadh newspaper, was detained in apparent relation to her women's rights activism, including her leadership in the movement to lift the ban on women driving. A few days earlier, on 19 June 2018, Al-Fassi had been put under a travel ban. The detailed circumstances surrounding her arrest remained unclear. She was not granted access to her lawyer or family and no information was given about her whereabouts. Since November 2018, Al-Fassi and nine other women's rights activists have reportedly been subjected to torture by electrocution and flogging, sexual harassment, and sexual assault.

On 13 March 2019, Al-Fassi and the nine other activists appeared in a criminal court in a closed-door trial for the first time since their arrest. The charges were not made public; however, reports indicated that the ten were tried on charges for allegedly communicating with international organizations and foreign media and promoting women's rights. On 27 March 2019, following the second hearing, the court released three of the activists. On 3 April 2019, the remaining activists, including Al-Fassi, appeared in court and were apparently denied bail. On 2 May 2019, Al-Fassi and three other women's rights activists were temporarily released.

Al-Fassi was the author of Sanawat fi 'Umr Al-Mar'ah Al-Saudiyyah [Years in the Lives of Saudi Women] (2018), Women in Pre-Islamic Arabia: Nabataea (2007), and numerous articles and book chapters on women's history in the Arabian Peninsula. As a human rights activist, she was engaged in efforts to lift the ban on women driving. She was involved in initiatives to allow women's full participation in municipal elections, co-founding the "Baladi" campaign to empower women who wanted to participate. She led the campaign to include women in the Majlis al-Shura (Consultative Assembly), resulting in the appointment in 2013, for the first time, of thirty women members. In 1993, she founded the Sunday Forum, a monthly gathering of women with lectures on a wide range of issues. On 17 November 2018, the Middle East Studies Association of North America awarded al-Fassi the MESA Academic Freedom Award for 2018.¹⁴⁵

See also Egypt, Yemen.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009, 2013, 2017–2018.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2018.

War crimes prosecutions remained hampered due to a lack of political will, adequate resources, and weak witness support mechanisms. Few high-ranking officials implicated in serious abuses committed in the war of 1991–1995 were held to account in Serbian courts. By August 2018, 11 war crimes cases were still at investigation stage and 19 were pending before Serbian courts. The Office of Serbia’s War Crimes Prosecutor issued two new indictments during the same period. In the first eight months of 2018, first instance courts delivered no judgments in war crimes cases. The appeals court acquitted six persons and returned one case to the first instance court for retrial. Since the establishment of the War Crimes Prosecutor in 2003, 44 final judgments have been issued, 74 people convicted, and 50 acquitted. The first trials in Serbia for war crimes in Srebrenica restarted in November 2017 after being plagued by delays. Eight Bosnian Serb former police officers resident in Serbia were charged with the killing in a warehouse of more than 1,300 Bosniak civilians from Srebrenica in July 1995. In June 2018, a witness quit the trial, stating he received threats despite having a protected identity.

In June 2018, Chief Prosecutor Serge Brammertz at the Mechanism for International Criminal ¹⁴⁵ Scholars at Risk, “Dr. Hatoon Al-Fassi Detained Over Women’s Rights Activism” (19 July 2018); American Historical Association, “Letter to King Salman bin Abdulaziz al-Saud” (Washington, 4 September 2018); Scholars at Risk, Free to Think: Report of the Scholars at Risk Academic Freedom Monitoring Project (New York: SAR, 2018), 17; Various academics, Letter to King Salman and Prince Mohammad bin Salman (6 November 2018); Human Rights Watch, “Saudi Arabia: Detained Women Reported Tortured,” (20 November 2018); MESA Academic Freedom Award: Hatoon al Fassi, 2018 Recipient (16 November 2018); United Nations Special Procedures, Letter about Saudi-Arabian Human Rights Defenders (UA SAU 11/2018; 10 October 2018); “Saudi Arabia Temporarily Frees Four Women Activists,” BBC News (3 May 2019); Scholars at Risk, “Hatoon Al-Fassi, Saudi Arabia” (24 June 2019); Scholars at Risk, “Letter to His Majesty King Salman bin Abdulaziz Al Saud” (25 June 2019); NCH Campaign (2018–2019).

Tribunals (MICT) in The Hague urged Serbia to officially acknowledge the crimes committed in Srebrenica in 1995 as genocide. In April 2018, the MICT sentenced Vojislav Seselj to ten years' imprisonment for inciting crimes through nationalist speeches in the Vojvodina, Serbia during the 1992 war. The Tribunal cleared Seselj of war crimes in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia. Seselj has already served his time, having been in custody in The Hague since 2003.¹⁴⁶

Kosovo

In March 2018, special prosecutor David Schwendiman at the Hague-based Specialist Chambers and Prosecutor's Office trying serious war crimes committed during the 1998–1999 conflict in Kosovo resigned his post. In May, Jack Smith, was appointed as the new special prosecutor. At the end of 2018, no indictments had been issued. The court was set to adjudicate cases investigated by the Special Investigative Task Force, prompted by a 2011 Council of Europe report accusing some Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) members of abductions, beatings, summary executions, and the forced removal of human organs in Kosovo and Albania during and after the Kosovo war. Senior KLA fighters were expected to be indicted and stand trial. The court would operate under Kosovo laws, with 19 international judges.

By mid-June 2018, the European Rule of Law Mission (EULEX) ceased its executive functions in the Kosovo judiciary. By that time, mixed panels of EULEX and local judges had handed down four decisions related to war crimes. Formal investigations were underway in 33 cases and 374 cases were pending at a preliminary investigation stage. EULEX was involved in a total of 46 verdicts since its establishment in 2008. At the end of 2018, EULEX was set to hand over 900 unresolved cases to the local Special Prosecutor's Office, working with only two prosecutors on war crimes. The Human Rights Review Panel, an independent body set up in 2009 to review allegations of human rights violations by EULEX staff, ruled in six cases between January and September 2018 and found all inadmissible. Twenty-five cases were pending before the panel at the end of 2018.¹⁴⁷

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007. See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

¹⁴⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 506–507.

¹⁴⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 509–510.

SEYCHELLES

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

On 1 August 2018, the National Assembly approved a bill that would set up a seven-member Committee on Truth, Reconciliation and National Unity to provide the public with the opportunity to settle past political divisions and grievances that began with the 1977 coup d'état which made the Seychelles a one-party state until 1993.¹⁴⁸

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012, 2016.

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011, 2015–2016, 2018.

The government maintained strict restrictions on the right to peaceful assembly through the Public Order Act, requiring a police permit for any “cause-related” assembly if it was held in a public place, or in a private venue if members of the general public were invited. The definition of what was treated as an assembly was extremely broad and those who failed to obtain the required permits faced criminal charges. Activist Jolovan Wham was prosecuted in 2018 for three counts of violating the Public Order Act for organizing two peaceful protests and a candlelight vigil. On 3 October 2018, performance artist Seelan Palay was convicted of violating the Public Order Act by walking from Hong Lim Park to parliament carrying a piece of art to commemorate the 32 years, since 1989, that political prisoner Chia Thye Poh (1941–) was detained under the Internal Security Act. Seelan was sentenced to two weeks in prison after refusing to pay a fine of S$2,500 (US$1,800).¹⁴⁹

¹⁴⁸ Daniel Laurence, “Seychelles Approves First Committee on Truth, Reconciliation and National Unity,” Seychelles News Agency (2 August 2018).

¹⁴⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 514.

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2013–2015, 2017.

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2018.

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012–2014.

In December 2017, Muse Bihi Abdi was sworn in as president of Somaliland. The Somaliland government arbitrarily arrested numerous journalists and critics—targeting people who spoke out on “controversial issues,” notably the ongoing border tensions with Puntland and unity with Somalia. In April 2018, Naima Ahmed Ibrahim (a popular poet), Mohamed Kayse Mohamud (a blogger), and Boqor Osman Aw-Mohamud (an outspoken traditional elder), were convicted under vague and overly broad criminal provisions for public criticism of government policies and public officials.¹⁵⁰

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012–2018.

In December 2018, the Advertising Regulatory Board ordered fast-food outlet Chicken Licken to withdraw a commercial showing an African explorer conquering Europe in the 17th century. It said colonialism was “traumatic” for Africans and “not open for humorous exploitation.” The advert showed a young African, Big Mjohnana, leaving his village in 1650 and docking his boat in Holland in 1651 (one year before Jan van Riebeeck’s arrival in South Africa). A man called Sandile Cele had lodged a complaint with the board, arguing that the commercial made a “mockery of the struggles of the African people against the colonisation by the Europeans in general, and the persecutions suffered at the hands of the Dutch in particular.” Upholding the complaint, the board said: “While the commercial seeks to turn the colonisation story on its head with Big John travelling to Europe, it is well-known that many Africans were in fact forced to travel to Europe in the course of the colonisation of Africa. They did not leave their countries and villages wilfully. They starved to death during those trips to Europe and arrived there under harsh and inhumane conditions.”¹⁵¹

¹⁵⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 519.

In 2016, after nine years of litigation, the Department of Justice released to the nongovernmental organization South African History Archives (SAHA) the Victims Database of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), holding records of around 22,000 cases that came to the TRC. SAHA transformed the database into a format which can be searched for persons, sources, acts, perpetrators, witnesses and events; it became publicly available in May 2019.¹⁵²

See also Ghana, India, Malawi.

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015–2018.

South Sudan did not make progress on establishing the hybrid court envisioned in the 2015 peace agreement, included in the revitalized agreement. It had yet to sign the memorandum of understanding with the African Union or promulgate legislation to establish the court. In May 2018, President Salva Kiir appointed General Gabriel Jok Riak as chief of defense forces of the Sudan People’s Liberation Army (SPLA). Riak was subject to targeted sanctions by the United Nations, European Union, and United States. In August 2018, Kiir announced an amnesty for Riek Machar and other rebel commanders, a move criticized as contravening international law prohibitions on amnesties for war crimes.¹⁵³

¹⁵¹ “South Africa’s Chicken Licken Colonialism of Europe Advert Banned,” BBC News (18 December 2018).

¹⁵² South African History Archive, Press Release (30 May 2019); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, Newsletter (May 2019), 12.

¹⁵³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 540.

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2018.

In July 2015, the Defense Ministry blocked the declassification of archives dating from the Civil War (1936–1939) and subsequent Franco dictatorship (1939–1975), arguing that it was not a priority in times of crisis. The documents, dating from between 1931 and 1968 and stored in over 10,000 folders, had been classified under the 1968 Law of Official Secrets. Historians had had access to part of them in the 1980s but access was blocked again in 2010. In [September] 2018, the Commission for the Classification of Defense Documents approved a report that recommended that Defense Minister Margarita Robles authorize general access to pre-1968 documents regarded as confidential and kept in the General Military Archive in Ávila (which was one of eight historical archives). The commission's report concluded that the 1968 Official Secrets Act was not retroactive, meaning that no document prior to 28 April 1968, when the law came into force, was legally classified as secret and that, consequently, no declassification was necessary. The report added, however, that there was a provision in the historical heritage law that prevented the public from accessing documents whose release could threaten the security and defense of the state, even if they were not legally classified. In such circumstances, consultations could be authorized by the head of the department in charge of the archives (the defense minister).¹⁵⁴

In October 2018, sculptor and video artist Enrique Terneiro ([1969]–) was filmed painting a red dove and the words “Por la Libertad” (For Freedom) on the tomb of dictator General Francisco Franco (1892–1975). He shouted, “For freedom and the reconciliation of all Spaniards!” as he was grabbed by a security guard.¹⁵⁵

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2018.

The political crisis further slowed progress on ensuring truth and justice for grave rights violations during the 26-year-long civil war (1983–2009) between the separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam

¹⁵⁴ “Franco-era Secrets to Remain Secret, Says Govt,” The Local (25 June 2015); Miguel González, “Spanish Defense Ministry to Release Secret Documents on Civil War and Franco Dictatorship,” El País (19 September 2018).

¹⁵⁵ “Why Franco’s Tomb Is a Headache for Spain’s New Government,” BBC News (31 October 2018).

(LTTE) and government forces. President Maithripala Sirisena's sudden decision to appoint Mahinda Rajapaksa as prime minister raised fears about a return to past abusive practices and a further delay in transitional justice. Rajapaksa stepped down only after the Supreme Court ruled that the president's actions were illegal. After the defeat of the LTTE in 2009, instead of addressing allegations of serious violations by both sides, the Rajapaksa government had suppressed media, targeted rights activists, and continued to arbitrarily detain and torture perceived opponents. The new government that took office after Rajapaksa's electoral defeat in 2015, pledged at the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council to ensure accountability for conflict-related abuses. By 2018, however, while Sri Lanka had acted on some of the human rights-related undertakings, it failed to make much progress on transitional justice. Of the four mechanisms adopted at the UN Human Rights Council—an office on missing persons (OMP); a truth and reconciliation commission; reparations and non-recurrence; and a special court to ensure accountability through prosecutions—only the first had been established, three years later. The OMP published its interim report in September 2018, urging the government to provide interim relief to families of the missing while they waited for the investigations to be completed. The interim report importantly acknowledged that families of the disappeared were having difficulty trusting the OMP, given the government's long history of failed commissions, and called on the government to strengthen the OMP's authority and independence to work free from government interference. The OMP pledged to set up twelve regional offices throughout the country, and emphasized the need for redress, through a proposed Office for Reparations, to families of the disappeared. The government stated that it had drafted a bill on reparations for victims, under the terms of the UN Human Rights Council resolution. However, given the ongoing political uncertainty, it was unclear what future any of the transitional justice mechanisms would have.¹⁵⁶

See also United Kingdom.

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2018.

Amid an ongoing economic crisis, President Omar al-Bashir reshuffled the government twice in 2018 and the ruling National Congress Party endorsed him to run for another term in 2020. Sudan had made no meaningful attempt to provide accountability for past or current abuses in conflict zones or other serious human rights violations. It did not cooperate with the International Criminal Court (ICC) cases on charges against the president and four other men, of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Darfur (2003–present). On 11 April 2019, al-Bashir was ousted in a military coup d'état.¹⁵⁷

¹⁵⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 543, 545.

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012–2013, 2015–2016, 2018.

See also Netherlands.

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013, 2016–2018.

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2017–2018.

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009, 2014, 2016–2018.

See Israel.

¹⁵⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 549.

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2018.

In 2015, archaeologist Ghazwan Yaghi (1970–) and his wife, university librarian Lamis Yaghi, went into exile in the Netherlands after three year’s work in difficult war circumstances (2011–2014) and one year’s unemployment (2014–2015). Yaghi, a specialist of Islamic archaeology during the Mamluk sultanate (1250–1517), had been a director of the History Museum in Damascus. After some uncertain years, he had received a one-year research fellowship from the Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research in 2019.¹⁵⁸

See also Lebanon.

¹⁵⁸ “Vluchteling: In Syrië wás hij iemand – hier heeft Ghazwan Yaghi een tijdelijk contract,” NRC Handelsblad (30–31 March 2019), W10.

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012, 2016–2018.

On 30 December 2018, the Transitional Justice Commission said that it might be unable to review 60,567 classified political files from the Martial Law period (1949–1987) in the National Police Agency (NPA) and National Security Bureau (NSB) archives due to difficulties in the declassification process. The commission was gathering political files relevant to the suppression of democracy and freedom under martial law, which it hoped to cite in a report due in late 2020.

On 25 February 2019, the commission stated that a total of 1,056 people who were killed or unjustly convicted in the crackdown during and after the 2/28 Incident—28 February 1947 with the crackdown that continued until May 1947 leaving an estimated 18,000 to 28,000 people dead—were expected to be exonerated. The total exonerated so far was 3,831. [See also NCH Annual Reports, 2008, 2012, and 2016–2017.]¹⁵⁹

See also China.

TAJIKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2017–2018.

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2016–2017.

See Myanmar, Rwanda, Uganda.

¹⁵⁹ Chen Yu-fu, “Declassification Slowing Justice Process: Source,” Taipei Times (31 December 2018); “Agency to Release Third Exonerations List,” Taipei Times (27 February 2019).

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2018.

Despite evidence showing that soldiers had been responsible for most casualties during the 2010 political confrontations with the United Front for Democracy against Dictatorship (UDD), or “Red Shirts,” that left at least 90 dead and more than 2,000 injured, no military personnel or officials from the government of former Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva had been charged for killing and wounding civilians at the time. At the same time, numerous UDD leaders and supporters had been prosecuted on criminal charges related to the “Red Shirt” street protests in 2010.¹⁶⁰

Shortly before 6 April 2017, a bronze plaque next to a statue of King Chulalongkorn (1853–1910) mysteriously disappeared in Royal Plaza, Bangkok. It marked the end of the absolute monarchy after 1932 (with the inscription “Here on 24 June 1932 at dawn, the People’s Party proclaimed a constitution for the country’s advancement.”). On 6 April 2019, King Vajiralongkorn hosted a ceremony in the throne hall, giving his approval to a new constitution drafted by Thailand’s military rulers. The plaque had been replaced with a new plaque, saying: “To love and respect the Buddhist trinity, one’s own state, one’s own family, and to have a heart faithful to your monarch, will bring prosperity to the country.” Prime Minister Prayuth Chan-ocha dismissed the theft as unimportant and warned not to organize protests about the plaque. One activist who turned up at Royal Plaza to protest was detained; an opposition politician, who posted that the plaque was a national asset and should be protected by law, was charged under the Computer Crimes Act. Six people were arrested for sharing Facebook posts concerning the removal of the plaque. At the end of 2017 they remained imprisoned, facing charges on multiple counts of violation of Article 112 of the Penal Code (the lèse majesté provision).¹⁶¹

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2013, 2015–2018.

¹⁶⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 577.

¹⁶¹ Jonathan Head, “The Mystery of the Missing Brass Plaque,” BBC News (20 April 2017); Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 360; “Thai Coronation Heralds an Unpredictable Reign,” BBC News (7 May 2019).

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2013, 2017–2018.

TRINIDAD and TOBAGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2018.

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2018.

The authorities frequently attempted to impede the work of the Instance Vérité et Dignité (IVD; Truth and Dignity Commission) since its creation in 2013. The IVD was tasked with exposing decades of crimes committed between 1955 (the last year of French rule) and the 2011 uprising that overthrew Ben Ali. In December 2018, the IVD had revealed that it had uncovered 62,720 cases of abuse and held confidential hearings for more than 50,000 of these. The IVD report detailed that the President Beji Caid Essebsi (1926–) was allegedly responsible for crimes committed while serving as a minister in the regime of Habib Bourguiba. Essebsi had reportedly overseen mass arrests and show trials against Bourguiba’s political opponents following an attempted military coup in 1962. In addition, the report alleged extensive corruption by former President Ben Ali, his extended family and wider network and human rights violations including enforced disappearances and torture committed under his rule. The report also included findings from interviews with 1,782 Tunisian resistance fighters of crimes committed by occupying French forces before the end of French rule in 1956. Furthermore, it listed government efforts to prevent the IVD accessing national archives to find evidence of past crimes, as well as pressure from a union of security service workers who rejected IVD efforts to refer members to trial. Essebsi had criticized the commission’s work, stating in 2018 that he was “against settling scores of the past.” Parliament undermined the process of transitional justice by voting not to allow the Truth and Dignity Commission to exercise its prerogative to extend its mandate by one year.¹⁶²

The Transitional Justice Law mandated the Instance Vérité et Dignité (IVD; Truth and Dignity Commission) to transfer serious crimes to specialized chambers to be established within the country’s court system that would “have jurisdiction over widespread or systematic human rights violations, including deliberate killing, rape and sexual violence, torture, enforced disappearance, and execution without fair trial guarantees.” The IVD had referred at least 173 cases to this court system. On 29 May 2018, the first trial of past violations in a specialized chamber opened in the city of Gabes. It related to the forced disappearance of Kamel Matmati, an Islamist activist whom the police arrested in 1991. The commission transferred to the specialized courts 16 other cases of human rights violations, including cases of torture, enforced disappearances, and arbitrary detentions. As of November 2018, no verdicts had been reached.¹⁶³

¹⁶² Ruth Michaelson, “Tunisian President Accused of Complicity in Torture,” Guardian (26 March 2019); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 585–586.

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2018.

In 2013, pianist and composer Fazıl Say was convicted of inciting hatred against Islam following tweets he made, including retweeting a verse from a poem by 11th-century poet Omar Khayyám (1048–1131) who attacked pious hypocrisy. Say was given a ten-month suspended prison sentence before being acquitted in 2016. In 2018, Say’s concerts were canceled in Turkey because of his public defense of secularism.¹⁶⁴

On 25 August 2018, police in Istanbul forcefully broke up a regular peaceful protest by the so-called Saturday Mothers remembering their relatives who disappeared during the violence of the 1990s. Officers used water cannon and tear gas and detained about 50 people. The Saturday Mothers have met in central Istanbul since 1995 and this was to be their 700th protest. The sit-in was banned by the authorities under a new security law because it had been publicized on social media accounts linked to the Kurdistan Workers’ Party (PKK). All those detained were released after giving statements to the police. The disappearances that were the subject of the protests took place during the height of the PKK insurgency. Turkey never investigated what happened to those who disappeared after being detained. Police prevented the Saturday Mothers from holding their sit-ins for a decade between 1999 and 2009 but this was the first time in recent years that police had intervened. The ban on holding the vigil at the traditional location remained in effect at the end of 2018. A Saturday Mothers’ vigil in Diyarbakir was also banned, as were all public assemblies organized by the Diyarbakir branch of the Human Rights Association from September 2018 onward.¹⁶⁵

¹⁶³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 585–586.

¹⁶⁴ Kaya Genç, “Turkey’s Unnatural Selection,” Index on Censorship, 47, no. 3 (autumn 2018), 8.

¹⁶⁵ “Turkey Police Fire Tear Gas at Mothers’ Protest,” BBC News (25 August 2018); Human Rights Watch, World

In September 2018, it was reported that the chapter “Living Beings and the Environment” would take the place of “The Beginning of Life and Evolution” in the standard national textbooks for 15-year-olds from that month on.¹⁶⁶

On 11 January 2016, the Initiative of Academics for Peace issued a petition “We will not be party to this crime,” signed by 1128 scholars from 89 Turkish universities and by more than 300 scholars from abroad (later the number of signatories reached 2212). [See NCH Annual Reports 2016–2017.] It called on the government to end its military operations in southeastern Turkey, including in civilian areas, and to stop violence against civilian Kurds. Shortly after the publication of the appeal, a criminal investigation was opened into the initial signatories, including the following historians:

- Ayşe Gül Altınay: see below.
- Candan Badem: see NCH Annual Report 2017.
- Büşra Ersanlı: see NCH Annual Reports 2012–2013 and 2018.
- Ahmet Ersoya: see below.
- Çigdem Kafescioglu: see below.
- Muzaffer Kaya: see NCH Annual Report 2017.
- Turan Keskin: see NCH Annual Report 2017.
- Ramazan Kurt: see NCH Annual Reports 2016–2017.
- Noémi Lévy-Aksu: see below.
- Zübeyde Füsün Üstel: see below.

Academics for Peace (founded 2012) were at first accused of making propaganda for the PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party) although many of the signatories were neither Kurdish nor pro-PKK. After the coup attempt of 15 July 2016, they were called “Gülenist coupist.s”¹⁶⁷

In January 2019 Ahmet Ersoya, a historian at Bogazici University working on the connections between photography, print culture, and archival practices in the late Ottoman Empire, was scheduled to be tried on charges of membership of a terrorist organization for signing the 2016 peace petition, risking five to Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 591; Toon Beemsterboer, “Zelfs de Zaterdagmoeders mogen van Erdogan niet meer betogen,” NRC Handelsblad (28 November 2018), 7.

¹⁶⁶ “Turkish Schools to Stop Teaching Evolution, Official Says,” Guardian (23 June 2017); Toon Beemsterboer, “Darwin raakt in ongenade in Turkije,” NRC Handelsblad (30 June 2017); Selim Girit, “Are Turkey’s Schools Dropping Evolution and Teaching Jihad?” BBC News (22 August 2017); Kaya Genç, “Turkey’s Unnatural Selection,” Index on Censorship, 47, no. 3 (autumn 2018), 8.

¹⁶⁷ Candam Badem, “The Quest to Quell Opposition Leads to ‘Academocide’,” University World News (10 February 2017).

ten years' imprisonment. His wife Çigdem Kafescioglu, an urban historian, was charged with fifteen months' imprisonment for "conducting terrorist propaganda through the peace petition," but the punishment was suspended while she was put on probation for five years.¹⁶⁸

On 25 February 2019, the Istanbul Regional Appeals Court upheld the 15-month sentence of historian and political scientist (Zübeyde) Füsun Üstel, originally imposed on 4 April 2018 for signing the 2016 petition. Üstel was tried under charges of "conducting propaganda for a terrorist organisation" (article no. 7.2 of Anti-Terror Law no. 3713). She was the first academic to refuse the legal provision offered by the courts when prison sentences are less than two years. The provision involved a "statement of penitence" by the defendant and suspension of the pronouncement of judgment for a period of five years, during which the defendant was supposed to refrain from committing further "crimes." She was imprisoned on 8 May 2019.

Üstel, a retired professor from Galatasaray University in Istanbul, published a series of articles in Turkey-based and international journals of social sciences, mostly focusing on the history of Turkey, nationalism, and identity issues. Among her works are Citizenship Education from the Constitutional Monarchy until Today (in Turkish; Istanbul 2016, 7th edition) and Turkish Homes (in Turkish; Istanbul 2017, 4th edition).¹⁶⁹

On 21 May 2019, Ayşe Gül Altınay, professor of cultural anthropology and director of the Gender and Women's Studies Center at Sabancı University in Istanbul, was charged with "knowingly and willingly supporting a terrorist organization as a non-member" and sentenced to 25 months in prison for signing the 2016 petition. Since her prison term is over two years, it was not deferred. She appealed the sentence. Altınay's research and writing focused on militarism, nationalism, violence, memory, gender, and sexuality. It includes The Grandchildren: The Hidden Legacy of Lost Armenians in Turkey (2014, with Fethiye Çetin), Gendered Wars, Gendered Memories: Feminist Conversations on War, Genocide and Political Violence (2016, with Andrea Petö), and Women Mobilizing Memory (co-edited with Maria José Contreras, Marianne Hirsch, Jean Howard, Banu Karaca, and Alisa Solomon).¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁸ Ahmet Ersoya, personal communication (17 January 2019).

¹⁶⁹ Emily Seymour, "Turkish Academic Who Signed Peace Petition Set To Go To Prison for 15 Months," Index on Censorship (26 March 2019); Research Institute on Turkey and Others, "Open Letter in Support of Prof. Füsun Üstel and All Other Academics in Turkey Facing Imprisonment for Advocating Peace" (12 March 2019); Brendan O'Malley, "Relentless Prosecutions of Academics for Peace Gather Pace," University World News (4 May 2019); Tansu Pişkin, "Sentenced Academic Üstel: 'We are at Where Word Begins, Not Ends'," Bianet (7 May 2019).

¹⁷⁰ Tansu Pişkin, "25-Month Prison Sentence for One Academic," Bianet (21 May 2019); Utrecht Forum for Memory Studies, "Statement of Support for Ayşe Gül Altınay, Turkish Academic for Peace Sentenced to 25 Months in Prison" ([May] 2019); "The Memory Studies Association Stands in Solidarity with Memory Scholar Ayşe Gül Altınay!" ([May] 2019); Mnemonics Network of Memory Studies, "Statement of Support for Ayşe Gül Altınay, Turkish Academic for Peace Sentenced to 25 Months in Prison" (Ghent [May] 2019); "Another Academic for Peace Sentenced to 2 Years, 1 Month in Prison," Committee of Concerned Scientists (30 May 2019).

On 13 June 2019, French-born Turkish historian Noémi Lévy-Aksu, specialized in the history of state security in the late Ottoman Empire and modern Turkey at Boğaziçi University (2010–2017), was sentenced to 30 months in prison for signing the 2016 petition on charges of “terrorist propaganda” (article 7.2 of the Turkish criminal code). She taught at the International Relations Department of the London School of Economics (September 2018–). She appealed the verdict. Already on 22 February 2017, the Council of Higher Education (Yüksek Eğitim Kurulu, YÖK) had canceled her work permit at Boğaziçi University. Besides her book Ordre et désordres dans l’Istanbul ottomane (2013), she published several articles and book chapters on policing and urban history in the late Ottoman Empire. She co-edited The Young Turk Revolution and the Ottoman Empire: The Aftermath of 1908 (2017) and currently works on a manuscript entitled The Power of Discretion: Martial Law in the Late Ottoman Empire and Modern Turkey.¹⁷¹

See also Germany, Netherlands.

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012, 2015–2018.

RFE/RL reporter, Soltan Achilova, who has been assaulted numerous times in previous years, was attacked on multiple occasions. In May 2018, for example, plainclothed security agents threatened her and blocked her access to a public memorial event, which she had sought to photograph.¹⁷²

In July 2018, the Supreme Court upheld the twelve-year prison terms of five men sentenced in 2017 for studying the works of the Turkish Muslim theologian Said Nursi (1868–1960) a Muslim Kurdish scholar, Sufi teacher, and political leader. The men were charged with incitement, financing criminal activity, and related offenses.¹⁷³

Police harassed Batyr Batyrov, a history teacher who had filed official complaints about corruption in education. In August 2018, the Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights (TIHR), an exile group, reported 2019).

¹⁷¹ Hala Kodmani, “Noémi Lévy-Aksu: ‘J’ai été condamnée en Turquie pour “propagande terroriste”,” Libération (17 June 2019); “Noémi Lévy-Aksu: Resisting in the Academic Sphere” 5Harfliler (12 March 2017); Scholars at Risk, Incident (13 June 2019).

¹⁷² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 597.

¹⁷³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 599.

that police issued death threats to Batyrov and his family if he did not stop writing complaints.¹⁷⁴ ¹⁷⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 598.

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2017.

In April 2018, International Criminal Court (ICC) prosecutors completed their case against alleged former Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) commander Dominic Ongwen, charged with 70 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Ongwen's defense began its case in September 2018. Two ICC warrants remained outstanding for the arrest of Joseph Kony, long-time LRA leader and Vincent Otti, who was presumed dead. The LRA remained active in central Africa, but there had been fewer media reports of killings and abductions.

On 30 August 2018, the International Crimes Division (ICD) of the High Court confirmed charges against alleged former LRA commander Thomas Kwoyelo, in custody since his capture in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) in 2009. The trial began in September 2018 but was quickly adjourned until November, when Kwoyelo pled not guilty to all 93 counts against him. Pre-trial sessions in the case against Jamil Mukulu, alleged leader of the rebel Allied Democratic Forces (ADF), captured in Tanzania in April 2015, started at the ICD. Mukulu and 34 others were charged with terrorism, multiple murders, aggravated robbery, and crimes against humanity over several years.¹⁷⁵

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011, 2014–2018.

Justice for conflict-related abuses and crimes committed during the 2014 Maidan protests and mass disturbances in Odessa remained unaddressed several years later, despite numerous pledges from the authorities to ensure justice. Law enforcement failed to preserve evidence after the events and to prevent suspects from fleeing the country. In April 2018, appeals hearings began against the acquittal of 19 anti-Maidan activists who were on trial for offenses related to the 2 May 2014 Odessa mass disturbances, which pitted pro-Maidan and anti-Maidan groups against each other, and in which 48 people died and more than 200 were injured. At the end of 2018, no progress was made in the appeal proceedings. Criminal proceedings continued against former members of the Berkut riot police battalion, charged with killing and injuring protesters in the February 2014 Maidan protests. In April 2018, charges against a pro-Maidan protester, Ivan Bubenchik, for killing two police officers in February 2014 were dropped after the prosecutor general cited a 2014 law exempting protesters from prosecution for certain crimes committed during the protests. Bubinchik remained under investigation for illegal use of weapons and endangering law enforcement.¹⁷⁶

¹⁷⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 604.

In June 2018, Lviv's Memorial of Glory to Heroes Fallen in World War II was vandalized.¹⁷⁷

See also Poland.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2016.

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2018.

In July 2018, students at the University of Manchester painted over a mural of a poem by Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936), the 1907 Nobel Prize in Literature, arguing that the writer “dehumanized people of color.” The poem If, written around 1895, had been painted on the wall of the university's newly refurbished students' union. But students painted over the verses, replacing them with the 1978 poem “Still I Rise” by American poet and civil rights activist Maya Angelou (1928–2014). Sara Khan, the union's liberation and access officer, said that the decision to paint over the mural was “a statement on the reclamation of history by those who have been oppressed by the likes of Kipling for so many centuries, and continue to be to this day.” The act sparked a debate.¹⁷⁸

On 1 and 2 October 2018, the United Kingdom Black History Month website was brought down twice by hackers in what its editors believed to be a case of “cyber-racism.” The website included resources for schools and details of forthcoming events. Black History Month of 2018 attracted significant attention because of the Windrush anniversary (70 years since the arrival of Caribbean migrants on the Empire Windrush ship to the UK), but also because campaigners complained that a number of councils had scrapped the name Black History Month, describing it instead as a celebration of all ethnicities,

¹⁷⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 607–608.

¹⁷⁷ Antony Kalashnikov, “Soviet War Memorials in Eastern Europe Continue to Strain Relations with Russia,” The Conversation (20 August 2018).

¹⁷⁸ Frances Perraudin, “Manchester University Students Paint over Rudyard Kipling Mural,” Guardian (19 July 2018).

leading to accusations of appropriation.¹⁷⁹

On 23 December 2018, researchers reported that a vast cache of material dating from 1939 until the 1980s relating to Britain's nuclear weapons and atomic energy programs had been unexpectedly withdrawn by the National Archives within a week at the instruction of the government's Nuclear Decommissioning Authority.¹⁸⁰

In 2018 it was revealed that around 2008–2010 the Foreign Office destroyed 195 files from 1978–1980, when MI5 and SAS personnel advised Sri Lankan spies and commandos how to counter Tamil guerrillas. In January 2019, the Morning Star disclosed that in 2014–2015 (in the weeks after the Foreign Office apologized for burning files about Britain's abuse of Mau Mau anti-colonial activists in Kenya [see NCH Annual Report 2013]) diplomats shredded another 177 files from 1981–1985 when the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) uprising in Sri Lanka started. Only lists of file names survived, many of them relating to arms sales and counter-insurgency support. One historian, Phil Miller, called it an act of "historical vandalism." In January 2019, he said that the Foreign Office intended to destroy 40 files on Sri Lanka from 1986–1987.¹⁸¹

On 5 June 2019, the video-sharing website YouTube announced that it would remove material glorifying the Nazis from its platform in an attempt to stop people being radicalized. In the process, however, it also deleted archival material related to Adolf Hitler uploaded by some history teachers to help educate future generations about the risks of fascism. Among them were Scott Allsop (with a channel featuring hundreds of historical clips from old documentaries) and Richard Jones-Nerzic. YouTube said that Allsop's and Jones-Nerzic's material had been reinstated after an appeal.¹⁸²

Northern Ireland

In August 2018, the police arrested Belfast journalists Trevor Birney and Barry McCaffrey for their work on No Stone Unturned. This award-winning documentary examined state collusion in the 1994 Loughinisland massacre, when members of the loyalist Ulster Volunteer Force killed six civilians and wounded five others in a pub in County Down. More than a hundred officers turned up at the journalists'

¹⁷⁹ Haroon Siddique, "'Cyber-Racism': UK Black History Month Website Attacked," Guardian (2 October 2018).

¹⁸⁰ Robert Booth, "British Nuclear Archive Files Withdrawn without Explanation," Guardian (23 December 2018).

¹⁸¹ "Britain's Foreign Office Admits to Destroying Hundreds of Files Regarding Start of LTTE Uprising in Sri Lanka," Sunday Times (21 January 2019), Phil Miller, "UK Shredding Sri Lankan Skeletons in the Closet," JDS, (Journalists for Democracy in Sri Lanka) (30 January 2019).

¹⁸² Jim Waterson, "YouTube Blocks History Teachers Uploading Archive Videos of Hitler," Guardian (6 June 2019).

homes accusing them of document theft, under the United Kingdom's Official Secrets Act. Charges were dropped in June 2019.¹⁸³

The British authorities still wanted access to the tapes (interviews given in 2001–2006) of Anthony McIntyre (a former Irish Republican Army [IRA] volunteer who had been imprisoned for the murder of a Ulster Volunteer Force [UVF] member in 1976 and who had a PhD in history) of his activities (his role during the so-called “Troubles” in Northern Ireland). [See NCH Annual Reports 2012–2017.] They served a subpoena on Boston College in the United States seeking copies of the interviews. To that end, the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) and Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) issued an International Letter of Request (ILOR). McIntyre wanted to know if an American court dealing with the case received his affidavit denying involvement in alleged terrorist offenses under investigation.

On 22 October 2018, the High Court ruled that while the ILOR was carelessly composed, this was not due to bad faith. It also ruled that all the tapes should be held in secure storage and under seal at the Royal Courts of Justice pending a the final outcome of the legal challenge. In 2019, McIntyre was granted a United Kingdom Supreme Court hearing in an attempt to stop the PSNI getting hold of the tapes. The Supreme Court was expected to sit in early October 2019.¹⁸⁴

See also China, Egypt, Turkey.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2018.

In December 2017, the State Department Policy Planning Staff denied a request from the State Department Office of the Historian to renew the terms of three members of the Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation (known as the Historical Advisory Committee, or HAC): James McAllister, Thomas Zeiler, and Katherine Sibley. Made up of nine scholars of United States foreign relations, the HAC advises the State Department Office of the Historian on aspects of declassifying and publishing diplomatic papers and documents. No reasons were given for the denial. Concerned, therefore, that the denial of renewal requests was a result of “politicizing a committee of non-partisan, academic experts,” HAC member Robert McMahon, who represented the Society for Historians of ¹⁸³ Ryan McChrystal, “Failing to Face Up to the Past,” Index on Censorship (2019 no. 2), 48–49.

¹⁸⁴ Alan Erwin, “Ex-IRA Man Loses Battle to Stop Police Accessing Interview Tapes,” Irish Times (22 October 2018); Maya Rubin, “Ex-IRA Man Takes Academic Freedom Case to the UK’s Supreme Court,” Index on Censorship website (28 June 2019); Ryan McChrystal, “Failing to Face Up to the Past,” Index on Censorship (2019 no. 2), 49.

American Foreign Relations (SHAFR), resigned from his post in June 2018.¹⁸⁵

When historian Manisha Sinha, the Draper Chair in American History at the University of Connecticut and author of The Slave's Cause: A History of Abolition (2018), compared President Donald Trump with President Andrew Johnson (served 1865–1869) in an op ed published by Cable News Network (CNN) with the headline, “What happened the last time a President chose America’s enemies over its friends,” she received death threats. A man was identified and charged with threatening to commit a crime and making harassing phone calls. In the article she had argued that Trump and Johnson had delusions of personal grandeur and a tainted ascent to the presidency in common.¹⁸⁶

On 29 August 2018, Rutgers University found that James Livingston, professor in its Department of History, violated its discrimination and harassment policy following a string of racially-charged posts made to his Facebook in June 2018. The university was also re-examining the case. On 20 August 2018, the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) wrote to the university to reverse its decision and protect faculty members’ constitutional right to speak as private citizens on matters of public concern. It said that, in accordance with Supreme Court precedent, an employee’s speech was protected if he was speaking as a citizen, it involves matter of public concern, or the government lacked “adequate justification” for treating the employee differently than the general public. On 5 September 2018, the American Historical Association wrote to Rutgers University objecting “to the university investigating and considering sanctions against Professor Livingston for comments made wholly outside of the context of his university employment and extraneous to his role as teacher and historian.” It defended the right of historians to express their opinions as private citizens without fear of institutional discipline.¹⁸⁷

In 2018, there was an outcry after the International Congress on Medieval Studies—held in Kalamazoo and organized by the Medieval Institute at Western Michigan University—rejected a number of panels proposed by the group Medievalists of Color. An open letter, signed by more than 600 scholars, denounced the organizers for “a bias against, or lack of interest in, sessions that are self-critical of medieval studies, or focused on the politics of the field in the present, especially relative to issues of ¹⁸⁵ Seth Denbo, “Request Denied: History Faces an Uncertain Future at the State Department,” Perspectives on History (27 August 2018).

¹⁸⁶ Manisha Sinha, “What Happened the Last Time a President Chose America’s Enemies over Its Friends,” CNN (27 July 2018); Rick Shenkman, “Manisha Sinha Got Death Threats after Writing an Article Comparing Donald Trump to Andrew Johnson,” History News Network (30 July 2018).

¹⁸⁷ Emily Rolen, “Rutgers History Professor Calls Out ‘Caucasian Aholes,’ Resigns from White Race in Facebook Rant,” Philly Voice (5 June 2018); Christian Zapata & Ryan Stiesi, “Rutgers Reexamines Decision on Racially Charged Facebook Posts Made by History Professor,” Daily Targum (3 September 2018); American Historical Association, “Letter of AHA President Mary Beth Norton to Rutgers President Robert Barchi” (10 September 2018).

decoloniality, globalization, and anti-racism.” The panels about race that were accepted, some scholars noted, were organized by white scholars.¹⁸⁸

In October 2018, the provost of Augsburg University, Minnesota, suspended its professor of history and medieval studies Phillip Adamo for using the N-word during a class discussion about a James Baldwin book, The Fire Next Time, in which the word appeared—and for sharing essays on the history of the word with students who complained to him about it. The suspension letter, dated January 2019, cited “issues” raised by students related to bias and discrimination, respect for students, teaching competence, and program leadership. The American Association of University Professors wrote a letter of protest arguing that the suspension “appeared to have been primarily based on classroom speech that was clearly protected by principles of academic freedom.”¹⁸⁹

On 14 January 2019, judge Michael Graffeo of the Jefferson County Circuit in Alabama, ruled that a 2017 state law barring the removal or alteration of historical monuments wrongly violated the free speech rights of local communities, especially in the mostly black city of Birmingham (70% of the population was black). The state law meant to prevent the removal of Confederate monuments from public property. The state had sued Birmingham after its officials had tried to remove an obelisk that was erected to honor Confederate veterans in a downtown park in 1905. Rather than toppling the stone marker, the city had built a wooden box around it in August 2017. The state intended to appeal the ruling.¹⁹⁰

On 17 January 2019, the Army published a long-awaited two-volume study of the United States war in Iraq (2003–2011) that criticized decisions of some of the most senior officers and outlined lessons from the conflict. Written by a team of army officers, it was commissioned in 2013 by General Ray Odierno, when he was serving as the Army chief of staff, and a draft was finished by June 2016. Publication of the history had been stymied, as senior officials worried about the study’s impact on the reputation of prominent officers and congressional support for the Army. The study, totaling more than 1,300 pages, was posted on the U.S. Army War College website, along with more than 1,000 declassified documents used in the research. It drew conclusions about the United States failure to train Iraqi forces so that they could become self-reliant; the limitations of coalition warfare; and Washington's inability to deter Iran and Syria from giving sanctuary and support to militant groups.¹⁹¹

¹⁸⁸ Jennifer Schuessler, “Medieval Scholars Joust With White Nationalists. And One Another,” New York Times (5 May 2019); Steering Committee of the BABEL Working Group and Others, “Open Letter to the Board of the Medieval Institute at Western Michigan University and the Organizers of the International Congress on Medieval Studies” (s.l. 2018); Tom Bartlett, “Medieval History Goes to War With Itself,” Chronicle of Higher Education (28 June 2019).

¹⁸⁹ Colleen Flaherty, “Professor Is Suspended for Using the N-word in Class in Discussion of Language from James Baldwin Essay,” Inside HigherEd (1 February 2019).

¹⁹⁰ Jay Reeves, “Judge Overturns Alabama Law Preventing Removal of Confederate Monuments,” Time (15 January 2019).

In January 2019, Dearborn Mayor Jack O'Reilly blocked publication of an issue of the city-funded Dearborn Historian because it carried a ten-page cover story entitled "Henry Ford and 'The International Jew.'" The piece was about industrialist Henry Ford (1863–1947), to mark the 100th anniversary of Ford (who died in Dearborn) buying the Dearborn Independent weekly newspaper, which he used as a vehicle for his anti-Semitism. On 30 January 2019, O'Reilly also dismissed the magazine's editor Bill McGraw (who authored the piece). On 31 January, the Dearborn Historical Commission passed a (non-binding) resolution that supported the article and McGraw, and asked O'Reilly to allow the magazine to be mailed to subscribers. On 25 January 2019, the Deadline Detroit published the story, which spread far beyond the magazine's small circulation, with O'Reilly's order to suppress it further stoking interest.¹⁹²

On 11 February 2019, a judge from the Court of Appeals (Fourth Circuit) ruled that school officials of Charles County, Southern Maryland, had not violated the First Amendment rights of Caleigh Wood ([1998]–). An 11th-grade student at La Plata High School in 2014–2015, Wood had refused to complete a lesson of the world history curriculum on "The Muslim World" that she said had forced her to embrace Islam in conflict with her Christian faith—and the Constitution. The court ruled, however, that the curriculum did not endorse a particular religion "and did not compel Wood to profess any belief."¹⁹³

On 8 April 2019, two persons were arrested on charges of vandalism and ethnic intimidation because on 31 March 2019 they had vandalized The Unsung Founders Memorial dedicated since 2005 to slaves and African-American workers at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, the university police said. The suspects were identified through university police video surveillance footage. They had ties to a group called Heirs to the Confederacy. In August 2018, protesters had toppled a Confederate monument on the campus, called "Silent Sam," seen by many as an emblem of white supremacy. The statue was stored at an undisclosed location on campus.¹⁹⁴

¹⁹¹ Michael R. Gordon, "Army Releases a Critical History of the War in Iraq," Wall Street Journal (17 January 2019).

¹⁹² "Dearborn Mayor Fires Author of Magazine Story about Ford's anti-Semitism," Deadline Detroit (31 January 2019).

¹⁹³ Court of Appeals (4th Circuit), Caleigh Wood versus Board of Education of Charles County and Others: Judgment (2019); Ann Marimow, "Christian Student Challenged a School History Lesson on Islam and Lost in Court," Washington Post (13 February 2019).

¹⁹⁴ Mihir Zaveri, "2 Arrested in Vandalism of Slave Memorial at University of North Carolina," New York Times (8 April 2019).

See also Canada, China, Ecuador, Egypt, Germany, Hungary, Iran, Japan, Lebanon, New Zealand, Romania, Russia, Saudi Arabia, South Sudan, United Kingdom, Yemen.

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013, 2015–2018.

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2014, 2016.

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011, 2015.

On 25 March 2019, the entire board of Women Church World (founded 2012; a monthly supplement in the Vatican daily L'Osservatore Romano)—consisting of eleven women including founder Lucetta Scaraffia (1948–)—resigned citing in an open letter to Pope Francis a campaign to discredit them and put them “under the direct control of men.” Scaraffia declared that pressure on her staff had intensified after it had published reports about sexual abuse of nuns by other members of the clergy. She added that the daily’s new editor, Andrea Monda, had tried to control the supplement’s editorial line and bring in external collaborators. Monda denied this. Scaraffia was a historian at La Sapienza University in Rome and a journalist.¹⁹⁵

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012, 2014, 2017–2018.

Since former Attorney-General Luisa Ortega Díaz had been dismissed in August 2017, no official information had been available about prosecutions of officials implicated in human rights violations. The United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) reported in June 2018 that impunity for human rights abuses in Venezuela was “pervasive.” In July 2017, Ortega Díaz’s office was investigating nearly 2,000 cases of people injured during the 2017 crackdown. In more than half of the cases, prosecutors had evidence suggesting fundamental rights violations, according to official sources. The OHCHR reported that 357 security officers were under investigation for alleged extrajudicial killings during raids of the Operation Peoples’ Liberation (OLP; launched in 2015 by the government, supposedly to address rising security concerns). The OHCHR said that security forces suspected of extrajudicially killing protesters had in some cases been released, despite judicial detention orders, and that the prosecutors had issued at least 54 arrest warrants for security agents implicated in the killing of 46 people during protests. A trial, though, had started in only one case.¹⁹⁶

On 1 February 2018, agents of the Sebin intelligence service detained Enrique Aristeguieta Gramcko ([1933–]), a lawyer, historian, and former politician, in the middle of the night in Caracas. Aristeguieta

¹⁹⁵ “Vatican Women Editors Resign from Women’s Magazine,” BBC News (26 March 2019); “Lucetta Scaraffia” Wikipedia (retrieved 26 March 2019).

¹⁹⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 648–649.

Gramcko was active in two groups that criticized the Nicolás Maduro government: he was the president of the Great National Alliance (GAN) and a board member of Soy Venezuela. A widely respected figure, he was a member of the Junta Patriótica, a congressman, ambassador to the Caribbean, deputy minister of home affairs, governor of the Nueva Esparta state, and president of the Supreme Electoral Council.¹⁹⁷

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2013, 2016–2017.

In [March] 2019, historian Tran Duc Anh Son (1967–), a former director at a fine arts museum in Hue and a deputy director at the Danang Institute for Socio-Economic Development, was expelled from the Communist Party “for posting false information” and “violating a code that governs party members’ behavior” after two Facebook comments. The first was a comment on a cartoon, which contained a character saying: “Seventy-three years ago they corralled people to a rally to listen to the Declaration of Independence. Seventy-three years later they forbid people to gather to celebrate Independence Day.” This referred to a famous 1945 speech by Ho Chi Minh in which the future president declared Vietnam’s independence from France, and an oblique criticism of the Communist Party’s current leaders, who escalated repression of political dissidents. In September 2018, Son had written underneath the cartoon the question “Is this true?” The second comment was a question he left under a post featuring two articles in the state-run news media about the country’s education minister. The question was: “How have things become this bad?” The Facebook comments prompted a monthlong investigation by the Communist Party Central Committee of Danang.

Son was a specialist of Vietnam’s South China policies, defended the view that Vietnam had irrefutable claims to the disputed Paracel (Hoang Sa) and Spratly (Truong Sa) archipelagos in the South China Sea (East Vietnam Sea) that China claimed as its own, and criticized his government for not doing more to challenge Beijing’s territorial claims. China had controlled the Paracels since 1974, when it seized them from South Vietnam in a naval clash. It had bolstered its foothold in the Spratlys later through an island-building campaign. China sought to justify its claim to sovereignty over waters that encircle both archipelagos—represented by what they now call the nine-dash line—by citing maps from the 1940s and 1950s. Son’s evidence consisted of older maps: he and other Vietnamese historians argued that the Nguyen dynasty, which ruled Vietnam from 1802 to 1945, wielded clear administrative control over the Paracels in the 1850s, decades before imperial or post-revolutionary China showed any interest in them. But Son also said that his government was reluctant to use the records he uncovered to challenge China (Vietnam's next-door neighbor and largest trading partner).¹⁹⁸

¹⁹⁷ UN Watch, “UN Watch Condemns Venezuela Arrest of 85-year-old Activist” (Geneva, 2 February 2018).

When journalist Bui Tin ([1928]–2018), deputy editor-in-chief of the Communist party newspaper Nhan Dan, defected to the West on a visit to Paris in September 1990, he became persona non grata and his role on 30 April 1975 (the day of the Communist victory) remained unmentioned in the country's histories. An army reporter and a senior lieutenant colonel with the North Vietnam army, Bui Tin had been the highest-ranking officer when his team was ushered into the room where the defeated president General Duong Van "Big" Minh was awaiting to transfer power. In November 1990, he wrote "A Petition of a Single, Ordinary Citizen" to the Communist Party, in which he criticized the economic and political situation inside the country. In 1995, his "Following Ho Chi Minh: Memoirs of a North Vietnamese colonel" was published. His death was not mentioned in the Vietnamese press.¹⁹⁹

¹⁹⁸ Mike Ives, "Vietnam's Communist Party Ousts Historian Who Criticized Its China Policy," New York Times (13 March 2019); Mike Ives, "A Defiant Map-Hunter Stakes Vietnam's Claims in the South China Sea," New York Times (25 November 2017).

¹⁹⁹ "Obituary: Bui Tin, the Vietnamese Reporter Scrubbed from the History Books," BBC News (19 August 2018).

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco / Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010, 2013–2016, 2018.

In September 2014, Houthi forces (members of a Northern Yemeni faction) and forces loyal to former president Ali Abdullah Saleh took control of the capital, Sanaa, and much of Yemen. On 26 March 2015, the Saudi-led coalition attacked Houthi-Saleh forces in support of Yemeni President Abdu Rabbu Mansour Hadi. This international armed conflict killed and injured thousands of Yemeni civilians. As of November 2018, 6,872 civilians had been killed and 10,768 wounded, the majority by the United States-supported Saudi Arabia-led coalition airstrikes, according to the Office of the United Nations (UN) High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). The actual civilian casualties were likely much higher. Thousands more had been displaced by the fighting.

None of the warring parties carried out credible investigations into their forces' alleged laws-of-war violations. The coalition's Joint Incidents Assessment Team (JIAT) did not conduct credible investigations. JIAT failed to release full investigation reports or detailed information on their methodology, including how they determined which strikes to investigate, which state's forces participated in attacks they investigated, or what steps, if any, coalition states had taken to prosecute individuals responsible for war crimes. While JIAT had recommended that the coalition pay civilian victims some form of assistance in more than a dozen attacks, the coalition did not appear to have made any concrete progress toward creating a fair, effective redress or condolence payment system. The United States was not known to have conducted investigations into any alleged unlawful attacks in which its forces had taken part. In September 2018, despite attempts by the Saudi-led coalition to terminate the mandate, the UN Human Rights Council voted by a substantial margin to renew the mandate of the Group of Eminent Experts to conduct international investigations into violations and abuses in Yemen. Yemen has not joined the International Criminal Court.²⁰⁰

On 22 August 2018, a fire destroyed the archives of the Awqaf Ministry (in charge of religious "endowments" or properties) in the capital Sanaa. The government blamed the Iran-backed Houthi rebels of looting the ministry, saying the fire aimed to destroy documents on the Awqaf's properties so as to allow the militias to seize these properties.²⁰¹

In the civil war (2015–), many cultural sites were ravaged, archaeological relics lost, and antiquities

²⁰⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2019: Events of 2018 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2019), 661, 667–668.

²⁰¹ "Yemeni Government Condemns Houthis for Burning Awqaf Ministry Archive," Asharq al-Awsat (26 August 2018).

taken from Yemen's museums. In 2019, culture minister Marwan Dammaj circulated a 290-page report in Arabic and English that detailed the looting at the Aden National Museum, the Taiz National Museum (damaged after shelling in 2016), and the National Museum of Zinjibar, and a catalog of 1,631 objects missing from the museums. The list included ivory figurines from the ancient Kingdom of Saba (the mythic realm of the Queen of Sheba); Roman-era golden coins and marble statuettes; brass finials; and Hebrew manuscripts. Mwatana, an independent Yemeni human rights group, cited Houthi forces in the looting of several museums, though it also accused Saudi air forces of bombing cultural sites where they believed Houthi combatants had taken shelter. In February 2019, the Malaysia-based Islamic Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization charged the Houthis with plundering manuscripts, historical texts and Islamic relics from the library of Zabid, Yemen's capital during the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries.²⁰²

²⁰² Tom Mashberg, "Yemen Asks U.S. for Help to Curb Smuggling of Looted Ancient Artifacts," New York Times (6 March 2019).

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2015.

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2015, 2018.

INTRODUCTION

This twenty-fourth *Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, in particular about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists, and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It mainly covers events and developments of 2017 and 2018.

Disclaimer. The fact that the NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

Download this report at:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/18.pdf>

Cite this report as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2018

(<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/18.pdf>).

For the complete set of NCH Annual Reports, see:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content/ar.html>

Or click:

						2018	2017	2016	2015
2014	2013	2012	2011	2010	2009	2008	2007	2006	2005
2004	2003	2002	2001	2000	1999	1998	1997	1996	1995

All Annual Reports (1995–2018) were compiled by Antoon De Baets.

Please send any comments to antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org

AFGHANISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2016.

In a welcome development, the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court requested that a preliminary investigation be opened into crimes allegedly committed by all parties to the ongoing armed conflict in Afghanistan. The decision was an important step toward ensuring accountability for crimes under international law committed since 2003, and providing truth, justice and reparation for the victims.¹

On 28 December 2017, at least 41 people were killed and 84 wounded in a suicide bomb attack in the Shia Tabayan cultural center in West-Kabul where a discussion forum was being held to mark the 38th anniversary of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979. A Shia cultural organization was the target but the Afghan Voice news agency was also hit. Islamic State (IS) said it was behind the attack; it considered Shia apostates and aimed to turn the conflict in Afghanistan into a sectarian war between Sunnis and Shias. President Ashraf Ghani's spokesman described the attack as an "unpardonable" crime against humanity.²

ALBANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2012, 2015–2017.

No measures were taken to locate the body of Remzi Hoxha, a Macedonian Albanian who was forcibly disappeared by National Intelligence Service officials in 1995. No progress was reported toward the exhumation of the remains of around 6,000 people who had disappeared between 1945 and 1991.³

Gentiana Sula, a former deputy minister of social welfare, became the head of the Authority on Access to Information on files of the former secret service Sigurimi [see also NCH Annual Report 2017].⁴

See also Serbia/Kosovo.

¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 41.

² "Afghanistan Suicide Bomb Attack: Dozens Killed in Kabul," BBC News (28 December 2017).

³ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 70.

⁴ Andrew Hosken & Albana Kasapi, "Albania: The Country Searching for Hundreds of Mass Graves," BBC News (1 November 2017).

ALGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001–2017.

The authorities took no steps to open investigations and counter the impunity for grave human rights abuses and possible crimes against humanity, including unlawful killings, enforced disappearances, rape and other forms of torture committed by security forces and armed groups in the 1990s during Algeria's internal conflict (1992–2000), which left an estimated 200,000 people killed or forcibly disappeared. In January 2017, the Swiss judiciary shelved a war crimes investigation against retired Algerian Minister of Defense Khaled Nezzar for events between 1992 and 1994 in Algeria, citing inadmissibility due to the absence of armed conflict in Algeria at the time [see also NCH Annual Reports 2003, 2013].⁵

In February 2017, the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Committee found that the Algerian authorities had violated the right to remedy, the right to life, and the prohibition against torture with regard to Mohamed Belamrania, who was forcibly disappeared and extrajudicially executed in 1995. Days after the UN finding was published, police detained his son, Rafik Belamrania, and charged him with “advocating terrorism on Facebook.” He had filed his father's case before the UN body and documented other cases of enforced disappearance, arbitrary detention, and extrajudicial executions by Algeria's security forces against suspected supporters of the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) party during the internal conflict. In November 2017, he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and fined 100,000 Algerian dinars (around US$ 870).⁶

ANGOLA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2009, 2017.

ARGENTINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2017.

As of November 2017, the Attorney General's Office reported 2,971 people charged, 818 convicted, ⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 72.

⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 72–73.

and 99 acquitted of crimes allegedly committed by the last military junta (1976–1983). Of 613 cases alleging crimes against humanity, judges had issued rulings in 193. Prosecutions were made possible by a series of actions taken in the early 2000s by Congress, the Supreme Court, and federal judges annulling amnesty laws and striking down pardons of former officials implicated in the crimes. As of September 2017, 125 people who were illegally taken from their parents as children during the dictatorship had been located. Many were reunited with their families. The large number of victims, suspects, and cases make it difficult for prosecutors and judges to bring those responsible to justice while respecting their due process rights. The Attorney General’s Office reported in October 2017 that 533 pre-trial detainees and convicted prisoners were under house arrest, a right that Argentine law provides to people older than 70.⁷

Twenty-two years after the 1994 bombing of the Argentine Israelite Mutual Association (AMIA) in Buenos Aires that killed 85 people and injured more than 300, no one has been convicted of the crime. The investigation stalled when Iran, which Argentina’s judiciary suspects of ordering the attack, refused to allow Argentine investigators to interview Iranian suspects in Argentina. In 2013, Argentina and Iran signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) that allowed an international commission of jurists to review evidence and question Iranian suspects – but only in Tehran – likely rendering the interviews inadmissible in an Argentine court. A federal court declared the MOU unconstitutional: the Mauricio Macri administration said it would not appeal. A government decree issued in April 2017 transferred classified documents from the Prosecution Unit to the Ministry of Justice, compromising the independence of the investigation and restricting complainants’ access to evidence. In August 2017, the government said it had asked Interpol to re-issue red notices – a form of international arrest warrant – to detain several Iranians implicated in the attack. In September, Vice-President Gabriela Michetti called on Iran to collaborate with the investigations during her speech at the United Nations General Assembly.

In January 2015, Alberto Nisman, the prosecutor in charge of investigating the bombing, was found dead in his home with a single gunshot wound to the head and a pistol beside him matching the wound. His death came just days after he had filed a criminal complaint accusing then-President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner and her foreign affairs minister of conspiring with Iran to undermine the investigation. Later in 2015, a federal court dismissed Nisman’s complaint. However, following an appeal by a federal prosecutor, in December 2016, the judiciary ordered the case reopened. In October 2017, a judge requested that Fernández de Kirchner provide a statement on the case. As of September 2017, courts had not determined whether Nisman’s death was suicide or murder. A new Gendarmerie report published that month stated that Nisman had been murdered. In 2015, a court began the trial of several officials – including former President Carlos Menem, his head of intelligence, and a judge – for their alleged interference with the initial investigation into the bombing. The trial continued at the end of 2017.⁸

⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 34–35; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 31, 77.

The Supreme Court ruled in the case of Luis Muiña – who was found guilty of crimes against humanity – that one day served in pre-trial detention must be considered as two, if the person has been detained without sentence for more than two years. Congress then passed a law clarifying that the so-called “2x1 formula” may not be applied to crimes against humanity, genocide, or war crimes.⁹

See also United Kingdom.

ARMENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2006, 2010, 2014–2016.

See Netherlands, Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2001, 2003, 2007–2009, 2014–2016.

In May 2017, over 250 Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders from 13 regions met and issued the “Uluru Statement from the Heart,” which urged constitutional reforms, including the establishment of a First Nations voice in the constitution and a truth and justice commission. In October 2017, the government formally rejected the key recommendation of the Referendum Council to establish an Indigenous advisory body to parliament.¹⁰

In August-September 2017, three city councils in Melbourne and Victoria voted to scrap the official Australia Day celebrations (Australia’s official national day marking the anniversary of the arrival of Britain’s first settlers on 26 January 1788) out of respect to Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples. The colonization of Australia was accompanied with genocide and crimes against humanity against the Aboriginal population. Some compared the commemoration to “celebrating the Nazi Holocaust.” Many indigenous Australians referred to “Australia Day” as “Invasion Day,” but some Aboriginal leaders did not support the move. In August 2017, Prime Minister Malcolm Turnbull declared: “An attack on Australia Day is a repudiation of the values the day celebrates: freedom, a fair go, mateship and diversity.” Earlier in 2017, “Invasion Day” protests were held around the country. In the run-up to Australia Day on 26 January 2018, statues of colonizers were stained. At a statue of James Cook (1728–1779), daubed with paint, the message was left: “We do not forget the genocide.”¹¹

⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 37–38; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 77.

⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 77.

¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 49.

In May 2018, family historian Garry Smith discovered that the word Aboriginal being whited out from his great-grandmother's death certificate. He was told by the Western Australian Registry of Births, Deaths, and Marriages that the word had been redacted because it was an offensive term. Western Australia was the only jurisdiction in Australia to deem the word Aboriginal offensive and remove it from historical birth, death and marriage certificates. The Northern Territory registrar-general was the only other Australian bureaucrat to have this power, but he chose only to remove the term “half-caste.” Archivists, genealogists, and historians across Australia protested against the registrar's power to remove terms from certificates.¹²

AUSTRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2005–2007, 2009.

On 5 October 2015, Jewish writer Stephan Templ ([1961–]) began a one year prison sentence for defrauding the state. In 2013, Vienna's regional criminal court had convicted him to three year's imprisonment (later reduced to one year) after he had omitted the name of an estranged aunt in an application on behalf of his mother for the return of property seized in 1938. He said that, given that the state had stolen the property from his family, it was its duty, not his, to track down any relatives.

Templ, a leading critic of Austria's restitution record, caused controversy in 2011 with a book co-written with historian Tina Walzer and entitled Our Vienna: Aryanization Austrian-Style, which documented properties in Vienna – including a sanatorium owned by Templ's relatives, Lothar Fuerth and his wife, apartment buildings, cinemas, and even a ferris wheel – that had been confiscated from their Jewish owners. In 2006, Templ had made the restitution claim. In September 2015, President Heinz Fischer rejected a request for clemency, saying that the punishment was fair because the court had ruled that Templ had “damaged Austria” by his actions. Critics called the decision to imprison Templ an “overreaction” and suggested that it could be linked to his criticism of Austria’s restitution record. Seventy-five Holocaust historians signed a letter urging the government to cancel the sentence.

¹¹ “Australia Day: Council Shifts Celebrations over Sensitivities,” BBC News (16 August 2017); “Australia Day: Council Scraps ‘Grossly Insensitive’ Celebration,” BBC News (14 September 2017); “Australië: beeldenstorm,” NRC Handelsblad (26 January 2018), 6.

¹² Rebecca Turner, “Outcry over Word ‘Aboriginal’ Continues as Historians Push for Ban on Changing Certificates,” ABC News (30 June 2018).

Templ wrote a new (English-language) book, Austria’s Living Ghost (published in late January 2018), partly written in prison. In the book, he examined the work of Austria’s Arbitration Panel for In Rem Restitution, a body set up in 2002 to review the restitution work done immediately after World War II on properties that in 2001 were in the state’s possession. The book reportedly showed that out of nearly 2,000 restitution cases handled in the 1940s and 1950s, the Arbitration Panel reopened and declared unjust a total of only nine cases. It intervened in another 18 cases that had not been the subject of a claim. In his reply to these conclusions, panel chairman Josef Aicher said that “To assess ‘extreme injustice’ the Arbitration Panel has developed a complex case law,” based on “restrictions on freedom of contract and discrepancy in value: the more the two criteria are pronounced, the more likely it is that an extreme injustice exists.” Aicher added that the Arbitration Panel has so far issued 138 recommendations for restitution with an estimated total value of $59 million. According to Templ, all these recommendations pertained to only 28 assets. Citing independent appraisals, Aicher replied that “virtually all real estate that had been confiscated by the state was restituted in its entirety after the war” as well as 60 percent of the properties sold under duress.

In 2018, Templ faced a civil libel suit by Claire Fritsch, a legal adviser to the restitution authority who served as the main witness in his criminal court case. Fritsch claimed that she was libeled by his defense team’s attempts to undermine her testimony.¹³

See also Italy.

AZERBAIJAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–1998, 2008–2013, 2015–2017.

The authorities continued to fail to hold senior officials accountable for torture and other human rights violations committed during and since the 2011 protests.¹⁴

¹³ Jasmine Coleman, “Holocaust Historians Condemn Austria Jailing of Jewish Writer,” BBC News (6 October 2015); “Austrian Historian Writes about Holocaust Restitution – from Prison,” Jerusalem Post (24 January 2018).

¹⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 87.

On 17 May 2017, the Baku Appeal Court ordered human rights activists and historians Leyla and Arif Yunus [see also NCH Annual Reports 2015–2017] to return from the Netherlands to participate in the subsequent court hearings in their case. On 12 June 2017, several human rights organizations launched an appeal to Interpol to prevent the dissemination of an alert against the Yunuses, which would violate the prohibition in Interpol’s constitution against the misuse of its systems for political purposes.¹⁵

¹⁵ “Statement: Prevent Misuse of INTERPOL in the Case of Prominent Azerbaijani Human Rights Defenders” (12 June 2017).

BAHRAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2008–2012, 2015–2017.

BANGLADESH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2017.

In February and March 2018, two mandatory courses were introduced in every department of all universities across the country: “Swadhin Bangladesher Obvyudyer Itihas” [History of the Emergence of Independent Bangladesh], by Muntasir Mamun and Soumitra Shekhar, and “Bangla Bhasa O Sahityo” [Bangla Language and Literature], by Rafiqul Islam and Soumitra Shekhar. The decision had been taken by the University Grants Commission (UGC) in a meeting in June 2016. On 25 February 2018, the UGC presented a copy of the history book to Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. In the book’s introduction, Mamun lamented that the younger generations were not aware of the non-communal and secular character of the country anymore, adding: “This apathy has contributed to the rise of religious fundamentalism and militancy in the country. Without learning the history and origin of Bangladesh, the new generation will forget their roots.”¹⁶

See also Myanmar.

BELARUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2000, 2005–2007, 2009–2011, 2014–2017.

Peaceful protests against a new tax on the unemployed took place in February and March 2017, including on 25 March, Freedom Day, the anniversary of the creation of the Belarusian People’s Republic in 1918, and continued the following day. Police arbitrarily detained at least 700 people in connection with the protests, including about 100 journalists and 60 human rights activists. At least 177 people were charged with fabricated offenses, such as hooliganism or participating in unsanctioned protests, and sentenced to fines or up to 25 days’ detention, following pro forma administrative court hearings. Also in March, authorities arrested 35 people on criminal charges of “organizing mass riots” for the Freedom Day protests. In June, authorities closed this rioting case due to lack of evidence, and released those who had been charged only with rioting.¹⁷

¹⁶ Rashid al Ruhani, “UGC Introduces Two Mandatory Courses in All Universities,” Dhaka Tribune (27 February 2018).

BELGIUM

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

See Burundi, Liberia.

BELIZE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

BOLIVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2017.

Bolivia had prosecuted only a few of the officials responsible for human rights violations committed under authoritarian governments from 1964 to 1982, partly because the armed forces had at times refused to give information to judicial authorities about the fate of people killed or forcibly disappeared. In August 2017, the government established a Truth Commission to carry out non-judicial investigations of grave human rights abuses committed in 1964–1982. It was due to submit a report in 2019. The commander-in-chief of Bolivian armed forces, General Luis Orlando Ariñez, said that the military would fully cooperate. The armed forces created a working group composed of military officers to provide support for the commission, including by granting access to their archives. The commission could provide information for judges to convict those responsible.¹⁸

In early October 2017, at the eve of the 50th anniversary of the death of the Cuban revolutionary, Ernesto “Che” Guevara, a row broke out between the government and army veterans. As Bolivia was a political ally of Cuba, the left-wing government of President Evo Morales was planning a series of ¹⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 72–73.

¹⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 77; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 31, 94.

commemorations but the army veterans who fought Guevara's forces said they would not take part in the official ceremonies and rather would pay homage to the 59 soldiers who had died in the battle against Guevara. In 1966, Guevara had left Cuba to establish guerrilla groups elsewhere in Latin America; he was shot dead in Bolivia on 9 October 1967.¹⁹

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2017.

The domestic prosecution of war crimes committed during the armed conflict of 1992–1995 remained slow, with a backlog of several hundred cases pending before various courts at the end of 2017. Despite recent progress, the prosecutions continued to suffer from lack of capacity and resources, ineffective case-management and persistent political obstruction. The goal to finish the most complex cases in the State Court War Crimes Chamber by the end of 2015 had not been reached. Between January and November 2017, the court delivered 37 verdicts, 20 of them appeals. Out of 37 verdicts, it reached 7 acquittals, 22 convictions, and 8 partial acquittals. The total number of final judgments since the court became fully operational in 2005 stood at 188. A revision of the 2008 National War Crimes Strategy to address key institutional deficiencies and to establish new deadlines for the completion of cases was under way at the end of 2017.

A report in June 2017 by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Mission to Bosnia and Herzegovina identified progress made by national courts in addressing conflict-related sexual violence stemming from the armed conflict. Between 2004 and 2016, 116 such cases were completed across all jurisdictions in the country. As of the end of 2016, 58 cases involving conflict-related sexual violence were ongoing in courts, and 128 cases remained under investigation. There was no progress in the adoption of the Law on Protection of Victims of Torture at the state level by the end of 2017. This law would guarantee a specific set of rights and entitlement for war victims on the whole territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Criminal courts continued the recent practice of granting financial compensation to victims of wartime rape, bringing the number of final judgments awarding financial reparation for war crimes in criminal proceedings to four. However, the compensations had not been paid by the end of 2017. The convicted perpetrators lacked funds and there was no alternative mechanism to compensate survivors of criminal acts. Most victims continued to be required to pursue compensation claims in separate civil proceedings, where they had to reveal their identity and incur additional costs. The 2016 Constitutional ¹⁹ “Bolivia’s Army in Dispute with Government over Che Guevara Homage,” BBC News (3 October 2017).

Court ruling that the statute of limitations applied to reparation claims directed against the perpetrators and not the state – even in war crimes cases – resulted in widespread dismissal of claims in 2017.

Although over 75% of missing persons from the war had been exhumed and identified, there were still 8,000 people missing in connection with the conflict. The process of exhumations continued to encounter significant challenges, including reduced funding and limited expertise. The Law on Missing Persons remained unimplemented, with the Fund for Families of the Missing still awaiting dedicated resources.

Cross-appeals against the conviction and sentence filed in April 2016 by lawyers for Bosnian Serb wartime President Radovan Karadžić and prosecutors at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), in relation to his March 2016 conviction for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, were pending at the end of 2017. On 22 November 2017, the ICTY convicted former Commander of the Republika Srpska Army, Ratko Mladić, of genocide in Srebrenica, war crimes, and crimes against humanity in Bosnia, and sentenced him to life in prison. In August 2017, the Appeal Court acquitted ten people indicted for concealing Mladić, arrested in Serbia in 2011. The ICTY delivered its final judgment on 29 November 2017, bringing to a close its largely successful 23-year effort to hold perpetrators of war crimes to account.²⁰

BOTSWANA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

On 17 July 2017, parliament passed a bill which incorporated the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court into domestic law, including the offenses of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. This followed Botswana's ratification of the Rome Statute in 2000.²¹

BRAZIL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2017.

The perpetrators of human rights abuses during military rule from 1964 to 1985 continue to be shielded

²⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 84–85; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 52, 96, 323.

²¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 98.

from justice by a 1979 amnesty law that the Supreme Court upheld in 2010, a decision that the Inter-American Court of Human Rights quickly ruled violated Brazil's obligations under international law. Since 2012, federal prosecutors had charged more than 40 former military officers and other agents of the dictatorship with killings, kidnappings, and other serious human rights abuses. Lower courts dismissed most of the cases, while the Supreme Court halted two, pending its re-examination of the validity of the amnesty law. In May 2017, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights held a hearing in the case of journalist Vladimir Herzog, who was tortured and killed by state agents in 1975. The court will have to address the 1979 amnesty law again when it decides the Herzog case.²²

BULGARIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2002, 2006, 2009, 2012, 2015–2017.

BURKINA FASO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2004, 2005, 2013, 2015–2017.

Fourteen people awaited trial in connection with the 1987 murder of former President Thomas Sankara, three of whom remained in detention [see also NCH Annual Reports 2001, 2016–2017].²³

The trial of former President Blaise Compaoré and 32 former ministers before the High Court of Justice was repeatedly delayed; in June 2017 it was temporarily suspended by the Constitutional Council. Compaoré was charged with acts of wilful assault, complicity in assault, assassination, and complicity in assassination in relation to the October 2014 uprising. An international arrest warrant for him and his former Chief of Security, Hyacinthe Kafando, remained in place. In May 2017, an international arrest warrant was issued against Compaoré's brother, François Compaoré, in relation to the murder of investigative journalist Norbert Zongo in December 1998. François Compaoré was placed under court supervision in France, where he was living, pending a decision on his extradition to Burkina Faso.²⁴

²² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 97.

²³ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 106.

²⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 106.

BURUNDI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2015, 2017.

In 2007, photographer Teddy Mazina (1972–) returned from exile in Belgium where he had stayed since 1995 because of the civil war (1993–2005). Calling Burundi an “amnesiac country” and himself “an activist of memory,” he started taking pictures to document, with others, nearly 800 cases of forced disappearance, death, rape, or torture. In 2015, he fled Burundi again after the repression following the re-election of President Pierre Nkurunziza.

His work served as evidence for the International Criminal Court, which in November 2017 started an investigation into the crimes against humanity committed in Burundi between April 2015 and June 2017. At least 1200 persons were believed to have died in that period and “thousands” were imprisoned or disappeared.²⁵

On 4 September 2017, the report of the United Nations (UN) Commission of Inquiry on Burundi concluded that there were reasonable grounds to believe that crimes against humanity had been committed since April 2015. On 28 September 2017, the UN Human Rights Council adopted a resolution mandating a team of three experts “to collect and preserve information [...] in cooperation with the Government of Burundi,” and “to make recommendations for technical assistance and capacity building.” On 29 September, the Council also renewed the Commission of Inquiry’s mandate for another year. Burundi’s withdrawal from the International Criminal Court (ICC) came into effect on 27 October 2017. Two days earlier, the Pre-Trial Chamber authorized an investigation into the situation in Burundi between April 2015 and October 2017, a decision made public in November 2017. The African Union (AU) Peace and Security Council did not meet to discuss Burundi in 2017, despite the continued presence of AU human rights observers and military experts in the country at the Council’s request.²⁶

²⁵ Sébastien Hervieu, “Photographie: Un ‘activiste de la mémoire’ contre le régime burundais,” Courrier international (15 January 2018).

²⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 24, 109–110; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 111.

CAMBODIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2017.

At the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), the Co-Investigating Judges issued a joint closing order dismissing the case against Im Chaem in Case 004/1 in February 2017. She was found not to fall within the ECCC’s personal jurisdiction of being a senior leader or one of the most responsible officials during the Khmer Rouge regime (1975–1979). In June 2017, closing statements were made in a second trial of Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan in Case 002. The case against them had been severed by the Trial Chamber of the ECCC in 2011, resulting in two trials on different charges. They faced charges of crimes against humanity, genocide and grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions.²⁷

CAMEROON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2012–2014, 2016.

CANADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000, 2002–2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2009, 2012–2017.

When on 21 September 2017, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau addressed the United Nations General Assembly, he talked about Canada's historic failings regarding indigenous people. He said that Canada’s legacy of colonialism and its lasting impact on First Nations Canadians was one of “humiliation, neglect and abuse.” There were about 1.4 million indigenous people in Canada. In November 2017, Trudeau also apologized to members of the LGBT community for actions the government took through the late 1980s against thousands of workers in the military and the Canadian public service. The government also announced in May 2017 that it would pardon and expunge records for any Canadians who were charged, and who still have on their records, criminal offenses that were no longer on the books.²⁸

See also Poland.

²⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 112.

²⁸ “Justin Trudeau: Canada Humiliated Indigenous People,” BBC News (21 September 2017); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 122.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2009, 2011–2012, 2014–2017.

In May 2017, the National Assembly presented a peace roadmap – which included a national committee of victims and excluded amnesties for war crimes – to the government. In June, the government and 13 of the 14 armed groups signed a peace agreement which included an immediate ceasefire, political representation for armed groups, and the creation of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission. It also incorporated the potential for pardons. In July 2017, the African Union (AU) produced the Roadmap for Peace and Reconciliation in the Central African Republic, which launched a joint mediation.

In May 2017, the United Nations (UN) released a mapping report documenting serious violations of human rights and humanitarian law committed in 2003–2017, finding that some may amount to war crimes or crimes against humanity. The report may aid the work of the Special Criminal Court and future justice mechanisms. In February 2017, President Faustin-Archange Touadéra appointed the court's chief prosecutor, Toussaint Muntazini Mukimapa, the former advisor to the military attorney general of the Democratic Republic of Congo, in a process perceived to be fair and transparent, with external partners observing all discussions. In April 2017, Minister of Justice Flavien Mbata announced the appointment of two international judges, followed by the appointment of five national judges in May. In June, the president appointed a deputy international prosecutor. The Netherlands, the United States, and the UN were the principal donors to the Special Criminal Court, but the court's five-year budget remained only partially covered. The Special Criminal Court also continued to require technical assistance. The Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court (ICC) continued investigations into alleged war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the country. The ICC issued no arrest warrants in 2017. The United Nations Human Rights Council renewed the mandate of the independent expert and scheduled a discussion with the independent expert, the United Nations (UN), African Union (AU), government representatives, and civil society in March 2018 to focus on the impact of the peace and reconciliation process on the human rights situation.

Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, a former vice president of the Democratic Republic of Congo and leader of the Mouvement pour la Libération du Congo (Movement for the Liberation of the Congo), was sentenced to one year's prison and fined €300,000 euros (approximately US$ 353,000) in March 2017 for bribing witnesses during an earlier war crimes trial at the ICC. ICC judges found Bemba and four associates guilty of witness tampering in October 2016. Bemba was found guilty of rape, murder, and pillage in March 2016 for crimes committed in the Central African Republic in 2002 and 2003.²⁹

²⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 125, 130; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 23, 118, 120.

CHAD

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012, 2015–2016.

See Senegal.

CHILE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2017.

Victims of human rights violations during Chile’s military regime (1973–1990) continued to demand truth, justice, and reparation. Although courts had heard hundreds of cases, most of those convicted did not serve prison sentences, and many victims continued to lack access to institutional mechanisms to demand reparation. Congress discussed a bill to make information gathered by former truth commissions available to prosecutors and parties to relevant judicial proceedings. In May 2017, the government filed a bill before Congress to establish a National Mechanism for the Prevention of Torture.³⁰

In June 2017, President Michelle Bachelet publicly apologized to the Mapuche people for all social injustices that their communities had historically endured and that were committed or tolerated by the state. In the context of the current Chilean constitutional-making process, indigenous people demanded the recognition of Chile as a multinational State, collective rights, access to political rights such as self-determination, special political representation, and territorial rights to land, ancestral waters, and natural resources. In 2014, applications of the Anti-Terrorism Law against Mapuche activists were found by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights – in Norín Catrimán et al v. Chile – to be in violation of the American Convention on Human Rights.³¹

In September 2017, the Michelle Bachelet administration submitted a bill to Congress that would lift the 50-year veil of secrecy over testimony given before the National Commission on Political Imprisonment and Torture, known as the Valech I Commission, from November 2003 to May 2004. The commission learned the places in which detention took place and the torture methods used by the dictatorship (1973–1990), and recognized 28,459 victims of political imprisonment and torture (in a second revision, an additional 9,795 new torture victims were recognized). The lifting of the secrecy order generated intense debate among those who believed that opening the testimony to judges investigating human rights crimes violated the victims' privacy and those who claimed that the secret contributed to impunity enjoyed by the guilty.³²

³⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 124–125.

³¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 136; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 124.

CHINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2017.

In [2017], civil law was amended to punish “those who infringe upon the name, likeness, reputation, or honor of a hero or martyr, harming the societal public interest.” The legislation introduced the term “historical nihilism.” Chinese President Xi Jinping perceived independent historians with critical ideas about the official history of the Communist Party and its heroes as producers of “historical nihilism.” In a 2013 speech, he had said that in recent years “hostile forces” at home and abroad had “attacked, vilified and defamed” China’s modern history with the aim of overthrowing the Chinese Communist Party. He believed that sloppiness on the historical front had contributed to the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991.³³

In March 2017, a historical novel, Ruanmai (Soft Burial) (People’s Literature Publishing House, 2016), written by Fang Fang, came under attack from Maoists because in describing the excesses during the land reform in the 1950s, it appeared to sympathize with the landlords. Critics believed that the novel discredited land reform, a major feat of the Communist Party of China, and saw it as a form of historical nihilism. The novel told the story of a dying woman, by following her buried memories and her son’s investigation of his family’s past. The wife of a rich landlord’s son in eastern Sichuan Province in the late 1940s, she witnessed her husband's entire family committing suicide. Many of the landlords and their families were killed or tortured during the campaigns, even after their land was confiscated. The book was not banned.

In 1999, Sichuan writer Xiao Shu had published a book called The Truth of Liu Wencai, trying to evaluate this landlord through a more neutral perspective, but the book had been banned for challenging ³² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 133.

³³ Orville Schell, “China’s Cover-Up: When Communists Rewrite History,” Foreign Affairs (12 December 2017; January–February 2018 Issue); Kiki Zhao, “Chinese Court Upholds Ruling Against Historian Who Questioned Tale of Wartime Heroes,” New York Times (15 August 2016); Carrie Gracie, “The Thoughts of Chairman Xi,” BBC News (13 October 2017); “[Party History and What The People Can’t Be Told \[Update\]](#),” China Digital Times (3 January 2018); Louisa Lim, “A Date (Not) To Forget,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 9.

China's New Democratic Revolution.³⁴

The government also continued to imprison those trying to commemorate peacefully the 4 June 1989 Tiananmen massacre. At least eleven activists were detained in June 2017 for commemorating the massacre; most were accused of “picking quarrels and provoking trouble.” In March 2017, a Sichuan court sentenced artist Chen Yunfei to four years’ imprisonment on charges of “picking quarrels and provoking trouble” in connection with his activities commemorating the massacre. Chen had paid his respects at the grave of Wu Guofeng, a 20-year-old student who had been shot and bayoneted to death by troops in Beijing on 4 June 1989. Four men who printed labels of Tank Man (the young white-shirted man facing down a column of tanks on the Avenue of Everlasting Peace on 4 June 1989) for liquor bottles faced long sentences for “inciting subversion of state power.” Li Xiaoling and Shi Tingfu remained in detention, and Ding Yajun was sentenced to three years’ imprisonment in September 2017.³⁵

At least ten activists were detained for holding memorials for Nobel Peace Prize laureate Liu Xiaobo who died in custody from liver cancer in July 2017 [see also NCH Annual Reports 2010–2011, 2017].³⁶

In the 20 years since Hong Kong came under Chinese rule, the office of the chief executive failed to hand over any official records at all for eight years and the Security Bureau for ten years. The fact that Hong Kong never had a freedom of information law or archives law was widely criticized. In 1994 and 1995, under British rule, the Government House gave nothing to the archives. Activists were anxious that records of sensitive information, such as government decisions during the 2014 pro-democracy street protests, could be destroyed with impunity. In February 2018, Hong Kong democracy activists again demanded that the United Kingdom release tens of thousands of files from Hong Kong. They believed that the files could help defend Hong Kong’s autonomy as Beijing tightened control. Release of the papers, however, was not prioritized. Hong Kong-related records from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) in London dating up to 1989 were available at the National Archives, although large numbers were still closed. In addition, more than a quarter of a million files from the British administration were held as part of a controversial hoard of former colonial documents secretly held at a high-security FCO site, Hanslope Park.³⁷

³⁴ Louisa Lim, “Rewriting History in the People’s Republic of Amnesia and Beyond,” The Conversation (28 May 2018); Zhang Yu, “Novel Exploring Excesses of 1950s Land Reform Draws Criticism from Maoists,” Global Times (22 March 2017).

³⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 140; Louisa Lim, “A Date (Not) To Forget,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 9; Louisa Lim, “Rewriting History in the People’s Republic of Amnesia and Beyond,” The Conversation (28 May 2018); Kevin Lui, “Tens of Thousands in Hong Kong Commemorate the 1989 Tiananmen Massacre,” Time (4 June 2017); Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 37, 127.

³⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 126.

In [July] 2017, Tsinghua University (Qinghua University) in Beijing canceled a history class about the Cultural Revolution which was to be taught in the fall by Tang Shaojie, a professor in the philosophy department. When it first appeared in 1995, the course was entitled “The History of the Cultural Revolution,” but when Tang asked to teach it in 2006, his application was ignored. He could only teach it after changing its name to “Chinese Cultural History of 1966–1976.”³⁸

In August 2017, Shi Jiepeng, a professor of classical Chinese at Beijing Normal University, was sacked for “improper comments”; Shi had called Mao Zedong (1893–1976) a “devil.”³⁹

On 18 August 2017, Cambridge University Press (CUP) confirmed that it had complied with a Chinese instruction (from an import agency) to block online access from China to 315 articles and book reviews from the China Quarterly (without the editorial board’s consent) in order “to ensure that other academic and educational materials ... remain available to researchers and educators in this market.” The list of articles to be blocked was sent by the General Administration of Press and Publications in China to CUP. CUP published the list. It showed that the blocked titles focused overwhelmingly on taboo topics such as the 1989 Tiananmen Massacre, the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), Taiwan, Hong Kong’s fight for democracy, and ethnic tensions in Xinjiang and Tibet. They ranged from material published in the 1960s to materials recently published. Critics called CUP an “active participant in rewriting history.” Louisa Lim, author of a book on Tiananmen, The People’s Republic of Amnesia, said that a search for Tiananmen on the China Quarterly got 50 results overseas, but only five within China. In 2016, China had signed up to the International Publishers Association, which had as one of its guiding principles the freedom to publish. On 21 August 2017, after a wave of protests, CUP abruptly reversed its decision to censor online content and reposted the blocked articles. It made them available free of charge.

The CUP climb-down came as the Journal of Asian Studies, also published by CUP, received a similar instruction from China’s General Administration of Press and Publications concerning some 100 articles. On 21 August 2017, CUP said: “At present no Journal of Asian Studies articles have been removed from CUP website search results in China.”⁴⁰

³⁷ Venus Wu, “Hong Kong’s Vanishing Archives and the Battle to Preserve History,” Reuters (6 September 2017); Tania Branigan, “Hong Kong Democracy Activists Urge UK to Release Unseen Files,” Guardian (4 February 2018).

³⁸ Caroline Roy, “Tsinghua University Cancels Professor’s Cultural Revolution History Class,” Shanghaiist (14 July 2017).

³⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 143.

⁴⁰ “Cambridge University Press Accused of ‘Selling Its Soul’ over Chinese Censorship,” Guardian (19 August 2017); “Cambridge University Press Statement Regarding Content in China Quarterly” (18 August 2017); “List of Censored Titles” (18 August 2017); Yojana Sharma, “China Pressures Respected Journal to Censor Articles,” University World News (18 August 2017); “Cambridge University Press Reverses China Censorship”

On 3 January 2018, the China Digital Times posted presumably leaked internal minutes from a discussion held at the Central Party School in 2010. It did so under the title “[Party History and What The People Can’t be Told \[Update\]](#).” In this discussion, the panelists interpreted a speech delivered by Xi Jinping to the Central Party School in 2010 (prior to his ascendancy to President and General Secretary), in which he explained the limits to be placed on the officially-sanctioned public understanding of Party history.⁴¹

On 25 February 2018, as the Chinese Communist Party proposed removing a constitutional clause in order to extend Xi Jinping’s presidency, words such as “proclaiming oneself an emperor” were suddenly censored. In particular, allusions to Yuan Shikai (1859–1916), who in December 1915 – March 1916 tried to restore the monarchy, were perceived as cryptic references to Xi. Other censored terms were: The Emperor’s Dream (title of a 1947 animated puppet film) and Hundred Days’ Reform (a failed Qing Dynasty reform by the Guangxu Emperor, quashed by a coup carried out by supporters of the Empress Dowager Cixi).⁴²

On 27 April 2018, the “Heroes and Martyrs’ Protection Law” was passed, which prohibited the misrepresentation, defamation, profanation, or denial of the actions of heroes and martyrs, or to praise or beautify invasions. Those found in violation would be investigated for criminal responsibility and punished. The law banned criticism or questioning of the 1949 formation of the People’s Republic by Communist revolutionaries, and prohibited acts that glorified historical events considered unpatriotic, such as Japan’s invasion of China (1931–1945). The law stemmed from the Five Heroes of Langya Mountain case (2013–2016) [see NCH Annual Report 2017].⁴³

In April 2018, a row erupted about the review of history textbooks by a government-appointed panel in Hong Kong. The panelist deemed inappropriate phrases like “China taking back Hong Kong,” “China insisted on taking back Hong Kong’s sovereignty,” “the transfer of sovereignty,” “one-party Move,” BBC News (21 August 2017); Chris Buckley, “After Criticism, Publisher Reverses Decision to Bow to China’s Censors,” New York Times (21 August 2017); Ben Bland, “Curtailing Academic Freedom Is China’s Latest Export to the World,” Financial Times (22 August 2017); Christopher Balding, “China Looks at Western Universities and Smells Weakness,” Foreign Policy (24 August 2017); Yojana Sharma, “CUP Reverses China Censorship after Academic Uproar,” University World News (22 August 2017); Bruce Macfarlane, “Universities Must Stand Up to Chinese Censorship,” University World News (25 August 2017); “Petition Cambridge University Press Not to Censor China Articles”; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 143.

⁴¹ “[Party History and What The People Can’t be Told \[Update\]](#),” China Digital Times (3 January 2018); Amber Ziyue Wang, “Universities Told to Further Embed Chinese Culture,” University World News (5 June 2018).

⁴² Kerry Allen, “China Censorship after Xi Jinping Presidency Extension Proposal,” BBC News (26 February 2018); Oiwan Lam, “China: Riddles and Funny Memes Outwit Online Censors,” Global Voices Advox (13 March 2018).

⁴³ “China Criminalizes Defamation of Revolutionary Heroes,” Deutsche Welle (27 April 2018); Louisa Lim, “Rewriting History in the People’s Republic of Amnesia and Beyond,” The Conversation (28 May 2018).

dictatorship,” and “the city [Hong Kong] is located south of China.” At the same time, a new curriculum framework for teaching Chinese history at Hong Kong junior secondary school levels was announced on 24 April 2018 – with no separate sections on Hong Kong’s past and no mention of the 4 June 1989 Tiananmen Massacre or the 1967 anti-colonial riots. The framework would be implemented progressively in Form One, starting from September 2020.⁴⁴

See also Singapore, Zimbabwe.

COLOMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2004, 2006–2017.

The government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) reached an agreement in 2016 to end their 52-year armed conflict (1964–2016). The Unit for the Victims’ Assistance and Reparation, created in 2011 by Law 1148, recorded a total 8,532,636 victims for the duration of the armed conflict. This included 363,374 victims of threats, 22,915 victims of sexual offenses, 167,809 victims of enforced disappearance, 7,265,072 victims of forced displacement, and 11,140 victims of anti-personnel mines.

Between 28 January and 18 February 2017, 6,803 FARC guerrillas moved into 26 demobilization zones with the support of the United Nations (UN) Monitoring and Verification Mission in Colombia established by UN Security Council resolution 2261 of 2016. In accordance with the Peace Agreement (see below), the UN Security Council adopted resolution 2377 (2017) approving a second verification mission on the political, economic, and social reintegration of FARC members, which commenced on 26 September 2017.

However, civilians continue to suffer serious abuses by the National Liberation Army (ELN) guerrillas and paramilitary successor groups that emerged after a demobilization process a decade ago. Violence associated with the conflict had forcibly displaced more than seven million Colombians since 1985, generating the world’s largest population of internally displaced persons. Human rights defenders, trade unionists, journalists, indigenous and Afro-Colombian leaders, and other community activists faced death threats and violence, mostly from guerrillas and successor groups. Perpetrators of these abuses were rarely held accountable.

⁴⁴ “Changes to History Textbooks Offer Lessons that Must Be Learned,” South China Morning Post (29 April 2018); Peace Chiu, “No Separate Sections on Hong Kong for New History Curriculum, Education Authority Says,” South China Morning Post (25 April 2018); Kimmy Chung, “‘No Political Considerations’ behind Chinese History Curriculum Change, Hong Kong Education Chief Says,” South China Morning Post (26 May 2018).

In February 2017, the government and the ELN started peace talks in Quito, Ecuador, after more than two years of exploratory negotiations. In September 2017, days before Pope Francis's visit to Colombia, the parties agreed to hold a bilateral ceasefire between October 2017 and January 2018. The ELN also agreed to stop certain abuses, including recruiting children under 15 and using antipersonnel landmines. Also in September, "Otoniel," leader of the Gaitanista Self-Defenses of Colombia (AGC), the country's largest paramilitary successor group, said that he was willing to negotiate ending the groups' crimes. The reported negotiations remained confidential at the end of 2017.⁴⁵

Between 2003 and 2006, right-wing paramilitary organizations with close ties to security forces and politicians had undergone a deeply flawed government demobilization process in which many members remained active and reorganized into new groups. These successor groups continued to commit such widespread abuses as killings, disappearances, and rape. At times they benefited from the tolerance and even collusion of state agents. Implementation of the 2005 Justice and Peace Law, which offered dramatically reduced sentences to demobilized paramilitary members who confessed their crimes, had been slow, despite significant progress since 2014. As of July 2016, 182 of the more than 30,000 paramilitary troops who officially demobilized had been sentenced under the law. The convictions covered a small portion of the more than 4,000 defendants seeking the law's benefits. "Parapolitics" investigations and prosecutions of members of Congress accused of conspiring with paramilitaries continued in 2017. From 2006 through August 2015, 63 legislators had been convicted of crimes related to "parapolitics."⁴⁶

Point 5 of the 2016 Peace Agreement created the "Truth, Justice, Reparation and Nonrepetition System," which included the Special Jurisdiction for Peace and judicial mechanisms such as a unit for investigating and dismantling the criminal organizations that succeeded paramilitarism. Point 5 also defined the position regarding reparations for the victims of the armed conflict (1964–2016). In this context, victims of the armed conflict demanded guarantees of access to justice, as well as guarantees of the right to truth and reparation and, especially, of non-repetition of abuses such as forced displacement and sexual violence for Indigenous, Afro-descendant, and peasant farmer communities at risk. These demands had yet to be met, and the agreement's long-term viability was threatened due to the perpetrators of crimes under international law, including war crimes, crimes against humanity, and human rights abuses not being brought to justice. On 27 November 2017, Congress approved the Special Jurisdiction for Peace.

⁴⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 152; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 131; "Colombia Registers 82,998 Disappearances in 59 Years," Telesur (28 February 2018).

⁴⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 153–154; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 131–132.

Individuals responsible for crimes against humanity and serious war crimes who fully cooperated with the new jurisdiction and confessed their crimes would be subjected to up to eight years of “effective restrictions on freedoms and rights,” but no prison time. In December 2016, Congress passed an amnesty law, with the stated purpose of excluding human rights violations from amnesty. The law, however, had language that could allow people responsible for atrocities to benefit from amnesties. As of September 2017, the Constitutional Court was reviewing the law’s constitutionality.⁴⁷

On 9 November 2017, senator and former President Álvaro Uribe Vélez tweeted that the works of Mauricio Archila Neira, a historian at the Universidad Nacional de Colombia and member of Centro de Investigación y Educación Popular (CINEP; Center for Research and Popular Education) were libelous and promoted terrorism. Archila Neira recently became a member of the Comisión para el Esclarecimiento de la Verdad, la Convivencia y la No Repetición (Commission for the Elucidation of Truth, Coexistence, and Non-Repetition), established as part of the peace process between the government and FARC. Uribe Vélez’s remarks were widely condemned by historians in and outside the country. Archila Neira published about 20th-century Colombian social and oral history.⁴⁸

In December 2017, a new law re-established the compulsory teaching of Colombian history in primary and secondary schools. It reversed a 1994 law which had taken history classes off school curricula, making them part of a wider social sciences module together with geography, anthropology, and politics. Viviane Morales, a former senator running for president, had proposed the law, saying “The absence of this subject in the curricula of Colombian schools has led to a sort of amnesia or historic and cultural illiteracy.” A commission of the Ministry of Education would launch a new history curriculum before June 2020.⁴⁹

⁴⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 155–156; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 131–133.

⁴⁸ Álvaro Uribe Vélez, tweet (@AlvaroUribeVel) (9 November 2017); César Augusto Duque Sánchez, personal communication (9 November 2017); Carta de apoyo de historiadores colombianos a Mauricio Archila, “A la opinión pública” (Bogotá, 11 November 2017); Declaración del Grupo de Trabajo CLACSO “Izquierdas latinoamericanas,” “Apoyo a Mauricio Archila Neira ante los ataques recibidos de parte de los enemigos de la paz” (November 2017); CINEP, “¿Quién le teme a la verdad? Comunicado sobre los ataques calumniosos al profesor Mauricio Archila Neira y al Cinep/PPP” (<http://www.cinep.org.co/Home2/component/k2/item/512-quien-le-te-me-a-la-verdad.html>); 15 November 2017).

⁴⁹ Irene Caselli, “Colombia’s New History Test,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 61.

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2000, 2003–2017.

In 2017, Sylvestre Mudacumura, military commander of the Forces démocratiques de libération du Rwanda (FDLR; Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) armed group, remained at large. The International Criminal Court (ICC) issued an arrest warrant against him in 2012 for attacks on civilians, murder, mutilation, cruel treatment, rape, torture, destruction of property, pillage, and outrages against personal dignity, allegedly committed in 2009 and 2010 in eastern Congo. The trial continued at the ICC for Bosco Ntaganda, who was accused of 13 counts of war crimes and five counts of crimes against humanity allegedly committed in northeastern Congo's Ituri province in 2002 and 2003.⁵⁰

See also Central African Republic.

CONGO (Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

COSTA RICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

CÔTE D'IVOIRE

See Ivory Coast.

CROATIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2001, 2003–2013, 2015–2017.

⁵⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 176.

Of the over 6,000 people who went missing during the 1991–1995 war, the fate and whereabouts of more than 1,500 remained unclarified. The International Commission on Missing Persons reported that Croatia failed to make significant steps toward fulfilling the rights to truth, justice, and reparation for victims, including by failing to account for over 900 unidentified mortal remains in its mortuaries.⁵¹

In 2018, there were no formal commemorations of the centenary of the Kingdom of Yugoslavia, founded in 1918.⁵²

CUBA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2002, 2006, 2010–2012, 2015–2016.

In 2016, artist Luis Manuel Otero Alcántara and Yanelys Nuñez Leyva, art curator and staff writer at Revolución y Cultura (a magazine published by the Ministry of Culture), launched the Cuban Museum of Dissidence, a website listing all those who stood up against the government during Cuba’s history (Hatuey, José Martí, Fidel Castro, Oswaldo Payá, etc.). Otero Alcántara was detained twice in 2017 and followed and threatened on several occasions; Nuñez Leyva was dismissed. The museum website was blocked in Cuba. The duo relied on Facebook and other social networks to post information related to the project.⁵³

See also Bolivia.

CYPRUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2005, 2008–2011, 2013, 2015–2017.

In 2017, the Committee of Missing Persons in Cyprus exhumed the remains of 46 people, bringing the total number of exhumations since 2006 to 1,217. Between 2007 and 31 December 2017, the remains of 855 missing individuals (645 Greek Cypriots and 210 Turkish Cypriots) were identified.⁵⁴

⁵¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 138.

⁵² Luka Ostojić, “Another Country,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 15.

⁵³ Irene Caselli, “Tracing a Not Too Dissident Past,” Index on Censorship (2018 no. 1), 28–30.

⁵⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 142.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2010, 2013–2017.

In May 2017, the Council of Europe Commissioner for Human Rights urged the Czech authorities to remove a pig farm from the site of a former Nazi concentration camp, where most of the victims were Roma, in the village of Lety u Písku. While appreciating the government's efforts to buy the land, the commissioner was concerned over the length of the process, and the government's repeated failure to remove the pig farm and create a memorial as a measure of reparation for the Roma who suffered and died there during World War II. In November 2017, the government signed a contract to buy off the land from the owner of the pig farm and made a commitment to build a memorial on the site.⁵⁵

⁵⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 144.

DENMARK

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2007, 2013, 2016–2017.

On 29 January 2018, the former unofficial collaborator of the East German Stasi intelligence service Jan Aage Jeppesen appeared at Copenhagen City court in a defamation case against historian Bent Jensen and publisher Gyldendal over two statements made in the 2014 book Ulve, får og vogtere, I (Wolves, Sheep and Guards I). While admitting to having been a Stasi collaborator (he was paid, inter alia for infiltrating the Ost-West Transfer group, which helped smuggle East German citizens to the West, gave the Stasi a description of Danish security service PET's offices, and took photographs of Polish activists in Copenhagen), Jepessen disputed accusations made in the book that he “caused several East German citizens to end up in East German prisons,” and “spied against Denmark,” for which, he said, there was no evidence. He did not seek legal penalties against Jensen or Gyldendal. The State Prosecution Service had shelved a criminal case against Jeppesen in 2002, stating that it was unlikely he would be convicted and that the case was too old. A verdict was scheduled for 5 March 2018.⁵⁶

DJIBOUTI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

⁵⁶ “Danish Former Stasi Collaborator Sues Historian for Libel,” The Local (30 January 2018).

ECUADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2007, 2009–2017.

A Truth Commission set up by the Rafael Correa administration to investigate government abuses from 1984 to 2008 (from the beginning of the repressive presidency of León Febres Cordero until Correa took office) documented 136 cases of gross human rights violations involving 456 victims, including 68 extrajudicial executions and 17 disappearances. A special prosecutorial unit created in 2010 to investigate the cases had initiated judicial procedures in fewer than ten of them, and progress on those had been slow. The United Nations Committee on Enforced Disappearances noted in March 2017 that no criminal responsibility had been established for 17 cases of enforced disappearances identified by the Truth Commission, and that the whereabouts of 12 of those victims remained undisclosed. In February 2017, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that Ecuador was responsible for an enforced disappearance in 1995 and for failing to conduct a diligent investigation into the case. Despite the fact that the official Truth Commission report had concluded that the victim had been forcibly disappeared, Ecuador denied before the court that state agents were responsible.⁵⁷

See also Colombia.

EGYPT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2001, 2003, 2006–2007, 2010–2017.

Despite an explicit constitutional provision recognizing the Nubian Indigenous People's right to return to their traditional lands, the government continued to deny displaced Nubians the right to access their traditional lands, posing a threat to the preservation of their cultural, historical, and linguistic identity. On 3 September 2017, Nubian activists held a protest calling on the authorities to repeal a 2014 presidential decree that classified 16 villages on traditional Nubian lands as military zones and prohibited residents from living there. The police arrested 25 activists and detained them for three months.⁵⁸

⁵⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 182, 183; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 151.

⁵⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 156.

The eight-grade textbook “Our Arab homeland ... geographic trends and Islamic culture,” published by an independent publisher, showed the Israeli flag instead of the Palestinian one on a map of the Middle East, which caused the Education Ministry in September 2017 to order the removal of the controversial page from the book and bar it from further distribution. The head of the general education department said steps would be taken against the publisher if an investigation found that the textbook did not receive a license from the Education Ministry.⁵⁹

In January 2018, the independent media group Mosireen launched an Internet “resistance archive” (<https://www.youtube.com/user/Mosireen>) named “858” for the number of hours of footage that were shot during the 2011 Revolution (25 January–11 February 2011) and collected by the group. At the time, Mosireen had hoped to use the crowd-sourced videos as evidence against President Hosni Mubarak’s security forces in court, but those trials never came to pass (Courts cleared Mubarak and some of his top aides of any responsibility). In addition, after the 2013 coup, prosecutors used Mosireen’s videos against protesters in court. Members of Mosireen described the act of assembling their video archive as a defense of the revolution’s memory against a regime that wanted to erase history but they also saw the need to balance the publication of the videos with the security of people featuring in them (their risk to be prosecuted). In early 2018, the government also struck all reference to the 2011 and 2013 uprisings from school textbooks.⁶⁰

In [May] 2018, Ahmed Rashwan, a history lecturer at the Teachers’ School of state-run Damanhour University, was suspended. In his book Studies in Modern Arab History, Rashwan reportedly accused the government of President Hosni Mubarak (toppled in 2011) of promoting “religious mania” and political Islamism at the hands of theologians, including influential clerics Metwaly el-Sharawy (?–1998), former minister of religious affairs, and Amr Khaled, a television preacher. The university president ordered an internal investigation into Rashwan’s writings to find out whether he had defamed prominent Muslim clerics. The news of the possible defamation triggered online condemnations and angered Egyptian lawmakers, including Omar Hamrush, who headed the parliament’s religious committee. Rashwan denied the allegations.⁶¹

See also Israel.

⁵⁹ Roi Kais, “Textbook Featuring Israeli Flag Raises Ire in Egypt,” Ynetnews.com (13 September 2017).

⁶⁰ Amir-Hussein Radjy, “How to Save the Memories of the Egyptian Revolution,” The Atlantic (25 January 2018).

⁶¹ Ashraf Khaled, “Lecturer Probed over Alleged Defamation of Top Clerics,” University World News (3 May 2018).

EL SALVADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2017.

Measures were adopted nationally and internationally to redress crimes under international law and punish perpetrators of human rights violations committed during the armed conflict (1980–1992). In May 2017, a court ordered the reopening of the case of Óscar Arnulfo Romero y Galdámez, Archbishop of San Salvador, who was murdered in 1980 by a death squad while celebrating mass. Following a judgment by the Supreme Court in 2016 in which the 1993 Amnesty Law was ruled to be unconstitutional, the Court held a hearing in July to 2017 determine what steps the government had taken to comply with the ruling. In that hearing, both the executive and legislative branches of government admitted to being in contempt of the ruling. In September 2017, the government created a commission to search for people who had been subjected to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict. In November 2017, the United States Supreme Court cleared the way for Colonel Inocente Orlando Montano Morales to be tried in Spain on charges that he conspired in the killing of six Jesuit priests, their housekeeper and her daughter in El Salvador in 1989.⁶²

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

ERITREA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008, 2016.

The right of people to leave Eritrea was severely restricted. The authorities continued to prohibit those aged between five and 50 from travelling abroad, and anyone attempting to leave was subject to arbitrary detention. If caught by the military, they were detained without charge until they paid exorbitant fines. People caught during national holidays to commemorate independence were subject to higher fines.⁶³

⁶² Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's –Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 157–158.

⁶³ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 160.

ESTONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2010, 2015, 2017.

ETHIOPIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2011, 2015–2017.

On 3 September 2017, police broke up the launch party for “Ethiopia,” the fifth album of popular singer Teddy Afro (1976–) (born Tewodros Kassahun). Despite the fact that “Ethiopia” briefly hit no. 1 on Billboard’s world music chart and could be purchased or heard on virtually every street corner in the capital, Addis Ababa, after its May 2017 release, his songs were nowhere to be found on state radio and television. Teddy Afro’s music glorified Amhari rulers such as Emperors Menelik II (1844–1913) and Haile Selassie (1892–1975), in opposition to the nationalism of the ruling Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front, a formerly Marxist guerrilla movement that has ruled the country since 1991 (until 26 April 2018) and which was dominated by a political party from the Tigrayan people. The government promoted Ethiopia’s ethnic diversity and used “unity through diversity” as its slogan. The song – and its criticism of rising ethnic division in Ethiopia – reportedly challenged this official vision.

In 2005, a first confrontation with the government took place when Teddy Afro’s album “Yasteseryal” came out days before an election that descended into violence after the opposition denounced it as rigged. The album was a homage to Haile Selassie, and its lead single “Jah Yasteseryal,” questioning whether the government was improving the country, became a protest anthem. Another album, “Tikur Sew” (2012), was an homage to Menelik II. Among Ethiopia’s largest ethnic group, the Oromos, however, this album was seen as an affront because it glorified an emperor who brutally absorbed Oromo territory into Ethiopia’s borders.⁶⁴

⁶⁴ Paul Schemm, “The World Loves Ethiopian Pop Star Teddy Afro—His Own Government Doesn’t,” Washington Post (17 September 2017); “Teddy Afro,” Wikipedia (12 January 2018); AFP, “Ethiopian Pop Star Teddy Afro Delights Fans,” Enca.com (28 December 2017).

FIJI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006, 2010.

FINLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012, 2017.

FRANCE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1999, 2001–2009, 2011–2014, 2016–2017.

On 15 September 2017, the Constitutional Council ruled that restrictions until 2021 on access to the archives of former President François Mitterand (1916–1996) concerning Rwanda were “justified on the grounds of common interest and are proportional,” citing a law protecting presidential archives for 25 years after the death of a head of state. Genocide researcher François Graner had sought permission to study them after an announcement by the French presidency in April 2015 that its archives on Rwanda for 1990–1995 would be declassified. Graner wrote a book accusing French officers of helping the Hutu militias during the 1994 genocide; France denied any such complicity. Graner called the ruling political. On 14 December 2017, he and Thomas Borrel, member of the association “Survie” submitted a complaint to the European Court of Human Rights.⁶⁵

See also Burkina Faso, Netherlands, Poland, Serbia/Kosovo.

⁶⁵ “Rwanda Genocide: France Keeps 1990s Archives Secret,” BBC News (15 September 2017); “Un chercheur réclame l’ouverture du ‘verrou’ des archives de l’Élysée sur le génocide rwandais,” VOA (13 December 2017); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 457.

GABON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2016.

The International Criminal Court (ICC) continued its preliminary examination into whether alleged crimes committed after May 2016, including in the context of the 2016 presidential elections, could amount to crimes under the Rome Statute, and whether the criteria for opening an investigation were met. In June 2017, ICC representatives conducted a two-day visit.⁶⁶

GAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2016–2017.

The human rights climate in Gambia improved dramatically as the new president, Adama Barrow, and his government took steps to reverse former President Yahya Jammeh's legacy of authoritarian and abusive rule. After winning the December 2016 election and taking office in January 2017, Barrow moved quickly to distinguish his government from Jammeh's, whose security forces used arbitrary arrests, torture, and extrajudicial killings to suppress dissent and independent media during his 21 years in power (1996–2017). The new government promised to make Gambia the "human rights capital of Africa," released scores of political prisoners, and began to strengthen the judiciary and reform the security services. It also reversed Jammeh's planned withdrawal from the International Criminal Court (ICC).

In October 2017, the Ministry of Justice drafted legislation establishing a Truth, Reconciliation and Reparation Commission (TRRC) to document violations committed from 1994 to January 2017 and oversee reparations to victims. On 13 December 2017, the TRRC bill was passed by the National Assembly, following consultation on the bill with national and international actors. The Ministry of the Interior had created a specialized police unit, the Panel on Missing Persons, in February 2017 to investigate enforced disappearances during the Jammeh era. It was expected to submit a list of missing people to be investigated by the TRRC. The bodies of four people suspected of being forcibly disappeared during the Jammeh era were exhumed in March 2017, including opposition activist Solo Sandeng (murdered in April 2016). Ousmane Sonko, minister of the interior from 2006 until he fled the country in September 2016, was being investigated in Switzerland for alleged crimes against humanity committed during the Jammeh era.

⁶⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 169.

In addition, the government had frozen assets suspected of belonging to Jammeh and established a commission of inquiry to investigate Jammeh's alleged abuses of public finances. The commission began hearing evidence in public sessions in August 2017.

Nevertheless, human rights groups were concerned that the government had not taken steps to preserve documentary and physical evidence of security force abuses. In October 2017, Gambian victims, civil society organizations, and international human rights groups formed a coalition to campaign to bring Jammeh and his accomplices to justice.⁶⁷

GEORGIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2003, 2010–2012, 2014, 2016.

GERMANY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–2000, 2003, 2006–2013, 2015–2017.

See Australia, Denmark, Netherlands, Poland, Tajikistan, Turkey, Ukraine.

GHANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2004–2008, 2017.

GREECE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2004–2011, 2013–2017.

On 19 May 2018, the mayor of Thessaloniki, Yiannis Boutaris ([1943–]), was treated in hospital after being beaten up by a group of nationalists angry over his appearance at a remembrance event, a ceremony to mark the killing of ethnic Greeks by Turks in World War I, marking what is known in ⁶⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 235, 237, 240; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 170–171.

Greece as the “Pontic Genocide” (1913–1922).⁶⁸

See also Macedonia.

GRENADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2017.

In April 2017, former dictator Efraín Ríos Montt (1926–2018) was ordered to stand trial for his role in the 1982 Dos Erres massacre, in which army Special Forces killed around 200 civilians. In 2011 and 2012, five former members of the military had been convicted for their roles in the massacre. At the end of 2017, no trial date for Ríos Montt had been set. In May 2013, Ríos Montt had been found guilty of genocide and crimes against humanity for the assassination of over 1,771 Mayan Ixil civilians in 105 massacres, when he was head of state in 1982 and 1983. He had been sentenced to 80 years in prison, but ten days later the Constitutional Court had overturned the verdict on procedural grounds. The retrial began in March 2016 but was suspended two months later. In May 2017, the Constitutional Court ruled that because Ríos Montt was mentally unfit for a public trial, proceedings against him would take place behind closed doors, but those against his co-defendant, José Mauricio Rodríguez Sánchez – the former intelligence director – would be public. The trial date for each defendant had yet to be scheduled at the end of 2017.

Mass protests took place in August and September 2017 and Guatemala faced a political crisis when several members of the government resigned in September, in reaction to President Jimmy Morales’s attempt to expel the head of the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (an independent body established by the United Nations and the Guatemalan government in 2006 to strengthen the rule of law post-conflict).⁶⁹

⁶⁸ “Thessaloniki Mayor Yiannis Boutaris Beaten Up,” BBC News (20 May 2018).

⁶⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 248–249; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 30, 31, 180.

GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2017.

There was progress in the trial proceedings relating to the killing of over 150 peaceful demonstrators and the rape of at least 100 women in the Conakry Stadium in 2009. In March 2017, Aboubacar Sidiki Diakité was extradited to Guinea from Senegal after being at large for several years, and faced charges in connection with the Stadium event. He was the former aide to Moussa Dadis Camara (leader of the military junta in 2009). Several people charged in connection with the killings and rapes retained influential positions, including Mathurin Bangoura, Moussa Tiégboro Camara, and Claude Pivi who were senior officials in the military junta at the time. In November 2017, the investigating judges announced that the judicial investigation had been completed; however, none of the suspected perpetrators had been brought to trial by the end of 2017. In September 2017, a group of victims filed a lawsuit against Sékouba Konaté, who served as Minister of Defense in 2009, as well as transitional President between 2009 and 2010.⁷⁰

GUINEA-BISSAU

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2012, 2015.

GUYANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997.

⁷⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 183.

HAITI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2000–2003, 2006, 2008–2009, 2013–2017.

The United Nations Human Rights Committee called on Haiti to continue investigations into financial and human rights crimes allegedly committed during the tenure of former President Jean-Claude Duvalier (1951–2014) from 1971 to 1986. It called on Haiti to bring to justice all those responsible for serious human rights violations committed during that time. Allegations of violations included arbitrary detentions, torture, disappearances, summary executions, and forced exile. Duvalier died in 2014, six months after the Port-of-Prince Court of Appeal ruled that the statute of limitations could not be applied to crimes against humanity and ordered that investigations against him should continue. As of November 2017, a re-opened investigation into crimes committed by Duvalier’s collaborators remained pending.⁷¹

HONDURAS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998, 2001–2002, 2009–2015.

HONG KONG

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996. See China.

HUNGARY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997, 2004, 2007–2017.

On the instruction of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, the removal and transfer of the manuscripts held at the György Lukács Archives began on 15 January 2018. On 24 May 2018, the last research associate was dismissed [see also NCH Annual Reports 2016–2017].⁷²

⁷¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 253–254.

⁷² “Statement on the Formation of the Lukács Archive International Foundation \(LAIF\) \(Hungarian: LANA\)” (31 August 2016); updates (13 January 2018; 3 June 2018).

INDIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1997, 2000–2017.

The Supreme Court directed the Central Bureau of Investigation to investigate more than 80 alleged extrajudicial executions by police and security force personnel in the state of Manipur between 1979 and 2012, ruling that cases should not go uninvestigated merely because of the passage of time.⁷³

In May 2017, four men were arrested in Chennai and held in administrative detention for more than three months for attempting to stage a memorial for Tamils killed in the civil war in Sri Lanka (1983–2009).⁷⁴

A special investigation team set up in 2015 to reinvestigate closed cases related to the 1984 Sikh massacre closed 241 cases and filed charges in 12 others. In August 2017, the Supreme Court set up a panel comprising two former judges to examine the decisions to close the cases.⁷⁵

On 2 August 2017, the Madras High Court (Tamil Nadu) issued two court orders to ban Internet Archive (<http://web.archive.org>; a digital library allowing people to find archived versions of webpages via a free service called the Wayback Machine) and more than 2,600 other file-sharing websites. The ruling was based on the petitions of two Bollywood production houses, Red Chillies Entertainment and Prakash Jha Productions, to stop file-sharing websites from distributing pirated copies of two recently released Bollywood movies, “Jab Harry Met Sejal,” and “Lipstick under My Burkha.”⁷⁶

In October 2017, Sangeet Som, a lawmaker for the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) in Uttar Pradesh, while addressing supporters in Meerut, called the Taj Mahal a “blot on Indian culture” built by “traitors.” The remarks came weeks after the famous mausoleum, built by Muslim Emperor Shah Jahan in memory of his favorite wife in 1643, was excluded from an Uttar Pradesh tourism booklet. In June 2017, Hindu nationalist Yogi Adityanath, the chief minister of Uttar Pradesh, had said that the Taj Mahal “did not reflect Indian culture.” Both remarks sparked shock and outrage online.⁷⁷

On 27 October 2017, the Additional Sessions court in Pune acquitted 68 members of the Shambhaji

⁷³ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 39.

⁷⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 191.

⁷⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 190.

⁷⁶ Global Voices Advox, “India Bans the Internet Archive over Concerns of Pirated Bollywood Films,” Ifex News (14 August 2017).

⁷⁷ “Indian Politician: ‘Taj Mahal Built by Traitors,” BBC News (16 October 2017).

Brigade, including its former president Anant Chonde, who had been charged with dacoity (an act of armed robbery committed by a gang) and rioting for ransacking the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute (BORI) in Pune in December 2003 during the James Laine affair [See NCH Annual Report 2004]. A total of 72 had been charged but four died during the trial. After examining nine witnesses, the prosecution failed to establish the identities and roles of the actual attackers and if the 72 had been among them.⁷⁸

In November 2017, Hindu groups and a Rajput caste organization called to ban Padmavati, a film that told the story of the fictional 14th-century Hindu queen Padmavati belonging to the high Rajput caste and the Muslim ruler Alauddin Khilji. The movie, based on the 1540 epic poem Padmavat by 16th-century poet Malik Muhammad Jayasi, was directed by Sanjay Leela Bhansali; Bollywood stars Deepika Padukone and Ranveer Singh played the lead roles. The epic extolled the virtue of Padmavati who committed sati (the practice of a widow immolating herself on her husband's funeral pyre) to protect her honor from the invading Khilji who had killed her husband, the Rajput king, in a battle. Rumors of a scene in the film of Khilji dreaming of getting romantic with Padmavati enraged many like the Rajput Karnik Sena, a fringe caste group, who called for the film to be banned. The group disrupted the film set and slapped Bhansali earlier in 2017, vandalized cinemas, and threatened to chop off Padukone's nose (referring to a story in the epic Ramayana where a character has her nose chopped off as punishment). The group also held protests against the film in several states ruled by the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). Rajput community members burned effigies of Bhansali and also sought a ban of the film. Rajasthan Chief Minister Vasundhara Raje said that the film should not be released until "necessary changes [were] made so that sentiments of any community are not hurt." A regional BJP leader announced a reward of nearly 1.5 million dollar for anyone beheading Bhansali and Padukone. Bhansali denied that the film contained such a dream sequence. Many cinemas refused to screen the film. On 19 November 2017, the producers announced that the 1 December 2017 release of the film – the most expensive film ever made in India – had been indefinitely delayed following the protests. On 28 November 2017, the Supreme Court rejected an appeal to block the global release of the film. On 30 December 2017, the Central Board of Film Certification (CBFC) told local media that it had not recommended any cuts. It added, however, that it wanted the film's title to be changed into Padmaavat and two disclaimers to be shown, one saying that the film did not claim historical accuracy and another saying that the film did not promote sati. On 1 January 2018, the general president of the Indian History Congress, historian K. M. Shrimali, said that the RSS and BJP were trying to rewrite history to create a Hindu nation, where minorities were treated as second-class citizens. On 23 January 2018, the Supreme Court ruled that bans on the film in Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh were unlawful.⁷⁹

⁷⁸ "68 Arrested for Ransacking BORI in 2004 Acquitted," Sakal Times \(27 October 2017\); "68 Sambhaji Brigade Men Acquitted of BORI Attack," Pune Mirror \(27 October 2017\); Yogesh Yoshi, "Pune Court Acquits 68 Members of Sambhaji Brigade Accused Of Ransacking Bhandarkar Institute," Hindustan Times \(28 October 2017\).

On 19 January 2018 Minister for Higher Education Satyapal Singh took aim at the theory of evolution. Calling himself “a responsible man of science,” Singh, a chemist, suggested that Darwin’s theory was “scientifically wrong” and “need[ed] to change” in school and university curricula. On 21 January 2018, India’s three science academies released a statement endorsed by more than 2000 scientists, declaring that “it would be a retrograde step to remove the teaching of the theory of evolution from school and college curricula or to dilute this by offering nonscientific explanations or myths.”⁸⁰

On 5 March 2018, a few days after a Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP)-led coalition defeated the Communist Party of India (Marxist) in elections, winning 43 out of 59 seats, BJP supporters allegedly pulled down a statue of Vladimir Lenin in Belonia, state of Tripura. Local BJP leader Raju Nath denied that the excavator used to remove the statue was hired by his party and told The Indian Express that the statue fell because of an “overflow of anger.” It was the first act in a wave of vandalism. On 6 March 2018, BJP leader H. Raja made calls on his Facebook page to destroy the statue of activist Periyar Ramasamy, admired by lower castes, in the state of Tamil Nadu. Hours later, the statue was defaced. On 7 March 2018, district officials in Meerut, state of Uttar Pradesh, discovered a statue of Dalit leader B. R. Ambedkar (1891–1956) in pieces. Dalits blamed upper-caste Tyagis for defacing the statue. On the same day, residents of Kolkata found the damaged and defiled bust of the BJP founder, Syama Prasad Mookerjee. On 8 March 2018, vandals attacked a statue of Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948) in the state of Kerala, breaking its wire-rimmed eyeglasses.⁸¹

On 6 June 2018, Shoma Sen ([1958]–), professor of English at Rashtrasant Tukadoji Maharaj Nagpur University, Nagpur (Maharashtra), and member of the Committee for the Protection of Democratic Rights, was arrested together with four others. Reasons for the detentions were shifting – from an initial accusation of involvement in violence that broke out at the Bhima Koregoan memorial on 1 January 2018, to a charge of being affiliated with Naxal (Maoist) groups, to a charge of plotting an assassination. On 1 January 2018 there had been a commemoration for the 200th anniversary of a battle in which the ⁷⁹ “Padmavati: Why a Bollywood Epic Is Facing Fierce Protests,” BBC News (21 November 2017); “Padmavati: India’s Supreme Court Rejects Bid to Block Bollywood Epic,” BBC News (28 November 2017); “Padmavati: Controversial film ‘Cleared by Indian Censor Board,’” BBC News (30 December 2017); “Distorting History Another Form of Terror, Says Historian,” The Tribune (2 January 2018); Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 191.

⁸⁰ Pallava Bagla, “India’s Education Minister Assails Evolutionary Theory, Calls for Curricula Overhaul,” Science (22 January 2018).

⁸¹ “India Crowd Pulls Down Tripura Lenin Statue after Communist Defeat,” BBC News (6 March 2018); Maria Abi-Habib & Hari Kumar, “As India’s Tensions Boil, Even a Statue of Gandhi Isn’t Safe,” New York Times (10 March 2018).

Dalits helped the British East India Company defeat the local ruling army. The commemoration caused riots between the Dalit and their allies and right-wing Hindu nationalists. Sen and the four others were charged with participation in an alleged left-wing conspiracy. Sen had also been involved in a fact-finding effort to look into an incident in which law enforcement authorities killed 40 people in an anti-Naxal operation in the Gadchiroli district of Maharashtra in April 2018.⁸²

INDONESIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2001–2002, 2004–2013, 2015–2017.

Despite commitments made by President Joko Widodo, Indonesia failed to address past human rights violations. In February 2017, the Administrative Court in the capital, Jakarta, overturned a decision by the Public Information Commission ordering the government to publish a report on the 2004 murder of human rights defender Munir Said Thalib, which reportedly implicated senior intelligence officers. The Court made the decision on the grounds that the current government had not received the report from the previous government. In August 2017, the Supreme Court upheld the Administrative Court's decision.⁸³

In August 2017, police and military personnel forced the cancellation of a public workshop on financial compensation for victims of the massacres of 1965–1966. Security forces “interrogated and intimidated” organizers, claiming that they lacked a permit. On 16 September 2017, police blockaded the offices of the Jakarta Legal Aid Institute to stop a public forum (organized by Bonnie Setiawan) on the 1965 massacre. Police and military officers surrounded the compound, preventing participants from entering the building on the pretext that the organizers lacked a permit for the gathering. Two hundred people were trapped in the building. The next day, an armed mob – several hundred hard-line Islamists, nationalist militia members, and hired local street thugs, armed with rocks and sticks – laid siege to it. Police officers dispersed the mob with warning shots and tear gas. Those attending the event had to be evacuated to safety. The mob – opposed to public discussion of the 1965 massacre of Communists – apparently thought that they were breaking up an illegal gathering of Communist sympathizers. On 18 September 2017, 22 people were arrested for rioting. Five officers were injured in the confrontation.⁸⁴

⁸² Committee of Concerned Scientists, “Chair of English Department at Nagpur University Arrested” (18 June 2018).

⁸³ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 193.

⁸⁴ Reuters, “Anti-communist Mob Attacks Indonesia Meeting, 22 Arrested,” Bangkok Post (18 September 2017); Joe Cochrane, “Indonesia Takes a Step Back From Reckoning With a Past Atrocity,” New York Times (29 September 2017); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 274.

On 16 October 2017, historian A. B. Kusuma said during a discussion at the Indonesian parliament in Jakarta that researchers faced difficulties in accessing primary sources about the Agency for the Preparatory Work for Indonesian Independence (BPUPKI) and the Indonesian Independence Preparation Committee (PPKI).⁸⁵

In October 2017, the National Security Archive, a United States (US) nongovernmental public transparency organization, released 39 declassified documents from the US Embassy in Jakarta showing that US diplomatic personnel had been fully aware of the 1965–1966 massacres. Amnesty International urged the government to use the information contained in these declassified US Embassy documents as new momentum to reveal the truth and deliver justice to survivors. It urged state institutions, including the TNI (Indonesian military) to also open their archives. In a response, Chief Security Minister Wiranto said that the declassified files could not automatically be taken into account in legal proceedings as they need to be examined first.⁸⁶

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2017.

In Iran, the authorities jailed scores of peaceful critics including women’s rights activists, minority rights and environmental activists, trade unionists, lawyers, and those seeking truth, justice and reparation for the mass executions and enforced disappearances of the 1980s.⁸⁷

On 7 August 2016, Xiyue Wang ([1980–]), a fourth-year graduate student in the Princeton University History Department and a China-born naturalized United States citizen since 2009, was detained and confined to Evin Prison in Tehran while in Iran to study Farsi and do Ph.D. research into late 19th and early 20th century Eurasian history, particularly regional governance practices across multiple countries. After he left Iran he was planning to continue his research in Russia. Wang was interested in ⁸⁵ “Researchers Rue on the Difficulty of Accessing Sources from National Archives,” Netralnews.com (17 October 2017).

⁸⁶ Adinda Putri, “Amnesty International Urges Gov’t to Reveal Archives on 1965 Mass Killings,” Jakarta Globe (22 October 2017); National Security Archive, “U.S. Embassy Tracked Indonesia Mass Murder 1965” (17 October 2017); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 276.

⁸⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 56, 197.

archives about the administrative and cultural history of the Qajar dynasty (1785–1925) in Tehran and Mashhad. He spent his first 18 days in solitary confinement. In February 2017, he was charged with two counts of espionage, widely believed to be fabricated. In April 2017 he was convicted and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. On 16 July 2017, the Iranian judiciary's Mizan News Agency said that he was "sent" by Princeton University to "infiltrate" Iran and that he had connections to American and British intelligence agencies. The agency also declared that Wang had illicitly scanned 4,500 pages of digital documents and had done "highly confidential research for the United States State Department, Harvard Kennedy School and the British Institute of Persian Studies." Wang's appeal was denied in August 2017. On 5 December 2017, he was transferred to Ward 7; he was told that he would be with Taliban and other prisoners who have badly beaten him in the past.⁸⁸

See also Argentina, United States.

IRAQ

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2017.

In September 2017, the United Nations (UN) Security Council passed a resolution that was aimed at ensuring accountability for war crimes and human rights abuses committed by Islamic State (IS) in Iraq, but crucially failed to include any provisions to ensure accountability for crimes committed by Iraqi forces, militias, and the United States-led coalition.⁸⁹

In November 2017, writer and activist Saad Salloum (1975–), assistant professor at the College of Political Sciences of Mustansiriyah University and founding member of the Iraqi Council for Interfaith Dialogue, and his colleagues at the Iraqi-based NGO Masarat Foundation for Cultural and Media Development were subjected to death threats by an unknown Islamic armed group through phone calls ⁸⁸ "Academic Statement for the Release of Xiyue Wang" (petition); personal communication Trudy Peterson (18 July 2017); personal communication Eleanor Hubbard (24–25 July 2017); Princeton University, "Frequently Asked Questions about Xiyue Wang" (20 July 2017; updated 28 July 2017); Rick Gladstone, "Iran Sentences U.S. Graduate Student to 10 Years on Spying Charges," New York Times (16 July 2017); Carly Baldwin, "Iran Convicts Princeton Grad Student Of Spying," Princeton Patch (16 July 2017); Mitch Gerber, "Iran Sentences Princeton Ph.D. Student to 10 Years in Prison," The Chronicle of Higher Education (16 July 2017); Saeed Kamali Dehghan, "Iran Sentences Chinese-born American to 10 years in Jail on Spying Charges," Guardian (16 July 2017); AFP, "Iran Sentences Chinese-American Princeton Historian Xiyue Wang to 10 years for Espionage," South China Morning Post (17 July 2017); "Iran Denies Graduate Student's Appeal of 10-Year Sentence," Town Topics (23 August 2017); "Iran Court Upholds 10-year Jail Sentence of US 'Spy'," BBC News (3 September 2017); Hua Qu (Xiyue Wang's wife), "Xiyue Wang Transferred to More Extreme Prison" (5 December 2017).

⁸⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 63.

and letters asking the foundation staff to halt its activities. The Masarat Foundation, coordinated by Salloum, worked to support the rights of minority groups, collective memory studies, and inter-faith dialogue. In 2017, it suffered from two cases of robbery of its archive material and possessions. Among Salloum's books were "Minorities in Iraq: Memory, Identity & Challenges" (2013) and "Êzidîs in Iraq: Memory, Beliefs and Current Genocide" (2016).⁹⁰

See also Kuwait, United Kingdom.

IRELAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000, 2002, 2004, 2006, 2013, 2015–2016.

ISRAEL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000–2003, 2008–2014, 2016–2017.

More than three years after the end of the 2014 Gaza-Israel conflict, in which some 1,460 Palestinian civilians were killed, many in evidently unlawful attacks including war crimes, the authorities had previously indicted only three soldiers for looting and obstructing the investigation. The Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court continued its preliminary examination of alleged crimes under international law committed in the Occupied Palestinian Territories since 13 June 2014, including during the 2014 Gaza-Israel conflict.⁹¹

On 6 March 2017, dozens of Israeli soldiers invaded al-Biereh, near Ramallah (West Bank), and killed the Palestinian pharmacist and historian Bassel al-A'raj ([1986]–2017), who was hiding there, after exchanging fire with him for more than two hours. He was killed from a close range; his corpse was taken to an unknown destination. Al-A'raj had been wanted by the Israeli army for several months, and the soldiers frequently invaded his home, and his family's home, looking for him amidst violent searches. In March 2016, al-A'raj and five other Palestinians had gone missing for a week, but they were later detained and interrogated by the Palestinian Security Forces about their whereabouts. They had declared open-ended hunger strikes in Palestinian prisons until they were released. Shortly after their release, Israeli soldiers abducted four of them but they could not find al-A'raj, who remained "wanted" by the army until he was killed. He was a pharmacist who graduated from an Egyptian university, and worked in this profession near Jerusalem. He was also a historian and a writer who documented the Palestinian revolutions, starting with those from the 1930s against the British occupation, and worked with various youth groups introducing them to the history of Palestine, including through trips to historic sites. He also wrote several detailed articles in support of resistance against the Israeli occupation, and had called for a complete boycott of Israel.⁹²

⁹⁰ PEN International, "Iraq: Fears for Safety of Prominent Iraqi Writer and His Colleagues at Masarat Foundation" (22 November 2017); Masarat Foundation, "Statement," (21 November 2017).

⁹¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 63, 211.

On 6 September 2017, the finance ministry stipulated that two events produced by Einat Weizman at the Jaffa Theater in June and August 2017 met the criteria of the 2011 Nakba law, which gave the finance minister the authority to reduce government funding to organizations that openly rejected the definition of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, or that marked Israel's Independence Day as a day of mourning. At the second event, on 30 August 2017, actors Leora Rivlin and Doron Tavori read transcripts from Palestinian-Israeli poet Daren Tatour's trial. Tatour has been under house arrest for two years while tried on charges of incitement to violence and terrorism and of supporting a terrorist organization. Theater director Igal Ezraty would be summoned to a hearing on reducing the theater's budget for violating the law. The hearing would be conducted by a joint committee comprised of representatives of the ministries of finance, justice and culture and sports, after which Finance Minister Moshe Kahlon was to render a decision. Ezraty said: "[E]vents that we hosted and did not censor ... were recorded and transcribed, every word in them can be heard and we will prove they do not include a call for terrorism, revolt, or violence."⁹³

In January 2018, outgoing Chief Archivist Yaakov Lozowick published a comprehensive report on the state of the government archives and presented it to the High Council of the Archives (the statutory body with limited advisory jurisdiction in archival matters.) Lozowick said that "Israel is not dealing with its archival material in a manner befitting a democracy. The vast majority of the material is sealed and will never be opened. The little of the material that will be made accessible, will be accessible only with unreasonable restrictions. The process of releasing of records lacks any public accountability or transparency." Among the reasons for this situation were fear of exposing war crimes, fear of provoking the "Arab population," fear of harming Israel's image, and a power struggle between the chief archivist and the archives' legal advisor, as well as the Prime Minister's Office. Only some 1.29 percent of state archival material had been made accessible to the public.⁹⁴

⁹² "Israeli Army Kills a Palestinian near Ramallah," IMEMCnews (6 March 2017).

⁹³ Yair Ashkenazi, "Israel Weighs Cutting Funding to Jaffa Theatre over Alleged Incitement," Haaretz (6 September 2017); Ital Mol, "Israel knevelt kritische kunstenaars" NRC Handelsblad (10 October 2017), C3.

⁹⁴ Noam Hofstadter, "What Secrets Is Israel's State Archive Hiding from the Public?" +972 Blog (26 January 2018).

See also Argentina, Egypt, Poland, United States.

ITALY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2003, 2008, 2010, 2012, 2016–2017.

In December 2017, arts activist Laura Ghianda posted a picture of the “Venus of Willendorf” (a famous 11-centimeter 30,000-year-old statuette depicting a naked woman as a fertility symbol) on Facebook. It went viral – and Facebook censored the photo, labeling it, at first, as “dangerously pornographic.” Ghianda messaged that the “war on human culture and modern intellectualism will not be tolerated.” On 28 February 2018, the Natural History Museum in Vienna, where the figurine was on display, expressed its outrage, saying: “An archaeological object, especially such an iconic one, should not be banned from Facebook because of ‘nudity,’ as no artwork should be.” On 1 March 2018, a Facebook spokesperson officially apologized for its censorship of the photo.⁹⁵

See also Poland.

IVORY COAST (Côte d’Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2017.

Ivorian judges continued to investigate crimes committed by both sides during the 2010-2011 post-election crisis, but the deeply flawed trial of former First Lady (and historian) Simone Gbagbo, acquitted on 28 March 2017, raised doubts about Ivorian courts’ ability to effectively try serious human rights cases. Human rights groups acting on behalf of victims refused to participate in Simone Gbagbo’s trial, which was marred both by fair trial concerns and the prosecution’s failure to present sufficient evidence to fully explore her role during the 2010–2011 crisis. Simone Gbagbo was also wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) on four counts of crimes against humanity, but so far the Ivorian government has refused to transfer her to The Hague. Neither Ivory Coast’s Special Investigative and Examination Cell, established in 2011, nor the ICC were investigating crimes committed during election-related violence in 2000 or the 2002–2003 armed conflict.

The ICC trial of former President (and historian) Laurent Gbagbo and the former youth minister and militia leader Charles Blé Goudé for crimes against humanity committed during the 2010–2011 crisis continued in 2017. In July 2017, the ICC Appeals Chamber ordered the Trial Chamber to review its ruling to deny Gbagbo’s provisional release. The ICC also intensified its investigations into crimes committed by pro-Ouattara forces during the crisis, but had yet to issue arrest warrants. President Alassane Ouattara said that all further cases related to the 2010–2011 crisis would be tried in national courts.⁹⁶

⁹⁵ Dagmar Breitenbach, “Facebook Apologizes for Censoring Prehistoric Figurine ‘Venus of Willendorf.’” Deutsche Welle (1 March 2018).

⁹⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 160–162; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 137, 138.

JAMAICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2017.

Jamaica again failed to ratify the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), which it signed in September 2000, nor had it adhered to the United Nations Convention against Torture or the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance.⁹⁷

More than a year after a Commission of Enquiry published its findings into the events that took place in Western Kingston during the 2010 state of emergency that left at least 69 people dead, the government had still not officially responded on how it planned to implement the recommendations, or made a public apology. In June 2017, the Jamaica Constabulary Force completed an internal administrative review into the conduct of officers named in the commissioners' report. However, it found no misconduct or responsibility for human rights violations during the state of emergency.⁹⁸

See also Trinidad and Tobago.

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2017.

Since March 2016, at least 11 national and private junior high schools across Japan had received many postcards and persistent phone calls objecting to their use of Tomoni Manabu Ningen no Rekishi (“Human history we learn together”), a history textbook for junior high schools published by Manabisha in Tokyo mentioning wartime comfort women, which the postcards described as “far left, anti-Japan.” Some of the postcard senders identified themselves as local assembly members or heads of local governments. One school had received more than 200 letters of protest over a six-month period. The textbook, edited by Kodomo to Manabu Rekishi Kyokasho no Kai (Association for History Textbooks to Teach Children), was reportedly the only junior high school history textbook that mentioned the comfort women issue.⁹⁹

⁹⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 216.

⁹⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 215.

⁹⁹ “Schools Hit with Protests for Using History Textbook Mentioning ‘Comfort Women,’” The Mainichi (9 August 2017).

In February 2017, the Japan Federation of Bar Associations pressed the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare to provide a formal government apology and financial compensation to the approximately 84,000 persons mostly with genetic disorder (including 16,500 persons forced to have sterilization surgery) victimized under the Eugenic Protection Act between 1948 and 1996.¹⁰⁰

Reflecting the recent rise of anti-ethnic Korean groups, Tokyo Governor Yuriko Koike, for the first time in a decade, did not send a eulogy to the annual memorial service on 1 September 2017 for ethnic Korean victims of the 1923 Kanto Great Earthquake. Ethnic Koreans (Zainichi) were massacred in the aftermath when demagogues claimed that Koreans were looting and committing arson. Historically, ethnic Koreans had faced widespread social and economic discrimination in Japan, attitudes that persisted in ultra-nationalist political groups.¹⁰¹

In December 2017, President Moon Jae-in of the Republic of Korea (South Korea) made a statement that the 2015 agreement between Japan and South Korea on Japan's Military Sexual Slavery System failed to solve the issue, following the findings of the task force appointed in July to review the deal. The agreement had been criticized by civil society organizations as well as historians for its failure to provide a fully victim-centered approach and to provide an official, unequivocal recognition of responsibility by Japan for serious human rights violations committed by its military against women and girls before and during World War II.¹⁰²

See also Korea, South, United States.

¹⁰⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 303.

¹⁰¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 302.

¹⁰² Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 217.

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004, 2015.

In December 2017, the International Criminal Court (ICC) ruled that Jordan failed to comply with its obligations as a state party to the Rome Statute of the ICC after it did not execute the Court's request for the arrest of Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. The ICC decided to refer Jordan's noncompliance to the Assembly of States Parties of the Rome Statute and to the United Nations Security Council. Jordanian authorities failed to arrest al-Bashir when he visited Jordan in March 2017 for the Arab League summit. The ICC has issued two arrest warrants against him on charges of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity in Darfur, Sudan.¹⁰³

¹⁰³ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 219–220.

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2017.

Impunity for abuses committed during the 2007–2008 post-election violence persisted, after the International Criminal Court (ICC) dropped cases against President Uhuru Kenyatta, his deputy William Ruto, and four others. The government had yet to develop a plan to implement a reparations fund it established in 2015 to support the post-election violence victims. Although it had taken steps to help some victims from the 2007 political violence such as internally displaced persons, the government did not assist rape survivors who still needed medical treatment and financial help. Three men wanted by the ICC since 2013 and 2015 for witness interference in one of the cases had yet to be surrendered. Challenges to the arrest warrants or surrender were pending in Kenyan courts.¹⁰⁴

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011, 2013–2015, 2017.

See Korea, South.

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012–2013, 2016–2017.

South Korea's "North Korean Human Rights Act" came into effect on 4 September 2016. The law required that the government establish a foundation to support research on the human rights situation in North Korea, develop a strategy to promote human rights in the North, fund groups working on issues of North Korean human rights, and create the Center for North Korean Human Rights Records under the Ministry of Unification (MOU) to do research and act as an archive of North Korean human rights violations for possible use in future prosecutions.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 317.

On 11 September 2017, following President Moon Jae-in's order to investigate unanswered questions about the Gwangju Democratization Movement of 18–27 May 1980, the Ministry of National Defense established a special investigation committee chaired by Lee Geon-lee. On 23 October 2017, it reported that the Chun Doo Hwan administration (1980–1988) had launched a top secret fact-finding mission (“80 Commission”) into the May 1980 uprising in June 1985, led by the Agency for National Security Planning, but used it to whitewash the military's repression of anti-government protesters. The 80 Commission manipulated military records on the uprising. A Gwangju White Paper supposedly produced by the 80 Commission had still to be located in the National Intelligence Service archives. Later, in 1988, military authorities ordered the unfavorable parts of 1981 statements about the 21 May 1980 shootings to be deleted before their publication. Also, the Defense Security Command under the administration of Roh Tae-woo, Chun's successor, operated a team to downplay the Chun regime's brutality in suppressing the uprising in order to influence public sentiment during the National Assembly hearings. Allegations that soldiers had been ordered to fire at protesters from a helicopter and that fighter jets armed with bombs had been ready to support the crackdown were not yet resolved. Meanwhile, on 23 October 2017, the May 18 Memorial Foundation said that it would start an excavation at the former site of Gwangju Prison.¹⁰⁶

On 27 October 2017, the Seoul High Court overturned the acquittal of Park Yu-ha, author of a book on the comfort women, fining her US$ 8,846 for defaming victims of Japanese wartime sexual slavery in her book. Stating harmful facts, especially when those facts contravened narratives relevant to Japan's wartime aggressions, was punishable with up to three years in prison or a fine up to US$ 17,849. The court found that Park's research, regardless of whether it was true or not, had harmed the nine plaintiffs by causing them “mental stress” [see also NCH Annual Reports 2016–2017].¹⁰⁷

On 28 December 2017, President Moon Ja-in said that the 2015 deal, in which Japan apologized for the wartime sexual slavery system and promised to give 1 billion yen ($8.6 million) to a fund for Korean women, had deficiencies [see also NCH Annual Report 2017]. A commission who had investigated the deal criticized its secret aspects (including avoidance by South Korea of the term “sexual slavery” and ¹⁰⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 499.

¹⁰⁶ Ser Myo-Ja, “Gwangju Massacre Probe Makes Strides,” Korea Joongang Daily (24 October 2017).

¹⁰⁷ Choe Sang-Hun, “Professor Who Wrote of Korean ‘Comfort Women’ Wins Defamation Case,” New York Times (25 January 2017); David Volodzko, “South Korean Professor Fined for Book about ‘Comfort Women’, Proving the Truth is Still Dangerous,” South China Morning Post (5 November 2017).

removal of a statue outside the Japanese embassy in Seoul).¹⁰⁸

See also Japan.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005.

On 17 December 2016, the Iraqi Defense Ministry pledged high rewards to those who provided credible information about the whereabouts of remnants of Kuwaiti missing persons, and Kuwait's national archive. On 19 September 2017, Kuwait urged the United Nations Assistance Mission in Iraq (UNAMI) to press the Iraqi government to double efforts in the search of the Kuwaiti prisoners and missing persons, as well as property and the national archive.¹⁰⁹

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2013, 2016–2017.

¹⁰⁸ Kjeld Duits, "Zuid-Korea rakelt oude ruzie met Japan weer op," NRC Handelsblad (30–31 December 2017), 8; Annemarie Luck, "No Comfort in the Truth," Index on Censorship (2018 no. 1), 19–21.

¹⁰⁹ "Iraqi Offers Rewards for Information about Kuwaiti POWs, Archive," Kuwait News Agency (17 December 2016); "Kuwait Urges UN to Press Iraq over Prisoners, Nat'l Archive," Kuna.net (20 September 2017).

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008, 2015–2016.

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2017.

Lebanon failed to advance justice or accountability for the families of the estimated 17,000 kidnapped or “disappeared” during the 1975–1990 civil war and its aftermath. In October 2012, Justice Minister Shakib Qortbawi had put forward a draft decree to the cabinet to establish a national commission to investigate the fate of the “disappeared,” but no further action had been taken. In September 2014, the government finally provided the families of the disappeared with the files of the Official Commission of Inquiry appointed in 2000. These showed that the government had not conducted any serious investigation.¹¹⁰

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2015.

Most of the 2009 recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission were yet to be implemented, including a recommendation to establish a criminal tribunal to prosecute crimes under international law, and measures aimed at obtaining accountability and reparation for victims. The Commission was established following human rights violations and abuses carried out during the 14-year civil war (1979–2003). No one had been prosecuted for human rights violations committed during the civil war. However, Mohammed Jabbateh was convicted of perjury and immigration fraud in the United States, in relation to his role in alleged war crimes. Investigations also continued in Switzerland and Belgium into alleged war crimes committed by Alieu Kosiah and Martina Johnson – commanders in rebel groups – who were arrested in Switzerland and Belgium respectively, in 2014.¹¹¹

¹¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 341.

¹¹¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 239.

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2017.

On 26 May 2017, the Tripoli Revolutionaries Brigade, a militia allied with the Interior Ministry of the United Nations-backed Government of National Accord (GNA), overran the al-Hadba Correctional Facility in Tripoli and transferred from there to another location in Tripoli detained Gaddafi-era officials, including former intelligence chief Abdullah Sanussi, former Prime Minister Abuzaid Dorda, and al-Saadi Gaddafi, a son of ousted Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi (ruled 1969–2011).

The prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) has a mandate to investigate war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide committed in Libya since 15 February 2011, pursuant to United Nations Security Council Resolution 1970. In April 2017, the ICC unsealed an arrest warrant for Mohamed Khaled al-Tuhamy, a former chief of the Internal Security Agency under Muammar Gaddafi, for war crimes and crimes against humanity during the 2011 uprising. His whereabouts were unknown at the end of 2017.

Saif al-Islam Gaddafi, another son of Gaddafi, continued to be subject to an arrest warrant issued by the ICC to face charges of crimes against humanity. In 2015, the Tripoli Court of Assize sentenced Gaddafi to death in absentia for crimes committed during the 2011 uprising. The Abu Baker al-Siddiq militia in Zintan, which had held him since 2011, reported it released him on 9 June 2017, citing an amnesty law passed by Libya's parliament. His release could not be confirmed; independent international observers had not seen or heard from Gaddafi since June 2014.¹¹²

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009, 2015.

In 2017, a publishing house reportedly withdrew the books of a prominent historian of the Holocaust [name unknown] after she accused a national hero of complicity in atrocities against Jews during World War II.¹¹³

¹¹² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 346.

¹¹³ David Matthews, "Historians Fear 'Censorship' under Poland's Holocaust Law," Times Higher Education (21 February 2018).

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2015, 2017.

On 17 June 2018, Greece and Macedonia (Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia – FYROM) signed an agreement that aimed to settle a decades-long dispute over Macedonia’s name. Under the agreement, Macedonia would be known as North Macedonia (name of the language: “Macedonian”; name of the inhabitants: Macedonians / citizens of the Republic of North Macedonia). As part of the agreement, Greece would lift its objections to the renamed nation joining the European Union and NATO. Greece had long feared that use of the name Macedonia implied a claim to its northern province also called Macedonia. The agreement still needed approval by both parliaments and by a referendum in Macedonia [see also NCH Annual Reports 1995, 1999, 2006, 2009–2011, 2017].¹¹⁴

See also Albania.

MADAGASCAR

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

In July 2017, the United Nations Human Rights Committee called on Madagascar to immediately provide the National Human Rights Commission with an independent and sufficient budget to enable it to carry out its mandate. It also recommended that the government expedite the establishment of the High Council for the Defense of Democracy and the Rule of Law, whose mission included the promotion and protection of human rights, and provide it with financial autonomy.¹¹⁵

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011, 2016–2017.

See United Kingdom.

¹¹⁴ “Macedonia Name Dispute: PMs Watch as Ministers Sign ‘Historic’ Deal,” BBC News (17 June 2018).

¹¹⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 246.

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2013.

MALI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013–2017.

Efforts to tackle impunity faltered as several high-profile trials related to abuses committed in northern Mali during the 2012–2013 occupation failed to make significant progress. The 2015 peace agreement, which recommended the establishment of an international commission of inquiry to investigate crimes under international law including war crimes, crimes against humanity, and human rights violations, had not been implemented by the end of 2017. Judicial authorities made little progress in ensuring justice for the victims of violations committed during the 2012–2013 armed conflict. The Truth, Justice, and Reconciliation Commission, established by presidential executive order in 2014 with a three-year mandate to investigate crimes and the root causes of violence dating back to 1960, however, made meaningful progress in 2017. The 25-member commission operationalized five regional offices and took over 5,000 statements from victims and witnesses. The credibility of the commission was undermined, however, by government’s inclusion of nine armed group members, while excluding victims’ group representatives.¹¹⁶

The situation in Mali remained under investigation by the International Criminal Court (ICC) since 2012. On 17 August 2017, the ICC ordered Al Mahdi to pay 2.7 million euros (US$ 3.2 million) for damage to the buildings, economic losses and moral harm to victims – primarily the people of Timbuktu, who depend on tourism. The ICC also ordered Al Mahdi to pay the symbolic sum of one euro (US$ 1.17) to Mali and one euro to the international community via UNESCO, which is responsible for World Heritage site cultural listings. The ICC said that the destruction of cultural monuments like those in Timbuktu “carries a message of terror and helplessness. (It) destroys part of humanity's shared memory and collective consciousness, and renders humanity unable to transmit its values and knowledge to future generations." In 2016, Al Mahdi had been convicted of the war crime of intentionally directing attacks against religious and historic buildings in Timbuktu, and sentenced to nine years' imprisonment.¹¹⁷

¹¹⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 362; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 253.

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015.

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011, 2017.

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

¹¹⁷ International Criminal Court, "Ahmad Al Faqi Al Mahdi Makes First Appearance before the ICC" (Press Release; 30 September 2015); Wim Brummelman, "Primeur: Aangeklaagd voor vernietigen werelderfgoed," NRC Handelsblad (30 September 2015); Bert Lanting, "Strafhof berecht jihadist om vernieling graftombes," Volkskrant (28 September 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 345; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 397; "When Cultural Heritage Is under Attack, Human Rights Are under Attack' – UN Expert," UN News Centre (4 March 2016); United Nations Special Rapporteur in the Field of Human Rights, Intentional Destruction of Cultural Heritage (A/HRC/31/59; 3 February 2016); "Islamist Rebel Apologises for Destroying Timbuktu Shrines at ICC Trial," BBC News (22 August 2016); "Mali Islamist Jailed for Nine Years for Timbuktu Shrine Attacks," BBC News (27 September 2016); "Ahmad al-Faqui al-Mahdi: The Vandal of Timbuktu," BBC News (27 September 2016); Lorne Cook, "ICC Orders Mali Extremist to Pay \$3.2 Million in Reparations," AP News (17 August 2017); Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 22, 246; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 253–254; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 421–422; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 363.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2017.

Since 2006, the security forces have carried out widespread enforced disappearances. In August 2017, the government reported that the whereabouts of more than 32,000 people who had gone missing since 2006 remain unknown. Prosecutors and police routinely failed to take basic investigative steps to identify those responsible for enforced disappearances, often telling the missing people's families to investigate on their own. Authorities routinely failed to identify remains of bodies or body parts found in various locations, including in clandestine graves, throughout Mexico.

The federal government pursued potentially promising initiatives to find people who have gone missing, but they produced limited results. In 2013, it created a unit in the Attorney General's Office to investigate disappearances, which became a Special Prosecutor's Office in October 2015. However, the office has made only limited progress in investigating and prosecuting cases of forced disappearance. In 2015, Congress approved a constitutional reform giving it authority to pass general laws on enforced disappearances and torture that would establish a single nationwide definition for each of the crimes and facilitate their prosecution in all 31 states and Mexico City. The law was passed in November 2017. At the end of 2017, its implementation remained pending.¹¹⁸

As of July 2016, the National Human Rights Commission (CNDH) had received almost 10,000 complaints of abuse by the army since 2006 – including more than 2,000 during the administration of Enrique Peña Nieto (2012–2018). It found in more than 100 cases that military personnel committed serious human rights violations. In November 2017, the Chamber of Deputies approved the Law on Internal Security, authorizing military involvement in domestic law enforcement activities – including intelligence gathering – without including meaningful measures to improve accountability. At the end of 2017, the proposal was under discussion in the Senate.¹¹⁹

On 1 February 2017, the Supreme Court of Justice ruled that the families of the more than 1,200 people who disappeared during the “Dirty War” (1968–1982) had the right to access government records with the names “of all those listed as disappeared by the government,” on the grounds that the information requested could not be kept classified when it referred to human rights violations, including disappearances. The court ordered the National Institute of Access to Information and Personal Data to issue a new resolution, ordering the Procuraduría General de la República (PGR; federal prosecutor's office) to disclose the requested information to the claimant, and allowing the claimant to make those names public.

¹¹⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 365–366.

¹¹⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 367; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 29.

At the time of the crimes, systematic attempts to erase records that the disappeared persons ever existed (for example, by destroying birth or school certificates), had reportedly taken place. Some local prosecutors had launched investigations into disappearances, but all ended without any charges being filed, and with the investigative files and the names of the victims being kept secret by the PGR.

After 2003, a request was filed under the access to information law (2003) in order to obtain the names of those disappeared by the government. The PGR refused to release the relevant 135 files, a decision supported by the National Institute of Access to Information and Personal Data overseeing the law. The Open Society Justice Initiative and Litiga OLE then filed a constitutional challenge to this decision with the Supreme Court (an “amparo”) on the grounds that the access to information law included a “human rights override,” stipulating that government agencies could not withhold information related to investigations of human rights violations. The amparo also cited the collective aspect of the right to truth, the right to the recognition of legal personality, and the right to a name for the victims, which must be proportionally weighed in cases on enforced disappearances.¹²⁰

See also Spain.

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2013.

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2017.

¹²⁰ Mariana Mas, “A Victory for the Truth about Mexico’s ‘Dirty War’,” Open Society Foundations (8 February 2017).

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013, 2015–2017.

The authorities failed to take any steps toward addressing impunity for grave violations including systematic torture, enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions in Morocco and Western Sahara between 1956 and 1999, despite the recommendations made by the Equity and Reconciliation Commission transitional justice body in 2005.¹²¹

The Polisario Front again failed to hold to account those responsible for committing human rights abuses in camps under its control during the 1970s and 1980s.¹²²

MOZAMBIQUE

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

Mozambican law enforcement continued its practice of not investigating a range of serious crimes. The cases of ten high-profile figures, including senior opposition members, state prosecutors, and prominent academics, who were either killed or injured in apparently politically motivated attacks in 2016, remained unresolved. Authorities also failed to investigate human rights abuses allegedly committed by government security forces in 2015 and 2016 in relation to clashes with armed men from the former rebel group, now political party, Resistência Nacional Moçambicana (RENAMO; Mozambican National Resistance), such as enforced disappearances, arbitrary arrests, and property destruction. In 2016, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights said that at least 14 RENAMO officials were killed or abducted across the country in the first quarter of 2016.¹²³

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2017.

In 2017, the government failed to adequately investigate and hold to account perpetrators of serious human rights violations in Rakhine State, including crimes against humanity. In November 2017, a ¹²¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 267.

¹²² Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 267.

¹²³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 382.

military investigation concluded that no human rights violations had been committed in Rakhine State following the 25 August 2017 attacks by the armed group Arakan Rohingya Salvation Army (ARSA) and subsequent military campaign against them.¹²⁴

The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights reported that the Myanmar security and armed forces purposely destroyed the property of the Rohingyas, scorched their dwellings and entire villages in northern Rakhine State. The destruction included “an effort to effectively erase all signs of memorable landmarks in the geography of the Rohingya landscape and memory in such a way that a return to their lands would yield nothing but a desolate and unrecognizable terrain. Information received also indicates that the Myanmar security forces targeted teachers, the cultural and religious leadership, and other people of influence in the Rohingya community in an effort to diminish Rohingya history, culture, and knowledge.” Meanwhile, according to Azrin Afrin, a history lecturer at Jahangirnagar University, Dhaka (Bangladesh), historical documents showed that Rohingyas had been living in Rakhine state for centuries, yet the Myanmar government insisted that they were illegal immigrants from Bangladesh, which underpinned their moves to drive them out of Myanmar.¹²⁵

¹²⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 272–273.

¹²⁵ United Nations Human Rights Office of the High Commissioner of Human Rights, Mission report of OHCHR rapid response mission to Cox's Bazar, Bangladesh—13-24 September 2017 (Geneva 2017), 1; Mushfique Wadud, “Universities Take up Rohingya Cause, Call for Research,” University World News (6 October 2017).

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011, 2016–2017.

The trial of eight prisoners of conscience, accused in the long-running Caprivi case [see also NCH Annual Reports 2009, 2011, 2016–2017], resumed in May 2017. The eight were charged and convicted of treason and sedition in 2007. In 2013, the Supreme Court set aside their convictions and sentences ranging from 30 to 32 years and ordered a retrial. However, they remained in detention pending trial, in violation of international fair trial standards, at the end of 2017.¹²⁶

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2017.

The transitional justice process was plagued by a lack of political will from all parties, as well as the military. At least 13,000 people had been killed and over 1,300 forcibly disappeared during the civil war (1996–2006), yet political leaders continued to neglect calls for accountability. The government did not amend the Investigation of the Disappeared Persons, Truth and Reconciliation Commission Act 2014 as ordered by the Supreme Court in 2014 and 2015. By the end of 2017, two bodies – the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and the Commission of Investigation on Enforced Disappeared Persons (CIEDP) – had respectively collected over 60,000 and 3,000 complaints of human rights violations, such as murder, torture, and enforced disappearances committed by state security forces and Maoists during the conflict. Effective investigations did not take place. An acute shortage of resources and capacity adversely affected the ability of the two bodies to deliver truth, justice, and reparation. Political parties resisted amending transitional justice laws in what was widely perceived as a prioritization of reconciliation and monetary compensation over truth, justice, and other reparations, including guarantees of non-repetition. No effective investigations had taken place into the hundreds of killings of demonstrators by security forces since 1990 in various parts of Nepal. In August 2017, the commissions began preliminary investigations into the more than 65,000 complaints they received. However, reports of flawed implementation, including lack of transparency and weak engagement with victims, sustained concerns among stakeholders.¹²⁷

¹²⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 274.

¹²⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 387–388; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 39, 276.

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2017.

On 22 February 2018, the Lower House (Second Chamber) of the Dutch parliament near unanimously passed a motion recognizing the massacre of an estimated 1.5 million Armenians in 1915 as a genocide. It also decided to send a cabinet-level representative to the Armenian capital, Yerevan, for the annual commemoration of the genocide on 24 April. The government, however, announced that it only recognized events as genocide if that was supported by a binding United Nations Security Council resolution or a verdict from an international court and, therefore, that it would not follow the parliamentary judgment and would continue to speak of “the question of the Armenian genocide.” Five members of the Dutch parliament from Turkish origin who had voted in favor of the motion were attacked in the Turkish press and on the social media as “traitors.” As early as 2004, the parliament had urged the cabinet to discuss the genocide. The new move heightened Dutch-Turkish tensions. More than twenty nations, including Russia, Germany, France and the Vatican, had recognized the 1915 massacres as genocide.¹²⁸

See also Azerbaijan, Central African Republic, Nigeria.

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007, 2017.

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

¹²⁸ “Dutch MPs Vote to Recognise Disputed Armenian ‘Genocide’,” BBC News (22 February 2018); “Kamer erkent Armeense genocide, kabinet niet,” NRC Handelsblad (23 February 2018); Clara van de Wiel, “Politici van Turkse komaf overspoeld met haat,” NRC Handelsblad (28 February 2018), 9; “Genocide: Gif in debat over Armeense genocide zit bij fractie van Denk,” NRC Handelsblad (1 March 2018), 17; Mike Corder (Associated Press), “Dutch Lawmakers Label Massacre of Armenians as Genocide,” Business Insider (22 February 2018).

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2013.

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2013, 2016–2017.

In June 2017, the widows of four men from the Ogoni region in the Niger Delta who were executed following an unfair trial in 1995, filed a lawsuit in the Netherlands against Shell, demanding compensation and a public apology. They accused Shell of complicity in the unlawful arrest and detention of their husbands during a brutal crackdown by the then military authorities on the Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People. International organizations called for Shell to be investigated for involvement in these crimes. Environmental pollution linked to the oil industry continued to undermine the economic, social, and cultural rights of the Niger Delta communities.¹²⁹

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012, 2016–2017.

¹²⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 285.

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2017.

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012, 2014, 2016.

Enforced disappearances continued in Pakistan; the victims were at considerable risk of torture and other ill-treatment, and even death. No perpetrators were known to have been brought to justice for the hundreds or thousands of cases reported across the country in recent years.¹³⁰

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2013–2015.

In Gaza, Hamas authorities took no steps to prosecute members of its forces and Hamas' military wing, the 'Izz al-Din al-Qassam Brigades, for extrajudicial executions they carried out in 2014 and 2016.¹³¹

See also Egypt, Israel.

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2013, 2015–2017.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012, 2015.

¹³⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 39.

¹³¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 294.

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2017.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission estimated in 2003 that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents. Authorities achieved limited progress in prosecuting wartime abuses by government forces, in part due to lack of collaboration from the Defense Ministry. According to Peruvian human rights groups, prosecutors had only achieved rulings in 78 cases related to abuses committed during the armed conflict, as of May 2017, and only 17 convictions. One year after its approval, the National Plan for the Search for Disappeared Persons was still not implemented.

Since May 2017, new evidence had become public corroborating longstanding allegations that former President Ollanta Humala Tasso (in office 2011–2016 and a former army officer) ordered egregious human rights violations committed by security forces in the early 1990s in the Madre Mía military base in the Alto Huallaga region. The evidence – including testimony from victims, witness, and soldiers involved in the abuses – strongly implicated Humala in crimes including torture, enforced disappearances, killings, and an attempt to conceal incriminating evidence when he ran for president in 2006. At the end of 2017, Humala remained under investigation for the abuses and in pre-trial detention on corruption charges.

Efforts to secure the early release of former President Alberto Fujimori gained strength during 2017. Fujimori was sentenced in a landmark trial in 2009 to 25 years in prison for killings, enforced disappearances, and kidnappings committed in 1991 and 1992. In May, Keiko Fujimori, his daughter and the runner-up in the 2016 tight presidential elections won by Pedro Pablo Kuczynski, filed a motion seeking to overturn her father's conviction for kidnappings. A Lima court rejected the motion, but her appeal remained pending at the end of 2017. In June 2017, Kuczynski told The Economist that the time to secure Fujimori's release from prison was "about now." Although the president denied it, his announcement seemed to be a reaction to growing pressure from Fujimori supporters who controlled the Congress under the lead of Keiko Fujimori. In 2016, prosecutors decided to close the investigation of Alberto Fujimori in connection with forced sterilizations of mostly poor and indigenous women committed during his administration. On 24 December 2017, Kuczynski granted a humanitarian pardon and grace to former President Fujimori. Thousands took to the streets to protest against the decision.

A national registry of victims of forced sterilizations committed between 1995 and 2001, was created in 2015 and more than 4,700 victims had been registered at the end of 2017. Fujimori's intelligence advisor, Vladimiro Montesinos, three former army generals, and members of the Colina group – a state-sponsored death squad – were also serving sentences ranging from 15 to 25 years for the 1991 assassination of 15 people in the Lima district of Barrios Altos, and for six disappearances. In August 2017, military officers were sentenced for the torture, enforced disappearance, and extrajudicial execution of 53 people in Los Cabitos military barracks in Ayacucho in 1983. In September 2017, the trial began of former navy personnel charged with killing more than 100 people during a riot in El Frontón prison in 1986, a charge which could amount to a crime against humanity. Courts made much less progress in addressing violations, including extrajudicial killings, disappearances, and torture, committed during the earlier administrations of Fernando Belaúnde (1980–1985) and Alan García (1985–1990).¹³²

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2015.

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011, 2014–2017.

Under legislation passed in June 2017, the PiS government gave local officials and landowners one year to remove all public monuments and memorials that “paid tribute to persons, organizations, events, or dates symbolizing Communism or other totalitarian systems.” About 500 were identified, almost all from the Communist era as the Soviets had already removed Nazi ones.¹³³

In early 2018, a controversial memory law, sent to the Sejm on 16 August 2016, was approved by the Lower House (on 26 January 2018), the Senate (on 31 January 2018, with 57 against 23 votes and 2 abstentions), and President Andrzej Duda (on 6 February 2018), and would come into force on 1 March 2018. The bill – an amendment to a 1998 law which established the official Instytut Pamięci Narodowej (IPN, Institute for National Remembrance, a state body tasked with establishing an official historical narrative and prosecuting Nazi and Communist-era crimes) – was authored by Deputy Justice Minister Patryk Jaki. It said that:

“Art. 55a. 1. Whoever publicly and contrary to the facts attributes to the Polish Nation or to the

¹³² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 423–424; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 30, 298.

¹³³ Rick Lyman, “Political Rage over Statues? Old News in the Old World,” New York Times (17 August 2017).

Polish State responsibility or co-responsibility for the Nazi crimes committed by the German Third Reich, as specified in Article 6 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal – Annex to the Agreement for the prosecution and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis, executed in London on 8 August 1945 (Journal of Laws of 1947, item 367), or for any other offenses constituting crimes against peace, humanity, or war crimes, or otherwise grossly diminishes the responsibility of the actual perpetrators of these crimes, shall be liable to a fine or deprivation of liberty for up to three years. The judgment shall be communicated to the public. 2. If the perpetrator of the act specified in section 1 above acts unintentionally, they shall be liable to a fine or restriction of liberty. 3. An offense is not committed if the perpetrator of a prohibited act set out in sections 1 and 2 above acted within the framework of artistic or scientific activity.”

The amendment would enable IPN or an NGO to bring a claim against individuals. Civil remedies could include a retraction of the statement and/or compensation (including large fines). The government insisted that the legislation aimed to prevent the international defamation of Poland, and was not intended to hamper academic debate. On 6 February 2018, Duda said that the bill “protect[ed] the Polish interests ... protect[ed] our dignity, the historical truth, so that we could be judged fairly in the world, so that we would not be slandered as a state and as a nation.” Duda also said that he would send the bill to the Constitutional Tribunal to check its regulations. The law would make it illegal to describe Nazi death camps on Polish soil as “Polish death camps,” which was a point of general consensus. However, critics of the bill (such as the Warsaw-based Polish Center of Holocaust Research of the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology of the Polish Academy of Sciences and Yad Vashem’s International Institute for Holocaust Research) said that this should not be imposed by law. The bill also did not clearly state how artistic or scientific activity would be defined. In addition, and above all, critics feared that due to its broad scope and terminology, the bill would have a chilling effect on free speech and on debating history by possibly outlawing any references to the collaboration with, or complicity of, Poles in crimes committed in Poland during the Holocaust, as found in evidence or expressed by Holocaust survivors, witnesses, journalists, teachers, academics – Polish or foreign. Not only did the law cover crimes committed during the Holocaust, it also tried to prevent any trivialization of massacres of Poles by Nazi-allied Ukrainian forces during the war (such as the Volyn [Volhynia] Massacre), and to stifle any criticism of post-war Polish partisans – who were accused of atrocities against Jews and Ukrainians – who fought the Communist government. The law was also widely criticized by, among others, Israel, the United States, and France. Israeli MPs were backing a bill that would give legal aid to any Holocaust survivors telling their story who were prosecuted in a foreign country. During World War II, Poland had been attacked and occupied by Nazi Germany. Millions of its citizens were killed, including three million Polish Jews in the Holocaust. The Polish Center for Holocaust Research described the law as an “unprecedented (and unknown in a democratic system) intrusion into the debate about the Polish history.” The American Historical Association and 41 other scientific associations condemned the law, saying that as it referred specifically to histories that documented and explored Polish participation in violence against Jews during World War II, it therefore threatened free pursuit of historical inquiry. The Polish Government, in a reply to the Council of Europe, emphasized that the bill solely concerned protection of the “Polish Nation” and “Polish State” rather than of individuals or groups. On 22 March 2018, the office of Justice Minister and Prosecutor General Zbigniew Ziobro described as partly unconstitutional the memory law on the website of the Constitutional Court. It said that penalizing acts committed abroad independently of the laws in place there was against the constitution, which opposes “excessive interference,” and added that the law was “dysfunctional,” could have “opposite results than those intended,” and could “undermine the Polish state’s authority.” On 27 June 2018, the government proposed to decriminalize the offense, an amendment to the law which was backed by the lower house of parliament (with 388 voting in favor of the amendment, with 25 against and five abstentions). The government said that the amendment took into account the widespread international outrage caused by the law.

On 21 February 2018, Maja Borkowska, a journalist for the public broadcaster PR24 (Radio Poland 24), resigned after her supervisor ordered her not to report that the opposition political party Civic Platform was preparing amendments to the bill. Also in February, German historian Bernd Rother, who had participated in the IPN conference “Nations in Occupied Europe and the Holocaust” in Warsaw, declared that he would not offer his contribution for publication in a book as long as the law was in force. He also feared that the IPN would actively prosecute historians. According to Rother, eight other speakers also refused to offer their contribution for publication. In March 2018, the Polish League against Defamation, close to the PiS, filed defamation charges against Argentinian newspaper Página 12, which had published an article in December 2017 about the massacre of Jews in Jedwabne in 1941. In late March 2018, Deputy Prime Minister Piotr Gliński publicly attacked the head of Polin, a Warsaw museum of Polish-Jewish history, for what he termed “very deep political involvement,” saying that the museum was “supposed to create positive values, and not arouse conflicts.” In [early April 2018], IPN historian Adam Pulawski said he was to be transferred away from his post because of his work on Poland’s wartime relations with Jews. IPN would reportedly not publish his latest book. Polish-Canadian Holocaust researcher Jan Grabowski said that he received death threats after being accused by the Polish League against Defamation, a nationalist group, of falsifying the history of Poland. After the Holocaust law was approved, officials at the Auschwitz-Birkenau memorial and museum, including its director Piotr Cywiński, described how they were subjected to a wave of “hate, fake news and manipulations” at the hands of Polish nationalists. Concerns were raised about pressure being exerted on official guides at the site, after the home of one Italian guide in Krakow was attacked and supporters of a convicted anti-Semitic filmed themselves repeatedly bullying their guide during a visit to the camp in March 2018. The nationalists falsely accused the museum of deliberately downplaying the fate of the approximately 74,000 non-Jewish Polish prisoners who perished in the camp, by focusing exclusively on its Jewish victims.

Polish lawmakers had tried to pass a similar bill in 2013 but failed. After the conservative Law and Justice Party won the first parliamentary majority since the end of Communism, new attempts were announced on 15 February 2016. An anti-Holocaust denial law has existed in Poland since 1998. As early as 23 November 2016, the United Nations Human Rights Committee had reported that it was “concerned about a draft law that would impose up to three years of imprisonment on anyone who referred to the Nazi camps operated in occupied Poland during the Second World War as Polish” and recommended that Poland should “review the draft law of August 2016 concerning reference to Nazi camps operated in occupied Poland during the Second World War to bring it into line with article 19 of the Covenant.”¹³⁴

¹³⁴ Certified English translation of the law: <https://www.ms.gov.pl/pl/informacje/news,10368,nowelizacja-ustawy-o-ipn-wersja-w-jezyku.html> (2 February 2018); United Nations Human Rights Committee, “Concluding observations on the seventh periodic report of Poland” (CCPR/C/POL/CO/7; 23 November 2016), paragraphs 37–38; Polish Government, “Answer to the Alert on the Platform to Promote the Protection of Journalism and Safety of Journalists” (6 February 2018); Institute of National Remembrance, “A Statement of the Council of the Institute of National Remembrance” (27 February 2018); Reuters, “Poland Plans to Punish Use of the Phrase ‘Polish Death Camps’,” Guardian (13 February 2016); Jan Grabowski, “‘Patriotic’ Move Threatens Academic Freedom,” University World News (17 February 2016); Roeland Termote, “Noem je Auschwitz een ‘Pools kamp’? 5 jaar celstraf,” NRC Handelsblad (17 February 2016), 14; Polish Center for Holocaust Research, “Center’s Statement regarding the Planned Changes to the Law about the Institute of National Remembrance,” (12 September 2016); Don Snyder, “Poland Is Poised to Put ‘Bad’ Historians of the Holocaust in Prison,” Forward (2 September 2016); AP, “Poland Moves To Ban References to Nazi-era ‘Polish Death Camps’,” World Israel News (27 January 2018); Ruth Eglash & Avi Selk, “Israel and Poland Try To Tamp Down Tensions after Poland’s ‘Death Camp’ Law Sparks Israeli Outrage,” Washington Post (28 January 2018), “Israel Criticises Poland over Proposed Holocaust Law,” BBC News (29 January 2018); “Poland President To Review Holocaust Bill after Israel Outcry,” BBC News (29 January 2018); “Poland’s Senate Passes Controversial Holocaust Bill,” BBC News (1 February 2018); Joel Gunter, “Holocaust Law Wields a ‘Blunt Instrument’ against Poland’s Past,” BBC News (3 February 2018); “Poland President Duda ‘Will Sign’ Controversial Holocaust Bill,” BBC News (6 February 2018); “Poland Holocaust Law: France Criticises ‘Ill Advised’ Text,” BBC News (7 February 2018); “Israel Rebukes Poland PM for ‘Jewish Perpetrators’ Remark,” BBC News (18 February 2018); “Israel-Poland Spat,” BBC News (19 February 2018); “Poles Told to Report ‘Anti-Polish Slander’ to Diplomats,” BBC News (20 February 2018); American Historical Association, “AHA Condemns Polish Law Criminalizing Public Discussion of Polish Complicity in Nazi War Crimes” (February 2018); Uladzislau Belavusau, “Polen verkondigt met herinneringswet de teloorgang van zijn liberale democratie,” Volkskrant (20 februari 2018); David Matthews, “Historians Fear ‘Censorship’ under Poland’s Holocaust Law,” Times Higher Education (21 February 2018); Council of Europe, “Poland: New Bill Could Ban Journalists from Historical Debate,” (1 February 2018); OSCE, “New Law on World War II Crimes in Poland Can Threaten Freedom of Expression, Says OSCE Representative Désir” (1 February 2018); Todor Gardos (Human Rights Watch), “Poland’s Twisted Holocaust Law” (10 February 2018); “Poland: PR24 Journalist Resigns after Being Told Not Report on Opposition Amendments to Holocaust Law” (21 February 2018); Nikolay Kuposov, “Memory Laws and Nationalist Lies,” Project Syndicate (7 March 2018); Robert Mackey, “Polish Law on Holocaust Draws New Attention to Anti-Semitism in Poland’s Past and Present,” The Intercept (3 March 2018); Paul Ingendaay, “Widrige Fakten in Polen,” Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (13 March 2018); AFP, “Polish Attorney General’s Office Calls Holocaust Law Unconstitutional,” Times of Israel (22 March 2018); Sam Sokol, “Polish Historian Says He Was Forced to Switch Jobs because of His Holocaust Research,” Jewish Chronicle (5 April 2018); Konstanty Gebert, “Projecting Poland and Its Past,” Index on Censorship (2018 no. 1), 35–37; Jemimah Steinfeld, “Holocaust Law: The Story So Far,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 36; Bernt Hagtvet, “Masters of None,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 55–56; Resisting Ill Democracies in Europe: Understanding the Playbook of Illiberal Governments To Better Resist Them: A case-study of Croatia, Hungary, Poland and Serbia (Oslo, Geneva, Zagreb, Human Rights House Foundation, November 2017), 28; Christian Davies,

See also Denmark, Russia.

PORTUGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2017.

“Poland’s Holocaust Law Triggers Tide of Abuse against Auschwitz Museum,” The Guardian (7 May 2018); “Poland Holocaust law: Government U-turn on Jail Threat,” BBC News (27 June 2018).

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2017.

In [February] 2017, Mikhail Piotrovsky, director of the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, spoke out against handing St. Isaac's Cathedral back to the Russian Orthodox Church. As a result, the security services – nominally working under the direction of the ministry of culture – began focusing their attention on the museum. Officers ransacked the museum's archives – devoting particular attention to Stalin's sale of art to the West in the 1920s and 1930s – and took catalogs and other archival materials. The security services reportedly accused the Hermitage of “illegally publishing documents” containing secret information “over the course of many years” about “the sale by the museum of art in the 1920s and 1930s.” They also banned the sale of books that were sold by the Hermitage's shop.¹³⁵

On 25 July 2017, the Memorial Human Rights Center demanded the release of historian Yuri Dmitriev [Dmitriyev] [see also NCH Annual Report 2017] and an end to what it called a political trial. On 26 December 2017, a group of experts ruled that the photos of Dmitriev's adopted daughter found at his home were not pornography. Prosecutors requested a third assessment of the photos. On 27 December 2017, the court in Petrozavodsk granted the request but at the same time ordered to release Dmitriev from pretrial custody by 28 January 2018. Dmitriev would be barred from leaving the city without permission while the investigation continued. In the week of 8 January 2018, Dmitriev was due to begin enforced psychiatric testing to determine whether he had “sexual deviations” amid fears he will be falsely declared insane and although a previous psychiatric evaluation had declared him to be of sound mind. On 20 March 2018, the prosecutor requested a nine-year prison sentence for Dmitriev. On 5 April 2018, Dmitriev was acquitted of the child pornography charge, but not of the charge of illegal possessing a weapon. He was sentenced to three months of probation and community service. On 13 April 2018, the Petrozavodsk city prosecutor appealed against Dmitriev's acquittal. On 14 June 2018, the acquittal was overturned by the Supreme Court of Karelia and Dmitriev was re-arrested on 27 June 2018.¹³⁶

¹³⁵ Paul Goble, “Putin Regime now Seizing and Destroying Archives to Whitewash the Soviet Past,” Euromaidan Press (17 April 2017).

¹³⁶ Petition for Yuri Dmitriev: <https://www.change.org/p/chairman-of-petrozavodsk-city-court-a-a-sudakov->

In [July] 2017, Roskomnadsor (Federal Service for Supervision of Communications, Information Technology, and Mass Media) blacklisted A Teachers' Guide to Studying, Understanding and Examining the Stalinist Repressions (2015), a history textbook by Andrei Suslov, a history professor at Perm State University, and a colleague, because it was “dangerous to the health of children.” Perm’s education ministry had initially published the guide on its own website but removed it after the ban. The state prosecutor demanded the textbook’s nonprofit publisher Center for Political Education and Human Rights to mark the book with an age restriction of 18+ on its website. In response, Suslov and his publisher sued Roskomnadsor. A hearing was set for 3 October 2017 and a verdict was expected by the end of 2017. The textbook’s blacklisting reportedly came after activists from the Stalinist movement sut vremeni (Essence of Time) had protested against the textbook with a letter campaign to state authorities in [2015], followed by a report written in 2016 by Roskomnadsor-accredited experts, that determined that the textbook was “hostile to state and social views.” Pavel Guryanov of the Perm chapter of sut vremeni said that the work brainwashed the children of Perm in the interests of the publisher’s foreign sponsors. Suslov’s suit countered that the Roskomnadsor-accredited experts’ report damaged his reputation and demanded its removal from the Roskomnadsor website. He also applied for a second opinion on it, carried out by the “Laboratory for Applied Linguistics,” which concluded that it was “based on its own version of historical fact.”¹³⁷

From July 2017, an avant-première row concerning the film Matilda by director Alexei (Aleksei) Uchitel took place. The film explored the love of the last Tsar Nicholas II (1868–1918) for ballerina Matilda Kshesinskaya (1872–1971) before he came to the throne and married in November 1894; it included some erotic scenes. Russian Orthodox Christians saw Nicholas II, who was executed by the Bolsheviks in 1918, as a martyr; he was canonized in 2000 by the Orthodox Church. Campaigners interpreted the exposé of his love affair as an insult. They included Duma member Natalia Poklonskaya and groups called “Christian State, Holy Russia” and “The Tsar’s Cross.” The latter group said that the public-appeal-in-defense-of-yuri-dmitriev; Yelizaveta Mayetnaya, “Supporters Rally Around Accused Russian Historian Of Stalin's Crimes,” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (27 April 2017); “Ukrainians Ask for International Protection for Russian Historian Who Is Persecuted by FSB,” Human Rights Information Centre (28 December 2016); Petition: Освободить историка Юрия Дмитриева (in Russian); “Stalin's Shadow: How a Gulag Historian Fell Victim to Russia's Dark Past,” Moscow Times (9 June 2017); Andrew Osborn, “Hunter of Stalin's Mass Graves on Trial: Friends Say He's Been Framed,” Reuters (13 July 2017); Halya Coynash, “Russia Honours Founders of the Soviet Terror, Jails Historian who Uncovered their Victims,” Human Rights in Ukraine (3 October 2017); “Russian Historian Charged With Child Pornography To Be Released,” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (27 December 2017); Andrew Osborn, “Russian Historian who Exposed Stalin's Crimes Faces Enforced Psychiatric Testing,” Reuters (9 January 2018); Ivan Nechepurenko, “Gulag Historian Ordered to Undergo Psychiatric Testing in Russia,” New York Times (11 January 2018); AFP, “Russian Gulag Historian Faces 9 Years in Prison: Lawyer,” Business Standard (20 March 2018); Oleg Boldyrev, “Stalin Crimes Expert Cleared over 'Child Porn',” BBC News (6 April 2018); Andrew Kramer, “Russian Historian Who Exposed Soviet Crimes Is Cleared in Pornography Case,” New York Times (5 April 2018); “Yury A. Dmitriev,” Wikipedia (2 July 2018).

¹³⁷ Elina Ibragimowa, “Why Stalin Is Causing a Classroom Storm in Russia,” Deutsche Welle (29 July 2017).

“blasphemous” film “desecrated the memory of the Holy Regal Martyrs.” On 31 August 2017, petrol bombs were thrown at a St Petersburg building housing Uchitel’s studio, but the interior was not damaged. On 4 September a man was arrested in Yekaterinburg (the city where the tsar and his family were executed in July 1918) after crashing his jeep into a cinema. On 11 September, two cars were torched outside the Moscow office of a lawyer acting for Uchitel. The Kremlin condemned letters that warned cinemas that they would “burn” if they dared screen Matilda. Russia’s biggest cinema chain, the Cinema Park and Formula Kino group, canceled screenings of the film. The film was due to go on general release in Russia on 26 October 2017.¹³⁸

In October 2017, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights reported that groups manifesting their attachment to Ukrainian national symbols, dates, or historic figures in the Crimea were sanctioned by courts for violating public order or conducting unauthorized rallies. The public activities of the unregistered Simferopol-based Ukrainian Cultural Center – such as paying tribute to Ukrainian literary, political, or historic figures – were often disrupted or prohibited. On 18 February 2015, the Bakhchysarai authorities prohibited the local Mejlis from carrying out a rally in commemoration of the anniversary of the death of Noman Çelebicihan (1885–1918), the first President of the short-lived independent Crimean People’s Republic (1917–1918). On 11 March 2015, a court in Simferopol ordered 40 hours of corrective labor for three pro-Ukrainian activists and 20 hours for a fourth after they unfurled a Ukrainian flag bearing the inscription “Crimea is Ukraine” during a rally to commemorate the anniversary of the national poet of Ukraine, Taras Shevchenko (1814–1861), two days earlier. Institutions promoting Ukrainian culture and traditions were shut down. The Museum of Ukrainian Vyshyvanka – a traditional Ukrainian embroidery – was closed in February 2015.

The Simferopol city authorities refused to grant permission for an assembly planned by the Crimean Tatar NGO Kardashlyk for 23 August 2014 near the memorial complex for the victims of the 1944 Crimean Tatar deportation. Crimean Tatars taking part in unauthorized motorcades to commemorate the 1944 Crimean Tatar deportation were regularly arrested, interrogated for hours, and fined. In June 2015, the city of Simferopol rejected an application by the Mejlis to hold celebrations of the Crimean Tatar Flag Day.¹³⁹

On 24 November 2017, Polish historian Henryk Glebocki was reportedly detained in Moscow and ordered to leave Russia within 24 hours after he gave lectures in St. Petersburg about the Soviet-era

¹³⁸ “Rage at Tsar Film Suspected in Russia Car Blaze,” BBC News (11 September 2017); “Russian Cinemas Shun Tsar Film Matilda after Threats,” BBC News (12 September 2017); Amie Ferris-Rotman, “Costume Drama,” Index on Censorship, 46, no. 3 (September 2017), 72–74.

¹³⁹ Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, Situation of Human Rights in the Temporarily Occupied Autonomous Republic of Crimea and the City of Sevastopol (Ukraine) (Geneva 2017), 3, 21, 23, 26, 32.

purges of 1937–1938. Glebocki had also been denied access to archives in Russia that he previously had used to research Polish-Russian relations during the 19th and 20th centuries. In October 2017, Polish authorities had expelled Russian historian Dmitry Karnaukhov – accusing him of having ties with Russian intelligence and “participating in a hybrid war against Poland.”¹⁴⁰

In January 2018, Memorial’s employees were threatened in the republics of Chechnya and Ingushetia. On 9 January 2018, the director of the Chechen office, Oyub Titiev (Titiyev), was arrested on a falsified charge of illegal drug possession (a common tactic used against activists and journalists in the region) that could bring ten years’ imprisonment. His family members received threats from the local police. The Kremlin’s human rights council did not exclude the possibility that drugs had been planted on Titiyev by Chechen police. On 17 January 2018, security cameras captured two men in masks setting ablaze Memorial’s office in Nazran, capital of Ingushetia. This reportedly occurred three days after the arrival of a group of journalists and lawyers who were investigating Titiyev’s arrest. On 19 January 2018, Chechen police arrived to raid the Memorial office in Grozny. Earlier, speaking at a meeting with police officers, Chechnya’s authoritarian leader Ramzan Kadyrov attacked Memorial, referring to its activists as “enemies of people” who told the world about Russian issues to discredit the state. Memorial’s chairman Alexander Cherkasov said that Kadyrov issued an ultimatum, banning Memorial’s activity in Chechnya. On 22 January 2018, a car belonging to the Memorial office in Dagestan was torched. As of 18 June 2018, Titiev was still in prison.

In December 2017, Chechnya’s leader Ramzan Kadyrov was sanctioned by the United States Treasury over alleged human rights violations, including involvement in extrajudicial killings. One of the sanctions was the deactivation by Facebook of his Instagram account, which had three million followers. The actions against Memorial were believed to be a revenge for the closure of the account and to have involved Chechen security forces: Memorial was held responsible for reporting about the human rights violations that gave rise to the sanctions.¹⁴¹

On 23 January 2018, following a screening before senior figures on 22 January, the distribution certificate of the British comedy film The Death of Stalin (2017), by director Armando Iannucci, was withdrawn, effectively canceling its release on 25 January. Among those who criticized it for its ¹⁴⁰ “Russia Expels Polish Historian without Explanation,” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (27 November 2017).

¹⁴¹ “‘Memorial’ Human Rights Activists in Russia Face Arrest, Arson, Murder,” Daily Beast (20 January 2018); “Critical Voices Targeted with Arson, Arrest and Legislation,” Ifex (1 February 2018); European Parliament, “Russian Government Urged To Release Oyub Titiev” (press release; 8 February 2018); Marc Bennets, “Chechen leader’s Instagram Closure ‘Led to Revenge Attacks’ on NGO,” Guardian (21 January 2018); PEN International, “Oral Statement on Freedom of Association and Peaceful Assembly in Russia for the United Nations Human Rights Council 38th Special Session, Item 3: Interactive Dialogue with the UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and of Association” (18 June 2018).

“ideological warfare” or “extremism,” citing its unfavorable portrayal of historical figures like Marshal Georgy Zhukov (1896–1974), were Yelena Drapeko, deputy head of the lower house of parliament’s culture committee, Yury Polyakov, a member of the culture ministry’s advisory council, Zhukov’s daughter, and Nadezjda Umanova of the Russian Society for Military History. The film was a satire of the power struggle in the Kremlin following Stalin’s death in 1953. An open letter to Culture Minister Vladimir Medinsky signed by 21 senior figures criticized the film for parodying Russia’s history and denigrating the memory of Russian citizens who fought the Nazis. Pavel Pozhigaylo, a member of the Culture Ministry’s advisory board, said that the film’s release in advance of the 75th anniversary of the end in 1943 of the Battle of Stalingrad, to be celebrated nationwide on 2 February 2018, would be an affront to Russia’s World War II veterans. On 25 January 2018, Moscow’s Pioneer Cinema, the only Russian cinema to go ahead with the film, stopped the first screening after a police visit hours before. Tickets had been sold for showings until 3 February 2018. The culture ministry said that the cinema would be prosecuted for showing the comedy without a license. In 2015, the ministry had withdrawn the distribution license of “Child 44,” a Cold War thriller about a series of child murders in the USSR in 1953, saying it “distorted historical facts.”¹⁴²

On 12 May 2018, Pavel Chikov and Damir Gaynutdinov, head and legal researcher respectively of the international human rights group Agora, published a report, Russia against History: Punishment for revision (available in Russian at https://guides.files.bbc.co.uk/bbc-russian/Russia_vs_History.pdf), about the dangers that Russian historians face. The report observed that the most dangerous subject for historical research in Russia was World War II and the role of the USSR in it. Over the last decade, criminal charges were brought against 17 historians for their discussion of the war. One of these cases was dismissed because of the statute of limitations, but the other 16 were found guilty. The government also engaged in 41 acts of censorship on historical issues, seven efforts to revise the work of scholars, numerous acts of obstruction of access to archives, and routine prohibition of the use of materials found by scholars in government archives. According to the report, the Russian authorities had stepped up their efforts in recent years to impose a single conception of Russian history; their main instrument in that regard was the use of the provisions of anti-extremist legislation.¹⁴³

In June 2018, activists accused the government of erasing Gulag victims from memory after it was revealed that agencies were destroying Soviet prisoner records under a secret decree. The director of the Gulag museum in Moscow complained to the Russian Human Rights Council, that the interior ¹⁴² “Russia Bars ‘Extremist’ British Comedy ‘The Death of Stalin’,” BBC News (23 January 2018); “Death of Stalin: Russian Cinema Drops Film under Pressure,” BBC News (26 January 2018); Matthew Luxmoore, “In Russia, ‘The Death of Stalin’ Is No Laughing Matter,” New York Times (24 January 2018).

¹⁴³ “Being a Historian an Increasingly Dangerous Profession in Russia, Agora Study Says,” Euromaidan Press (13 May 2018).

ministry has been trashing irreplaceable cards containing the names of those repressed. The card system came into existence as follows: if prisoners survived their lengthy sentences in Gulag labor camps and were released, their case files were destroyed but archive cards were created instead recording their names, date and place of birth, what camps they had been in and when they were liberated. After a researcher requested information about a prisoner's Gulag sentence in vain, it had emerged that a secret 2014 decree signed by 11 government agencies allowed officials to dispose of a prisoner's card after his or her 80th birthday.¹⁴⁴

See also Afghanistan, China, India, Iran, Netherlands, Ukraine.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2017.

¹⁴⁴ Alec Luhn, "Russia Deleting Records of Gulag Victims under Secret 2014 Order," Telegraph (8 June 2018).

SAINT VINCENT

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

SÃO TOMÉ

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011, 2013, 2017.

On 5 April 2017, United Nations experts on cultural rights, housing, and extreme poverty called on the government to halt the planned forced evictions and demolition of the 400-year-old walled Al-Masora (al-Masoura; Musawara) quarter in the village of Awamia. Al-Masora was considered a historical model of a walled village, including mosques, farms and farmers' markets, places of worship for Shia "Hussainiyat" and businesses; it was home to about 2,000 to 3,000 people. Part of a "development project," the demolition started in May 2017 and triggered deadly clashes between security forces and Shia militants. In late July 2017, security forces surrounded and sealed off Awamia as they confronted an armed group hiding in a historic neighborhood slated for demolition. The violence killed more than 20 civilians, five militants, and 12 security personnel. The interior ministry blamed the unrest on "terrorist groups who have been in the area for years."¹⁴⁵

See also Yemen.

¹⁴⁵ "UN Experts Urge Saudi Arabia to Halt Forced Evictions and Demolitions of the Al-Masora Neighborhood in Awamia" (press release; 5 April 2017); "Awamiya: Inside Saudi Shia Town Devastated by Demolitions and Fighting," BBC News (16 August 2017); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 465; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 318.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009, 2013, 2017.

In April 2017, the Extraordinary African Chambers in Senegal upheld the conviction and sentence of life imprisonment of former Chadian President Hissène Habré for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and torture committed in Chad between 1982 and 1990.¹⁴⁶

See also Guinea.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2017.

Prosecutions for crimes committed during the war (1991–1995) were hampered due to lack of political support, insufficient staff, and other resources at the Office of the War Crimes Prosecutor, and weak witness support mechanisms. The Serbian parliament finally appointed a new war crimes prosecutor in May 2017, Snežana Stanojković, after an 18-month-long vacancy. Few high ranking officials implicated in serious wartime abuses had been held to account in Serbian courts. Between January and August 2017, 17 war crimes trials were pending before them. The war crimes prosecutor issued two new indictments during the same period. Over the same eight months, first instance courts delivered no judgments. The appeals court overturned convictions of three people. Over the same eight months, 11 cases were still at investigation stage. Since the establishment of the War Crimes Prosecution Office in 2003, 124 judgments had been issued, 82 people convicted and 42 acquitted.

The first trials in Serbia for war crimes in Srebrenica started in February 2017. Eight Bosnian Serb former police officers were charged with the killing in a warehouse of more than 1,300 Bosniak civilians from Srebrenica in July 1995. In July 2017, the Belgrade Appeals Court dismissed the charges, stating that the prosecutor who filed the charges was not authorized to do so. On appeal, the indictment was reinstated; proceedings started afresh in November 2017.

Relatives of the disappeared were denied recognition as civilian victims of war, if their missing family member had died outside Serbia. In May 2017, relatives of missing Kosovo Serbs called on the government to make progress in recovering their bodies.

Chief Prosecutor Serge Brammertz at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

¹⁴⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 23, 322.

(ICTY) urged Serbia in June 2017 to officially acknowledge the crimes committed in Srebrenica in 1995 as genocide.¹⁴⁷

Kosovo

Following the January 2017 arrest in France of former Kosovo Prime Minister and Kosovo Liberation Army fighter Ramush Haradinaj based on a Serbian arrest warrant, a French court in April rejected Serbia's extradition request. Haradinaj was wanted in Serbia on war crimes charges. He had been twice acquitted by the ICTY of war crimes during the 1998–1999 Kosovo conflict.

In July 2017, after months of delay, Kosovo's Constitutional Court approved the revised rules of procedure and evidence for the Specialist Chambers and Specialist Prosecutor's Office, the Hague-based court tasked with trying serious war crimes committed during the 1998–1999 Kosovo war. This allowed the court to issue first indictments. The court was set to adjudicate cases investigated by the Special Investigative Task Force, prompted by a 2011 Council of Europe report accusing some Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) members of abductions, beatings, summary executions, and the forced removal of human organs in Kosovo and Albania during and after the Kosovo war. Senior KLA fighters were expected to be indicted and stand trial. The court will operate under Kosovo laws, with 19 international judges, appointed by the European Union in February 2017. In June 2017, the European Union approved a one-year budget for the court.

Under 2014 legislation, the competencies of the European Union-led Police and Justice Mission (EULEX) for the prosecution of crimes under international law were limited, although some prosecutions continued. The absence of any agreement on mutual legal assistance between Kosovo and Serbia hampered the prosecution of Serbs suspected of crimes under international law during the 1998–1999 armed conflict, including conflict-related sexual violence (CRSV). Hundreds of unresolved case files were due to be transferred by June 2018 to Kosovo's Special Prosecution Office. Prosecutors, NGOs and CRSV survivors were concerned that testimonies, known to have been gathered after the armed conflict by the United Nations Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), had not been promptly or adequately investigated. In June 2017, former President Atifete Jahjaga was denied entry to Serbia, where she was due to present a book of testimonies from CRSV survivors. Progress was made in implementing legislation introduced in 2014, which provided some reparation for CRSV survivors. A commission was appointed to consider applications from survivors, who were due to be able to apply for monthly compensation payments from January 2018. Other reparation measures did not meet international standards, failing to provide survivors with free health care or adequate rehabilitation. Stigma associated with wartime rape continued to overshadow survivors. Little progress was made in locating people still missing from the armed conflict and its aftermath. Some 1,658 people were still missing. The Kosovo Specialist Chambers opened in The Hague on 28 June 2017. They had been established to investigate the alleged abduction, torture, and murder of Kosovo Serbs and some Kosovo Albanians, transferred to Albania by members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) during and after the 1998–1999 war. In December 2017, members of parliament failed to revoke the law governing the Specialist Chambers, which they considered discriminated against the KLA.

¹⁴⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 470–471; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 323.

The Human Rights Review Panel, an independent body set up in 2009 to review allegations of human rights violations by EULEX staff, ruled in eight cases between January and October 2017, four of which were follow-up decisions in earlier cases where violations had been found by the panel. Thirty cases were pending before the panel at the end of 2017.¹⁴⁸

The United Nations failed to follow recommendations made in 2016 by the Human Rights Advisory Panel (HRAP), an independent body set up in 2006 to examine complaints of abuses by the United Nations (UN) Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), that the UN apologize and pay individual compensation to lead poison victims forced to live in UNMIK-run camps in northern Kosovo after the 1998–1999 war. Victims were displaced members of the Roma, Ashkali, and Balkan Egyptian communities. In May 2017, UN Secretary-General António Guterres proposed a watered-down plan to create a voluntary trust fund for community assistance projects not specifically targeting those affected by lead poisoning. At the end of 2017, no states had contributed to the trust fund.¹⁴⁹

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007. See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012, 2016.

¹⁴⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 474–475; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 324–325.

¹⁴⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 475.

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011, 2015–2016.

On 4 August 2017, the National University of Singapore (NUS) suspended Chinese-born American professor Huang Jing, director of the Centre on Asia and Globalisation at the NUS Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy. The Ministry of Home Affairs had identified Huang as a spy, saying that he had used his senior position to “deliberately and covertly advance the agenda of a foreign country at Singapore’s expense. He did this in collaboration with foreign intelligence agents.” It did not name the foreign country involved. It added that Huang’s permanent residency status would be revoked and he would be banned from re-entering the country. Huang was planning an appeal against his expulsion. Huang received his master degree from Fudan University, Shanghai, where he read history. Later, he obtained a doctorate in political science from Harvard University. He was an expert on Chinese politics and United States-China relations. Many said that he held pro-Chinese views.¹⁵⁰

In September 2017, Amos Yee Pang Sang was granted political asylum in the United States on the grounds that Singapore had persecuted him for exercising his right to peaceful expression [See also NCH Annual Reports 2015–2016].¹⁵¹

In November 2017, activist Jolovan Wham was charged with violating the Public Order Act, among other things because he had been involved in a silent protest to commemorate the 1987 arrests of activists under the Internal Security Act (ISA).¹⁵²

On 29 March 2018, Thum Ping Tjin, a Singaporean research fellow at Oxford University, coordinator of the university’s Project Southeast Asia and historian of Singapore’s independence struggle of the 1950s and 1960s, appeared before the Parliamentary Select Committee on Deliberate Online Falsehoods at a public hearing on “fake news.” In his written submission to the committee, he had claimed that fake news had not had a big impact in Singapore with the exception of Operation Coldstore (the 1963 imprisonment without trial of over 100 people deemed to be part of a Communist conspiracy to overthrow the government), when politicians of the People’s Action Party Government had told Singaporeans that “people were being detained without trial on national security grounds due to involvement with radical Communist conspiracies to subvert the state,” adding that “declassified documents have proven this to be a lie.” He was interrogated about this research for six hours by Minister for Law and Home Affairs K[asiviswanatha] Shanmugam, a committee member, who challenged Thum with evidence to the contrary. Shanmugam repeatedly expressed disdain for Thum’s research, rephrasing its findings in general terms that misrepresented it, and attempting to get Thum to agree to the rephrasing by forcing him to provide only yes/no answers. Following Thum’s appearance, an open letter in support of him and academic freedom in Singapore, signed by nearly 300 academics from various countries, was submitted to the committee. In a reaction, committee chairman and deputy speaker of parliament Charles Chong suggested on 30 April 2018 that “there has been a coordinated attempt, with foreign actors involved, to try to influence and subvert our parliamentary processes.” Oxford University senior lecturer Philip Kreager, chair of the Project South East Asia, refuted Chong’s conspiracy allegations. On 2 May 2018, three Oxford University academics who supervised Thum’s 2011 doctoral thesis (Chinese Language Political Mobilization in Singapore, 1953–1963) defended the latter’s academic credentials in a letter to Chong. In a follow-up submission in early May 2018 to the parliamentary committee, Thum provided detailed responses to the questions raised by the committee specifically regarding his historical research.

¹⁵⁰ Yojana Sharma, “University Suspends Professor after Foreign Spy Charge,” University World News (7 August 2017).

¹⁵¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 480.

¹⁵² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 479.

After he had published and lectured about Operation Coldstore in late 2013 and early 2014, Thum had been told by a senior NUS colleague that he would no longer be able to work in Singapore.¹⁵³

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2013–2015, 2017.

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2017.

Long-standing human rights violations continued to persist against the “erased,” an estimated 25,000 former permanent residents of Slovenia mostly originating from other former Yugoslav republics. They were removed from the official registry following Slovenia’s independence in 1991. The authorities failed to offer new options to the remaining “erased” in terms of restoring their legal status and related rights since the expiry of the Legal Status Act in 2013. In September and November 2017, the European Court of Human Rights ruled as inadmissible complaints by some of those whose applications for restoring legal status had been rejected under the Legal Status Act provisions.¹⁵⁴

¹⁵³ Low Youjin, “Oxford Professors Defend Historian Thum’s Thesis and Academic Credentials,” Today (2 May 2018); Yojana Sharma, “Academic Freedom Faces ‘Grave Threat’ from Parliament,” University World News (15 May 2018); Project SEA, “In Defence of Dr PJ Thum and Academic Freedom in Singapore” (Oxford 17 April 2018); The hearings on YouTube: “Delving into Singapore’s history” (Part 1 of 4) [1.28:48]; “Delving into Singapore’s history” (Part 2 of 4) [2.06:00]; “Delving into Singapore’s history” (Part 3 of 4) [1.33:20]; “Delving into Singapore’s history” (Part 4 of 4) [20:52].

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012–2014.

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012–2017.

In February 2017, the North Gauteng High Court ruled that the government’s attempt to withdraw from the International Criminal Court (ICC) was unconstitutional and invalid, as it had issued its withdrawal notice without consulting parliament. The court ordered President Jacob Zuma and the Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs to revoke the notice of withdrawal. The ICC debacle further dented South Africa’s international image as a champion of human rights and international justice. The government proposed legislation to parliament on withdrawal, but removed it from consideration in March. In December 2017, the government indicated at the ICC’s Assembly of States Parties in New York that it would indeed pursue its intent to withdraw.¹⁵⁵

In July 2017, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber ruled that South Africa violated its legal obligations to the court in failing to arrest Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in June 2015, when he attended the African Union Summit in the country. Al-Bashir was the subject of two ICC arrest warrants on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes committed in Darfur. South African courts had previously confirmed that the government had a duty to arrest al-Bashir. The chairperson of the African National Congress (ANC) International Relations subcommittee, Edna Molema, in an op-ed published a week later, said that the domestic court rulings on al-Bashir’s arrest had vindicated the ANC’s initial decision to withdraw from the ICC.¹⁵⁶

¹⁵⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 330.

¹⁵⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 493; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 24, 334.

¹⁵⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 493–494.

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015–2017.

Three transitional justice bodies, provided for in the 2015 Agreement on the Resolution of the Conflict in the Republic of South Sudan, had not been established by the end of 2017. In July 2017, the African Union (AU) Commission and the government agreed on the content of a statute and a memorandum of understanding for the establishment of one of the bodies, the Hybrid Court for South Sudan, although they were not formally approved or adopted. A technical committee for the Commission for Truth, Reconciliation, and Healing began consultations on the commission's design and legislative framework. South Sudan's legislative framework failed to define or criminalize torture, enforced disappearance, or crimes against humanity.¹⁵⁷

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2017.

Spanish authorities continued to close investigations into crimes under international law committed during the Civil War (1936–1939) and the Franco regime (1939–1975). They argued that it is not possible to investigate the crimes reported, such as enforced disappearances and torture, in view of, among other things, the 1977 Amnesty Act and the statute of limitations. The authorities continued to fail to take measures to locate and identify the remains of victims of enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions during the Civil War, leaving families and organizations to undertake exhumation projects without state support.¹⁵⁸

In February 2017, Mexico's Attorney General's Office started an investigation into the so-called "stolen babies" case, making Mexico the second country to investigate crimes under international law committed in Spain during the Civil War and the Franco regime. The investigation concerned the case of a woman born in Spain in 1968 and handed over to a Mexican family, reportedly after having been abducted from her family. In September 2017, the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances stated that this case constituted a new opportunity for Spain to fully cooperate in the investigations carried out by other states into enforced disappearances which occurred in ¹⁵⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 23, 338.

¹⁵⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 341.

Spain.¹⁵⁹

See also El Salvador, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey.

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2017.

In October 2015, the United Nations Human Rights Council adopted consensus resolution 30/1 in which Sri Lanka pledged to undertake several human rights reforms, including transitional justice demands arising from the civil war (1983–2009), and to establish four transitional justice mechanisms, including a judicial mechanism with “participation of international judges, prosecutors, lawyers and investigators.” Civil society leaders handed a comprehensive report to the government in January 2017. It contained strong recommendations, including for a hybrid justice mechanism. Neither the president nor the prime minister received the report publicly. Senior cabinet ministers explicitly rejected the recommendation that foreign nationals participate in the special court. Both the president and the prime minister publicly reiterated the point, and further emphasized that the government would not allow “war heroes” to be prosecuted.

One of the four pillars of the 2015 resolution was to create an Office of Missing Persons (OMP). Although the government had enacted a law to that effect in August 2016, efforts operationalizing it remained stalled until September 2017. Commissioners to the OMP had not been appointed and the OMP had yet to be formally set up at the end of 2017. In June 2017, President Maithripala Sirisena had promised families of the disappeared that he would order the release of lists of those who surrendered to, or were detained by, the armed forces during and after the armed conflict (1983–2009). The lists had not been made public by the end of 2017. Families of the disappeared said that the OMP was decided without proper consultation with affected groups. The 2016 act, therefore, did not address the need for psychosocial support, victim and witness protection measures, a minority rights commission, and symbolic gestures to allow public grieving, such as commemorating the dead.¹⁶⁰

Attempts by families to arrange stones as memorials for lost relatives were stopped by security forces. Catholic priest Elil Rajendram was detained and other residents of Mullaitivu were subjected to police ¹⁵⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 341.

¹⁶⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 507–509; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 40, 342, 343.

harassment following their efforts to hold memorials for family members who died during the armed conflict (1983–2009).¹⁶¹

See also India.

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2017.

The Security Council did not press Sudan to cooperate with the International Criminal Court (ICC) in its investigation into crimes committed in Darfur, despite having referred the situation to the ICC in 2005. The ICC first announced charges in 2007. It had outstanding arrest warrants against five individuals, including President Omar al-Bashir, for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide committed in Darfur between 2003 and 2008.¹⁶²

See also Jordan, South Africa.

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012–2013, 2015–2016.

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013, 2016–2017.

In September 2017, King Mswati III told the United Nations General Assembly in New York that Swaziland was committed to peace and a decent life for all. He said that his government granted all citizens an opportunity to voice their views in order to constructively contribute to the social, economic, cultural, and political development of the country. He failed to mention, however, the recent amendments to the Public Order Act, which allowed critics of the king or the Swazi government to be prosecuted, and upon conviction be fined E 10,0000 (US$ 770) or imprisoned for two years or both, for ¹⁶¹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 343.

¹⁶² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 519.

inciting “hatred or contempt” against the cultural and traditional heritage.¹⁶³

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2017.

In September 2017, a Syrian man who had served in the Syrian army was convicted of war crimes by the Södertörn District Court and sentenced to eight months’ imprisonment for violating the dignity of five dead or severely injured persons by posing for a photograph with his foot on one victim’s chest.¹⁶⁴

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009, 2014, 2016–2017.

In February 2018, it became known that the Federal Defense Department could not find 27 unpublished folders and dossiers from an investigation into a covert paramilitary group called “Projekt 26” or P-26 three decades ago. P-26 was established during the Cold War in the 1950s when, like in other countries, the Swiss military began assembling a guerrilla-style force to resist a Communist invasion. P-26 was disbanded in 1990 after revelations of its existence prompted a public scandal. Critics feared that the documents were destroyed or intentionally misplaced to hide embarrassing details about neutral Switzerland’s secret advances toward NATO or clandestine ties to foreign spy agencies such as MI6.¹⁶⁵

See also Algeria, Gambia, Liberia.

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2017.

The International Impartial and Independent Mechanism to assist in the investigation and prosecution of the most serious crimes under international law committed in Syria since March 2011 took shape

¹⁶³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 520.

¹⁶⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 348.

¹⁶⁵ John Miller, “In Switzerland, Dismay as Papers on Secret Cold War Army Vanish,” Reuters (7 February 2018).

during 2017 after its formal establishment in December 2016 by the United Nations General Assembly.¹⁶⁶

On 1 August 2017, Syrian officials informed Noura Ghazi, the wife of computer engineer Bassel Khartabil Safadi (1981–2017), that he had been extrajudicially executed in October 2015. During that same month, his colleagues had produced a new 3D model of Palmyra using data collected by him before his detention [see also NCH Annual Reports 2015–2016].¹⁶⁷

On 20–22 and possibly 26 January 2018, Turkish air strikes damaged a neo-Hittite temple at the Ain Dara site near the Kurdish-held city of Afrin, Aleppo Governate, destroying about 60% of the temple including some colossal carved basalt lions. The temple was an important example of Syro-Hittite religious architecture, built by the Arameans in the first millennium BCE. The Turkish military operation inside Syria had the purpose to extend a “buffer zone” that would sever the access of YPG (Syrian-Kurdish “People’s Protection Units”) to the Turkish border. On 19 March 2018, Turkish-backed Syrian rebels seized Afrin, meanwhile looting properties. Rebels tore down a statue of the Kurdish hero Kawa Haddad (a blacksmith who as a symbol of resistance against repression is a central figure in a Kurdish legend about the new year celebration of Nowruz). Many YPG fighters withdrew along with the estimated 220,000 civilians who fled the city in the days before the seizure.¹⁶⁸

See also Sweden, Turkey.

¹⁶⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 63.

¹⁶⁷ Louis Imbert, “Un cybermilitant syrien meurt en prison,” Le Monde (6–7 August 2017), 4; PEN International, “Joint Statement – Syria: Rights Groups Condemn Extrajudicial Execution of Human Rights Defender and Software Engineer Bassel Khartabil” (2 August 2017); Global Voices Advox, “They Can Kill Bassel, but not His Memory,” Ifex News (1 August 2017); Bassel Safadi (Khartabil), Letter [9 April] 2014, Index on Censorship, 46, no. 3 (Autumn 2017), 63.

¹⁶⁸ “Syria War: Turkish Air Strikes ‘Damage Ancient Afrin Temple’,” BBC News (29 January 2018); Michael Danti, Darren Ashby, Marina Gabriel & Susan Penacho, “Update: Ain Dara,” Asor: Cultural Heritage Initiatives (s.d. [January 2018]); Diana Darke, “How Historical Afrin Became a Prize Worth a War,” BBC News (24 January 2018); “Syria War: Afrin Looted by Turkish-Backed Rebels,” BBC News (19 March 2018).

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012, 2016–2017.

From mid-February to early June 2017 when they were dispersed, Indigenous people and supporters staged a 100-day sit-in near the Presidential Office protesting against government guidelines, proposed by the cabinet-level Council of Indigenous Peoples, on changing the designation of traditional Indigenous territory.¹⁶⁹

TAJKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2017.

In October 2016, the government sentenced human rights lawyer Buzurgmehr Yorov to 21 years' imprisonment in a political trial. In two additional trials held in 2017, the authorities extended Yorov's prison sentence by two years for insulting a government official and for citing a stanza of the 11th- and 12th-century Persian poet Omar Khayyam (1048–1131), during his own trial. At the end of 2017, prosecutors were seeking Yorov's imprisonment for up to five more years in relation to additional charges of fraud and "insulting the president," increasing Yorov's total possible jail term from 25 to 30 years.¹⁷⁰

In July 2017, security service officers in seven cities across Tajikistan arbitrarily detained and interrogated the relatives of at least ten peaceful activists who, earlier that month, had attended a conference in Dortmund, Germany, commemorating the signing of the peace accords that formally ended Tajikistan's civil war (1992–1997). Authorities retaliated against the activists' relatives, publicly shaming them for their family members' activism.¹⁷¹

In August 2017, President Emomali Rahmon signed into law amendments to the Law on Traditions regulating the practice of cultural traditions and celebrations. The amendments compelled citizens to wear traditional dress at cultural celebrations or ceremonies, such as weddings and funerals. Women in particular were prohibited from wearing black at funerals. In the same month, police and local officials

¹⁶⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 353–354.

¹⁷⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 537.

¹⁷¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 536.

approached over 8,000 women who were wearing the Islamic headscarf (hijab) in public places, ordered them to remove it because it was against the law, and asked them instead to wear a headscarf tied behind the head in the “traditional Tajik way.” Dozens of women were briefly detained, many had their hijabs forcibly removed. Women wearing western-style dress were not targeted. Government officials claimed that the hijab was a form of “alien culture and tradition” and a sign of “extremism.” Shops selling Islamic clothing were raided by security forces and many were forced to close.¹⁷²

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2016–2017.

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2017.

In spite of evidence showing that soldiers were responsible for most casualties during the 2010 political confrontations with the United Front for Democracy Against Dictatorship (UDD), or “Red Shirts,” that left at least 90 dead and more than 2,000 injured, no military personnel or officials from the government of former Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva have been charged for killing and wounding civilians at the time. On the other hand, numerous UDD leaders and supporters faced serious criminal charges for their street protests in 2010.

In August 2017, the Supreme Court’s Criminal Division for Political Office Holders acquitted former Prime Minister Somchai Wongsawat and other senior government officials for their roles in the violent crackdown on the People’s Alliance for Democracy (PAD) protesters in October 2008, which left two people dead and more than 400 injured.¹⁷³

In 2017, six people were arrested for sharing Facebook posts concerning the removal of a plaque commemorating events in 1932 that brought an end to absolute monarchy. At the end of 2017 they remained imprisoned, facing charges on multiple counts of violation of Article 112 of the Penal Code (the lèse majesté provision).¹⁷⁴

¹⁷² Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 356.

¹⁷³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 549.

¹⁷⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 360.

On 9 October 2017, Sulak Sivaraksa was summoned for an interrogation before military prosecutors in his 2014 trial for lèse majesté. After Sivaraksa, a proclaimed monarchist, petitioned King Vajiralongkorn for help, the court dropped the charges for lack of evidence on 17 January 2018 [see also NCH Annual Reports 1995, 2008, 2015, 2017].¹⁷⁵

On 31 January 2018, historian Charnvit Kasetsiri ([1942–]), former President of Thammasat University, reported to the police's Technology Crime Suppression Division (TCSD) to hear a cybercrime charge against him. The police accused him of violating Article 14 of the Computer Crime Act. If found guilty, he would face up to five years in prison, a fine of up to 100,00 baht, or both. The charge emerged after he had shared on his Facebook account a false news report that during a visit to Washington in October 2017, Naraporn Chan-ocha, wife of Prime Minister and junta leader Prayut Chan-o-cha, had a two-million-baht Hermes purse, while it was, in fact, a product of Thailand's Royal Folk Arts and Crafts Center and cost no more than 10,000 baht. Subsequently, the TCSD accused Charnvit of disseminating forged computer data likely to cause damage to a third party, a violation of the Computer Crimes Act. Upon arriving at the TCSD, Charnvit read a statement, denying the charges, and emphasizing that he merely exercised his freedom of expression. He observed that his case was one of many SLAPP cases (Strategic Lawsuits against Public Participation), meant to shut down criticism.¹⁷⁶

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2013, 2015–2017.

A new government body – the Chega! National Center: From Memory to Hope (CNC) – was established through Decree Law No. 48/2016. The CNC's purpose was to facilitate the implementation of recommendations made by the truth commission (CAVR) in 2005 and the bilateral Timor-Leste and Indonesia Commission of Truth and Friendship in 2008. The main planned activities of the CNC included memorialization, education, solidarity with victims of past human rights violations, and outreach. However, the CNC did not have a mandate to address the CAVR's recommendations on justice and reparations for victims of serious human rights violations.¹⁷⁷

¹⁷⁵ Pravit Rojanaphruk, "112 Case Moves Forward against Historian For Doubting 16th Century 'Elephant Duel'" (6 October 2017); PEN International, "Thailand: Octogenarian Writer and Activist Faces 15-year Prison Sentence," (27 October 2017); AP, "Thailand Drops Royal Insult Charges against Elderly Historian," CBS News (17 January 2018); Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 359–360; Global Coalition to Protect Education from Attack, Education under Attack 2018 (New York: GCPEA, 2018), 243.

¹⁷⁶ "Former TU Rector Charnvit Reports to Police over Cybercrime Charge," Prachatai (31 January 2018).

¹⁷⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 361–

Victims of serious human rights violations committed during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999) continued to demand justice and reparations.¹⁷⁸

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2013, 2017.

The authorities continued to fail to take steps to identify those suspected of responsibility for human rights violations, including the deaths of nearly 500 people, during the violence surrounding the presidential election in 2005. Of the 72 complaints filed by the 364 victims' families with the Atakpamé, Amlamé and Lomé courts, none are known to have been fully investigated.¹⁷⁹

TRINIDAD and TOBAGO

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

In October 2017, a statue of Christopher Columbus in the capital Port of Spain was defaced with red paint by locals demanding its removal. The newly launched Jamaica-based Center for Reparations Research (CRR) resolved that Caribbean governments “be asked to remove from places of public celebration monuments statues and other effigies to persons who either committed or facilitated [...] crimes against humanity in the Caribbean.” “Therefore,” the CRC chair added, “monuments to such persons as Christopher Columbus, Horatio Nelson, and Francis Drake – and all other military and civil supporters of slavery and the colonial project – should be removed.”¹⁸⁰

362.

¹⁷⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 43, 361.

¹⁷⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 363–364.

¹⁸⁰ Earl Bousquet, “Tri-Continental Nations Support Caribbean Quest for Reparations,” Telesur (1 December 2017).

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2017.

On 24 December 2013, the National Constituent Assembly (NCA) adopted the Law on Establishing and Organizing Transitional Justice. The law established a Truth and Dignity Commission (IVD) tasked with uncovering the truth about abuses committed between July 1955, shortly before Tunisia's independence from France, and the law's adoption in December 2013. The IVD (the only ongoing national transitional justice mechanism in North Africa) declared, in June 2016, that it had received 62,065 complaints from people alleging human rights abuses and had begun processing them. On 17–18 November 2016, the IVD held the first public hearings of victims of human rights violations, which were aired live on national television and radio stations. Since then, the IVD had held eleven more hearings covering various human rights violations during the Ben Ali and Bourguiba presidencies (1987–2011 and 1956–1987 respectively), such as torture, abuses against union rights, sexual assault against women imprisoned for political reasons, and violations of economic rights.

The transitional justice process suffered a major setback with the adoption, on 13 September 2017, of a law on “reconciliation in the administrative field” by a vote of 117 votes to nine, with one abstention. The law offered blanket impunity for those civil servants implicated in corruption and embezzlement of public funds but who did not benefit personally. For this category of persons, the law terminated any ongoing prosecutions and trials and preempted future trials. The law would thus impair the IVD work, which had a mandate to investigate economic crimes and situate them within the larger picture of systematic corruption under Ben Ali.

The transitional justice process also suffered from lack of criminal accountability for serious human rights violations. Authorities have failed in the seven years since Ben Ali's overthrow to investigate or hold anyone accountable for the vast majority of torture cases, including notorious cases of death in custody as a result of torture. By late 2017, the specialized chambers had not been set up.

There was no progress on the adoption of a memorandum of understanding between the IVD and the Ministry of Justice to allow for the referral of cases to specialized judicial chambers. Government institutions including the Ministries of the Interior, Defense, and Justice continued to fail to provide the IVD with the information it requested for its investigations. The Military Justice system refused to hand over to the IVD the case files of the trials of those accused of killing protesters during the 2011 uprising and of victims of police repression during the Siliana protests in 2012.¹⁸¹

¹⁸¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 556–557; Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 63, 366.

On 30 January 2018, eleven NGO's, coordinated by Hassine Bouchiba, organized a sit-in in front of the IVD premises and asked what would be the fate of the files of those who were wounded and who died during the 2011 revolution. They recommended that the files be kept in the National Archives and not transferred abroad. None of the survivors had had access to their files [See also NCH Annual Reports 2015–2017].¹⁸²

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2017.

On 30 March 2017, police reportedly detained 37 students from İstanbul University who participated in a peaceful demonstration commemorating the 1972 Kızıldereli Massacre – a military raid in which 10 activists in Turkey were killed after taking British intelligence officers hostage, allegedly to stop the execution of their imprisoned colleagues. Shortly after the demonstration began, plainclothes police arrived on the scene and detained 37 of the students.¹⁸³

On 21 July 2017, a new bill, passed by the Constitutional Committee, banned any mention of the 1915 Armenian genocide by parliamentarians. Those who broached the subject in parliament could have deductions made from their salaries and could be barred from attending parliamentary sessions. Armenians and governments of more than 29 countries labeled the deaths of Armenians during this period as genocide. The Turkish state called it tehcir, or forced displacement.¹⁸⁴

On 19 August 2017, German-Turkish writer Dogan Akhanli ([1956–]), a known critic of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, was arrested in Granada, Spain, after an Interpol “red notice.” Akhanli wrote extensively on human rights in Turkey, including about the 2007 murder of Hrant Dink [See also NCH Annual Reports 2006–2015] and the 1915 Armenian genocide. He was granted release the next same day on condition that he would stay in Madrid. Akhanli had been a political prisoner between 1985 and 1987. He fled to Germany in 1991 as a refugee, achieving citizenship in 2001. He was arrested again in 2010 when he visited Istanbul, accused of a 1989 armed robbery. He was acquitted and released after a number of months - only to have proceedings reinstated at a later date.¹⁸⁵

¹⁸² “Sit-in devant le siège de l’IVD pour réclamer le sort réservé aux dossiers des victimes” Shems FM (30 January 2018); “L’institution des Archives Nationales inquiète du sort des archives de l’IVD,” Leaders (27 February 2018).

¹⁸³ Scholars at Risk, Free to Think 2017 (New York: SAR, 2017), 24–25; Global Coalition to Protect Education from Attack, Education under Attack 2018 (New York: GCPEA, 2018), 248.

¹⁸⁴ Kaya Genç, “Unleashing the Past,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 23–24.

¹⁸⁵ “Dogan Akhanli: Spain Grants Erdogan Critic Conditional Release,” BBC News (20 August 2017).

On 22 March 2018, police detained Kübra Sağır, a Turkish literature and history student at Boğaziçi University and head of the Kurdish literature commission at the university's student literature club, during a raid on her student dorm. They questioned Sağır about the preparations for the peaceful student protest on 19 March against the Turkish military operation in the northwest Syrian district of Afrin and for two of the slogans used then, neither of which promoted violence. On 3 April, the 6th Istanbul Peace Court accepted the prosecutor's request to arrest her, pending trial on charges of terrorism propaganda. She was held in the Bakırköy Women's Prison.¹⁸⁶

In early June 2018, Büşra Ersanlı – emeritus professor of political science at Marmara University specialized in historical subjects – who was on trial for having signed the January 2016 petition “We will not be party to this crime” (calling on the government to stop violence against civilian Kurds) was sentenced to 15 months in prison under Article 7.2 of the Anti-Terror Law (“propaganda for a terrorist organization.”) The measure was applied with immediate effect because Ersanlı did “not express any remorse.” Ersanlı had the right to object to the verdict within a week. The hearings against academics who had signed the petition started on 5 December 2017. As of June 2018, 242 academics had had their first hearings, 15 of which were sentenced to 15 months in prison. All the sentences were suspended, except those of Zübeyde Füsün Üstel and of Ersanlı [see also NCH Annual Reports 2012–2013].¹⁸⁷

See also Greece, Netherlands, Syria.

¹⁸⁶ Human Rights Watch, Turkey: Government Targeting Academics: Dismissals, Prosecutions Create Campus Climate of Fear (New York: Human Rights Watch, 14 May 2018), 6.

¹⁸⁷ Beyza Kural (Bianet), “Prof. Dr. Büşra Ersanlı Sentenced to 1 Year, 3 Months in Prison Without Deferment,” Barış İçin Akademisyenler / Academics for Peace (5 June 2018); Committee of Concerned Scientists, “Turkish Academic Sentenced to 15 Months for Signing Peace Petition” (8 June 2018); “Turkish Academic Receives Jail Sentence for Signing Peace Petition,” Ahval News (5 June 2018).

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012, 2015–2017.

Dozens of people arrested in the late 1990s and early 2000s remain forcibly disappeared in Turkmen prisons. They included at least 80 prisoners subjected to enforced disappearance after an alleged assassination attempt on then President Saparmurat Niyazov in November 2002. Following their arrest, the government denied their families access to them and information on their whereabouts. In 2017, the fate and whereabouts of these men remained unknown, except in the cases of three who died and whose bodies authorities returned to families, confirmed by Prove They Are Alive, an international campaign against enforced disappearances in Turkmenistan.¹⁸⁸

¹⁸⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 373; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 572.

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2017.

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011, 2014–2017.

Justice for conflict-related abuses and crimes committed during the 2014 Maidan protests, which led to the ouster of the Ukrainian government and mass disturbances in Odessa, remained elusive. In September 2017, an Odessa court acquitted all 19 defendants who were on trial for offenses related to the 2 May 2014 mass disturbances, which pitted pro-Maidan and anti-Maidan groups against each other, and in which 48 people died and more than 200 were injured. All 19 were anti-Maidan activists, five of them were in pre-trial custody since 2014. The court stated that the prosecution “did not even try to prove their guilt.” The Security Service of Ukraine (SBU) immediately accused two of them of separatism, and a court remanded them to custody. A crowd of Ukrainian nationalists attempted to storm the courtroom as judges announced the verdict, using tear gas and stones, and injuring about 20 police officers. Police investigated, but at the end of 2017 no one was held accountable. One pro-Maidan suspect remains at liberty, pending trial.¹⁸⁹

On [17] January 2018, the State Committee for State TV and Radio Broadcasting banned Stalingrad (1998), an award-winning book by British historian Anthony Beevor ([1946]–) about the battle of Stalingrad (August 1942–February 1943). It was called anti-Ukrainian and prohibited on the grounds that it might incite “inter-ethnic, racial and religious hostility,” because it had mentioned the massacre of 90 Jewish orphans by Ukrainian nationalist militiamen on Nazi orders in Bila Tserkva on 21 August 1942. Officials banned the import of 30,000 Russian-language copies of the book. The authorities accused Beevor of wrongly ascribing the massacre to the militiamen. A head of the committee, Serhiy Oliyinyk, said that “several paragraphs did not allow us to give permission for [the import of] this book” and accused Beevor of falling for a “provocation” that was never confirmed by war crimes prosecutors after the conflict. Beevor responded that his source, Lieutenant-Colonel Helmuth Groscurth, an anti-Nazi German officer who tried to stop the executions, was clearly mentioned in the book; he denied that he used a Soviet source as the committee alleged. He demanded an apology. Together with this book, 24 other books were banned, including one by Russian historian Boris Sokolov. The ban was eventually overturned.¹⁹⁰

¹⁸⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 581–582.

See also Russia.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2016.

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2017.

The Iraq Historic Allegations Team, a body set up to investigate alleged abuses of civilians in Iraq by United Kingdom (UK) armed forces between 2003 and July 2009, was shut down by the government in June 2017. A preliminary examination by the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court into alleged war crimes committed by UK personnel in Iraq remained open.¹⁹¹

In January 2017, the Historic Institutional Abuse Inquiry published findings from the investigation into 22 residential children’s institutions in Northern Ireland, covering the period from 1922 to 1995. It found widespread and systemic failings by the United Kingdom and institutions in their duties toward the children in their care. The government had not implemented any of the recommendations at the end of 2017. It continued to refuse funding to implement plans by the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland to address the backlog of “legacy” coroners’ inquests.¹⁹²

In December 2017, The Guardian newspaper reported that thousands of files had “vanished” from the National Archives in Surrey after being requested by government departments (including the Ministry of Defence, Home Office, and Foreign Office). It reported that files included those related to the conflict in Northern Ireland, the Falklands War, and defense agreements with Malaya. Government files held at the National Archives had previously been key to exposing details of human rights violations carried out by United Kingdom security forces in Northern Ireland¹⁹³

¹⁹⁰ Tom Parfitt, “Sir Antony Beevor Goes into Battle as Book on Stalingrad Is Banned,” The Times (20 January 2018); Coilin O’Connor & Andy Heil, “Historian Beevor ‘Astonished’ at Ukraine Ban on Best-Selling ‘Stalingrad’,” RFE/RL News (17 January 2018); Stephen Komarnyckyj, “The Whole Truth,” Index on Censorship, 47 no. 1 (Spring 2018), 42–43.

¹⁹¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2018: Events of 2017 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2018), 231.

¹⁹² Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 383.

See also China, India, Iran, Russia, Singapore, Switzerland, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, Ukraine, United States.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2017.

In June 2017, it became known that the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) destroyed records on its involvement in the 1953 coup in Iran when it moved offices on the incorrect belief that there were copies of the records elsewhere. In late 2017, a partially-declassified CIA history of the coup, entitled Zendebad, Shah!, was released; it reflected two documents: a 200-page internal CIA history of the coup from 2000 (the so-called Wilber report), which was leaked to the New York Times, and part of a declassified 2011 internal document confirming its coup activities [see also NCH Annual Report 2017].¹⁹⁴

The National Archives and Records Administration (NARA) formally approved a CIA records retention schedule that allowed the CIA to destroy information that is more than 30 years old – in spite of warnings from public interest groups that this would likely result in the destruction of many important documents, potentially including classified information related to the CIA’s official actions abroad, investigative files from the offices of the Inspector General, Security, and Counterintelligence, files relating to CIA spies that the CIA itself did not deem “significant,” and files related to CIA investigations into alleged unauthorized releases of classified information.¹⁹⁵

When in July 2017 dozens of the white supremacist Ku Klux Klan (KKK) group in Virginia took part in an authorized march to protest at the planned removal of a statue of General Robert E. Lee (who oversaw the pro-slavery Confederate forces in the United States civil war, 1860–1865) from Charlottesville, Virginia, they were met by hundreds of rival demonstrators. Police declared the counter-protests “unlawful” and used tear gas to disperse the crowds. On 12 August 2017, violent clashes took place during another march in Charlottesville, where white supremacists and neo-Nazis again protested against the removal of the Lee monument. A 32-year-old woman was killed and nearly 20 people injured when a car was driven into a crowd of counter-protesters. Following the clashes, dozens of schools and local governments began removing statues dedicated to the Confederacy. Four Confederate-era statues were taken down in Baltimore, Maryland, while the governors of Virginia and North Carolina ordered the removal of similar monuments in their states.

¹⁹³ Amnesty International, “UK: ‘Lost’ Archives—Amnesty Concern at Possible Loss of Evidence of Human Rights Violations in Northern Ireland” (press release; 26 December 2017).

¹⁹⁴ Lauren Harper, “Is NARA Rubber-Stamping Potentially Damaging Records Retention Schedules?” Unredacted (15 February 2018).

¹⁹⁵ Lauren Harper, “Is NARA Rubber-Stamping Potentially Damaging Records Retention Schedules?” Unredacted (15 February 2018).

A rally in February 2016 had ended with the arrests of 13 people after a violent clash between members of the KKK and rival demonstrators resulted in a number of stabbings in Anaheim, California. In May [2017], a torch-lit rally against the removal of Confederate monuments in Virginia had been condemned by a local mayor. More than 100 people attended a counter-protest the following night.¹⁹⁶

On 28 August 2017, the American Historical Association published a Statement on Confederate Monuments. It specified, among others: “To remove such monuments is neither to ‘change’ history nor ‘erase’ it. What changes with such removals is what American communities decide is worthy of civic honor,” and “We also encourage communities to remember that all memorials remain artifacts of their time and place. They should be preserved, just like any other historical document, whether in a museum or some other appropriate venue. Prior to removal they should be photographed and measured in their original contexts.”¹⁹⁷

In September 2017, Harvard University decided to overturn Michelle Jones’s admission to its Ph.D. program in History. Faculty of Arts and Sciences administrators overturned the History Department’s decision to admit Jones to its doctoral program, apparently out of concern over a potential backlash for admitting a formerly incarcerated student to the university. Jones had been convicted on charges of murder. She was later accepted by New York University.¹⁹⁸

In early September 2017, an opinion piece signed by Ronn Torossian, Hank Sheinkopf, and George Birnbaum appeared in three politically conservative Jewish publications (the Jewish Press, the Algemeiner and the Israeli network Arutz Sheva). It attacked David Myers, a UCLA historian of Jewish civilization who was appointed President of the Center for Jewish History in New York City in June 2017, as an extremist who “must be fired for radical viewpoints.” It criticized Myers for serving on the board of the liberal New Israel Fund; for having helped raise money online for If Not Now, which opposed the occupation of the West Bank; and for advising J Street, a lobby that supports a two-state solution. The piece also linked to several essays and reviews written by Myers, including one from 2008 in which he wrote that “the deep wound of the Nakba must finally be exposed to the light of day, and in some way be healed.” In a 7 September 2017 letter to the Center, nearly 500 scholars in the field of Jewish Studies, united in a Jewish Studies Activist Network, protested against the attack and defended Myers.¹⁹⁹

¹⁹⁶ “KKK Rally in Virginia Leads to Rival Protests and Clashes,” BBC News (9 July 2017); “University of Texas Removes Four Confederate Statues,” BBC News (21 August 2017); Robert Lockett & Otis Pickett, “Charlottesville and the Mississippi Flag,” Jackson Free Press (21 August 2017).

¹⁹⁷ American Historical Association, Statement on Confederate Monuments (28 August 2017).

¹⁹⁸ Jason Beckfield, Joyce E. Chaplin, & Khalil Gibran Muhammad, “We Are Educators, Not Prosecutors,” Harvard Crimson (20 September 2017).

In early September 2017, the peer-reviewed development studies journal Third World Quarterly published an essay by Bruce Gilley ([1966–]), associate professor of political science at Portland State University, entitled “The Case for Colonialism.” The article argued for a return to Western colonialism as a solution to the problems facing weak and fragile states. Two petitions calling for the essay’s retraction gathered 10,000 signatures. Within a few weeks, half of the Third World Quarterly editorial board (15 of 34 members) had resigned, including the editor, Shahid Qadir, who had received “credible threats of personal violence” from Indian nationalists and resigned for his own safety. Approximately one month after its publication date, Gilley consented to the article’s withdrawal by the journal’s publisher. Some of the professors who had organized the petition to retract Gilley’s article found themselves the subject of online harassment. Portland State University’s diversity office investigated a complaint of discrimination and harassment against Gilley, which the latter described as a gross abuse of process.

In the United Kingdom, a similar heated controversy took place when Nigel Biggar ([1955–]), regius professor of moral and pastoral theology at Oxford, defended similar theses in The Times of 30 November 2017. Biggar ran a five-year interdisciplinary project, Ethics and Empire, with invitation-only workshops. Oxford University supported Biggar’s right to consider the historical context of the British empire.²⁰⁰

In early February 2018, vandals at the University of Tennessee Chattanooga campus tried to cover up posters for black history month with ones referencing Adolf Hitler. On 17 February 2018, the white nationalist group Traditionalist Workers Party advertised an event at the University of Tennessee Knoxville campus, but the group was not welcome on campus.²⁰¹

¹⁹⁹ Mark Oppenheimer, “The Israel Litmus-test and Scholarly Freedom,” Los Angeles Times (8 September 2017); Jewish Studies Activist Network, “Letter to the Board of the Center for Jewish History” (7 September 2017).

²⁰⁰ Rebecca Schendel, “Our Mission Is To Speak Truth to Power under Threat,” University World News (19 January 2018); Nigel Biggar, “Don’t Feel Guilty about our Colonial History,” The Times (30 November 2017); “Letters to the Editor: Our Colonial History and Guilt over Empire,” The Times (2 December 2017); Vimal Patel, “Scholar Who Defended Colonialism Now Defends Himself,” University World News (23 March 2018); Reuben Rose-Redwood, “Genocide Hoax Tests Ethics of Academic Publishing,” The Conversation (2 July 2018).

²⁰¹ “Black History Month Posters Covered Up at University of Tennessee with Ones Referencing Hitler,” CBS News (9 February 2018).

In April 2018, New York City removed a statue of James Marion Sims (1813–1883), unveiled in the 1890s, from Central Park. Known as the “father of gynecology,” Sims had performed medical experiments on enslaved black women using no anesthetic. The statue was removed following a review into “hate symbols.”²⁰²

In its majority opinion upholding President Donald Trump’s ban on travel into the United States of citizens of several predominantly Muslim countries on 26 June 2018, the Supreme Court also overturned a long-criticized 1944 decision that the United States government could force more than 120,000 people of Japanese descent into internment camps in 1942–1946. Justice Sonia Sotomayor had mentioned the 1944 case, Korematsu v. United States, in her dissent, arguing that the rationale behind the majority decision had “stark parallels” to Korematsu; in both cases, Sotomayor argued, the government “invoked an ill-defined national security threat to justify an exclusionary policy of sweeping proportion.” Writing for the majority, Chief Justice John Roberts argued that the case was not relevant to the travel ban, but also said that it was now overturned: “The dissent’s reference to Korematsu ... affords this Court the opportunity to make express what is already obvious: Korematsu was gravely wrong the day it was decided, has been overruled in the court of history, and – to be clear – ‘has no place in law under the Constitution.’” The Korematsu decision (6–3), although much criticized, including by Supreme Court justices, had never been formally revoked.²⁰³

On 3 July 2018, Facebook sent a notice to the Liberty County Vindicator in Texas saying that some words in a post that violated its “standards on hate speech” were removed. The Vindicator had posted bite-size sections of the United States Declaration of Independence in the run-up to the 4 July 1776 independence celebrations, including its paragraphs 27–31 containing the phrase “Indian Savages.” Facebook apologized and restored the text a day later.²⁰⁴

See also Central African Republic, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Poland, Russia, Singapore.

²⁰² “New York: James Marion Sims Statue Removed from Central Park,” BBC News (17 April 2018).

²⁰³ Abby Vesoulis & Abigail Simon, “The Supreme Court Overturned a Ruling That Enabled Internment of Japanese-Americans During World War II,” Time (26 June 2018); ; Jennifer Medina, “For Survivors of Japanese Internment Camps, Court’s Korematsu Ruling Is ‘Bittersweet’,” New York Times (28 June 2018).

²⁰⁴ Jason Murdock, “Declaration of Independence Flagged as Hate Speech by Facebook,” Newsweek (5 July 2018).

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013, 2015–2017.

In February 2017, human rights defenders investigating human rights violations that occurred during the military regime (1973–1985) reported receiving death threats; the sources of these threats were not investigated. In May 2017, human rights defenders denounced these threats at a hearing before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, which the Uruguayan authorities did not attend. The national Working Group on Truth and Justice, implemented in 2015, had not achieved concrete results regarding reparations for victims of past crimes under international law. In October 2017, the Supreme Court ruled that crimes committed during the military regime did not amount to crimes against humanity and were, therefore, subject to statutes of limitations, hindering victims' access to justice, and preventing the prosecution of those suspected of criminal responsibility.²⁰⁵

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2014, 2016.

²⁰⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 30–31, 389.

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011, 2015.

See Colombia, Netherlands.

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012, 2014, 2017.

Most victims of human rights violations continued to lack access to truth, justice, and reparation. Victims and their families were often subjected to intimidation. In April 2017, two officers of the Bolivarian National Guard were sentenced for killing Geraldine Moreno during demonstrations in Carabobo state in 2014. The majority of victims of murder, torture, and other violations by state actors were yet to receive justice or reparation. The Attorney General's Office announced investigations into killings in the context of protests between April and July 2017. The National Constituent Assembly, established on 30 July 2017, appointed a Truth Commission to investigate cases of human rights violations during the protests, but there were concerns about its independence and impartiality. There were reports of victims or their families being pressured by authorities to testify and agree on facts that could waive the responsibility of state agents for these violations, as well as obstacles to the work of defense lawyers working with human rights organizations.²⁰⁶

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2013, 2016–2017.

²⁰⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 396.

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco / Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010, 2013–2016.

Since the civil war began in 2011 and international armed conflict followed in March 2015, all parties committed serious violations of international humanitarian law and violations and abuses of human rights law with absolute impunity. Since its inception in September 2015, the National Commission to Investigate Alleged Violations of Human Rights, established by the Yemeni government, failed to conduct prompt, impartial, and effective investigations consistent with international standards into alleged human rights violations committed by all parties to the conflict in Yemen. Similarly, the Saudi Arabia-led coalition investigative mechanism continued to appear to lack the necessary impartiality and independence to carry out its work credibly. With the proliferation of armed groups and security forces without command and the lack of effective control of the central government over its security forces and territories, the space for impunity further widened. In its mid-term report, the United Nations (UN) Panel of Experts on Yemen expressed concern that member states of the coalition were expressly shielding themselves from accountability and individual responsibility by hiding behind the umbrella of the coalition. In a positive development, the UN Human Rights Council passed a resolution in September 2017 mandating a group of experts to investigate abuses by all parties in Yemen. This constituted a first step toward justice for victims of human rights abuses and grave violations of international law.²⁰⁷

²⁰⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 63, 402.

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2015.

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2015.

On 10 November 2017, the police disrupted a meeting in Marange Village, in the east, of 22 activists from Latin American and Southern African countries to commemorate the ninth anniversary of the killing of 200 people by the military. The 200 had been killed after they took control of the diamond fields in protest at government plans to hand over diamond mines to Chinese businesses. The 22 activists were arrested and charged with entering a protected area without a government permit. They were released on 11 November after pleading guilty and were each fined US$ 100.²⁰⁸

²⁰⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2017/18: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2018), 406.

INTRODUCTION

The twenty-third Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It mainly covers events and developments of 2016 and 2017.

Disclaimer. The fact that the NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

Download this report at:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/17.pdf>

Cite this report as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2017

(<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/17.pdf>).

For the complete set of NCH Annual Reports, see:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content/ar.html>

Or click:

							2017	2016	2015
2014	2013	2012	2011	2010	2009	2008	2007	2006	2005
2004	2003	2002	2001	2000	1999	1998	1997	1996	1995

All Annual Reports (1995–2017) were compiled by Antoon De Baets.

Please send any comments to antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org

AFGHANISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2016.

ALBANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2012, 2015–2016.

In April 2015, the parliament passed a law opening up files from the secret police (Sigurimi) of the Communist era (1944–1991) to people who were spied upon and barring former Sigurimi members from holding public office in the future. An estimated 7,000 opponents of the regime were killed and more than 100,000 deported to labor camps. During the Communist era, 90 percent of the Sigurimi files were destroyed every five years as a routine practice. In 1991 many of the remaining files were destroyed; the rest is kept in the Interior Ministry archive. Kastriot Dervishi, the archive's former director, estimated that the surviving documents comprised random samples from the files of only 12,000 or so Sigurimi collaborators—roughly 10 percent of the total. Unofficial sources believe that about 20 percent of Albanians collaborated with the Sigurimi.

In December 2016, Prime Minister Edi Rama announced that, as a follow-up to the 2015 law, a commission had been charged with opening the Sigurimi files and with vetting candidates for public office to see if they collaborated with the repressive regime. The commission was chaired by Gentiana Sula, a former deputy minister of social welfare. She said that initial estimates suggested that there were “millions of pages of documents, more than 120,000 files and 250,000 records.” Critics feared that the 2015 law did not oblige the government to publicize the findings of searches or to remove officials who were former collaborators. Albania also planned to sign an agreement with the International Commission on Missing Persons, paving the way for an official effort to find and identify the remains of some 6,000 disappeared.¹

¹ “Albania Opens Communist Secret Police Files,” BBC News (1 May 2015); Matthew Brunwasser, “As Albania Reckons With Its Communist Past, Critics Say It’s Too Late,” New York Times (26 February 2017); Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 62; Briseida Mema, “Opening Secret Police Files, Albania Seeks to Drain the Swamp,” AFP News (27 March 2017).

ALGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001–2016.

Perpetrators of human rights crimes and abuses during the internal armed conflict (1992–2000) continued to enjoy impunity under the 2006 Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation. The charter criminalized comments deemed to denigrate the security forces or state institutions for their conduct during the armed conflict, when both state forces and extremist Islamist groups committed torture, enforced disappearances, unlawful killings, and other serious abuses. Associations representing the families of the disappeared continued to face denial for legal registration. Families of the disappeared alleged being subject to pressures because they refused compensation from the state in exchange for accepting a death certificate for their still-missing relatives. The authorities also continued to protect state forces responsible for serious crimes in the 1990s by criminalizing calls for justice, thus turning the law on its head.²

In June 2016, the French gave 22 volumes of copies of diplomatic documents about the Liberation War (1954–1962) to the Algerian national archives. On 31 October 2016, Director General of the National Archives Abdelmadjid Sheikhi (Chikhi) accused the French authorities of hiding their Algerian archives (estimated by him at sixty tons of documents), which were secretly transferred to France in the last years of colonization (1961–1962). On 2 February 2017, the Cour des comptes (public auditor) found that the archives brought to France from Algeria and Indochina after decolonization and located in its National Archives had not been preserved, catalogued or made accessible adequately. Only an unspecified quantity of records relating to the 17 October 1961 massacre and to the Algerian war of independence had been made accessible after May 1999 and April 2001 respectively.³

In 2017, Leila Sidhoum, assistant professor at the Faculty of Political Science of the University of Algiers 3, was awarded a distinction for her PhD research on the role of governing elites in the period between 1989 and 2016. However, the acting dean reportedly blocked her degree and pulled her work from the university library. Sidhoum said that she had been told to remove parts of the thesis referring to the army, the president and the banned Islamic Salvation Front political party (FIS) during the armed conflict (1992–2000).⁴

² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 54, 65; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 76.

³ “La France remet à l'Algérie des copies d'archives de guerre,” CRIonline (22 June 2016); “France Accused of Hiding Its Archive Smuggled during Colonial Era,” Memo: Middle East Monitor (1 November 2016); APS “La Conservation des archives rapatriés d'Algérie en 1962 est ‘défaillante’” Al Huffington Post (4 February 2017).

See also France, Mali.

ANGOLA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2009, 2016.

On 29 June 2016, the Supreme Court in Luanda ordered the conditional release of the group of seventeen known as the Luanda Book Club [see NCH Annual Report 2016] after it upheld a habeas corpus petition filed in April, requesting that the seventeen be released pending a decision on their appeal to the Constitutional Court. The seventeen were not allowed to leave Angola and were required to check in with the authorities every month while waiting for the decision. Upon their release, they reportedly walked through the streets of Luanda, shouting “Reading is not a crime!”⁵

ARGENTINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2016.

As of September 2016, 2,541 people had been charged, 723 convicted, and 76 acquitted of crimes allegedly committed by the military junta during the “Dirty War” (1976–1983), according to the Attorney General’s Office. Prosecutions were made possible by a series of actions taken in the early 2000s by Congress, the Supreme Court, and federal judges annulling amnesty laws and striking down pardons of former officials implicated in the crimes. As of November 2016, 121 children illegally taken from their parents during the war had been located.

In May 2016, a federal court convicted fourteen former military and intelligence chiefs from Argentina and one from Uruguay of crimes against humanity committed as part of the “Plan Condor,” a coordinated intelligence plan launched in the 1970s by the de facto governing military regimes in Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay. Reynaldo Bignone, the last de facto president of Argentina at the time, was sentenced to twenty years’ imprisonment for his role in hundreds of enforced disappearances during Plan Condor. A further fourteen military leaders were sentenced to imprisonment.

⁴ Ahmed Rouaba, “Algerian Student: ‘University Censored My Political Thesis’,” BBC News (4 July 2017).

⁵ “Angola Court Orders Conditional Release of Jailed Activist Book Club,” Guardian (29 June 2016); PEN International, “Luanda Book Club Activists Conditionally Released” (Update #1 to RAN 07/16; 8 July 2016).

In August 2016, the sentence on the “La Perla” historical trial—which included clandestine centers in Córdoba Province—was rendered, sentencing 28 perpetrators to life imprisonment without parole for crimes that included torture, homicide, and the illegal abduction of babies in 1974—the first conviction for abuses committed before the 1976 coup. Nine sentences were passed for between two and fourteen years’ imprisonment and six acquittals. By December 2016, the Bicameral Commission to identify economic and financial interests that had colluded with the military dictatorship, created by Law 27.217 in 2015, had not been established.

Given the large number of victims, suspects, and cases, prosecutors and judges faced challenges bringing those responsible to justice while respecting their due process rights. In September 2016, the Attorney General’s Office reported that 489 pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners were under house arrest, a right provided for by law to people over seventy years old. In August 2016, the government said it would not appeal judicial rulings granting house arrest to these detainees and convicted prisoners.⁶

Twenty-two years after the 1994 bombing of the Argentine Israelite Mutual Association (AMIA) in Buenos Aires that killed 85 people and injured more than 300, no one has been convicted of the crime. The investigation stalled when Iran, suspected by the Argentine judiciary of ordering the attack, refused to allow Argentine investigators to interview Iranian suspects in Argentina. In 2013, Argentina and Iran signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) that allowed an international commission of jurists to review evidence and question Iranian suspects—but only in Tehran, which would likely have rendered the interviews inadmissible in an Argentine court. A federal court declared the MOU unconstitutional, a ruling that the administration of President Mauricio Macri said it would not appeal. The government said further that it would ask Interpol to reissue red notices—a form of international arrest warrant—to detain several Iranians implicated in the attack, and that it would present draft legislation to try the Iranians in absentia. In January 2015—days after he had filed a criminal complaint accusing then-President Cristina Fernández and her foreign affairs minister of conspiring with Iran to undermine the investigation—Alberto Nisman, the prosecutor in charge of investigating the bombing, had been found dead in his home with a single gunshot wound to the head and a pistol beside him. In 2015, a federal court dismissed Nisman’s complaint but an appeal by a federal prosecutor to reopen the investigation was pending in late 2016. As of November 2016, the courts had not determined if Nisman was a victim of suicide or murder.

In 2015, a court began the trial of several officials—including former President Carlos Meném, his head of intelligence, and a judge—for their alleged interference with the initial investigation into the bombing. The trial continued in late 2016.⁷

⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 30, 69; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 83–84.

In 2017, at the occasion of their 40th anniversary, the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo declared that they were worried that the present center-right government of President Mauricio Macri was attempting to “whitewash history,” because it had suggested that the number of victims of the dictatorship (1976–1983) may have only been around 9,000, a provisional figure drawn up by the 1984 CONADEP. But the military themselves reported killing 22,000 people in a 1978 communication to Chilean intelligence.” The Mothers warned that the current era of alternative facts, revisionist history and dictatorship denialism posed a new kind of threat for the country.⁸

See also Bolivia, Spain.

ARMENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2006, 2010, 2014–2016.

See Germany, Sweden, United States.

AUSTRALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2001, 2003, 2007–2009, 2014–2016.

See China, Indonesia, United Kingdom.

AUSTRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2005–2007, 2009.

⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 69; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 86.

⁸ Uki Goñi, “40 Years Later, the Mothers of Argentina’s ‘Disappeared’ Refuse to Be Silent,” Guardian (28 April 2017).

AZERBAIJAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–1998, 2008–2013, 2015–2016.

In April 2016, historians and human rights activists Leyla and Arif Yunus went to live in the Netherlands [see NCH Annual Report 2016.].⁹

In May 2016, police arrested youth activists Giyas Ibrahimov and Bayram Mammadov for spraying graffiti on a monument to former President Heydar Aliyev and demanded that they apologize on camera. When they refused, policemen beat and threatened to rape them with truncheons to force them to confess to drug possession. Authorities failed to conduct effective investigation into the ill-treatment allegations. In October 2016, Ibrahimov was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment; Mammadov's trial was ongoing at the end of 2016.¹⁰

⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 77.

¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 104.

BAHRAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2008–2012, 2015–2016.

On 14 February 2016, the authorities sought to repress civil society actions commemorating the peaceful uprising of 14 February 2011, in which Bahrainis marched for human rights and democracy. They violently suppressed street protests and imposed sieges to restrict individuals from participating in these marches. In the days leading up to the anniversary and on the day itself, they attacked and arrested many of the protesters on the streets. On 9 February 2016, the Chief of Public Security issued a warning against protests. On 14 February, the police chief implied in a public statement that the protesters posed “security threats from Iran-backed elements and militants linked to Islamic State.” The Bahrain Center for Human Rights documented 157 protests, at least 33 protests of which were suppressed by riot police. Between 7 February and 14 February 2016, 89 individuals were arrested. By the end of 2016, no senior officers or officials responsible for torture, unlawful killings and other excessive use of force in 2011 had been held to account.¹¹

On 9 October 2016, the authorities arrested journalist and social media activist Faisal Hayyat and charged him with “insulting a sect and a religious figure” after he had published tweets on 7 October commenting on events from early Islamic history. On 28 November 2016, 46 human rights organizations signed a letter asking King Hamad bin Isa Al Khalifa to release him. On 29 November 2016, however, he was sentenced to three months’ imprisonment. Hayyat had already been imprisoned and tortured in 2011 for his involvement in the pro-democracy protests.¹²

BANGLADESH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2016.

The International Crimes Tribunal (ICT), a court established to investigate the events of the 1971 independence war, continued its operations in 2016 without addressing serious procedural and substantive defects. It sentenced at least six people to death. The proceedings were marked by severe irregularities and violations of fair trial rights, such as the arbitrary restriction of the number of defense witnesses allowed. Two people convicted of war crimes and crimes against humanity by the ICT were executed, both senior members of Jamaat-e-Islami—Motiur Rahman Nizami in May 2016 and Mir Quasem Ali in September 2016. Ali was a senior member of the executive committee of the opposition Jamaat-e-Islami party; he was convicted for crimes he allegedly committed in 1971, even as the chief justice criticized the attorney general, the prosecution, and investigators for producing insufficient evidence in the case. The government secretly detained Ali's son, a key member of his defense team, denied him access to his father before execution, and forbade him from participating in the funeral. On 23 August 2016, a group of United Nations human rights experts expressed concern about the fairness of ICT trials, and urged the government to annul Ali's death sentence and grant him a retrial, stating that proceedings were marred by irregularities.¹³

¹¹ Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Annual Report Bahrain 2016: A Series of Repressive Attacks against Rights and Human Rights Defenders (Copenhagen: BCHR, 2017), 31–32; Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 54.

¹² International PEN, “Bahrain: Government Must End Judicial Harassment of Faisal Hayyat and Other Journalists” (28 November 2016); Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Annual Report Bahrain 2016: A Series of Repressive Attacks against Rights and Human Rights Defenders (Copenhagen: BCHR, 2017), 30.

A new proposed law, entitled “Bangladesh Liberation War (Denial, Distortion, Opposition) Crime Law” (abbreviated as “Liberation War Denial Crimes Act”) and dated 8 March 2016, provided for imprisonment and fines if certain events of the 1971 war of independence were denied, distorted or opposed. The proposal would outlaw the “inaccurate” representation of war history and “malicious” statements in the press that “undermined any events” related to the war. Efforts to “trivialize” information related to the killing of civilians during the war would also be forbidden.¹⁴

The draft Digital Security Act 2016 proposed to do away with the contentious Section 57 of the 2006 Information and Communications Technology Act (amended in 2013), which was invoked against those who questioned facts about the 1971 independence war. The new law, however, included draconian clauses such as life sentences for spreading false information about the 1971 war or about the founder of Bangladesh, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman.¹⁵

In February 2017, the Education Ministry released a new version of textbooks for grades one to ten that many said displayed a shift toward radical Islam. Names of people affiliated with religions other than Islam had been replaced, including that of the poet Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), who wrote the national anthem for Bangladesh.¹⁶

On 26 May 2017, workers begun to dismantle the statue of Themis, the Greek goddess of justice

¹³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 81; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 118–119.

¹⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 118–119; David Bergman, “The Politics of Bangladesh's Genocide Debate,” New York Times (5 April 2016); David Bergman, “Bangladesh Liberation War \(Denial, Distortion, Opposition\) Crime Law,” Bangladesh Politico (10 April 2017).

¹⁵ Sadaf Saaz, “Dying to Tell a Story,” Index on Censorship, 46, no. 1 (spring 2017), 36.

¹⁶ GEM Report, “What Did You Learn in School? Is 'B' for Banana? Or Burka?” (8 February 2017).

(wearing a sari), from the Supreme Court complex. It was erected six months before but Islamists led by conservative Islamist group Hefazat-e-Islam had staged mass rallies in Dhaka demanding its removal. They claimed that it amounted to idolatry and hurt the religious sentiments of Muslims. Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina agreed to its removal, although secular groups opposed it.¹⁷

BELARUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2000, 2005–2007, 2009–2011, 2014–2016.

On 23 March 2017, human rights organizations called on the authorities to drop all charges immediately against writers, publishers and journalists who were arrested following a wave of nationwide protests. The detainees included writer and historian Vladimir Orlov. He and others were arrested by six masked security officers at the entrance of a literature festival in Minsk. It was believed that the arrests were part of a crackdown by the authorities ahead of nationwide Freedom Day celebrations on 25 March 2017.¹⁸

Throughout March 2017, the government executed a crackdown on peaceful demonstrators against a tax to fight “social parasitism.” The crackdown came to a head around 25 March (Freedom Day), a popular but unacknowledged commemoration of national independence in 1918 (the establishment of the Belarusian People’s Republic). This wave of mass arrests was the severest since the post-election crackdown in December 2010.¹⁹

See also Denmark.

BELGIUM

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

¹⁷ “Greek Goddess Statue Removed in Bangladesh after Islamist Outcry,” BBC News (26 May 2017).

¹⁸ John Keenan, “Outrage as Belarus Arrests Authors, Publishers and Journalists in Crackdown,” Guardian (23 March 2017).

¹⁹ United Nations General Assembly, Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in Belarus (A/HRC/35/40; New York 21 April 2017), §§4–5; Andrei Aliaksandrau, “There’s Nothing New about Fake News,” Index on Censorship (2017, no. 2), 52–54.

BELIZE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

BOLIVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2016.

On 20 November 2016, the Foreign Ministry announced that it would declassify diplomatic documents from the dictatorships in 1964–1982 so that relatives of the dead and disappeared could obtain new information about the crimes committed at the time. They would include diplomatic files of René Barrientos Ortuño’s military regime (1964–1969)—regarding the execution of Argentine revolutionary Ernesto Che Guevara on 9 October 1967—and of Hugo Banzer Suárez’s military regime (1971–1978), on the steps it took against leftist opponents as part of Plan Condor.²⁰

Bolivia has prosecuted only a few of the officials responsible for human rights violations committed under authoritarian governments (1964–1982), in part because the armed forces had at times refused to provide information to judicial authorities on the fate of people killed or forcibly disappeared. Despite repeated commitments to do so, the government had yet to create a truth, justice and reconciliation commission to carry out independent investigations of abuses during that period; the creation was promised at a March 2015 public hearing before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.²¹

See also Argentina.

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2016.

There was slow progress in prosecuting crimes from the 1992–1995 war in domestic courts. Lack of capacity and resources, along with ineffective case management and persistent political obstruction, ²⁰ “Bolivia to Declassify Operation Condor and Che Murder Files,” Telesur (22 November 2016).

²¹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 86; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 127.

continued to slow down the progress of prosecution and access to redress before these courts. In July 2016, an independent analysis commissioned by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) showed that the National War Crimes Strategy had failed to meet its targets, with a backlog of over 350 complex cases still pending before the State Court and Prosecutor's Office. In April 2016, the Constitutional Court declared that the statute of limitations applied to reparation claims for non-material damage and that claims could be directed only against the perpetrators, not the state, further limiting the ability of victims to claim and obtain compensation.

Although more than 75% of the missing persons from the war had been exhumed and identified, there were still 8,000 people missing. The process of exhumations encountered significant challenges, including reduced funding for the Missing Persons Institute and limited expertise domestically. The Law on Missing Persons remained unimplemented, with the Fund for the families of missing persons still awaiting establishment.

The trial in the State Court against Naser Orić, a former Bosnian army general, and Sabahudin Muhić, a former Bosnian army soldier, started on 26 January 2016—after the Mechanism for International Tribunals rejected a request by Orić's lawyers to order the State Court to stop the case against him because he had already been acquitted of the same charges at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY).

The ICTY issued first-instance verdicts in cases of former high-ranking officials in relation to crimes committed during the 1992–1995 conflict. In March 2016, the ICTY found Radovan Karadžić, the wartime President of Republika Srpska (RS), guilty of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity and sentenced him to forty years' imprisonment. Karadžić was convicted of genocide in the area of Srebrenica in 1995, of persecution, extermination, murder, deportation, inhumane acts (forcible transfer), terror, unlawful attacks on civilians and hostage-taking. He was acquitted of the charge of genocide in other municipalities in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992. Also in March 2016, the ICTY found Vojislav Šešelj, the Serb Radical Party leader, not guilty on any counts of crimes against humanity and war crimes. In late 2016, the defense case in the trial of Ratko Mladić, the former commander of the Republika Srpska Army, was in progress at the ICTY. The case experienced a substantial slowdown due to delays in evidence presentation by the defense. Mladić was on trial for genocide in Srebrenica and seven other municipalities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the persecution of Bosniaks and Croats throughout the country, terrorizing the civilian population of Sarajevo and taking United Nations peacekeepers hostage. The trial judgment was expected in November 2017.²²

See also Switzerland.

²² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 88–89; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 134–135.

BOTSWANA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

See Namibia.

BRAZIL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2016.

The perpetrators of human rights abuses during military rule (1964–1985) continued to be shielded from justice by a 1979 amnesty law that was upheld by the Supreme Court in 2010, a decision that the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled was a violation of Brazil's obligations under international law. In 2014, the National Truth Commission identified 377 such perpetrators, but owing to the amnesty law, their crimes remained unpunished. Federal courts did allow the prosecution of at least two former military officers for killings during military rule, but the Supreme Court temporarily halted those prosecutions in 2014 and 2015, pending its re-examination of the validity of the amnesty law.²³

On 2 September 2016, the new government of President Michel Temer appointed twenty new members to and removed six members (Ana Guedes, José Carlos Moreira da Silva Filho, Virginius Lianza, Manoel Moraes, Carol Melo and Elayne Marcia Moraes) from the Amnesty Commission (a commission, established in 2001, that proposed laws and reparations for the victims of the dictatorship of 1964–1985). One of the new members, Paulo Lopo Saraiva, a former army sergeant during the military regime, participated in repression activities during the 1964 coup against President João Goulart. The Movimento por verdade, memória, justiça e reparação (Movement for Truth, Memory, Justice and Reparation) called this a dismantlement of the commission. It was the first time that members of the commission were appointed without consulting civil society and also the first time that the government removed former members.²⁴

See also Argentina.

²³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 145.

²⁴ “Temer Appoints Dictatorship Defender to Amnesty Commission,” Telesur (4 September 2016); Nota pública do Movimento por verdade, memória, justiça e reparação (4 September 2016).

BULGARIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2002, 2006, 2009, 2012, 2015–2016.

In 2016, Defense Minister Nikolai Nenchev's written reply to parliamentary questions revealed that at least 16000 records of military intelligence personnel (half of the total) were destroyed during the transition (1989–1991), most of them by the Bulgarian Communist Party. He handed the remaining military intelligence records (a total of 87280 archival units) over to the Dossier Commission (the body established in 2006 and charged with disclosing the affiliation of people in various categories of public life to the former State Security and the Military Intelligence).²⁵

BURKINA FASO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2004, 2005, 2013, 2015–2016.

In May 2016, Burkina Faso issued an international arrest warrant for former President Blaise Compaoré. In June, the military tribunal indicted fourteen people, including Compaoré, suspected of involvement in the assassination of former President Thomas Sankara in 1987. Seven people, including Colonel Alidou Guebré and Caporal Wampasba Nacouma, were arrested in October and charged. The investigation into Sankara's death had been reopened after the fall of Compaoré in October 2014; he had succeeded Sankara in 1987.

An investigating judge from Burkina Faso, François Yaméogo, formally asked French authorities to declassify military documents to see whether France had played a role in the assassination of President Thomas Sankara in 1987. Sankara's widow and supporters had repeatedly accused France of masterminding his 1987 killing because he was a Marxist revolutionary. In March 2017, Pouria Amirshahi, a deputy in the French National Assembly for the Ninth constituency for French residents overseas, wrote a letter to President François Hollande, in which he asking to lift the secrecy status of the archives (blocking access until 2037) and their release in the name of a greater historical interest. In April 2015, Vincent Hiribarren, a lecturer in world history at King's College, London, tried to gain access to the archives but only a few documents of little relevance were released in August 2016.²⁶

²⁵ "Bulgaria: Many Thousands of Communist-era Military Intelligence Staff Records Destroyed," The Sofia Globe (18 August 2016).

²⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 98. "Burkina Faso 'Wants France to Release Sankara Archives'," BBC News (13 October 2016); "Burkina Faso: un député français demande l'ouverture des archives sur Sankara," RFI Afrique (18 March 2017); Vincent Hiribarren, "Ouvrons les archives sur le meurtre de Thomas Sankara," Le Monde (13 March 2017).

BURUNDI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2015.

The operational phase of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which covers 1962 to 2008, was launched in March 2016 and began collecting testimonies in September 2016. It did not have judicial authority and the special tribunal that was initially envisaged was not established.²⁷

²⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 103.

CAMBODIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2016.

The United Nations-supported Khmer Rouge Tribunal had been crippled since its inception in 2006 by official non-cooperation with its investigations into international crimes committed by Pol Pot's Khmer Rouge (1975–1979). In 2016, the court did not complete a second trial of two prominent ex-Khmer Rouge leaders, Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan, and did not conclude investigations into four other, mid-level, Khmer Rouge leaders.²⁸

CAMEROON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2012–2014, 2016.

CANADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000, 2002–2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2009, 2012–2016.

In 2016, historian Dennis Molinaro of Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario, found records in the Library and Archives Canada (LAC) demonstrating that in 1951 the Federal Cabinet of Prime Minister Louis St-Laurent passed a secret order to authorize a Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) surveillance program codenamed “Picnic” to wiretap suspected spies, communist sympathizers and others deemed “disloyal” or “subversive.” By 1950, Canada had passed an Emergency Powers Act and sent troops to fight in the Korean War (1950–1953), but after the war, when the act was set to expire, the government kept the program going during peacetime using the Official Secrets Act, possibly until as late as 1980–1984. The cabinet order was never revealed to parliament and never transferred to the archives. Molinaro said that the Privy Council Office refused to release the secret order—or even confirm it existed. It also said that even if the government had it, officials would be exempt from releasing it publicly for fear that the 65-year-old order could be “injurious” to Canada’s international relations and covert police techniques.²⁹

²⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 168.

²⁹ Dave Seglins & Rachel Houlihan, “Federal Cabinet Secretly Approved Cold War Wiretaps on Anyone Deemed ‘Subversive,’ Historian Finds,” CBC News (15 December 2016).

See also Iran, Norway, Poland, Rwanda.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2009, 2011–2012, 2014–2016.

In August and September 2016, the criminal court in the capital Bangui tried 55 cases, some of them dealing with serious crimes such as rape and murder. However, the court did not address any abuses or alleged war crimes related to the internal conflict (2002–2003). Resource constraints and administrative hurdles impeded operationalizing the Special Criminal Court, a hybrid court with national and international judges and prosecutors set up in June 2015 that would focus on grave international crimes committed since 2003. The vast majority of suspected perpetrators of serious crimes and gross violations of human rights remained at large, free of any arrest or investigations. In August 2016, the United Nations and the government signed a document that outlined their tasks and responsibilities related to the court. On 15 February 2017, President Faustin-Archange Touadéra appointed Toussaint Muntazini Mukimapa, a military prosecutor from the Democratic Republic of Congo, as prosecutor. It would partner with the International Criminal Court (ICC), which had a mandate to prosecute crimes since August 2012 but would only be able to focus on high-level suspects.

The ICC investigations on the so-called CAR II situation, based on crimes under international law committed from 2012 onward, continued. Two separate teams worked respectively on crimes committed by ex-Seleka (largely Muslim rebel groups) and by Anti-balaka and its affiliates (largely Christian and animist militias). On 20 June 2016, ICC investigations on the CAR I situation, which focused on crimes against humanity and war crimes since 1 July 2002, resulted in the conviction of a Congolese national (and former Vice President of the Democratic Republic of Congo), Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, as a military commander. He was sentenced to eighteen years' imprisonment for war crimes and crimes against humanity, including murder, rape and pillaging committed by his militia. Forces from Bemba's Mouvement pour la libération du Congo (Movement for the Liberation of the Congo) had been active in the Central African Republic in 2002 and 2003, acting at the behest of then-President Ange-Félix Patasse to repress a coup attempt by then-General Francois Bozize. The ICC's sentence followed its first conviction for rape as a war crime and its first conviction based on command responsibility. In September 2016, Bemba's legal team filed an appeal. The ICC prosecutor, who had sought a 25-year sentence, indicated that her office would appeal the sentence to "reflect the totality of Bemba's culpability." On 19 October 2016, ICC judges found Bemba and four associates guilty of witness tampering because they attempted to bribe witnesses.³⁰

See also Democratic Republic Congo.

CHAD

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012, 2015–2016.

See Senegal.

CHILE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2016.

According to data released by the Ministry of the Interior’s human rights program in December 2015, justice authorities were investigating a total of 1,048 cases involving human rights violations committed during military rule under Augusto Pinochet (1973–1990). As of December 2015, 344 individuals had been sentenced for human rights crimes, including killings and enforced disappearances; 117 of them were serving prison sentences. While courts continued to prosecute abuses committed during military rule, the Supreme Court used its discretionary powers in many cases to reduce the sentences imposed on perpetrators, sometimes even to a non-custodial sentence. Victims, their relatives and civil society organizations opposed several attempts to obtain the early release on parole of convicted perpetrators. At the end of 2016, a bill was before Congress to deny the possibility of parole for those convicted of crimes against humanity.

In July 2016, Juan Emilio Cheyre, former army commander-in-chief, was placed under judicial investigation for his alleged role as accomplice in the 1973 murders of fifteen opponents of the Pinochet dictatorship. At the time, he was a lieutenant in the La Serena regiment, and the homicides were part of what became known as the “Caravan of Death,” a military death squad that tortured, extrajudicially killed, and disappeared suspected dissidents throughout Northern Chile. General Sergio Víctor Arellano Stark, who led the Caravan of Death, died in March 2016 without serving prison time, although the Supreme Court convicted and sentenced him to six years’ imprisonment.

³⁰ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 21, 22, 113; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 178–179; Human Rights Watch (Lewis Mudge), “A Step Toward Justice in the Central African Republic” (21 February 2017).

In September 2016, the Supreme Court confirmed the four-year sentences of two former military officials for the torture of General Alberto Bachelet in 1973. In October 2016, the Supreme Court overturned the 1974–1975 convictions for sedition and treason of 12 ex-members of the Chilean air force who refused to join the 1973 military coup.³¹

See also Argentina, United States.

CHINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2016.

In 2013, historian Hong Zhenkuai, a former executive editor of the history journal Yanhuang Chunqiu (China Through the Ages), challenged in two articles the official narrative about the Five Heroes of Langya Mountain, whose reportedly heroic defense of the area against invading Japanese troops and ensuing suicide in 1941 became part of the revolutionary mythology of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP). In August 2015, the sons of two of the five men sued him. On 27 June 2016, the Beijing Xicheng District People’s Court ruled that Hong had defamed the heroes and that he should apologize publicly on websites and news outlets to the complainants. In its verdict, it wrote that Hong’s articles failed to portray the five men positively and, “based on insufficient evidence,” cast doubt on the CCP’s narrative of events. According to the verdict, “The national sentiments, historical memories and the national spirit reflected in the five heroes of Langya Mountain and their story are important sources and components of modern China’s socialist core values ... Thus, it also damages the Chinese nation’s spiritual values.” On 15 August 2016, the Beijing Second Intermediate People’s Court upheld the ruling. In a reaction, Hong declared that he would not apologize, saying that the plaintiffs had not provided any evidence that disproved his findings: “This is basic academic freedom, and I need to maintain my dignity as an intellectual.” The court would probably publish the verdict in the news media and order Hong to pay the publication costs. In July 2016, one of the plaintiffs, Ge Changsheng, had said in an interview that Hong’s articles negated CCP history and heroes and constituted “historical nihilism”.

Among the issues raised by Hong were whether the men jumped from the peak of Langya Mountain or a lower level, whether they leapt voluntarily or slipped off the mountain, and the number of casualties. He said that the district court verdict failed to mention where he falsified or vilified the heroes. He said he drew on published accounts by the two survivors, “who appeared in my articles as witnesses—I quoted what they said.” In one of the two articles, published on the news website Caijing.com, Hong wrote that while it was important for people to respect war heroes who resisted the Japanese invasion, historical truth should be respected too. Jiang Keshi, a Chinese historian at Okayama University in Japan who studied modern Japanese history, also said that the official Chinese version had major flaws. Based on the records that he had found in Japan, he said that no Japanese soldier died in the fighting with the five at the mountain. The Chinese version, which first appeared in 1941 in a CCP newspaper, asserted that many Japanese had died. And in 2005, an article in the CCP newspaper People’s Daily said that the five Langya heroes shot and killed or wounded at least ninety Japanese soldiers.³²

³¹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 117; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 181–182.

In [March] 2016, Yang Jisheng (1940–), deputy editor of the liberal historical journal Yanhuang Chunqiu, finished The World Turned Upside Down, a history of the Cultural Revolution and sequel to Tombstone: The Great Chinese Famine, 1958–1962 (Chinese 2008; English abridged version 2012). But officials warned Yang against publishing it and barred him from traveling to the United States to receive a journalistic award. The book was published in Hong Kong in late December 2016. An abridged English translation was expected in 2019. Yang did not have extensive access to archives for his book but he drew on hundreds of memoirs, histories and studies [see also NCH Annual Reports 2013, 2016].³³

In late April 2016, a few weeks before the fiftieth anniversary of the start of the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), the Cultural Revolution Museum in Shantou (established in 2005; the only one dedicated to the Cultural Revolution in mainland China) was covered up without the knowledge of Peng Qi’an, a former local Chinese Communist Party (CCP) official and the museum’s founder. Signs appeared, saying: “Because of the need to adjust the function of the park, repairs will be carried out.” Workers smoothed concrete over the names of victims, wrapped “Socialist Core Values” banners around the main exhibition hall, placed red-and-yellow propaganda posters over stone memorials to the terror, and raised scaffolding around statues of critics of Mao Zedong (like Liu Shaoqi and Marshal Ye). Peng Qi’an believed the order to cover up the museum was not local, but came from “higher up.”³⁴

³² Kiki Zhao, “Chinese Court Orders Apology Over Challenge to Tale of Wartime Heroes,” New York Times (28 June 2016); Kiki Zhao, “Chinese Court Upholds Ruling Against Historian Who Questioned Tale of Wartime Heroes,” New York Times (15 August 2016).

³³ Chris Buckley, “Historian’s Latest Book on Mao Turns Acclaim in China to Censure,” New York Times (21 January 2017).

³⁴ Didi Kirsten Tatlow, “Fate Catches Up to a Cultural Revolution Museum in China,” New York Times (2 October 2016).

As in previous years, authorities were on high alert ahead of the anniversary to preempt commemorations of the Tiananmen massacre of 4 June 1989. Measures included putting under house arrest or restricting the movement of activists, including Ding Zilin [See also NCH Annual Reports 2000, 2004–2005, 2008–2009], a founding member of the Tiananmen Mothers, and Sun Wenguang [See also NCH Annual Report 2009], a retired professor of Shandong University, Jinan, Shandong Province. Journalist Gao Yu and former top official Bao Tong [see also NCH Annual Reports 1999, 2005, 2009] were required to leave Beijing for enforced “vacations.” Yu Shiwen, who spent 18 months in prison for his 1989 work organizing pro-democracy efforts in Guangzhou, has been detained since 2014 for commemorating the massacre that year. Activists who commemorated the 1989 Tiananmen crackdown continued to be detained, including Sichuan activists Fu Hailu and Luo Fuyu. Despite systematic harassment and intimidation, activists found subversive ways to commemorate it online. Four human rights defenders were arrested for commemorating the anniversary. They posted an online advertisement for a popular alcohol with a label reading “Remember, Eight Liquor Six Four”—a play on words in Chinese echoing the date of the notorious event, accompanied by the “tank man’s” picture. The action was covered widely on social media before being censored. Miao Deshun, a labor activist arrested after participating in the 1989 protests was reportedly released in October 2016 after 27 years’ imprisonment.³⁵

In July 2016, the offices of the history magazine Yanhuang Chunqiu (see item above) were taken over by strangers, who changed the computer passwords, opened the mail and took over the running of the magazine. Among the staff purged were founder and director Du Daozheng ([1923–]), a Chinese Communist Party (CCP) member and former senior editor at the state-run news agency Xinhua, and Hu Dehua, the son of reform-minded former leader Hu Yaobang. The magazine, with a reported readership of some 200,000 a month, had long offered a mild critique of the official Communist version of China’s history, including by publishing critical articles in 2008 about former party leader Zhao Ziyang and in 2013 about the Five Heroes of Langya Mountain (see item above). The original staff issued a notice that any future editions of the magazine had nothing to do with them and in August 2016 they went to court to challenge the censorship.³⁶

In the summer of 2016, academic Wang Changjiang criticized former leader Mao Zedong in a lecture

³⁵ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 19, 34, 121; Human Rights Watch, “China: Tell the Truth About Tiananmen on Anniversary” (1 June 2016).

See also <http://www.tiananmenmother.org/> and <http://www.64memo.com/html/victims.htm>.

³⁶ John Sudworth, “China Censorship: How a Moderate Magazine Was Targeted,” BBC News (17 August 2016); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 191; “What Was behind China Magazine Takeover?” BBC News (interview with Du Daozheng; 17 August 2016).

at the Chinese Communist Party (CCP)'s elite training academy, saying that he had been unable to satisfy people's basic wants of food and clothing. The lecture was secretly videotaped. Shortly thereafter, Wang stepped down from his position as the director of a research department at the Central Party School, citing reasons of age.³⁷

In September 2016, Kwon Pyong (Chinese name: Quan Ping) ([1988]–), an ethnic-Korean citizen from Yanbian who had studied aerospace engineering at Iowa State University in the USA, used Twitter to mock and criticize the nation's rulers, including posting a selfie in which he wore a T-shirt that likened President Xi Jinping to Hitler. Kwon, who on Twitter described himself as a "perpetual student, citizen, dedicated to overturning communism," was arrested and put into police custody. On 15 February 2017, he faced trial on a charge of "inciting subversion." Kwon's two defense lawyers were abruptly dismissed from the case days before the trial. He risked eighteen months' imprisonment.³⁸

In [November 2016], new film censorship laws were decreed. Among other things, they stipulated that those Chinese films that "distorted national history or national historical figures, hurt national sentiments and undermined national unity" were to be banned. The laws were due to come into effect in March 2017.³⁹

On 5 January 2017, the University Party committee of Shandong Jianzhu University dismissed Deng Xiangchao ([1954–]), communications professor and deputy head of the university's School of Art, for his "erroneous remarks" about former leader Mao Zedong, posted on the Sina Weibo social-media service on the eve of Mao's 123rd birthday (26 December 2016). Deng had written: "If he'd died in 1945, China would have seen 6 million fewer killed in war. If he'd died in 1958, 30 million fewer would've starved to death." and: "It wasn't until 1976 when he finally died that we at last had food to eat. The only correct thing he did was to die." In the aftermath of the postings, Deng was also vilified by protesters and online, with some calling him "an enemy of the people." His Weibo account was deleted. He was also dismissed from his jobs as a member of the Standing Committee of the Shandong Provincial Committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference and as counselor to the provincial government.

When writer Lu Yong showed support for Deng, he was threatened. Video taken hours later showed Mao loyalists parading through the campus of Jinan University with large banners while ³⁷ Te-Ping Chen, "History Lesson: Mao Remarks Get Chinese Professor Fired," Wall Street Journal (10 January 2017).

³⁸ Chris Buckley, "He Called China's President 'Xitler' on Twitter—Now He Faces Prison," New York Times (16 February 2017).

³⁹ Stephen McDonnell, "Will New Censorship Kill Chinese Filmmaking?" BBC News (26 november 2016).

chanting “Down with Deng Xiangchao, down with traitors.” When Liu Yong, a television employee in the central city of Luohe, reposted Deng’s remarks, he was suspended from his advertising job. According to Luohe Television, Liu had made “erroneous comments and distorted the truth” on his personal Weibo account.⁴⁰

On 11 January 2017, the Education Ministry ordered that history textbooks move the start of China’s war against Japanese invaders six years back to 1931, calling it the “14-Year War of Resistance Against Japanese Aggression” (1931–1945), apparently to broaden the scope of the struggle from which the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) derived its legitimacy. In 1931, the Imperial Japanese Army invaded Manchuria.⁴¹

On 24 and 25 March 2017, historian Feng Chongyi ([1960]–), a Chinese-born associate professor of China studies at the University of Technology Sydney, Australia, who had often criticized Beijing’s crackdown on political dissent (particularly the so-called 709 crackdown on human rights lawyers which started on 9 July 2015) on overseas Chinese websites and in interviews with foreign journalists, was put on a no-fly list and barred from leaving China, first in Kunming, then twice in Guangzhou. Although he was not arrested or charged, state security officers questioned him, suspecting him of being a “threat to national security.” On 2 April 2017, Feng was allowed to return home. As a condition of his departure, Feng was required to sign a document promising not say anything about the police interrogations.

The confinement occurred while premier, Li Keqiang visited Australia to promote deeper ties. Feng had also criticized the Chinese government’s increasing efforts to exert influence over ethnic Chinese in Australia. In 2016, he had spoken out against plans for concerts to honor Mao Zedong in Sydney and Melbourne, writing that for many Australians Mao was a symbol of dictatorship, violence and political persecution. His research focused on intellectual and political developments in modern and contemporary China.⁴²

In March 2017, Shen Zhihua ([1950–]), reputedly China’s foremost historian of the Cold War and ⁴⁰ Te-Ping Chen, “History Lesson: Mao Remarks Get Chinese Professor Fired,” Wall Street Journal (10 January 2017); “University Party Committee Makes Professor Retire after Controversial Mao Comments,” Global Times (8 January 2017); Gerry Shih, “Critics Attacked, History Revised as China Nationalism Rises,” ABC News (13 January 2017).

⁴¹ Gerry Shih, “Critics Attacked, History Revised as China Nationalism Rises,” ABC News (13 January 2017); Javier Hernández, “China, Fanning Patriotism, Adds 6 Years to War with Japan in History Books,” New York Times (11 January 2017).

⁴² Chris Buckley, “China Bars Professor at Australian University From Leaving, Lawyer Says,” New York Times (26 March 2017); “Australian Academic Chongyi Feng Prevented from Leaving China,” Guardian (26 March 2017); Yojana Sharma, “Sydney Professor Barred from Leaving China,” University World News (30 March 2017); Yojana Sharma, “Professor Allowed to Leave after Being Questioned,” University World News (6 April 2017).

specialist of the Korean War (1950–1953), criticized the official policy of China toward North Korea at a university lecture in Dalian. He declared: “Judging by the current situation, North Korea is China’s latent enemy and South Korea could be China’s friend.” His views and the debate about them were not reported in Chinese state news media. But his speech remained on the website of the Center for Cold War International History Studies at East China Normal University in Shanghai, where Shen worked. He restated his views in lectures in Shanghai and, in mid-April 2017, in Xian. The son of Chinese Communist Party (CCP) officials, Shen previously used his earnings from gold trafficking business to pay for dredging archives in Russia, after serving a prison term (1983–May 1984) on a charge (reportedly groundless) of leaking state secrets.⁴³

On 26 May 2017, Hong Kong activist Fung Ka Keung submitted a Tiananmen-themed frame (a layer of text across his Facebook page profile picture) for approval to Facebook, which rejected it the next day on the grounds that it “belittled, threatened or attacked a particular person, legal entity, nationality or group.” After it was accused of an act of censorship with political and economic motivations in Hong Kong media outlets, Facebook apologized for “incorrectly” rejecting the frame and approved it. The network had been blocked in China since 2009, and was thought to be keen to re-enter the market. Fung’s frame stated in a mixture of Chinese and English: “June 4 28th Anniversary,” “Vindicate June 4th” and “End Dictatorial Rule.” A second similar frame created by Fung was also approved.⁴⁴

On 4 June 2017, tens of thousands of people gathered in Hong Kong’s Victoria Park for a vigil organized by the Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Patriotic Democratic Movements in China to commemorate the 1989 Tiananmen massacre. Organizers estimated that 110,000 people had gathered, while police thought that just 18,000 took part. Hong Kong remained the only place under China’s jurisdiction that allowed open memorialization of the 1989 crackdown.⁴⁵

On 13 July 2017, dissident Liu Xiaobo (1955–2017) died. He was one of the original signatories of Charter 08, a human rights movement established on 10 December 2008, the sixtieth anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Liu was a leading participant in and hunger striker during the 1989 student demonstrations on Tiananmen Square, a lecturer in literature and chairman of the Independent Chinese PEN Center since 2003. He was originally detained in December 2008 and sentenced to eleven years’ imprisonment on charges of “inciting subversion of state power” on 25

⁴³ Chris Buckley, “Criticism of Beijing’s North Korea Policy Comes From Unlikely Place: China,” New York Times (18 April 2017); “Shen Zhihua,” The China Story (retrieved 19 April 2017).

⁴⁴ “Facebook Sorry for Tiananmen Picture Frame Rejection,” BBC News (31 May 2017).

⁴⁵ Kevin Lui, “Tens of Thousands in Hong Kong Commemorate the 1989 Tiananmen Massacre,” Time (4 June 2017).

December 2009 for his role in drafting and circulating the charter. His lawyers were given only twenty minutes to present their case, in a trial that lasted less than three hours. On 10 February 2010, a Beijing court rejected Liu's appeal. On 10 December 2010, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. He had already been imprisoned in [1989–90], 1995, and [1996–98]. He was released a few weeks before he died.

Point 19 of Charter 08 read: “Transitional Justice. Rehabilitate the reputation of and give state compensation to the victims who suffered political persecution during past political movements as well as their families; release all political prisoners, prisoners of conscience, and people who are convicted because of their beliefs; establish a truth commission to restore historical truth, to pursue accountability and to fulfill justice; seek a settlement of the society on this foundation.” The text of Charter 08 also included a direct reference to the 4 June events, as an example of the “long trail of human rights disasters” caused by the Chinese Communist Party power monopoly. The Charter was initially signed by over 300 scholars, journalists, freelance writers and activists (including Liu Xiaobo, Jiang Qisheng, Ding Zilin, Jiang Peikun, Dai Qing, Li Datong, Tsering Woeser, Wang Lixiong and Zhang Yaojie, and by December 2009 had over 10,000 signatories from throughout China. Chinese living outside China, including Yu Ying-shih, signed a letter of support for the charter [see also NCH Annual Reports 2009–2010, 2013].⁴⁶

See also Japan, Taiwan, Thailand.

COLOMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2004, 2006–2016.

In June 2016, the government and the guerrilla group Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC; Colombian Revolutionary Armed Forces) signed a bilateral ceasefire and cessation of hostilities agreement. This came into force on 29 August 2016, although a de facto ceasefire had been in place since 2015. On 24 August 2016, the two sides reached agreement on a peace deal, which was signed on 26 September 2016 in Cartagena. However, on 2 October 2016, the deal was rejected in a referendum, in part because of concerns over the agreement's lax justice provisions. On 12 November 2016, the two sides announced a revised peace deal, which was signed on 24 November. It was ratified by Congress on 30 November, after which the FARC was due to begin a six-month process of demobilization and disarmament, to be monitored and verified in part by a mission of unarmed United Nations observers. By the end of 2016, FARC combatants had yet to congregate in the concentration zones from where they were due to start the demobilization process, because of delays in making these areas habitable. On 28 December 2016, Congress approved a law to provide amnesties or pardons to FARC combatants and the waiving of criminal prosecutions for security force personnel not under investigation for or convicted of crimes under international law. Those who had served at least five years' imprisonment for crimes under international law would, under certain circumstances, be conditionally released. Ambiguities in the law could result in many human rights abusers evading justice. The modifications made to the peace agreement did not significantly strengthen victims' rights. However, a provision requiring the FARC to provide an inventory of the assets it had acquired in the conflict, which would be used to provide reparation to victims, would, if effectively implemented, be a positive development.

⁴⁶ Human Rights Watch, “China: Tiananmen's Unhealed Wounds” (13 May 2009); Human Rights Watch, “China: End June 1989 Massacre Denial, Free Dissidents” (1 June 2010); Ifex Communiqué (3 June 2009); Index on Censorship (2010, no. 4), 182–83, 221–22; NRC Handelsblad (9 December 2010), 3; PEN American Center, Ifex Alert (2 April 2009); Wordt Vervolgd (December 2010–January 2011) 38.

The peace agreement established a Special Jurisdiction for Peace—to come into force once approved by Congress—to investigate and punish those responsible for crimes under international law, a truth commission and a mechanism to locate and identify those missing as a result of the conflict. Despite some positive features, however, it fell short of international law and standards on victims' rights, including punishments that appeared to be inconsistent with the gravity of certain crimes and a definition of command responsibility that could make it difficult to hold to account FARC and security force commanders for crimes committed by their subordinates.

On 30 March 2016, the government and the second largest guerrilla group, the National Liberation Army (ELN) announced that they would begin peace talks. However, the process had not started by the end of 2016 because of the ELN's failure to release one of its high-profile hostages. President Juan Manuel Santos Calderón was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize on 7 October 2016 for his role in securing the peace deal.

Very few of those suspected of responsibility for conflict-related crimes under international law were brought to justice. However, as part of the peace process, the government and the FARC formally apologized for their role in several emblematic human rights cases. On 15 September 2016, Santos formally apologized for the state's role in the killing in the 1980s and 1990s of some 3,000 members of the Patriotic Union party, set up by the Colombian Communist Party and the FARC as part of the failed peace process with the government of Belisario Betancur (1982–1986).

In February 2016, the Constitutional Court ruled that a 2015 reform (Legislative Act No. 1) giving military courts jurisdiction over cases related to military service and over crimes committed on active service was constitutional. The reform also stipulated that international humanitarian law, rather than international human rights law, would apply when investigating armed forces personnel for conflict-related crimes, even though many such crimes were not committed during combat and the victims were overwhelmingly civilians. However, the Court ruled that international human rights law should also apply during investigations. Nevertheless, there were concerns that the Court's ruling would do little to overcome impunity given the military justice system's woeful record in bringing to justice members of the armed forces implicated in human rights violations.⁴⁷

In 2013, then-Attorney General Alejandro Ordoñez ordered Miguel Ángel Beltrán Villegas (1965–), a historian, sociologist and associate professor (2005–) at the Universidad Nacional in Bogotá [see NCH Annual Reports 2010, 2012.], dismissed and stripped him of his right to teach at public universities for thirteen years. In 2014, he was found guilty of rebellion, arrested in August 2015 and sent to La Picota prison in Bogotá. While imprisoned, he participated in a hunger strike in February 2016 in solidarity with his fellow inmates protesting prison conditions. On 1 September 2016, he was released after a Supreme Court ruling reversed a lower court judgment because it based its finding that he was a member of the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC) on faulty evidence.⁴⁸

On 5 April 2017, President Juan Manuel Santos inaugurated a Truth Commission that would investigate the victimization of civilians during the 52-year civil war (1964–2016). The commission was part of the transitional justice system (including in addition, a Transitional Justice Tribunal and an amnesty court), agreed with guerrilla group Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (FARC) in a peace deal in November 2016. The justice system was approved by Congress earlier in 2016 in a series of votes. In one of these, almost one third of the senate claimed to have a conflict of interests related to war crimes. The commission's task was to find out what happened to the eight million victims of the conflict. It would not be able to impose penalties or transfer evidence or confessions to any court. Former President Álvaro Uribe dismissed the transitional justice system as a “terrorist tribunal” and condemned the peace process.⁴⁹

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2000, 2003–2016.

On 19 December 2015, two rebel leaders convicted by the International Criminal Court (ICC), Germain Katanga and Thomas Lubanga, returned to Congo to serve the remainder of their sentences in Kinshasa. While Katanga finished his sentence from the ICC ruling in January 2016, he remained ⁴⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 123–124, 126.

⁴⁸ “Colombian Political Prisoner and Professor Freed From Prison,” Telesur (2 September 2016).

⁴⁹ Adriaan Alsema, “Colombia Creates Historic Truth Commission,” Colombia Reports (5 April 2017).

in detention and faced national war crimes charges that were filed against him before he was transferred to the ICC. On 21 March 2016, the ICC found the Congolese politician and former rebel leader Jean-Pierre Bemba guilty of rape, murder, and pillage in neighboring Central African Republic. On 19 October 2016, the ICC found Bemba and his defense team guilty of bribing witnesses to lie in his favor at his trial. In October 2016, warlord Gedeon Kyungu Mutanga surrendered. Instead of arresting him, local officials in Lubumbashi gave Gedeon, as he was commonly known, a celebratory welcome. In late 2016, it remained unclear whether he would serve the remainder of his 2009 sentence.⁵⁰

See also Central African Republic, Rwanda.

CONGO (Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

COSTA RICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

CÔTE D’IVOIRE

See Ivory Coast.

CROATIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2001, 2003–2013, 2015–2016.

The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia raised concerns about the pace and effectiveness of prosecutions by the national courts of crimes committed during the 1992–1995 war. The law regulating the status of civilian victims of war passed in 2015 helped ease access to reparations and made it easier for survivors to access crucial services, but challenges remained in providing all victims, especially ethnic minorities, with equal and effective access to justice. For the second consecutive year, no progress was made in establishing the fate and whereabouts of 1,600 persons disappeared during the war.⁵¹

⁵⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 224.

The period of political instability around the turn of the year 2015 was accompanied by a surge in nationalist rhetoric and hate speech targeting specific groups, in particular ethnic Serbs, refugees and migrants. Civil society groups recorded increased instances of the media and public officials “evoking fascist ideology” from the past [Ustasha ideology] by promoting the use of inflammatory iconography and generally fueling an anti-minority sentiment.⁵²

On 23 January 2017, far-right news site Maxportal and local television show Bujica broadcast two videos from 1992 in which former Croatian President (2000–2010) Stjepan Mesic called into question the death toll at the Jasenovac concentration camp during World War II: he spoke about 25,000 deaths while 83,145 people (47,627 Serbs, 16,173 Roma, 13,116 Jews and partisans) had been identified on a name-by-name basis. He also said it was a labor camp rather than a concentration camp. Historians refuted the claims. The Ustasa deliberately destroyed the camp and the village of Jasenovac while retreating before the advancing anti-fascist Partisan troops in April 1945 in order to cover the massive crimes committed there.⁵³

On 13 March 2017, American descendants of Serbs, Jews and Roma seeking compensation for property seized by the Independent State of Croatia (NDH), which was led by the Nazi-allied Ustasa movement (1941–1944) filed a 3.2 billion euro lawsuit against Croatia in the Illinois Northern District Court. Critics said that the suit was likely to fail because the constitution’s preamble stated that Croatia was not the legal successor to the NDH state. The confiscations under NDH rule were part of a process known as the “aryanization of property,” in which property of Serbs, Jews and Roma was given to ethnic Croats according to 1941 racial laws. In 1996, Croatia had passed a law which enabled the return of property seized for the state during the Communist era (1944–1991).⁵⁴

See also Slovenia.

⁵¹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 132.

⁵² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 132.

⁵³ Sven Milekic (BIRN), “Croatia Ex-President Shown Downplaying WWII Crimes,” Balkan Insight (24 January 2017); Sven Milekic (BIRN), “Jasenovac Concentration Camp Photos Show Post-War Reality,” Balkan Insight (7 June 2017).

⁵⁴ Sven Milekic (BIRN), “WWII Compensation Lawsuit Against Croatia ‘Likely to Fail’,” Balkan Insight (13 March 2017).

CUBA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2002, 2006, 2010–2012, 2015–2016.

See United States.

CYPRUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2005, 2008–2011, 2013, 2015–2016.

In 2016, the Committee of Missing Persons in Cyprus (CMP) exhumed the remains of 96 people, bringing the total number of exhumations since 2006 to 1,192. Between 2007 and 2016, the remains of 740 missing individuals (556 Greek Cypriots and 184 Turkish Cypriots) were identified. With information from private individuals drying up and CMP access to Turkish military files continuing to be obstructed, the rate of exhumation and identification of remains was starting to slow down.⁵⁵

The 2017 calendar prepared by the Cyprus Turkish Teacher’s Union (KTOS) sparked controversy because it contained information which contradicted the “official history” taught in Turkish Cypriot schools: (1) Archbishop Makarios III (president of Greek Cyprus, 1960–1974) was presented as the “President of the Republic of Cyprus” while Turkey and the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) had not recognized the Republic; (2) Twelve June 1958 was marked as the date when Turkish Cypriots “brutally murdered” nine Greek Cypriots in Gonyeli after being provoked by the British; (3) An incident was mentioned where Turkish Cypriots were murdered by the Turkish Resistance Organisation (TMT) on 22 April 1962; and (4) Fifteen November—the date that northern Cyprus unilaterally declared independence in 1983—was referred to as: “The date when the common existence of the Turkish Cypriots was put in jeopardy and the date Turkish Cypriot international relations with the rest of the world came to an end after Rauf Denktaş struck a deal with the generals of the coup in Turkey to establish the TRNC.”

The People’s Party (HP) and numerous NGOs with nationalist views issued statements condemning KTOS. On 29 December 2016, the Party of Rebirth (YDP; the political movement of Turkish immigrants in the north) laid a “black wreath” in front of KTOS’s headquarters. Threats were sent to KTOS and its members. KTOS general secretary Sener Elcil declared that the calendar did not contain any false information. KTOS secretary Besim Baysal wrote that KTOS was trying to create an alternative to calendars brought from Turkey which only presented the “official view.” Turkish Cypriot education officials had asked the authorities to launch an investigation against KTOS, hoping that it would lead to a court case. The Denktash Foundation said it also had called for a criminal investigation. It planned a protest against KTOS.⁵⁶

⁵⁵ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 135.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2010, 2013–2016.

On 11 January 2017, the Constitutional Court ruled by a narrow majority that the accessibility of archives from Nazi and Communist regimes would remain unchanged, thereby overturning a Supreme Court proposal which doubted the constitutionality of that accessibility given its privacy implications.⁵⁷

See also Russia.

⁵⁶ Tahsin Eroglu, “Teachers Union Calendar in the North Causes Outrage over ‘Unofficial’ Historical Content,” CyprusMail (29 December 2016).

⁵⁷ Ruth Fraňková, “Researchers Welcome Ruling Protecting Access to Historical Archives,” Radio Praha (12 January 2017).

DENMARK

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2007, 2013, 2016.

In [May] 2016, researcher Martin Rasmussen, who investigated 1,000 of approximately 6,000 case files about members of the Frikorps Danmark (Danish Nazi volunteers who served in the Waffen SS and in concentration camps abroad), discovered that between half and two thirds of these (including payroll books and photographs) stored at the National Archives had been removed. They included documents central to the criminal case against Danish Nazi Helmuth Leif Rasmussen ([1925–])—accused of war crimes at the extermination camp near Bobruisk in Belarus—which were torn out of police reports, and materials about the paramilitary group Petergruppen (Peter group) which was responsible for the murder of the poet-priest Kaj Munch. The discovery of the removed files was immediately linked to a case of archival theft from 2012. In that year, it was discovered that Kim Dorph Vinther and Henrik Irdan had over many years stolen at least 1,062 pieces of Nazi memorabilia and documents (emblems, police reports, court files, and cases about deserters) from the National Archives and sold them to collectors. In 2013, they were sentenced to two years' and 21 months' imprisonment respectively. There were strong suspicions that more persons were involved in the archival theft.⁵⁸

DJIBOUTI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

⁵⁸ Anja Hansen, personal communication (4 May 2016), based on 7 Danish newspaper reports; AFP, "'Irreplaceable' Nazi-era Documents Stolen from Danish Archives," Telegraph (25 October 2012).

ECUADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2007, 2009–2016.

A truth commission set up by the administration of President Rafael Correa to investigate government abuses from 1984 to 2008 (from the beginning of the repressive presidency of León Febres Cordero [1984–1988] until Correa took office) documented 136 cases involving 456 victims, including 68 victims of extrajudicial execution and 17 of enforced disappearance. Progress by a special prosecutorial unit created in 2010 to investigate the cases was slow. According to government statistics from December 2015, judicial procedures had been initiated in only eight cases. In its periodic review of Ecuador in July 2016, the United Nations Human Rights Committee called on Ecuador to carry out timely investigations of cases documented by the truth commission, and bring those responsible to justice [see also NCH Annual Reports 2007, 2009–2010, 2015].⁵⁹

EGYPT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2001, 2003, 2006–2007, 2010–2016.

In April 2016, Khaled Fahmy, head of the history department at the American University in Cairo, [See also NCH Annual Report 2013] criticized the fact that foreign researchers had to obtain a security permit before they could work in the National Archives. For example, United States researchers were denied a permit for a project on the history of private presses in the nineteenth century. To obtain it, they had to follow a procedure which on average took three months after they had submitted a form, a recommendation letter from their university, a copy of their passports, a personal photograph and, often, a synopsis of their research project. Many permits for foreign researchers were denied. Fahmy denounced this state of affairs in which foreign researchers were seen or treated as spies.

Fahmy also related that when in about 1991 he did research in the Egyptian National Archives about the Levantine campaign led by Ibrahim Pasha, Mohamed Ali's son, from 1831 to 1840, he was barred from photocopying three maps: (1) a map of enemy Ottoman positions around Jaffa, on which Ibrahim's forces were preparing to march; (2) a proposed postal system to connect Ibrahim's command in the Levant and Cairo, with thirty points along a route that would deliver correspondence between Mohammed Ali and his son; and (3) a map illustrating a proposal of Ibrahim to his father in 1838 or 1839 to reinforce positions on Egypt's northern border by building naval fortifications across the Delta coastline. The reason given was national security. According to Fahmy, after the Egyptian-Israeli border dispute over Taba (1988) following the 1979 peace treaty, the Egyptian team, which included historian Younan Labib Rizk, proved Egypt's claim to the town by using documents that showed Egypt exercised sovereignty over it. The evidence was supported by old maps, prompting the security apparatus to understand the significance of old maps for national security.

⁵⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 230.

Examples of researchers denied a research permit included an Egyptian working on Mamluk history, a student working on the history of the Labour Corps during World War I, and a student working on the history of the British irrigation expertise in Egypt in the late 19th century (because of the dispute with Ethiopia over the Nile waters, it was feared to contain information that could harm Egypt's negotiating position—for example, information about Ethiopia's right to the Nile waters).⁶⁰

In January 2017, the NGO Cairo Institute for Human Rights Studies (CIHRS) published a report entitled Toward the Emancipation of Egypt: A Study on Assembly Law 10/1914 (Cairo: CIHRS, 2017, 95 pages). Without properly consulting parliament, the British colonial authorities had issued the so-called Assembly Law during World War I (1914) in order to stifle dissent. Although the law was repealed by parliament in 1928, King Fuad I did not officially notify parliament of his objection to the repeal bill and the latter was not published in the Official Gazette and therefore never entered into force. Successive post-independence governments continued to apply it against meetings and demonstrations until the present day. The draconian law legalized the concept of collective liability, which allowed for mass sentences against participants in any assembly where a crime was alleged to have occurred, regardless of each participant's individual criminal liability.

The report was authored by a researcher specialized in modern Egyptian history who wished to remain anonymous together with legal researcher Salah al-Ansary. The authors' access to the National Archive was obstructed: an employee told the research team that the archives were not open to the public; access required affiliation with a university and the filing of an application. Since the topic was political, the application had to be approved by the General Intelligence, the National Security Council, and Homeland Security. The authors commented: "The requirement of security establishment approval to access historical documents dating back a century was odd indeed. The only explanation for such a procedure is that it reflects the state's attempt to control the historical record and narrative" (p. 16).

Several Egyptian lawyers and historians who were consulted for the report requested anonymity, fearing for their personal safety. The CIHRS Cairo office encountered several difficulties (registration duty, foreign funding prohibition), causing it to move some of its activities and staff to Tunisia. One of the lead researchers for the report left Egypt, amid fears that he could be convicted in connection with the foreign funding prohibition. The editor of the report was banned from travel.⁶¹

⁶⁰ Khaled Fahmy, "Giulio, the Islands and National Security," Mada Masr (23 April 2016); Lisa Anderson, "Academic Freedom in a Globalized World," Science & Diplomacy (17 August 2016).

On 23 February 2017, the institution “Censorship of Artistic Works” banned the film “18 Days,” which covered events between the start of the Revolution on 25 January 2011 and the departure of President Hosni Mubarak on 11 February 2011 on the charge that it contained many obscene words. The same institution did not issue a permit to screen the film “The Last Days of the City” during the first quarter of 2017.⁶²

See also Israel, South Sudan.

EL SALVADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2016.

In June 2016, a monitoring compliance hearing relating to two cases of enforced disappearance committed during the armed conflict (1980–1992) took place before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights. In September 2016, the Court rendered a judgment in one of the cases, Contreras versus El Salvador, and updated information about the criminal investigations and all the efforts made to identify and bring to justice those suspected of criminal responsibility for crimes under international law and human rights violations.

In July 2016, the Supreme Court declared the 1993 Amnesty Law unconstitutional, an important step forward for victims of past human rights violations seeking justice. Five days after the United Nations Truth Commission had published its recommendations in 1993, authorities had passed the Amnesty Law that had so far prevented investigations into the human rights violations committed during the conflict.

Four military officers who were the subject of a 2011 arrest warrant issued by a Spanish judge for their involvement in the 1989 killing of six Jesuit priests, their housekeeper and her daughter were reportedly arrested in February 2016. However, according to press reports, the Supreme Court denied the extradition request in August 2016. In September, a court ordered the reopening of the El Mozote case in which hundreds of civilians were executed by military officials in December 1981. During 2016, two former military officers who served as ministers of defense during the armed conflict were deported from the United States to El Salvador accused of human rights violations committed during the 1980s.

⁶¹ Cairo Institute for Human Rights Studies, Toward the Emancipation of Egypt: A Study on Assembly Law 10/1914 (Cairo: CIHRS, 2017, 95 pages), 1–17.

⁶² Association for Freedom of Thought and Expression (AFTE), The Quarterly Report on the State of Freedom of Expression in Egypt: First Quarter \(January–March 2017\) ([Cairo]: AFTE, 2017), 14–15.

In 2017, judge Ricardo Chicas reopened the case of the murder of Archbishop Oscar Romero, who was shot by a right-wing death squad in 1980 as he celebrated mass. The case against the prime suspect had been dismissed in 1993 as a result of the amnesty law. The ruling followed a 2016 decision by the constitutional court to repeal the amnesty law that prohibited criminal trials stemming from the civil war (1980–1992).⁶³

In late January 2017, United States (US) Congressman James McGovern met with President Salvador Sánchez Cerén and urged him to open the military archives relating to the more than 10,000 disappearances from the civil war (1980–1992) and to create a national commission to search for them. Official data report 75,000 dead and 8,000 missing. In August 2016, 27 Congressmen, including McGovern, called on President Barack Obama to declassify United States military and intelligence records and reports relating to unresolved cases of disappearances and human rights violations during the civil war. Some documents still remained classified, mainly those of United States intelligence agencies.⁶⁴

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

See Gambia.

ERITREA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008, 2016.

⁶³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 30, 151; "El Salvador Judge Reopens Case of Slain Archbishop Romero," Telesur (18 May 2017).

⁶⁴ EFE, "Congresista de EE.UU. pedirá a El Salvador abrir archivos de la guerra civil," El Mundo (27 January 2017); "A Leader on Human Rights, McGovern to Receive Testimonies of Families Whose Loved Ones Disappeared During Civil War" (press release: 27 January 2017).

ESTONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2010, 2015.

On 31 May 2017, nationalist politician Georg Kirsberg of the far-right Conservative People's Party vowed in his election campaign to decriminalize Holocaust denial and outlaw instead revisionism on the Soviet domination of Estonia.⁶⁵

ETHIOPIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2011, 2015–2016.

Large-scale and unprecedented protests swept through Ethiopia's largest region of Oromia beginning in November 2015, and in the Amhara region from July 2016. Ethiopian security forces cracked-down on these largely peaceful demonstrations, killing more than 500 people. Protesters from Oromia expressed concerns over decades of historical grievances and the wrongful use of lethal force by the security forces. Similar protests and a resultant crackdown had occurred in Oromia in April and May 2014 [see also NCH Annual Reports 1998, 2000, 2003, 2015–2016].⁶⁶

In October 2016, security services started killing people at the annual Irreecha festival—a thanksgiving celebration of the Oromos at which those attending wear traditional clothes and sing resistance songs—in Bishoftu. The numbers killed were disputed: official sources counted 52 deaths, Oromo Federalist Congress activists claimed that 678 people died. Many condemned the attack as a massacre and an “attack on Oromo identity.” After the crackdown, pictures of the festival goers who were killed were published internationally, but the state shut down all access to the outside world.⁶⁷

The right of people to leave the country was restricted. If people seeking to leave were caught by the military during national holidays to commemorate independence, they were subject to higher fines than on other days.⁶⁸

See also Egypt.

⁶⁵ “Estonian Politician Vows to Legalize Holocaust Denial,” Arutz Sheva: Israel National News (10 July 2017).

⁶⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 251, 253.

⁶⁷ Ismail Einashe, “Ethiopia in Crisis, Closes Down News,” Index on Censorship, 45, no. 4 (Winter 2016), 32–35.

⁶⁸ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 154.

FIJI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006, 2010.

FINLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

On 5 May 2017, the government and the Sámi parliament officially agreed to launch a truth and reconciliation process. The chairwoman of the Sami parliament, Tiina Sanila Aikio, said that negotiations were beginning on what the content, mandate and resources of the commission would be. The relationship between the government and the Sámi parliament had been difficult in the past few years, among other reasons, because of the rejection of Sámi bills during the previous government term.⁶⁹

FRANCE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1999, 2001–2009, 2011–2014, 2016.

In December 2016, the Collective against Islamophobia in France and a French human rights organization that was founded by Jews in the 1920s sued Morocco-born French-Jewish scholar Georges Bensoussan ([1952–]), author of Jews in Arab Lands (2012) and editor of The Shoah History Review, before the 17th Criminal Tribunal of Paris on charges of incitement to racial hatred for remarks about the anti-Semitism of Muslim French made in 2015 during an interview aired on France Culture radio station. Bensoussan had said: “In French Arab families, babies suckle anti-Semitism with their mothers’ milk.” Bensoussan argued that he had paraphrased Algerian sociologist and filmmaker Smain Laacher. In reality, Laacher had said in an interview that for many Arab families, anti-Semitism is in “the air that one breathes.” Bensoussan told the court that he had apologized several times to those who were hurt by his comments and that he did not mean to generalize his remarks to all Muslims. In a statement of 16 December 2016, scholars called Bensoussan’s remarks legitimate criticism and dismissed the charge as an attempt at intimidation. On 7 March 2017, the tribunal acquitted Bensoussan, ruling that the plaintiffs had failed to substantiate the charges and concluding that Bensoussan merely “misspoke” in quoting Laacher without intention to incite hatred.⁷⁰

⁶⁹ Yle Sapmi, “Truth and Reconciliation Commission May Be Launched in Finland Already after Summer.” The Independent Barents Observer (11 May 2017).

On 26–28 May 1967 at Pointe-à-Pitre, capital of Guadeloupe, a strike of construction workers (which began on 24 May 1967) for a wage increase of two percent developed into a major clash between the CRS (French mobile police forces or Képis rouges) and black workers, students, and other protesters. The prefect Pierre Bolotte ordered to shoot, leading the CRS and French army to kill 87 persons and wound several hundreds. One of the first people to be shot and killed was Jacques Nestor, believed to be a member of Groupe d’organisation nationale de la Guadeloupe (GONG), a clandestine movement for Guadeloupean independence. Although Guadeloupeans had demanded an inquiry into the killings since 2005, all relevant archives (of hospitals, barracks, offices of mayors) mysteriously disappeared; the archives in France were inaccessible. A French inquiry in 2014–2016 said that “due to lack of evidence, it was impossible to ascertain the number of people who died.” The official record held that seven were killed. France never officially acknowledged its role in the massacre. The intelligence police reports from 1967, initially classified for 50 years, were mandated—on the eve of the 50th anniversary of the massacre—to remain closed for another 25 years. On 24 April 2017, a collective of Guadeloupean associations and workers’ movements made plans to commemorate the massacre’s fiftieth anniversary in Paris.⁷¹

See also Algeria, Burkina Faso, Greece, Morocco, Rwanda, Senegal, Tunisia, United States.

⁷⁰ “Leading Jewish Scholar Prosecuted in France for Alleged anti-Muslim Remarks,” Haaretz (20 December 2016); Shirli Sitbon, “French Historian Georges Bensoussan Sued over ‘Arab Hate’ Comment,” Jewish Chronicle (7 February 2017); “French Jewish Historian Cleared of Hate Speech Charges against Muslims,” Jewish Telegraphic Agency (8 March 2017).

⁷¹ “Guadeloupe: Appel pour la vérité, la justice, la réparation et la réhabilitation pour les victimes des massacres des 26 et 27 mai 1967 à Pointe à Pitre,” CaribCreoleNews (24 April 2017); Susannah Savage, “50 Years On: Guadeloupeans Remember French Brutality,” Al-Jazeera ([May] 2017).

GABON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2016.

GAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2016.

On 23 March 2017, Justice Minister Abubacarr Tambadou said in a statement that a Truth and Reconciliation Commission would be set up and reparations would be offered to victims of former President Yahya Jammeh's government, which was accused of the torture and killing of perceived opponents. The government would also probe the finances of Jammeh, who fled into exile in January 2017 to Equatorial Guinea after a rule that began in 1994 when he seized power in a coup. Public hearings would be expected to commence by the end of 2017.⁷²

GEORGIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2003, 2010–2012, 2014, 2016.

See Russia.

GERMANY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–2000, 2003, 2006–2013, 2015–2016.

In early 2017, Jörg Baberowski, professor of Eastern European history at Humboldt University in Berlin, filed an interim injunction with the Cologne District Court against the General Student Committee Asta, a left-wing student union, at the University of Bremen with the aim of prohibiting as defamation the reproduction or circulation of Asta leaflets which criticized Baberowski's statements on Nazi crimes and refugees. After Baberowski had addressed a political meeting in Bremen, Asta had accused him of glorifying violence and playing down arson attacks on refugee hostels as a natural response by outraged citizens. The union also claimed that he advocated racism, confronted people with sheer hatred and represented right-wing radical positions. When the injunction was granted, Asta objected and proceedings were held. In March 2017, the court ruled that whereas the student union had the right to call Baberowski a “right-wing radical,” it must not take his controversial statements about refugees out of context because this violated his right to publicity.

⁷² "Gambia to Set Up Truth and Reconciliation Commission," Reuters (23 March 2017).

In February 2014, Baberowski had told Der Spiegel that he shared historian Ernst Nolte’s views in the 1986 “Historikerstreit” on the singularity of the Holocaust. He compared Hitler with Stalin in Der Spiegel, claiming that Hitler was not “a psychopath, he wasn’t cruel, and he tolerated no mention of the extermination of the Jews in his presence.” Stalin, on the other hand, “had fun adding names to the death lists and signing them. He was evil-minded, a psychopath.” Further debate arose when Baberowski spoke at the German Museum of History in Berlin at the height of discussions over Germany possibly engaging in the Iraq and Syrian crises, stating: “If one is not prepared to take hostages, burn villages to the ground, hang people and spread fear and terror, which is what the terrorists are doing, one cannot win such a conflict.” Attempts by students to organize an event at Humboldt University to address these remarks were initially blocked by university officials, who spoke of a possible “defamation of staff members.” But the meeting was eventually held. In early December 2014, Peter Burschel, director of the Humboldt University history department, issued a statement calling on students and teaching staff to counter what he called a campaign against Baberowski.⁷³

On 2 June 2016, the German parliament approved overwhelmingly (one vote against, one abstention) a resolution describing the 1915 massacre of Armenians by Ottoman Turks as a genocide. The resolution used the word “genocide” in the headline and text. It also said that Germany, at the time an ally of the Ottomans, bore some guilt for doing nothing to stop the killings. The German government distanced itself from the resolution. In Istanbul, armed riot police were deployed outside the German consulate, near Taksim square, where a protest against the vote was taking place. Days later, eleven German members of parliament (MPs) of Turkish origin were put under police protection as they received death threats after supporting the motion. Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdogan had questioned the Turkishness of the eleven. A tweet of Ankara’s mayor showing the eleven MPs and saying they had “stabbed us in the back,” was retweeted by many Turkish nationalists, some of whom made death threats. A group of Turkish lawyers reportedly filed a complaint accusing the MPs of “insulting Turkishness and the Turkish state.” The leader of Germany’s Green Party, Cem Özdemir—who initiated the debate on the genocide in the Bundestag—told a newspaper that he had been ⁷³ Michael Gardner, “University Defends Controversial Scholar,” University World News (5 December 2014); “Germany: Growing Support for Defense of Bremen University Students against Right-wing Professor Jörg Baberowski,” World Socialist Web Site (6 February 2017); Michael Gardner, “Controversial German Professor ‘Hounded by Commissars’” University World News (31 March 2017).

emailed threats.⁷⁴

On 22 October 2016, Manfred Grieger's contract as head of historical communication of Volkswagen (VW) was terminated. He was replaced by archivist Ulrike Gutzman. The apparent reason for Grieger's departure (which many called a dismissal) was his critical 2015 review of a 518-page 2014 study of the World War II labor practices of Auto Union (now Audi), a VW subsidiary. The review received scant attention until the German business weekly, Wirtschaftswoche, mentioned it in late August 2016. Grieger had written that the 2014 study was biased and played down the relationship between Auto Union officials and the Nazi elite during World War II. An open letter drafted by historian Hartmut Berghoff and signed by 75 German academics accused VW of a vindictive punishment.

With Hans Mommsen, Grieger co-authored an exhaustive study financed by VW and published in 1996, exposing how the company had made extensive use of forced labor during World War II, when its factory in Wolfsburg produced weapons and military equipment. The book also uncovered embarrassing information about Ferdinand Porsche and Anton Piëch; the sons of the latter owned a majority of VW's voting stock since 2012.⁷⁵

See also Hungary, Namibia, Poland, Russia, Rwanda, Tanzania, Ukraine, United States.

GHANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2004–2008.

In October 2016, the authorities announced that they would remove a statue of the Indian leader and pacifist Mahatma Gandhi (unveiled by Indian President Pranab Mukherjee in June 2016) from the University of Ghana's Legon campus in Accra and relocate it. The statue had sparked protests over Gandhi's racism: when he lived in South Africa at the turn of the 19th and 20th centuries, he had advocated the superiority of Indians over black Africans and used the derogatory term kaffir to refer to native Africans.⁷⁶

⁷⁴ "Armenia 'Genocide' Row: Turkey Recalls Envoy to Germany after Vote," BBC News (2 June 2016); "Eleven German MPs under Police Protection in 'Genocide' Row," BBC News (12 June 2016).

⁷⁵ "VW Fires Corporate Historian—Views on World War II Era to Blame?" Europe Online Magazine (22 October 2016); Alison Smale & Jack Ewing, "Volkswagen Parts Ways With the Historian Who Chronicled Its Nazi Past," New York Times (2 November 2016).

⁷⁶ Abigail Abrams, "Ghana Will Remove 'Racist' Gandhi Statue From Its Oldest University," Time (6 October 2016); "Petition: Gandhi's Statue at the University Of Ghana Must Come Down" (12 September 2016).

GREECE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2004–2011, 2013–2016.

In [October] 2016, British historian Sheila Lecoer, lecturer in Italian at the Imperial College, London, and her Greek publisher Alexandria Publications were sued for defamation in Athens by the family of the late Vayias Vaitsis. In the original English edition and the 2013 Greek translation of her book Mussolini's Greek Island: Fascism and the Italian Occupation of Syros in World War II (2009), Lecoer had mentioned that in 1944 Vaitsis had accepted the post of acting prefect of Syros, capital of the Cyclades archipelago, under the quisling government of Prime Minister Ioannis Rallis (1878–1946) and the German occupation force (October 1943–November 1944). She also wrote that “a continuing controversy surround[ed] his name” (pages 182–183 of the 2009 edition). The family demanded 300,000 euros in damages as they claimed that Vaitsis’s reputation was tarnished and many inhabitants of the island now considered him to be a traitor and Nazi collaborator. The trial was planned for 27 October 2016.⁷⁷

In [November] 2016, deputy Education Minister Kostas Zouraris reportedly suggested openly that the neo-Nazi political party Golden Dawn should harass historian, history textbook author and member of parliament Maria Repoussi. He spoke about her in derogatory terms. He also reportedly accused some historians of being paid agents by “enemies of the nation” from abroad.⁷⁸

In [May] 2017, human rights activist Panayote Dimitras, head of the Greek Helsinki Monitor and of Racist Crimes Watch [See also NCH Annual Report 2008], filed a lawsuit against author, columnist and historian Soti Triantafyllou (1957–) under the anti-racism legislation over claims she had defamed Islam and incited violence via a quote in one of her articles. This quote, which she attributed to 13th-century Venetian traveler Marco Polo (1254–1324), said, “The militant Muslim is the person who beheads the infidel, while the moderate Muslim holds the feet of the victim.” Dimitras claimed that Triantafyllou could have verified the quote, which was never uttered by Marco Polo. The article, entitled “Rock and Roll will Never Die,” was published in the free magazine Athens Voice in November 2015, the day after jihadi gunmen burst into the Bataclan music hall in Paris and killed ninety people during a series of terrorist attacks. In several of her writings, Triantafyllou had criticized radical Islam and the underestimation of the threat of Islamic extremism. She was set to appear in court on 21 July 2017. Dimitras had to prove that the author acted with an intention to incite violence, hate or discrimination against Islam in a way that endangered public order.⁷⁹

⁷⁷ Network of Concerned Historians Campaign; “Petition for Sheila Lecoer: Greek version” (19 October 2016); “Petition for Sheila Lecoer: English version” (24 October 2016); Damian Mac Con Uladh, personal communications (19 and 25 October 2016).

⁷⁸ Antonis Liakos, personal communication (7 November 2016).

On 2 and 8 May 2017, historian Polymeris Voglis (1964–), the head of a committee appointed by the education minister to propose revisions to primary school history textbooks, was targeted by Proto Thema, one of the biggest-selling Sunday tabloids. In two successive issues, he was attacked as an enemy of the nation: someone who called FYROM “Macedonia” and who termed the Greek civil war (1946–1949) as a “revolution”. He was also called a “janissary” of the minister in the second article, which included comments from one academic and some other non-academic historians attacking him as “illiterate” and as someone who wanted to “denationalize” Greece. The Pan-Hellenic Association of Philologists also condemned the revisions.⁸⁰

See also Bangladesh.

GRENADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2016.

Civil society organizations continued to push for approval of Law 3590, which would create a National Commission for the Search for Victims of Enforced Disappearance and Other Forms of Disappearance. The law, which was first presented before Congress in 2006, had not been discussed by the end of 2016.

In February 2016, a court convicted two former military officers on charges of crimes against humanity in the form of sexual violence and domestic and sexual slavery. It was the first time that a Guatemalan court had prosecuted a case of sexual violence related to the country’s 36-year internal armed conflict (1960–1996). The victims were 15 Maya Q’eqchi’ women.

José Efraín Ríos Montt, former President and commander-in-chief, was found guilty in May 2013

⁷⁹ Damian Mac Con Uladh, personal communication (18 May 2017); Harry van Versendaal, “Lawsuit over Islam Comments Tests Boundaries between Controversial Language and Free Speech,” Ekathimerini.com (23 May 2017); “Soti Triantafyllou,” Wikipedia (retrieved 23 May 2017).

⁸⁰ Damian Mac Con Uladh, personal communication (18 May 2017); Philip Chrysopoulos, “Greek Philologists Criticize Education Ministry for Biased History Books,” Greek Reporter (18 May 2017).

of genocide and crimes against humanity. He was sentenced to 80 years' imprisonment, but several days later the Constitutional Court overturned the verdict on procedural grounds. Ríos Montt had led a military government from 1982 to 1983, when the military carried out hundreds of massacres of unarmed civilians. In August 2015, a trial court declared Ríos Montt mentally unfit for retrial, ruling instead that he should be represented by his lawyers in a special closed-door proceeding. In October 2015, an appellate court rejected a two-year-old petition by Ríos Montt's attorneys to apply a 1986 amnesty decree that would put an end to his prosecution, ruling that the decree, applicable to "all political and related common crimes" committed between March 1982 and January 1986, did not apply to genocide and crimes against humanity. The trial remained stalled at the end of 2016.

In recent years, the Attorney General's Office had obtained convictions in several other cases involving human rights crimes committed during the internal conflict. In 2011, four army Special Forces soldiers received lengthy sentences for their role in the 1982 Dos Erres massacre of more than 250 people. In 2013, former National Police Chief Héctor Bol de la Cruz received a 40-year sentence for ordering the disappearance of a student activist in 1984. In January 2015, former Police Chief Pedro García Arredondo was sentenced to 90 years' imprisonment for a raid on the Spanish embassy in 1980, in which 37 people burned to death. In July 2014, Fermín Felipe Solano Barillas became the first ex-guerrilla to be convicted in connection with atrocities. Found guilty of ordering the massacre of 22 residents of the town of El Aguacate in 1988, he was sentenced to 90 years' imprisonment.⁸¹

GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2016.

More than seven years on, Guinea had yet to deliver justice for the grave crimes committed in September 2009, when security forces massacred some 150 opposition supporters and raped over 100 women. The crimes were committed during the military rule of then-Captain Moussa Dadis Camara. The panel of judges appointed in 2010 to investigate the massacre made important strides despite political, financial, and logistical obstacles. They had interviewed more than 400 victims and charged some fifteen suspects, including several high-level members of the security forces and the former junta leader, Camara. While the investigation appeared to enjoy increased political and financial support from the government, the failure to suspend high-level suspects from their government posts, the March 2016 appointment of accused General Mathurin Bangoura to the position of governor of the capital Conakry, and the failure to close the investigation, raised concern. In late 2016, several investigative aspects remained outstanding, including the questioning of key witnesses and locating mass graves believed to contain the bodies of some one hundred victims who remained unaccounted for.⁸²

⁸¹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 173; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 294–295.

In August 2016, the Provisional Commission on National Reconciliation (CPRN) submitted its final report to President Alpha Condé. The CPRN was established by presidential decree in 2011 to explore the roots of decades of political and communal violence and present a roadmap for addressing them. The report made 22 recommendations, including the creation of an independent truth commission, justice for key perpetrators, and reparations for victims of political and communal violence. The National Human Rights Commission (INIDH), established in 2015 and mandated by the 2010 constitution, largely failed to fulfil its mandate and suffered from a lack of credibility as a few commissioners quit amid concerns over lack of fiscal transparency.⁸³

GUINEA-BISSAU

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2012, 2015.

GUYANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997.

⁸² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 176; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 299–300.

⁸³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 300–301.

HAITI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2000–2003, 2006, 2008–2009, 2013–2016.

The United Nations Human Rights Committee and the United Nations independent expert on Haiti both called on Haiti to continue investigations into financial and human rights crimes allegedly committed during former President Jean-Claude Duvalier's tenure as president (1971–1986). They called on Haiti to bring to justice all those responsible for serious human rights violations committed during Duvalier's tenure. Allegations of violations included arbitrary detentions, torture, disappearances, summary executions, and forced exile. Duvalier died in 2014, six months after the Port-of-Prince Court of Appeal ruled that the statute of limitations could not be applied to crimes against humanity and ordered that investigations against him should continue. A reopened investigation into crimes committed by Duvalier's collaborators remained pending in late 2016.⁸⁴

HONDURAS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998, 2001–2002, 2009–2015.

HONG KONG

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996. See China.

HUNGARY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997, 2004, 2007–2016.

On 31 August 2016, Ágnes Heller and János Weis founded the Lukács Archive International Foundation (LAIF) to support the survival of the Lukács Archives. György Lukács (1885–1971) was a renowned Jewish philosopher and literary historian known for his original views of the Marxist

⁸⁴ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 30, 179; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 306.

doctrine [see NCH Annual Report 2016].⁸⁵

In March 2017, the city council of Budapest, which was dominated by the ruling Fidesz party, announced plans to remove the statue of György Lukács from Szent István Park. The statue was to be replaced by that of King (and Saint) Stephen (975–1038), considered the founder of the Hungarian State and the person who converted the Hungarian tribes to Christianity.⁸⁶

On 15 May 2017, German Holocaust denier Horst Mahler (1936–) was arrested in Hungary after illegally leaving Germany. Mahler had announced that he was seeking asylum in Hungary. He was a former Marxist urban guerrilla who became a far-right extremist; he had been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for Holocaust denial in 2009 but released in 2015 due to ill health and placed on probation. Mahler's parents had been Nazi Party members, even though Mahler had Jewish ancestors.⁸⁷

⁸⁵ Network of Concerned Historians Campaign; “Protest Against Closing Down the Lukács Archiv” (Petition; 8 March 2016); Alex Doherty, “‘History Has a Habit of Intruding’: Save the Lukács Archive” (14 March 2016); “György Lukács,” Wikipedia (31 March 2016); “Statement on the Formation of the Lukács Archive International Foundation \(LAIF\) \(Hungarian: LANA\)” (31 August 2016).

⁸⁶ Vladislav Davidzon, “Statue of György Lukács in Budapest to Be Removed,” Tablet (30 March 2017).

⁸⁷ Sewell Chan, “Horst Mahler, German Holocaust Denier, Is Arrested in Hungary,” New York Times (15 May 2017).

INDIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1997, 2000–2016.

In early 2016, officials, including Muhammad Shafi Zahid, director of the Department of Archives and Archaeology of the government of Jammu and Kashmir, and Abdul Ahad, its former director, reported that after independence, and especially after 1985, the government of Jammu and Kashmir, and particularly its judiciary and police departments, had broken the archives law by not regularly transferring documents to the archives. This endangered the writing of history, including about the 1953 events (when Prime Minister of Jammu and Kashmir Sheikh Abdullah was dismissed and later arrested). The police department was said to have an own archive. There were no significant records of the Jammu and Kashmir Assembly available: two volumes of Jammu and Kashmir Constituent Assembly debates and a copy of the debates of the Autonomy resolution, which was passed by the Assembly in 2000 for restoration of the pre-1953 status to Jammu and Kashmir, were available at the Assembly while the rest was untraceable or available in bits and pieces. On 22 April 2016, minister for finance and culture Haseeb Drabu issued a six months' deadline to the department of archives to archive all cabinet decisions.⁸⁸

On 12 February 2016, Kanhaiya Kumar—a doctoral student in African studies, elected president of the Jawaharlal Nehru University Student Union (JNUSU) and a member of the student wing of the Communist Party of India—was arrested after a campus event on 9 February 2016 for allegedly shouting anti-India slogans at a protest against the hanging in February 2013 of Afzal Guru, a Kashmiri activist convicted of playing a role in the 2001 attack on the Indian parliament. On 24 February 2016, Umar Khalid and Anirban Bhattacharya, two PhD students in history, were arrested in connection with their participation in the same demonstration. The three were interrogated on charges of sedition. After their release on bail, Kumar gave a speech on campus about poverty, caste and freedom. Subsequently, JNU took disciplinary action against the three. Also in 2016, violent clashes had broken out in Ramjas College over an invitation to Umar Khalid⁸⁹

In February 2016, scholars in India, led by a professor at the Indian Institute of Technology Bombay, ⁸⁸ Naseer Ganai, "Jammu and Kashmir Archives Denied Record for Past 6 Decades," Mail Today (12 January 2016); "Official Documents, Cabinet Decisions not Archived since 1985," Kashmir Reader (23 April 2016).

⁸⁹ Saikat Majumdar & Prakash Shah, "The Battle for the Indian Mind," Times Higher Education (5 May 2016); PEN & International Human Rights Program, Fearful Silence: The Chill on India's Public Sphere (Toronto / London 2016), 8, 18; PTI, "JNU Row: Umar Khalid, Anirban Bhattacharya's Police Custody Extended by 2 More Days," Indian Express (27 February 2016); Scholars at Risk, Free to Think 2016: Report of the Scholars at Risk Academic Freedom Monitoring Project (New York: Scholars at Risk, 2016), 6–7; Vasudha Venugopal, "Universities to Dedicate a Wall to War Heroes," The Economic Times (2 May 2017).

initiated a petition calling for the removal of Sheldon Pollock, a Sanskrit scholar working at Columbia University, as chief editor of a Harvard University Press series of Indian classical texts on the grounds that his writings “misrepresented our cultural heritage” and that he had “shown disrespect for the unity and integrity of India” In the past, Pollock had received the Indian president’s award for Sanskrit and the Padma Shri Award. The scholars also criticized his support for recent statements condemning the arrest of student leader Kanhaiya Kumar at New Delhi’s Jawaharlal Nehru University on the charge of sedition (see item above). Radical Hindu activist Rajiv Malhotra accused Pollock of engaging in a “tendentious reading of the Indian past and of its present problems that is fixated on caste, class, race and gender oppression and regards our cultural achievements as tainted by this legacy.”⁹⁰

In [late April] 2016, Anurag Thakur, member of the Lok Sabha belonging to the ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), named Bipan Chandra (1928–2014), Aditya Mukherjee (1950–), K. N. Panikkar (1936–), Sucheta Mahajan (1958–), and Mridula Mukherjee (1950–) (all current or former historians of Jawaharlal Nehru University) in parliament and attacked their book India’s Struggle for Independence. He alleged that the authors used the term “terrorist” for Bhagat Singh (1907–1931), a revolutionary socialist who was influential in the Indian independence movement, and that this amounted to willful defamation of a national hero. He asked for an inquiry. Chandra c.s., however, never used the term “terrorist” to describe Singh although the latter used the term to describe himself. Chandra c.s. sometimes spoke of a “revolutionary terrorist.” Gradually, when the connotation of the term “terrorist” became negative, Chandra stopped using it. In 2007, he issued a public statement urging that it should be dropped; he used the phrase “revolutionary socialist” instead. The book under attack, however, still carried the earlier terminology as it was a 1988 edition which was never revised, although reprinted fifty times. The co-authors issued a statement on the day of the attack saying that they wanted to change the term with immediate effect and wrote to the publishers of the English and Hindi versions to do so. Nevertheless, the sale of the book remained prohibited by Delhi University, RSS ideologue Dinanath Batra demanded destruction of the English copies, and criminal cases were filed in Kanpur court (Uttar Pradesh) against the authors.⁹¹

In June 2016, a special court in Gujarat convicted 24 people for their involvement in the mass killing of 69 people by a Hindu mob in Gulbarg Society, a Muslim neighborhood in Ahmedabad, during the ⁹⁰ Elizabeth Redden, “Scholars Who Study Hinduism and India Face Hostile Climate,” Inside HigherEd (12 April 2016); Saikat Majumdar & Prakash Shah, “The Battle for the Indian Mind,” Times Higher Education (5 May 2016).

⁹¹ Mridula Mukherjee, “A History of Their Own: Behind the Bhagat Singh Controversy Lies an Attempt to Impose One Notion of Nationalism,” Indian Express (4 May 2016); Romila Thapar and others, Bipan Chandra and Bhagat Singh (booklet; 2016); Kashmir Dhankhar, personal communications (3 May 2016; 10 & 13 & 16 July 2016).

2002 Gujarat riots. While pronouncing the verdict, the court called the killings the “darkest day in the history of civil society.” But some victims’ families, lawyers, and rights activists criticized the acquittals of senior Bharatiya Janata Party leaders and a police official.⁹²

In July 2016, the High Court in Chennai (Madras) rejected a series of petitions demanding the prosecution of Tamil novelist Perumal Murugan ([1966–]). In December 2013, Murugan had published a novel, Madhorubhagan (English: One Part Woman, published by Penguin). Set in the early twentieth century in the village Namakkal, Tiruchengode, Tamil Nadu, it told the story of a poor, childless couple, of which the wife participated in a sex ritual during an ancient chariot festival in order to conceive. In 2015, Hindu and caste-based groups protested against the book, saying that the “fictitious” extramarital sex ritual at the center of the plot insulted the town, its temple and its women. Copies of the novel were burned and a petition sought the arrest of Murugan, although the latter asserted that the scenario was based on historical fact. He was forced to a “settlement” with a “peace council” in Tamil Nadu state, according to which Murugan agreed to apologize for his novel and withdraw all unsold copies of the book. Murugan also announced that he gave up writing. The court declared the settlement not binding.⁹³

On 19 July 2016, the Supreme Court criticized Congress vice-president Rahul Gandhi for his remark that the Hindu nationalist Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) was behind the 1948 assassination of Mahatma Gandhi and indicated that he would have to face trial for criminal defamation and prove that he made the statement in the public interest. Gandhi made the comment in March 2014 during a parliamentary election rally at Bhiwandi, Maharashtra; it led to a criminal complaint filed by RSS activist Rajesh Kunte. On 13 May 2016, the Supreme Court had ruled that India's criminal defamation law did not have a chilling effect on free speech, and told three petitioners who challenged the constitutional validity of Indian Penal Code Sections 499 and 500 (making defamation a criminal offense punishable with up to two years’ imprisonment), including Rahul Gandhi, that they would have to stand trial in the cases against them.⁹⁴

On 5 November 2016, the police of Bastar district, Chhattisgarh state, lodged a First Information

⁹² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 316–317.

⁹³ “Perumal Murugan: Indian Court Drops Charges against Author,” BBC News (5 July 2016); Soutik Biswas, “How an Indian Writer ‘Returned from the Dead,’” BBC News (25 August 2016); PEN & International Human Rights Program, Imposing Silence: The Use of India’s Laws to Suppress Free Speech (Toronto / London 2015), 43.

⁹⁴ Krishnadas Rajagopal, “SC Slams Rahul Gandhi in Defamation Case,” The Hindu (19 July 2016); Dhananjay Mahapatra, “RSS killed Gandhi: Express Regret or Face Trial, Supreme Court Tells Rahul Gandhi,” Times of India (19 July 2016); Betwa Sharma, “Criminal Defamation: The Urgent Cause that Has United Rahul Gandhi, Arvind Kejriwal and Subramanian Swamy,” Huffington Post (15 July 2015).

Report (FIR) against Nandini Sundar (professor of sociology at Delhi University), Archana Prasad, a history professor at Jawaharlal Nehru University and a member of the All India Democratic Women's Association, Vineet Tiwari (Joshi-Adhikari Institute in Delhi and member of the Communist Party of India), Sanjay Parate (Chhattisgarh State Secretary of the Communist Party of India [Marxist]) and others along with Maoists for the murder of anti-Maoist activist Shamnath Baghel based on a complaint of the latter's wife. They were charged with criminal conspiracy, murder, and punishment for rioting. Naxals (members of a Maoist guerrilla group) allegedly killed Baghel on 4 November in Nama village. Sundar and the other accused said that the charges were fabricated as part of pressure tactics against scholars and activists documenting human rights abuses committed by the police in the state.

Sundar, who had studied tribal-dominated Bastar since 1990, had initiated a public-interest litigation (PIL) against human right violations in Chhattisgarh in 2007. This led the Supreme Court in 2011 to ban the violent, government-sponsored Salwa Judum vigilante movement. More recently, in May 2016, Sundar, Prasad, Tiwari and Parate belonged to a fact-finding team that looked into the impact of Maoist violence and state excesses on ordinary villagers in Bastar, finding that they were not only victims of fake encounters, gang rapes and arrests (by the police and security forces), beatings (by both police and Maoists), killing of informers (by Maoists), but were also increasingly falling prey to a new form of Salwa Judum. The scholars and activists were allegedly intimidated and harassed by the police. One month earlier, in April 2016, Baghel and other villagers had formed a security group and spearheaded the protest against Naxal activities in their village. Since May 2016, they had reportedly received threats from Maoists after they had filed a complaint against Sundar, Prasad, Tiwari, Parate and others for allegedly inciting tribals against the government and seeking their support for the Maoists during the fact-finding mission. They alleged that Sundar and the others had "threatened" the villagers not to oppose the Maoists—an accusation the scholars called a fake charge. On 8 October 2016, Sundar's book on the conflict in the region, The Burning Forest: India's War in Bastar, was released. On 24 October 2016, the police and security forces in Chhattisgarh burnt effigies of critics of human rights violations, including Sundar, at an official protest. Prasad was an expert in the contemporary history of adivasi (ethnic and tribal groups considered the aboriginal population of India); she focused on the ideologies of resistance and forms of protest amongst adivasi workers through the collection of their oral histories.⁹⁵

In 2013, some Tamil Nadu politicians claimed that the Nadar community was depicted in a poor light in a National Council for Educational Research and Training (NCERT) social science textbook for ⁹⁵ "After Burning their Effigies, Chhattisgarh Police Now Charge Critics With 'Murder'," The Wire (8 November 2016); "DU Professor Nandini Sundar Booked for Tribal Man's Murder," The Hindu (8 November 2016); Anjali Puri, "Burning the Constitution Among the Tribals," The Wire (book review of The Burning Forest; 8 October 2016).

Class IX, India and the Contemporary World-1 (used by the Central Board of Secondary Education [CBSE] and 15 state boards). A chapter entitled “Clothing: A Social History” mentioned that the Nadars were toddy-tappers and had migrated to the southern Travancore state in the nineteenth century to work under Nair landlords. The recommendation of the NCERT’s textbook development committee (that had prepared the book) to delete these references was carried out. On 19 December 2016, the CBSE decided to remove the section entitled “Caste, Conflict and Dress Change” from the textbook, following an order by the Madras High Court to remove “objectionable content.” The section discussed how the Nadars were forced to keep their upper bodies uncovered by the caste council of the Nairs of Travancore state in the early 1800s. This was perceived as a sign of respect towards the “upper” castes, and they had to pay a so-called “breast tax” if they chose to cover themselves. In 1822, the practice sparked the Channar Revolt, in which women from the Nadar and Ezhava communities demanded the right to wear the same clothing as “upper” caste women. Hostility continued until 1858. While some groups approved the removal of the section, saying that its content was “degrading” and “inaccurate,” historians condemned it as “sanitizing history” and “erasing the anti-caste struggle.”⁹⁶

On 19 April 2017, the Supreme Court ruled that Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) leaders Lal Krishna Advani (a former deputy prime minister), Murli Manohar Joshi (a former government minister) and Uma Bharti (a current government minister) had to be tried for criminal conspiracy over the 1992 destruction of the mosque at Ayodhya. The three leaders, who denied any wrongdoing, had made inflammatory speeches that encouraged Hindu mobs to tear down the Babri mosque at Ayodhya on December 1992. The riots that followed killed nearly 2,000 people. The Court added that the trial had to be concluded in two years. It had been hearing the case since 2011 after setting aside the 2010 Allahabad High Court ruling [See also NCH Annual Reports 2002–2004, 2006–2007, 2010–2011, 2015].⁹⁷

See also Ghana, United Kingdom, United States.

⁹⁶ Basant Kumar Mohanty, “Assam Boy Forces Textbook Revision,” Telegraph (5 February 2014); Maya Palit, “The CBSE Just Removed an Entire History of Women’s Caste Struggle,” The Wire (24 December 2016).

⁹⁷ “Ayodhya Dispute: India Top Court Orders Trial for BJP Leaders,” BBC News (19 April 2017).

INDONESIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2001–2002, 2004–2013, 2015–2016.

On 23 February 2016, after numerous complaints of “nudity” and “explicit content,” Facebook user Dea Basuri ([1993]–) had her account suspended after she posted a series of historical mostly black-and-white photos of local women. The posts showed Indonesian women in traditional attire with their breasts exposed and were a reaction to what Basuri called unreasonable censorship by television stations in Indonesia. The album had gone viral within 24 hours with almost 3000 shares on Facebook. Social media users threw their support behind Basuri by sharing her Twitter posts as well as signing her online petition appealing to the Facebook CEO entitled “Dear Mark Zuckerberg: Please stand up for gender equality and the preservation of history”.⁹⁸

In March 2016, the Indonesian Commission for Human Rights (Komnas HAM) sent a letter to United States President Barack Obama, requesting the White House to disclose confidential documents on the 1965–1966 massacres.

On 18–19 April 2016, a two-day symposium on the 1965–1966 killings was held in Jakarta. It was the first time that a public discussion of the massacres was endorsed by the government. It brought together survivors, scholars, activists and artists, as well as military and other government officials. Retired General Luhut Pandjaitan, the Coordinating Minister for Political, Legal and Security Affairs, delivered the opening speech, saying that no official apologies were to be expected. He also ruled out a criminal investigation of the killings.

On 25 April 2016, President Joko Widodo instructed Luhut “to begin gathering information about mass graves scattered across the archipelago. The coordinator of NGO Commission for Missing Persons and Victims of Violence (KONTRAS), Haris Azhar, said it had evidence of at least sixteen mass graves containing as many as forty bodies each, mostly on Java, but also on Bali and Sulawesi, but it expressed concerns about guarantees of legal protection of the sites and people who knew about them.

On 9 May 2016, Bedo Untung, coordinator of the Foundation for the Research of 1965/66 Massacre (YPKP 65) handed the government a list of 122 mass graves, believed to contain 1,999 bodies, asking that the sites and witnesses to those deaths be protected. It included sites in Java and Sumatra but no other regions where killings occurred, such as Bali, Kalimantan, Sulawesi, East Nusa Tenggara and West Nusa Tenggara.

In October 2016, the government announced that it would redress the violations using non-judicial measures to ensure “national harmony and unity.” Victims and NGOs raised concerns that this process might prioritize reconciliation while abandoning the quest for truth and justice.⁹⁹

⁹⁸ Marguerite Afra Sapiie, “Facebook Suspends Indonesian User for Posting Historical Photos Featuring Topless Women,” Jakarta Post (26 February 2016).

On 3 May 2016, a World Press Freedom Day celebration in Yogyakarta was disbanded. The police urged journalists and press activists to cancel the event, which planned to screen Pulau Buru Tanah Air Beta (Buru Island: My Homeland), a documentary by Rahung Nasution on the 1965–1966 massacres.¹⁰⁰

On 2 June 2016, Rappler.com reporter Febriana Firdaus attempted to cover a meeting in Jakarta of over 300 Islamic hardliners and retired army generals opposed to government-backed efforts to officially acknowledge the 1965–1966 massacres. The crowd began to target Firdaus as she was interviewing members of the Indonesian Catholic Students Association (PMKRI). The PMKRI members had come to the venue to protest their logo removal from the symposium. Organizers of the meeting and supporters of the Islam Defenders Front (FPI) and State Defense Movement (GBN) surrounded her and began to yell at and threaten her. She was banned from the venue. Following the meeting, FPI supporters and other Islamic hardliners took to the Internet, sending violent threats to Firdaus on social media as part of a campaign of intimidation against her that lasted for more than 24 hours. Users labeled her a “fake Islamist” and a communist supporter. The Alliance of Independent Journalists (AJI) transferred Firdaus to a secure location. She feared for her life and the lives of her family members.¹⁰¹

On 20 July 2016, an international panel of judges—established in 2014, presided over by judge Zak Yacoob, a former South African Constitutional Court Justice, and operating under the name People’s Tribunal on the 1965 Crimes against Humanity in Indonesia—concluded that the 1965 mass killings were crimes against humanity, and that the United States, United Kingdom and Australia were complicit in them. Its report estimated that 400,000 to 500,000 people—believed associated with the Partai Komunis Indonesia (PKI; Indonesian Communist Party)—were killed by military death squads. In November 2015, the tribunal had held a four-day hearing in The Hague, hearing over twenty witnesses, some of whom gave evidence behind a screen to protect their identity. In an official ⁹⁹ “US Must Open Its Archives on 1965-66 Massacre: Human Rights Watch in Jakarta,” Jakarta Globe (n.d. [2016]); Jeffrey Hutton, “Indonesia Moves to Investigate Anti-Communist Atrocities,” New York Times (26 April 2016); Joe Cochrane, “After Long Silence, Indonesia Allows Talk of Anti-Communist Atrocities,” New York Times (17 April 2016); Melle Garschagen, “Voor altijd het stigma van een communist,” NRC Handelsblad (22 April 2016), 14–15; Lintang Sulastri, “Activists Hand Indonesian Government List of Mass Grave Sites,” Benar News (9 May 2016); Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 189.

¹⁰⁰ Bambang Muryanto & Jon Afrizal, “Scholars, Government Differ on Marxism,” Jakarta Post (23 May 2016).

¹⁰¹ IPI, “Indonesian Reporter in Hiding after Harassment Campaign” (8 June 2016); “AJI Condemns Intimidation against Journalist,” Tempo.co (3 June 2016).

reaction, coordinating Political, Legal and Security Affairs Minister Luhut Pandjaitan told the press that Indonesia had its own legal system, that no external party could dictate the way it solved its problems and that the government would not bow to the panel's recommendations.¹⁰²

In July 2016, the local Aceh provincial parliament selected seven commissioners to the Aceh Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which was expected to operate between 2016 and 2020. The Commission was established to examine the circumstances which led to past abuses during the Aceh conflict between the Indonesian security forces and the Free Aceh Movement, in particular between 1989 and 2004.¹⁰³

See also Japan.

IRAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2016.

In February 2016, Homa Hoodfar ([1950–]), a triple citizen of Canada, Ireland and Iran and professor of social anthropology at Concordia University in Canada, traveled to Iran to visit relatives and conduct historical and ethnographic research on the participation of Muslim women in public life. In March, the counter-intelligence unit of the Revolutionary Guards raided her apartment, confiscated her computer, her passports and her cell phone, and arrested her. Released on bail shortly thereafter, she was not permitted to leave Iran. Over the subsequent two months, she was summoned repeatedly to report to authorities to be interrogated. On 6 June 2016, she was arrested and taken into custody in Evin prison. On 11 June 2016, she was indicted on unknown charges, although they reportedly included “dabbling in feminism and security matters” and “co-operating with a foreign state against Iran.” It was not yet clear whether she had been charged with espionage, sedition or propaganda against the state. She was denied medical care. Homa was a world expert on sexuality and gender in Islam and had written books and papers. Iran did not recognize dual nationality and treated detainees only as Iranian, depriving them of consular access. On 26 September 2016, Hoodfar was released on “humanitarian grounds.” She went to Oman, where she would receive urgent medical attention.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰² Juliet Perry, “Tribunal: Indonesia Guilty of 1965 Genocide,” WDSU News (21 July 2016).

¹⁰³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 189.

¹⁰⁴ Scholars at Risk, “Canadian-Iranian Professor Arrested in Iran” (9 June 2016); Susan Ormiston, “Concordia University Prof Jailed in Iran's Evin Prison, Family Says,” CBC (9 June 2016); Saeed Kamali Dehghan & Ashifa Kassam, “Canadian-Iranian Professor Arrested in Tehran by Revolutionary Guards,” Guardian (8 June 2016); Sidhartha Banerjee, “Canadian Academic Homa Hoodfar Indicted on Unknown Charges in

On 9 August 2016, the website of late Grand Ayatollah Hussein Ali Montazeri (1922–2009) posted an audio recording of a meeting in which he objected to the state-sanctioned execution of 4,000–5,000 political prisoners, mostly members of the Mujahedeen-e-Khalq (MEK), over the course of two months in 1988. One of those responsible for ordering the executions was conservative cleric Ebrahim Raisi ([1962–]), a candidate for the presidential elections in 2017 and, in 1988, a deputy prosecutor-general and member of a committee that decided on the executions in Tehran. Montazeri's son Ahmad, the cleric behind making the recording public, was twice interrogated by the Special Court for the Clergy about the release of the tape and pressed to remove it. According to him, the interrogators accused him of “divulging state secrets” and helping the “alliance of Saudi Arabia and the MEK.” Very few government officials defended the release of the tape or criticized the MEK executions. Ali Motahari, a member of parliament representing Tehran, published an open letter to Interior Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi on 27 August 2016, saying that while the MEK's crimes were known to everyone, Pourmohammadi should respond to doubts and questions about the executions. In response, 35 members of parliament signed a letter of complaint against him.

By the time Ahmad Montazeri was arrested, the audio file was disseminated widely in the social media and in media outlets outside of the Iran. In November 2016, a Special Clerical Court sentenced Montazeri to 21 years' imprisonment, reduced to six years because his brother was a martyr. He was also defrocked for three years. Montazeri refuted the charge of divulgence of state secrets with the argument that his father had already written about this meeting in one of his books. His father had been put under house arrest from 1997 until his death in 2009.¹⁰⁵

On 30 October 2016, the authorities arrested several organizers of a demonstration with thousands of participants at the tomb of pre-Islamic King Cyrus the Great (c. 590–530 BC) in Pasargadae, 630km (390 miles) south of Tehran, on charges of violating “the values” of the Islamic Republic of Iran and chanting nationalistic slogans. The activists said that 30 October marked the day that Cyrus conquered Babylon in modern-day Iraq and declared all peoples equal in his Achaemenid Empire. Cyrus was also said to have freed slaves, including thousands of Jews. Iranian nationalists had marked the “Day of Cyrus” for the past several years.¹⁰⁶

Iran,” Globe and Mail (11 July 2016); Charles Taylor, “We Can't Delay: Homa Hoodfar Must Be Freed,” Boston Globe and Mail (2 September 2016); Alan Shepard, “Message from the President: Professor Emerita Homa Hoodfar Is Jailed in Iran” (Press release Concordia University; 9 June 2016); Melissa Etehad, “Iran Has Detained an Iranian Canadian Professor, and Her Family Doesn't Know Why,” Washington Post (9 June 2016); Alex Neve, “The World Must Step Up for Homa Hoodfar,” The Globe and Mail (14 September 2016).

¹⁰⁵ “Iran Officials behind 1980s Executions Defend Decision,” Al Monitor (30 August 2016); Radio Zamaneh, “Iran: 21 Year Sentence for Disclosing File on State Execution of 4000 Political Prisoners,” Eurasia Review (30 November 2016); Ehsan Abdoh-Tabrizi, “Iran's Presidential Election: The Cynical Moderate Versus the Representative of the Deep State,” Open Democracy (17 May 2017).

¹⁰⁶ “‘Activists Held’ at King Cyrus Tomb in Iran,” BBC News (31 October 2016).

On 7 June 2017, terror attacks in Tehran at the parliament and Ayatollah Khomeini's shrine (mausoleum) claimed seventeen lives and left 42 people injured. Questions remained about the number and nationality of the terrorists involved; some thought that the assailants were Iranians who had joined Islamic State. The attacks took place just as President Hassan Rouhani settled into his second term.¹⁰⁷

See also Argentina, Bahrain, United States.

IRAQ

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2016.

An anonymous history professor at the university identifying himself as an “independent historian” started the blog Mosul Eye (<http://mosuleye.wordpress.com>) in English and Arabic in order to chronicle events in Mosul under Islamic State (IS) domination [See also NCH Annual Report 2016]. In October 2015, the blog had 11,500 followers. The chronicler reportedly received many threats from IS. The historian had been keeping journals and collecting an archive of materials on Iraqi militias and insurgent groups since the 2003 invasion. He declared that there was heavy damage to the archives of the Sunni Muslim library of the 265-year-old Latin Church and Monastery of the Dominican Fathers and the Mosul Museum Library (which contained works dating back to 5000 BCE). In February 2017, when IS was chased from the university, the anonymous historian started a campaign to restore the university library under the slogan “Let it be a book, rising from the ashes.” The aim was to collect at least 200,000 books.¹⁰⁸

Between mid-March and early April 2016, Islamic State (IS) militants destroyed the Northwest Palace of Assyrian King Ashurnasipal II, built in the 9th century BCE, and blew up the Temple of Nabu in the ancient Assyrian royal capital Nimrud (near Mosul). Nabu was the ancient Mesopotamian god of writing and scholarship.¹⁰⁹

¹⁰⁷ Ramin Jahanbegloo, “Islam and Sectarianism,” New Age Islam (13 June 2017); “Iraanse Revolutionaire Garde: dat IS aanslagen Teheran opeist, bewijst dat Saoedi-Arabië erachter zit,” Volkskrant (7 June 2017).

¹⁰⁸ Ursula Lindsey, “An Independent Historian Documents Life Under the Islamic State,” Al-Fanar (9 October 2015); Gilgamesh Nabeel, “Q & A with the ‘Mosul Eye’ Historian” Al-Fanar (9 October 2015); Neveen Youssef, “Rebuilding Mosul’s Libraries Book by Book,” BBC News (12 April 2017).

¹⁰⁹ Zainab Bahrani, “It’s Time To End The Boycott Of Iraqi And Syrian Academics,” Huffington Post (1 July 2016); Kristin Romey, “Iconic Ancient Sites Ravaged in ISIS’s Last Stand in Iraq,” National Geographic (10 November 2016); Kristin Romey, “Why ISIS Hates Archaeology and Blew Up Ancient Iraqi Palace,” National Geographic (14 April 2015).

In 2016, it was reported that Iraqi and Syrian scholars were unable to attend international conferences on heritage preservation that concerned their own countries because of visa restrictions. A (female) Iraqi archaeologist who won a post-doctoral fellowship at Columbia University, New York, was denied a visa.¹¹⁰

Around 8 July 2016, suicide bombers and gunmen killed at least 35 people in an attack by Islamic State (IS) militants at a Shia shrine, the mausoleum of Sayid Mohammed bin Ali al-Hadi, in Balad.¹¹¹

Between the end of August and the beginning of October 2016, the ziggurat at the ancient Neo-Assyrian capital of Nimrud, a stepped tower built in 879 BCE, was leveled by the Islamic State (IS). Kurdish Peshmerga forces severely damaged archaeological remains at the site of Dur-Sharrukin, Sargon II's capital of the Neo-Assyrian Empire, while digging defensive berms and trenches at the site between mid-October and early November 2016. Dur-Sharrukin had been looted by IS in the spring of 2015. When Nimrud was recaptured by Iraqi government forces on 13 November 2016, the full extent of the destructions by IS became visible, prompting UNESCO to describe the act as a war crime. The custodian of the Nimrud site, Sheikh Abdullah Saleh, was chased away from it for the duration of its occupation by IS. Iraq's deputy antiquities minister, Qais Rasheed, estimated that as much as 70% of Nimrud has been destroyed by IS.¹¹²

On 17 December 2016, the Iraqi Defense Ministry pledged high rewards to those who provided credible information about the whereabouts of remnants of Kuwaiti missing persons, and Kuwait's national archive.¹¹³

On 9 January 2017, Meriwan al-Naqshabandi, representative of Sunni Endowment Diwan in Kurdistan, said in a statement that Islamic State (IS) destroyed nearly one hundred religious places, including churches and Yazidi shrines in Nineveh Plain, during their occupation of villages and cities of Iraqi Kurdistan.

Meanwhile, more than 400 historic texts (13th–20th centuries) were stored in cans and hidden behind a wall constructed before IS occupied (June 2014–November 2016) and partly destroyed the Christian monastery of Mar Behnam, near Mosul. The texts were recovered; texts that had not been ¹¹⁰ Zainab Bahrani, "It's Time To End The Boycott Of Iraqi And Syrian Academics," Huffington Post (1 July 2016).

¹¹¹ Jeremy Bowen, "Iraq Shrine Attack: IS Kills Dozens in Balad," BBC News (8 July 2016).

¹¹² Kristin Romey, "Iconic Ancient Sites Ravaged in ISIS's Last Stand in Iraq," National Geographic (10 November 2016); "Nimrud: Iraqi Forces 'Retake Ancient City from IS," BBC News (13 November 2016); Martin Chulov and Salem Rizk, "Piecing Back Together an Iraqi Archaeological Gem Blown Sky-high by Isis," Guardian (24 November 2016).

¹¹³ "Iraqi Offers Rewards for Information about Kuwaiti POWs, Archive," Kuwait News Agency (17 December 2016).

secreted were burned.¹¹⁴

On or around 24 January 2017, Islamic State (IS) evacuated its headquarters and reportedly burned tons of its archives “amid strict procedures” in Tal Afar District, west of Mosul. On 29 May 2017, IS began to burn tons of its archives at its main offices near residential areas in Baaj, west of Mosul, in order to cover crimes committed by the group and to conceal the identity of its sympathizers.¹¹⁵

On 21 June 2017, as Iraqi security forces were approaching, Islamic State (IS) militants blew up the Great Mosque of al-Nuri and the Hadba Minaret (built in 1172) in Mosul. In July 2014, IS leader Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi gave a Friday sermon from the pulpit inside the mosque during which he demanded allegiance in what was his first and only public appearance following the declaration days earlier of a “caliphate” (a state governed in accordance with Islamic law, or Sharia, by God’s deputy on Earth, or caliph). The Sunni mosque was named after the Muslim General Nur al-Din Mahmoud Zanki, famous for waging jihad against Christian crusaders.¹¹⁶

See also Germany, Iran, Israel, United Kingdom, United States.

IRELAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000, 2002, 2004, 2006, 2013, 2015–2016.

See Iran, United Kingdom.

¹¹⁴ Loaa Adel, “Islamic State Destroys 100 Religious Shrines in Nineveh Plain,” Iraqi News (9 January 2017); Owen Jarus, “Hundreds of Historic Texts Hidden in ISIS-Occupied Monastery,” Life Science (16 December 2016).

¹¹⁵ Loaa Adel, “Islamic State Evacuates Headquarters in Tal Afar, Burns Its Archives,” Iraqi News (24 January 2017); Mohamed Mostafa, “Paramilitary Leader Says IS Burn Archives in Baaj, West of Mosul,” IraqiNews.com (29 May 2017).

¹¹⁶ “Battle for Mosul: Destruction of al-Nuri Mosque ‘Shows IS Defeated’,” BBC News (22 June 2017); Kishwar Rizvi, “Destruction of Mosul Mosque Desecrates History,” CNN (24 June 2017).

ISRAEL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000–2003, 2008–2014, 2016.

In April 2016, a report by the Akevot Institute for Israeli-Palestinian Conflict Research, Point of Access, found that public access to 99% of 14 million archival records kept in Israel's State Archive and in the archives of the Israeli Defense Forces and the Defense Establishment was blocked due to decisions made without legal authority, disregard for the regulations on accessing archival material and other failures. The archives also failed to provide reasons for decisions to deny applications to access archival material. Israeli government archives concealed certain documentation related to state-sanctioned human rights violations, without legal authority to do so and years after the so-called Restricted Access Period (usually between fifteen and seventy years, depending on the sensitivity of the material) expired. Neither the General Security Service nor the Mossad were preparing for the nearing end of the 70-year Restricted Access Period on their archival material. Akevot tried in vain to access files from 1948–1949 relating to Israeli Arabs, files labeled "Occupied territories" from 1967–1968, police files from the 1970s, and files compiled by a committee examining the 1990 riots on the Temple Mount. Akevot also discovered a forgotten clause ("The state is prohibited from divulging information that could harm relations with other minorities, and which could serve as a basis for filing charges against the state.") in a recommendation made by a ministerial committee that dealt with viewing classified archival material. The Association of Israeli Archivists and the family of Paul Alsberg awarded the 2016 Alsberg Prize for Research on Archives to Akevot Institute researchers Noam Hofstadter and Lior Yavne for their report, Point of Access.¹¹⁷

On 14 October 2016, Israel froze its ties with UNESCO after it approved at committee stage a draft decision submitted by seven Arab countries that criticized Israel's excavation activities at holy places in Jerusalem and the occupied West Bank. The draft aimed at "the safeguarding of the cultural heritage of Palestine and the distinctive character of East Jerusalem" and repeatedly used only the Arab name Haram al-Sharif (Noble Sanctuary) for one of the holiest sites in both Islam and Judaism and never the Jewish name, Temple Mount. It denounced Israeli actions, including the use of force and the imposition of restrictions on Muslim worshippers and archaeological work. Israel accused UNESCO of denying Judaism's connections to the religion's holiest sites; Education Minister Naftali Bennett said that the draft decision "denied history and encouraged terror." On 18 October 2016, ¹¹⁷ Lior Yavne, "Akevot's Report on Access to Israeli Gov't Archives Released" (press release; 30 May 2016); Akevot, Point of Access: Barriers for Public Access to Israeli Government Archives (Tel Aviv: Akevot, 2016); Ofer Aderet, "Activists: Israel State Archives Buries History To Save Government from Shame." Haaretz (22 May 2016).

UNESCO passed the resolution.¹¹⁸

More than two years after the end of the 2014 Gaza-Israel conflict, in which some 1,460 Palestinian civilians were killed, many in evidently unlawful attacks including war crimes, the Israeli authorities had indicted only three soldiers for looting and obstructing an investigation. In August 2016, the Military Advocate General announced the closure of investigations into twelve incidents, despite evidence that some should be investigated as war crimes. Israel's military investigations were not independent or impartial, and failed to deliver justice.

The prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) continued her preliminary examination of allegations of crimes under international law carried out by Israeli forces and Palestinian armed groups since 13 June 2014. The Israeli government allowed an ICC delegation to visit Israel and the West Bank in October 2016.

In December 2016, the United Nations (UN) Security Council demonstrated rare unity when it reaffirmed that Israel's establishment of settlements in Palestinian territory it had occupied since 1967 had no legal validity and constituted a flagrant violation of international law and an obstacle to peace and security. Rather than exercise its veto, the United States abstained while the Council's fourteen other member states supported the resolution.¹¹⁹

In June 2017, on the fiftieth anniversary of the Six-Day War (5–10 June 1967), Israel released 150,000 confidential documents (officially inaccessible until 2037). The Egyptian archives remained classified, with many doubting that they still existed, while many of those in Iraq and Syria had been destroyed by years of neglect, corruption, and ongoing wars. One observer wrote that Arab leaders had been “glad to keep that dark part of their history under lock and key, fearing that if too much were revealed, it would be shown just how weak—and complicit—they were in one of the worst collective military disasters of modern times.”¹²⁰

See also Poland, Ukraine, United States.

¹¹⁸ “Israel Freezes Ties with Unesco for ‘Denying Jewish Holy Sites’,” BBC News (14 October 2016); “Unesco Passes Contentious Jerusalem Resolution,” BBC News (18 October 2016); “Israël overdrijft conflict Tempelberg [Interview with Ofer Zalzburg],” NRC Handelsblad (17 October 2016), 12.

¹¹⁹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 204–205.

¹²⁰ Sami Moubayed, “Opening of 1967 Israeli Archives Disturbs Old Arab Wounds,” Asia Times (5 June 2017).

ITALY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2003, 2008, 2010, 2012, 2016.

On or around 1 January 2017, Facebook removed the picture of a sixteenth-century Renaissance statue of the sea god Neptune (dominating the Piazza del Nettuno in Bologna) from the Facebook page of art historian and writer Elisa Barbari in compliance with its policy on nudity. The Facebook page was called “Stories, curiosities and views of Bologna.” The intervention was much criticized.¹²¹

See also United States.

IVORY COAST (Côte d’Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2016.

The trial of former President (and historian) Laurent Gbagbo and his Youth Minister and militia leader Charles Blé Goudé for crimes against humanity committed during the 2010–2011 post-election crisis before the International Criminal Court (ICC) began in January 2016 and was ongoing at the end of 2016. The ICC and national judges were also investigating high-level perpetrators from pro-Ouattara forces but had yet to bring them to trial in late 2016. In February 2016, however, President Alassane Ouattara announced that no more Ivorian nationals would be sent to the ICC for prosecution because the national justice system was operational. The domestic Special Investigative and Examination Cell, established in 2011, continued its investigations into human rights crimes committed during the crisis. The cell charged high-level perpetrators from both sides, including several pro-Ouattara commanders now in senior positions in the Ivorian army. In May 2016, the highest criminal court (cour d’assises) began trying the former President’s wife (and historian), Simone Gbagbo, for crimes against humanity, despite an outstanding ICC warrant for her arrest. Prior to this, in May 2015, the ICC rejected Ivory Coast’s appeal against the admissibility of her case before the Court.

At least 146 Gbagbo supporters who were arrested between 2011 and 2015 were still awaiting trial for crimes allegedly committed during the post-electoral violence of 2010. Approximately 87 of them had been in detention since 2011 or 2012. Despite Ouattara’s commitment to ensure that justice would be applied equally under his presidency, only those suspected of being Gbagbo supporters were tried for serious human rights violations committed during and after the 2010 election. Forces loyal to Ouattara who committed serious violations were not prosecuted. Some of them had been identified by victims' families; although the killings were investigated no one was prosecuted by the end of 2016.

¹²¹ Nick Squires, “Facebook ‘Censors’ Nude Statue of Sea God Neptune, the Well-known Renaissance Symbol of Northern Italian City,” Telegraph (2 January 2017).

In February 2016, 24 military officers charged with the assassinations of former coup leader and Ivorian President, General Robert Guéi, and his family in 2002, were tried before the Military Tribunal. Three defendants, including General Bruno Dogbo Blé, former head of Gbagbo's Presidential Guard, and Commander Anselme Séka Yapo, former security chief, were sentenced to life imprisonment. Ten defendants were sentenced to ten years' imprisonment each and the others were acquitted. Neither the special cell nor the ICC were investigating crimes committed during election-related violence in 2000 or the 2002–2003 armed conflict.

Ivory Coast's reparations body had, when it submitted its report in April 2016, compiled a list of more than 316,000 victims potentially eligible for reparations, although the vast majority of victims had yet to receive assistance. On October 25 2016, the government published the report of the Dialogue, Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which completed its work December 2014, although the report did little to identify those responsible for crimes committed during the 2002–2003 conflict or 2010–2011 crisis.¹²²

¹²² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 22, 130; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 209, 211.

JAMAICA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

Impunity prevailed for the decades-long pattern of alleged unlawful killings and extrajudicial executions by law enforcement officials. While more than 3,000 people had been killed by law enforcement officials since 2000, only a handful of officials had been held accountable to date.¹²³

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2016.

In March 2016, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) published concluding observations on the combined 7th and 8th periodic reports of Japan. Among other things, it expressed concerns related to the issue of comfort women, including the lack of a full victim-centered approach, and the need for “full and effective redress and reparation” for all victims, including those from countries not covered by the agreement with South Korea. Comfort women came also from such countries as the Philippines, China, Taiwan, the Netherlands, Indonesia, and East Timor.¹²⁴

The Japanese APA hotels chain was criticized by the Chinese government because a book written by its owner Toshio Motoya was widely distributed in its outlets. Entitled “The Real History of Japan: Theoretical Modern History II,” the book was a compilation of Motoya’s columns for the hotel’s newsletter. It denied that the 1937 Nanjing massacre had happened and cast doubt on historical evidence for the sexual slavery system during the Pacific War (1931–1945). Popular Chinese hotel booking portals pulled APA’s listings from their sites. Existence of the book was highlighted in a widely shared video posted on Chinese microblog site Weibo on 15 January 2017.¹²⁵

See also China, Korea, North, Korea South, United States.

¹²³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 29.

¹²⁴ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 210; “Japan / S. Korea: “The Long Awaited Apology to ‘Comfort Women’ Victims Is yet to Come—UN Rights Experts” (United Nations press release; 11 March 2016); Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, Concluding Observations on the Combined Seventh and Eighth Periodic Reports of Japan (CEDAW/C/JPN/CO/7-8; 7 March 2017), paras. 28–29; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 359.

¹²⁵ “Japan Hotelier’s Nanjing Massacre Denial Angers China,” BBC News (19 January 2017).

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004, 2015.

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2016.

The collapse of the last International Criminal Court (ICC) case directly related to the 2007–2008 post-election violence devastated victims' hopes for justice. National authorities made no progress to address these crimes. The ICC vacated charges against Deputy President William Ruto and Joshua arap Sang, a former radio journalist, for lack of evidence in April 2016. For one judge, the combination of witness interference and political obstruction warranted a mistrial. The case's collapse followed that of cases against four others, including President Uhuru Kenyatta. In September 2016, an ICC trial chamber referred Kenya's lack of cooperation in the Kenyatta case to the ICC's Assembly of States Parties.

The government continued its campaign to press the African Union to consider calling on its member countries who also belong to the ICC to leave the court, but several countries blocked consensus at a July 2016 summit. A bill related to Kenya's withdrawal from the ICC remained pending in parliament. The government continued to ignore the plight of thousands of women and men who were raped during the post-election violence in 2007–2008. It had failed to provide livelihood support, as well as medical and psychosocial care to them, including for children who were born from rape and faced violence and discrimination. The government had not established a restorative justice fund that was promised to survivors of historical injustices, including post-election violence. Hearings continued over the course of 2016 in the Kenyan high court on a petition brought by survivors of election-related sexual violence seeking to compel the government to investigate. A second case, related to shootings by police during the violence, was also pending.¹²⁶

¹²⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 21; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 380–381.

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011, 2013–2015.

In February 2016, the authorities stopped all investigations into abductions of Japanese citizens, reversing the 2014 bilateral agreement to investigate cases. Media reports said that the decision followed Japan's reinstating previously eased sanctions after North Korea's nuclear weapons tests in January. North Korea had previously admitted that its security agents abducted twelve Japanese nationals during the 1970s and 1980s [see also NCH Annual Report 2015].¹²⁷

See also China.

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012–2013, 2016.

On 28 November 2016, amidst a political crisis involving President Park Geun-hye, the Education Minister Lee Joon-sik unveiled the drafts of three new textbooks (written by a secretly selected panel of scholars) during a nationally televised news conference but at the same time indicated that it was rolling back its plan to require schools to use only state-issued history textbooks [See also NCH Annual Report 2016]. Opposition parties and many local education offices criticized the drafts, saying that they highlighted former President Park Chung Hee's achievements while giving only cursory descriptions of his brutal dictatorship (1961–1979) and that they did not or only scarcely mention mass executions of civilians during the Korean War (1950–1953).

On 12 May 2017, President Moon Jae-in ordered his government to abolish the state-issued history textbooks for middle and high school students which had been developed under the auspices of his impeached and ousted predecessor, former President Park. The history textbooks prepared by Park's government had been so unpopular that only one of the 5,500 middle and high schools adopted one of them; but even that school was temporarily barred from using it after parents filed a lawsuit.¹²⁸

On 28 December 2016, activists put up a statue representing wartime sex slaves outside the Japanese ¹²⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 221.

¹²⁸ Choe Sang-Hun, "Amid Scandal, South Korean Officials Retreat on Controversial Textbook Plan," New York Times (28 November 2016); Choe Sang-Hun, "Professor Who Wrote of Korean 'Comfort Women' Wins Defamation Case," New York Times (25 January 2017); Choe Sang-Hun, "South Korea's New Leader Abolishes State-Issued History Textbooks," New York Times (12 May 2017).

consulate in Busan as a protest against a deal struck exactly one year before, in which Japan apologized and promised to give 1 billion yen (8.6 million US dollars) to a fund for Korean women. Critics said the deal was reached without consultation with victims, did not contain Japan's acknowledgement of legal responsibility, and did not provide direct compensation to the victims. Busan police initially removed the statue but there was fierce pressure for it to remain. Days later, local authorities allowed it to be reinstalled. Japan said that the statue violated the 2015 deal, which agreed that Japan's reparations would "finally and irreversibly" resolve the issue and in January 2017 temporarily withdrew its ambassador to South Korea. Around 37 similar statues were thought to exist in South Korea.¹²⁹

On 25 January 2017, historian Park Yu-ha, author of a book on the comfort women, was found not guilty of defamation [see NCH Annual Report 2016]. Justice Lee Sang-yoon said: "The opinions the defendant expressed in her book can invite criticism and objections and can even be abused by those who deny that the comfort women were forcibly mobilized ... But academic expressions must be protected not only when they are right but also when they are wrong."¹³⁰

On 12 May 2017, President Moon Jae-in ordered that a protest song be sung again during a government ceremony marking the anniversary of the May 1980 pro-democracy uprising in the southern city of Gwangju, when local citizens rose up against the military dictator Chun Doo-hwan. During the uprising, hundreds of protesters were killed by Chun's police, paratroopers and tanks. In subsequent decades, "March Song for My Dear," which commemorated those killed in Gwangju, became a rallying cry in anti-government or labor protests. Like the Gwangju 1980 protest itself, the song became a symbol of South Koreans' struggle for democracy. During annual government-sponsored ceremonies for the uprising, all those participating used to be required to sing the song in unison as part of the official program. But after the conservatives took power in 2008, that requirement was abolished. Instead, a choir sang the song.¹³¹

See also China, Japan.

¹²⁹ "Japan Recalls Korean Envoy over 'Comfort Women' Statue," BBC News (6 January 2017); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 359.

¹³⁰ "Statement against the Indictment of Professor Park Yu-ha" (26 November 2015); Choe Sang-Hun, "Professor Who Wrote of Korean 'Comfort Women' Wins Defamation Case," New York Times (25 January 2017).

¹³¹ Choe Sang-Hun, "Amid Scandal, South Korean Officials Retreat on Controversial Textbook Plan," New York Times (28 November 2016); Choe Sang-Hun, "South Korea's New Leader Abolishes State-Issued History Textbooks," New York Times (12 May 2017).

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005.

See Iraq.

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2013, 2016.

The authorities failed to make a genuine effort to effectively investigate the June 2010 inter-ethnic violence in southern Kyrgyzstan. While violence was used by members of both ethnic Kyrgyz and Uzbek communities, and while the latter sustained most deaths, injuries and damage, prosecutions were disproportionately aimed at members of the ethnic Uzbek community.¹³²

See also Turkey.

¹³² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 227.

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008, 2015–2016.

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2016.

In October 2012, Justice Minister Shakib Qortbawi put forward a draft decree to the cabinet to establish a national commission to investigate the fate of thousands of people who were forcibly disappeared or went missing during the civil war (1975–1990) and its aftermath and who may have been unlawfully killed, but no further action was taken. In September 2014, the government finally provided the families of the disappeared with the files of the Official Commission of Inquiry appointed in 2000 to investigate the fate of the kidnapped. These showed that the government had not conducted any serious investigation. The failure perpetuated the suffering of the families, who continued to face administrative, legal, social and economic hurdles resulting from the enforced disappearance of their relatives.

On 13 April 2017, the 42nd anniversary of the start of the civil war, the International Committee of the Red Cross urged the government to help families of the thousands of missing by approving a law and a project to collect DNA samples to try to trace their whereabouts. There was currently no public database or exact numbers of people who went missing during the civil war in which an estimated 150,000 people were killed.¹³³

The Netherlands-based Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) continued to try in their absence four men accused of complicity in the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafic Hariri and others in a 2005 car bombing in Beirut. The four continued to evade arrest. A fifth accused died in Syria. On 15 July 2016, the STL charged al-Akhbar newspaper and its editor-in-chief, Ibrahim al-Amine, with contempt of court for failing to comply with a court order requiring them to remove information concerning confidential witnesses and obstruction of justice. On 29 August, the court sentenced al-Amine to a fine of € 20,000 and the newspaper to a fine of € 6,000.¹³⁴

¹³³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 231; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 401; Heba Kanso, "Lebanon Urged to Do More to Trace Thousands Missing from Civil War," Thomson Reuters Foundation News (13 April 2017).

¹³⁴ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 231.

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2015.

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2016.

The International Criminal Court (ICC) had the mandate to investigate war crimes and crimes against humanity in Libya pursuant to United Nations (UN) Security Council Resolution 1970 passed on 27 February 2011. Impunity continued to prevail, although in January 2016 the Public Prosecutor informed the ICC that arrest warrants had been issued against three officials accused of torturing As-Saadi al-Gaddafi (son of former leader Muammar Gaddafi) in detention. It remained unclear whether those accused were arrested and prosecuted. The head of al-Hadba Prison, who was suspended after the torture of al-Gaddafi, was reportedly restored to his position. In November 2016, the ICC committed to prioritize its investigations in 2017 into ongoing crimes in Libya, including those committed by Islamic State (IS) and other armed groups, and issue new arrest warrants. However, the ICC initiated no new investigations in 2016, citing security concerns and insufficient resources. Saif al-Islam al-Gaddafi (another son of Muammar Gaddafi), against whom the ICC issued an arrest warrant in relation to alleged crimes against humanity committed during the 2011 conflict, continued to be detained by a militia in Zintan. He was last seen by United Nations monitors in June 2014.¹³⁵

On 7 February 2017, during combing operations in the Ghanfouda area of Benghazi after its liberation from terrorist groups affiliated to Islamic State, hundreds of antique books and rare Islamic manuscripts from Benghazi University were discovered by a battalion of the Libyan army. The groups had stolen and transferred the manuscripts to the positions they controlled during the period of their seizure of the university.¹³⁶

See also United States.

¹³⁵ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 235; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 407.

¹³⁶ “Rare Islamic Manuscripts Stolen by ISIS Restored in Libya,” ABNA News Agency (9 February 2017).

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009, 2015.

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2015.

In its second ruling against Macedonia's controversial lustration process, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) has ruled that Macedonian institutions deprived a communist-era official, Petar Karajanov (1936–), of a fair trial and violated his privacy by publishing his name before a final ruling was passed. A former member of the Central Committee of the League of Communists of Macedonia (SKM), and former head of the SKM branch in Skopje, Karajanov had contested the verdict against him in 2013, shortly after the Lustration Commission pronounced him a spy and after the Administrative Court, to which he had submitted a complaint, confirmed the ruling. He declared that he felt targeted for having taken an open stand against the lustration process: in 2008, he had been among those who submitted a case to the Constitutional Court, calling on it to scrap the lustration law passed. Karajanov also claimed that his case was based on another person's documents who had allegedly collaborated with the former communist secret services and who had the same name. He pointed out several inconsistencies to back this claim.

In 2016, the former head of the Constitutional Court, Trendafil Ivanovski, won his case against the state before the ECHR, which ruled that Macedonia had broken Ivanovski's human rights by not giving him the right to defend himself before the commission, and by denying him access to the evidence against him. At least ten other people were suing Macedonia in Strasbourg on similar grounds.

Ever since the Lustration Commission started work in 2009, many critics complained that the process was abused to attack critics of the VMRO DPMNE party-led government. In August 2015, after criticism from Brussels, the Commission said it was terminating the lustration process, starting from the beginning of 2016. Since 2016, the Administrative Court had begun annulling dozens of lustration decisions made by the commission and it had yet to decide on many others.¹³⁷

See also Greece.

¹³⁷ Sinisa Jakov Marusic, "Strasbourg Rules Against Macedonia in Lustration Case," Balkan Insight (7 April 2017).

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011, 2016.

In March 2016, a magistrate acquitted Lena Hendry, a staff member of the human rights group Pusat KOMAS, of the charge that she had illegally organized a private screening of the documentary, “No Fire Zone: The Killing Fields of Sri Lanka,” finding that the government had failed to show her guilt [See also NCH Annual Report 2016]. On 21 September 2016, the High Court reversed the acquittal and ordered a resumption of the case after the government appealed. Section 6 of the Film Censorship Act prohibited the circulation, distribution, display, production, sale, hire or possession of any film, whether imported or domestically produced, without first obtaining approval from the government-appointed Board of Censors. The Sri Lankan embassy had publicly demanded that the film not be shown. The documentary concerned war crimes committed in the last months of Sri Lanka’s civil war (2009), including Sri Lankan army artillery attacks that killed thousands of civilians and the extrajudicial executions of captured fighters and supporters of the secessionist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam. On 21 February 2017, the Kuala Lumpur Magistrate’s Court convicted Hendry for screening the documentary. On 22 March 2017, Hendry was sentenced to pay a fine of RM 10,000 (about €2,100) or spend a year in prison. She was the first human rights defender to be charged and convicted under the Film Censorship Act.¹³⁸

See also Thailand.

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2013.

¹³⁸ Centre for Independent Journalism, “Malaysian Convicted for Screening Doc on Sri Lanka,” Iflex (23 February 2017); Human Rights Watch, “Malaysia: Convicted for Showing a Film” (21 February 2017); Article 19, “Statement Malaysia: Article 19 Condemns Conviction of Human Rights Activist for Screening Banned Film” (22 February 2017).

MALI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013–2016.

On 22 August 2016, at the opening of the International Criminal Court (ICC) trial against Ahmad Al Faqi Al Mahdi, the accused admitted having destroyed cultural sites in Timbuktu and apologized [See also NCH Annual Report 2016]. On 27 September 2016, he was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment. The court found that Al Mahdi had written a sermon dedicated to the destruction and given instruction and tools to complete the operation. He had not only offered "logistical and moral support" for the attacks, but also taken part in the physical destruction of at least five out of the ten buildings. The trial was the ICC's first prosecution for this war crime (destruction of cultural and religious sites, as well as historical monuments) and the first time an ICC defendant pleaded guilty.¹³⁹

Progress in addressing impunity was evident in the trial of former coup leader General Amadou Haya Sanogo and 17 co-defendants, many members of the security services, for the 2012 abduction and killing of 21 elite "Red Beret" soldiers (accused of supporting the ousted President, Amadou Toumani Touré), which began on 30 November 2016. However, the Malian government made scant progress in holding to account those responsible for many other violations committed during the 2012–2013 armed conflict. The United Nations (UN) Independent Expert on Mali highlighted the lack of progress, particularly regarding meaningful access to justice for women who had experienced violence. Insecurity and lack of logistical support for magistrates were cited as among the major impediments. Serious crimes include the summary execution by armed Islamists of approximately 150 Malian soldiers in Aguelhok, sexual violence, and widespread pillage by various armed groups in the north, as well as the extrajudicial execution, enforced disappearance, and torture of suspected Islamist rebels by the security forces. With a few exceptions, judicial authorities failed to investigate over one hundred complaints filed by victims and their family members.

The Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission, established by executive order of the president in 2014 with a three-year mandate to investigate serious human rights violations between 1960 and 2013, was still not operational at the end of 2016. In December 2015, the Council of Ministers approved the appointment of fourteen commission members, and in May 2016, an additional ten commissioners were appointed. During 2016, the 25-member commission developed a work plan and commenced research into past violations. The credibility of the body was undermined by the government's failure to consult sufficiently with a wide variety of stakeholders on the commission's membership, mandated powers, and degree of independence. The commission's inclusion of nine members of armed groups and lack of inclusion of those representing victims' groups drew sharp criticism from Malian civil society. In July 2016, the CEDAW (United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women) Committee voiced concern about the low level of representation of women on the commission and at decision-making levels following the 2015 Algiers peace agreement.¹⁴⁰

¹³⁹ "Islamist Rebel Apologises for Destroying Timbuktu Shrines at ICC Trial," BBC News (22 August 2016); "Mali Islamist Jailed for Nine Years for Timbuktu Shrine Attacks," BBC News (27 September 2016); "Ahmad al-Faqi al-Mahdi: The Vandal of Timbuktu," BBC News (27 September 2016); Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 22, 246; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 421–422.

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015.

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011, 2016.

Although slavery was abolished officially in 1981 and was recognized as a crime in domestic law, human rights organizations including SOS Esclaves and the Initiative for the Resurgence of the Abolitionist Movement (IRA), regularly criticized the continuation of this practice. In May 2016, the Special Tribunal against Slavery opened in Nema, and in the same month two former slave owners were handed a one-year prison sentence and a four-year suspended sentence and ordered to pay compensation to two women victims. Yet in the same month, in the same town, President Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz denied that slavery existed and called on the Haratines, the former slave population, to have fewer children in order to address the legacy of slavery and poverty.¹⁴¹

¹⁴⁰ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 245–246; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 421–422.

¹⁴¹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 249.

In 2010, Biram Dah Abeid (1965–), a historian and lawyer by training, a politician and advocate for the abolition of slavery inflicted upon the Haratin ethnic group, to which he belonged, was discharged as a senior adviser to the President of the National Commission for Human Rights in Mauritania because he had continuously voiced slavery issues. He was also threatened with prosecution and imprisonment for “illegal activities” if he would not suspend his active role in the fight against slavery. In December 2010, Abeid was arrested, detained and tortured during a dispute between the police and his group (the Initiative for the Resurgence of the Abolitionist Movement [IRA-Mauritania], founded in 2008), when about eighty activists descended on the house of an owner of two slave girls, demanding that the owner be imprisoned. On 6 January 2011, along with two other activists, Abeid was sentenced to one year’s imprisonment. He was imprisoned a month later but pardoned by President Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz. In August 2011, police suppressed a sit-in in front of the police brigade over their “employment of minors against the law.” Abeid and ten other IRA activists were injured and hospitalized in the capital Nouakchott. In April 2012, during a demonstration in Nouakchott, the group was accused of burning early Islamic legal texts of the Maliki school of Islamic law that permitted slavery. The president publicly promised to administer the death penalty against him. Abeid’s telephone and internet service were cut off and he was imprisoned with other IRA activists. Later IRA apologized for the incident. On 3 September 2012, after several months of detention and cancelation of their trial, the activists were released on bail following pressure from the European Union. On 11 November 2014, Abeid and 16 other IRA activists were arrested for protesting against the repeal of charges against a slave master who raped a fifteen-year-old girl that worked as his slave. On 15 January 2015, hearings of the case took place and Abeid was sentenced to two years’ imprisonment. In August 2015, an appeal was rejected. On 17 May 2016, the Supreme Court of Mauritania decided to release Abeid.¹⁴²

The authorities continued to bar the legal registration of several NGOs and human rights organizations. For example, the Association des Veuves de la Mauritanie, an organization calling for the truth about summary executions and disappearances in the 1990s, had been waiting for recognition since 1993; it renewed its request in 2010.¹⁴³

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

¹⁴² “Biram Dah Abeid,” Wikipedia (10 July 2017).

¹⁴³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 249.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2016.

After 2003, a request was filed under the access to information law (2003) in order to obtain the names of those disappeared by the government during the “Dirty War” (1968–1982). The Procuraduría General de la República (PGR; federal prosecutor’s office) refused to release the relevant 135 files, a decision supported by the National Institute of Access to Information and Personal Data overseeing the law. The Open Society Justice Initiative and Litiga OLE then filed a constitutional challenge to this decision with the Supreme Court (an “amparo”) on the grounds that the access to information law included a “human rights override,” stipulating that government agencies could not withhold information related to investigations of human rights violations. The amparo also cited the collective aspect of the right to the truth, the right to the recognition of legal personality, and the right to a name for the victims, which must be proportionally weighed in cases on forced disappearances. At the time of the crimes, systematic attempts to erase records that the disappeared persons ever existed (for example, by destroying birth or school certificates), had reportedly taken place. Some local prosecutors had launched investigations into disappearances, but all ended without any charges being filed, and with the investigative files and the names of the victims being kept secret by the PGR. On 1 February 2017, the Supreme Court of Justice ruled in the case that the families of the more than 1,200 people who had the right to access government records with the names “of all those listed as disappeared by the government,” on the grounds that the information requested could not be kept classified when it referred to human rights violations, including disappearances. The court ordered the National Institute of Access to Information and Personal Data to issue a new resolution, ordering the PGR to disclose the requested information to the claimants, and allowing claimants to make those names public.¹⁴⁴

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

¹⁴⁴ Mariana Mas, “A Victory for the Truth about Mexico’s ‘Dirty War’,” Open Society Foundations (8 February 2017).

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2013.

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2016.

Opposition parties, which entered the cabinet in May 2016 as part of a pre-election agreement, would propose a retired intelligence officer, Gojko Pejovic, for the post of Inspector General in the National Security Agency, who is allowed access to secret service operations and surveillance files, including sealed Communist-era files from the UDBA [Yugoslav communist secret police] and files from the 1990s.¹⁴⁵

By the end of 2016, the authorities had not acted on the recommendations of the United Nations Committee on Enforced Disappearances to include disappearance as a separate criminal offense in the Criminal Code. The authorities also failed to enable access to justice and reparation for victims. Additionally, they failed to ensure that the continuous nature of enforced disappearance was recognized in its system of criminal law. The fate and whereabouts of the 61 individuals still reported missing following the 1991–1999 armed conflicts in the former Yugoslavia were not investigated.¹⁴⁶

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013, 2015–2016.

The authorities failed to implement key recommendations from the Equity and Reconciliation Commission, ten years after the Commission published its report examining human rights violations between 1956 and 1999.¹⁴⁷

In the 2014 documentary Briser le silence / Break the silence by filmmaker Tarik El-Idrissi, former ¹⁴⁵ Dusica Tomovic, "Montenegro under Pressure to Open Secret Files," Balkan Insight (31 May 2016).

¹⁴⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 257.

¹⁴⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 54, 260.

victims of the violent suppression of a separatist rebellion in the Rif region (north of Morocco) in 1958–1959 by the army under then Crown Prince Hassan (soon to be King Hassan II) were interviewed. It revealed that the victimization of the Rifis in the 1950s was never properly documented or publicly acknowledged and that the survivors refused to speak of it, guarding their secret within the family.¹⁴⁸

In March 2017, the French Commission du Secret de la Défense national (CSDN), an independent administrative body in charge of advising on documents declassification, approved declassification of 89 documents of the Service de Documentation Extérieure et de Contre-Espionnage (SDECE; the former external and counter-espionage services) between 1965 and 1966 were to be declassified. The documents related to leftist politician Mehdi Ben Barka's 1965 disappearance [See also NCH Annual Reports 2000, 2002–2003, 2016.]

In 1967, Morocco's former head of intelligence and Minister of Interior, General Mohammed Oufkir, had been sentenced in absentia by a French court to life imprisonment for his alleged role in the kidnapping of Ben Barka. In 1975, an investigation into the case was opened in France in 1975, and since then it had not made significant advancements. In 2000, 2004 and 2008, tens of documents had been declassified without any result. Some thought that crucial information was destroyed before 1982.¹⁴⁹

See also France.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2016.

The institutional and legislative framework maintained obstacles to holding perpetrators of human rights violations to account, and delivering justice, truth and reparations to victims and their families. Most perpetrators of past and current human rights violations continued to evade justice. In January 2016, just days before it was dissolved, parliament adopted the Former Presidents' Security Law, which could grant immunity to former presidents for crimes committed while they were in office, ¹⁴⁸ Susan Gilson Miller, "Why History Matters in Post-2011 Morocco," Jadaliyya (30 November 2016).

¹⁴⁹ Amnesty International, "Time for Truth 50 Years after Enforced Disappearance of Opposition Leader Mehdi Ben Barka" (MDE 29/2747/2015; London: AI, 28 October 2015); "Will Declassified French Documents Uncover Truth about Ben Barka's Mysterious Disappearance?" Morocco World News (11 May 2017); "France: vers une déclassification des documents dans l'affaire Ben Barka," RFI (10 May 2017).

including for crimes against humanity, war crimes and other crimes under international law.¹⁵⁰

In [March 2017], some—including Soe Win, the great-grandson of Burma’s last King Thibaw [reigned 1878–1885])—called for cancelation of a Thai soap opera and historical drama, entitled Plerng Phra Nang (A Lady’s Flames), because they found it defaming in its depiction of Burmese palace intrigue. In the drama, Ananthip, a character who schemes to seize control of the kingdom, reportedly closely resembled Hsinbyumashin, a real-life Burmese palace consort who orchestrated the massacre of scores of royals so that Thibaw could ascend the throne. In 1885, Thibaw abdicated and the monarchy was abolished when British forces defeated and invaded Burma.¹⁵¹

¹⁵⁰ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 266.

¹⁵¹ “‘Insulting’ Thai Palace Soap Opera Angers Myanmar,” BBC News (13 March 2017).

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011, 2016.

Forty-two released Caprivi detainees—accused of treason after their arrests in 1999 and acquitted between 2013 and 2015—continued to live in fear after facing threats and intimidation. On 17 May 2016, they were notified that the Prosecutor General would appeal against their acquittals. The Vice Chairperson of the Caprivi Concerned Group (CCG), Retief Kangongo, went missing on 30 April 2016 following alleged threats by the Inspector General of the Namibian police. The CCG supported the acquitted detainees. Kangongo reportedly sought asylum in Botswana. In August 2016, the Supreme Court ruled in favour of Boster Mubuyaeta Samuele, one of the Caprivi detainees. He had fled to Botswana, and, in December 2002, he was abducted by Namibian security forces in Botswana and brought to Namibia to face trial. He then spent 13 years in prison. Samuele successfully argued that the Namibian courts had no jurisdiction to prosecute him since Namibian officials had violated international law when he was abducted and arbitrarily detained.¹⁵²

In their section of the municipal cemetery of Swakopmund, the Herero, traditional cattle herders, exhibited the horns of a cow belonging to their late paramount chief—drawing complaints, presumably from people tending to the cemetery's German section. In 2016, the city council eventually ordered the horns to be removed, angering many Hereros.¹⁵³

In 2016, protesters splashed paint on the statue known as the Marine Denkmal (erected 1908) in Swakopmund, that commemorates German soldiers who in 1904–1908 helped crush a rebellion against German colonial rule by the Herero and Nama ethnic groups, a crime recognized as genocide. The statue was the site where the German-speaking minority held annual commemorations. Uahimisa Kaapehi, an ethnic Herero city councilor, introduced a motion for the monument's removal. The city council referred the matter to the National Heritage Council.

In [2009], the most prominent statue of the German colonial era—an equestrian monument known as the Reiterdenkmal—had been toppled from a hill overlooking Windhoek, the capital. The monument was moved to courtyard of a nearby German fortress.¹⁵⁴

In the summer of 2016, the German government announced that it would recognize the killings of 1904–1908 as genocide for the first time. To that end, it engaged in talks with the Namibian government. As the victims of the crime, Herero and Nama representatives demanded a place at these talks and argued that no settlement could be agreed without their approval.¹⁵⁵

¹⁵² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 267.

¹⁵³ Norimitsu Onishi, "A Colonial-Era Wound Opens in Namibia," New York Times (21 January 2017).

¹⁵⁴ Norimitsu Onishi, "A Colonial-Era Wound Opens in Namibia," New York Times (21 January 2017).

In [January 2017], representatives of the Herero and Nama peoples filed a class action lawsuit in New York under the Alien Tort Statute (a 1789 law frequently invoked in human rights cases) to demand reparations for the systematic massacre of some 100,000 of their forebears between 1904 and 1908 (widely regarded as the first genocide of the twentieth century). It was not clear whether the American courts would rule that they had jurisdiction to hear the case. The 1789 law was controversial and the United States Supreme Court had acted to restrict the scope of claims under it in 2013.¹⁵⁶

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2016.

Nepal made little concrete progress on justice for serious abuses committed by both sides during its civil war (1996–2006). At least 13,000 people were killed and over 1,300 were forcibly disappeared during the conflict. Efforts to ensure prosecutions in civilian courts for serious human rights and humanitarian law violations during the conflict remain stalled. While Nepal had delivered interim monetary and in-kind compensation to the families of those who were “disappeared” or killed during the conflict, others, such as survivors of sexual violence or torture, had received no compensation from the state.

In May 2016, the ruling Communist Party of Nepal (Unified Marxist-Leninist) and the Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist Center) agreed an amnesty for perpetrators of human rights abuses during the conflict. In July 2016, the Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist Center) and the Nepali Congress agreed to form a coalition government with the understanding that the Commission on Truth and Reconciliation (TRC) and the Commission on Investigation of Enforced Disappeared Persons (CIEDP) would focus on reconciliation and compensation, and not prioritize criminal prosecutions for past human rights violations. The 2014 Truth and Reconciliation Commission Act retained language which allowed amnesties for serious crimes under international law, despite the Supreme Court’s ruling against these provisions in 2015. The government did not amend the law and had yet to come up with a concrete roadmap in late 2016. The TRC and the CIEDP began registering complaints in mid-April 2016, fourteen months after their establishment and started public hearings; as of August ¹⁵⁵ Justin Huggler, “Germany Sued for Reparations over Colonial-era Genocide in Namibia,” Telegraph (6 January 2017).

¹⁵⁶ Justin Huggler, “Germany Sued for Reparations over Colonial-era Genocide in Namibia,” Telegraph (6 January 2017).

2016, they had received nearly 59,000 complaints. Officials of both commissions raised concerns about government delays and non-co-operation, lack of resources and unrealistically short deadlines for filing cases. Victims groups and civil society protested against the lack of transparency and consultation in the appointment of commissioners to both commissions.¹⁵⁷

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2016.

Jules Schelvis (1921–2016), a Jewish typesetter and graphic designer passed through seven concentration camps from May 1943 until May 1945 and became a historian after his retirement. He wrote books about the camps, including Sobibór, and was a complainant (Nebenkläger) in the case of John Demjanjuk. In 2008, he received an honorary doctorate from the University of Amsterdam.¹⁵⁸

In August 2016, the Carmel Secondary School in Oldenzaal dismissed a recently appointed history teacher who posted neo-Nazi texts and pictures on the internet and liked similar messages on social media. On 1 September 2016, a judge in Enschede endorsed the school's decision in summary proceedings.¹⁵⁹

See also Azerbaijan, Japan, Lebanon, Rwanda, Serbia/Kosovo.

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007.

In [early April] 2017, Paul Moon, a historian at Auckland University of Technology, wrote an open letter rejecting the “forceful silencing of dissenting or unpopular views” on university campuses. It was signed by 27 high-profile New Zealanders, including former Prime Minister Sir Geoffrey Palmer (in office 1984–1990), Dame Tariana Turia and Don Brash. The letter came in response to Human ¹⁵⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 270; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 447.

¹⁵⁸ NRC Handelsblad (13 April 2011), 16; Wikipedia (29 April 2011); Bas Blokker, “Hij móést over Sobibor vertellen,” NRC Handelsblad (5 april 2016), 6.

¹⁵⁹ “Oldenzaalse school ontslaat docent met extreemrechtse ideeën,” NOS (6 September 2016); Thomas de Veen, “Middelbare school ontslaat extreem-rechtse leraar,” NRC Handelsblad (7 September 2016), 8–9.

Rights Commissioner Dame Susan Devoy's call for a review of the hate speech law. Police had suggested that hate speech be looked at as a specific crime. Moon pointed at the risk that unpopular or offensive speech would be dismissed too easily as hate speech, creating a culture of fear. Moon planned to send a copy of the letter to all party leaders in parliament.¹⁶⁰

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2013.

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2013, 2016.

There was continued lack of accountability for serious human rights violations committed by security officers. No independent and impartial investigations into crimes committed by the military had taken place despite President Muhammadu Buhari's repeated promises in May 2016. Moreover, senior military officials alleged to have committed crimes under international law remained uninvestigated; Major General Ahmadu Mohammed was reinstated into the army in January 2016. He had been in command of operations when the military executed more than 640 detainees following a Boko Haram attack on the detention center in Giwa barracks on 14 March 2014.

In its November 2016 preliminary report, the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) announced that it would continue its analysis of any new allegations of crimes committed in Nigeria and its assessment of admissibility of the eight potential cases identified in 2015, in order to reach a decision on whether the criteria for opening an investigation were met.¹⁶¹

¹⁶⁰ "High-profile Kiwis: Free Speech under Threat in NZ Universities," NZHerald.co.nz (4 April 2017).

¹⁶¹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 278.

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012, 2016.

On 24 June 2016, the Ministry of Justice ruled that a 43-year-old Rwandan national accused of complicity in the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, whose appeal rights were exhausted, could be extradited to Rwanda. The extradition had not been carried out by the end of 2016.¹⁶²

In September 2016, Facebook deleted a post by writer Tom Egeland that featured “The Terror of War,” a Pulitzer prize-winning photograph by Nick Ut that showed children, including the naked nine-year-old girl Kim Phúc, fleeing from an aerial napalm attack in 1972 during the Vietnam War. Egeland’s post discussed “seven photographs that changed the history of warfare.” When Egeland complained about the censorship, the company suspended his Facebook account. Widespread protest erupted with Facebook users sharing the photo. Some 180,000 people used Facebook to view the Guardian’s account of the row—illustrated with the same uncensored photo. Another 4,000 shared it on Facebook. Phúc, living in Canada, declared: “I’m saddened by those who would focus on the nudity in the historic picture rather than the powerful message it conveys. I fully support the documentary image taken by Nick Ut as a moment of truth that captures the horror of war and its effects on innocent victims.” The leading evening newspaper Aftenposten wrote an open letter of protest to Facebook’s CEO Marc Zuckerberg and Prime Minister Erna Solberg reposted the image. After it was removed from Solberg’s page, she denounced it as an attempt to “edit our common history” and added: “I want my children and other children to grow up in a society where history is taught as it was. Where they can learn from historical events and mistakes.” Facebook justified its censorship with reference to its “Community Standards” against pornography but on 9 September 2016 reversed its decision and allowed users to share the iconic photo, stating that “In this case, we recognize the history and global importance of this image in documenting a particular moment in time.”¹⁶³

¹⁶² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 282.

¹⁶³ Reporters without Borders, “Facebook’s Iconic Blunder,” Ifex (9 September 2016); Sam Levin with Julia Carrie Wong and Luke Harding, “Facebook Backs Down from ‘Napalm Girl’ Censorship and Reinstates Photo,” Guardian (9 September 2016).

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

On 15 April 2016, writer, film-maker and intellectual Abdullah Habib ([1964–]) was summoned by the internal security service for questioning before the Special Division of the Omani Police General Command in Muscat. Detained upon arrival, he remained in incommunicado detention for over a week. No official reason was given for his arrest, although it may be in connection with a Facebook post (14 April 2016) he wrote calling on the government to reveal the burial sites of rebels executed during the Dhofar rebellion, an insurgency which took place in the south of Oman between 1962–1976. In the post, Habib related the story of the execution of two groups of rebels he called “Group 72” and “Group 74,” highlighting the cruel treatment meted out to the victims. He also pointed to the British involvement in suppressing the rebellion and mentioned Tim Landon, a Brigadier in the British army at the time who was influential in engineering the coup which placed the current Sultan Qaboos on the throne. He was released on 5 May 2016.¹⁶⁴

See also Iran.

¹⁶⁴ Network of Concerned Historians Campaigns [1] and [2]; Abdullah Habib’s post (in Arab); Release Abdullah Habib Now Community; Pen International Rapid Action Network, Oman: Prominent Artist Arrested and Detained (RAN 09/16; 29 April 2016 & update 5 May 2016).

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012, 2014, 2016.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2013–2015.

See Israel, United States.

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2013, 2015–2016.

In July 2016, a Comisión 20 de Diciembre (Commission 20 December), chaired by Juan Planells, was created to look into the events surrounding the United States invasion of Panama (labeled Operation Just Cause) and the overthrow of the government of Manuel Noriega (20 December 1989–31 January 1990). In March 2017, the Supreme Court agreed to give the commission access to its archives. An estimated 3,000 people died during the invasion. On 29 May 2017, Noriega died in a hospital in Panama City.¹⁶⁵

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012, 2015.

See Argentina.

¹⁶⁵ “Justicia panameña abre archivos sobre invasión de EE.UU.” Prensa Latina (8 March 2017).

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2016.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict (1980–2000). Many had become victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents.

In a landmark trial, former President Alberto Fujimori was sentenced in 2009 to 25 years' imprisonment for killings and "disappearances" committed in 1991 and 1992. In July 2016, he requested a pardon on humanitarian grounds, but withdrew it in September after newly elected President Pedro Pablo Kuczynski said he would likely reject it. Fujimori's intelligence advisor, Vladimiro Montesinos, three former army generals, and members of the Colina group, a government death squad, were also serving sentences ranging from 15 to 25 years for the 1991 assassination of 15 people in the Lima district of Barrios Altos, and for six "disappearances." Courts have made much less progress in addressing violations, including extrajudicial killings, disappearances, and torture, committed during the earlier administrations of Fernando Belaúnde (1980–1985) and Alan García (1985–1990).

Only a tiny percentage of the human rights violations committed during the armed conflict had been brought to trial, according to Human Rights Trials in Peru, a project based at George Mason University, Fairfax, Virginia, that monitored human rights prosecutions. In 2016, court hearings continued into their sixth year in the case of torture and disappearances at the Los Cabitos military base in Ayacucho in 1983. Abuses committed in that military base in 1984 and 1985 had been under criminal investigation for over ten years, but had not been brought to trial in late 2016.

In July 2016, a prosecutor decided to close the investigation against former President Alberto Fujimori for forced sterilizations of mostly poor and indigenous women committed during his administration (1990–2000). A month later, a higher-ranking prosecutor requested that the closure be reconsidered, but a ruling on his request remained pending in late 2016. More than 2,000 forced sterilizations have been reported to authorities, but human rights groups contend that these represent only a small portion of such cases. In November 2015, then-President Ollanta Humala had signed a decree creating a national registry of victims of forced sterilizations. In June 2016, he signed the "Law on the Search of Disappeared Persons," a bill to search for victims of disappearances committed during the armed conflict. The law created a national registry of the disappeared and ordered that the Justice Ministry approve and implement a national search plan.

In May 2016, a court ordered that the government pay reparations to victims of abuses committed by both sides of the conflict and their relatives for each of the abuses they suffered, overturning the limits on reparations established by the legislature.¹⁶⁶

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2015.

See also Japan, United States.

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011, 2014–2016.

On 15 February 2016, the government announced a new memory law enabling “the defense of the good name of the Polish Republic and the Polish Nation” that would impose a sentence of up to three years’ imprisonment for those who “attribute to the Polish Nation or to the Polish State, the participation, organization, responsibility or complicity, in crimes committed by the III German Reich, or other crimes against peace and war crimes” [See also NCH Annual Report 2016.] In particular the phrase “Polish death camps” in reference to wartime Nazi concentration camps on Polish soil, would be targeted, justice minister Zbigniew Ziobro declared. Poland had long sought to eliminate the misleading phrase from historical and newspaper accounts since it suggested that Poland, itself occupied by Nazi Germany during World War II, was responsible for concentration camps on its territory. The new law was sent to the Sejm on 16 August 2016. Critics like the Polish Center of Holocaust Research of the Institute of Philosophy and Sociology of the Polish Academy of Sciences (including Jan Grabowski) and Yad Vashem’s International Institute for Holocaust Research said that the law lacked precision and threatened to criminalize historical research which focused on the actions of Poles during World War II. Yehuda Bauer called the assertion that there were no Poles who took part in the murder of Jews Holocaust denial. On 14 November 2016, the American Historical Association expressed its concern in relation to the draft memory law which would “allow police and judicial authorities to overrule the judgments of trained historians,” and would “threaten the ability of historians to conduct impartial research that might reveal facts that these authorities find uncomfortable.”¹⁶⁷

¹⁶⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 294; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 481–482.

On 12 April 2016, a prosecutor in Katowice questioned historian Jan Gross for five hours to determine if he had broken laws prohibiting the defamation of the nation [see NCH Annual Report 2016]. If found guilty, Gross could be sentenced to up to three years' imprisonment. On 14 November 2016, the American Historical Association expressed its concern in relation to the potential legal proceedings against Gross. Gross had been investigated before for defaming Poland for his book Fear. The investigation had not led to charges.¹⁶⁸

In June 2016, the Institute of National Remembrance (IPN) proposed plans to move 229 monuments marking the Soviet army's liberation of Poland at the end of World War II to an open-air museum north-west of Warsaw. The monuments were erected to glorify the Red Army's role in ousting the Nazis, but Poland rejected the associated claim that the Red Army gave Poland its independence, instead seeing the Soviet domination as a period of oppression. Russia protested the plan, saying that it exposed a lack of gratitude. Cemeteries were not affected by the plan.¹⁶⁹

In [January] 2017, the Minister of Culture Piotr Glinski declared that the new Museum of the Second World War in Gdansk was “not patriotic and heroic enough” and did not present a full picture of Polish heroism during the war. He cut the budget requested by the museum director, historian Pawel Machcewicz, by nearly half. Glinski accused Machcewicz of distorting Polish history and not focusing enough in the exhibits on Poland's military campaigns against the Nazis and Soviet forces. The government also announced plans to change the entire concept of the museum. The city of Gdansk (where World War II began when Germany invaded it in September 1939) filed complaint with the Supreme Administrative Court in Warsaw, which twice suspended the governmental plans. On 23 March 2017, the new museum opened; it approached the history of the Second World War from a European and worldwide perspective. On 5 April 2017, however, the court gave the ¹⁶⁷ Reuters, “Poland Plans to Punish Use of the Phrase ‘Polish Death Camps’,” Guardian (13 February 2016); Jan Grabowski, “‘Patriotic’ Move Threatens Academic Freedom,” University World News (17 February 2016); Roeland Termote, “Noem je Auschwitz een ‘Pools kamp’? 5 jaar celstraf,” NRC Handelsblad (17 February 2016), 14; Polish Center for Holocaust Research, “Center’s Statement regarding the Planned Changes to the Law about the Institute of National Remembrance,” (12 September 2016); Don Snyder, “Poland Is Poised to Put ‘Bad’ Historians of the Holocaust in Prison,” Forward (2 September 2016); American Historical Association, “Letter of Concern to Polish Government regarding Treatment of Historian Jan Gross” (14 November 2016).

¹⁶⁸ Alex Duval Smith, “Polish Move to Strip Holocaust Expert of Award Sparks Protests,” Guardian (14 February 2016); Selma Leydesdorff, “Polen dupeert zijn schrijver Jan Gross – om de Joden,” NRC Handelsblad (16 February 2016), 16; AP, “Holocaust Scholar Questioned on Claim Poles Killed More Jews than Germans in War,” Guardian (14 April 2016); Catherine Porter, “Poland Wrestles with Its Past—and Present,” The Toronto Star (24 September 2016); American Historical Association, “Letter of Concern to Polish Government regarding Treatment of Historian Jan Gross” (14 November 2016).

¹⁶⁹ “Soviet Troop Monuments in Poland To Be Moved to New Museum,” BBC News (28 June 2016).

government permission to merge it with another museum that still had to be established on Gdansk's peninsula Westerplatte. The Gdansk museum had been commissioned by the predecessor government of Donald Tusk, a historian, Gdansk native, president of the European Council and political rival of the incumbent nationalist Law and Justice (PiS)-led government. In the summer of 2016, Education Minister Anna Zalewska had drawn protests from the Anti-Defamation League after saying in an interview that Polish citizens were not responsible for the pogroms in Jedwabne and another Polish town.¹⁷⁰

In May 2017, Holocaust historian Jan Grabowski was accused of slandering Poland's reputation with research that focused on the participation of some Poles in the killing of Jews during World War II. The Polish League against Defamation said that Grabowski's scholarship "falsified the history of Poland, proclaiming the thesis that Poles were complicit in the extermination of Jews." On 19 June 2017, more than 180 historians of modern European history came to his defense, calling the statement against him a "distorted and whitewashed version of the history of Poland during the Holocaust era." Based at the University of Ottawa in Canada, Grabowski, the son of a Holocaust survivor, received several death threats, leading to security patrols in his department.¹⁷¹

See also Russia, Ukraine.

PORTUGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

On 7 January 2017, Mário Soares (1924–2017) died. In March 1968, lawyer Soares, who had a degree in history and philosophy from Lisbon University (1951), was deported to São Tomé but was able to return in 1969 during a brief liberalization period. As he attacked the dictatorship and its colonial policies in Africa, he was harassed by the political police. (During the 1960s he had already been arrested at least twelve times.) The 1969 elections in which he participated as an opposition candidate were rigged. He went into exile in France (1969–1974), where he taught at the Sorbonne. In 1973 he helped re-establish the Socialist Party. After 1974, he was prime minister on several occasions, and from 1985 to 1996 he was elected president twice.¹⁷²

¹⁷⁰ Adam Easton, "Poland in Row with Historians over Landmark War Museum," BBC News (5 May 2016); Pawel Adamowicz, "Is Museum of the Second World War not Patriotic enough?" Huffington Post (s.d. [February] 2017); Jenne Jan Holtland, "Rechter geeft groen licht voor 'fusie' Pools Tweede Wereldoorlogmuseum." Volkskrant (5 April 2017); Soraya Sarhaddi Nelson, "Poland's New World War II Museum Just Opened, But Maybe Not For Long." NPR (4 April 2017); Marcin Król, "The Past Is Not a Foreign Country," Index on Censorship, 46, no. 1 (spring 2017), 74–76.

¹⁷¹ Vanessa Gera, "Historians Defend Scholar who Studies Poland and Holocaust." Washington Post (20 June 2017).

¹⁷² Amnesty International, Report 1967–68 (London: Amnesty International, 1968), 11; M. Azevedo, Historical Dictionary of Mozambique (Metuchen 1991), 122; Index on Censorship (1972, no. 2), 55; Derek Jones, ed., Censorship: A World Encyclopedia (London / Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 2001), 1916; D. L. Wheeler, Historical Dictionary of Portugal (Metuchen 1993), 49–52, 165–166.

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2016.

After a complaint by member of the Just Russia party Dmitry Zakharov that the state-run Library of Ukrainian Literature in Moscow was storing newspapers that “distorted historical facts” and exhibited a “Russophobic nature,” armed and masked law enforcement officers raided the library on 28 October 2015, seized files and about 200 books and pamphlets, and detained director [since 2006] Natalya Sharina ([1957–]) [See also NCH Annual Report 2016]. The next day a criminal case was opened against her on suspicion of inciting ethnic hatred and breaking the law on extremism. The Investigative Committee stated that it wanted her arrest after the investigators found books in the library that allegedly disseminated “anti-Russian propaganda,” including works by radical nationalist activist Dmytro Korchynsky [Dmitry Korchinsky], which were declared extremist by a court and banned in Russia. A spokesman for the library said the most controversial items were stored in a separate room and could only be given to political analysts and historians who need it for professional purposes. Sharina herself denied that the books belonged to the library and claimed they had been secretly planted there by some law enforcement officials. On 5 April 2016, weeks before her house arrest was due to expire, she was charged with embezzlement for allegedly misappropriating library funds to pay for a lawyer to defend her during a previous unfounded attempt to prosecute in 2011–2013. Her house arrest was extended several times. On 15 August 2016, the Moscow Prosecutor General’s office refused to sign the indictment against Sharina and the case was sent back for further investigation. On 2 November 2016, her trial began. She was charged with “inciting hatred and enmity through misuse of office” under Article 282 of the Criminal Code and of fraudulent use of library funds, offenses for which she could face up to ten years’ imprisonment. On 5 June 2017, the Meshchanskiy District Court in Moscow found her guilty of “incitement of hatred” toward Russian people and “embezzlement” and handed-down a four-year suspended sentence for holding “extremist literature.” She appealed the conviction.¹⁷³

¹⁷³ “Urgent Action: Librarian’s Case Sent Back for Investigation” (UA: 261/15; Index: EUR 46/4710/2016; 25 August 2016); Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 307; PEN International, “Russia: Conviction of Librarian Must Be Quashed” (7 July 2017); Nataliya Vasalyeva, “Chief of Moscow’s Ukrainian Library Gets Suspended Sentence,” AP News Archive (5 June 2017).

On 4 April 2016, President Vladimir Putin announced at a meeting with head of Federal Archive Agency Andrei Artizov that he had signed an executive order bringing the agency under direct subordination to the President because “the materials in [the] agency’s possession are of particular value for the country.”¹⁷⁴

In June 2016, a court in Perm convicted Vladimir Luzgin ([1979]–) and gave him a fine of 200,000 rubles for reposting on his social network page a text, entitled “15 Facts about Banderites, or What the Kremlin Is Silent About,” which stated (correctly) that the Soviet Union, in collaboration with the Nazis, invaded Poland in 1939. Luzgin had written: “The communists and Germany jointly invaded Poland, sparking off the Second World War. That is, communism and Nazism closely collaborated, yet for some reason they blame Bandera who was in a German concentration camp for declaring Ukrainian independence.” Luzgin was found guilty of posting “knowingly false information.” The dean of Perm University’s History Faculty Alexander Vertinsky appeared as a witness for the prosecution and claimed that the material contained “statements that do not correspond with the position accepted at international level.” Luzgin was probably the first person in Russia to face criminal prosecution under a controversial 2014 law envisaging anything from fines to five years’ imprisonment for so-called “rehabilitation of Nazism.” The Sova Center had criticized the law, saying its aim was to prohibit historical discussion. Luzgin refused to pay the fine and sought political asylum in Prague.

At a press conference with German Chancellor Angela Merkel on 10 May 2015, President Vladimir Putin had defended the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, claiming that the USSR was left to face Hitler’s Germany by itself. Culture minister Vladimir Medinsky called the pact a “colossal achievement of Stalin’s diplomacy.” On 20 September 2015, Russia’s ambassador to Venezuela, Vladimir Zayemsky, claimed that the USSR did not invade Poland on 17 September 1939 and that it was in fact Poland, not the USSR, that collaborated with Nazi Germany. He wrote that “the alleged invasion by Soviet forces of Poland in 1939 is a lie” and went on to claim that although Poland was the first victim of World War II, it tried to be “Hitler’s faithful ally” in the period before the war.¹⁷⁵

On 13 July 2016, the official list of active “foreign agents” comprised 104 groups. In 2012, the parliament had adopted a law that required NGO’s to register as “foreign agents” (a term interpreted as “spy” or “traitor”) with the Ministry of Justice if they engaged in “political activity” (overbroadly defined) and received foreign funding. The law aimed to marginalize independent advocacy groups. In early March 2013, the government launched a nationwide campaign of inspections of hundreds of ¹⁷⁴ “Meeting with Head of Federal Archive Agency Andrei Artizov” (press release, Kremlin, 4 April 2016).

¹⁷⁵ Halya Coynash, “Russian Fined for Reposting that the USSR & Nazi Germany Invaded Poland,” Human Rights in Ukraine (1 July 2016); “How Russia Is Engaged in a Battle for its Own History,” Sky News (11 December 2016).

NGOs to identify groups seen as “foreign agents” and force them to register as such. Numerous groups challenged the prosecutor’s office and the Ministry of Justice in courts; most lost their cases. As a result, by February 2015, at least 13 groups chose to shut down rather than wear the “foreign agent” label. In August 2013, the then-federal ombudsman Vladimir Lukin, acting on behalf of four NGO’s, challenged the law in the Constitutional Court. On 8 April 2014, the Court upheld the law, ruling that there were no legal or constitutional grounds for contending that the term “foreign agent” had negative connotations from the Soviet era and that, therefore, its use was “not intended to persecute or discredit” NGO’s. It also found that the “foreign agent” designation was in line with the public interest and the interest of state sovereignty. On 23 May 2014, parliament amended the law, this time authorizing the Ministry of Justice to register independent groups as “foreign agents” without their consent, if the ministry regarded the organizations as engaged in “political activity” and if the organization was receiving foreign funding. On 4 June 2014, the amendments were signed into law. On 5 June 2014, the Ministry of Justice promptly registered five groups as “foreign agents,” and since then has registered a total of 130. By 2 June 2016 the registry included the following groups among others: Human Rights Center “Memorial” (Moscow), Educational Center “Memorial” (Sverdlovsk region), Commemorative Centre of History of Political Repressions “Perm-36,” Komi Human Rights Commission “Memorial” (Syktyvkar), Research and Information Center “Memorial” (St. Petersburg), Yekaterinburg Memorial Society (Yekaterinburg), Ryazan Historical, Educational and Human Rights Center “Memorial” (Ryazan). Groups that a court found responsible for failing to register as a “foreign agent” and fined included, among others: Anti-Discrimination Center “Memorial” (St. Petersburg) [the NGO won two administrative cases, but later lost a similar civil suit to the prosecutor’s office and chose to shut down], Educational Center “Memorial” (Sverdlovsk region) [the NGO lost the suit, the appeals court decreased the amount of the fine], and the Human Rights Center “Memorial” [the NGO lost the suit]. The leaders of at least eight NGO’s faced administrative charges personally, including the Anti-Discrimination Center “Memorial” (St. Petersburg) [the NGO won the suit but the organization chose to shut down when it lost a “foreign agent” civil suit to the prosecutor’s office]. On 1 February 2016, around 90 members of the Russian PEN Center, together with 21 historians belonging to the Free Historical Society and Russian academics, called on the Ministry of Justice to halt its abuse of power against NGOs deemed to be “foreign agents.” They feared that any public criticism or appeal to the state authorities or their representatives to amend the provisions of a particular law or overturn an unlawful decision would be deemed a “political activity” and grounds for inclusion on the list of “foreign agents”. The amendments to the law published by the Justice Ministry on 22 January 2016 contained a proviso that scientific, cultural and charitable activities would not be deemed political. PEN and the historians rejected this since an exception would only be made if the organization had not conducted the activity “with the aim of exerting influence on public opinion and decisions by the state authorities” [See also

NCH Annual Report 2016].¹⁷⁶

In early August 2016, Vadim Potomsky, the governor of Oryol (a city south of Moscow), planned to unveil a monument for the first Tsar, Ivan the Terrible (1530–1584; ruling 1547–1584), during the 450th anniversary of Ivan’s decree that a fortress be built there. But the inauguration was delayed after a protest in July by local people holding signs such as: “We don’t need a monument to a tyrant.” They initiated three lawsuits to remove the statue. The founder of tsardom was known for his long campaign of terror against the nobility and populace, as well as for killing his son during an argument. On 15 October 2016, the statue was unveiled, not on the intended location—the theater—but at the Oka river. In his speech, Potomsky compared Ivan to President Vladimir Putin.¹⁷⁷

In September 2016, during events commemorating victims of the September 2004 school hostage-taking in Beslan, North Ossetia, police roughed up and detained several activists wearing T-shirts and holding a sign saying: “Putin is the Slaughterer of Beslan.” Thugs apparently acting as proxies of local law enforcement attacked two journalists.¹⁷⁸

On 31 October 2016, the scientific council of the National Security Council (NSC) reportedly opposed what it called efforts that distorted the meaning of the 1917 Russian Revolution and other historical events (such as the nationality policies of the tsarist Empire and the USSR, the role of the USSR in World War II, the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, and the political crises in Warsaw Pact countries) in view of the coming centennial of the Revolution. It advocated the establishment of a new government center that would take up the role of the commission for preventing attempts at the falsification of history that was disbanded in 2012. This fitted into a broader pattern. Point 21 of the National Security Strategy (2015) stated that other countries were increasingly using information technology to manipulate public consciousness and falsify history, while the Draft Information Security Doctrine (2016, point 12) noted that they were trying to “undermine the historical foundations” of the Russian people. The Presidential Administration and the Institute of History of the Russian Academy of Sciences, however, were opposed to that step.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 306; Human Rights Watch, “Russia: Government against Rights Groups” (14 July 2016); Russian PEN, “Writers and Academics Speak Out against Law on ‘Foreign Agents’” (1 February 2016).

¹⁷⁷ Alec Luhn, “Russian Orthodox Church Head Backs Ivan the Terrible Sculpture,” Guardian (2 August 2016); “Omstreden standbeeld van Ivan de Verschrikkelijke onthuld,” NOS (15 October 2016); Steven Derix, “Waarom Ivan de Verschrikkelijke in Rusland een standbeeld krijgt,” NRC Handelsblad (1 December 2016), 14–15.

¹⁷⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 498.

¹⁷⁹ Paul Goble, “History Of Russia’s 1917 Revolution Now In Danger?” Eurasia Review (1 November 2016); Cameron Johnston, “Russia: History as Myth?” European Union Institute for Security Studies Alert Issue no. 40 (November 2016), 1–2.

On 14 November 2016, the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) said that the situation within the territory of Crimea and Sevastopol amounted to an international armed conflict between Russia and Ukraine. The ICC Prosecutor was conducting an assessment as to whether the same was true for eastern Ukraine. On 16 November 2016, President Vladimir Putin announced that Russia no longer intended to become a party to the Rome Statute of the ICC, which it had signed in 2000 but did not ratify.¹⁸⁰

On 13 December 2016, the FSB arrested Karelian historian Yuri Dmitriyev ([1955–]) and held him in remand prison on charges of “preparing and circulating child pornography.” His trial before a local court in the regional capital of Petrozavodsk was scheduled to begin in May 2017, and, if convicted, he faced between eight and fifteen years’ imprisonment. He also faced an illegal-weapons charge stemming from a piece of a vintage hunting rifle that investigators found in his flat—a relic his lawyer said Dmitriyev recovered during a research dig. Dmitriyev denied all allegations, saying that he had been framed because of his activities as a historian, and colleagues both in Russia and abroad argued that the charges were trumped-up to punish him for his past research and to silence him in the future.

As the head of the Karelian chapter of the rights-advocacy group Memorial, Dmitriyev had assembled a Book of Remembrance that included the names of 13,000 Great Terror victims. In 1997, he and his colleagues Irina Fliege and Veniamin Iofe, discovered the Sandarmokh mass grave, where more than 9,500 prisoners representing over 60 ethnic groups from the Solovki GULAG camp were executed and buried by Stalin’s secret police in 1937–1938. In addition, over strong resistance from Karelian security agents, Dmitriyev lobbied to have the spot memorialized (today there is a large stone memorial at the site). Recently, he had participated in a Memorial project to create an online database giving details about some 40,000 agents of Stalin’s secret police, who were directly responsible for the murders of some one million Soviet citizens during the Great Terror period, as well as the persecution of millions more (the “executioners’ database”). Shortly after the publication, Memorial started receiving threats and unambiguous “recommendations” to end the project. More than 7,000 people signed an online petition denouncing the charges against Dmitriyev as “a provocation.” Historians and activists from Ukraine and Poland have published open letters of support. During the investigation and while Dmitriyev was in custody, the latter’s latest research—450 pages of meticulous investigation—and his entire research archive disappeared without a trace.

In August [2016], for the first time in 20 years, the Karelian government and the Russian Orthodox Church declined from taking part in commemorations in Sandarmokh.¹⁸¹

¹⁸⁰ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 309.

¹⁸¹ Yelizaveta Mayetnaya, “Supporters Rally Around Accused Russian Historian of Stalin’s Crimes,” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (27 April 2017); “Ukrainians Ask for International Protection for Russian Historian Who Is Persecuted by FSB,” Human Rights Information Centre (28 December 2016); Petition:

On 13 June 2017, a court in Podolsk tried Vladimir Melikhov ([1957–]), a descendant of Cossacks and founder of two private history museums. The museums focused on the persecution of the anti-Bolshevik resistance following the 1917 Revolution and on the reasons why many Cossacks and other persecuted Soviet citizens welcomed, at least initially, Hitler’s invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941. Melikhov was denounced on state television as a traitor and border guards defaced his passport to prevent him from leaving Russia. The court in Podolsk found him guilty of trumped-up criminal charges such as illegal possession of weapons and sentenced him to one year of “restricted freedom” (house arrest). The evidence against him consisted of a 19th-century gun and a stash of bullets. Melikhov claimed that investigators had planted them.¹⁸²

See also China, Poland.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2016.

Individuals suspected of involvement in the 1994 genocide faced trial in Rwanda and Sweden. In March 2016, the Congolese authorities transferred Ladislav Ntaganzwa to Rwanda to stand trial on charges of genocide and crimes against humanity, in line with an arrest warrant issued by the United Nations Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals—the body responsible for following up the work of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), which closed in December 2015 after delivering its final judgement against former minister Pauline Nyiramasuhuko and five co-accused.

In April 2016, Rwanda’s High Court sentenced to life imprisonment an academic and former government official, Léon Mugesera, extradited from Canada in 2012. He was convicted of incitement to commit genocide, inciting ethnic hatred and persecution as a crime against humanity. He was acquitted of preparing and planning the genocide and conspiracy to commit genocide.

In July 2016, a French court found Octavien Ngenzi and Tito Barahira, two former mayors, guilty of genocide and crimes against humanity, and sentenced them to life imprisonment. It was only the second time that Rwandan genocide suspects were convicted in France, a close ally of the Rwandan government before and during the 1994 genocide. In December 2016 a French court confirmed the 25-year prison sentence of Rwandan former intelligence chief Pascal Simbikangwa for genocide and Освободить историка Юрия Дмитриева (in Russian); “Stalin’s Shadow: How a Gulag Historian Fell Victim to Russia’s Dark Past,” Moscow Times (9 June 2017).

¹⁸² Andrew Higgins, “Putin-Era Taboo: Telling Why Some Soviets Aided Nazis,” New York Times (21 June 2017).

complicity in crimes against humanity. A German court convicted another former mayor, Onesphore Rwabukombe, to life imprisonment for his role in the genocide in December 2015. In July 2016, Enoch Ruhigira, who in 1994 was chief of staff of the then President, Juvénal Habyarimana, was arrested in Germany at the request of the Rwandan authorities, who were seeking his extradition on genocide charges. In May 2016, a court in Sweden convicted Claver Berinkindi of genocide and sentenced him to life in prison. A court in London in December 2015 denied an extradition request for five genocide suspects. On 12 November 2016, genocide suspects Jean-Claude Iyamuremye and Jean-Baptiste Mugimba were extradited from the Netherlands and transferred to Kigali Central Prison. On 17 November 2016, Henri Jean-Claude Seyoboka, a former military official, was deported from Canada, accused of involvement in the genocide. He had not disclosed his military background in his asylum application. On 28 September 2016, university professor Léopold Munyakazi was deported from the USA to Rwanda. He was charged with committing genocide, complicity in genocide, conspiracy to commit genocide, extermination and genocide negation. He had been arrested after the genocide, but was released in 1999 due to a lack of evidence. Rwanda issued an international warrant for his arrest in 2006 a month after he gave a speech in which he described the massacres of 1994 as fratricide rather than genocide. In a hearing in October 2016, Munyakazi pleaded not guilty.¹⁸³

See also Norway.

¹⁸³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 310–311; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 507–508.

SAINT VINCENT

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

SÃO TOMÉ

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

See Portugal.

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011, 2013.

On 5 April 2017, United Nations experts on cultural rights, housing and extreme poverty called on the government to halt the planned forced evictions and demolition of the 400-year-old walled Al-Masora quarter in the village of Awamia. Al-Masora was considered a historical model of a walled village, including mosques, farms and farmers' markets, places of worship for Shia "Hussainiyat" and businesses; it was home to about 2,000 to 3,000 people.¹⁸⁴

See also Iran.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009, 2013.

In 2016, France promised to give Senegal 2.5 million digital images of documents relating to Senegal's colonial history, particularly archives relating to the Thiaroye massacre. The Thiaroye massacre was a mutiny against poor work conditions and revocation of pay by 1,300 volunteers and conscripts of the Tirailleurs Sénégalais (infantry) units of the French army, and the subsequent killing of at least 35 to 70 (and perhaps as many as 300 to 400) of them by French forces at Thiaroy camp, ¹⁸⁴ "UN Experts Urge Saudi Arabia to Halt Forced Evictions and Demolitions of the Al-Masora Neighborhood in Awamia" (press release; 5 April 2017).

near Dakar, on the night of 30 November to 1 December 1944. In March 1945 a military tribunal sentenced 34 survivors to ten years' imprisonment. The families of the massacre victims demanded that France turn over all the Ministry of Defense archives on the massacre, including a list of victims, that the texts on the memorial at Thiaroy cemetery be rewritten and that the 1945 trials be reviewed. In 2012, French President François Hollande had promised to restitute the archives to Senegal; at that occasion he had called the event a "bloody suppression." Camp de Thiaroye, a 1988 film by Ousmane Sembène about the massacre, was called "inaccurate" at the time and banned in France for a decade and censored in Senegal.¹⁸⁵

On 30 May 2016, Chad's former President Hissène Habré was sentenced to life imprisonment by the Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC) in Senegal, a court established under an agreement between the African Union and Senegal. He was found guilty of crimes against humanity, war crimes and torture committed in Chad between 1982 and 1990. His lawyers lodged an appeal. The sentence set a new benchmark for efforts to end impunity in Africa. The case was the continent's first universal jurisdiction case and Habré the first former African leader to be prosecuted before a court in another country for crimes under international law. On 29 July 2016, the EAC awarded the victims of rape and sexual violence in the case 20 million CFA (US$33,880) each; the victims of arbitrary detention and torture, as well as prisoners of war and survivors, 15 million CFA (US$25,410) each; and the indirect victims, 10 million CFA (US$16,935) each.¹⁸⁶

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2016.

Journalists and researchers reported that the Serbian interior and defense ministries, and the army and police systematically obstructed the Freedom of Information Law by denying access to information which could prove who was responsible for crimes or their cover-up and help locate missing persons during the wars of the 1990s with Croatia (1991–1995), Bosnia and Herzegovina (1992–1995) and Kosovo (1998–1999). In most cases, even when ordered to disclose the documents, the ministries did not obey decisions made by the Commissioner for Information and Public Importance and Personal Data Protection. The four most common answers to requests were "state secret," "strictly confidential,” “we don’t have that information,” and “you need to provide more details.” International organizations warned that many suspected war criminals were still active as army and police officers, including some who worked in the police witness protection unit, and were preventing further investigation of war crimes.¹⁸⁷

¹⁸⁵ "Thiaroye Massacre," Wikipedia (1 February 2017); "Thiaroye 44: les familles des victimes demandent 'la fin de l'obstruction à la manifestation de la vérité'" Dakaractu (1 December 2016); Mamadou Seck, "Le président Sall: 'La France va rendre au Sénégal ses archives'," Sanslimitesn.com (20 December 2016); Jeremy Black, Using History (London 2005), 31.

¹⁸⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 21–22, 116.

In March 2016, the Prosecutor’s Office confirmed the indictment of eight former members of the Special Brigade of the Ministry of the Interior of Republika Srpska, the ethnic Serb party to the war in Bosnia, for war crimes committed against civilians in Srebrenica in 1995. Since its establishment in 2003, 110 judgments were issued: 75 convictions and 35 acquittals.

Also in March 2016, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) acquitted Vojislav Šešelj, President of the Serbian Radical Party. He had been indicted on three counts of crimes against humanity (persecution, deportation and inhumane acts of forcible transfer) and six counts of war crimes (murder, torture and cruel treatment, wanton destruction, destruction or willful damage done to institutions dedicated to religion or education and plunder of public or private property). The prosecution lodged an appeal which was pending at the end of 2016. Following the April 2016 elections, Šešelj returned to the National Assembly.

In February 2016, the Serbian government adopted a war crimes strategy which sets out criteria for prioritizing cases and commitment to prosecute high ranking officials suspected of war crimes, while failing to specify how. The strategy was part of the European Union (EU) requirements that focused on rule of law, and part of EU’s enlargement process with Serbia. The War Crimes Prosecutor’s Office separately was drafting another strategy concerning war crimes prosecutions. The chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), Serge Brammertz, expressed concern in June 2016 that Serbia had failed to appoint a new chief war crimes prosecutor after almost a year. In late 2016, Serbia had still yet to do so.¹⁸⁸

Kosovo

EU Rule of Law Mission (EULEX) has been involved in a total of 38 verdicts on war crimes since it was established in 2008. The Human Rights Review Panel, an independent body set up in 2009 to review allegations of human rights violations by EULEX, did not rule on any cases between January and September 2016. Forty-nine cases were pending before the panel in late 2016. The EULEX mandate was extended until June 2018. However, EULEX announced it would not launch new investigations into cases of crimes under international law. At the end of 2016, hundreds of pending cases were due to be transferred to the Kosovo authorities despite the European Commission declaring the Kosovo judiciary “slow” and “vulnerable to undue political influence.” The Kosovo Special Prosecution Office remained understaffed and struggled to recruit adequately trained and experienced prosecutors to investigate and prosecute crimes under international law and to launch new investigations.

¹⁸⁷ Marija Ristic, “Serbian Ministries Block Public Access to War Files,” Balkan Insight (8 April 2016).

¹⁸⁸ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 318; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 520–521.

The Human Rights Advisory Panel (HRAP), an independent body set up in 2006 to examine complaints of abuses committed by or attributable to the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), ceased its operations on 1 July 2016. In a critical July report, HRAP found that UNMIK had violated human rights; had not properly investigated serious allegations of wrongdoings, and had failed to comply with the panel’s recommendations. Abuses by UNMIK included lack of adequate criminal investigations in relation to disappearances, abductions, killings, and excessive use of force by UNMIK police during a crowd control operation in 2007, resulting in deaths and serious injuries of four protesters. The panel found violations in all nine cases that it addressed between January and July 2016.

The Kosovo Specialist Chambers, a relocated special court to prosecute former members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) for crimes committed during and after the war (1998–1999), was set up in The Hague. At the end of 2016, the first indictments by the Specialist Prosecutor had yet to be issued. The Council of the European Union allocated €29 million to support the setting up and functioning of the relocated judicial proceedings between April 2016 and June 2017. In January 2016, Oliver Ivanović, leader of a Kosovo Serb political party, was sentenced by a panel of international judges at the Basic Court of Mitrovicë/Mitrovica to nine years’ imprisonment for ordering the murder of ethnic Albanians in the town in April 1999. He remained under house arrest at the end of 2016 while his appeal against his conviction was pending before the Court of Appeals in Pristinë/Pristina. Over 1,600 people remained missing in the aftermath of the armed conflict (1998–1999). No further grave sites were identified in Serbia or Kosovo despite exhumations at potential mass graves. Co-operation agreements between the two parties remained unimplemented.¹⁸⁹

On 13 February 2017, Kosovo President Hashim Thaci launched consultations to establish a new Truth and Reconciliation Commission to deal with the human rights violations (including dozens of massacres) during the 1998–1999 war. Thaci, who was the political leader of the Kosovo Liberation Army during the war, said that the commission would support the judiciary in prosecuting war crimes. A similar commission, launched by former Yugoslav President Vojislav Kostunica in 2001, failed to yield results [See also NCH Annual Report 2003].¹⁹⁰

¹⁸⁹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 319–320; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 525–527.

See also Croatia, Slovenia.

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007. See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012, 2016.

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011, 2015–2016.

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2013–2015.

On 2 August 2016, the 72nd anniversary of the Roma Holocaust ('Porrajmos' or 'Pharrajimos'), Rita Izsák-Ndiaye, the United Nations special rapporteur on minority issues, and Adama Dieng, the Special Adviser of the United Nations Secretary-General on the Prevention of Genocide, issued a statement calling on all states to recognize and ensure the right to remembrance for the Roma, to make 2 August an official day of remembrance for the victims of the Pharrajimos and to identify and preserve Roma graves and mass graves, including those that had not yet been marked, to enable survivors to remember and mourn in dignity.¹⁹¹

¹⁹⁰ Die Morina & Doruntina Baliu (BIRN), "Kosovo's Thaci Announces Post-War Reconciliation Commission," Balkan Insight (13 February 2017).

¹⁹¹ "UN Experts Call on All Governments To Recognise the Right to Remembrance for the Roma People" (press release, Geneva; 2 August 2016).

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2016.

On 13 May 2016, the Platform of European Memory and Conscience expressed concerns about the official unveiling on 26 April 2016 (on the so-called Day of Uprising against Occupation) of a monument to former chief of the secret political police OZNA/UDBA and high Communist party official Ivan Maček-Matija in the area of Kočevski Rog (Southern Slovenia), where tens of thousands of unarmed people—mostly Slovenes, Croats and Serbs—were murdered in 1945 after World War II by Yugoslav Communists.¹⁹²

Long-standing human rights violations against the “erased”—former permanent residents of Slovenia originating from other former Yugoslav republics—persisted. No new options were offered to the remaining “erased” to restore their legal status and related rights since the expiry of the Legal Status Act in 2013. In November 2016, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) dismissed the complaint against Slovenia of some of the “erased” whose legal status had already been regulated. However, additional human rights issues of the “erased” remained pending before the ECHR at the end of 2016.¹⁹³

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012–2014.

See United States.

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012–2016.

In October 2016, the government submitted an instrument of withdrawal from the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) without consulting parliament. The withdrawal would take effect

¹⁹² Platform of European Memory and Conscience, “The EU Must Stop Glorifying Communist Perpetrators!” (13 May 2016).

¹⁹³ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 325.

after one year. The move followed non-cooperation procedures by the ICC against South Africa after the authorities failed to execute warrants of arrest for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes against Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir when he visited South Africa in June 2015 to attend the African Union (AU) summit. The move also followed the dismissal by the Supreme Court of Appeal on 15 March 2016 of an appeal against the 2015 North Gauteng High Court judgment that the failure to arrest al-Bashir violated the constitution. State authorities had allowed al-Bashir to leave South Africa in contravention of an interim order by North Gauteng High Court that he must remain.¹⁹⁴

On 15 March 2017, Helen Zille, former opposition leader of the Democratic Alliance (DA) political party, tweeted: “For those claiming legacy of colonialism was ONLY negative, think of our independent judiciary, transport infrastructure, piped water etc.” Many reacted angrily to the tweet. On 16 March 2017, she tweeted: “I never justified colonialism. I apologise if my tweet read that way.” DA leader Mmusi Maimane responded: “Let’s make this clear: Colonialism, like Apartheid, was a system of oppression and subjugation. It can never be justified.” He said that apologies were not enough and that Zille had to face a disciplinary hearing. On 2 April 2017, the DA announced that Zille stood accused of bringing the party into disrepute and of undermining DA’s reconciliation project. On 3 June 2017, Zille was suspended pending the outcome of the hearing.¹⁹⁵

See also Ghana, Indonesia, Sudan.

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015–2016.

Despite a deficient legal framework, the scattered and often damaged archives of South Sudan, spanning the period from 1903 until the present, were slowly collected by archivists, curators and folklorists in shipping containers, storage tents and rented houses in the capital Juba—although funding for cultural projects such as archive construction and artifact collection was regularly suspended. A process of emergency conservation, organization and digitization of the documents was initiated.

¹⁹⁴ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 330.

¹⁹⁵ “SA Politician To Be Investigated over Colonialism Tweets,” BBC News (AFP; 16 March 2017); “Zuid-Afrikaanse politicus berispt nadat ze kolonisatie ophemelt,” Algemeen Dagblad (17 March 2017); “Helen Zille Faces Disciplinary Action after Colonialism Tweets,” BBC News (2 April 2017); “South Africa Opposition Party Suspends Helen Zille over Colonialism Tweets,” BBC News (3 June 2017).

Records in South Sudan had suffered serious damage during the 1955–1972 and 1983–2005 civil wars in Sudan. The half-century struggle for autonomy by the African-Christian south against the Arab-Muslim north left two million southerners dead and millions exiled. South Sudan became independent on 9 July 2011. Many archives still remained abroad. Filing cabinets in Durham, United Kingdom, held thousands of pages of colonial-era records. Much else was located in Khartoum, Sudan, despite a 2012 agreement that stipulated the return of cultural and archival materials to South Sudan. When civil war erupted again in 2013, artifacts collected for a national museum were either sent to the Nile River Museum in Egypt for safekeeping or piled into a shipping container behind the Ministry of Culture, Youth and Sports.¹⁹⁶

Although the 2015 Agreement on the Resolution of the Conflict in the Republic of South Sudan (ARCSS) between government and opposition forces provided for the establishment of a Hybrid Court for South Sudan by the African Union Commission, little progress was made towards its establishment. Such a court would represent the most viable option for ensuring accountability for crimes such as war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during the armed conflict (2013–2015), and for deterring further abuses. There was also little progress toward the establishment of a Commission on Truth Reconciliation and Healing or a Compensation and Reparations Authority. These two bodies were also provided for in the ARCSS.¹⁹⁷

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2016.

The authorities continued to refuse to cooperate with the Argentine judiciary to investigate crimes under international law committed during the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) and by the Franco regime (1939–1975). They obstructed Argentine prosecuting authorities in the class action known as “querrela argentina” (Argentinian lawsuit) from taking statements from some of the victims and the nineteen defendants. By means of a circular dated 30 September 2016, the Spanish Prosecutor’s Office instructed territorial prosecutor offices to refuse to conduct any of the judicial inquiries requested by the Argentine prosecuting authorities, arguing that it would not be possible to investigate the crimes reported, such as enforced disappearances and torture, under the 1977 Amnesty Act

¹⁹⁶ Nina Stochlic, “Can Archivists Save the World’s Newest Nation?” National Geographic (3 November 2016); Rift Valley Institute, “National Archive of South Sudan” (2008–).

¹⁹⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 21, 335.

(among others) and because of the statute of limitations.¹⁹⁸

On 26 May 2016, the municipality of Tortosa unanimously withdrew General Francisco Franco's perpetual title of honorary mayor which was given to him in 1964. There was also a controversy about the possible removal of a Francoist monument in the river Ebro. In March 2016, the Catalanian parliament had condemned "all forms of fascism, including the Franquist dictatorship," asking Tortosa to remove the monument.¹⁹⁹

In October 2016, protesters in Barcelona defiled and destroyed a statue of General Francisco Franco. The statue, representing a headless Franco on a horse, was part of the exhibition "Franco, Victòria i República" (Franco, Victory and Republic). The statue was eventually removed.²⁰⁰

In January 2017, after having received a complaint of the Guardia Civil (military police) in April 2016, the High Court (Audiencia Nacional) charged history student Casandra Vera ([1996]–), from Murcia, with "humiliating victims of terrorism" because she had tweeted thirteen satirical remarks about Admiral and former Prime Minister Luis Carrero Blanco (1904–1973) between late 2013 and early 2016. On 20 December 1973, Carrero Blanco had been assassinated in Madrid by four members of Basque pro-independence group ETA with a car bomb that had catapulted him twenty meters in the air ("Operation Ogre"). If convicted, Vera could be imprisoned for thirty months followed by a three-year parole term and a term of "total disqualification" for another eight years, which would block her teacher aspirations. On demand of the public prosecutor, Vera deleted the tweets. In a letter to the newspaper El País, Carrero Blanco's granddaughter called the potential sentence disproportional. The affair enchained a wave of jokes about Carrero Blanco on Twitter. During her trial, Vera declared that she had mocked a historical figure and would never do this with other victims of terrorism. In April 2017, she was sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

In 2015, Beñat Lasa Fernández had been sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment for glorifying terrorism and humiliating its victims because he had tweeted his support for ETA and mocked Carrero Blanco. The sentence was later reduced after Lasa Fernández pleaded guilty.²⁰¹

In April 2017, the government admitted to member of parliament Alberto Garzón of the political party

¹⁹⁸ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 338.

¹⁹⁹ Marc Rovira, "Tortosa Retira la Alcaldía Perpetua a Franco," El País (26 May 2016).

²⁰⁰ "Beeld van Franco drie dagen belaagd, Barcelona is er klaar mee," NOS (21 October 2016).

²⁰¹ Maartje Bakker, "Spaanse aangeklaagd voor satirische tweets over ETA-aanslag," Volkscrant (19 January 2017); "Relative of Franco-era Leader Slams Suggested Prison Term for Student who Tweeted Jokes about Murder," El País (19 January 2017); Gloria Rodríguez-Pina, "Una estudiante se enfrenta a dos años y medio de cárcel por hacer chistes en Twitter sobre Carrero Blanco," El País (11 January 2017); Silvia Nortes, "No Laughing Matter," Index on Censorship (2017, no. 2), 86.

Izquierda Unida (United Left) that it had withdrawn some archives (from the franquist presidency and government until June 1973) from public consultation and relocated them under a classified status in the private Francisco Franco National Foundation. This operation was possibly carried out in 2007, after the adoption of the Ley de Memoria Histórica.²⁰²

On 7 May 2017, British historian and prolific author Hugh Thomas (1931–2017) died. His book The Spanish Civil War (1961) was banned during the Franco era. In 1962, it won the Somerset Maugham Prize. It remained in print, with several revisions. After graduation in the early 1950s, Thomas had worked at the British Foreign Office and had been secretary to the British delegation at major disarmament talks. In 1979, Thomas became chairman of the Centre for Policy Studies, a right-wing policy institute whose supporters included Margaret Thatcher before and after she was elected prime minister (1979–1990). In 1982, according to newspaper reports, Thomas acted as Thatcher’s adviser during the Falklands war against Argentina.²⁰³

In May 2017, Spanish comedian Dani Mateo was summoned to testify before a judge after in May 2016 he had referred to the Valle de los Caídos (Valley of the Fallen), a monument built by Franco’s regime, as “shit” during a satirical television show. The Asociación para la defensa del Valle de los Caídos (Association for the Defense of the Valley of the Fallen) accused him of insulting religious feelings.²⁰⁴

In May 2017, the Catholic Church and Ministry of Health agreed to open up their archives to parents who believed their children may have been stolen at birth. The practice of an estimated 300,000 niños robados (stolen children) began in the late 1930s and aimed at removing babies from families deemed “undesirable.” By the 1950s organized criminal gangs had reportedly become involved selling infants for adoption to make profits. Nuns, priests, nurses and doctors were implicated in the mass theft and trafficking of infants. Several organizations in Spain dedicated to reuniting stolen babies with their birth parents were formed in recent years.²⁰⁵

See also El Salvador.

²⁰² “Archivos reabren debate sobre el franquismo,” El Telégrafo (11 April 2017).

²⁰³ Alan Cowellmay, “Hugh Thomas, Prodigious Author of Spanish History, Dies at 85,” New York Times (10 May 2017).

²⁰⁴ Silvia Nortes, “No Laughing Matter,” Index on Censorship (2017, no. 2), 85.

²⁰⁵ “Spanish Authorities Agree to Open ‘Stolen’ Baby Archives,” BBC News (24 May 2017).

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2016.

In October 2015, the UN Human Rights Council adopted a consensus resolution in which Sri Lanka pledged to undertake many human rights reforms, including resolving the many transitional justice demands arising out of the civil war (1983–2009). Under the resolution, Sri Lanka promised to establish four transitional justice mechanisms, including a special court “integrating international judges, prosecutors, lawyers and investigators” with an independent investigative and prosecuting body. The resolution also called for an office on missing and disappeared persons, a truth-telling mechanism, and a mechanism designed to guarantee non-recurrence and reparations. A government task force designed to hold public consultations nationally on the four transitional justice mechanisms was slow to get off the ground. Shortly after, the government announced a framework to create an office to discover the fate of those missing and forcibly disappeared, leading to an outcry over inadequate public consultations. This lack of trust marred the ongoing public consultations on the other three mechanisms. Senior members of government continued issuing contradictory statements on the need to have international participation in the four transitional justice mechanisms, with the president and prime minister both claiming these would be wholly domestic processes, contrary to the Human Rights Council resolution.²⁰⁶

In May 2016, Sri Lanka ratified the International Convention against Enforced Disappearance, but by the end of 2016 had not passed legislation criminalizing enforced disappearance in domestic law. The Presidential Commission to Investigate into Complaints Regarding Missing Persons concluded in July 2016, having received over 19,000 civilian complaints. However, little progress was made in clarifying the fate of the missing or bringing perpetrators of enforced disappearance to justice. In August 2016, parliament bypassed public consultation when it adopted an Act establishing the Office on Missing Persons to assist families to trace missing relatives and take on the case load left by the Commission.²⁰⁷

On 20 May 2017, President Maithripala Sirisena announced new investigations into alleged secret detention centers as part of a drive to find tens of thousands of people still missing after the decades-long war (1983–2009). In 2016, the International Red Cross had urged the government to disclose the fate of the more than 16,000 people still officially missing. On 12 June 2017, Sirisena met with families of disappeared persons in Jaffna and promised that he would issue directives to the National Security Council to release lists of persons who surrendered to the Armed forces in final phase of the war (2009), detainees, and political prisoners. Families of the disappeared in the north had been holding a demonstration for more than hundred days seeking to find the whereabouts of their disappeared family members.²⁰⁸

²⁰⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 554–556.

²⁰⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 340.

See also Malaysia.

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2016.

The authorities continued to refuse to execute five arrest warrants issued by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for Sudanese nationals, including two warrants for President Omar al-Bashir on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes allegedly committed in Darfur since 2003. The African Union continued to call on states to disregard their international obligations to arrest Al-Bashir. In May 2016, Uganda failed to arrest visiting Al-Bashir and hand him over to the ICC, failing hundreds of thousands of people killed or displaced in the Darfur conflict. Elsewhere, South Africa's Supreme Court rebuked the government for its failure to abide by its domestic and international obligations when it failed to arrest Al-Bashir during a visit to the country in 2015. This affirmed the international norm of rejection of immunity of perpetrators for international crimes, irrespective of official capacity.²⁰⁹

See also South Africa, South Sudan, United States.

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012–2013, 2015–2016.

²⁰⁸ AFP, "Sri Lanka Offers Fresh Probes into Civil War's Missing Thousands," New Indian Express (20 May 2017); "Sri Lanka President Meets Families of Disappeared in the North, Promises Immediate Measures," ColomboPage (13 June 2017).

²⁰⁹ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 21, 22, 343.

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013, 2016.

Swaziland's dual legal system where both common law and Swazi customary law operate side by side, resulted in conflicts leading to numerous violations of women's rights, despite constitutionally guaranteed equality. In practice, women, especially those living in rural areas under traditional leaders and governed by highly patriarchal Swazi law and custom, were often subjected to discrimination and harmful practices. Violence against women was endemic. Civil society activists criticized the widely held view among traditional authorities that human rights and equal rights for women were foreign values that should be subordinated to Swazi culture and tradition.²¹⁰

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

On 24 April 2016, the 101th anniversary of the 1915 Armenian genocide, the Turkish embassy in Stockholm wrote an email to TV4 television station, asking not to broadcast a documentary about the Armenian genocide. Program director Viveka Hansson declined the request.²¹¹

See also Rwanda.

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009, 2014, 2016.

On 13 June 2017, an appeals court found Donatello Poggi, a local politician in the canton of Ticino, guilty of racial discrimination because of two articles on the Corriere del Ticino and TicinoLibero websites in 2012. Poggi had written that the 1995 genocide of Bosniaks from Srebrenica were “propaganda lies” and that Serbs, not Bosniaks, were the greatest victims of the Bosnian war (1992–1995). He was fined and given a two-year suspended prison sentence. In so doing, the court confirmed ²¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 569.

²¹¹ “Turkse druk om Zweedse docu over Armeense genocide te weren,” Volkskrant (25 April 2016).

an earlier conviction of May 2016.²¹²

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2016.

On 7 July 2016, Islamic State (IS) released a 57-second video showing its destruction of the Palmyrene funerary portraiture as well as desecration of the mummies of the Palmyra Museum after it overtook the city in May 2015. IS considered worshipping or mourning at grave sites to be equal to idolatry; it often destroyed burial sites throughout areas under their control²¹³

Government forces held thousands of detainees without trial, often in conditions that amounted to enforced disappearance, adding to the tens of thousands whose fate and whereabouts remained undisclosed following their enforced disappearance by government forces since 2011. They included peaceful critics and opponents of the government as well as family members detained in place of relatives whom the authorities sought. Thousands of people, mostly Islamists, also remained disappeared since they were detained by Syrian government forces in the late 1970s and early 1980s. In December 2016, the United Nations (UN) General Assembly established an independent international mechanism to ensure accountability for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in Syria since March 2011.²¹⁴

See also Germany, Iraq, Israel, Lebanon, United States.

²¹² Danijel Kovacevic (BIRN), "Swiss Politician Convicted of Srebrenica Genocide Denial," Balkan Insight (20 June 2017).

²¹³ "ISIS Releases Video Showing Its Destruction of the Palmyra Museum's Artifacts," Association for Research into Crimes against Art (ARCA) (7 July 2016).

²¹⁴ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 55, 353.

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012, 2016.

On 21 May 2016, the new Education Minister, Pan Wen-chung announced that he would scrap by executive order the controversial adjustment of guidelines for high school history textbooks [See also NCH Annual Report 2016]. The ministry had voted at a screening meeting in January 2014 that it would make several adjustments to history textbooks, such as changing “the period of Japan’s occupation” to “the period of Japan’s colonial occupation,” or adding anti-Communist policy to the background in sections on the “White Terror” period (1947–1987). The adjustments sparked student protests, and civic groups blasted the revisions as China-centric.²¹⁵

As of 1 August 2016, the Academia Historica—Taiwan’s highest-level national archive administered directly by the Presidential Office—restricted access to its files for scholars from mainland China, (including Hong Kong and Macau). The archive said that the step was in accordance with the Freedom of Government Information Law and equivalent to mainland China’s restriction of archive access to Taiwanese scholars. The opposition Kuomintang (KMT) condemned the move. The confidential files (including documents related to the Northern Expedition—a KMT campaign led by Chiang Kai-Shek against local warlords in China [1926–1928]; the Second Sino-Japanese War (1937–1945); Taiwan-China unification plans and government suppression of civil strife) were reviewed between August and December 2016, however, and posted online between January and April 2017. The files represented 98.8 percent of all existing documents related to Chiang²¹⁶

In March 2017, it was announced that a committee would be established to investigate cases from 5 October 1945, when the Chinese Nationalist Party (Kuomintang; KMT) arrived in Taiwan, to 16 November 1992, when the then-KMT government ended martial law. One of its seven members would be nominated by Academia Historica. It was yet unclear whether the committee would also address the issue of political archives and the restoration of justice for those who were convicted by a flawed judicial process during the era of martial law (1949–1987) [See also NCH Annual Report 2016].²¹⁷

See also Japan.

²¹⁵ Chen Chih-chung, Yu Hsiao-han & Lilian Wu, “New Education Head to Scrap Adjustment of Textbook Guidelines,” Focus Taiwan (21 May 2016).

²¹⁶ “Top Archive To Bar Mainland China Scholars,” The China Post (30 July 2016); Lee Hsin-fang, “Tsai Recommits to Transitional Justice,” Tapei Times (25 June 2017).

²¹⁷ Lo Tien-ping, “Committee to Ease Transitional Justice Expected,” Taipei Times (19 March 2017).

TAJIKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

The government took steps to extend its control over the legal profession, significantly curtailing its independence. In November 2015, authorities approved a new law requiring all lawyers to renew their licenses with the justice ministry, instead of the independent bar association or licensing body, and to retake the bar examination every five years. Lawyers declared that the exam included questions on a broad range of subjects unrelated to law, such as history, culture, and politics, and that they were concerned it was being used to exclude those who took on politically sensitive cases.²¹⁸

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2016.

On 8 February 2017, the government announced that it considered legal action against Germany to pay reparations for atrocities committed from 1890 to 1919, when the country, then named Tanganyika, was a German colony. Tens of thousands of people were allegedly starved, tortured and killed by German forces while trying to put down rebellious tribes (including forced starvations following the tribal revolt known as Maji Maji in 1905–1907), defense minister Hussein Mwinyi told lawmakers.²¹⁹

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2016.

In October 2013, Patiwat Saraiyaem ([1990–]), a student at Khon Kaen University's Fine and Applied Arts Faculty and Secretary General of the Student Federation of the North East, and Pornthip Munkong [Mankong] (f) ([1987–]), a graduate of the Faculty of Political Science at Ramkhamhaeng University and political activist, performed the play Jao Sao Ma Pa (The Wolf's Bride) to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of the October 1973 pro-democracy student protest at Thammasat University [See also NCH Annual Report 2015]. The play, which was organized by a ²¹⁸ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 582.

²¹⁹ Sylvester Domasa, "Tanzania Seeks German Reparations Over Colonial Acts," AP (8 February 2017).

now-defunct theater group, dramatized the story of a fictional king and his advisor in a fantasy kingdom. While the show was performed only once at Thammasat University, it was recorded and shared on social media. In mid-August 2014, Saraiyaem and Munkong were arrested, imprisoned and in October 2014 charged with lèse majesté. Denied bail, they pleaded guilty on 29 December 2014 in order to reduce their sentence. On 23 February 2015, they were each sentenced to two and a half years' imprisonment. In August 2016, they were released: Saraiyaem on 12 August in a royal pardon to mark the Queen's 84th birthday, Munkong on 27 August. Popularly known as the "14 October Event," the 14 October 1973 uprising was led by student activists. While it was initially crushed by the army, it ultimately resulted in the end of 26-year military dictatorship.²²⁰

On 11 April 2016, the Administrative Court ruled against Thammasat University that self-imposed exile historian Somsak Jeamteerasakul [See also NCH Annual Reports 2011, 2014–2015] was not guilty of leaving the university after the 2014 coup and had to be reinstated. The university order had been finalized despite the fact that Somsak had requested leave of absence from 1 August 2014 to 31 July 2015 to pursue academic activities overseas. In March 2016, the Thai police announced that they were considering further lèse majesté charges against Somsak together with the Thai PBS channel (the only public television channel in Thailand), over a talk program called Tob Jod (The Answers). On 11, 14 and 18 March 2013, Tob Jod had broadcast a series of discussions on the lèse majesté law. Apart from Somsak, the program featured social critic Sulak Sivaraksa [See also NCH Annual Reports 1995, 2008, 2015] and others.²²¹

On 24 June 2016, seven student activists were arrested while holding an activity to mark the 24 June revolution (the Siam Revolution) in 1932 at Laksi intersection in Bangkok. As they had distributed copies of the New Democracy Movement's Kao Kham newspaper, police asked them stop their activity. When they refused and marched to Laksi monument, they were arrested and charged with "illegal assembly" in forming a public gathering of more than five people. The June 24 revolution was a bloodless coup led by a small group of Bangkok intellectuals that put an end to 700 years of absolute monarchy in Thailand and replaced it with the current system of a constitutional monarchy.²²²

On 5 October 2016, Joshua Wong ([1997–]), pro-democracy student activist from Hong Kong, one of the leaders of the 2014 Umbrella Movement there, and founder of the political party Demosisto, ²²⁰ Charlie Campbell, "The Draconian Legal Weapon Being Used to Silence Thai Dissent," Time Magazine (31 December 2014); PEN International Rapid Action Network, "Thailand: Student Activists Sentenced for Insulting the Monarchy in a Play" (24 February 2015); "Thammasat University" (27 October 2014).

²²¹ "Exiled Academic Somsak Wins Lawsuit against Thammasat University," Prachatai English (11 April 2016).

²²² Online Reporters, "Arrests, Campaign Mark Revolution Day," Bangkok Post (24 June 2016).

arrived at Bangkok airport. He was due to speak about “the politics of the new generation” to Thai students commemorating the fortieth anniversary commemoration of the 6 October 1976 Thammasat University massacre. Thai authorities prevented him from entering the country, reportedly at the request of the Chinese government, and held him for twelve hours. On 6 October, he was allowed to address students at Chulalongkorn University, Bangkok, via a Skype link. According to several students, Thai police banned umbrellas—the symbol of the Hong Kong pro-democracy movement—from the auditorium during the 6 October events. In May 2016, Wong had been denied entry to Malaysia where he was to take part in talks about democracy in China.²²³

On 12 April 2017, the Ministry of Digital Economy and Society told Thai internet users in a letter to stop following and sharing posts from the social media accounts of three overseas critics of the military-backed government, including Somsak Jeamteerasakul (see item above), Pavin Chachavalpongpun and Andrew MacGregor Marshall, lest they be accused of violating the 2007 Computer Crimes Act. Pavin was a lecturer based in Japan, Marshall a Reuter’s correspondent formerly based in Bangkok, whose book about the Thai monarchy was banned in Thailand in 2011. Aside from being critics of the Thai government, they were all accused of violating the lèse majesté law. Instead of reducing the online followers of the three critics, the unintended effect of the letter and the subsequent media hype it generated was increasing the popularity of the banned social media accounts.²²⁴

See also Myanmar.

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2013, 2015–2016.

A working group was established by Prime Minister Rui Maria de Araújo in May 2016 to advise the government on implementation of the recommendations of the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR), issued in 2005. Many recommendations related to impunity had not been implemented by the end of 2016.²²⁵

²²³ Yojana Sharma & Mimi Leung, “Deported Activist Talks to Student Massacre Memorial,” University World News (7 October 2016); “Hong Kong Activist Joshua Wong Barred from Entering Thailand,” BBC News (5 October 2016); Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 360.

²²⁴ “Thailand Tells Internet Users to Unfollow Junta Critics on Social Media—or Face Consequences,” Advoc Global Voices (19 April 2017).

²²⁵ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights

See also Japan.

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2013.

More than eleven years after the deaths of nearly 500 people during the violence surrounding the presidential election of 24 April 2005, the authorities had taken no steps to identify those responsible for the deaths. Of the 72 complaints filed by the victims' families with the Atakpamé, Amlamé and Lomé courts, none are known to have been fully investigated.²²⁶

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2016.

Although the security forces under former President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali's regime (1987–2011) used torture extensively, authorities failed to investigate or hold anyone accountable for the vast majority of torture cases. They also have held no one accountable for the politically motivated long-term imprisonment of thousands of persons after unfair trials during his tenure.

On 24 December 2013, the National Constituent Assembly (NCA) adopted the Law on Establishing and Organizing Transitional Justice. The law set out a comprehensive approach to addressing past human rights abuses. It provided criminal accountability via specialized chambers within the civil court system for human rights violations that occurred between July 1955 and December 2013. The law also established a Truth and Dignity Commission tasked with uncovering the truth about abuses committed between 1 July 1955, shortly before Tunisia's 1956 independence from France, and the law's adoption in December 2013. The NCA elected fifteen of the commission's members on 15 May 2014. In June 2016, the commission reported that it had received 62,065 complaints from people concerning a wide range of human rights violations, including arbitrary detentions, torture, unfair trials, sexual violence and religious and ethnic discrimination, and had begun processing them. On 17–18 November 2016, it held the first public hearings of victims of human rights violations. The hearings were aired live on national television and radio stations.

(London: AI, 2017), 361.

²²⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 363.

The family and friends of ex-President Zine El ‘Abidine Ben Ali diverted public funds and lands for their benefit, instrumentalizing state institutions such as public banks, the judiciary, and the police to benefit themselves and to punish those who resisted their business initiatives, according to the 2012 report of the National Commission to Investigate Corruption and Embezzlement. In June 2016, however, parliament started debating the Law on Economic and Financial Reconciliation, which the government approved in 2015 with strong support from President Beji Caid Essebsi. Discussion of the proposed law had been suspended in 2015 following protests led by the popular movement Manich Msameh (“I will not forgive”). If adopted, the proposed law would offer officials and business executives accused of corruption and embezzlement under the Ben ‘Ali administration an amnesty and immunity from further prosecution if they returned the proceeds of their crimes. Its immunity provisions would also undermine investigations under the transitional justice process. The draft law had not been enacted at the end of 2016.²²⁷

During or after the January 2011 uprising, many state security and political police archives disappeared: they were either stolen or destroyed because they contained evidence of crimes. The rest was located in the Interior Ministry where they remained inaccessible. In November 2016, Khaled Krichi, the chairman of the arbitration and reconciliation committee of the Instance Vérité et Dignité (IVD), the Tunisian truth commission (see item above), accused the Interior Ministry of refusing to hand over its archives containing information about human rights violations, which caused the commission to slow down the handling of cases of victims.²²⁸

See also Egypt.

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2016.

On 11 January 2016, the Initiative of Academics for Peace issued a petition “We will not be party to this crime” signed by 1128 scholars from 89 Turkish universities and by more than 300 scholars from abroad. It called on the government to end its military operations in southeastern Turkey, including in civilian areas, and to stop violence against civilian Kurds. Shortly after the publication of the appeal, a criminal investigation was opened into the initial signatories, including the following historians: Ramazan Kurt (see NCH Annual Report 2016); Muzaffer Kaya: see item below; Turan Keskin: see item below; Candan Badem: see item below. Academics for Peace were at first accused of making propaganda for the PKK (Kurdistan Workers' Party) although many of the signatories were neither Kurdish nor pro-PKK. After the coup attempt of 15 July 2016, they were called "Gülenist coupists" (after Fethullah Gülen, a Muslim cleric living in the United States and accused by Turkish authorities of organizing the July 15 coup attempt)²²⁹

²²⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 55, 364; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 596–597.

²²⁸ “IVD : Le ministère de l’Intérieur refuse de nous communiquer les archives,” Business News (14 November 2016); Sadri Khiari, “Qu’en est-il des archives de la police politique?” Nawaat (6 February 2017).

On 10 March 2016, the academics Muzaffer Kaya (historian), Esra Mungan (psychologist), Kıvanç Ersoy (mathematician) and Meral Camcı (linguist) organized a press conference at which they renewed their call for peace and condemned the harassment of academics who had signed the January 2016 petition. The Chief Prosecutor in Istanbul initiated a new investigation accusing them of "making propaganda for a terrorist organization" (Article 7.2 Anti-Terrorism Law). The first three were detained on 15 March and Camcı followed on 31 March. On 22 April 2016, they were released but not acquitted. The Minister of Justice decided that investigation on charges of "denigrating the Turkish nation" (Article 301 Penal Code) should proceed, but the trial was delayed and scheduled for 30 March 2017. Kaya had been dismissed by his university after signing the January 2016 petition.²³⁰

On 21 July 2016, 56 associations, including the American Historical Association, the American Society for Environmental History, the Economic History Association, the Organization of American Historians, the Society of Architectural Historians and the World History Association, expressed concern about the acceleration of purges in the educational sector and the assault on academic freedom and institutional autonomy after the failed coup attempt of 15 July 2016.²³¹

On 27 July 2016, twelve days after the failed coup attempt of 15 July 2016 unleashed a massive purge of academics, Turan Keskin ([1984–]), PhD student in history and economics, was suspended from the Yüzüncü Yıl University in Van with 20 other staff members, in his case probably because as one of the signatories of the petition of January 2016, he was openly critical of official policies. With reduced salary, he took a temporary job as a research assistant and student tutor in Van while ²²⁹ Candan Badem, "The Quest to Quell Opposition Leads to 'Academocide'," University World News (10 February 2017).

²³⁰ Amnesty International, "Turkey: Academics Detained for Signing Peace Appeal (UA 78/16; EUR 44/3792/2016; 7 April 2016); Amnesty International, "Turkey: Academics Targeted for Peace Appeal Released" (UA 78/16; EUR 44/3902/2016; 25 April 2016); Note du conseil du Corps scientifique de l'UCL à soumettre au Conseil Académique, "Le musèlement des universités turques: Pour un soutien académique à une communauté scientifique menacée" ([20 November] 2016); Amandine Thiry, personal communication (20 November 2016, 22 December 2016).

²³¹ "Threats to Academic Freedom and Higher Education in Turkey" (Statement; 21 July 2016).

continuing his research at Boğaziçi University [Bosphorus University] in Istanbul.²³²

On 1 August 2016, two weeks after the failed coup attempt of 15 July 2016, Candan Badem ([1970–]), an associate history professor at Munzur University in Tunceli, was suspended for three months because he had signed the January 2016 petition and on allegations of connections to the Islamist Gülenist movement, which according to President Erdogan had been behind the coup. On 3 August 2016, Badem was arrested on charges of “coup attempt.” His office and house were searched. A book by Fethullah Gülen found in his office was used as evidence to link him to the Gülenist movement. Although Badem was released the next day, he stayed under judicial control. His passport was canceled and a block was placed on his credit cards, bank accounts and car. On 1 September 2016, he was dismissed by decree. Badem, who had denounced one of Gülen’s books in a tweet in May 2014, declared that he had read Gülen’s book in order to criticize it.²³³

On 2 August 2016, Clyde Forsberg, an American historian of religions and American culture at the Department of Western Languages and Literatures at Karabük University, and a musician and playwright, was suspended after his university accused him of aiding and abetting the FETÖ/PDY armed terror organization (the Fethullah Terrorist Organization, an official label for the Gülen movement) because on 26 July he had posted a poem about the aftermath of the coup. On 14 August 2016, he was arrested on charges of “aiding and abetting terrorism and treason following the failed coup attempt,” detained for four days, interrogated several times, and, upon his release, dismissed from the university in a notice signed by the vice rector and labeled “top secret.” Forsberg accepted a position at the American University of Central Asia in Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan.²³⁴

In 2016, a statue of Atatürk was removed from the main square in Rize. It would be replaced by a monument to those killed in the 15 July 2016 coup attempt.²³⁵

In June 2017, Alpaslan Durmuş, chairman of the Turkish Board of Education, announced that evolution as a subject would not be taught anymore because it was “debatable, controversial and too complicated for students.” A chapter on evolution was being removed from ninth grade biology

²³² Marloes de Koning, “Ze zijn bang om met me gezien te worden,” NRC Handelsblad (28 July 2016), 14–15.

²³³ Cem Oyvatt, “‘Witch-Hunt’ against Academics Continues Following Attempted Turkey Coup,” Times Higher Education (11 August 2016); Can Uğur, “Marxist Historian Candan Badem Is Free,” BirGün (4 August 2016); Joe Parkinson & Emre Peker, “In University Purge, Turkey’s Erdogan Hits Secularists and Boosts Conservatives,” Wall Street Journal (24 August 2016); Scholars at Risk, “Candan Badem” (November 2016); Tim Whewell, “The Human Impact of Turkey’s Purges,” BBC News (25 November 2016); Candan Badem, “The Quest to Quell Opposition Leads to ‘Academocide’,” University World News (10 February 2017).

²³⁴ Elizabeth Redden, “A Foreign Academic Briefly Detained in Turkey Tells His Story,” Inside HigherEd (31 August 2016); Verle John, “Release Professor Clyde Forsberg from Turkish Prison NOW” (petition).

²³⁵ Kaya Genç, “Talking a Tightrope,” Index on Censorship, 46, no. 1 (spring 2017), 14.

course books, and the subject was postponed to the undergraduate period. Final changes to the curriculum were likely to be announced at the end of June 2017. The draft changes had been put forth for public consultation at the beginning of 2017. Reports in Turkish media, based on apparent leaks of school board meetings, also predicted a diminished role in the curriculum for the study of the nation's founder Atatürk, and an increase in the hours devoted to studying religion. Durmuş said that a greater emphasis would be placed on the contributions of Muslim and Turkish scientists; history classes would move away from a "Eurocentric" approach. Secular critics worried that the government was clung to neo-Ottoman ideals that saw Turkey as the vanguard of a greater Islamic nation.²³⁶

See also Germany, Sweden, United States.

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012, 2015–2016.

The whereabouts of prisoners who were subjected to enforced disappearance after an alleged assassination attempt on then President Saparmurat Niyazov in 2002 remained unknown.²³⁷

²³⁶ "Turkish Schools to Stop Teaching Evolution, Official Says," Guardian (23 June 2017); Toon Beemsterboer, "Darwin raakt in ongenade in Turkije," NRC Handelsblad (30 June 2017).

²³⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 372.

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2013, 2015–2016.

On 15 August 2016, the pre-trial hearing of former Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) commander Colonel Thomas Kwoyelo, charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity in northern Uganda, began in the International Crime Division of Uganda's High Court. The hearing was adjourned because Kwoyelo's lawyers were not notified in time. The prosecution also introduced new charges relating to sexual and gender-based violence. In September, a court in Gulu, northern Uganda, ruled that victims could participate in the proceedings in line with their right to participate before the International Criminal Court (ICC). Kwoyelo, who had been captured by the Ugandan army in 2008, remained in detention.

On 23 March 2016, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed seventy charges against Dominic Ongwen, a former LRA commander who had been abducted as a child and forcibly recruited into the LRA. The charges included crimes against humanity and war crimes, sexual and gender-based crimes, and conscription and use of child soldiers in northern Uganda. The trial was due to begin in December 2016.²³⁸

See also Sudan.

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011, 2014–2016.

On 10 January 2017, a monument honoring some 900, mostly ethnic Polish, victims of a 1944 massacre by a Nazi unit composed mostly of Ukrainian volunteers was severely damaged by unknown vandals in Huta Peniatska, near Lviv. A stone cross was smashed to pieces and two slabs bearing the names of the victims were painted with a Ukrainian flag, Ukrainian nationalist symbols, and a Nazi SS emblem. The local police started an investigation. Poland's Foreign Ministry asked Ukraine to ensure that the perpetrators were punished.²³⁹

In late February or early March 2017, Eduard Dolinsky, director of the Ukrainian Jewish Committee, ²³⁸ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 375.

²³⁹ "World War II Monument Damaged In Ukraine's Lviv Region," Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty (11 January 2017).

protested the attendance of historian Volodymyr Viatrovykh, director of the Ukrainian National Memory Institute since 2014, at an international symposium on the Holocaust in Paris. Dolinsky maintained that Viatrovykh had praised Roman Shukhevych, a former leader of the wartime the nationalist Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA) and Nazi collaborator whose troops killed thousands of ethnic Poles and Jews. Twenty-eight historians signed a petition objecting to Viatrovykh's inclusion in the symposium.²⁴⁰

See also Russia.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2016.

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2016.

The Iraq Historic Allegations Team, a body set up to investigate possible war crimes by United Kingdom forces, continued work in 2016, despite unwarranted political criticism of its existence and the principle of legal scrutiny of military operations.²⁴¹

In 2016, declassified MI5 records revealed that social historian and political activist Edward Palmer [E. P.] Thompson (1924–1993) had been spied upon from 1943 (when he served in the army) to at least 1963. Among others, it intercepted a letter written by Thompson and addressed to a regional party official in Yorkshire in which he attacked the Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) leadership in 1956 [See also NCH Annual Report 2015].²⁴²

In October 2016, the Foreign Office (“Whitehall”) reportedly pulled dozens of files from the National Archive amid fears that they contain details of British military assistance when in June 1984 the Indian army assaulted Sikh militants at the Golden Temple in Amritsar where thousands of people were killed and the temple destroyed. Papers released to the archive in the summer of 2016 were recalled abruptly days after the Sikh Federation wrote to Foreign Secretary Boris Johnson, saying that they had uncovered “delicate information” concerning “UK military assistance to India” (a note dated July 1984 referring to the possibility of an involvement by SAS [Special Air Service, a unit of the British Army]) after “an Indian request for military assistance in the setting up of a National Guard for internal security duties.” A 2014 Whitehall review of 23,000 documents from December 1983 to June 1984 by Sir Jeremy Heywood, the cabinet secretary, had said that British assistance to India at the time had been limited to a visit by a military adviser in February 1984. It also had found that a Ministry of Defence file on military assistance to India over the Golden Temple operation had been destroyed in November 2009. Files reportedly removed in October 2016 included papers about a meeting between Prime Ministers Indira Gandhi and Margaret Thatcher, British defense sales to India and Sikh demonstrations in the United Kingdom. The period of sectarian conflict in India saw the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by two Sikh bodyguards on 31 October 1984.²⁴³

²⁴⁰ Cnaan Liphshiz, “Ukrainian Historian Who Praised Nazi Collaborator Invited To Holocaust Conference,” Forward (6 March 2017); “Historians Sign Petition Objecting to the Inclusion of a Nationalist Who Praised a Nazi Collaborator,” History News Network (8 March 2017).

²⁴¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2017: Events of 2016 (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2017), 280.

²⁴² Ian Cobain, “Historian EP Thompson Denounced Communist Party Chiefs, Files Show,” Guardian (28 September 2016).

The University of Cambridge’s Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology refused a request done in November 2016 by the Australian Rodney Kelly on behalf of the Gweagal people in Sydney to return four spears taken by British explorer Captain James Cook in 1770. Kelly claimed to be a direct descendant of the Gweagal warrior Cooman, from whom the spears and also a shield (currently held by the British Museum) were allegedly taken. In 2016, both the Australian senate and state parliament of New South Wales had voted to support the repatriation of the artifacts from the two museums.²⁴⁴

Northern Ireland

In order to mark the centenary of the Easter Rising in April 1916, the International Mural Wall on Divis Street, Belfast, was temporarily repainted to tell its story from a Belfast perspective. However, an image of unionist leader Edward Carson (1854–1935) and the Ulster Volunteers, the first loyalist paramilitary group, was paintbombed, and a poster for the “People’s Parade”—organized for 24 April to mark the calendar date of the rising—covered Carson’s face. In addition, former republican prisoner and leading mural artist Danny Devenny was subjected to threats via social media.²⁴⁵

In April 2016, the British government lodged a subpoena with Boston College seeking access to taped interviews given by Anthony McIntyre (an interviewer in the Boston College Belfast Project with a PhD in history and a former Irish Republican Army [IRA]) volunteer who was imprisoned in the ²⁴³ Sean O’Neill, “Files on Sikh Massacre Are Withdrawn ‘to Hide SAS Role’,” The Times (4 November 2016).

²⁴⁴ Harry Pearl, “Cambridge University Refuses to Return Aboriginal Artifacts to Australia,” Reuters (17 June 2017).

²⁴⁵ Allison Morris, “Row over International Wall Escalates with Threats to Artist,” Irish News (12 April 2016).

North) [See also NCH Annual Reports 2012–2016]. The subpoena was issued in sealed proceedings; Boston College was requested to treat them as confidential. Former Belfast Project director Ed Moloney and interviewer Wilson McArthur declared that the action by the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) and Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) was a fishing expedition, which was prohibited by international law.

On 7 June 2016, at the High Court, lawyers for McIntyre said they wanted to see the full legal document, which listed the reasons why the PSNI and PPS wanted to seize some of the Boston tapes, after they were given a heavily redacted copy of it. The court allowed the PSNI to apply for a Public Interest Immunity Certificate in order to keep secret the reasons why they wanted access to some of the tapes.

In May 2017, the High Court ruled that McIntyre's legal team would be given access to the correspondence between the PPS and U. S. authorities when PPS sought access to McIntyre's interviews deposited at Boston College. The British authorities wanted access to McIntyre's recorded recollection of his own IRA activities and for that reason they had served a subpoena on Boston College seeking copies of his recorded interviews. To that end, PPS and PSNI issued an International Letter of Request (ILOR). McIntyre wanted to know if an American court dealing with the case received his affidavit denying involvement in alleged terrorist offenses under investigation.²⁴⁶

See also Burkina Faso, Egypt, Greece, Indonesia, Myanmar, Oman, Rwanda, South Sudan, Spain, United States.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2016.

The volume Iran 1952–1954—published in 1989 as part of the series Foreign Relations of the United States (FRUS), the official history of United States foreign policy published by the State Department since 1861—left out any reference to the coup that overthrew Prime Minister Muhammad (Mohammad) Musaddiq (Mosaddegh, Mosaddeq) in 1953. The coup had been backed by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The chairman of the State Department Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation (a committee established to review records, advise, and make recommendations to the State Department's Historian's Office concerning the FRUS), Warren Cohen, ²⁴⁶ Gerry Moriarty, "Boston College Subpoenaed for Anthony McIntyre Interviews," Irish Times (25 April 2016); Will Leitch, "Boston Tapes: Police May Seek Immunity over Interviews," BBC News (6 June 2016); Alan Erwin, "Ex-Provo in Boston Tapes Row Can Examine PPS Files," Belfast Telegraph (25 May 2017).

historian at the University of Michigan, resigned in protest. At its April 1990 convention, the Organization of American Historians (OAH) adopted a resolution condemning excessive secrecy and gaps in FRUS. The OAH claimed that recent FRUS volumes showed “significant increases in deletions and omissions.” In 1991 Congress passed a law requiring the FRUS volumes to include covert operations as well as overt diplomacy in order to present a “thorough, accurate, and reliable documentary record” of American policy. In 1997, CIA officials admitted that various files concerning the operations in the 1950s had been destroyed in the early 1960s, among them nearly all files concerning the Iranian coup. In 2000, a 200-page internal CIA history of the coup (the so-called Wilber report) was leaked to the New York Times. In 2011, the CIA declassified part of an internal document confirming its coup activities. Meanwhile, the State Department Historian’s Office promised a make-up volume, which was ready in 2013. In 2016, however, the State Department decided not to release the volume, saying it was concerned about the fragility of United States relations with Iran. On 15 June 2017, the State Department finally released the long-awaited “retrospective” 970-page volume of declassified United States government documents on the 1953 coup in Iran, including details on Iranian, American and British planning and implementation of the covert operation, as well as information about American contacts with key figures such as Ayatollah Abol-Ghasem Kashani (the main cleric involved in national politics), and insights into American concerns about the influence of the communist Tudeh Party. Justifications given in the past not to publish the volume included protecting intelligence sources and methods, bowing to British government requests and avoiding stirring up Iranian hardline elements who might seek to undercut the nuclear deal Iran signed with the United States in 2015.²⁴⁷

In January 2016, the owner and employees of a company contracted by the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, to remove three Confederate monuments (of Confederate Generals Robert E. Lee and P.G.T. Beauregard and Confederate States of America President Jefferson Davis) standing on public land, received death threats. Less than a week later, the owner’s car was found aflame. In February 2016, the city removed a list of possible replacement contractors from its website after some reported receiving threatening phone calls or emails. Meanwhile, the Louisiana Landmarks Society and a chapter of the Sons of Confederate Veterans were two of four plaintiffs in a federal suit to block the city’s plan. On 26 January 2016, a federal judge dismissed their attempt. In addition, a bill introduced in the state legislature sought to block the removal.

²⁴⁷ “Snowed by the CIA,” Harper’s Magazine (September 1997), 17–21 (taken from the May 1997 Organization of American Historians Newsletter); National Security Archive, “CIA Stalling State Department Histories: Archive Posts One of Two Disputed Volumes on Web” (27 July 2001); Malcolm Byrne, “It’s Time to Release the Real History of the 1953 Iran Coup,” Politico (12 October 2016); “Iran 1953: State Department Finally Releases Updated Official History of Mosaddeq Coup,” National Security Archive (15 June 2017); Ervand Abrahamian, “Now We Know What the State Department Was Hiding,” History News Network (9 July 2017).

In April 2017, workers dismantled an obelisk that was erected in 1891 to honor members of the Crescent City White League who in 1874 fought in the Reconstruction-era Battle of Liberty Place against the racially integrated New Orleans police and state militia.

On 11 May 2017, the statue of Jefferson Davis (erected in 1911) was removed around 3 a.m. under a heavy police presence. Mayor Mitch Landrieu said in a statement: “These monuments have stood not as historic or educational markers of our legacy of slavery and segregation, but in celebration of it. I believe we must remember all of our history, but we need not revere it. To literally put the Confederacy on a pedestal in some of our most prominent public places is not only an inaccurate reflection of our past, it is an affront to our present, and a bad prescription for our future.” On 20 May 2017, the statue of Robert Lee (erected in 1884) was also removed. Before police cleared the area on 18 May 2017, nearly 200 protesters gathered to voice support and opposition to the monument. The statues would be placed in a museum and properly contextualized there.

The debate over Confederate symbols took center stage after a white supremacist shot dead nine black worshippers at a church in South Carolina in June 2015. South Carolina removed the Confederate battle flag, which had flown at its State House for more than 50 years, and other Southern cities also considered taking down monuments.²⁴⁸

In February 2016, the University of California at Irvine (UCI) accepted a faculty committee’s recommendation to refuse gifts for endowed professorships in Indian religions from donors with specific ideas about how Hinduism should be studied. The committee had concluded that any association with the Dharma Civilization Foundation, which publicly stated its views about specific scholars whose work it found problematic and sought to promote scholarship by Hindus about Hindus, was “inconsistent with UCI’s core values as a public university that fosters diversity, inclusion, toleration and respect.”²⁴⁹

In April 2016, an online petition that received more than 23,000 signatures accused a 15-member multidisciplinary group of South Asian studies faculty (who proposed changes to middle schools social studies curriculum documents) of seeking “to erase India and Hinduism from California’s schools.” The Hindu American Foundation launched a #DontEraseIndia campaign. At issue were questions of whether it was historically accurate to use the word “Hinduism” to describe the religion of ancient India, whether certain references to “India” had to be replaced with “South Asia” or “Indian subcontinent,” and whether caste was not only a religious belief but also a social and cultural structure. Most of the group's proposed edits addressed the sixth- and seventh-grade world history and geography curriculum, which together spanned from ancient civilizations to the early modern era.

²⁴⁸ Natalie Pompilio, “Whitewashing History? Tug-of-war over Confederate Monuments Rages On,” Washington Post (15 April 2016); Christopher Mele, “Jefferson Davis Statue in New Orleans Is Removed,” New York Times (11 May 2017); “New Orleans Purges Final Confederate statue,” BBC News (20 May 2017).

²⁴⁹ Elizabeth Redden, “Scholars Who Study Hinduism and India Face Hostile Climate,” Inside HigherEd (12 April 2016).

In May 2016, a group of academics (including Thomas Hansen, a professor of anthropology and South Asian studies at Stanford University, and Michael Witzel, Harvard University professor of Sanskrit) and a coalition of secular South Asian organizations (South Asian Histories for All) urged the California State Board of Education to change the term "India" to "South Asia" in its history and social studies textbooks for 11- to 13-year-olds (grades 6 and 7) as a more accurate descriptive term for the region, one that did not equate India as it existed before 1947 with the modern Indian nation-state. They also urged not to remove references to caste in Indian society and its link to Hinduism. Many other academics (like Nathan Glazer, professor emeritus of sociology at Harvard University) and a number of conservative Hindu-American organizations (like the Hindu American Foundation, HAF) accused the first group of "Hinduphobia" and signed a petition to stop the change accusing the first group of wanting to "erase" India itself by recommending the name change. They also asked not to teach the caste system as part of Hindu religion and culture, but rather as part of the region's history. Nearly half of the 2.5 million Hindus in the United States lived in California. Textbooks based on California's Instructional Quality Commission framework were often used in other states as well.²⁵⁰

Around 20 April 2016, Joseph Ventre, a history teacher at the Monmouth County high school, was asked to resign after at least one parent complained that he showed a video from television channel HBO's program "John Oliver's Last Week Tonight" that lampooned Republican presidential front-runner Donald Trump. However, the superintendent of the Middletown Township School District said that Ventre withdrew his resignation on 22 April 2016 and that "there [was] no action regarding this employee before the board at this time."²⁵¹

In May 2016, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia (DC) Circuit ruled that the 2014 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI) report into the secret detention program operated by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) after the attacks of 11 September 2001 ("9/11") remained a "congressional record" and was not subject to disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. A petition seeking United States Supreme Court review of the ruling was filed in November 2016. Separately, in late December 2016, a DC District Court judge ordered the administration to preserve the SSCI report, and to deposit an electronic or paper copy of it with the ²⁵⁰ Elizabeth Redden, "Scholars Who Study Hinduism and India Face Hostile Climate," Inside HigherEd (12 April 2016); Jennifer Medinamay, "Debate Erupts in California Over Curriculum on India's History," New York Times (4 May 2016); Rohit Chopra, "Viewpoint: Why Hindu Groups Are against California Textbook Change Pakistan respectively," BBC News (27 May 2016).

²⁵¹ Rob Spahr, "N.J. Teacher Reportedly Forced to Resign over Anti-Trump Video," NJ.Com (22 April 2016).

Court for secure storage. At the end of 2016, it was not known whether the government would appeal the order.

In August 2016, the United Nations Human Rights Committee expressed concern that the United States had provided no further information on the SSCI report. The full 6,963-page report remained classified top secret and the SSCI had not released it by the end of 2016. The Committee also noted that the United States had provided no further information on reports that Guantánamo Bay detainees had been denied access to judicial remedy for torture and other human rights violations incurred while in American custody. No action was taken to end impunity for the systematic human rights violations, including torture and enforced disappearance, committed in the secret CIA detention program after 9/11.²⁵²

In early May 2016, Daniel Browning, a professor of religion and history at William Carey University, was dismissed despite his tenured status, reportedly because his views were too liberal and not in line with Baptism. William Carey University was a private Christian liberal arts college in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, affiliated with the Southern Baptist Convention and the Mississippi Baptist Convention. More than 500 people signed a petition in support of Browning.²⁵³

On 12 May 2016, students at Stanford University held a demonstration at the History Corner to protest the history department's decision to deny tenure to Aishwary Kumar, an assistant professor of non-Western intellectual history, saying that the history department undervalued traditions of thought from the global south. Paula Findlen, the head of the history department, stated that she respected students' desire to support Kumar.²⁵⁴

On 24 June 2016, an invitation to Shimon Dotan, award-winning filmmaker and member of New York University's graduate school of journalism, to screen and discuss his documentary The Settlers at an international conference entitled "The Place of Religion in Film" at Syracuse University (SU) in March 2017, was suddenly withdrawn. The documentary chronicled the history and present state of the religious settler movement in the West Bank, where more than 400,000 Israeli Jews lived on occupied land. The SU Religion Department wrote to Dotan that it was warned that "the BDS [Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions] faction on campus will make matters very unpleasant for you ... if you come." The film portrayed the settlements in a negative light and was skeptical toward many ²⁵² Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 29, 385–386.

²⁵³ Ellen Ciurczak, "Hundreds Support Fired William Carey University Professor," The Clarion-Ledger (6 May 2016).

²⁵⁴ Caleb Smith, "Students Protest History Professor Aishwary Kumar's Tenure Denial," Stanford Daily (13 May 2016).

settlers.²⁵⁵

When in September 2016 the CIA declassified documents about the United States-supported military coup in Chile in September 1973, it continued to withhold information on what it knew about planning for the coup and what intelligence it shared with then President Richard Nixon. The section on Chile of the Presidential Daily Brief dated 11 September 1973 (the day of the coup) was completely censored, as was an entire page on Chile provided to Nixon on 8 September 1973, even though thousands of once-sensitive intelligence records from the coup period have already been declassified since at least 1999.²⁵⁶

In mid-September 2016, the University of Berkeley, California, canceled a so-called DeCal history course, Palestine: A Settler Colonial Analysis, taught by undergraduate student of peace and conflict studies Paul Hadweh ([1994–]). According to the syllabus, the course would “explore the connection between Zionism and settler colonialism,” as well as “the possibilities of a decolonized Palestine.” The course was initially approved by Hatem Bazian, an Islamic scholar at Berkeley, by the Ethnic Studies department’s head and by Berkeley’s Academic Senate. After an article in the Jewish-American newspaper The Algemeiner, entitled “UC Berkeley Offers Class in Erasing Jews From Israel, Destroying Jewish State” on 8 September 2016 and after the Amcha Initiative (an organization to protect Jewish students) sent a letter to the chancellor signed by 43 organizations saying that Hadweh “intended to indoctrinate students to hate the Jewish state and take action to eliminate it,” the class was canceled. This, in turn, caused an uproar and after the course’s name was changed into “Palestine: A Settler Colonial Inquiry,” it was reinstated. Hadweh reportedly received death threats for trying to teach his class.²⁵⁷

On 10 November 2016, Frank Navarro (1951–), a history teacher at Mountain View High School, Bay Area, California, and expert in Holocaust history, was suspended and put on paid leave after a parent complained in an email over a lesson in which he examined parallels between the rise of President-elect Donald Trump and German Nazi dictator Adolf Hitler. Navarro was not allowed to see the email nor go over the lesson plan to determine what the parent found problematic. The suspension lasted five days (originally seven). In class, Navarro had told his students that Hitler’s persecution of Jewish people bore “remarkable parallels” to Trump’s campaign rhetoric about Muslims, Latino ²⁵⁵ Conor Friedersdorf, “How Political Correctness Chills Speech on Campus,” The Atlantic (1 September 2016).

²⁵⁶ National Security Archive, “CIA Cover-Up on Chile: Agency Tries to Hide Knowledge of 9/11/73 Coup Plotting” (Press release; 9 September 2016); National Security Archive, “Did Nixon Even Read the CIA’s Daily Briefs?” (Press release; 14 September 2016).

²⁵⁷ Alexander Nazaryan, “Why a Controversial Palestinian History Class at Berkeley Was Canceled, Then Reinstated,” Newsweek (5 October 2016).

immigrants and black Americans.²⁵⁸

On 10 November 2016, twenty students of the Armenian Students Association at California State University, Northridge, boycotted a lecture about Turkish leader Atatürk by George Gawrych, the Baylor University Charles Boal Ewing chair in military history. They turned their backs on Gawrych and repeatedly chanted “Turkey guilty of genocide” and “genocide denialist.” Many Armenians felt that Gawrych’s award-winning 2013 book The Young Atatürk: From Ottoman Soldier to Statesman of Turkey praised a leader who had denied the Armenian genocide. The lecture, organized by the Association of Turkish Americans of Southern California (ATASC), was stopped.²⁵⁹

On 21 November 2016, Turning Point USA (an organization that supported conservative youth activism) launched a “Professor Watchlist” to expose academics with a “radical agenda in lecture halls.” An archived version of the webpage described its mission as “to expose and document college professors who discriminate against conservative students, promote anti-American values, and advance leftist propaganda in the classroom.” Among the historians on the list of about two hundred academics were Frank Barajas, Juan Cole, Bruce Cumings, Gerald Horne, Carol Lasser, Norman Markowitz, Joan Neuberger, Gabriel Piterberg and Heather Cox Richardson. Others, such as Peter Dreier and Jennifer Adair, were on the list for being inspired by the work of “radical” historian Howard Zinn or for putting it on a reading list. The list was condemned for its many errors and for its chilling and intimidating effect on free expression. Since the website launch, professors have posted on social media to stand in solidarity with those on the list and to report their own politically motivated work to the site. In a much shared Facebook post, Richardson complained about her being mentioned on the list and her name was removed on 23 November 2016. In an open letter of solidarity of 8 December 2016, more than a hundred faculty members at the University of Notre Dame, including four historians and four art historians, wrote that they wanted their names added to Professor Watchlist, saying that those listed were “the sort of company we wish to keep.”

On 5 January 2017, the Council of the American Historical Association (AHA) approved the following statement: “The AHA upholds the rights of students, faculty, and other historians to speak freely and to engage in nonviolent political action expressing diverse perspectives on historical or contemporary issues. We condemn all efforts to intimidate those expressing their views. Specifically, we condemn in the strongest terms the creation, maintenance, and dissemination of blacklists and watchlists—through media (social and otherwise)—which identify specific individuals in ways that could lead to harassment and intimidation.”

²⁵⁸ David Ferguson, “History Teacher Suspended for Lesson Showing ‘Remarkable Parallels’ between Rise of Trump and Hitler,” Raw Story (12 November 2016).

²⁵⁹ Robert Spallone, “Armenian Students Protest Atatürk Scholar to Leave Campus,” The Sundial (10 November 2016).

The Professor Watchlist had antecedents. In 1950, three former FBI agents created a list of alleged Communists called Red Channels: The Report of Communist Influence in Radio and Television. In 1990, Roger Kimball published a book entitled Tenured Radicals: How Politics Has Corrupted Our Higher Education, which reflected the “culture wars” of that era. The 2006 book The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America by conservative author David Horowitz [See also NCH Annual Report 2001], was a similar project, “denouncing,” among others, Joel Beinin [See also NCH Annual Report 2007], Juan Cole, Norman Finkelstein [See also NCH Annual Reports 2007–2009], Eric Foner [See also NCH Annual Report 2016], Vinay Lal, Ali Mazrui [See also NCH Annual Report 2004] and Howard Zinn [See also NCH Annual Report 2014].²⁶⁰

On 15 September 2016, the Appeals Court for the Seventh Circuit rejected an attempt by the Justice Department to keep secret the Grand Jury testimony from the prosecution in 1942 of The Chicago Tribune for revealing that the United States had cracked Japanese codes. The case to release the records stored at the National Archives facility in College Park, Maryland, was initiated on 18 November 2014 by historian Elliot Carlson, the American Historical Association, the National Security Archive, the Naval Historical Foundation, the Naval Institute Press, the Organization of American Historians, the Society for Military History, and the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. The Appeals Court rejected the government’s arguments that the district court lacked any authority to order that the transcripts be made public and that Carlson and the other petitioners lacked standing to seek access to the grand jury transcripts, holding that the fact that Carlson “is a member of the public is sufficient for him to assert his ‘general right to inspect and copy ... judicial records’” which included grand jury records.

The June 1942 report by Chicago Tribune correspondent Stanley Johnston about the Battle of Midway that month noted that the United States Navy knew that the Japanese would attack by sea—thus revealing the highly classified information that the United States had cracked the Japanese code. A grand jury investigation for publishing leaked classified information (and thus violating the Espionage Act) followed. The grand jury ultimately refused to issue an indictment.²⁶¹

²⁶⁰ Katherine Knott, “Watch List of ‘Anti-American’ Professors Stirs Fears,” University World News / Chronicle of Higher Education (25 November 2016); Professor Watchlist; Professor Watchlist \(archived version\); Heather Cox Richardson, “I Will Not Shut Up. America Is Still Worth Fighting For.” BillMoyers.com (29 November 2016); Max Larkin, “A Campus ‘Watchlist’ Reminds Professors of Old Political Panics,” Wbur (6 December 2016); Peter Dreier, “The Professor Watchlist Gets an F for Accuracy,” The American Prospect (9 December 2016); Valerie Strauss, “A Twist on Controversial ‘Professor Watchlist’: Notre Dame Academics Want Their Names Added,” Washington Post (8 December 2016); Jennifer Freilach, “Professor Watchlist Is Keeping an Eye on You!” (1 January 2017); Frank Barajas, “Professor, You’re Being Watched!” History News Network (24 January 2017); AHA Statement on Right to Nonviolent Political Action (Denver, CO, 7 January 2017).

²⁶¹ James Warren, “Trying to Keep 74-year-old Testimony Sealed” (20 September 2016); “Reporters Committee and Historians Win Bid to Unseal Grand Jury Transcripts from Historic 1942 Leak Investigation of The Chicago Tribune,” Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press (Press Release, 15 December

On 31 October 2016, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) released volume 5 of the Top Secret Official History of the Bay of Pigs Invasion [see NCH Annual Reports 2011–2014.]²⁶²

From December 2016 and up to the inauguration of President Donald Trump on 20 January 2017, groups of archivists, researchers and librarians rescued sensitive data sets by archiving many websites with thousands of documents on sensitive topics (for example, climate). Within hours of the inauguration ceremony, official statements on such topics as man-made climate change vanished from governmental websites, including whitehouse.gov and that of the Environmental Protection Agency.²⁶³

In December 2016, an Afro-American teacher [unnamed] gave an assignment to her 12- to 14-year-old students at the Business and Economics Academy of Milwaukee (BEAM; a charter school in Wisconsin), to write an essay defending the actions of the Ku Klux Klan. Some of the parents protested, leading to the teacher's suspension on 19 December 2016 while an investigation was underway. The original letter explaining the assignment said: "When we return in January, students will watch the movie To Kill a Mockingbird and do a research paper on the history of the Ku Klux Klan. This paper will be a persuasive paper defending Klan members on trial. The research is being done leading into Black History Month 2017. The goal of this paper is not to teach the students the Klan was correct in their behavior, but rather to teach the students to write persuasively." Of the 748 students enrolled in the school, 97% were black.²⁶⁴

On 13 December 2016, 1200 scholars of United States history and related fields issued a collective statement on "Civil Rights and Liberties in Dangerous Times." They urged Americans to be vigilant against a mass violation of civil rights and liberties after Donald Trump's inauguration as president. Looking back on episodes during World War II and the Cold War, they also called to recognize and act upon the links between historical knowledge, informed citizenship, and the protection of civil and human rights.²⁶⁵ 2016).

²⁶² International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of May 2014, 10; "National Coalition for History Asks Federal Court to Review FOIA Decision" (30 August 2012); National Security Archive, Update (14 April & 1 August & 15 August 2011, 17 April & 10 May & 7 December 2012 & 13 December 2013 & 21 May 2014).

²⁶³ Morgan Currie & Britt Paris, "How the 'Guerrilla Archivists' Saved History—and Are Doing It again under Trump," The Conversation (22 February 2017).

²⁶⁴ Amy X. Wang, "A Black Teacher Asked Her Students to Defend the Ku Klux Klan—and Was Promptly Suspended," Quartz (<http://qz.com/868275>; 20 December 2016); Casey Gerardo, "Teacher Removed from Local Charter School Classroom after Assignment to Defend Ku Klux Klan," Today's TMJ4 (19 December 2016).

²⁶⁵ "1200 Historians and Other Scholars Say They Are Alarmed by Threats to Civil Liberties," History News Network (13 December 2016).

On 14 December 2016, Republican representative Kim Hendren proposed to add to the Arkansas code the following section: “Prohibited course materials. A public school district ... shall not include in its curriculum ... any book or other material authored by Howard Zinn from the years 1959 through 2010.” Historian Howard Zinn (1922–2010) was the author of the best-selling A People’s History of the United States (first edition 1980) [See also item above and NCH Annual Report 2014]. The bill would ban Zinn’s books from all public schools of Arkansas; it was introduced on 2 March 2017 and referred to the House Committee on Education. In reaction, the Zinn Education Project website started sending one of Zinn’s books and A People’s History for the Classroom to any Arkansas teacher who requested them. By 10 March 2017, 700 middle and high school teachers and school librarians had sent requests. In 2010, former Governor of Indiana Mitch Daniels had sought to ban Zinn’s works from Indiana’s classrooms, and the Tucson school district in Arizona banned A People’s History from all classrooms in 2012.²⁶⁶

In early January 2017, the United Nations Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent backed the Norwalk School District in Connecticut when it removed an “offensive” textbook on slavery from classrooms. The textbook, “The Connecticut Adventure” (2001; written by historian John Ifkovic) was being studied by pupils aged nine and ten until district officials removed it on the grounds that its depiction of slavery was inaccurate, simplistic and offensive. The book said slaves in Connecticut were often treated like family members, and were “taught to be Christian” and sometimes how to read and write. “Enslaved people in Connecticut, like those in the American South before the civil war, were trafficked against their will, had their fundamental right to life, liberty and property taken away from them, faced similar levels of exploitation, and were subjected to the most dehumanizing treatment imaginable,” the working group’s chair Ricardo Sunga (Philippines) said.²⁶⁷

On 17 January 2017, a bill against “divisive” courses or events at public colleges and universities in Arizona, proposed by proposed by Republican State Representatives Bob Thorpe and Mark Finchem, was not approved. Republican Representative Paul Boyer, chairman of the Arizona House’s Education Committee, said he would not hear the bill because it did not have sufficient committee support. The bill was prompted by a course on white studies at Arizona State University and would have prohibited state institutions from offering any class or activity that promoted “division, resentment or social justice toward a race, gender, religion, political affiliation, social class or other class of people,” or otherwise encouraged “solidarity or isolation” based on those categories. The state attorney general could have directed Arizona to withhold up to 10 percent of designated funding from any college district or university accused of violating the law. Typical criticism of white studies alleged that it promoted division or aimed to make whites feel guilty—a claim rejected by scholars. Critics of the bill said that its aims were contradictory and that it represented an attack on academic freedom, since it proposed to police not only what professors teach, but how they teach. The proposed legislation built on an earlier state law banning ethnic studies in K-12 education and being challenged in court.

²⁶⁶ Andrea Germanos, “Arkansas Lawmaker Introduces Bill to Ban Howard Zinn From Classrooms,” Common Dreams (3 March 2017); Zinn Education Project, “Hundreds of Arkansas Teachers Request Howard Zinn’s A People’s History,” Common Dreams (13 March 2017).

²⁶⁷ United Nations Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent, “UN Human Rights Expert Panel Backs US Schools over Ban on ‘Offensive’ Slavery Textbook” (press release, 5 January 2017); J. Blaauw, personal communication (18 January 2017).

In December 2016, two Wisconsin Republican legislators threatened to withhold state funds from the University of Wisconsin at Madison in relation to a planned course on racism.²⁶⁸

On 27 January 2017, the White House issued an official statement in recognition of International Holocaust Remembrance Day, in which it referred generically to “innocent people” as victims of “Nazi terror,” while failing to mention that it was a genocide with the Jews as its primary victims as well as other groups such as the Roma. The statement was widely criticized for its de-Judaization and for depriving the Holocaust of its historic specificity.²⁶⁹

On 31 January 2017, the Society of American Archivists issued a statement in which it strongly opposed President Donald Trump’s Executive Order “Protecting the Nation from Foreign Terrorist Entry into the United States” (27 January 2017), that restricted entry into the United States by individuals from seven Muslim-majority countries (Iran, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Sudan, Syria, and Yemen). The statement said that “this executive order may prevent international archival researchers, students, and staff from traveling to and from the United States; subject international archival researchers to intrusive screenings of their private information; intimidate marginalized communities from preserving and sharing their archival records; or disrupt the lives and work of archivists and archival students and faculty who are green card holders.”²⁷⁰

In February 2017, online bookshop Amazon removed books that denied the Holocaust from its online stores in countries where Holocaust denial is illegal (Germany, France, Italy). Such books remained available in the United States and the United Kingdom. The United States-based Anne Frank Center for Mutual Respect argued that by offering such books on sale, Amazon was an accomplice to ²⁶⁸ Colleen Flaherty, “White Is the Word: Arizona Lawmakers’ Failed Ban on ‘Divisive’ College Courses Highlights New Criticism of White Studies,” Inside HigherEd (18 January 2017).

²⁶⁹ Benjamin Thorne & Michelle Kelso, “Feasting on Fear with Arguments as Faulty as Hitler’s,” University World News (10 February 2017); Nicole Duran, “Democrats Try to Shame GOP over White House Holocaust Statement,” Washington Examiner (7 February 2017); MEE Staff, “White House Accused of Anti-Semitism by Holocaust Historian,” Middle East Eye (31 January 2017).

²⁷⁰ Society of American Archivists, “Statement on Executive Order Restricting Entry into the United States by Individuals from Seven Muslim-Majority Countries” (31 January 2017).

Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism. Yad Vashem appealed to Amazon to remove the books; a secondary solution, it added, would be to clearly mark the nature of the books.²⁷¹

On 11 February 2017, Yale University decided to rename Calhoun college into Hopper college. John C. Calhoun was a former vice president of the United States (1825–1832) and an advocate of slavery, Grace Murray Hopper a female computer scientist. The decision followed years of debate and was based, first, on the works of a Committee to Establish Principles on Renaming chaired by law and history professor John Witt, then, on the deliberation of three advisers charged with applying the principles to the case. It reversed a decision made in April 2016. The university said it would not remove symbols of Calhoun from its campus. The Witt report stated: “A university ought not erase the historical record. But a great university will rightly decide what to commemorate and what to honor, subject always to the obligation not to efface the history that informs the world in which we live.”²⁷²

On 22 February 2017, French historian Henry Rousso ([1954]–) was detained for more than ten hours by Customs and Border Protection officers at Houston airport, who told him that he violated immigration law by using a tourist visa to enter the country to attend an academic conference. Lawyers intervened to stop his deportation and Rousso could give his keynote address (“Writing on the Dark Side of the Recent Past”) as scheduled on 24 February 2017 at a conference organized by the Hagler Institute for Advanced Study at Texas A&M University, College Station²⁷³

On 1 March 2017, the Japanese foreign ministry presented an amicus curiae brief to the Supreme Court in a case revolving around a planned comfort women memorial in Glendale, California. In 2013, two Japanese-Americans and a nonprofit educational group had filed a lawsuit against the memorial, arguing that it infringed the constitutional power of the federal government to set foreign policy. After lower and higher courts dismissed the plaintiffs’ claims on freedom of expression grounds, the plaintiffs had lodged an appeal with the Supreme Court in January 2017.²⁷⁴

When in July 2017 dozens of the white supremacist Ku Klux Klan (KKK) group in Virginia took part in an authorized march to protest at the planned removal of a statue of General Robert E Lee (who ²⁷¹ “Amazon Selling Books in US, UK Online Stores that Deny the Holocaust,” Jewish Telegraphic Agency (13 February 2017); Tamara Zieve, “Amazon Should Stop Selling Holocaust Denial Books,” Jerusalem Post (24 February 2017).

²⁷² “Yale Renames Calhoun College amid Controversy over Slavery,” BBC News (12 February 2017); “Yale To Change Calhoun College’s Name” (Yale press release; 11 February 2017).

²⁷³ Erin McCann, “French Historian Says He Was Threatened With Deportation at Houston Airport,” The New York Times (26 February 2017).

²⁷⁴ “Japan Gives Rare Opinion to U.S. Supreme Court over ‘Comfort Women’ Row,” Japan Today (1 March 2017).

oversaw the pro-slavery Confederate forces in the United States civil war, 1860–1865; see also item above) from Charlottesville, they were met by hundreds of rival demonstrators. Police declared the counter-protests “unlawful” and used tear gas to disperse the crowds.

A rally in February 2016 had ended with the arrests of 13 people after a violent clash between members of the KKK and rival demonstrators resulted in a number of stabbings in Anaheim, California. In May [2017], a torch-lit rally against the removal of Confederate monuments in Virginia had been condemned by a local mayor. More than 100 people attended a counter-protest the following night.²⁷⁵

See also China, Croatia, Egypt, El Salvador, India, Indonesia, Iraq, Israel, Namibia, Panama, Peru, Rwanda, Turkey, United Kingdom.

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013, 2015–2016.

The Truth and Justice Working Group, established in May 2015 to investigate crimes against humanity committed between 1968 and 1985 (including the military dictatorship, 1973–1985), continued to collect testimonies, conduct exhumations, and locate the remains of missing persons. It also gained access to important documentation, including archives at the headquarters of Naval Fusiliers and was due to make its findings public in 2017.²⁷⁶

See also Argentina.

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2014, 2016.

See Kyrgyzstan.

²⁷⁵ “KKK Rally in Virginia Leads to Rival Protests and Clashes,” BBC News (9 July 2017).

²⁷⁶ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 390–391.

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011, 2015.

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012, 2014.

Venezuela's withdrawal from the jurisdiction of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (in effect since 2013) continued to deny victims of human rights violations and their relatives access to justice, truth and reparation. According to a report presented to parliament by the Public Prosecutor's Office in January 2016, over 11,000 reports of crimes under international law and human rights violations were received in 2015, while only 77 trials were initiated during that year.²⁷⁷

See also Russia.

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2013, 2016.

In March 2016, bloggers Nguyen Huu Vinh and Nguyen Thi Minh Thuy were sentenced to prison terms (duration unknown but between seven months and five years) [see NCH Annual Report 2016].²⁷⁸

See also Norway.

²⁷⁷ Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2016/17: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: AI, 2017), 394.

²⁷⁸ Amnesty International, "Demand Release of Blogger and Assistant" (ASA 41/2801/2015; 4 November 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 399; PEN International, "PEN Joins 18 NGOs in Calling on President Obama to Press Vietnam to Release Imprisoned Activists" (26 April 2016).

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco / Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010, 2013–2016.

See United States.

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2015.

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2015.

INTRODUCTION

The twenty-second Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It mainly covers events and developments of 2015 and 2016.

Disclaimer. The fact that the NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

Download this report at:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/16.pdf>

Cite this report as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2016

(<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/16.pdf>).

For the complete set of NCH Annual Reports, see:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content/ar.html>

Or click:

								2016	2015
2014	2013	2012	2011	2010	2009	2008	2007	2006	2005
2004	2003	2002	2001	2000	1999	1998	1997	1996	1995

All Annual Reports (1995–2016) were compiled by Antoon De Baets.

Please send any comments to antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org

AFGHANISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2015.

In 2016, philosopher and imam Sayed Hassan Akhlaq (1976–), an adviser of the Afghanistan Academy of Sciences in 2010–2011, reported that in 2011 he was urged to adapt his “History of Islamic philosophy,” a course for professors and researchers he then taught at the academy. Some of his colleagues thought that the course insulted their religious beliefs. He became a visiting scholar at the Catholic University of America and George Washington University in the United States (2013–).¹

See also United Kingdom, United States.

ALBANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2012, 2015.

In March 2015, an Office of Missing Persons was established to locate the remains of Albanians forcibly disappeared under the communist government (1946–1991).²

On 8 December 2015, supporters of the opposition Democratic Party torched a bunker installed near the Interior Ministry during protests in front of the office of Prime Minister Edi Rama in Tirana. They then tried to smash it. The bunker, a tourist attraction, was designed as a reference to the thousands of bunkers that dotted the country under Communist leader Enver Hoxha (1946–1985); it was built a mile north of Rama’s office as the entrance to a labyrinth of tunnels dug out under Hoxha as an escape route for the state elite in times of war.³

See also Serbia/Kosovo.

¹ Sayed Hassan Akhlaq, “Threats to Academic Freedom in Afghanistan Today, Personal Experience,” Huffington Post (22 February 2016).

² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 64.

³ Benet Koleka, “Albanian Protesters Vent Anger at PM’s Office, Torch Bunker,” Reuters (8 December 2015); Pieter van Os, “Monument dankzij bunkerstorm,” NRC Handelsblad (24 March 2016), 20.

ALGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001–2015.

In February 2016, the Minister of Mujahedeen (independence war veterans), Tayeb Zitouni, declared that the discussions with the French Secretary of State in charge of Veterans' Affairs and Memory, Jean-Marc Todeschini, focused primarily on archives regarding the missing persons during the Liberation War (1954–1962) and nuclear tests conducted by the France in southern Algeria. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]⁴

Perpetrators of human rights crimes and abuses during the internal armed conflict (1992–2000) continued to enjoy impunity under the 2006 Law on Peace and National Reconciliation. This law criminalized comments deemed to denigrate the security forces or state institutions for their conduct during the armed conflict, during which state forces committed torture, enforced disappearances, unlawful killings, and other serious abuses. Associations representing the families of the disappeared continued to face official harassment and pressure to accept state offers of compensation provided under the same law, and to abandon their demands for details of the fate of those missing and for truth and justice.⁵

ANGOLA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2009.

On 27 May 2014, youth activists organized a demonstration calling for, among others, a commission of inquiry into the massacre of 27 May 1977 (a massacre used by then President Agostinho Neto and his followers, to eliminate thousands of Angolan citizens for alleged involvement in a coup attempt that was never proven). Police arrested twenty individuals as they arrived at the Largo de Independência (Independence Square) in the capital Luanda. One of them said they were beaten by police, driven to Catete and then released there some several hours later.⁶

⁴ Rédaction du HuffPost Algérie/Agence, "Des historiens plaident pour l'ouverture des archives de la révolution du 1er novembre" (19 July 2015); "Zitouni: Algeria, France Should 'Seriously' Deal with Issues of Common Memory," Algeria Press Service (27 January 2016).

⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 55, 67; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 65.

⁶ Amnesty International, Punishing Dissent: Suppression of Freedom of Association and Assembly in Angola (AFR 12/004/2014; London: Amnesty International, 2014), 39.

On 28 March 2016, seventeen activists, known as the Luanda Book Club, were sentenced to between two and eight years' imprisonment and fined 50,000 kwanza (around 300 US dollar) for "preparatory acts of rebellion" and "criminal conspiracy." An earlier charge of "attempting against the president's life" was dropped on 21 March 2016 (President José Eduardo dos Santos has been in power since 1979).

Between May and June 2015, the study group had met on a weekly basis. On 20 June 2015, the day of their arrest, they had gathered at a book store in Luanda to read Domingos da Cruz's unpublished manuscript Tools to Destroy a Dictatorship and Avoiding a New Dictatorship: Political Philosophy for the Liberation of Angola (184 pages), an adaptation of United States academic Gene Sharp's book From Dictatorship to Democracy: A Conceptual Framework for Liberation (a blueprint for non-violent resistance to repressive regimes). The meeting to discuss the book was considered by the authorities to be a preliminary act to a coup. The trial started on 16 November 2015 and was originally held in secret. Domingos da Cruz and three other defendants initiated a hunger strike on 10 December 2015 in protest against the ongoing delays of the trial.

The activists included writer, journalist and university lecturer Domingos da Cruz ([1984]–), author of the manuscript (himself arrested on 21 June 2015) and professor at the Independent University of Angola; journalist and law student Sedrick de Carvalho, the book's designer; university lecturer Nuno Álvaro Dala, one of the lecturers of the seminars, rapper Luaty "Ikonoklasta" Beirão (Henrique Luaty da Silva Beirão), and Osvaldo Caholo (Osvaldo Sérgio Correia Caholo) ([1990]–), a lieutenant in the National Air Force (the only one of the group with military experience) and a lecturer of African history at the Technical University of Angola (UTANGA). Caholo was arrested on 24 June 2015. Among the books the police confiscated from his library were Purga em Angola (Purge in Angola), by Dália Meteus and Álvaro Meteus, a book on the 27 May 1977 massacre (see above). Another book was História das Ideias Políticas (History of Political Ideas), on the thoughts of "great philosophers and politicians about politics."

Both the prosecution and defense lawyers announced that they would appeal. Da Cruz was reportedly sentenced to eight-and-a-half years' imprisonment for "leading the criminal association." Beirão was sentenced to five-and-a-half years for "falsifying documents." The others received prison sentences ranging from two to four- and-a-half years.⁷

⁷ Rafael Marques de Morais, "The Angolan Regime Is Afraid of Books," Maka Angola (8 July 2015); Amnesty International, "Urgent Action: Peaceful Activists still Detained without Charge" (AFR 12/2295/2015; 21 August 2015); Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, "Letter to the President" (UA AGO 3/2015; 23 October 2015); International PEN, "Angola: Pernicious pursuit of the Luanda Book Club" (RAN 07/16; 31 March 2016).

ARGENTINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2015.

Twenty-two years after the 1994 bombing of the Argentine Israelite Mutual Association (AMIA) in Buenos Aires that killed 85 people and injured more than 300, no one has been convicted. From the outset, judicial corruption and political obstruction hindered criminal investigations and prosecutions. The investigation stalled when Iran, suspected by the Argentine judiciary of ordering the attack, refused to allow Argentine investigators to interview Iranian suspects in Argentina. In 2013, Argentina and Iran signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) to allow an international commission of jurists to review evidence and question Iranian suspects—but only in Tehran. Because interviews conducted in Iran would likely not be admissible in an Argentine criminal court, a coalition of Argentine Jewish groups mounted a legal challenge against the MOU. It was never implemented. The perpetrators of the AMIA attack continued to go unpunished.

In January 2015, Alberto Nisman, the prosecutor in charge of investigating the bombing, was found dead in his home with a single gunshot wound to the head. His body was discovered only days after he filed a criminal complaint accusing then-President Cristina Fernández and her foreign affairs minister of conspiring with Iran to undermine the Argentine criminal investigation of Iranian suspects. A pistol matching the wound was found beside the body. In May 2015, a federal court dismissed Nisman’s complaint, and as of November, the courts had not determined if Nisman was murdered or committed suicide. In August 2015, a Buenos Aires court began the trial of several officials—including former President Carlos Meném, his head of intelligence, and a judge—for their alleged interference with the initial investigation into the bombing. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]⁸

Several cases of human rights violations committed during the “Dirty War” waged by the military dictatorship (1976–1983) against political opponents were reopened in 2003, after Congress annulled amnesty laws that had been passed in the 1980s. In 2005, the Supreme Court ruled the amnesty laws unconstitutional, and federal judges subsequently struck down pardons favoring former officials convicted of, or facing trial for, Dirty War human rights violations. As of June 2015, courts had decided 142 cases of crimes against humanity committed by the dictatorship, resulting in 592 convictions. The Center for Legal and Social Studies reported that, as of November 2015, 56 suspects had been acquitted and 2740 charged. Given the large number of victims, suspects, and cases, prosecutors and judges faced challenges in bringing those responsible to justice while also respecting the due process rights of the accused.

⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 71; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 71–72.

Those from the civil, business and legal sectors who were complicit in human rights violations and crimes under international law had yet to be brought to justice. According to the Public Prosecutor's Office, questions about responsibility remained even in cases where significant evidence had been gathered. To date, only one member of the judiciary and two businessmen have been convicted. On 23 September 2015, the Chamber of Deputies passed a bill to the Senate proposing the creation of a commission, with representatives from both the Chamber and Senate, to identify economic and financial interests that had colluded with the military dictatorship.

Argentina had made significant progress both in identifying children of the disappeared who were illegally abducted and given to other families during the dictatorship, and in reuniting them with their biological families. As of November 2015, 118 children illegally taken from their parents during the Dirty War had been found. The National Bank of Genetic Data, created by the government in 1987, was of enormous help in his effort, but its usefulness was severely limited by a 2009 law. Local human rights activists challenged the law, and the case was pending in late 2015.⁹

See also Spain.

ARMENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2006, 2010, 2014–2015.

On 7 April 2015, Yerevan police arrested five members of the opposition movement Founding Parliament. The group had received permission to hold a rally in Yerevan on 24 April, the 100-year anniversary of the Armenian genocide. Authorities charged the men with planning a mass disturbance, after searching their homes and office and seizing wooden bats, kitchen knives, a stun gun, and a publicly available pamphlet, as well as their laptops and flags. On 10 April, a Yerevan court remanded all five to pre-trial custody, but on 4 May, the prosecutor general released them pending the investigation, which was ongoing in late 2015.¹⁰

The Turk Hack Team group claimed that it launched DDoS attacks against websites of the Armenian government, as well as Armenian business and media sites, causing disruptions on 24 April, the ⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 28, 70–71; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 72–73.

¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 79.

Armenian Genocide commemoration day.¹¹

See also Switzerland, Turkey, United States.

AUSTRALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2001, 2003, 2007–2009, 2014–2015.

In 2015, the Australian National University in Canberra handed back a collection of bones (40,000-year-old remains of about 140 people found around Lake Mungo—including a woman known as Mungo Lady) to elders from the local Aboriginal communities. The bones are expected to eventually be returned to and reburied at Lake Mungo, where they were discovered in the 1960s and removed in 1974. The university formally apologized, admitting that research had been conducted without the assent of the traditional owners.¹²

In 2016, the University of New South Wales (UNSW) published an Indigenous Terminology Guide (updated from a 1996 list) which distinguished between more and less appropriate language. It stated that: “Australia was not settled peacefully, it was invaded, occupied and colonised. Describing the arrival of the Europeans as a ‘settlement’ attempts to view Australian history from the shores of England rather than the shores of Australia.” And: “Nomadism has been associated with lack of land tenure or anchorage in land, and this has been coupled with the idea that Aboriginal people did not really occupy the land, but only roamed over it. The extension of the doctrine of terra nullius was based on this kind of distinction. Note that the 1992 Mabo Native Title judgement by the High Court rejected terra nullius as wrong both in fact and in law.” On 30 March 2016, Australia’s tabloid Daily Telegraph newspaper carried the headline “UNSW rewrites the history books to state Cook ‘invaded’ Australia,” but UNSW rejected the claim.¹³

¹¹ Freedom House, Freedom on the Net 2015 (Washington: Freedom House, 2015), 68.

¹² Jonathan Pearlman, “University Returns 40,000-year-old Mungo Man to Australia’s Aborigines,” Telegraph (6 November 2015).

¹³ Indigenous Terminology (University of New South Wales; retrieved 30 March 2016); “University Tells Students Britain ‘Invaded’ Australia,” BBC News (30 March 2016).

AUSTRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2005–2007, 2009.

AZERBAIJAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–1998, 2008–2013, 2015.

On 13 August 2015, after a trial marred by irregularities and due process violations, the Baku Court of Grave Crimes sentenced human-rights activist and historian Leyla Yunus to eight-and-a-half years' and her husband, human-rights activist and historian Arif Yunus, to seven years' imprisonment on politically motivated charges of illegal entrepreneurship, tax evasion, and fraud for running two unregistered human rights groups through a registered organization from 2006 through 2014. They would be tried later on a treason charge. Both suffered from serious health problems. On 12 November 2015 and 9 December 2015 respectively, Arif and Leyla Yunus were both released on health grounds; the appeals court changed both sentences to five years' probation. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]

Arif Yunus was a research officer of the History Institute of the National Academy of Sciences of Azerbaijan (1971–1992). In 1992 he worked as chief of the Information-Analytical Center of the Presidential Administration of Azerbaijan and in 1993–1994 he was president of the Analytical Center Azeri. Then he headed the Department of Conflict and Migration Studies of the Institute of Peace and Democracy (1994–present). He authored more than 200 scientific publications dedicated to the history of Azerbaijan, including Karabakh: Past & Present (2005).¹⁴

In 2016, it was reported that the sanctions against writer Akram Aylisli and his family were still in force. [See NCH Annual Report 2013.]¹⁵

¹⁴ “Deeply Distressing”—UN Experts Condemn Latest Prison Sentencing of Rights Defenders in Azerbaijan,” (Geneva: United Nations, 20 August 2015); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 92–93; Human Rights Watch, “Azerbaijan: Ailing Rights Defenders Convicted in Political Trial” (13 August 2015); “Rights Defenders Leyla and Arif Yunus Get Severe Jail Sentences,” Ifex (14 August 2015); Amnesty International (Dutch Section), Sample Letter (2015); “Rights Activist Leyla Yunus Freed from Jail in Azerbaijan,” Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty (9 December 2015); “Jailed Azerbaijani Activist Arif Yunus Released From Jail, But Can't Leave Baku,” Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty (12 November 2015); Rachel Denber (Human Rights Watch), “Prominent Human Rights Defender Leyla Yunus Free after 17 Months,” Ifex News (9 December 2015); Arif Yunusov, Karabakh: Past & Present (Baku: IPD / Turan Information Agency, 2005); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 77.

¹⁵ John Angliss, “Know Your Enemy,” Index on Censorship, 45 no. 1 (Spring 2016), 100–102.

BAHRAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2008–2012, 2015.

On 27 August 2014, activist Nader Abdulemam was arrested after three people accused him of “denigrating the prophet’s companion Khalid Bin al-Waleed [585 –642]” in a tweet he posted telling a historical story in which Khalid killed another companion and raped his wife. On 22 October 2014, Abdulemam was sentenced to six months’ imprisonment, later reduced to four months on 15 January 2015, when he was released after having served more time than his sentence. Repression against Abdulemam continued when he received news on 5 March 2015 that he was dismissed as a teacher at the Education Ministry, where he had worked for the past fourteen years. Authorities also arrested two Instagram users in September 2014 on charges of “denigrating the prophet’s companions.”¹⁶

BANGLADESH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2015.

In [2016], master student Siddhartha Dhar was threatened with death for blogging about evolution theory and religious history on his blog Mukto-Mona. Supported by Swedish PEN, he went into exile in Uppsala, Sweden.¹⁷

The International Crimes Tribunal (ICT), set up to address laws of war violations committed during Bangladesh’s 1971 independence movement, continued its operations in 2015 without addressing serious procedural and substantive defects that led to unfair trials. ICT proceedings were marked with severe irregularities and violations of the right to a fair trial. Challenges to the jurisdiction of the court continued to be barred due to a constitutional provision. Statements from prosecution witnesses shown by the defense to have been false were still used as evidence in court. Affidavits by defense witnesses that the accused was too far from the site of the offense to be involved were not admitted. The government prevented defense witnesses abroad from attending trials by denying visas. Appeals processes were marked by similar flaws. In April 2015, Mohammad Kamaruzzaman, a leading member of the Jamaat-e-Islami party, was hanged. His trial violated basic fair trial standards, arbitrarily curtailing the ability of the defense team to submit evidence, including witnesses and documents, and to challenge the credibility of prosecution witnesses by confronting them with prior inconsistent statements. In July 2015, the death sentence against Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP) member Mir Qasem Ali Salahuddin Qader Chowdhury was upheld on appeal. Both he and Ali Ahmed Mohammed Mujahid were executed on 21 November 2015 after the president rejected their last-minute clemency petitions. Several other accused were awaiting final appellate judgments in late 2015, including Motiur Rahman Nizami, who was sentenced to death in October 2014. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]¹⁸

¹⁶ Freedom House, Freedom on the Net 2015 (Washington: Freedom House, 2015), 107.

¹⁷ Eva Lundgren, “The University of Gothenburg Coordinates Sanctuary for Threatened Scholar” (press release, University of Gothenburg; 9 March 2016).

BELARUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2000, 2005–2007, 2009–2011, 2014–2015.

In 2000, dissident writer Svetlana Alexievich (1962–) went into exile to Germany and France and returned in 2011. Many of her books consisted of oral histories (including about Belarusian women who fought in World War II, the war in Afghanistan, and the 1986 nuclear disaster in Chernobyl). In 2015, she earned the Nobel Prize in Literature. Although President Aleksandr Lukashenko congratulated her with the prize, he later declared that Alexievich's books offended the Russians of Belarus. Her books were not published in Belarus but still on sale there.¹⁹

In the first half of 2015, the information Ministry denied access to 26 websites, including one for criticizing the World War II Victory Day celebration and its participants in an article calling on the authorities to use resources to assist war veterans rather than organize a parade.²⁰

BELGIUM

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

¹⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 83–84; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 111.

¹⁹ Alexander Kan, "Svetlana Alexievich: Exposing Stark Soviet Realities," BBC News (8 October 2015); Michiel Krielaars, "Interview: Svetlana Alexijevitsj," NRC Handelsblad (25 March 2016), C4–5.

²⁰ Alexander Kan, "Svetlana Alexievich: Exposing Stark Soviet Realities," BBC News (8 October 2015); Michiel Krielaars, "Interview: Svetlana Alexijevitsj," NRC Handelsblad (25 March 2016), C4–5.

BELIZE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

BOLIVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2015.

According to the United Nations Human Rights Committee, Bolivia prosecuted only a few of the officials responsible for human rights violations committed under authoritarian governments between 1964 and 1982. A contributing factor was the unwillingness of the armed forces to provide information on the fate of people killed or forcibly disappeared during this period. In March 2015, the deputy solicitor general announced plans to create a truth commission to investigate these crimes, but the government did not yet define its scope. A bill that was presented by victims' organizations to the Plurinational Legislative Assembly to create such a commission was pending at the end of 2015. In July 2015, the Public Ministry announced the creation of a genetic data bank to identify the remains of potential victims of enforced disappearance. It was estimated that around 150 people were forcibly disappeared during the military regimes. The Public Ministry called on the relatives of victims of enforced disappearances to undertake blood tests to establish possible matches.²¹

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2015.

The 20th anniversary of the 1995 Srebrenica genocide in July 2015 shone a spotlight on the limited progress toward justice for war crimes committed in Bosnia. While the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) had convicted 14 people of crimes committed at Srebrenica, and the trials of the alleged architects of the genocide continue in The Hague, progress in the national courts was more limited.

In late 2015, the defense case in the trial of Ratko Mladić, the Bosnian Serb wartime general, was in progress at the ICTY. Mladić was charged with genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, including in Srebrenica. The trial judgment was expected in November 2017. In July 2015, Bosnian ²¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 28, 89; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 119.

Serb wartime President Radovan Karadžić, also on trial at the ICTY on many of the same charges as Mladić, demanded a new trial, citing unfair treatment and prosecution errors. His claim was rejected and his trial continued. Closing arguments were heard in late September 2015. On 24 March 2016, he was found guilty of genocide in Srebrenica, war crimes and crimes against humanity and sentenced to 40 years' imprisonment.

The Bosnian government remained slow to implement the national war crimes strategy, adopted in 2008 to improve the prosecution of domestic war crimes. Prosecutors still lack sufficient capacity and funding, particularly at the district and cantonal levels. According to estimates by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, there was a backlog of more than 1,200 cases in Bosnian courts involving several thousand suspects. By September 2015, the War Crimes Chamber of the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina had reached 15 verdicts (3 acquittals, 9 convictions, and 3 partially acquitting verdicts) at the first instance in relation to 24 defendants, and 18 verdicts (1 acquittal, 15 convictions, and 2 partially acquitting verdicts) at the second instance in relation to 27 defendants, increasing the total number of completed cases to 290 since the court became fully operational in 2005. Throughout 2015, Željka Cvijanović, prime minister of the Republika Srpska entity, repeatedly challenged the legitimacy of the state court and the state prosecutor's office.

In November 2015, the heads of the Serbian and Bosnian governments signed a protocol on co-operation in the search for missing persons. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, over 8,000 people remained missing from the war.²²

See also France, Montenegro, Netherlands, Russia, Serbia.

BRAZIL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2015.

In December 2014, a national truth commission published its final report after more than two years of work investigating human rights violations during military rule (1964–1985). The commission found that violations were “widespread and systematic” and planned by officials at the highest level. The report identified 377 individuals responsible for human rights violations, including torture, killings, and enforced disappearances. The perpetrators of these crimes had been shielded from justice by a 1979 amnesty law. In April 2010, the Supreme Court reaffirmed lower court rulings that the amnesty law barred most prosecutions of state agents involved. Six months later, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that this interpretation violated Brazil's obligations under international law.

²² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 90–91; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 124–126.

Federal prosecutors pursued some cases against former military officers for killings during the military era. Federal courts in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo allowed the prosecution of at least two cases against former military officers for killings during the military era. The Supreme Court, in decisions in 2014 and 2015, temporarily halted both cases, pending its reexamination of the validity of the amnesty law.²³

BULGARIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2002, 2006, 2009, 2012, 2015.

On 27 May 2015, the Defense Ministry announced that it had opened the Communist-era military intelligence archives to research [See also NCH Annual Reports 2014–2015]. On 4 January 2016, the Interior Ministry published information on former agents of the Darzhavna Sigurnost (DS; State Security). The data set contained 134003 recordings on persons examined by the Dossier Commission (the body established in 2006 to publicly disclose former DS members holding positions of influence).²⁴

BURKINA FASO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2004, 2005, 2013, 2015.

General Gilbert Dienderé faced charges in connection with the murder of former President Thomas Sankara (1949–1987), including assassination and possession of a dead body, while in December 2015 an international arrest warrant was also issued against former President Blaise Compaoré (president from 1987 to 2014) for his suspected role in this murder. Authorities said that an extradition request would be sent to Ivory Coast.²⁵

²³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 135.

²⁴ "Bulgaria Publishes Information on Former State Security Agents in Open Data," Novonite.com (4 January 2016).

²⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 99.

BURUNDI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2015.

CAMBODIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2015.

Public statements by Cambodian officials and the start in June 2015 of publication of previously confidential court materials revealed numerous instances of government non-cooperation with the United Nations (UN)-assisted Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), set up to prosecute those most responsible for crimes committed by the Khmer Rouge (1975–1979). While the government allowed a trial of two former leaders of the Khmer Rouge government, Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan, on charges of crimes against humanity, genocide, and war crimes, it refused to carry out orders by a UN Secretary-General-nominated investigating judge to arrest two other former Khmer Rouge leaders, Meas Muth and Im Chem. This violated the 2003 UN-Cambodia agreement establishing the ECCC and continued a long pattern of opposition by Prime Minister Hun Sen to additional prosecutions. The government's non-cooperation seriously undermined possibilities for investigating suspects whom Hun Sen, himself a former Khmer Rouge commander, did not want brought to justice.²⁶

On 13 August 2015, Hun Sen ordered the arrest of Hong Sok Hour, an opposition party senator who the previous day had posted a video clip on Facebook including footage of the Cambodia-Vietnam border and of a badly translated excerpt from the 1979 Cambodia-Vietnam friendship agreement. Disregarding the senator's parliamentary immunity, a "counter-terrorism" security force contingent under the authority of Hun Sen's son-in-law detained him.²⁷

CAMEROON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2012–2014.

In June 2015, writer, historian and politician Dieudonné Enoh Meyomesse ([1954]–) was suddenly released. [See NCH Annual Report 2013.]²⁸

²⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 38, 104; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 155.

²⁷ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 153.

²⁸ Ebby Abramson, "Cameroonian Writer Enoh Meyomesse Finally Freed from Prison," Endangered Scholars Worldwide (20 June 2015).

In July 2015, during a visit to Yaoundé, French President François Hollande promised to open the archives about the suppression of the revolt and the accompanying genocidal massacres on the Bamileke people. It was the first time that a French head of state officially acknowledged France's role in the repression of colonial separatists in Cameroon. Estimates of the death toll range from 100,000 to 400,000 people killed between 1959 and 1964.²⁹

CANADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000, 2002–2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2009, 2012–2015.

In 2008, the government created a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to investigate how between the 1870s and 1996 the government removed about 150,000 aboriginal children from their homes and sent them to church-run schools, where many suffered physical and sexual abuse and about 4,100 died. Its mandate included to hold public hearings where victims could tell their stories, collect records and establish a National Research Centre. The TRC sued the government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper because it transferred only part of the relevant material available in the Library and Archives Canada. On 30 January 2013, the court ordered the government to provide millions of school-related documents to the TRC. In early 2014, no steps were taken for the transfer, which imperiled the submission of the TRC report by June 2015.³⁰

During the 19th and 20th centuries, approximately 150,000 indigenous children were removed from their families and communities and placed in residential schools, where they were forbidden to speak their own languages or practice their culture. Many also suffered physical and sexual abuse. In 2015, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, mandated to provide former students and others affected by this residential school system with an opportunity to share their experiences, found that the government pursued a policy of “cultural genocide” using residential schooling as a central element. According to the commission, the government's goal was to divest itself of its legal and financial obligations to indigenous peoples and to gain control over their land and resources. The commission made a number of recommendations to uphold indigenous peoples' rights and to promote reconciliation. The United Nations Human Rights Committee subsequently endorsed the ²⁹ Index on Censorship (1985, no. 5), 24–25; Achilles Mbembe, “Pouvoir des morts et langage des vivants: Les Errances de la mémoire nationaliste au Cameroun,” Politique Africaine (1986, no. 22), 39–40, 58–60, 68–69; Christina Okello, “Hollande Acknowledges Colonial-era Cameroon Massacres but Critics Want Apology” (5 July 2015).

³⁰ Mark Kennedy (Postmedia News), “Documents Delay Hampers Truth, Reconciliation Process: Residential Schools Scandal; Approval Hasn't Been Granted for Estimated \$14-Million Retrieval Job,” Montreal Gazette (7 February 2014).

recommendations in 2015, but the Stephen Harper government did not accept them. [See also NCH Annual Report 2014.]³¹

See also Netherlands, Rwanda, Sierra Leone.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2009, 2011–2012, 2014–2015.

Impunity remained one of the main challenges in addressing past atrocities. On 30 May 2015, President Catherine Samba-Panza promulgated a law creating a Special Criminal Court, a hybrid court within the national justice system that would focus on grave international crimes committed since 2003, and would include both national and international judges and prosecutors. Government authorities and the United Nations (UN) started preparations to secure funding, technical support and international experts. By the end of 2015, the Special Criminal Court was yet to be operational, due particularly to lack of funding.

The International Criminal Court (ICC) continued investigations into war crimes and crimes against humanity committed since 2012. The ICC's case against the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), a Ugandan rebel movement active in several countries across the region, was given new life in January 2015 when commander Dominic Ongwen surrendered in Obo, in the southeast of the Central African Republic (CAR). The LRA had been operating in the CAR since 2008. Ongwen faced 67 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity for crimes committed in Uganda. The LRA continued to threaten and abduct civilians in eastern parts of the CAR, though with less frequency than in past years.

The ICC trial of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, a Congolese national and former vice president of the Democratic Republic of Congo accused of failing to control his militia—allegedly implicated in murder, rape, and pillage in Bangui in 2002 and 2003—rested at the end of 2014, and during 2015 the judges deliberated on the evidence. On 21 March 2016, he was convicted for crimes against humanity and war crimes. A second ICC trial against Bemba and three accomplices on charges of tampering with witnesses opened in September 2015.³²

³¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 108; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 159.

³² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22, 122; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 167–168.

See also Uganda.

CHAD

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012, 2015.

On 20 July 2015, the trial of former Chadian President Hissène Habré opened at the Extraordinary African Chambers in Senegal (where he had lived in exile since 1990) on charges of crimes against humanity, torture and war crimes committed between 1982 and 1990 when he ruled Chad. This was the first time that an African court prosecuted a former African president under the principle of universal jurisdiction. Prosecutors presented archives from the Directorate of Documentation and Security (the secret police), found in abandoned offices, that recorded the names of 12,321 prisoners, interrogation reports and the deaths in detention of more than 1,200 people.

On 25 March 2015, twenty former state security agents connected to Habré's regime were convicted of torture by the Chadian Criminal Court; the court acquitted four of the accused and found the Chadian state liable for the defendants' actions. The defendants and the state were ordered to pay compensation of 75 billion CFA francs (US$ 125 million) to the 7,000 civil parties. In 2014 the Chadian authorities had declined to transfer these suspects to the Extraordinary African Chambers in Senegal, or to allow representatives of the Chambers to interview them in Chad.³³

CHILE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2015.

In March 2015, the chief justice reported that 1,056 cases of human rights violations committed during military rule (1973–1990) were under investigation, 112 of them for torture. According to the Interior Ministry's human rights program, as of December 2015, 344 individuals had received final sentences for human rights violations, including killings and enforced disappearances; 117 were serving prison sentences. While some individuals convicted of extrajudicial executions initially received long prison sentences, the Supreme Court's criminal chamber in many cases reduced the penalties on final appeal on the basis that the time elapsed since the crime justified a lesser, or even a non-custodial, sentence. Two of the five judges on the panel consistently dissented from this position. In addition, the prison service and appeals courts granted benefits such as day release and parole to individuals convicted of crimes against humanity, which the Supreme Court has upheld. No progress was made in overturning the 1978 Amnesty Law.

³³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 114, 315; Marlise Simons, "Trial of Chad's Ex-President Brings Harrowing Accounts of Abuse," New York Times (31 December 2015).

Victims' organizations condemned the slow progress in establishing the truth about the thousands of victims of enforced disappearance. Information and documentation gathered by the Valech Commission on politically motivated torture and imprisonment during the Augusto Pinochet era (1973–1990) remained classified as confidential, even from the judiciary, and therefore secret for 50 years and unavailable to those seeking justice for the victims. In October 2015, after a 40-day hunger strike by some victims of torture, a law was passed granting early economic reparation to victims of torture and political imprisonment. In July 2015, ten former military officers were charged with the kidnapping and killing of the singer and political activist Víctor Jara in 1973.

General Manuel Contreras, who commanded Pinochet's secret police, the DINA, died in a military hospital in August 2015. Contreras was responsible for summary executions, enforced disappearances, and torture that claimed thousands of victims during the early years of the dictatorship. At the time of his death, he was serving accumulated sentences of 529 years, and other cases against him were pending.

In September 2015, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that Chile had denied an effective remedy to twelve people sentenced by a military tribunal between 1974 and 1975. The case against them had not been quashed, despite evidence that their confessions were extracted under torture, and their allegations of torture had not been investigated.³⁴

CHINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2015.

In 2015, Yang Jisheng (1940–), author of Tombstone: The Great Chinese Famine, 1958–1962 (Chinese 2008; English 2012), was forced to resign as deputy editor of the liberal historical journal Yanhuang Chunqiu after the State Administration of Press, Publication, Radio, Film and Television criticized it for publishing dozens of articles that were “against the regulations.” In March 2016, Yang was prohibited from traveling to the United States to receive a journalistic award. [See also NCH Annual Report

³⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 28, 115–116; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 169–170.

2013.]³⁵

On 19 January 2015, the State Internet Information Office announced that it had shut down 133 accounts on the social media site Weixin—whose international version is known as WeChat—that were disseminating information that was “distorting history of the Communist Party and national history.”³⁶

On 10 July 2015, a group of twenty tourists visiting sites of ancient China, including the Genghis Khan Mausoleum at Ordos, was arrested by police at Ordos airport in Inner Mongolia and deported after some days of detention. In their hotel, they had watched a BBC documentary about Genghis Khan, (1162–1227), the founder of the Mongol state, but Chinese officials mistook it for a terrorist video.³⁷

In August 2015, the Norwegian Harald Bøckman (1945–), a historian, translator and China expert from the University of Oslo, was denied a visa to China, where he was to participate in the 22nd International Congress of Historical Sciences in Jinan, Shandong. Bøckman had also been refused a visa during the 2008 Olympics. A former Marxist, Bøckman had been an outspoken critic of the Chinese government on several occasions.³⁸

On 8 October 2015, writer Dolma Kyab (pen-name Lobsang Kelsang Gyatso; Chinese names: Zhou Shique and Zhou Ma Jia) (1976–), a history teacher at a middle school in Lhasa and a song writer, was released. [See NCH Annual Reports 2006, 2008.]³⁹

On 3 September 2015, the Chinese government marked the 70th anniversary of the end of World War II with a massive parade in Beijing. Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir, who was wanted by the International Criminal Court for genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, attended at ³⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 119; Wordt Vervolgd (April 2016), 5.

³⁶ Freedom House, Freedom on the Net 2015 (Washington: Freedom House, 2015), 199; Laura He, “China Probes College Textbooks for ‘Western Values’,” Market Watch (17 March 2015); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 178; Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 118.

³⁷ “China Tour Arrests Were ‘Misunderstanding over Documentary’,” BBC News (18 July 2015).

³⁸ “Norwegian Researcher Denied Visa to China,” The Nordic Page (23 August 2015); “Lars Harald Bøckman,” Wikipedia (September 2015); “The Norwegian China Scholar and Historian Harald Bockman Is Denied a Visa to China, where He Should Participate in the World Congress for Historians in Jinan,” Norway Today (22 July 2008); Norwegian PEN, “Norwegian Scholar Harald Bøckman Refused Visa to China” (22 July 2008).

³⁹ PEN, China: Dolma Kyab Released yet Indicates Chinese Repression of Tibetan Free Speech (8 October 2015).

Beijing's invitation.⁴⁰

See also Japan, Taiwan, Vietnam.

COLOMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2004, 2006–2015.

In November 2014, the Inter-American Court on Human Rights condemned Colombia for enforced disappearances committed by military troops after the recapture of the Palace of Justice in 1985. On 6 November 2015, in a ceremony ordered by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, President Juan Manuel Santos assumed responsibility and asked forgiveness for the state's role in the enforced disappearance of ten people, the enforced disappearance and extrajudicial execution of an eleventh person, and the torture of several other individuals. These crimes occurred after security forces stormed the Palace of Justice in Bogotá in November 1985 where people were being held hostage by the M-19 guerrilla group. Some hundred people died in the assault. Very few of those alleged to have been responsible for these crimes had been held to account. On 16 December 2015, the Supreme Court overturned the conviction of retired colonel Luis Alfonso Plazas Vega who in 2010 had been sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment for the crime of enforced disappearance in relation to this case.⁴¹

Between 2002 and 2008, army brigades across Colombia routinely executed civilians. Under pressure from superiors to show "positive" results and boost body counts in their war against guerrillas, soldiers and officers abducted victims or lured them to remote locations under false pretenses—such as with promises of work—and killed them, placed weapons on their lifeless bodies, and then reported them as enemy combatants killed in action. There has been a dramatic reduction in cases of alleged unlawful killings attributed to security forces since 2009, though credible reports of some new cases continued to emerge. The government did not keep statistics for "false-positives" as a category of crime distinct from other types of unlawful killings. However, as of May 2015, the Attorney General's Office was investigating more than 3,700 unlawful killings allegedly committed by state agents between 2002 and 2008, and had obtained convictions for over 800 of them. Authorities failed to prosecute senior army officers involved in the killings and instead have promoted many of them through the military ranks. In June and October 2015, the Attorney General's Office summoned a total of nine generals, including former army commander Mario Montoya, to testify on their alleged role in false-positive cases. As of late 2015, no charges had yet been brought against any of them. In July 2015, the government replaced the army's top commander, General Lasprilla Villamizar, who commanded a brigade allegedly responsible for 48 extrajudicial killings. General Rodríguez Barragan, however, continued to command the armed forces despite strong evidence implicating him in false-positive killings.⁴²

⁴⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 187.

⁴¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 32, 125; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 194.

Peace talks between the government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia, FARC), initiated in 2012, made significant progress in 2015. On 4 June 2015, the two sides also announced plans for a truth commission to carry out non-judicial investigations of gross human rights violations and serious violations of international humanitarian law committed during the armed conflict (1948–2012). The courts would not be able to use any information uncovered by the commission, however. This could undermine the ability of the judiciary to prosecute crimes under international law.

On 23 September 2015, the two sides announced that an agreement had been reached on transitional justice and that a peace deal would be signed by March 2016. Its central component was a Special Jurisdiction for Peace, which would consist of a tribunal and special courts with jurisdiction over those directly or indirectly involved in the conflict implicated in “serious human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law.” Those who denied responsibility for grave crimes, if found guilty, would face up to twenty years’ imprisonment. Those who admitted responsibility would receive non-custodial sentences of between five and eight years’ “effective restriction of freedoms.” Other parties to the armed conflict would also benefit from the agreement, likely including members of the armed forces responsible for false-positive cases (See item above). By proposing sanctions that did not appear to be proportionate to the severity of crimes under international law, Colombia may be failing to comply with its obligation under international law to prevent and punish such crimes. An Amnesty Law that would benefit those accused of “political and related crimes” was proposed. Although a definition of what constituted “related crimes” had yet to be agreed, those convicted of grave crimes would be excluded.

On 17 October 2015, the two sides reached agreement on a mechanism to locate and recover the remains of many of those—both civilians and combatants—still missing as a result of the conflict. The International Committee of the Red Cross estimated that 220,000 people were killed and 70,000 people went missing during the armed conflict between the government and rebel groups.

The Office of the Prosecutor (OTP) of the International Criminal Court (ICC) continued to monitor Colombian investigations of crimes that could fall within the ICC’s jurisdiction. In November 2015, ⁴² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 188, 190–191.

the OTP reported that it would “carefully review and analyse the provisions of the agreement [with the FARC], in particular with respect to the restrictions of liberty in special conditions and the inclusion of state agents.”⁴³

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2000, 2003–2015.

Mathieu Ngudjolo, the first defendant to be acquitted by the International Criminal Court (ICC), returned to Congo on 11 May 2015. On 2 September 2015, the ICC opened the trial of Bosco Ntaganda, who faced eighteen counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity allegedly committed in Ituri province in 2002–2003. He faced no charges for alleged crimes later committed in North Kivu province. The ICC prosecutor said that her office was continuing investigations in Congo. On 19 December, two Congolese rebel leaders convicted at the ICC, Germain Katanga and Thomas Lubanga, were returned to Congo to serve the remainder of their ICC sentences in Kinshasa. Katanga faced national war crimes charges in Congo that were filed against him before he was transferred to the ICC.

From 27 April to 2 May 2015, the Congolese Ministry of Justice and Human Rights convened a large conference in Kinshasa to evaluate its judicial reform program and recommend priority reforms that should be implemented, including the establishment of specialized mixed chambers to prosecute war crimes and crimes against humanity committed since the 1990s.

In August 2015, the civilian Appeals Court in Lubumbashi opened a trial against 34 members of the Luba and Batwa communities in northern Katanga for crimes against humanity and genocide. It was the first trial for international crimes to take place before civil courts in the country. Patriotic Resistance Front in Ituri (FRPI) leader Justin Banaloki, known as Cobra Matata, was arrested in Bunia on 2 January 2015 and charged with war crimes and crimes against humanity. In late 2015, he had not been brought to trial. Ntabo Ntaberi Sheka, wanted on a Congolese arrest warrant for crimes against humanity for the mass rape of nearly 400 people in 2010, remained at large in late 2015. His troops continued to commit serious abuses. No progress was made in bringing to justice those responsible for the summary executions of at least 51 young men and boys and the enforced disappearance of 33 others during a police campaign in Kinshasa, known as Operation Likofi, from November 2013 to ⁴³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 32, 122–123; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 188, 191, 193–194; Julia Symmes Cobb, “As Peace Talks Advance, Colombia Struggles to Find its Missing,” Reuters (28 July 2015); “Colombia and FARC Rebels Reach Deal on Missing People,” Aljazeera (18 October 2015).

February 2014, or for summary executions during demonstrations in January 2015. The government failed to exhume the mass grave in Maluku, a rural area about 80 kilometers from Kinshasa, where it admitted burying 421 bodies on 19 March. On 5 June 2015, family members of those forcibly disappeared or executed by Congolese security forces during Operation Likofi and the January demonstrations filed a public complaint with the national prosecutor requesting exhumation.

The National Assembly and the Senate adopted legislation implementing the Rome Statute of the ICC in June and November 2015 respectively. The final bill, promulgated into law on 2 January 2016, contained the death penalty for war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.⁴⁴

See also Central African Republic, Gabon.

CONGO (Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

See Gabon.

COSTA RICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

CÔTE D’IVOIRE

See Ivory Coast.

⁴⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22, 139; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 210–213.

CROATIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2001, 2003–2013, 2015.

In February 2015, the International Court of Justice cleared Serbia and Croatia of mutual claims of genocide, finding that neither Serbia nor Croatia had established the necessary intent on the part of the other to commit genocide during the conflict in 1991–1995. In May 2015, the Croatian Parliament passed the Law on the rights of victims of sexual violence in war: it provided survivors of wartime sexual violence with Croatian citizenship, a lump-sum compensation amounting to €13,000 and a monthly allowance amounting to €328. In addition to the payments, survivors would be entitled to health care, medical rehabilitation and psychological support. The law entered into force in June with the first allowances due to be paid out in January 2016.

However, Croatia did not yet adopt a comprehensive legislative framework that would regulate the status of, and access to reparation for, all civilian victims of war crimes. It did not ratify the 2006 International Convention against Enforced Disappearances nor did it adopt a law on missing persons. In the absence of these legal instruments, relatives of the 1,600 missing persons in Croatia were denied access to justice and reparations.⁴⁵

CUBA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2002, 2006, 2010–2012, 2015.

In 2013, Carlos Eire (1951–), born in Cuba but gone into exile in the United States with his parents in 1962, professor of history and religion at Yale University specialized in medieval and early modern Europe, published his youth memoirs, Snow in Havana, for which he won the National Book Award for non-fiction. As a result, he was declared an “enemy of the nation” in Cuba, unable to return to his native country.⁴⁶

See also Spain.

⁴⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 131–132.

⁴⁶ Guus Valk, “Waarom is Obama toch zo lief voor Castro?” (Interview with Carlos Eire), NRC Handelsblad (21 March 2016), 14–15.

CYPRUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2005, 2008–2011, 2013, 2015.

Between January and August 2015, the Committee of Missing Persons in Cyprus (CMP) exhumed the remains of 111 people, bringing the total number of exhumations since 2006 to 1061. Between August 2006 and January 2015, the remains of 625 missing individuals (476 Greek Cypriots and 149 Turkish Cypriots) had been identified and restituted to their families. On 23 February 2016, Presidential Commissioner for Humanitarian Issues and Overseas Cypriots, Photis Photiou, said that there was information in Red Cross archives relating to the battles that took place during the Turkish invasion of 1974, particularly around Kyrenia, on the northern coast. The fate of approximately two-thirds of missing persons (nearly 1,500) had not yet been established. In March 2016, the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers called upon the Turkish authorities to examine the reports and military archives in their possession containing information on burial sites, including of relocated remains, and to transmit them to the CMP. It also asked Turkey to give unhindered access to the CMP to all possible military zones located in the Turkish-occupied part of Cyprus.

Following the 2001 decision in the case “Cyprus versus Turkey,” the European Court of Human Rights ordered Turkey on 12 May 2014 to pay €90 million in compensation for invading the northern part of Cyprus in 1974. Additional compensation had been ordered in respect of applicants in the “Varnava and others versus Turkey” case. The Council of Europe called upon Turkey to pay without delay the sums awarded.⁴⁷

CZECH REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2010, 2013–2015.

On 18 February 2015, police reported that historian Jiří Fiedler (1935–2014) and his wife Dagmar (1939–2014) [see NCH Annual Report 2015] were killed by Dalibor C. ([1986–]) during a robbery. C. was apprehended after trying to sell Fiedler's jewelry, books and other items at a pawnshop. C. had contacted Fiedler through the Jewish Museum where he asked for help with mapping a Jewish cemetery in northern Moravia. He had three meetings with Fiedler and then came for the fourth time for the robbery and murder. He stabbed the victims several times and put on the gas stove after the crime but ⁴⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 134; “Cyprus to Investigate Red Cross Archives on Missing,” In-Cyprus (23 February 2016); “Turkey Asked to Provide Archive Info on Missing,” In-Cyprus (11 March 2016); European Court of Human Rights, Cyprus versus Turkey (2001); European Court of Human Rights, Varnava versus Turkey (2009).

the flat did not explode. He faced life imprisonment.⁴⁸

In March 2016, the Czech Institute for the Study of Totalitarian Regimes (ÚSTR) announced that parts (300,000 scanned documents) of the Archive of Security Bodies (ABS) (including archives of the security bodies of the Interior Ministry and of the Communist-era secret police StB) would be made available online. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]⁴⁹

⁴⁸ Helen Epstein & Wilma Iggers, eds., Archivist on a Bicycle: Jiří Fiedler (e-book; Plunkett Lake Press, 2015); JTA, "Police Bust Robber in Murder of Czech Jewish Historian," Forward (20 February 2015); ČTK, "Respekt: Prague Jewish Historian Fiedler Killed by Thief," Prague Monitor (25 February 2015).

⁴⁹ "Czechs May See Communist Secret Service Archives Data Online," České noviny (9 March 2016).

DENMARK

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2007, 2013.

In early April 2016, Clemens Räthel, a Swedish-German theater historian at Humboldt University, Berlin, and two colleagues, sent a letter to the Danish Minister of Culture, Bertel Haarder, and to the director of Det Kongelige Teater (the Royal Danish Theater, founded 1748), Morten Hesseldahl, protesting against plans to close the theater archives (containing documents from figures such as Ludvig Holberg [1684–1754], Adam Oehlenschläger [1779–1850], Henrik Ibsen [1828–1906] and August Bournonville [1805–1879]) and transfer them to the National Library. They also protested against plans to digitize the archives which would considerably slow down access during a transition period.⁵⁰

DJIBOUTI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

⁵⁰ Nils Thorsen, "Tyske teaterfolk om dansk spareøvelse: I lukker en af Europas vigtigste kulturinstitutioner," Politiken (7 April 2016); Anja Hansen, personal communication (8 April 2016).

ECUADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2007, 2009–2015.

Progress was slow on efforts to hold Ecuadorian officials to account for human rights violations committed from 1984 to 2008, the period covered by a truth commission set up by the Rafael Correa administration. In 2010, a special prosecutorial unit was formed to investigate 118 cases of abuse involving 456 victims, including 68 victims of extrajudicial execution and seventeen of enforced disappearance. In late 2015, prosecutors had brought charges in seven cases, including two in which suspects were convicted, and the National Court of Justice was set to begin hearing Ecuador's first-ever trial for crimes against humanity.⁵¹

EGYPT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2001, 2003, 2006–2007, 2010–2015.

In 2 July 2015, a French sociology student (known as “Fanny”) from the School for Advanced Studies in the Social Sciences (EHESS) in Paris was deported after being arrested by a security forces, in apparent relation to her research on the 6 April youth movement. She had interviewed members of the movement in the Nile Delta city of Damietta for her master's degree. The 6 April movement was a key pro-democratic protest force during the 25 January Revolution of 2011 and subsequent demonstrations. Following a crackdown on activism after the July 2013 regime change, however, the movement was driven underground and in 2014 it was banned.⁵²

The authorities failed to conduct effective, independent and impartial investigations into most incidents of human rights violations, including the repeated use of excessive force by security forces that resulted in the deaths of hundreds of protesters since July 2013 (when former President Mohamed Morsy was ousted from power). Investigations by the Public Prosecution into protests and incidents of political violence instead focused on alleged abuses by the authorities' opponents and critics. Courts held a small number of members of the security forces responsible for unlawful killings, in cases arising from several incidents that had attracted wide national and international condemnation.

In November 2015, former President Hosni Mubarak and several of his former senior security officials were retried by the Court of Cassation on charges of orchestrating a deadly crackdown on protesters during the 25 January Revolution of 2011. The trial was ongoing at the end of 2015.

⁵¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 223.

⁵² Emil Nader, “French Student Arrested, Deported from Egypt for Researching 6 April,” Daily News Egypt (7 July 2015).

In late 2015, no government official or member of the security forces had been charged for the killing of at least 817 protesters in Cairo's Rab'a al-Adawiya Square on 14 August 2013—a likely crime against humanity. On 13 August 2015, a court halved a 10-year prison sentence handed to a police officer who participated in the tear gas suffocation of 37 people whom police had arrested from Rab'a Square.⁵³

EL SALVADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2015.

The 1993 Amnesty Law remained in place, denying access to justice and reparations to victims of the human rights violations committed during the armed conflict (1980–1992). In April 2015, former General and Defense Minister Eugenio Vides Casanova was deported from the United States after an immigration judge in Florida ruled in 2012 that he should be sent back to El Salvador for his role in human rights violations committed by the armed forces during the armed conflict. By the end of 2015, there was no public information suggesting that Vides was facing any legal proceeding.

In March 2015, the Human Rights Ombudsman called upon the authorities to overcome the prevalent impunity for human rights violations during the armed conflict. The Ombudsman also called on the Legislative Assembly to deprive the Amnesty Law of its legal effects and urged the Attorney General's Office to effectively investigate victims' claims.

During the same month, more than a year after a ruling by the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice ordering the Attorney General's Office to thoroughly investigate the 1981 San Francisco Angulo massacre, in which 45 people were killed allegedly by members of the army, the Constitutional Chamber required the Attorney General to report the status of the investigation. Almost two months later, the Attorney General submitted a report, followed by a second in July after the Constitutional Chamber requested additional details. By the end of 2015, no decision had been issued by the Constitutional Chamber. In July 2015, the Constitutional Chamber established the responsibility of the armed forces in the enforced disappearance of eleven people in the context of the 1982 military "Cleaning Operation." Its ruling required the National Defense Ministry to provide information about the operation and in particular the fate and whereabouts of the victims. The Constitutional Chamber requested the Attorney General's Office to immediately start an investigation.⁵⁴

⁵³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 56, 148; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 228.

See also United States.

ERITREA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

A United Nations report mentioned that one of Eritrea's historical taboos was the G-15, a group of fifteen former members of the ruling People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ) opposing the policy of President Isaias Afewerki of postponing elections. Eleven of them were imprisoned and three exiled. One left the group and rejoined the government. Conscripts in the army were reportedly brainwashed often with political teaching on the history of Eritrea, including the independence struggle, aimed at developing a sense of patriotism.⁵⁵

ESTONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2010, 2015.

ETHIOPIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2011, 2015.

In January 2015, the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) charged a father and his three sons with terrorism for offending the late former Prime Minister and TPLF chairman (1989–) Meles Zenawi. They had said that they were happy about his death.⁵⁶

⁵⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 151.

⁵⁵ United Nations Human Rights Council, Report of the Detailed Findings of the Commission of Inquiry on Human Rights in Eritrea (A/HRC/29/CRP.1; 5 June 2015), paragraphs 478, 490, 1292, 1423.

⁵⁶ The Ethiopia Observatory, "TPLF Charges Father & 3 Sons with Terrorism for Bad-Mouthing Late Dictator Meles Zenawi: Spirit of North Korea upon Ethiopia!" (5 January 2015).

In February 2016, an Oromo singer [name unknown], living in exile since early 2016, reported that he had been arrested three times for his songs focusing on Oromo history and culture.⁵⁷

⁵⁷ Human Rights Watch, "Crackdown on Protests Continues in Oromia," Ifex News (22 February 2016).

FIJI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006, 2010.

FINLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

See Russia.

FRANCE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1999, 2001–2009, 2011–2014.

When the Nazis withdrew from France, they burned many of their archives. Other files, including those on “dangerous members of the resistance,” had already been sent to Berlin. Partisan groups stole some Gestapo files during and after the liberation.⁵⁸

In 2010, far-right leader Marine Le Pen (1968–) said at a rally of her political party Front National in Lyons that Muslims using the streets to pray because mosques were overflowing was an “occupation” of French territory, thereby alluding to the Nazi occupation of France (1940–44). In 2011, the case was closed. An anti-racism group filed a new complaint, which led to a judicial inquiry in 2012. On 2 July 2013, Le Pen lost her immunity from prosecution as a European Parliament member, as a result of which she could face criminal charges in France for incitement to discrimination, violence or hatred toward a group of people because of their religious affiliation. In 2014, the Lyons court of appeal dropped the case but it was revived by anti-racism groups who made a civil complaint. On 20 October 2015, Le Pen appeared in court. The prosecutor argued that she had referred to a specific number of persons and not to the whole Muslim community. In December 2015, she was acquitted of charges of inciting hatred. In 2011, praying in the streets was banned in Paris in response to growing far-right protests. Also in 2011, France became the first European Union state to ban public wearing of the face-covering Islamic veil (niqab). [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

⁵⁸ François-Guillaume Lorrain, “Gestapo: Les dossiers les plus intéressants ont disparu, Fonds incomplet, dossiers éparpillés, accès entravé ; Les historiens se battent pour étudier sereinement les coulisses de l'Occupation. Interview croisée,” Le Point (13 August 2015).

On 6 April 2016, Jean-Marie Le Pen, her father, was fined for repeating his statement that the gas chambers were “a detail” in the history of World War II. [See also NCH Annual Report 1998.]⁵⁹

In April 2015, the book Code noir (2012; Black Code) by Jean-François Niort, a progressive historian of law at the Université des Antilles in Guadeloupe and member of the scientific council of Mémorial ACTe (Memorial to Slavery & the Slave Trade; Centre caribéen d’expressions et de mémoire de la traite et de l’esclavage; memorial-acte.fr) became the object of a controversy. Dannick Zandronis, director of the editorial board of the nationalist website caraibcreolenews (CCN), Garcin Malsa, President of the Mouvement international pour les réparations de l’esclavage (International Movement for Slavery Reparations), and other representatives of the groups COSE, LKP, CIPN, MIR, and FKNG accused Niort of racism, “revisionism” and “negationism,” of being an agent of French colonialism and of defending the Code noir; Niort supposedly denied the horror of slavery and its character as a crime against humanity. Zandronis also called upon Niort, “a resident from France,” to leave Guadeloupe. Seventeen historians, led by Jean-Pierre Sainton—historian at the Université des Antilles and founding director of the Centre guadeloupéen d’histoire sociale et politique—criticized the accusation. In his interpretation of the Code noir, Niort had observed a mix of legal reification of slaves (they were property) and legal recognition of their humanity (they had certain choices, could reason and marry, convert to a religion and be free).⁶⁰

On 24 March 2016, while the judgment of Radovan Karadžić was being issued, Security officials of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) arrested and detained French journalist Florence Hartmann. A former ICTY press officer, she published a memoir when she left, entitled Paix et châtime (Peace and punishment). The book referred to confidential decisions of the ICTY Appeals Chamber to classify as “confidential” the documents created by the Supreme Defense Council of Serbia which Serbia supplied to the ICTY during the trial of Slobodan Milošević, calling them “improper.” She was sued, tried and convicted of contempt of court and sentenced to pay a €7,000 fine. When she failed to pay the fine, the ICTY converted the sentence into a week’s imprisonment (of which she served five). France had refused requests from the ICTY to arrest

⁵⁹ BBC News (1 June 2013); “France: Marine Le Pen Goes on Trial over Muslim Remarks,” BBC News (20 October 2015); Keesings historisch archief (2013), 327; “National Front Leader Le Pen Acquitted of Inciting Hatred,” BBC News (15 December 2015). “Boete Le Pen (87) voor futiliseren Holocaust,” NRC Handelsblad (7 April 2016).

⁶⁰ Jean-François Niort, “Ma réponse aux calomnieurs et mon message aux Guadeloupéens: Réponse scientifique et citoyenne aux calomnieurs et message aux Guadeloupéens,” including the Communiqué of the Guadeloupe Section of the Ligue des droits de L’homme of 4 April 2015; Julien Babel, “La polémique autour du livre de Jean- François Niort continue” (10 April 2015); Jacky Dahomay, “Dénonçons la fatwa contre Jean-François Niort” (6 April 2015); Jean-Luc Bonniol, “Mémoire de l’esclavage : Retour sur l’affaire Jean-François Niort,” (23 April 2015).

Hartmann for non-payment of the fine. The classification on the documents was later removed.⁶¹

See also Algeria, Cameroon, Egypt, Gabon, Morocco, Panama, Rwanda, Tunisia.

⁶¹ William Schabas, "The Yugoslavia Tribunal also Engages in Debt Collection," PhD Studies in Human Rights (25 March 2016); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of March 2016 (April 2016).

GABON

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

Journalists and opponents of the President Ali Bongo Ondimba (in power since 2009) claimed that he was born in Congo or Nigeria. A French court allowed Bongo's half-sister to see details of his birth certificate held in the archives of French Equatorial Africa, Nantes, France, which said that he was born in 1959 in Brazzaville, Congo (then French Equatorial Africa). Bongo's opponents claimed that he was adopted and, being of foreign origin, ineligible for re-election in 2016 because the constitution banned people who had adopted the Gabonese nationality from standing for president. Bongo challenged the validity of the document.⁶²

GAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

In January 2015, shortly after the attempted coup of 2014, Gambian authorities forcibly disappeared dozens of friends and relatives of the alleged coup plotters. They were held incommunicado, deprived of contact with family, and denied access to lawyers for up to seven months. The government refused to acknowledge the whereabouts or even the detention of many of them. A dozen of these family members were released as part of presidential pardons announced on 22 July 2015, the anniversary of President's Yahya Jammeh's 1994 coup. In the past decade, Gambian security forces had been implicated in dozens of enforced disappearances.⁶³

GEORGIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2003, 2010–2012, 2014.

The International Criminal Court prosecutor requested the court's judges to authorize an investigation into alleged crimes committed during the 2008 conflict between Georgia and Russia, including by ⁶² "Gabon: une plainte sur l'acte de naissance d'Ali Bongo classée sans suite," Radio France International (29 February 2016); "French Court Allows Viewing of Gabon President Ali Bongo's Birth Certificate," Radio France International (12 November 2015).

⁶³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 161; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 269.

South Ossetian forces (in some cases, with the possible participation of Russian forces) and also by Georgian forces.⁶⁴

GERMANY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–2000, 2003, 2006–2013, 2015.

On 21 May 2015, the Federal Court of Justice partially overturned the decision of the Frankfurt Higher Regional Court in the case of Rwandan citizen Onesphore Rwabukombe, who was sentenced in 2014 to 14 years' imprisonment for aiding the commission of a massacre at the Kiziguro church compound. It was found on appeal that Rwabukombe had actively been involved in the murder of 450 people at the Kiziguro church, and that his previous sentence was too lenient. The case was referred back to a lower court in Frankfurt for retrial.

On 28 September 2015, the Higher Regional Court in Stuttgart sentenced Rwandan leaders of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR) Ignace Murwanashyaka and Straton Musoni to 13 and 8 years' imprisonment respectively. They were both found guilty of leadership of a foreign terrorist group, while Murwanashyaka was additionally convicted of aiding in war crimes. It was the first trial based on the 2002 Code of Crimes against International Law. On 5 December 2014, the Higher Regional Court in Düsseldorf had convicted three German citizens, originally from Rwanda, for their support to the FDLR.⁶⁵

See also Denmark, France, Greece, Hungary, Netherlands, Poland, Russia, Ukraine.

GHANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2004–2008.

⁶⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 277.

⁶⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 166.

GREECE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2004–2011, 2013–2015.

On 28 August 2014, the parliament passed a new antiracist law that, among others, criminalized denial of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, provided they were recognized as such by international courts or the Greek parliament. A group of Greek historians warned that such a blanket criminalization could lead to the prosecution of scholars. In March 2015, a prosecutor in Rethymno, Crete, decided to indict German historian Heinz Richter ([1940–]) (formerly professor of Greek and Cypriot modern history at the University of Mannheim) over a book he wrote on the May 1941 battle of Crete on the grounds that it constituted a “denial of the crimes of Nazism against the Cretan people with derogatory content.” The trial started on 2 September 2015. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.] In December 2015, the Academy of Athens criticized the decision to sue Richter. On 10 February 2016, Richter was cleared of the charge.

The book, Operation Mercury: The Invasion of Crete (2011) described the seizure of Crete by German paratroopers in May 1941 and debunked (inter alia) some myths about resistance on Crete during World War II. Richter also reportedly belittled the Cretan resistance, describing it as “dirty” (meaning the participants in the war no longer obeyed the The Hague rules of war). The controversy had started when a University of Crete ceremony awarding a honorary doctorate to Richter in 2014 was boycotted by protesters, led by former chief of the National Defense General Staff Manousos Paragioudakis.⁶⁶

On 14 December 2015, the Supreme Court prosecutor’s office submitted to parliament two lawsuits (filed by New Democracy cadre and lawyer Failos Kranidiotis, and navy officer Panayiotis Stamatis) against Education Minister Nikos Filis to see whether he should be prosecuted under the 2014 antiracism law. Speaking on a television show in early November, Filis had said that the slaughter of tens of thousands of Black Sea Greeks (Pontic Greeks) by Turks in 1914–1923 was a case of ethnic cleansing rather than genocide. Greece had recognized the massacres as genocide in 1994 and Filis’s comments had prompted several protest rallies by members of the Pontic community.⁶⁷

⁶⁶ Antonis Liakos, personal communication (23 March 2015); Damian Mac Con Uladh, personal communication (23 March 2015); Σε δίκη παραπέμπει τον καθηγητή Χ. Ρίχτερ ο εισαγγελέας Ρεθύμνο (18 March 2015); Lina Giannarou, “History on Trial,” Ekathimerini.com (10 December 2015); “German Historian Heinz Richter Cleared of Charges,” Ekathimerini.com (10 February 2016).

⁶⁷ “Greek Education Minister Sued over Genocide Comment,” Ekathimerini.com (14 December 2015).¹

GRENADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2015.

Former Guatemalan head of state Efraín Ríos Montt was found guilty in May 2013 of genocide and crimes against humanity. He was sentenced to 80 years' imprisonment, but several days later the Constitutional Court overturned the verdict on procedural grounds. Ríos Montt had led a military government from 1982 to 1983 when the military carried out hundreds of massacres of unarmed civilians. In August 2015, a trial court declared Ríos Montt mentally unfit for retrial, ruling instead that he should be represented by his lawyers in a special closed-door proceeding that was scheduled to start in January 2016. In October 2015, an appellate court rejected a two-year old petition by Ríos Montt's attorneys to apply a 1986 amnesty decree that would put an end to his prosecution. The court ruled that the decree, applicable to "all political and related common crimes" committed between March 1982 and January 1986, did not apply to genocide and crimes against humanity. In May 2014, the Congress passed a resolution denying that acts of genocide had been committed during the country's civil war (1960–1996), despite findings to the contrary by a United Nations-sponsored Truth Commission in 1999. In addition to pursuing the case against Ríos Montt, the Attorney General's Office has, in recent years, convicted several other former members of security forces for human rights crimes committed during the war. Five members of the army's special forces received lengthy sentences for their role in the 1982 Dos Erres massacre of more than 250 people, and former National Police Chief Héctor Bol de la Cruz received a 40-year sentence for ordering the disappearance of a student activist in 1984.

In July 2014, Felipe Solano Barillas became the first ex-guerrilla to be convicted in connection with atrocities committed during the civil war. Found guilty of ordering the massacre of 22 residents of the town of El Aguacate in 1988, he was sentenced to 90 years' imprisonment. In January 2015, Pedro Garcia Arredondo, former chief detective of the now-defunct National Police, was sentenced to 90 years' imprisonment for a raid on the Spanish embassy in 1980 in which 37 people burned to death. The Guatemalan judiciary inaugurated a third "high-risk court" in October 2015 to hear cases of grave crimes, including genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. The new court was opened to help resolve cases more quickly and effectively, and ease the workload of the two existing high-risk courts.

Civil society organizations continued to push for the approval of Law 3590, which would create a National Commission for the Search for Victims of Enforced Disappearance and Other Forms of Disappearance. The law was first presented before Congress in 2006.⁶⁸

See also Spain.

GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2015.

Since 2010, the judiciary has opened several investigations into serious violations by security forces, including the 2007 killing of some 130 unarmed demonstrators, the 2009 massacre and rape of opposition supporters in a Conakry stadium (see below); the 2010 torture of members of the political opposition; the 2012 killing of six men in the southeastern village of Zogota; and the 2013 killing of demonstrators protesting the delay in holding parliamentary elections. In 2015, investigative judges took steps to move most of these investigations forward, but their efforts were hampered by the failure of some members of the army, gendarmerie, and police to respond to judicial summons. At the end of 2015, no trials had taken place.

More than six years on, a domestic investigation continued into the September 2009 massacre of opposition supporters at a rally in Conakry, largely by members of the elite Presidential Guard. Security force members were implicated in the killing of some 150 people and rape of over 100 women during military rule under Moussa Dadis Camara. Since legal proceedings began in 2010, the panel of judges appointed to investigate the massacre had made important strides, having interviewed more than 400 victims and charged 14 suspects, including several high-level members of the security forces. Meaningful steps taken in 2015 included the charging of former coup leader Camara and his then-vice president, Mamadouba Toto Camara.⁶⁹

⁶⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 28–29, 171; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 278–279.

⁶⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 173–174; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 282–283.

GUINEA-BISSAU

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2012, 2015.

GUYANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997.

HAITI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2000–2003, 2006, 2008–2009, 2013–2015.

Former President Jean-Claude Duvalier (1951–2014), who had returned to Haiti in January 2011 after nearly 25 years in exile, was accused of financial and human rights crimes committed during his 15-year tenure as president from 1971 to 1986. When the Port-au-Prince Court of Appeal ruled in 2014 that the statute of limitations could not be applied to crimes against humanity, and ordered additional investigation into the charges against Duvalier, victims of serious human rights violations, including arbitrary detentions, torture, disappearances, summary executions, and forced exile, hoped that they might finally see justice. However, Duvalier died on 4 October 2014—six months after the ruling, without ever having been brought to trial. The Human Rights Committee and the United Nations independent expert on Haiti both called on Haiti to continue the investigation and bring to justice all those responsible for serious human rights violations committed during Duvalier’s tenure. The latter reiterated his recommendation for the creation of “a truth, justice and peace commission to clarify and provide remedy” for the victims of past human rights violations under François (1957–1971) and Jean-Claude (1971–1986) Duvalier and President Jean-Bertrand Aristide (1996–2004). In late 2015, a (reopened) investigation into crimes committed by Duvalier’s collaborators was still pending.⁷⁰

HONDURAS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998, 2001–2002, 2009–2015.

HONG KONG

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996. See China.

⁷⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 29, 177; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 289.

HUNGARY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997, 2004, 2007–2015.

In June 1951, Bálint Hóman (1885–1951), professor of Hungarian medieval history, president of the Hungarian Historical Society (1933–1945) and minister of culture in various governments that supported the German political orientation (1932–1938, 1939–1942), died in prison. When the Red Army approached Hungary (December 1944–April 1945), he had fled to Austria, but from there he was extradited by the United States Army to Hungary because of his pro-Nazi and anti-Semitic wartime activities, including as a leader of the pro-Nazi Arrow Cross Party. As a government minister in the 1930s, Hóman spearheaded anti-Semitic legislation and in 1944 called for the deportation of Hungarian Jews. In 1946, the Communist government sentenced him to life imprisonment for war crimes, including for voting to declare war on the Soviet Union in 1941. With historian Gyula Szekfű (1883–1955), he had written an eight-volume Hungarian History (1928–1933).

In March 2015, the Budapest municipal court posthumously rehabilitated Hóman. In December 2015, the private Bálint Hóman foundation wanted to erect a bronze statue to honor Hóman in the latter's hometown Székesfehérvár. Its mayor Andras Cser-Palkovics, a member of the ruling political party Fidesz, declared that the foundation "had a right to do so in a democracy," but asked it to return the funding it had received from the city and government. On 14 December 2015, several hundred Hungarians, including representatives of Hungary's Jewish community and diplomats from various countries, attended a vigil to protest against the plan.⁷¹

The government decided to replace the statue of Mihály Károlyi, prime minister and first president of the Hungarian Democratic Republic (October 1918–March 1919), standing outside the parliament, by the statue of István Tisza, the conservative prime minister of Hungary (1903–1905, 1913–1917) in the last years of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy.⁷²

⁷¹ M. Bernath & F. von Schroeder, eds., Biographisches Lexicon zur Geschichte Südeuropas, volume 2 (Munich 1976), 176–177; L. Boia, ed., Great Historians of the Modern Age: An International Dictionary (New York 1991), 341–342; S. Borsody, "Modern Hungarian Historiography," The Journal of Modern History (1952), 402–403; R. vom Bruch & R. A. Müller eds., Historikerlexikon: Von der Antike bis zum 20. Jahrhundert (Munich 1991), 145; J. Cannon and others, eds., The Blackwell Dictionary of Historians (Oxford 1988), 400; I. Deák, "Historiography of the Countries of Eastern Europe: Hungary," American Historical Review (1992), 1051; D. Kosáry, "The Idea of a Comparative History of East Central Europe: The Story of a Venture," in D. Deletant & H. Hanak, eds., Historians As Nation-Builders: Central and South-East Europe (London 1988), 130–131; S. B. Várdy, Historical Dictionary of Hungary (Lanham MD 1997), 341; "Bálint Hóman," Wikipedia (24 April 2010); "US Joins Hungary Protest over Pro-Nazi Homan Statue," BBC News (14 December 2015).

⁷² Péter Molnár, "Slam Session," Index on Censorship (2015, no. 4), 20.

In March 2016, the Hungarian Academy of Sciences announced that it would close down the Lukács Archives in Budapest. György Lukács (1885–1971) was a philosopher and literary historian known for his original views of the Marxist doctrine. In 1919, he had been the People’s Commissar of Public Education in the government of the Hungarian Soviet Republic (21 March 1919–3 April 1919) and in 1956 he was the Minister of Popular Culture during the Revolution (27 October 1956–3 November 1956). Among his works were History and Class Consciousness (1923) and The Historical Novel (1937).⁷³

⁷³ “Protest against Closing Down the Lukács Archiv” (Petition; 8 March 2016); Alex Doherty, “‘History Has a Habit of Intruding’: Save the Lukács Archive” (14 March 2016); “György Lukács,” Wikipedia (31 March 2016).

INDIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1997, 2000–2015.

In March 2015, a Delhi court acquitted sixteen Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) men, who were among the nineteen charged with abducting and killing 42 Muslim men during the riots in Meerut, Uttar Pradesh, in May 1987 (the Hashimpura massacre). The victims were picked up from the Hashimpura Mohalla in a truck and taken to a nearby canal, where they were gunned down. The court stated that it could not convict anyone because of the “scanty, unreliable and faulty investigation.” A letter written by the Senior Superintendent of Police (SSP) of Meerut to the Crime Branch of the State Crime Investigation Department (CID), however, showed that Uttar Pradesh police destroyed the evidence on 1 April 2006. The matter was being heard in a court at time the documents were destroyed.⁷⁴

In April 2015, the Environment Ministry rejected an offer from the United Nations Environment Programme to assess the spread of toxic wastes at the site of the 1984 Bhopal gas leak disaster. In August 2015, the Madhya Pradesh state government incinerated 10 tonnes of the waste in Pithampur, 250 km from Bhopal, which activists said had violated Supreme Court orders and endangered the health of local residents.⁷⁵

On 14 May 2015, the Supreme Court ruled against Devidas Ramchandra Tuljapurkar, a bank employee, who had been accused of publishing allegedly obscene poems, penned by Marathi poet Vasant Dattatraya Gurjar, on Mahatma Gandhi (in particular “Gandhi Mela Bhetala” [I met Gandhi] written in 1984), in the in-house magazine of the All India Bank Association Union in 1994. Tuljapurkar maintained that the poem was not obscene but satirical. The court heard Tuljapurkar’s appeal against a Bombay High Court order dismissing his plea seeking to quash his prosecution under Section 292 (criminalizing publication and circulation of obscene content) of the Indian Penal Code. The court applied the so-called “Contemporary Community Standards Test” to Section 292, and held that this test applied with greater vigor when the names of “historically respected persons” like Mahatma Gandhi were used as a medium for obscene words or acts. It concluded that the poem fell within the ambit of offense of obscenity. However, since two decades had passed since the offense and because the publisher had apologized unconditionally upon hearing of the reactions of some members of the audience, the appellant was discharged.⁷⁶

⁷⁴ Mohammad Ali, “U.P. Police Destroyed Papers on Massacre,” The Hindu (2 February 2016); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 183; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 299.

⁷⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 183.

⁷⁶ Supreme Court of India, Tuljapurkar versus State of Maharashtra (2015); Tuljapurkar v.

In March 1989, historian M. M. Kalburgi (Malleshappa Madivalappa Kalburgi) (1938–2015) received death threats from temple chiefs and militants of the Hindu Lingayat community (founded in the twelfth century) because they alleged that his book Marga Ordu (One Way)—a collection of articles on Kannada folklore, religion and culture—blasphemed their twelfth-century patron saint, philosopher Basava (Basavanna or Basaveshwara) (1105–1167). He reportedly alleged that poet Channabasava, Basava’s nephew, was born from a relationship between Basava’s sister and a cobbler and that Basava’s relationship with his wife had been merely platonic. Kalburgi was given 24-hour police protection in Dharwar, Southern Karnataka state. Later, pressured by Lingayat seers, he withdrew the controversial sections from the book. His book Marga 4 earned him the Karnataka Sahitya Academy Award in 2006. He became vice-chancellor of Kannada University in Hampi. He was the chief editor of Samagra Vachana Samputa (published by the Government of Karnataka).

On 30 August 2015, Kalburgi was shot dead by two unknown assailants in his residence. Kalburgi had had run-ins with members of the Lingayat community and right-wing Hindutva groups over his research work and outspoken opinions on traditional religious beliefs and practices. As a rationalist scholar speaking during a seminar in June 2014 on a proposed anti-superstition bill in Bangalore, Kalburgi criticized idol worship as a “meaningless ritual” while supporting a piece of work by writer U.R. Ananthamurthy. At that occasion, right-wing groups Vishva Hindu Parishad (VHP; World Hindu Council), Bajrang Dal and Sri Ram Sena filed a case against both writers for “causing hurt to” religious sentiments and beliefs. Stones were pelted at Kalburgi’s residence and he was again threatened. He was provided police protection for some months but Kalburgi requested to withdraw the protection in mid-August.

In a tweet, Bajrang Dal leader Bhuvith Shetty welcomed Kalburgi’s death, adding that K.S. Bhagwan, an awarded historian who translated classical Kannada texts into English and worked at Mysore University until his retirement, would be the next target. After a wave of criticism, Shetty deleted the tweet, disabled his twitter account and denied any involvement in the murder. Bhagwan had recently invited VHP leader Vishveshwara Thirtha Swami for a debate on Hindu scriptures; he declared that he was not afraid of intimidation. Bhagwan was first threatened in 1985 and charged with blasphemy upon release of his book Shankaracharya and Reactionary Philosophy, which showed that Shankaracharya (788–820) was a strong advocate of the caste system rather than a social reformer.⁷⁷

Maharashtra, Note Columbia University (2015); “Supreme Court: Putting Indecent Words In Mahatma Gandhi's Mouth Isn't Artistic Freedom,” Huffington Post (17 April 2015).

⁷⁷ “MM Kalburgi Murder: Bajrangi Dal leader Welcomes Death, Says Another Academician Next,” Daily News and Analysis (30 August 2015); “Renowned Karnataka Writer Dr MM Kalburgi Shot Dead at his Home,” Daily Mail (30 August 2015); K.S. Bhagwan, “You Can Attack Us but Our Works Will Live On: Prof KS Bhagwan,” Hindustan Times (3 September 2015); Sania Farooqui, “Indian Scholar Who Spoke Out Against Idol Worship Is Shot Dead,” Time Magazine (31 August 2015); T.A. Johnson, “Former Karnatak University Vice-chancellor M M Kalaburgi, Who Had Run-ins with Hardliners, Shot,” Indian Express (31 August 2015); “M M Kalburgi,” Wikipedia (retrieved

In August 2015, the New Delhi Municipal Corporation (NDMC) decided to change the name of Aurangzeb Road to A.P.J. Abdul Kalam Road. Aurangzeb was a Mughal Emperor (1618–1707), Abdul Kalam (1931–2015), who died in July 2015, the eleventh President of India (in office, 2002–2007). Muslims and others protested the renaming.⁷⁸

On 23 September 2015, the Indian Council for Historical Research (ICHR) amended the funding rules and withdrew the special status that the Indian History Congress (IHC; founded 1935) had enjoyed since the ICHR was founded in 1972. The action came almost a year after the IHC passed a resolution against Prime Minister Narendra Modi's statement citing plastic surgery and genetic science to explain the creation of Ganesh and Karna. The IHC cautioned against "combining myth and history." Revocation of the special status was widely criticized on the grounds that the IHC received over 1,500 scholars every year at its annual conference and that it should not be treated at par with regional history congresses with conferences of 200 to 300 historians. Former IHC president (1981) and ICHR chairman (1987–1993) Irfan Habib called it another attempt of the National Democratic Alliance government to curb academic freedom.

In November 2015, Yellapragada Sudershan Rao, history professor at Kakatiya University in Telengana, resigned as chairman of the Indian Council of Historical Research [See NCH Annual Report 2015.]⁷⁹

In October 2015, when India invited all 54 leaders of the African Union to a summit in New Delhi, it ignored calls by the International Criminal Court to arrest Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, who faces charges of war crimes and genocide in Darfur.⁸⁰

In November 2015, the Culture Minister Mahesh Sharma refuted claims made by a group of lawyers in a 2014 petition to the court that the Taj Mahal—a mausoleum in Agra built in 1653 by Mughal Emperor Shah Jahan after the death of his wife Mumtaz Mahal—was originally a temple dedicated to the Hindu

24 October 2015); Index on Censorship (1989, nos. 6–7), 78; Derek Jones, ed., Censorship: A World Encyclopedia (London and Chicago, Fitzroy Dearborn, 2001), 252.

⁷⁸ Charu Kartikeya, "Aurangzeb Road Renamed, Akbar and Shah Jahan are Next: Irfan Habib" (1 September 2015).

⁷⁹ Ritika Chopra, "ICHR Revokes History Congress' Special Status," Indian Express (30 November 2015); "ICHR Stops Financial Aid to History Congress," Deccan Herald (1 December 2015); "Irfan Habib Denounces ICHR's Move to Revoke IHC Special Status," Business Standard (30 November 2015); Suhrith Parthasarathy, "Ideas Under Review," Index on Censorship (2015, no. 2), 28–29; Amartya Sen, "The Stormy Revival of an International University," The New York Review of Books (13 August 2015).

⁸⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 304.

god Shiva and should be handed over to Hindus.⁸¹

In early 2016, several officials—including Muhammad Shafi Zahid, director of the Department of Archives and Archaeology of the government of Jammu and Kashmir, and Abdul Ahad, its former director—reported that after independence, and especially after 1985, the government of Jammu and Kashmir, and particularly its judiciary and police departments, had broken the archives law by not regularly transferring documents to the archives. This endangered the writing of history, including about the 1953 events. The police department was said to have an own archive. There were no significant records of the Jammu and Kashmir Assembly available: two volumes of Jammu and Kashmir Constituent Assembly debates and a copy of the debates of the Autonomy resolution, which was passed by the Assembly in 2000 for restoration of the pre-1953 status to Jammu and Kashmir, were available at the Assembly while the rest was untraceable or available in bits and pieces.⁸²

See also United Arab Emirates.

INDONESIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2001–2002, 2004–2013, 2015.

In 2015, the people of Aceh commemorated the tenth anniversary of the 2005 Helsinki Peace Agreement between the government and the armed pro-independence Free Aceh Movement. The agreement ended a 29-year conflict (1976–2005) during which between 10,000 and 30,000 people were killed, many of them civilians. In November 2015, the Aceh House of People’s Representatives selected a team charged with appointing commissioners for the Aceh Truth and Reconciliation Commission, a body set up to examine abuses that occurred during the conflict. Some provisions in the bylaw under which the commission was created, fell short of international law and standards. Its mandate was limited to genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes and did not include other crimes under international law including torture, extrajudicial executions and enforced disappearances.⁸³

On 30 September 2015—the fiftieth anniversary of the mass killings in 1965 in which an estimated 500,000 to one million people were killed and hundreds of thousands were held without charge or trial for periods ranging from a few days to more than fourteen years—it was observed that the government had failed to pass a new law to establish a national truth commission almost nine years after the Constitutional Court had struck down a previous law (it had ruled that a provision requiring an amnesty for perpetrators of gross human rights abuses was unconstitutional). The recommendations of the Komnas HAM 2012 report [see NCH Annual Report 2013] were not given a follow-up, despite promises by President Joko “Jokowi” Widodo. In August 2015, Widodo, in his Independence Day speech, announced that he would establish a non-judicial mechanism to resolve all past human rights violations through a “reconciliation committee.” This was believed to include the 1965–1966 violations. Victims and NGOs remained concerned that this process would prioritize reconciliation and undermine efforts at truth and justice.

⁸¹ “Taj Mahal: India Monument ‘not a Hindu temple’,” BBC News (1 December 2015).

⁸² Naseer Ganai, “Jammu and Kashmir Archives Denied Record for Past 6 Decades,” Mail Today (12 January 2016).

⁸³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 38, 187.

The Indonesian government had also consistently failed to provide justice, truth and reparation for other past grave human rights abuses such as those committed in Aceh (see above), Timor-Leste (then East Timor), Papua and also during the 1998 May riots. On many occasions, internal meetings or public events about the 1965 violations held by the victims were disbanded by the authorities or broken up by vigilante groups while police frequently failed to intervene.⁸⁴

In October 2015, officials forced the organizers of the international Ubud Readers and Writers Festival to cancel events linked to the 1965 mass killings. They threatened to call off the literary festival, due to start in Bali in late October, if the organizers did not comply. Canceled events included three panel discussions on the massacres, book launches, the screening of the documentary The Look of Silence by Joshua Oppenheimer [see NCH Annual Reports 2013, 2015], and a photography exhibit of women survivors of the killings. Elsewhere, a Swedish national was deported for visiting a mass grave in Sumatra. Lentera, a magazine run by the Satya Wacana University’s Faculty of Social and Communication Studies in Salatiga, Central Java, was prevented from being sold outside the campus after reporting on the 1965 murders in the town; police confiscated and burned hundreds of copies of the magazine.⁸⁵

⁸⁴ Amnesty International, “Indonesia: Fifty Years on, Victims of ’65 Still Waiting for Truth, Justice and Reparation” (ASA 21/2496/2015; London: AI, 23 September 2015); Amnesty International, “Indonesia: Millions of Victims and Families Still Abandoned 50 Years after Mass Killings” (30 September 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 38, 187; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 306, 311.

⁸⁵ “Indonesia Cancels Festival Events Marking 1965 Mass Killings,” BBC News (24 October 2015); Marianna Tzabiras, “The 50th Anniversary of the Massacre Indonesians Aren’t Supposed to Talk about,” Ifex (6 November 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 188; Vicky Baker, “T-Shirted Turmoil,” Index on Censorship, 45 no. 1 (Spring 2016), 123.

On 19 November 2015, Filep Karma was released.

Karma had been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment in May 2005 on charges of "anti-state rebellion" for taking part in a peaceful ceremony on 1 December 2004 during which the Morning Star flag (a banned symbol of Papuan independence) was raised in Abepura (Jayapura), Papua Province, to commemorate the 1962 declaration for Papuan independence. [See also NCH Annual Report 2011.]⁸⁶

See also Netherlands, Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2015.

On 9 December 2015, managing editor and reformist cleric Seyed Mahmoud Doaei of Ettelaat newspaper wrote a front-page editorial, addressed to President Hassan Rouhani, in which he strongly objected to the ban—imposed by hardline judiciary—on publishing the name or images of former reformist president Mohammad Khatami (serving as president between 1997 and 2005). It emerged earlier in 2015 that a media blackout had been imposed regarding Khatami (non grata over his support for opposition leader and former presidential candidate Mir-Hossein Mousavi). Ettelaat first defied the ban on 5 December 2015, printing the Farsi translation of an interview with Khatami given to an Arabic newspaper. On 8 December 2015, Doaei was reportedly indicted for ignoring the ban. It was not the first time that the authorities banned mentions of Khatami in the media. In 2010, a similar ruling was issued regarding Khatami, Mousavi and others. During the 2013 presidential elections, Khatami had backed Rouhani and his support was reportedly crucial in the victory of the moderate cleric.⁸⁷

See also Argentina, Syria.

⁸⁶ Amnesty International, "Indonesia: Case sheet: The Jayapura Flag-raisers" (February 2005); Amnesty International, The Wire (October / November 2011), insert; Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (19 November 2009); Human Rights Watch, "Hellman/Hammett Grants Honor 42 Writers for Courage Facing Political Persecution" (4 August 2010); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 321; Ifex Alert (21 March 2012); Keesings historisch archief (2012), 178.

⁸⁷ Saeed Kamali Dehghan, "Iranian Newspaper Condemns Media Censorship in Rare Front-Page Editorial," Guardian (9 December 2015).

IRAQ

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2015.

In June 2014, an anonymous writer identifying himself as an “independent historian” started the blog Mosul Eye in English and Arabic in order to chronicle events in Mosul under the domination of the Islamic State (IS; formerly Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, ISIS). In October 2015, the blog had 11,500 followers. The chronicler reportedly received many threats from IS. The historian had been keeping journals and collecting an archive of materials on Iraqi militias and insurgent groups since the 2003 invasion.⁸⁸

On 12 May 2015, IS blew up the nearly 200-year-old Maryam Khatoon mosque in the Hawsh Kahn neighborhood of Mosul, Ninewa. In addition, between May and October 2015, IS looted and demolished many mosques, churches, graves, tombs and shrines which it considered un-Islamic and “manifestations of polytheism.”⁸⁹

On 28 May 2015, the United Nations General Assembly unanimously adopted a resolution which condemned the destruction of heritage in Iraq.⁹⁰

See also Spain.

IRELAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000, 2002, 2004, 2006, 2013, 2015.

The United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights criticized the lack of a prompt, thorough and independent investigation into the allegations of past abuses in the religious-run “Magdalene Laundries,” including the fact that survivors were not provided with adequate remedies.

⁸⁸ Ursula Lindsey, “An Independent Historian Documents Life under the Islamic State,” Al-Fanar (9 October 2015); Gilgamesh Nabeel, “Q & A with the ‘Mosul Eye’ Historian” Al-Fanar (9 October 2015).

⁸⁹ Office of the United Nations High Commissioner of Human Rights & United Nations Assistance Mission for Iraq—Human Rights Office, Report on the Protection of Civilians in the Armed Conflict in Iraq: 1 May–31 October 2015 (Baghdad: UNAMI/OHCHR, 2016), 16–17 (Destruction or damage of places of religious and cultural significance); Kanishk Tharoor & Maryam Maruf, “Museum of Lost Objects: The Winged Bull of Nineveh,” BBC News (29 February 2016).

⁹⁰ United Nations General Assembly, Resolution 69/281: Saving the Cultural Heritage of Iraq (28 May 2015).

[See also NCH Annual Reports 2013, 2015.]⁹¹

See also United Kingdom.

ISRAEL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000–2003, 2008–2014.

According to Shay Hazkani, assistant professor at the University of Maryland’s Center for Jewish Studies, in a July 2014 interview, Israeli state archive documents that were declassified in the 1980s had been reclassified in recent years. He estimated that about one-third of the documents that were declassified in the 1980s had been reclassified starting from the late 1990s, when the archives were digitized. They related to orders given to the nascent Israeli army to expel Palestinians during the 1948 war. These reclassified documents had been used extensively by “new historians” like Benny Morris, Avi Shlaim, Hillel Cohen and Ilan Pappé and cited in their books.

Hazkani, who was Israel Channel 10’s military correspondent from 2004 to 2008, also said that in 1955 Israel adopted a law that specified documents could be kept classified for a maximum of fifty years. But the Mossad, the army and the Shin Bet, which controlled very large archives, refused to comply with the law. Petitions to declassify specific documents had been brought before the higher courts.⁹²

In May 2015, the Israeli Supreme Court permitted the demolition of Susya, a Palestinian village in the south Hebron Hills in the West Bank with about 340 residents. The villagers built their homes on their agricultural land after Israel forcibly displaced them and designated the village as an archaeological site.⁹³

In June 2015, the United Nations (UN) Independent Commission of Inquiry on the 2014 Gaza Conflict published its report, documenting war crimes by Israeli forces and Palestinian armed groups during the fifty-day conflict and calling for accountability. Israel rejected the UN findings and continued its military investigations, but they were not independent and failed to deliver justice. Israeli military authorities opened investigations into the deaths of Palestinians killed by Israeli forces in the West Bank, but these investigations were similarly flawed, and only one case from 2013 led to an indictment for “negligent use of a firearm,” following lengthy delays and an appeal to Israel’s High Court.

⁹¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 199.

⁹² Lisa Goldman, “Classified: Politicizing the Nakba in Israel's State Archives,” 972 Magazine (19 February 2016).

⁹³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 333.

In September 2015, a government committee released its review of the Turkel Commission’s 2013 recommendations on Israel’s investigation systems and their compliance with international law. It side-stepped some recommendations, such as making war crimes offenses under national law, and failed to define practical steps or budgets necessary to implement others.⁹⁴

See also Argentina, Italy, Morocco, Palestinian Authority.

ITALY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2003, 2008, 2010, 2012.

In September 2015, Saverio Ferrari, a journalist and author known for his research on neo-fascist and neo-Nazi movements in Italy and their foreign links and affiliations, said that he received credible reports that extreme-right circles in Milan were planning an attack on him. For a number of years, Ferrari had suffered threats by neo-fascists. In 2012, he had been assaulted and had to be hospitalized as a result.⁹⁵

In March 2016, the government released thousands of previous classified documents related to fascist and Nazi war crimes committed in Italy during World War II. The documents were declassified after a parliamentary commission had investigated the concealment of files related to these crimes. Specifically, the commission had dealt with the so-called “cabinet of shame”—a wooden cabinet discovered in 1994 in a storeroom of the military prosecutor’s headquarters in which 695 files on war crimes had been hidden for decades. The documents concerned specifics of crimes ranging from anti-Jewish persecution to massacres of civilians that in total had resulted in 15,000 deaths.⁹⁶

⁹⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 203.

⁹⁵ ANPI Brescia, “Italian Historian Threatened by Neo-Fascists in Milan” (24 September 2015).

⁹⁶ JTA, “Italy Cracks Open Fascist-Era ‘Cabinet of Shame’ Archives” Forward (12 March 2016); Archivio storico della Camera dei deputati, Commissione parlamentare di inchiesta sulle cause dell’occultamento di fascicoli relativi a crimini nazifascisti (2016); Luigi Cajani, personal communication, 12 March 2016.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2015.

On 15 December 2014, the much-criticized Dialogue, Truth and Reconciliation Commission (CDVR), established to shed light on the post-electoral violence of 2010–2011, presented its final report to President Alassane Ouattara. However, the government had not yet publicly released the report in late 2015, although Ouattara had pledged to make 10 billion CFA (US$ 16.5 million) available for the indemnification of victims. The first group of victims began receiving financial and medical assistance in August 2015, but victims' groups criticized the lack of transparency of the reparations process.

In March 2015, the National Commission for Reconciliation and Compensation of Victims (CONARIV) was created to complete the work of the CDVR, in particular to register unidentified victims of the post-electoral violence. In December 2015, Ouattara committed to pardoning over 3,000 people detained since the electoral crisis, either totally or partially removing their sentences. At the end of 2015, the list of those pardoned had not been made public.⁹⁷

On 28 January 2016, the trial of historian and former President Laurent Gbagbo began at the International Criminal Court (ICC). He was the first ex-head of state to stand trial at the ICC. He denied the charges, saying he was the victim of a French plot. In October 2015, the ICC had rejected his request to hold the opening statements of his trial in Abidjan or Arusha. His wife Simone was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment by a court in Ivory Coast; however, this was for offenses against the state (undermining state security, participation in an insurrectionary movement, and public disorder), not human rights crimes. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2002, 2008, 2011–2015.]⁹⁸

See also Burkina Faso.

⁹⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 129; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 197.

⁹⁸ "Laurent Gbagbo: Ivory Coast Ex-leader Denies War Crimes," BBC News (28 January 2016); "Profile: Ivory Coast's Laurent Gbagbo," BBC News (27 January 2016); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 195; Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22, 129.

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2015.

In October 2015, Japan threatened to withdraw its funding for UNESCO after it included disputed Chinese documents about the 1937 Nanjing massacre (including court records from the International Military Tribunal for the Far East [1946–1948], photographs and film footage) in its Memory of the World list, despite protests from Tokyo. UNESCO did, however, reject a Chinese request to the effect that photos and other documents relating to Japan’s use of wartime sex slaves be included on the list. Chinese historians claimed that Japanese imperial army troops killed more than 300,000 soldiers and civilians during the six-week Nanjing massacre, but Japanese historians insisted that the number was between the tens of thousands and 200,000.⁹⁹

On 28 December 2015, the government reached an agreement with South Korea and acknowledged Japan’s deep responsibility for the military sexual slavery system before and during the Pacific War (1931–1945), which resulted in women and girls being forced into sexual slavery by the Japanese Imperial Army. Japan agreed to provide a one-time contribution of one billion yen (US$ 8.3 million) to carry out joint projects with South Korea, including a foundation to be established by the country. The South Korean government agreed to consider the removal of a statue commemorating the “comfort women” built in front of Japan’s embassy in Seoul. Both governments agreed to refrain from accusing or criticizing each other in the international community on the issue. The outcome was criticized as the agreement did not take into account the views and needs of survivors and they were not involved in the negotiations. The possible removal of the statue was also criticized because it not only commemorated the historical issue and legacy of the “comfort women” but also symbolized the survivors’ search for justice.¹⁰⁰

See also Korea, South, Thailand, United States.

⁹⁹ Justin McCurry, “Japan Threatens to Halt Unesco Funding over Nanjing Massacre Listing,” Guardian (13 October 2015).

¹⁰⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 206; “The Long Awaited Apology to ‘Comfort Women’ Victims Is yet to Come—UN Rights Experts” (United Nations press release; 11 March 2016); Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, Concluding Observations on the Combined Seventh and Eighth Periodic Reports of Japan (CEDAW/C/JPN/CO/7-8; 7 March 2017), paragraphs 28–29.

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004, 2015.

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2015.

Kenya has made no progress on accountability for post-2007 elections violence, including for sexual violence, but authorities continued with attempts to undermine the International Criminal Court (ICC) cases on Kenya by seeking to politicize the proceedings.

In December 2014, the ICC prosecutor withdrew crimes against humanity charges against President Uhuru Kenyatta due to insufficient evidence that the ICC prosecutor blamed on non-cooperation by Kenyan authorities and widespread witness interference. Deputy President William Ruto and former radio journalist Joshua arap Sang were standing trial on similar charges. Victims in the Kenyatta case were seeking to challenge the prosecution's decision to suspend investigations. Both sets of Kenyan cases at the ICC were dogged by claims of witness tampering. The trial chamber in the Ruto and Sang case found sufficient evidence of tampering to not admit into evidence the prior statements of six witnesses who subsequently refused to cooperate with the prosecution, setting off a new effort in parliament to seek Kenya's withdrawal from the ICC.

In late 2014, an ICC trial chamber indicated that the Kenyan government had not met its obligations to cooperate in the prosecution's investigations in the Kenyatta case but decided not to send a formal finding of non-compliance to the court's Assembly of States Parties for enforcement. The Office of the Prosecutor appealed the decision, and in August 2015, the Appeals Chamber referred the matter back to the Trial Chamber for review. In March 2015, Kenyatta said that a report of the Office of Director of Public Prosecutions indicated that, due to lack of evidence, it would not be possible to prosecute cases arising out of the 2007–2008 post-election violence and that "restorative" approaches should be used instead.

Kenyatta issued a general apology for human rights violations committed by the government and instructed the treasury to set aside Ksh10 billion (US$ 9.5 million) over the next three years for victim reparations for past injustices dating back to 1963, including victims of the recent post-election violence, as recommended in the report of the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission.

In June 2015, the African Union Assembly adopted a resolution which reiterated its previous calls for termination or suspension of ICC proceedings against Ruto of Kenya. In November, Kenya's government attempted to influence the fourteenth session of the Assembly of States Parties (ASP)— the political oversight body of the ICC—as part of its attempt to undermine Ruto’s trial, by threatening to withdraw from the ICC. On 5 April 2016, the Ruto case was thrown out of the court.¹⁰¹

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011, 2013–2015.

See Korea, South.

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012–2013.

After nine former comfort women in 2013 had sought a temporary injunction against publication of a book “Comfort Women of the Empire” (2013; Japanese translation November 2014) and filed a complaint against its author Park Yu-ha, a professor at Sejong University, in June 2014, the Seoul Eastern District Court in February 2015 ordered that Park’s book be redacted in 34 sections. A modified version was later published. On 13 January 2016, the court ordered Park to pay 10 million won (8,262 US dollars) to each of the women because she had defamed them with “false,” “exaggerated” or “distorted” content in her book. Park intended to appeal.

In a separate criminal case, the Seoul Eastern District Prosecutors Office on 18 November 2015 charged Park with defaming the honor of former comfort women and deviating from academic freedom. In the book, Park had argued that there was no evidence that the Japanese government was officially involved in forcibly recruiting the women from Korea (then a Japanese colony). She said that Korean collaborators and private Japanese recruiters were mainly responsible for taking Korean women, sometimes using coercion, into the “comfort stations,” where she said life included both rape and prostitution, and the women developed a “comradelike relationship” with Japanese soldiers. Many South Koreans questioned Park’s “Koreanness” online or accused her of being a traitor. At a conference in December 2015, Park said that her work was based on historical documents and the testimony of former comfort women and that it was not intended to criticize or defame any comfort women. Park accused prosecutors of trampling on academic freedom. More than 200 intellectuals and scholars signed two

¹⁰¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 353–355.

petitions in protest against the charges.¹⁰²

In October 2015, the government announced plans that from 2017 all secondary schools had to use state-issued history textbooks only, arguing that current middle and high school history textbooks (published by eight different companies) were too left-leaning and encouraged anti-American and pro-North Korea feelings (including by failing to make clear that the Korean War, 1950–1953, was started by the North). Conservatives had criticized the “masochistic historical views” in the textbooks and accused their authors of inculcating youngsters with “left-leaning nationalism.”

The system of privately-published textbooks had been introduced in 2003 under the progressive president Roh Moo-hyun; in 2014, the Education Ministry had asked the publishers to make many changes in the texts, but their authors filed lawsuits against the interference. Vice Prime Minister and education minister, Hwang Woo-yea, said that textbooks should teach “the proud history of South Korea, which has achieved both democratization and industrialization in the shortest time in world history.” The new book, to be called The Correct Textbook of History, would be written by a government-appointed panel of history teachers and academics. The National Institute of Korean History supervising the operation indicated that the names of authors would be kept secret until the project ended. Opposition politicians and several academics accused the government of “distorting history” and whitewashing South Korea’s past dictatorships—including the one led by President Park Geun-hye’s father, Park Chung-hee. Park Chung-hee had seized power in a 1961 coup and remained in control using torture and martial law until his assassination in 1979. President Park’s critics (including Park Han-yong, a chief researcher at the Center for Historical Truth and Justice, Seoul) asserted that the official history textbook plan echoed her father’s dictatorship, during which the government wrote history textbooks that glorified his coup as a “revolution” and justified his prolonged rule. They called the plan “a coup in history education.”

On 14 November 2015, security forces in Seoul clashed with protesters during a street rally, in which some 70,000 demonstrators took part. Part of the protest was against the imposition of the state-approved history textbook. On 5 December 2015, about 14,000 protesters held a mass rally against government policies, including the planned textbook.¹⁰³

¹⁰² Yoshihiro Makino, “Author of ‘Comfort Women of the Empire’ Indicted in South Korea,” Asahi Shimbun (20 November 2015); John Power, “Uncomfortable Truth? South Korean Academic on Trial for Defamation,” The Correspondent (4 December 2015); Choe Sang-Hun, “Professor Ordered to Pay 9 Who Said ‘Comfort Women’ Book Defamed Them,” New York Times (13 January 2016).

¹⁰³ “South Korea to Control History Textbooks Used in Schools,” BBC News (12 October 2015); “S Korea Protesters Clash with Police in Seoul,” BBC News (14 November 2015); Stephen Evans, “Why South Korea Is Rewriting Its History Books,” BBC News (1 December 2015); “South Korea Protests: Seoul Rally against Park Geun-hye,” BBC News (5 December 2015); Choe Sang-Hun, “South Korea to Issue State History Textbooks, Rejecting Private Publishers,” New York Times (12 October 2015); Se-Woong Koonov, “South Korea’s Textbook Whitewash,” New York Times (12

See also Japan, United States.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2013.

The authorities continue to deny justice to victims of the June 2010 interethnic violence in Osh and Jalal-Abad (southern Kyrgyzstan), where serious crimes were committed by members of both ethnic Kyrgyz and Uzbek communities. Ethnic Uzbeks were disproportionately killed and subjected to arbitrary detention, ill-treatment, and torture. In April 2015, Mahamad Bizurukov, an ethnic Uzbek on trial since 2011 in connection with the 2010 violence, was sentenced to thirteen years' imprisonment for murder. He was released in August 2015 on parole. A handful of other June 2010-related cases were still under judicial review. In June 2015, during a Central Asia visit, United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon called on authorities to investigate human rights violations related to the June 2010 violence, prosecute those responsible for serious crimes, review convictions tainted by torture, and work with civil society “to promote interethnic reconciliation,” including through transitional justice and reparations for victims. On the fifth anniversary of the violence in June, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe High Commissioner on National Minorities noted that “a sense of insecurity is still prevalent among the ethnic Uzbek community” and “little progress” has been made in investigating cases related to the June 2010 violence.¹⁰⁴

November 2015).

¹⁰⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 224–225; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 365.

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008, 2015.

On 21 March 2016, Kristīne Jarinovska, deputy head of the Commission for the Study of KGB Materials (established in 2015 with a three-year mandate), told Latvian Television that part of the archive of the Soviet secret service KGB was located at the Documentation Center on the Consequences of Totalitarianism, controlled by the Constitution Protection Bureau (SAB), and inaccessible for researchers. They included the partially burned KGB documents, found in the Police College and handed to the security police in 2015. Only officials with high-level security clearances could access the complete archive.¹⁰⁵

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2015.

In October 2012, Justice Minister Shakib Qortbawi put forward a draft decree to the cabinet to establish an independent national commission to investigate the fate of people forcibly disappeared during the civil war (1975–1990) and its aftermath, but no further action was taken. In September 2014, the government finally provided the families of the disappeared with the files of the Official Commission of Inquiry that had been appointed in 2000 to investigate the fate of the kidnapped. These showed that the government had not conducted any serious investigation.

The Netherlands-based Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) continued to try five men in their absence for alleged complicity in the killing of former Prime Minister Rafic Hariri and others in a car bombing in Beirut in 2005.¹⁰⁶

Several news agencies and government municipalities had their websites hacked, with assailants threatening to delete historical archives. The news website Lebanon Debate was subject to a double hacking attempt from IP (Internet Protocol) addresses in Lebanon and the United States on 24 March 2015; however, it was able to retrieve its archive and republished under a new domain. One of the most well-known blogs, Trella, was subject to a cyberattack on 11 April 2015, in which hackers threatened to ¹⁰⁵ “KGB Study Commission still Kept away from Archives,” LSM.LV (Public Broadcasting of Latvia) (21 March 2016).

¹⁰⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 55–56, 229; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 376.

erase the blog's archive since 2004.¹⁰⁷

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2015.

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2015.

Tripoli authorities sentenced former Gaddafi-era officials to long prison terms or death for alleged war crimes and other offenses committed during the 2011 uprising and ensuing armed conflict. Their trial was marred by irregularities; the authorities failed to comply with an International Criminal Court (ICC) demand to hand over Saif al-Islam al-Gaddafi, son of Mu' ammar al-Gaddafi; instead, he remained in militia detention; he was tried and sentenced to death.

The ICC Prosecutor expressed concern about Islamic State crimes and alleged international humanitarian law violations by Libya Dawn and Operation Dignity forces but failed to initiate new investigations, citing insufficient resources and Libya's instability, and called on states parties to the Rome Statute of the ICC to provide funding. The Prosecutor did not seek judicial review of a 2013 admissibility decision allowing a Libyan court to try former al-Gaddafi era Military Intelligence chief Abdallah al-Senussi; he was among nine defendants sentenced to death in July 2015.¹⁰⁸

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009, 2015.

See United States.

¹⁰⁷ Freedom House, Freedom on the Net 2015 (Washington: Freedom House, 2015), 524, 533–534.

¹⁰⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 56, 233; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 382.

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2015.

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011.

In a speech on 20 August 2011, Mohamad (Mat) Sabu, an opposition member of parliament and former deputy president of the Parti Islam Se Malaysia (PAS; Pan Malaysian Islamic Party) declared that all those who fought the British had to be recognized as freedom fighters. As an example, he mentioned the leader of an attack by the Communist Party of Malaya on a police station in Bukit Kepong in 1950 in which a number of police officers were killed. According to Sabu, the police officers fought to defend the British occupiers, while the attackers fought for freedom. After a newspaper called Sabu a Communist supporter, scores of police reports were filed against him and he and his family were threatened. On 21 September 2011, he was charged with criminally defaming the police officers. On 8 July 2015, Sabu was acquitted after the trial court found that the prosecution had failed to prove its case. If convicted, he would have risked two years' imprisonment and disqualification from politics for another five years after the end of his sentence.¹⁰⁹

On 3 July 2015, Lena Hendry, a staff member of the human rights group Pusat KOMAS, was charged under the Film Censorship Act for organizing a private screening of the award-winning documentary, "No Fire Zone: The Killing Fields of Sri Lanka" in Kuala Lumpur in July 2013. If convicted, she faced three years' imprisonment and a fine of up to RM30,000 (US$7,000). In September 2015, the Federal Court rejected Hendry's constitutional challenge to the Film Censorship Act. Her trial was set to start in December 2015. Section 6 of the act prohibited the circulation, distribution, display, production, sale, hire or possession of any film, whether imported or domestically produced, without first obtaining approval from the government-appointed Board of Censors. The Sri Lankan embassy had publicly demanded that the film not be shown. The documentary concerned war crimes committed in the last months of Sri Lanka's civil war (2009), including Sri Lankan army artillery attacks that killed thousands of civilians and the extrajudicial executions of captured fighters and supporters of the secessionist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁹ Human Rights Watch, Creating a Culture of Fear: The Criminalization of Peaceful Expression in Malaysia (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 62–63.

¹¹⁰ Human Rights Watch, "Malaysia: Drop Charges for Showing Film" (14 September 2015); Human

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2013.

MALI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013–2015.

On 18 September 2015, the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued its first arrest warrant in the context of its Mali investigation: on 26 September 2015, Ahmad Al Faqi Al Mahdi, member of the armed opposition group Ansar Dine, was transferred from Niger to the ICC. During the occupation of Timbuktu, he was at the head of the “Hesbah” (“Manners’ Brigade”) (May–September 2012) and associated with the work of the Islamic Court of Timbuktu. He was reportedly involved in the destruction of historical and religious monuments. He was suspected of war crimes over the destruction of nine mausoleums and a mosque in Timbuktu in 2012, the first case of its kind before the ICC.

Among the monuments were the mausoleum of Sidi Mahmoud Ben Omar Mohamed Aquit; the mausoleum of Sheikh Mohamed Mahmoud Al Arawani; the mausoleum of Sheikh Sidi Mokhtar Ben Sidi Muhammad Ben Sheikh Alkabir; the mausoleum of Alpha Moya Lamtouni (?—1605); the mausoleum of Sheikh Sidi Ahmed Ben Amar Arragadi; the mausoleum of Sheikh Muhammad El Micky; the mausoleum of Cheick Abdoul Kassim Attouaty; the mausoleum of Ahamed Fulane; the mausoleum of Bahaber Babadié, and the Sidi Yahia mosque. Preliminary hearings were due to be held in January 2016.

On 1 March 2016, when the confirmation of charges hearing was opened at the ICC, the United Nations Special Rapporteur in the Field of Cultural Rights, Karima Bennouna, said: “The destruction of cultural heritage is a violation of human rights ... It is impossible to separate a people’s cultural heritage from the people itself and their rights. Clearly, we must now understand that when cultural heritage is under attack, it is also the people and their fundamental human rights that are under attack.” She welcomed the decision of the ICC Prosecutor’s Office, for the first time, to charge the destruction of cultural and religious sites, as well as historical monuments, as a stand-alone war crime.¹¹¹

The government made little progress in holding to account those from all warring factions responsible for law-of-war violations committed during the 2012–2013 armed conflict. With few exceptions, judicial authorities failed to investigate over 100 complaints filed by victims and family members. In March 2015, seven human rights organizations filed complaints on behalf of 33 victims, against 15 people, for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in 2012. Moreover, the case regarding the torture and enforced disappearance in 2012 of 21 elite “Red Berets,” which in 2013 and 2014 resulted in charges against some 25 soldiers, including General Amadou Haya Sanogo (leader of the military junta that ruled Mali for part of 2012), had, in late 2015, failed to move past the investigations phase. In October 2015, eight supporters of Sanogo escaped from prison.

During 2015, the authorities freed at least 74 detainees, including several allegedly implicated in serious international crimes during the 2012–2013 armed conflict. The releases, characterized by the government as a “confidence-building measure” in the context of negotiations, were carried out without regard to whether the men might have been responsible for serious crimes. The peace accord lacked provisions to address impunity and the need for justice for serious crimes committed by all sides during the conflict. In October 2015, the United Nations Independent Expert on the situation of human rights in Mali expressed deep concern about the time taken to investigate and bring to trial cases of war crimes and human rights violations committed during the conflict.

In 2014, President Ibrahim Boubacar Keita had established the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (CVJR) by executive order. The Commission would have a three year mandate, covering the period from 1960 to 2013. It was to consist of fifteen members and seven working groups. It would function under the Ministry of National Reconciliation and Development of the North. In August 2015, the government appointed Ousmane Oumarou Sidibé, a former minister and member of the political opposition, as commission chairman; however, his appointment and the credibility of the body were limited due to the government’s failure to consult sufficiently with a wide variety of stakeholders on the commission’s membership, mandate powers, and degree of independence.¹¹²

¹¹¹ International Criminal Court, “Ahmad Al Faqi Al Mahdi Makes First Appearance before the ICC” (Press Release; 30 September 2015); Wim Brummelman, “Primeur: Aangeklaagd voor vernietigen werelderfgoed,” NRC Handelsblad (30 September 2015); Bert Lanting, “Strafhof berecht jihadist om vernieling graftombes,” Volkscrant (28 September 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 345; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 397; “When Cultural Heritage Is under Attack, Human Rights Are under Attack’– UN Expert,” UN News Centre (4 March 2016); United Nations Special Rapporteur in the Field of Human Rights, Intentional Destruction of Cultural Heritage (A/HRC/31/59; 3 February 2016).

¹¹² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 244, 245; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 397, 398.

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015.

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011.

In August 2015, a new law was adopted against slavery (amending the 2007 law), defining slavery as a crime against humanity, doubling the prison term for offenders and defining ten types of slavery, including forced marriage. In December 2015, two people were placed in detention and charged with acts of slavery.¹¹³

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2015.

Since 2006, Mexico's security forces have participated in widespread enforced disappearances. In August 2014, the government publicly acknowledged that the whereabouts of over 22,000 people who had gone missing since 2006 remained unknown. That number increased to more than 25,500, according to the National Registry of Disappeared or Missing Persons, which was established by law in 2012. By the end of 2015, the government reported that 27,638 people (20,203 men and 7,435 women) were missing but did not specify how many were subjected to enforced disappearance.

¹¹³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 248.

Prosecutors and police routinely failed to carry out basic investigative steps to identify those responsible, often telling the missing people's families to investigate on their own.

In 2013, the federal government created a unit in the Attorney General's Office to investigate disappearances. Officials from the unit said that they did not know of a single case in which someone had been convicted for an enforced disappearance committed since 2007. In April 2015, the legislature approved a constitutional reform that required the federal legislature to pass general laws on enforced disappearance and torture, which would establish a single nationwide definition for each of the crimes and facilitate their nationwide prosecution. On 10 December 2015, President Enrique Peña Nieto sent a bill to Congress which fell short of international standards.¹¹⁴

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2013.

See China.

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2013, 2015.

In September 2015, the United Nations Committee on Enforced Disappearances expressed concerns about shortcomings in war crimes proceedings, urged the authorities to recognize the relatives of the disappeared as victims, and called on the new Commission on Missing Persons to establish the whereabouts of 61 people missing since the armed conflicts of 1991–1995. In October 2015, the State Prosecutor rejected a request to review the legality of the final judgment in the “Deportations Case” which had acquitted nine former police officials of the enforced disappearance in 1992 of 60 Bosnian refugees.¹¹⁵

¹¹⁴ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 250–251; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 400–401.

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013, 2015.

Maâti Monjib ([1960]–) is a historian of political ideas and of the Maghreb. Born in Morocco, he got his first Ph.D. in France (North African politics) and another one in Senegal (African political history). He is a member of the Institut des études africaines (IEA; Institute for African Studies) at Mohamed V University in Rabat and the chairman (since early 2014) of the Rabat-based pluralist NGO Freedom Now–Comité pour la protection de la liberté de la presse et d’expression and the Association marocaine pour un journalisme d’investigation (AMJI; Moroccan Association of Investigative Journalism).

After the death of King Hassan II in 1999, Monjib returned to Morocco to work at the University of Mohammed V-Rabat. Between 2007 and 2010, he initiated a dialogue between left-wing democrats and moderate islamists. He was a founding member of the support council of the 20 February Movement, which organized protests in Morocco at the beginning of the Arab Spring. He founded and directed the Ibn Rochd Center for Studies and Communication in Rabat which trained hundreds of Moroccan journalists in investigative techniques and civic journalism. In November 2014, he shut down the institute after repeated interference from the state. Freedom Now, established in 2011, was refused registration by the authorities, reportedly because it is perceived as an anti-royalist front. Monjib had criticized the monarchy in columns in the foreign press in the past.

Since 2013, a long campaign of harassment and intimidation has been waged against him, including threats and defamatory articles in newspapers and on news sites. On 31 August 2015, he was detained briefly at the airport when returning from France. He was told that he was under investigation for “endangering state security.” On 14 September 2015, he was interrogated by the Brigade nationale de la police judiciaire (BNPJ) and accused of tarnishing Morocco’s image abroad, using foreign funds to promote a foreign agenda and sabotaging the credibility of state institutions. His associates were also questioned. On 16 September 2015, he went on hunger strike for the first time (until 19 September) after being barred from leaving Morocco for a conference in Barcelona. Authorities declared that they imposed the ban because of their investigation into suspected financial wrongdoing regarding the Ibn Rochd Center. The IEA board refused to give him permission to travel to Norway to attend two academic events related to his expertise. On 6 October 2015, he went on hunger strike at the headquarters of the Moroccan Association for Human Rights, Rabat, to protest against the restrictions against his freedom of movement and his academic freedom. On 20 October 2015, the secretariat of the National Committee to Support Maati Monjib issued a statement reporting a rapid deterioration in his health after fourteen days of hunger strike, and called for a show of solidarity with Monjib on 21 October in front of parliament. During his hunger strike, he collapsed twice and he was hospitalized. On 29 October 2015, Monjib suspended his hunger strike after authorities ended the travel ban. Instead, he was charged with receiving foreign funds with the intent to undermine Moroccan institutions and endanger national security. His trial before the Tribunal of First Instance in Rabat was due to start on 23 March 2016, and then the opening was postponed until 29 June 2016; he and six others faced up to five years' imprisonment if sentenced. Their crime was to have organized training sessions in the use of a smartphone app called Story Maker within the Ibn Rochd Center and AMJI with the support of the Dutch NGO Free Press Unlimited, and to have received funds from abroad to finance this project.

¹¹⁵ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 255.

Also in late 2015, Monjib sued the Moroccan website "Le360" for defamation in Paris following several articles over the previous months that denigrated him and his family. This trial was due to start in late January 2016.

Monjib is the author of La Monarchie marocaine et la lutte pour le pouvoir: Hassan II face à l'opposition nationale (The Moroccan Monarchy and the Struggle for Power: Hassan II Facing the National Opposition) (Paris: L'Harmattan, 1992), A Political Biography of Mehdi Ben Barka, with Z. Daoud (Paris: Éditions Michalon, 1996–2000), and editor of Islamists versus Secularists in Morocco, ed. (Amsterdam: IKV, 2009).¹¹⁶

Fifty years after the disappearance of left-wing political leader Mehdi Ben Barka (1920–1965) in Paris

¹¹⁶ Maâti Monjib, Personal communication (11 & 13 & 15 October 2015); "Situation personnelle de l'historien de nationalités française et marocaine Maâti Monjib" (Profile, October 2015); Freedom Now, Petition text (11 September 2015); Comité international de soutien à Maâti Monjib, Communiqué (15 November 2015); Biographical notes, Codesria and Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; Charlotte Bozonnet, "L'universitaire marocain Maati Monjib en grève de la faim," Le Monde (16 October 2015); Paul Schemm "Moroccan Journalist on Hunger Strike, Barred From Leaving," AP (17 September 2015); Reporters without Borders, "Monarchy's Red Lines Gag Morocco's Independent Media" (17 September 2015); Middle East Studies Association, "Letters on Morocco" (13 October 2015); Wagdy Sawahel, "Academic on Hunger Strike over Travel Ban, Harassment," University World News (22 October 2015); Wagdy Sawahel, "Academic Suspends Hunger Strike as Travel Ban Is Lifted," University World News (5 November 2015); Aziz El Yaakoubi, "Moroccan Intellectual Suspends Hunger Strike, Faces Charges: Lawyer," Reuters (29 October 2015); Le comité international de soutien à Maâti Monjib, "Maâti Monjib porte plainte contre le site 'Le360' pour diffamation" (press release; 10 January 2016); "Pétition pour l'abandon des poursuites contre les sept militants marocains des droits humains" (13 January 2016); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 409–410; Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 257; Le comité international de soutien à Maâti Monjib, "Le procès de Maati Monjib et des six autres activistes des droits humains reporté au 29 juin 2016" (press release; 24 March 2016); four NCH campaigns on <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content/ca.html>.

on 29 October 1965, Amnesty International urged the French authorities to declassify all its records related to him and the Moroccan authorities to cooperate with a new French investigation. In 1964, the Moroccan authorities had sentenced Ben Barka to death in his absence for allegedly plotting against King Hassan II. In June 1967, a French court had convicted several people (including Moroccan Minister of Interior, General Mohammed Oufkir) for Ben Barka's abduction; Oufkir was sentenced in absentia to life imprisonment. A French investigation (France's longest-standing) into his disappearance opened in 1975 remained pending forty years on. Access to classified information in France, to witnesses and suspects in Morocco, and to a former secret detention center located in Rabat and suspected to contain part of Ben Barka's remains were cited as obstacles. In July 2015, a French investigating judge filed new requests to search the Moroccan location and to question a witness in Israel who made revelations earlier in 2015 about the Mossad's involvement in the disappearance. Morocco never made an official enquiry into Ben Barka's fate. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2000, 2002–2003.]¹¹⁷

The authorities failed to implement recommendations made by the Equity and Reconciliation Commission, which examined human rights violations between 1956 and 1999, including a national strategy to combat impunity.¹¹⁸

The Polisario Front again failed to take any steps to hold to account those responsible for human rights abuses committed in the 1970s and 1980s in camps under its control.¹¹⁹

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2015.

State officials, including members of the security forces, remained protected from prosecution for past human rights violations by immunity provisions in the 2008 Constitution. In December 2015, a bill was submitted to Parliament which would guarantee former presidents lifetime immunity from prosecution for “actions”—which could include human rights violations, crimes against humanity and war crimes—taken while they were in office.¹²⁰

¹¹⁷ Amnesty International, “Time for Truth 50 Years after Enforced Disappearance of Opposition Leader Mehdi Ben Barka” (MDE 29/2747/2015; London: AI, 28 October 2015).

¹¹⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 259.

¹¹⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 260.

¹²⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 265.

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011.

On 7 September 2015, the Caprivi detainees' trial concluded. Judge Elton Hoff found thirty of the sixty-five accused guilty of charges of high treason, nine charges of murder, and ninety counts of attempted murder. Thirty-two people were acquitted and released, and a further three were found guilty of other charges.

The detainees were originally arrested and charged in 1999 for allegedly attempting to secede the then Caprivi region from Namibia. They had spent more than fourteen years in remand prison. The majority of them suffered health problems linked to age and prolonged detention and many of their relatives had no means of visiting them. Many of the Caprivi detainees were possible prisoners of conscience because they were arrested solely on the basis of their actual or perceived political views, ethnicity or membership of certain organizations. The length of their pre-trial detention violated the rights of the accused to a fair trial. Ten of the accused died in police custody before the High Court trial commenced in Grootfontein, Otjozondjupa Region, in 2003, while another 12 who went on trial died before its end. Most of the detainees reported being tortured or otherwise ill-treated at the time of their arrest. In passing his verdict, Judge Hoff upheld a 2001 Supreme Court decision, making confessions extracted under coercion inadmissible and also dismissed testimonies secured by torture or illegal police behavior.¹²¹

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2015.

Authorities made little progress on justice for serious abuses committed by both sides during the civil war (1996–2006). At least 13,000 people were killed and over 1,300 forcibly disappeared during the decade-long conflict. While Nepal delivered interim monetary and in-kind compensation to the families of those who were disappeared or killed during the conflict, others, such as survivors of sexual violence or torture, received no compensation from the state. In March 2015, the Supreme Court ruled against problematic provisions of the 2014 Truth, Reconciliation and Disappearances Act, striking down amnesty provisions and emphasizing that the Attorney General's Office retained authority to recommend prosecutions, and directed the government to remedy the law. In February 2015, the government set up legal and institutional frameworks for a Truth and Reconciliation ¹²¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 265–266.

Commission and Disappearances Commission, both called for in the act, and appointed some initial commissioners without amending the act as directed by the Supreme Court. The work of the commissions remained stalled in late 2015.¹²²

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2015.

In April 2015, a court in Arnhem ruled that a former Dutch commander and his two adjutants would not be prosecuted for complicity in war crimes and genocide at Srebrenica. In June 2015, the Netherlands paid compensation to relatives of victims of the Srebrenica genocide in 1995 who were forced to leave a United Nations compound by Dutch peacekeepers.¹²³

In August 2015, Dutch-Surinamese journalist Sandew Hira, director of the International Institute for Scientific Research (IISR), called on the Dutch government to open its archives—part of which is closed until 2060—about the military regime of Desi Bouterse (1980–1987) in order to collect evidence on the 1982 December murders. The foreign Ministry took the request into consideration. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2001–2004, 2010, 2012–2013.]¹²⁴

In August 2015, the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination expressed concerns over reports that citizens seeking to protest peacefully against portrayals of the traditional “Black Pete” (Zwarte Piet) figure of the Sinterklaas festival were denied authorization to conduct such protests at a meaningful time and place and subjected to violent attacks and other forms of intimidation, which were not adequately investigated. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]¹²⁵

In early October 2015, on a conference about crimes committed in Indonesia in 1965, Geoffrey Robinson, a Canadian historian and human rights expert at the University of California in Los Angeles, made an appeal to establish an international truth commission to investigate the war crimes

¹²² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 268; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 417, 419.

¹²³ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 262.

¹²⁴ “Sandew Hira: open archieven over Bouterse,” NOS (4 August 2015); “Bouterse: geen Nederlandse steun bij staatsgreep,” Volkskrant (9 December 2015).

¹²⁵ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 262.

committed after the Dutch colonial power refused to recognize the Indonesian declaration of independence in August 1945 and launched the so-called Police Actions (1945–1949). Historical research about the period was to support such a commission.¹²⁶

On 3 April 2016, Jules Schelvis (1921–2016) died. A Jewish typesetter and graphic designer who passed through seven concentration camps from May 1943 until May 1945, he became a historian after his retirement. He wrote books about the camps, including Sobibór, and was a complainant (Nebenkläger) in the case of John Demjanjuk. In 2008, he received a honorary doctorate from the University of Amsterdam.¹²⁷

See also Morocco, Serbia/Kosovo, Suriname.

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007.

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2013.

See Mali.

¹²⁶ Anne-Lot Hoek, “Waarheidscommissie Indië is nodig; Interview Geoffrey Robinson,” NRC Handelsblad (10–11 October 2015), 21.

¹²⁷ NRC Handelsblad (13 April 2011), 16; “Jules Schelvis,” Wikipedia (10 April 2011); Bas Blokker, “Hij móést over Sobibor vertellen,” NRC Handelsblad (5 April 2016), 6.

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2013.

Despite promises by President Muhammadu Buhari to investigate crimes under international law and other serious human rights violations and abuses committed by the military and Boko Haram, no meaningful action was taken. The government failed to hold its own forces to account, and prosecuted few people suspected of being Boko Haram members. However, the Office of the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Court identified eight potential cases involving crimes against humanity and war crimes: six involving Boko Haram and two involving the Nigerian security forces.¹²⁸

See also Gabon, Sierra Leone, South Sudan.

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012.

On 19 January 2015, the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal by a Rwandan national against his 2013 conviction by the Oslo District Court for murder during the 1994 genocide in Rwanda. The Court of Appeal confirmed his sentence of 21 years' imprisonment for premeditated complicity in the murder of 2,000 people in two massacres, and of seven people in a separate incident. He appealed against the decision to the Supreme Court. He was not charged with genocide, as the article defining genocide only entered into force in 2008 and did not have retroactive effect.¹²⁹

See also China, Rwanda.

¹²⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 21.

¹²⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 278.

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012, 2014.

On 3 December 2015, Sayed Wiqar Ali Shah, chairman of the history department of Quaid-i-Azam University (QAU), Islamabad, and director of the QUA National Institute of Historical and Cultural Research (NIHCR), was dismissed as director because he had defended views that were in conflict with the official views of Pakistan's history.

During a speech at the International Conference on Sindh History and Culture at the Shah Abdul Latif University, Khairpur, in late November 2015, Wiqar Shah had challenged some official historical notions and argued that there is a need to rewrite history with a special focus on regional history, and particularly on Sindh. Presenting his paper, entitled "Identity Crisis and the Responsibilities of the Present Pakistani Historians," he praised nationalist leaders such as Ghulam Murtaza Syed (Sayed) (1904–1995) (who initially had supported Pakistan and then ended up as an advocate for the creation of Sindhu Desh), Bacha Khan (1890–1988) and Wali Khan (1917–2006) and pre-partition heroes such as Bhagat Singh (1907–1931). He also argued that historians should focus on the progressive leaders of India and Pakistan and that more research was needed on the pre-Islamic period (Mohenjo Daro and the international trade routes of ancient times).

These views were reportedly brought to the attention of Higher Education Commission (HEC) chairperson Mukhtar Ahmed, who subsequently sought a report from the QAU vice chancellor, as a consequence of which Shah was removed from his post as NIHCR director. Shah explained to the vice chancellor that as a historian it was his responsibility to encourage new historians to conduct research on important and hitherto neglected topics. Shah did his doctoral research on the Khudai Khidmatgars and the politics of the North-West Frontier Province from 1937 to 1947 (1997).¹³⁰

On 22 January 2016, the United Nations Special Rapporteurs on Housing and Cultural Rights called on the government to halt the ongoing construction work of the Orange metro line in Lahore, which had resulted in numerous forced evictions and threatened a large number of protected heritage sites and historic buildings. The project passed through the historic center of Lahore, threatening pre-Partition buildings, minority places of worship, historic tombs and shrines and gardens, many of which were registered as protected heritage sites.¹³¹

¹³⁰ Kashif Abbasi, "Historian Removed for Attempting to Rewrite History?" Dawn (10 December 2015); "Dr. Syed Waqar Ali Shah," Pakistan Herald; Naazir Mahmood, "In Quest of Academic Freedom," The News on Sunday (13 March 2016).

¹³¹ "UN Experts Urge Pakistan to Halt Forced Evictions and Demolitions for New Metro Line in Lahore," (United Nations Press Release; Geneva, 22 January 2016).

See also Bangladesh.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2013–2015.

See Syria.

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2013, 2015.

The trial of former President Manuel Noriega for the enforced disappearance of union leader and activist Heliodoro Portugal in 1970 was suspended shortly before it was due to begin in May 2015. The suspension came after Noriega's lawyer appealed, arguing that the trial would violate the terms of his extradition from France in 2011. It was unclear when the court would rule on the appeal or if the trial would proceed. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights had ruled in 2008 that Panama was responsible for Portugal's enforced disappearance as well as the failure to investigate the crime. It also ruled that the government had to carry out an effective investigation and ensure the perpetrators were punished, as well as make reparations to the family. Although Panama ratified the International Convention against Enforced Disappearance in 2011, it had not recognized the competence of the Committee on Enforced Disappearances to receive and consider communications from or on behalf of victims or from other states parties.¹³²

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

¹³² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 29, 287.

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012, 2015.

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2015.

In 2003, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents. In a landmark trial, former President Alberto Fujimori was sentenced in 2009 to 25 years' imprisonment for killings and disappearances in 1991 and 1992. Courts consistently rejected petitions to reverse his sentence. Fujimori's intelligence advisor, Vladimiro Montesinos, three former army generals, and members of the Colina group, a government death squad, were also serving sentences ranging from 15 to 25 years for the assassination in 1991 of fifteen people in the Lima district of Barrios Altos, and for six disappearances. The courts made much less progress in addressing violations that occurred under the earlier administrations of Fernando Belaúnde (1980–1985) and Alan García (1985–1990). In a report issued in August 2013 to mark the tenth anniversary of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's final report, the human rights ombudsman found that, despite initial efforts, Peru had failed to consolidate a specialized judicial system with sufficient staff and resources to bring most cases to court.

In September 2015, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that Peru was responsible for the forced disappearance of fifteen people, including seven children, from the peasant community of Santa Bárbara, in Huancavelica, in 1991, and ordered Peru to prosecute those responsible, offer reparation to the relatives and exhume and identify the remains of the victims.

As of November 2015, only about two percent of the human rights violations committed during the armed conflict had been brought to trial, according to Human Rights Trials in Peru, a project based at George Mason University that monitors human rights prosecutions. In 2015, court hearings continued into their fifth year in two emblematic cases: torture and disappearances at the Los Cabitos military base in Ayacucho in 1983 and a massacre at Accomarca in 1985 in which an army unit killed 62 peasants. In May 2015, the Attorney General's Office reopened an investigation into forced sterilizations committed during Fujimori's administration. More than 2,000 forced sterilizations were reported to authorities, but these represented only a small portion of the cases, according to human rights groups. In November 2015, President Ollanta Moisés Humala Tasso signed a decree to create a national registry of victims of forced sterilizations.

In June 2015, the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances expressed concern about how few cases of disappearances had been brought to trial and about Peru's slow progress in the search for victims. The group also noted that most of the recommendations made by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission had not been implemented. In August 2015, the human rights ombudsman concluded that reparations for victims of the internal armed conflict, made pursuant to a 2005 law, had been “insufficient” and that some programs called for in the law still had not been implemented—ten years after it was passed.¹³³

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2015.

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011, 2014–2015.

On 9 February 2016, Jan Gross, Holocaust scholar and history professor at Princeton University, was threatened with being stripped of the Knight's Cross of the Order of Merit of the Republic of Poland, which was awarded him in 1996 for his past opposition to the Communist regime. His critical research into less “positive” aspects of Polish history contrasted with the views of the nationalist Law and Justice (PiS) government, in power since November 2015, which wanted to “restore Polish national pride” by emphasizing heroic periods and glorious themes in national history. In his works, Gross had often claimed that Poles had been complicit in Nazi war crimes. In September 2015, in an article published in the German newspaper Die Welt, he had lamented eastern European countries' reluctance to accept refugees and asserted that Poles killed more Jews than they did Nazis during World War II. Prosecutors in Warsaw decided to investigate whether Gross had broken laws prohibiting the defamation of Poland.

On 15 February 2016, the government announced a memory law, which would impose a sentence of five years' imprisonment for those who “blamed the Polish nation for Nazi or Stalinist crimes.” In particular the phrase “Polish death camps” in reference to wartime Nazi concentration camps on Polish ¹³³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 292; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 453–454, 456.

soil, would be targeted, justice minister Zbigniew Ziobro declared. Poland had long sought to eliminate the misleading phrase from historical and newspaper accounts since it suggested that Poland, itself occupied by Nazi Germany during World War II, was responsible for concentration camps on its territory.¹³⁴

See also United States.

¹³⁴ Reuters, "Poland Plans to Punish Use of the Phrase 'Polish Death Camps'," Guardian (13 February 2016); Alex Duval Smith, "Polish Move to Strip Holocaust Expert of Award Sparks Protests," Guardian (14 February 2016); Jan Grabowski, "'Patriotic' Move Threatens Academic Freedom," University World News (17 February 2016); Selma Leydesdorff, "Polen dupeert zijn schrijver Jan Gross—om de Joden," NRC Handelsblad (16 February 2016), 16; Roeland Termote, "Noem je Auschwitz een 'Pools kamp'? 5 jaar celstraf," NRC Handelsblad (17 February 2016), 14.

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

See United States.

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2015.

In July 2009 Nikolay Koposov, historian of early modern France and founding dean (1998–2009) of the Smolny College of Liberal Arts and Sciences at St. Petersburg State University, and his wife Dina Khapaeva, also a historian, were dismissed for their criticism of the memory politics of the Putin administration. In an article in the Duma's official newspaper, Sergei Mironov, the chair of the Council of Federation of the Duma, called their work "a danger to Russia's national security." They emigrated to Finland, where they worked at the Collegium for Advanced Study in Helsinki, and the United States. Khapaeva was appointed chair of the School of Modern Languages at Georgia Institute of Technology, Atlanta, Georgia; Koposov became a visiting professor at Johns Hopkins University history department, Baltimore, Maryland. In 2015, Koposov declared that he resigned (rather than "was dismissed") "when he realized Smolny was losing its autonomous status and moving away from its founding principles."¹³⁵

In 2015, Russia vetoed a Security Council resolution that would have condemned the 1995 killings in Srebrenica as a genocide.¹³⁶

On 27 February 2015, one of Russia's most prominent opposition activists, Boris Nemtsov, was shot dead within sight of the Kremlin. Mourners wishing to commemorate him at the site of his death were harassed by city authorities and pro-government supporters.¹³⁷

On 9 March 2015, Aleksandr Kravchenko, Veldar Shukurdzhiiev and history teacher Leonid Kuzmin

¹³⁵ Nikolay Koposov, "'The Armored Train of Memory: The Politics of History in Post-Soviet Russia,'" Perspectives on History (January 2011), 23–26; Gabrielle Spiegel, "Nikolay Koposov to Be Visiting Professor at Johns Hopkins University for 2012–2013," Perspectives on History (September 2012); Gabrielle Spiegel, personal communication (July 2013); Matthew Luxmoore, "Students Allege Political Purge at Russia's Oldest University," Aljazeera (23 May 2015).

¹³⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 477.

¹³⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 303.

were arrested at a small street gathering in Simferopol intended to celebrate the 201st anniversary of the birth of the Ukrainian poet Taras Shevchenko (1814–1861), at which they used national symbols such as yellow and blue ribbons. They were taken to a police station, released after three hours and sentenced to forty hours of community labor each, for violating rules of public assembly. They subsequently faced harassment by members of the anti-extremism police unit, including arrests and informal interrogations. Kuzmin also lost his job as a history teacher.¹³⁸

In May 2015, Crimean authorities once again refused to allow public events in Simferopol to commemorate the 1944 deportation of Crimean Tatars. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2014–2015.]¹³⁹

On 8 July 2015, the Russian State Archive published on its website a 1948 top-secret memo signed by Chief Military Prosecutor Nikolai Afanasyev arguing that legends of heroism attributed to “Panfilov’s 28,” a group of soldiers credited with having halted Nazi tanks headed for Moscow in 1941 before perishing together on the battlefield, were not accurate. On 20 July 2015, the head of the archive, Sergei Mirinenko ([1951–]), called the heroic stories a “falsification,” invented by a war journalist. The archive was attacked by Andrei Shalyopa, a director who prepared a film on Panfilov’s 28 (due for release in May 2016) and said that the publication undermined the “moral potential” of the nation. Publicly praising plans for the film, Minister of Culture and chair of the Russian Military History Society Vladimir Medinsky (author of popular history books) commented that the Russian State Archive “should not give its own evaluations of archival documents.” He stated that the head of an archive “is not a writer, a journalist, or a fighter against the fabrication of history.” He added that archival workers “can provide documents to people, but then journalists should draw their own conclusions” and “The question of what archival workers should be doing has arisen. They should do what the government pays them to do, and they should not try to master other professions in the process.” In mid-March 2016, Mirinenko was demoted and made head of research. His deputy, Larisa Rogovaya, was made acting director. In June 2015, Mirinenko had also attacked Soviet myths at the World Congress of the Russian Press, debunking the Panfilov legend and saying that the August 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact should be called the Hitler-Stalin Pact.

In October 2015, the Russian Defense Ministry announced that it would deploy small special research units to its Central Archive by 2016 to defend itself against ‘falsifications’ in accounts of the Soviet Red Army’s conduct during World War II.¹⁴⁰

¹³⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 381.

¹³⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 601; Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 381.

¹⁴⁰ Anna Dolgov, “Russian Archives Cast Doubt on Legends of Soviet War Heroes,” Moscow Times (9 July 2015); TASS, “Ahead of Patriotic Film Release, Russian Culture Minister Tells Archival Workers to Pipe Down” (31 July 2015); Tom Balforth, “Russian Archive Chief Out After

On 31 July 2015, the Ministry of Education in Yekaterinburg ordered all schools and colleges of the region to remove the books of British historians Antony Beevor and John Keegan “from the access of students and teaching staff,” claiming they promoted “Nazi stereotypes” (namely that Red Army soldiers engaged in mass rapes of German women in the later stages of the war). Beevor’s work had caused outrage in Russia, particularly his book Berlin: The Downfall (2002) (containing extensive material about rapes carried out by Soviet soldiers against German women in 1945) and his book on the battle of Stalingrad (1942–1943), a Soviet victory which came at great human cost. When Berlin was published in 2002, the Russian ambassador in London, Grigori Karasin, had accused Beevor of “lies, slander and blasphemy against the Red Army.”¹⁴¹

In September 2015, the Human Rights Center (HRC) Memorial was fined Rub 600,000 (US$ 8,800) after its sister organization, the Historical and Educational Center Memorial—which was not on the foreign agents register—did not mark its publications with the label “foreign agent.” [See NCH Annual Reports 2001, 2005–2006, 2009–2015.] The HRC Memorial lost its court appeal against the decision. Following a regular inspection of the HRC Memorial in November 2015, the Ministry of Justice concluded that its criticism of the Bolotnaya Square trials (held after arrests following protests on the day before the 2012 inauguration of President Vladimir Putin) and of Russian policies in Ukraine “undermined the foundations of the constitutional system” and amounted to “calls for the overthrow of the current government and change of the political regime.” The Ministry submitted its “findings” to the Prosecutor’s Office for further investigation. During the same month, Thorbjørn Jagland, the Council of Europe’s secretary general, called the Ministry of Justice’s accusations against Memorial “extremely worrying” and urged the government “to protect the activities of human rights defenders in Russia, including the work of Memorial.” He also reiterated that “the recently adopted NGO legislation, including the NGO ‘foreign agents’ law, should be revised.”¹⁴²

After a complaint by Dmitry Zakharov, a member of the Just Russia party, that the Library of Ukrainian Literature in Moscow was storing newspapers that “distorted historical facts” and exhibited Debunking Soviet WW II Legend,” RFE/RL News (17 March 2016); Matthew Bodner, “Russian Defense Ministry Plans Archive Unit to Counter ‘WWII Lies’,” Moscow Times (12 October 2015); Peter Hobson, “Battle in the Archives—Uncovering Russia’s Secret Past,” Moscow Times (24 March 2016).

¹⁴¹ Antony Beevor, “By Banning My Book, Russia Is Deluding Itself about Its Past,” Guardian (5 August 2015); Shaun Walker, “Russian Region Bans British Historians, Books from Schools,” Guardian (5 August 2015); Matthew Bodner, “Russian Defense Ministry Plans Archive Unit to Counter ‘WWII Lies’,” Moscow Times (12 October 2015).

¹⁴² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 016), 466, 470, 475; Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 305.

a “Russophobic nature,” armed and masked law enforcement officers raided the library on 28 October 2015, seized files and about 200 books and pamphlets, and detained director Natalya Sharina ([1957–]). The next day, a criminal case was opened against her on suspicion of inciting ethnic hatred and breaking the law on extremism. The Investigative Committee stated that it wanted her arrest after the investigators found books in the library that allegedly disseminated “anti-Russian propaganda,” including works by radical nationalist activist Dmytro Korchynsky [Dmitry Korchinsky], which were declared extremist by a court and banned in Russia. A spokesman for the library said that the most controversial items were stored in a separate room and could only be given to political analysts and historians who need it for professional purposes. The library, which contained around 30,000 books, mostly in Ukrainian, had been targeted by Russian investigators before—in 2010 and 2011.¹⁴³

In January 2016, the official commission on state secrets rejected a petition from over 60,000 Russians (collected by the activist group Komanda 29) to open the archive of the Soviet secret police and intelligence agencies (1917–1991), stating that the files would instead remain classified until 2044 and that the files “continued to have relevance to the present day and their circulation could bring harm to the Russian Federation.” Although in 1992 then-President Boris Yeltsin had signed a decree to move all Soviet classified files dealing with repressions into the public domain, they had been released piecemeal; in March 2014 the “Interdepartmental on the Protection of State Secrets” decided to extend the classified status of files until 2044.¹⁴⁴

In March 2016, the St Petersburg chapter of Nationalist group Narodny Sobor (National Union) lodged a complaint against historian Kirill Aleksandrov under the Russian law forbidding the propagation of “wars of aggression.” In February 2016, Aleksandrov had defended his PhD thesis, “The generals and the officer corps of the armed forces of the Committee for the Liberation of the Peoples of Russia, 1943–1946,” at the St Petersburg Academy of Sciences’ History Institute. The thesis was a study about Red Army General Andrei Vlasov who became a Nazi collaborator and led a small Russian force (the “Russian Army of Liberation”) against the Soviet side in the spring of 1945. The thesis caused a major controversy, with war veterans among an audience of around ninety people attending the academic council meeting. The prosecutors requested a copy of the thesis to look into evidence of illegal statements. If the case would result in a criminal conviction, Aleksandrov faced fines and a prison term of up to five years. The story of Vlasov, though not widely known, had been the subject of several books and documentary films both in Russia and the West.¹⁴⁵

¹⁴³ “Russian Police Detain Director of Ukrainian Library in Moscow,” Guardian (29 October 2015); Darina Litvinova, “Director of Moscow Library of Ukrainian Literature Accused of Inciting Hatred,” Moscow Times (29 October 2015); Andrew Osborn, “Russia Raids Ukrainian Library in Moscow, Arrests Head,” Reuters (29 October 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 304.

¹⁴⁴ Damien Sharkov, “Kremlin Rejects Petition to Open Soviet Secret Police Archive,” Newsweek (20 January 2016).

See also Georgia, Hungary, Latvia, Ukraine.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2015.

On 24 October 2014, the Rwanda Utilities Regulatory Authority (RURA) suspended the British Broadcasting Corporation's (BBC) Kinyarwanda service's broadcasts in Rwanda. RURA said it had received complaints of incitement, hatred, divisionism, genocide denial and revision from members of the public after the 1 October 2014 BBC television documentary "Rwanda's Untold Story" was broadcast. On 19 November 2014, a commission of inquiry, established by RURA and headed by former Prosecutor General Martin Ngoga, began investigations into these allegations against the BBC. The commission's report, published on 28 February 2015, concluded that the BBC had, among other things, abused press freedom and violated Rwandan law relating to genocide denial, revisionism, inciting hatred and divisionism. It recommended that the agreement between the Rwandan government and the BBC be terminated and that authorities initiate criminal and civil proceedings to deal with the alleged offenses. On 29 May 2015, RURA indefinitely suspended the BBC Kinyarwanda service. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]¹⁴⁶

The United Nations-run International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), set up in 1994 to try those responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law in 1994, was due to close at the end of December 2015. The trial of Léon Mugesera, who had been transferred to Rwanda from Canada in 2012 and was accused, among other things, of public incitement to genocide, ended in Kigali. The high court was expected to deliver its judgement in April 2016. Courts in several European countries (France, Norway, Spain, Sweden) handled outstanding genocide cases.¹⁴⁷

See also Germany, Norway.

¹⁴⁵ Nick Holdsworth, "Calls for Prosecution over PhD Thesis on Soviet Traitor," University World News (11 March 2016).

¹⁴⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 456; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 479.

¹⁴⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 308–309; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 483.

SAINT VINCENT

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011, 2013.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009, 2013.

See also Chad.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2015.

War crimes prosecutions in Serbia were hampered by a lack of support from authorities and weak witness protection mechanisms. Few high-ranking former military and civilian personnel implicated in serious wartime abuses were held to account in Serbian courts. In late 2015, fourteen war crimes trials were ongoing at first instance and seven were under appeal in the Serbian courts. Indictments had been issued in sixteen cases awaiting trial, including eight former Bosnian Serb police officers charged in September 2015 for their part in the murder of over 1,000 Bosniak civilians in Kravica, Srebrenica (Bosnia and Herzegovina) in July 1995 during the genocide, the first indictment for Srebrenica crimes in the Serbian courts. Thirteen cases were under investigation.

In November 2014, Vojislav Šešelj, the war crimes suspect and nationalist Serbian Radical Party leader, who had been charged with persecution, murder, forced deportation, illegal imprisonment, torture, and property destruction during the Yugoslav wars against Croats, Bosniaks, and other non-Serbs, was granted provisional release for medical treatment by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). In March, the ICTY revoked his provisional release and ordered his return to The Hague. Šešelj defied the order and remained in Serbia. On 31 March 2016, he was acquitted on all counts pending appeal.¹⁴⁸

In February 2015, the United Nations Committee on Enforced Disappearances urged Serbia to bring to justice all those—including senior officials—suspected of criminal responsibility for enforced disappearances during the armed conflict (1991–1995), and to guarantee reparation and legal status to relatives of the disappeared. In November 2015, a proposed bill on the rights of war veterans and civilian victims of war failed to recognize the right to reparation for victims of enforced disappearance and war crimes of sexual violence; a December amendment was not made public.¹⁴⁹

Kosovo

On 3 February 2016, Prenk Gjetaj, president of Kosovo’s official commission on missing persons, called on Serbia to open its military and police archives in order to help find the locations of mass graves from the 1998–1999 war in Kosovo. More than 1,600 persons remained missing since the war. He also emphasized the need for a memorial center that conserved and displayed the possessions left behind by the missing who have been identified.¹⁵⁰

Inter-ethnic tensions were heightened by Kosovo’s unsuccessful application for UNESCO membership (and thus the custody of Serbian cultural monuments).¹⁵¹

Measures to establish a special court to prosecute former members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) were repeatedly delayed in the Kosovo Assembly. The measures followed a European Union-led investigation into the abduction and transfer of Kosovo Serbs and other prisoners to Albania in 1999, where they were subsequently tortured and murdered. Under international pressure, legislation establishing the special court was finally approved in August 2015. Kosovo as well as the host country, the Netherlands, had yet to complete the remaining agreements for the practical establishment of the court. The special court would adjudicate cases investigated by the Special Investigative Task Force, prompted by a 2011 Council of Europe report accusing some KLA members of abductions, beatings, summary executions, and the forced removal of human organs in Kosovo and Albania during and after the Kosovo war (1998–1999).

In May 2015, the first instance court in the capital Pristina convicted six former KLA members to ¹⁴⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 135; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 494–495.

¹⁴⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 316.

¹⁵⁰ Petrit Collaku & Amire Qamili, “Kosovo Asks Serbia to Open Military Archives,” Balkan Insight (3 February 2016).

¹⁵¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 317.

a total of 65 years' imprisonment for the torture, ill-treatment, and murder of prisoners in the KLA detention center in Likovac. The decision was under appeal as of mid-November 2015. In June, former Prime Minister Ramush Haradinaj was arrested in Slovenia on a Serbian warrant for alleged war crimes during the war. Slovenia did not extradite Haradinaj to Serbia, but released him later that month.

The National Council for Survivors of Wartime Sexual Violence, led by President Atifete Jahjaga, made progress toward establishing a verification commission to process reparation claims. In November 2015, an action plan to ensure their access to justice was finalized. In December, a regulation on victims of sexual violence in conflict was adopted.

In April 2015, staff of the European Union Rule of Law Mission (EULEX) exhumed three bodies from a suspected mass grave in the village of Lausa. That same month, Kosovo authorities started searching for suspected mass graves in twenty locations. By the end of September 2015, mixed panels consisting of EULEX and local judges handed down one decision at the first instance level and one case in the Court of Appeals. EULEX has been involved in a total of 35 verdicts since it had been established in 2008.

1,650 people remained missing in the aftermath of the armed conflict; no further grave sites were identified in Serbia or Kosovo despite exhumations at potential mass graves. In Krushe-e Vogel, where 68 men were missing, the EULEX exhumed bodies—believed to have been misidentified—from the cemetery, without adequately notifying the men's relatives. The United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) failed to provide reparation to the families of missing Kosovo Serbs, whose abductions had not been effectively investigated by UNMIK police.

The Human Rights Advisory Panel, an independent body set up in 2006 to examine complaints committed by or attributable to UNMIK, found violations in 31 out of 36 cases addressed between January and August 2015.¹⁵²

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, France.

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007. See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

¹⁵² Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 317–318; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 497–498.

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

In [2016], historian Ibrahim Abdullah's appointment as associate professor (2004–) and head of the Department of History and African Studies at Fourah Bay College, University of Sierra Leone, was changed from a tenured and pensionable position to a year's contract following a disagreement over the allocation of courses in his department. His salary was suspended and he was threatened with dismissal. Abdullah sent a complaint to President Ernest Bao Koroma, the chancellor of the university, but the matter was not taken up either by the presidential office or the Education Ministry. His colleagues sent a letter of protest to Koroma. Abdullah intended to bring the matter to court.

Abdullah was a contemporary historian, specialized in the history of the working class and youth development, and of culture and politics in West Africa. He taught in universities in Nigeria, South Africa, Canada and the United States before returning to Sierra Leone in 1997—in the middle of the civil war—to work at the University of Sierra Leone. A critic of the state of the university, he openly spoke against the decline of teaching and learning standards on the campus.¹⁵³

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011, 2015.

On 12 May 2015, the court found Amos Yee Pang Sang (1998–) [see NCH Annual Report 2015] guilty of “[u]ttering words, etc., with deliberate intent to wound the religious or racial feelings of any person” and “distribution of any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation or figure or any other obscene object whatsoever.” The remaining charge (“use [of] any threatening, abusive or insulting words or behavior”) was dropped, pending a possible trial in the future. The trial drew widespread criticism. On 6 July 2015, Yee was given a four-week prison sentence, equivalent to time served. In October, the High Court dismissed Yee's appeal of his conviction.¹⁵⁴

On 29 May 2015, the National Arts Council (NAC) withdrew a publishing grant of 8,000 Singapore dollar from the graphic novel The Art of Charlie Chan Hock Chye by artist-illustrator Sonny Liew. Khor

¹⁵³ Chernoh Alpha M. Bah, “Sierra Leone: The War against Academic Freedom—FBC and the Case of Prof. Ibrahim Abdullah,” All Africa (18 March 2016).

¹⁵⁴ Julian Simmons, “Lee Kuan Yew is Finally Dead! Blogger Prosecuted,” Free Speech Debate (9 October 2015); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 503–504.

Kok Wah, senior director of the NAC’s literary arts sector, said: “The retelling of Singapore’s history in the work potentially undermine[d] the authority or legitimacy of the government and its public institutions, and thus breache[d] our funding guidelines.” The book contained the story of comic-book artist Charlie Chan during the formative years of Singapore’s modern history, and featured personalities such as first Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew (1923–2015) and opposition politician Lim Chin Siong (1933–1996), and events such as the Hock Lee bus riots (12 May 1955) and Operation Spectrum (or “Marxist Conspiracy,” 1987). News of the withdrawal boosted sales of the book; the first print run sold out in a weekend.¹⁵⁵

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2013–2015.

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2013, 2015.

The authorities failed to provide redress for the human rights violations committed against former permanent residents of Slovenia originating from other former Yugoslav republics, known as the “erased,” whose legal status was unlawfully revoked in 1992. No new options had been offered to the remaining “erased” to restore their legal status and related rights since the expiry of the Legal Status Act in 2013. Less than half of the 25,671 “erased” persons had their status restored. In June 2015, the Constitutional Court ruled that compensation claims made by “erased” persons should not be subject to a statute of limitations, and courts should take into account the claimants’ special status. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2007–2009, 2011–2013, 2015.]¹⁵⁶

See also Serbia/Kosovo.

¹⁵⁵ Mayo Martin, “Graphic Novel ‘Undermines Govt’s Authority’: NAC,” Channel NewsAsia (3 June 2015).

¹⁵⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 323–324.

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012–2014.

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012–2015.

After the events in early 2015 [see NCH Annual Report 2015], a Rhodes Must Fall movement was established. In reaction to a campaign, led by a South African student, to remove a statue of Cecil Rhodes from Oxford University's Oriel College as part of a drive to distance the university and its curriculum from Britain's colonial past, the university's Chancellor, Lord Patten, defended its historical relationship with Rhodes (one of the alumni and benefactors of Oriel College), saying that many of the university's scholars depended on activities that would be "unacceptable" in the modern world. Oriel College donors threatened to withdraw gifts and bequests if the statue was taken down. Other students demanded to change the name of a computer room at Oxford's University College.

In February 2016, a wave of student disturbances hit six South African universities, some of it inspired by the Rhodes Must Fall movement and partly directed against colonial symbols. On 16 February 2016, University of Cape Town (UCT) students burned down historic artworks and photographs linked to the Apartheid era (1948–1994). This included at least one, and possibly two, paintings by artist Keresemose Richard Baholo. In the 1990s, he painted a series of pictures of protests at the UCT featuring Jameson Hall in the background.¹⁵⁷

In June 2015, the Southern African Litigation Centre took the government to court in an attempt to force it to implement an International Criminal Court (ICC) arrest warrant for Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir, who was in South Africa for an African Union summit. The North Gauteng High ¹⁵⁷ Javier Espinoza, "Cecil Rhodes: Lord Patten Warns against 'Pandering to Contemporary Views' over Statue Row," Telegraph (13 January 2016); Javier Espinoza, "Students demand Cecil Rhodes name to be removed from computer room at Oxford University," Telegraph (18 January 2016); "Spate of Student Violence Hits South African Universities," StarAfrica (19 February 2016); Munyaradzi Makoni & Karen MacGregor, "Violent Protests at Universities," University World News (20 February 2016); Cheryl Hudson, "History is not a Morality Play: Both Sides on #RhodesMustFall Debate Should Remember That," The Conversation (30 January 2016); Zenobia Ismail, "Taking the Fall for the Empire," University World News (5 February 2016); Barbara Speed, "Rhodes Isn't Falling at Oxford, but Universities' Racist Curriculums Still Could," New Statesman (29 January 2016); Mia Swart, "History Could Douse Campus Infernos," BDlive (29 February 2016); Lizeka Tandwa, "Historical Records like Rivonia Trial Documents Could Be Destroyed—Nzimande," News 24 (29 February 2016).

Court issued an interim order on 14 June preventing Bashir from leaving the country pending the finalization of the matter. On 15 June, North Gauteng High Court ordered the state respondents, who included the Ministers of Justice and Police, to arrest and detain Bashir for his subsequent transfer to the ICC. On 15 June, South African authorities allowed Bashir to leave the country in direct contravention of the interim court order. The North Gauteng High Court requested that the state submit an affidavit explaining how Bashir was allowed to leave the country. The state submitted its explanatory affidavit and filed for leave to appeal against the High Court judgment. On 16 September, the North Gauteng High Court denied the state leave to appeal, indicating that the issue was moot, and that there were no prospects of success on appeal. The state petitioned the Supreme Court of Appeal in October. Subsequently, South Africa stated it was considering withdrawing from the ICC.¹⁵⁸

See also Sierra Leone, United Kingdom.

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013, 2015.

An armed conflict, which erupted in December 2013, pitted forces loyal to President Salva Kiir against those loyal to former Vice-President Riek Machar. Armed militia groups allied to each side participated in the fighting, which continued throughout 2015, but was more sporadic than previously. The authorities failed to hold anyone to account for crimes under international law committed during the armed conflict or to conduct thorough and impartial investigations into these crimes. The August 2015 peace agreement provided for the establishment of three mechanisms: a Commission on Truth, Reconciliation and Healing; a Compensation and Reparations Authority; and a Hybrid Court for South Sudan. The Commission on Truth, Reconciliation and Healing mandate covered the peace-building process, and included gender-based crimes and sexual violence. The Compensation and Reparations Authority mandate was to compensate for property losses incurred during the conflict. The Hybrid Court would have jurisdiction over crimes under international law and crimes established by the relevant laws of South Sudan; it was announced as an African-led and Africa-owned legal mechanism.

In 2014, the African Union (AU) Peace and Security Council (PSC) set up an AU Commission of Inquiry on South Sudan (AUCISS), chaired by former Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo, to investigate human rights violations and abuses committed during the armed conflict. Its mandate included recommending measures to ensure accountability and reconciliation. On 27 October 2015, the PSC published the report. It found evidence of systematic violations of human rights and crimes under international law by both warring parties, often committed with extreme brutality. It also found compelling evidence of extrajudicial killings, including ethnically motivated killings. Testimonies to the AUCISS consistently indicated that some 15,000 to 20,000 ethnic Nuer were killed during the first three days of conflict (15–18 December 2013). The report also found evidence of torture and mutilation of bodies; abductions; enforced disappearances; looting and pillaging; forcing victims to engage in cannibalistic acts; and forcing victims to jump into fires. Strong evidence was found supporting allegations of systematic sexual violence, which was a common feature of the atrocities committed by both sides. The AUCISS concluded that there was a high likelihood that rape was used as a weapon of war. It recommended that those with the greatest responsibility for atrocities be prosecuted and that the needs of victims, including reparations, be addressed. It called for the establishment of an ad hoc African legal mechanism under the leadership of the AU and other mechanisms for transitional justice similar to the provisions of the August peace agreement. It also recommended the reform of civil and criminal and military justice systems so as to contribute towards ensuring accountability.¹⁵⁹

¹⁵⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22, 329–330; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 513, 518.

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2015.

In July 2015, the new left-wing mayor of Madrid, Manuela Carmena, announced that she planned to remove the 167 remaining street names and other vestiges (squares, monuments) which referred to General Francisco Franco's dictatorship (1939–1975), including the Avenida del Comandante Franco. Many streets had already been renamed under the 2007 “historical memory” law. Valencia's mayor, Joan Ribó, set up a history commission whose task included reviewing street names (30 to 60), plaques and other symbols associated with Franco in order to remove them. After the Partido Popular (Popular Party) came to power in late 2011, however, it froze public funding for projects related to the historical memory law, including efforts to identify the remains in about 2,000 mass graves, seeing them as contrary to the conciliation principles embodied in the 1977 amnesty law.¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22, 334–335; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 525.

¹⁶⁰ Marta Borraz, “Manuela Carmena rebautizará las más de 150 calles franquistas de Madrid,” El diario (6 July 2015); Koen Greven, “Linkse burgemeester verwijdert dictator Franco na 40 jaar uit

In July 2015, the Defense Ministry blocked the declassification of archives dating from the Civil War (1936–1939) and subsequent Franco dictatorship (1939–1975), arguing that it was not a priority in times of crisis. The documents, dating from between 1931 and 1968 and stored in over 10,000 folders, had been classified in 1968 under the Law of Official Secrets. Historians had had access to part of them in the 1980s but access was blocked again in 2010.¹⁶¹

Despite a recent ban on universal jurisdiction cases, Judge Santiago Pedraz declared that he would continue investigations of eight Guatemalan officers implicated in human rights abuses during Guatemala's civil war (1960–1996).¹⁶²

The definitions of enforced disappearance and torture in Spanish legislation continued to be inconsistent with international human rights law. Restrictions on the exercise of universal jurisdiction led to the closure of major international cases. In particular, the Audiencia Nacional Court decided in July 2015 to halt its investigation into torture and other ill-treatment at the United States detention center in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, despite the submission in May of documents indicating that Spanish agents had been implicated in interrogations of detainees at the detention facility. An appeal was pending at the end of 2015.

Also in July 2015, a military court closed investigations into the torture of two prisoners committed by five Spanish soldiers at a Spanish military base in Iraq in 2004, on the basis that it had not been able to identify either the perpetrators or the victims. Questions remained on the thoroughness of the investigation by the military court.

The rights to truth, justice and reparation continued to be denied to victims of crimes committed during the Civil War (1936–1939) and the Franco era (1939–1975), as Spanish authorities failed to adequately co-operate with the Argentine judiciary investigating such crimes. In March 2015, the government rejected a request by the Argentine courts for the extradition of 17 people. Subsequently, a group of United Nations experts urged Spain to comply with its obligations to extradite or prosecute those responsible for grave human rights violations.¹⁶³

See also Rwanda.

straatbeeld,” NRC Handelsblad (7 July 2015); “Spanish Dictator Franco Names to Go from Madrid Streets,” BBC News (7 July 2015); Raphael Minder, “Civil War Legacy Continues to Divide Spain’s Politics and Its Streets,” New York Times (19 November 2015).

¹⁶¹ “Franco-era Secrets to Remain Secret, Says Govt,” The Local (25 June 2015).

¹⁶² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 281.

¹⁶³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 338–339.

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2015.

During the period after the end of the civil war (1983–2009) until Maithripala Sirisena’s election as president in January 2015, a hard-line group called the Bodu Bala Sena (BBS, Buddhist Power Force; established 2012) aggressively asserted Sinhalese Buddhist dominance and deployed a selective reading of Sri Lanka’s history—excluding the contributions of indigenous and non-Sinhalese communities. In so doing, it fanned fears of an existential threat to Buddhism and incited mobs to demolish mosques and riot against Muslims. At a rally in 2012, BBS leader Galagodaththe Gnanasara likened the Sri Lankan military’s victory of 2009 to the ancient conquest of Tamil chief Ellalan by Sinhalese King Vijaya. “Tamils have been taught a lesson twice,” he said and he warned other minorities if they tried to “challenge Sri Lankan culture.” In the north and east, where most Muslims lived, national monuments were erected to honor Buddhist kings; Buddha statues were placed in areas sacred to Muslims or Tamils. In Kuragala, the Culture Ministry built a Buddhist stupa at a Sufi Muslim cave, declaring it an ancient monastery site. The revisionist version of history was celebrated in films, books, television programs and state-run newspapers.¹⁶⁴

On 1 May 2015, a mob attacked Nirmal Ranjith Dewasiri—head of the history department, University of Colombo, former president of the Federation of University Teachers’ Association (FUTA) and its current media spokesperson—and Kumudu Kusum Kumara, a public intellectual, at Kirulapone where political parties supporting former President Mahinda Rajapaksa held a May Day rally. The attackers shouted that both were responsible for defeating Rajapaksa during the January 2015 presidential elections. Dewasiri had supported Maithripala Sirisena, who won the elections. Dewasiri was taken to the hospital but his condition was not serious.¹⁶⁵

President Maithripala Sirisena declared 19 May, the anniversary of the end of the armed conflict (1983–2009), to be Remembrance Day, and stressed that it was a day to commemorate all war dead. This move suggested that earlier restrictions on public commemorations by northern Tamils would be lifted. Although memorial events were permitted in most areas, a heavy police presence was reported at such gatherings in the north and east, and ceremonies were reportedly prohibited by the security forces in Mullaitivu, the site of the final offensive. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]¹⁶⁶

¹⁶⁴ Rohini Mohan, “Sri Lanka’s Violent Buddhists,” New York Times (2 January 2015).

¹⁶⁵ FUTA, “The FUTA Statement on the Attack on Dr Nirmal Ranjith Dewasiri and Dr Kumudu Kusum Kumara,” Sri Lanka Brief (2 May 2015); Chaminda Perera, “Dr. Nirmal Ranjith Dewasiri Attacked near Pro-MR May Day Rally,” Daily News (2 May 2015).

¹⁶⁶ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 341.

Impunity persisted for alleged crimes under international law committed during the armed conflict (1983–2009), including enforced disappearances, extrajudicial executions and the intentional shelling of civilians and protected areas such as hospitals. The report of an investigation into civilian deaths during the armed conflict, released in October 2015, called for new legislation recognizing command responsibility and an independent judicial inquiry into credible allegations that members of the armed forces may have committed war crimes. A United Nations (UN) investigation into alleged abuses committed during the final years of the armed conflict, including enforced disappearances and military attacks targeting civilians, concluded that these abuses, if established before a court of law, could amount to war crimes and/or crimes against humanity. It recommended reforms to address ongoing violations and the establishment of a hybrid court to address crimes under international law, with which the government signaled agreement. Based on this report, the UN Human Rights Council, with Sri Lanka's acquiescence, adopted a consensus resolution that recommended establishing a special court "integrating international judges, prosecutors, lawyers and investigators" with an independent Sri Lankan investigative and prosecuting body. The resolution was left with the government to work out the details for this body, including the role and number of the tribunal's foreign judges and prosecutors. The government has since turned to civil society groups from across the country for their input on this and a resolution-endorsed truth and reconciliation commission. Through the resolution, the government accepted many recommendations to improve the human rights situation, including a repeal of the draconian Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA), and reforms to the Witness and Victim Protection Law. Some key undertakings in the resolution included the establishment of a dedicated office on enforced disappearances; a truth, justice, and reconciliation commission; and an office on reparations. In November 2015, the government began planning public consultations throughout the country as an initial step towards the establishment of these offices.

Also in November 2015, the UN Working Group on Enforced and Involuntary Disappearances visited Sri Lanka at the invitation of the government. The group noted the almost complete lack of accountability for disappearances and the lack of sustained efforts to uncover the truth about what happened to the victims. The group also expressed concern that some of the people they had met with on their trip were subsequently visited by members of the security forces and were questioned about their meeting with the group.

The Presidential Commission to Investigate into Complaints Regarding Missing Persons received 18,586 reports of missing civilians, but made little progress in clarifying their fate or whereabouts or bringing perpetrators of enforced disappearance to justice. In October 2015, the government, noting a widespread lack of confidence in the commission, announced that it would replace it with another body. In December 2015, it signed and promised to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance and to criminalize enforced disappearances.¹⁶⁷

See also Malaysia.

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2015.

The armed conflict in Darfur (2003–) entered its twelfth year in 2015. Although large-scale fighting between the government and armed groups had subsided, there were sporadic clashes, acts of banditry and incidents of intercommunal violence. An estimated 223,000 people were displaced from their homes by conflict during 2015, bringing the total number of internally displaced persons in Darfur to 2.5 million. March 2015 marked the ten-year anniversary of the Security Council’s referral of the situation in Darfur to the International Criminal Court (ICC). Since then, the ICC has issued arrest warrants for five individuals, including President al-Bashir, for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide in connection with atrocities in Darfur. Sudan refused to cooperate with the court in any of the cases. In December 2014, ICC Chief Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda told the United Nations Security Council that she was “hibernating” her investigations on Darfur and urged the council to make “a dramatic shift” in its approach to states that did not cooperate with the court’s requests on arresting Darfur suspects.¹⁶⁸

See also China, India, South Africa.

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012–2013, 2015.

In [2016], the National Reparations Committee Suriname (NRCS), led by former minister Armand Zunder (1946–), pleaded to remove symbols of Dutch colonialism and to “decolonize” geographical ¹⁶⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 38, 340–341; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 528–529.

¹⁶⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 345; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 540–541.

names by reverting to their original Indian names. Streets named after colonial politicians had to be given names of Suriname heroes. On 1 July 2015, the old coat of arms of the Dutch private company Society of Suriname that “owned” Suriname from 1683 to 1795 was removed from the presidential palace and put in a museum.¹⁶⁹

See also Netherlands.

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013.

Swaziland’s dual legal system, where both Roman-Dutch common law and Swazi customary law operated side by side, resulted in conflict leading to numerous violations of women’s rights, despite constitutionally guaranteed equality. In practice, women, especially those living in rural areas under traditional leaders and governed by highly patriarchal Swazi law and custom, were often subjected to discrimination and harmful practices. Young women and girls were forced to take part in cultural activities like the Umhlanga reed dance. Families of girls and young women who failed to take part in such cultural activities were often punished or fined by their chiefs. Traditional structures and practices prohibited women from speaking in public at men’s gatherings and presented significant challenges for women’s political participation. Violence against women was endemic. Survivors of gender-based violence had few avenues for help as both formal and customary justice processes discriminated against them. Civil society activists criticized the widely held view among traditional authorities that human rights and equal rights for women were foreign values that should be subordinated to Swazi culture and tradition.¹⁷⁰

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

See Bangladesh, Denmark, Rwanda.

¹⁶⁹ Nina Jurna, “Hoezo Julianatop? De indiaanse naam Ipinumin moet weer terug,” NRC Handelsblad (11 maart 2016).

¹⁷⁰ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 545.

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009, 2014.

On 15 October 2015, the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights ruled in the case of Doğu Perinçek [see NCH Annual Reports 2008–2009, 2014]. Balancing the rights of others (the dignity of the victims of the 1915 Armenian massacres and the dignity and identity of modern-day Armenians) under Article 8 (the right to respect for private life) and Perinçek’s free expression (under Article 10), it confirmed the 2013 judgment by ten votes to seven. In particular, the Court took into account the following elements: Perinçek’s statements bore on a matter of public interest and did not amount to a call for hatred or intolerance; the context in which they were made had not been marked by heightened tensions or special historical overtones in Switzerland; the statements could not be regarded as affecting the dignity of the members of the Armenian community to the point of requiring a criminal law response in Switzerland; there was no international law obligation for Switzerland to criminalize such statements; the Swiss courts appeared to have censured Perinçek simply for voicing an opinion that diverged from the established ones in Switzerland; and the interference with his right to freedom of expression had taken the serious form of a criminal conviction. The Court also underlined that it was not required to determine whether the 1915 events could be characterized as genocide within the meaning of that term under international law; unlike the international criminal courts, it had no authority to make legally binding pronouncements on this point. In addition, the Court was not required to determine whether the criminalization of the denial of a genocide or other historical facts could in principle be justified. In examining the nature of Perinçek’s statements, the Court had also not sought to establish whether they could properly be characterized as genocide denial or justification for the purposes of the Swiss Criminal Code as that was for the Swiss courts to determine. The Court emphasized that Perinçek did not express contempt or hatred for the victims of the 1915 events. While in cases concerning statements denying the Holocaust, the Court had—for historical and contextual reasons—invariably presumed that they could be seen as a form of incitement to racial hatred, it did not consider that the same could be done in this case. Holocaust denial, even if dressed up as impartial historical research, had to be considered as implying anti-democratic ideology and anti-Semitism. The Court considered that Holocaust denial was especially dangerous in states which experienced the Nazi horrors and which could be regarded as having a special moral responsibility to distance themselves from the mass atrocities that they had perpetrated or abetted, by, among other things, outlawing their denial. By contrast, it had not been argued that there was a direct link between Switzerland and the events that took place in the Ottoman Empire in 1915. The Court held, by a majority, that the finding of a violation of Article 10 constituted in itself sufficient just satisfaction for any non-pecuniary damage suffered by

Perinçek.¹⁷¹

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2015.

On 15 March 2012, military intelligence detained computer engineer Bassel Khartabil (also known as Bassel Safadi) ([1982–]) [see also NCH Annual Report 2015.] A Syrian of Palestinian parents and specialist in open-source software development, he co-founded the research company Aiki Labs and was the chief technology officer of Al-Aous, a publishing and research institution dedicated to archaeological sciences and arts in Syria. His work included a 3D photorealistic reconstruction of the old city of Palmyra in Syria (see also below). He was held in incommunicado detention for eight months before his transfer to ‘Adra prison in Damascus in December 2012. He was tortured and ill-treated. On 9 December 2012, a Field Court (an exceptional court conducting secret trials) imprisoned him. On 21 April 2015, the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention declared his detention a violation of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. On 3 October 2015, Khartabil managed to inform his family that he was transferred to an undisclosed location. It is feared that he was tried and sentenced to death by a Military Field Court in the Military Police headquarters in Al-Qaboun, Damascus. Also in October, his colleagues produced a new 3D model of Palmyra using data collected by him before his detention.¹⁷²

On 21 May 2015, after seizing Tadmur, Islamic State (IS) militants occupied the UNESCO World Heritage site of Palmyra. Called the “Venice of the Sands,” Palmyra was an ancient watering place on a trade route between the Mediterranean coast and the valley of the river Euphrates that became the center of an empire during the 3th century AD, which fought the Romans and the Sasanian Persians. Syria’s head of antiquities, Maamoun Abdulkarim, said that hundreds of Palmyra’s statues had been moved to safety but that large monuments could not be transferred. In July 2015, Palmyra’s theater served as an execution ground for captured government soldiers. On 23 August 2015, IS militants blew up the ancient Temple of Baalshamin (1st century AD). The militants also attempted to blow up the Temple of Bel (Temple of Baal), the great sanctuary of the Palmyrene Gods and the most important structure of the site, but partly failed. Several funerary towers in the area known as the Valley of Tombs (including the Tombs of Iamblichus, Elahbel and Atenatan) were destroyed and looted. On 4 October 2015, the Arch of Triumph was blown up. On 27 March 2016, government forces recaptured Palmyra from IS. Abdulkarim said that the damage to the ancient city was less than previously feared.¹⁷³

¹⁷¹ European Court of Human Rights (Grand Chamber), Case of Perinçek v. Switzerland: Judgment (2015); Press Release (2015); Q&A (2015); Dirk Voorhoof, “Criminal Conviction for Denying the Armenian Genocide in Breach with Freedom of Expression, Grand Chamber Confirms,” Strasbourg Observers (19 October 2015).

¹⁷² “Break the Silence: Campaign for Jailed Human Rights Activists,” 10 December 2014; PEN International, “Syria: No Word on Activist’s Whereabouts” (4 November 2015); PEN International, “Syria: Renewed Calls for Bassel Khartabil’s Release on 4th Anniversary of Detention” (17 March 2016); Human Rights Council, Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, “Opinions Adopted at its 72nd Session, 20–29 April 2015—No.6/2015 (Syrian Arab Republic) (A/HRC/WGAD/2015; 6 May 2015).

On 18 August 2015, Islamic State (IS) militants beheaded archaeologist and historian Khaled al-Asaad (1934–2015), director of antiquities in Palmyra for 40 years (1963–2003), at a square outside the museum in Tadmur, in front of dozens of people. IS supporters circulated online photos showing his body tied to a traffic light. His severed head was placed underneath it. A sign attached to the body accused him of being an apostate who supported the al-Assad government, of representing Syria at overseas conferences with “infidels,” of being director of Palmyra’s “idols,” of visiting Iran and communicating with a brother in the Syrian security services. IS had detained and interrogated him in May for a few days and then in July-August for over a month to extract information about where valuable artefacts were hidden. Like many Syrian professionals, al-Asaad had been a member of the ruling Baath Party.

Qasem Abdullah Yehiya, assistant director of laboratories of the Directorate-General of Antiquities and Museums, died in a rocket attack on the Citadel of Damascus and the National Museum in mid-August 2015.¹⁷⁴

¹⁷³ “Syrian Forces Battle IS near Ancient Ruins of Palmyra,” BBC News (15 May 2015); Kevin Butcher, “Palmyra: IS threat to ‘Venice of the Sands’,” BBC News (15 May 2015); “Islamic State Seizes Syria’s Ancient Palmyra,” BBC News (21 May 2015); “Palmyra’s Baalshamin Temple ‘Blown up by IS’,” BBC News (24 August 2015); Jonathan Amos, “Palmyra: Satellite Image of IS Destruction,” BBC News (29 August 2015); “Palmyra’s Temple of Bel ‘still Standing’,” BBC News (31 August 2015); Dominic Bailey, “Palmyra: Islamic State’s Demolition in the Desert,” BBC News (5 October 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 51, 352.

¹⁷⁴ “Islamic State Militants Behead Archaeologist in Palmyra: Syrian Official,” Reuters (18 August 2015); “Syrian Archaeologist ‘Killed in Palmyra’ by IS Militants,” BBC News (19 August 2015); Ben Hubbard, “Syrian Expert Who Shielded Palmyra Antiquities Meets a Grisly Death at ISIS’ Hands,” New York Times (19 August 2015); “UNESCO Director-General Irina Bokova Deplores the Loss of Two Leading Scholars of Syrian antiquity” (UNESCO Press; 19 August 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 352.

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012.

On 30 July 2015, about 700 nationalist students belonging to the Sunflower Movement climbed barricades around the Ministry of Education compound and early on 31 July about 200 students were encamped inside the compound, demanding an audience with Education Minister Wu Se-hwa in order to drop the pro-Chinese history curricula and textbooks. Over the past several months, young activists had demonstrated in protest against the government's pro-Beijing "one China" policy. A week earlier, police had arrested 33 people—including student activist Lin Kuan-hua ([1985]–2015)—for illegal entry and damaging public property when a group of students had burst into the education minister's office and blocked authorities from entering. Wu reportedly threatened to file a criminal complaint against the arrested protesters. Lin then committed suicide, intensifying the anti-China protests.¹⁷⁵

After Tsai Ing-wen of the Democratic Progressive Party won the presidential elections in January 2016, the movement to re-evaluate Taiwan's authoritarian past gained strength. Among the injustices brought to new attention were the 228 Incident (a 1947 crackdown on protesters who voiced discontent over the then Kuomintang party's rule over Taiwan as it faced defeat by the Communists in mainland China; estimates of the number of civilians killed in the crackdown ranged from 2,000 to more than 25,000 civilians) [see also NCH Annual Reports 2008, 2012] and the White Terror (1949–1992). The Chinese Nationalist Party Kuomintang ruled Taiwan as a one-party state from 1945 until the first democratic presidential election in 1996.

From 1947 to 1987, tens of thousands of Taiwanese were imprisoned and at least 1,000 were executed, most in the early 1950s, after being accused of spying for Communist China. Although many archival records were destroyed, especially before the Archives Act was adopted in 2002, many court records and letters of prisoners written before their execution still survived. In 2012, Democratic Progressive Party Legislator Yu Mei-nu proposed a political archives act (co-drafted with the Taiwan Association for Truth and Reconciliation [TATR] and modeled on the Stasi Records Act passed by Germany in 1991) to regulate the archives of political persecution cases, but her motion was blocked at least 74 times by Kuomintang lawmakers. The draft act aimed at distinguishing "political victims" from "perpetrators" and granting the former and their families, not the latter, free files access and privacy protection. Yu intended to reintroduce the bill in parliament.

¹⁷⁵ Aftab Ali, "Taiwan's Students Storm Education Ministry in Taipei in Protest of 'pro-China' Textbooks after Activist, Lin Kuan-hua, Takes His Own Life," Independent (31 July 2015); Reuters, "Taiwan Students Storm Education Ministry Compound in Textbook Protest," Daily Mail (31 July 2015); Marije Vlaskamp, "Studenten bestormen ministerie Taiwan uit woede over geschiedenisboeken," Volkskrant (31 July 2015).

In February 2016, the news that the military police searched without a warrant the home of a civilian selling White Terror era documents sparked a public uproar. According to the military, the documents held and sold online by the civilian were related to Chinese communist spies and their confessions after they surrendered to the Kuomintang government in the 1960s and 1970s.¹⁷⁶

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

History textbooks reportedly mentioned that in 1963 a bloody revolution took place in Zanzibar, without any reference, however, to the massacre of about 30,000 persons (mainly Arabs) during that revolution.¹⁷⁷

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2015.

On 11 November 2015, the Chang Puak Police Station in northern Chiang Mai Province issued a summons to Attachak Sattayanurak, a history lecturer from Chiang Mai University, and seven other academics to report to the police station on 24 November 2015. According to Attachak, the summons was related to a joint statement of a national network of academics, which he read out in a public lecture hall on 31 October 2015. The statement urged the junta not to intervene in academic freedom, saying that “universities are not military camps.” After the May 2014 coup d’état, military and police officers had come to Attachak’s house while he was on a fellowship program in Japan. Upon his return, the officers had showed up at the university several times in order to talk with him.¹⁷⁸

Prime Minister General Prayut frequently stated that soldiers should not be condemned for violence connected to the military dispersal of street protests organized by the activist group United Front for Democracy against Dictatorship (UDD), known as the “Red Shirts,” in April and May 2010—in which 90 people died and more than 2,000 were injured—despite evidence that most casualties resulted from unnecessary or excessive use of lethal force by soldiers. No military personnel were charged for killing and wounding civilians at that time. The government, however, expedited investigations into cases in which persons connected to the UDD used violence in 2010, and UDD leaders and supporters faced serious criminal charges. In contrast, there was little progress in investigating or prosecuting alleged rights abuses and criminal offenses committed by the People’s Alliance for Democracy (PAD), the so-called “Yellow Shirts,” and by the People’s Democratic Reform Committee (PDRC) during political confrontations in 2008 and 2013–2014, respectively.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷⁶ Paul Mozur, “Taiwan Families Receive Goodbye Letters Decades After Executions,” New York Times (3 February 2016); Cindy Sui, “Taiwan Kuomintang: Revisiting the White Terror years,” BBC News (13 March 2016); Alison Hsiao, “Legislator Calls for Act to Archive Sensitive Documents,” Taipei Times (15 March 2016).

¹⁷⁷ Anonymous, personal communication (27 January 2016).

¹⁷⁸ “Defiant Academic Summoned after Calling for Academic Freedom,” Prachatai / English (19 November 2015).

See also United States.

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2013, 2015.

Little progress was made in addressing crimes against humanity and other human rights violations committed by Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries from 1975 to 1999. Many suspected perpetrators remained at large in Indonesia. No progress by the authorities was reported in implementing recommendations addressing impunity from the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR) and the bilateral Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF). In September 2015, a follow-up report by the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances noted with regret that Timor-Leste had yet to debate a draft law on the establishment of a Public Memory Institute, intended to implement the CAVR and CTF recommendations.¹⁸⁰

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2013.

¹⁷⁹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 565–566.

¹⁸⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 362.

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2015.

On 24 December 2013, the National Constituent Assembly (NCA) adopted the Law on Establishing and Organizing Transitional Justice. The law provided criminal accountability via specialized chambers within the civil court system to adjudicate cases arising from past human rights violations, including abuses committed by military and security forces. The law also established an Instance vérité et dignité (IVD; Truth and Dignity Commission) tasked with uncovering the truth about abuses committed between July 1955, shortly before Tunisia's independence from France, and the law's adoption in 2013. The NCA elected 15 IVD members on 15 May 2014. In August 2015, the IVD said it had received 16,000 complaints from people alleging human rights abuses and had begun processing them.

On 14 July 2015, however, the government approved a draft Law on Economic and Financial Reconciliation, strongly supported by President Beji Caid Essebsi. If enacted, the law would offer broad amnesty to officials of former President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali's regime (1987–2011) and terminate prosecutions and trials of, and cancel any sentences against, corrupt business executives who submitted a reconciliation request to a state-run commission. The proposed law would threaten the IVD's role to mediate cases relating to corruption and economic crimes, which were endemic during the Ben Ali rule.

On 29 February 2016, the director of the national archives, Hedi Jalleb, announced that the presidential archives were available for use by the IVD. [See also NCH Annual Report 2015.]¹⁸¹

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2015.

In May 2008, the government blocked all access to YouTube under the 1951 law that prohibited “insulting the memory of Atatürk” because it contained about ten videos that were deemed insulting to former President Mustafa Kemal Atatürk (1881–1938) by the court that issued the ban. It remained in effect until October 2010. Serkan Cengiz, Yaman Akdeniz and Kerem Altıparmak, university lecturers in law, challenged the ban in the name of free expression, a reasoning which was confirmed by the ¹⁸¹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 56; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 573–575; “Les archives de la présidence finalement mises à la disposition de l’IVD” Espace Manager (29 February 2016).

European Court of Human Rights in December 2015. The Court noted, inter alia, that the lecturers were active YouTube users who accessed videos related to their work and also uploaded academic work. In addition, it pointed out the importance of YouTube as a means to disclose political information ignored by mainstream media, thereby contributing to the emergence of citizen journalism. The interference, it maintained, was also unlawful because the Atatürk law allowed bans of specific publications only, not blanket bans of entire websites.¹⁸²

In April 2015, commemorations were held to mark the 100th anniversary of the 1915 massacres of Armenians in Ottoman Turkey with peaceful demonstrations across the country. No progress was made towards fully recognizing the crimes committed.¹⁸³

After the 7 June general elections, the Justice and Development Party (AK Party) reportedly destroyed two truckloads of official documents (regarding, among others, dissenters, fund expenditures and civil servant recruitment) after it lost its overall majority in Parliament. Most of the destruction was reportedly done in the Prime Ministry.¹⁸⁴

On 14 January 2016, Ramazan Kurt, a PhD student of philosophy and history of philosophy at the Faculty of Social Studies of Erzurum Atatürk University, was detained in his home and suspended because he had signed a petition calling on the government to end its military operations in southeastern Turkey, including in civilian areas. The petition was drafted by the Initiative of Academics for Peace, signed by 1128 scholars from 89 Turkish universities and by more than 300 scholars from abroad, and issued on 11 January 2016. Kurt was charged with “terror propaganda,” “incitement to hatred or defaming people” and “defaming the state’s judicial bodies.” He testified before the prosecutor. The court released him the same day pending investigation but imposed an overseas travel ban. The university condemned the petition as a latent support for separatists.

On 13 January 2016, Kurt had received threats, including by telephone, visits to his office, a social media campaign against him, and a protest by a far-right group and students. He complained to the prosecutor and requested police protection, but the police said they could not provide protection. Kurt left for his hometown in İzmir province because of safety fears. All the Turkish signatories of the petition were placed under investigation.¹⁸⁵

¹⁸² European Court of Human Rights, Cengiz versus Turkey: Judgment (2015); Marina van Riel, “Cengiz and Others v. Turkey: A Tentative Victory for Freedom of Expression Online,” Strasbourg Observers (5 January 2016).

¹⁸³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 369.

¹⁸⁴ “Report: AK Party Has Destroyed 2 Truckloads of Documents since Election,” Today’s Zaman (10 August 2015).

¹⁸⁵ “Ramazan Kurt,” Academic Freedom Monitor (14 January 2016); “Investigations, Universities’ Reactions against Academics,” Bianet (15 January 2016); “Turkish Academic Supports Probes,”

See also Armenia, Cyprus, Switzerland, United States.

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012, 2015.

Despite plans for constitutional reform and the establishment of an ombudsman institution, President Gurbanguly Berdymukhamedov and his associates enjoy unlimited power and total control over all aspects of public life in Turkmenistan. The Turkmen government often forced people to gather for hours for events attended by Berdymukhamedov. They were not permitted to leave or use the toilet. According to the Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights (TIHR), a Vienna-based group, on 5 August 2015, many were forced to wait for almost seven hours in the sun in heat of 41 degrees Celsius (105.8 degrees Fahrenheit) to welcome Berdymukhamedov for the opening of a new stadium in Ashgabat. Three of them died the same day.¹⁸⁶

The whereabouts of prisoners who were subjected to enforced disappearance after an alleged assassination attempt against then President Saparmurat Niyazov in 2002 remained unknown. The authorities did not respond to a request made in June 2015 during the European Union-Turkmenistan Human Rights Dialogue to provide relevant information. For 13 years, the families of those detained had not received any information about their whereabouts or wellbeing.¹⁸⁷

Urges for Moderation,” Asbarez (3 February 2016); “Over 120 Academics Face Investigations for Signing Peace Declaration,” Cihan (4 February 2016); Human Rights Watch, “Turkey: Academics Jailed For Signing Petition” (16 March 2016).

¹⁸⁶ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 586.

¹⁸⁷ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 374.

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2013, 2015.

On 6 January 2015, Dominic Ongwen, a senior commander in the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) was taken into custody by United States forces in the Central African Republic, and subsequently transferred to the custody of the International Criminal Court (ICC). Ongwen was indicted by the ICC in 2005 for crimes committed in Gulu, Northern Region, in 2004. He faced three counts of crimes against humanity and four counts of war crimes. On 10 September 2015, the ICC pre-trial chamber recommended to the ICC Presidency that Ongwen's confirmation of charges hearing be heard in Uganda. ICC arrest warrants for Joseph Kony, the LRA leader, and two other LRA commanders remained in force. The men were still at large at the end of 2015.¹⁸⁸

See also Central African Republic.

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011, 2014–2015.

The Ministry of education introduced patriotic history education at schools and universities. In their turn, universities on the territory of the self-declared republics abolished the history of Ukraine as a separate course and proposed their own vision of Ukraine's history, based on Russian textbooks.¹⁸⁹

In April 2015, the authorities banned a number of Russian films (films made in Russia after January 2014 and post-1991 films portraying the Russian military in a positive light) which allegedly distorted history.

In May 2015, a package of "decommunization" laws entered into force that banned Nazi and Communist symbols and criminalized denial of the "criminal nature of the Communist totalitarian regime," punishable by up to five years' imprisonment. "Propaganda" of either ideology was punishable by up to ten years' imprisonment. Another law, entitled "On the Legal Status and Honoring of Fighters for Ukraine's Independence in the Twentieth Century" recognized as "fighters for independence" nationalist groups that fought Germany during World War II but also those who collaborated with the ¹⁸⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 22, 377–378.

¹⁸⁹ Tatyana Malyarenko, "Universities under Fire in Ukraine's War," Index on Censorship (Summer 2015), 17.

Nazis and were implicated in atrocities and ethnic cleansing. The law ruled that denial or disrespect of their role in fighting for Ukrainian independence was an unlawful “desecration of their memory.” In June 2015, the parliament passed a law to make public archives of Ukraine’s Soviet-era KGB files. The Soviet term “Great Patriotic War” was replaced with “Second World War.” Historian Volodymyr Vyatrovych [Viatrovych] (1978–), founder of the nongovernmental Center for Research on the Liberation Movement (2002), former director of the Security Service of Ukraine Archives (2008–2010) and the director of the Ukrainian National Memory Institute, had introduced the laws in parliament. Critics said that the laws provided the infrastructure for an official version of Ukrainian twentieth-century history and would curtail critical views of that history.¹⁹⁰

In 2015, no significant progress was achieved in accountability for perpetrators of abuses during the 2014 Maidan protests, in which more than 100 protesters and 13 law enforcement officers died and many were injured. In its March 2015 report, the Council of Europe’s International Advisory Panel criticized the slow progress and poor quality of the investigation, noting a “widespread perception of impunity” on the part of law enforcement agencies.

In December 2015, the authorities established a Special Investigation Division within the Prosecutor General’s Office tasked specifically with Maidan-related investigations. The prosecutor’s office claimed that it had identified all senior government officials who took part in decision-making during the Maidan events, but in late 2015, it was unclear whether any had been charged. Authorities detained several riot police officers suspected of killing protesters from 18 to 20 February 2014. In late 2015, the trial of two of them remained ongoing. Many of the alleged perpetrators had reportedly left Ukraine.¹⁹¹

In September 2015, the government issued a declaration accepting the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) for crimes committed in the country since 20 February 2014. Although Ukraine was not yet an ICC member state, this declaration paved the way for the ICC prosecutor to consider whether the court should investigate abuses committed during the armed conflict. A February 2015 parliamentary resolution that prompted the government’s declaration attempted to cast the ICC’s potential inquiry as limited to alleged crimes committed by Russia or Russia-backed forces, but the ICC prosecutor would be able to consider conduct by all sides to the conflict. The government had

¹⁹⁰ Lily Hyde, “Ukraine to Rewrite Soviet History with Controversial ‘Decommunisation’ Laws,” Guardian (20 April 2015); Yulia Gorbunova, “Ukraine Shouldn’t Take a Leaf out of Russia’s Book,” Human Rights Watch (11 August 2015); Shaun Walker, “Russian Region Bans British Historians, Books from Schools,” Guardian (5 August 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 380; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 599, 600.

¹⁹¹ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 598.

also accepted ICC jurisdiction for the time period covering the Maidan protests during the period 21 November 2013—22 February 2014. In November 2015, the ICC prosecutor reported that based on the information available, the abuses committed during that period did not amount to crimes against humanity, but that the prosecutor could reconsider this in light of any additional information.¹⁹²

See also Russia.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

In May 2015, the Dubai Criminal Court sentenced an Indian national to one year in prison, followed by deportation, after it convicted him of blasphemy in relation to a Facebook post deemed to “insult” Islam and the Prophet Muhammad.¹⁹³

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2015.

In 2014, a furore broke out over the cancelation of a show at the Barbican in London called Exhibit B. The work, by the white South African artist Brett Bailey, used black actors to recreate the “human zoos” of the nineteenth century, which saw kidnapped Africans paraded as entertainment. Some 23,000 people signed a petition urging the Barbican to cancel the show, which it did following concerns about its ability to safely police protests outside.¹⁹⁴

On 26 June 2015, the Belfast High Court upheld the government’s decision not to hold an independent inquiry into the 1989 killing of Belfast solicitor Patrick Finucane. The government, along with Northern Ireland political parties and the Irish government, failed to agree legislation that would have established new mechanisms to investigate deaths attributed to the conflict in Northern Ireland (1969–1998), as had been promised under the December 2014 Stormont House Agreement (SHA).

In September 2015, the Derry Journal submitted a Freedom of Information request to view draft ¹⁹² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 598–599.

¹⁹³ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 382.

¹⁹⁴ Jodie Ginsberg, “Global View,” Index on Censorship, 45 no. 1 (Spring 2016), 57.

proposals on how to deal with the legacy of the Northern Ireland conflict within the SHA. It was refused by the Northern Ireland's Department of Justice on account of the fact that disclosure could compromise future consultation and thwart the exchange of ideas. On 23 September 2015, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Theresa Villiers, confirmed that those guilty of Troubles-related murders would be able to confess and then walk free and that, as agreed during the SHA, victims' relatives would not be notified of any such disclosures and that any information given over would not be admissible in legal proceedings. Relatives of Derry victims of the Troubles feared that the deal would amount to an amnesty for the perpetrators. Official plans also contained proposed legislation required for an oral archive to document the history of the conflict.¹⁹⁵

In August 2015, the British Library declined to store a large collection of Taliban-related documents because it reportedly contained some material which could contravene the Terrorism Act. The collection included newspapers, maps and radio broadcasts from when the Taliban were in power in Afghanistan (1996–2001). The loose counter-terrorism laws were criticized for instilling a climate of fear among academics studying extremist groups. The Terrorism Acts of 2000 and 2006 made it an offense to “collect material which could be used by a person committing or preparing for an act of terrorism”; they criminalized the “circulation of terrorist publications.”¹⁹⁶

The legal battle to get access to some of the Boston tapes continued in 2015 [See NCH Annual Reports 2012–2015]. In the Winston “Winkie” Rea case, the European Court of Human Rights in late May or early June 2015 refused to grant an interim prohibition as part of efforts to stop the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) from obtaining his taped testimony. On 29 September 2015, the PSNI said that evidence on the recordings was “hearsay” and useless in court, and declined to prosecute seven of the eight suspects identified in the 1972 abduction and death of Jean McConville.¹⁹⁷

On 13 August 2015, a first-tier tribunal in London dismissed on grounds of national security an application by Cork historian Barry Keane, author of Massacre in West Cork, to release the names of ¹⁹⁵ Eamon Sweeney, “Freedom of Information Request into ‘Deal on the Past’ Refused,” Derry Journal (24 September 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 386.

¹⁹⁶ “British Library Declines Taliban Archive over Terror Law Fears,” BBC News (28 August 2015).

¹⁹⁷ “Boston College Tapes: Police Get Access to Ex-Loyalist Prisoner Winston Rea’s Interviews,” BBC News (5 June 2015); Alan Erwin, “Court Refuses to Hear Winkie Rea’s Appeal over Boston Tapes,” Irish Times (19 May 2015); Alan Erwin, “Ex-loyalist Prisoner Seeks Emergency Hearing to Block Boston tapes; Winston ‘Winkie’ Rea to Have Final Roll of Dice in European Court of Human Rights,” Irish Times (21 May 2015); “Boston College Tapes Prompt New Probe into 1970s Murder Bid,” News Letter (8 October 2015); Beth McMurtrie, “After Battle to Get Boston College’s ‘Belfast’ Records, Prosecutors Now Largely Dismiss Their Value,” Chronicle of Higher Education (30 September 2015).

paid British informers who worked in Ireland against Irish secret societies between 1882 and 1916 (the year of the Easter rising). He lost his appeal against the Home Office, the Metropolitan police service and the United Kingdom Information Commissioner by a 2-to-1 majority decision. The tribunal decided that releasing the informers' names would risk harm their descendants and hamper the recruitment of informants. It said their names should remain secret "in perpetuity".¹⁹⁸

See also Russia, Rwanda, South Africa.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2015.

During the Rapp-Coudert investigations of 1940–1942, historians Philip Foner (1910–1994), specialist in labor and Afro-American was denied tenure because of his membership in the Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA). During the 1941 loyalty probe, Foner was dismissed as a history instructor at City College of New York (1933–1941), together with others, including his twin brother Jack Foner (1910–1999), also a historian at the same college and pioneer in black studies. Philip Foner became the educational director of the Fur and Leather Workers Union (1941–1945), chief editor of Citadel Press, New York (1945–1967) and professor of Pennsylvanian History (1967–1979) and Independence Foundation Professor (1980s) at Lincoln University, a historically black college outside of Philadelphia. He wrote the ten-volume History of the Labor Movement in the United States (1947–1994). In 1946, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) started an investigation into Philip Foner which would last for decades. Only in September 2015 did the FBI release a heavily redacted 45-page file on him. A document from 1984 referred to the fact that Foner was closely followed during the 1960s, listing his request to visit countries like Cuba, North Vietnam, and the USSR for research purposes.¹⁹⁹

In September 2015, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Lyndon B. Johnson Library released online a collection of 2,500 declassified President's Daily Briefs (PDBs) from the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2005–2006.]²⁰⁰

¹⁹⁸ First-Tier (London), Barry Keane versus Information Commissioner et alii: Appeal (concernedhistorians.org/le/387.pdf; 13 August 2015); Justine McCarthy, "Historian Loses Legal Battle To Name Past British Informers," Sunday Times (23 August 2015); "UK Court Quashes Historian Barry Keane's Attempt To Name Past British Informers (comment)" Politics.ie (1 September 2015).

¹⁹⁹ Matthew Guariglia, "Eccentric with a Slightly Gruff Manner'. Philip S. Foner's FBI File," Muckrock (7 September 2015).

²⁰⁰ National Security Archive, "President's Daily Briefs from Kennedy and Johnson Finally Released"

In December 2015, the Institute of Turkish Studies (ITS; founded 1971), an educational foundation based at Georgetown University and overseeing the distribution of the proceeds from an endowment by the Turkish government to support Turkish studies in the United States, lost its funding from the Turkish government. The Turkish embassy in Washington declined to comment on the reasons why. Some linked the withdrawal to the November 2015 election results, in which the opposition party associated with the ITS parent trust was not successful. The ITS was seeking new funds.

In late 2006, Donald Quataert (1941–2011), professor of history at Binghamton University, State University of New York, and expert on the Ottoman empire, forcibly resigned as chairman of the ITS board of governors (2001–2006). He had published a book review of Donald Bloxham's The Great Game of Genocide: Imperialism, Nationalism, and the Destruction of the Ottoman Armenians (Oxford University Press) in the Journal of Interdisciplinary History in the fall of 2006. In the review, he denounced the self-censorship in Ottoman historical writing regarding the massacre of the Ottoman Armenians in 1915 and called it a taboo that needed to be shattered. He wrote that the events "satisfie[d] the U.N. definition of genocide" and that it was wrong not to acknowledge this. ITS honorary chairman, Turkish Ambassador Nebi Şensoy, reportedly asked him to publicly retract his statements in the review or resign as chair if the ITS was to continue receive funding from the Turkish government. Birol Yesilada, a professor of political science and international relations at Portland State University, quitted ITS, among other things, over the Quataert case. ITS board member Fatma Müge Göçek, a sociologist at the University of Michigan, sent e-mail messages to other board members explaining that she thought that Quataert was within his rights as a scholar to write the review as he did; she called the forced resignation a violation of Quataert's academic freedom.²⁰¹

On 2 October 2015, the University of Washington Center for Human Rights (UWCHR) filed a freedom of information request against the Central Intelligence Agency seeking information about possible war crimes committed by retired Colonel Sigifredo Ochoa Pérez in El Salvador during that country's civil war (1979–1992). Two weeks later, someone broke into the office of Angelina Godoy, the center's director and stole her desktop computer and a hard drive containing about 90 per cent of the information relating to the center's research in El Salvador. The stolen files contained details of investigations related to the civil war, which left at least 75,000 people dead, 8,000 missing and a million displaced. According to the 1992 United Nations-sponsored truth commission, the vast majority of crimes were (16 September 2015).

²⁰¹ Elizabeth Redden, "Turkey Ends Funding for Controversial Research Institute," Inside HigherEd (22 December 2015); Scott Jaschik, "Is Turkey Muzzling U.S. Scholars?" Inside HigherEd (1 July 2008); Middle East Studies Association, "Letter to Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan" (27 May 2008); Donald Quataert, "The Massacres of Ottoman Armenians and the Writing of Ottoman History," Journal of Interdisciplinary History (Autumn 2006), 249–259.

committed by United States-backed military dictatorships against civilians in rural communities suspected of supporting the leftist guerrillas.²⁰²

In November 2015, Princeton University students urged officials to rename programs and buildings (such as the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs) named for former President Woodrow Wilson (1856–1924; Princeton University president 1902–1910; United States president 1913–1921). Although a progressive president, Wilson had supported racial segregation: as university president he had blocked black students from attending the university. He once called racial segregation “a benefit” and defended the enslavement of blacks by saying slaves “were happy and well-cared for.” Princeton University President Christopher Eisgruber agreed to consider the demands of the students, whose protest was led by the Black Justice League. On 4 April 2016, the university announced that it would not rename the school, saying that Wilson’s accomplishments deserved to be recognized along with his faults.²⁰³

On 18 November 2015, State Board of Education (SBE) members in Texas narrowly (with a 8–7 vote) rejected a plan to create a group of state university professors to check the history textbooks for factual errors. The call for more experts came after more than a year of controversy over SBE-sanctioned textbooks’ coverage of Islamic history; slaves as workers; the Civil War; and the importance of Moses and the Ten Commandments to the Founding Fathers when writing the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.²⁰⁴

In 2003 the records of the Korean National Association, dating to 1906, were discovered in the attic of a building being renovated in Los Angeles, California. The Association had functioned as a government-in-exile, and led independence efforts against Japanese colonial rule in the Korean peninsula (1910–1945). In January 2016, a drawn-out lawsuit about whether the records belonged in the United States or Korea was settled: the University of Southern California would digitize the 15,000 to 16,000 pages and send the originals to South Korea. Among the papers was a 1919 letter to President Woodrow ²⁰² Ansel Herz, “Two Weeks After It Sued the CIA, Data Is Stolen from the University of Washington’s Center for Human Rights,” The Stranger (21 October 2015); Nina Lakhani, “Confidential Files on El Salvador Human Rights Stolen after Legal Action against CIA,” Guardian (23 October 2015).

²⁰³ “Princeton Considers Dropping Woodrow Wilson Name after Protests,” BBC News (20 November 2015); “Princeton Rebuffs Calls To Rename Woodrow Wilson School,” BBC News (5 April 2016); David Wright, “Princeton Keeps Woodrow Wilson’s Name on the School despite Protests,” CNN Politics (4 April 2016).

²⁰⁴ Robert T. Garrett, “Texas School Board Rejects Push to Enlist Academics to Check Textbooks for Factual Errors,” Dallas Morning News (18 November 2015); Yanan Wang, “Workers” or Slaves? Textbook Maker Backtracks after Mother’s Online Complaint, Washington Post (5 October 2015).

Wilson, asking for his help and protesting the “brutal force” being used to suppress independence efforts in Korea.²⁰⁵

In February 2016, several staff members involved in a controversy over a freshman-retention plan at Mount St. Mary’s University, Maryland, were dismissed. Gregory Murry, an assistant history professor who spoke at length with student journalists for their original article about the retention plan, was locked out of his university email account and threatened with dismissal.²⁰⁶

In March 2016, Harvard Law School changed its official seal, in use since the 1930s, after protests because it incorporated the coat of arms of the eighteenth-century donor and slave owner Isaac Royall, known for his cruelty (including burning 77 slaves alive). In February 2016, Harvard University had already decided to remove the word “master” from academic titles, after protests from students who claimed that the title had echoes of slavery.²⁰⁷

In its one-year update to the United Nations Human Rights Committee, the United States (USA) said that it prohibited torture and other ill-treatment, enforced disappearance and arbitrary detention of “any person in its custody wherever they are held,” and that it held “accountable any persons responsible for such acts.” Yet by the end of 2015, no action had been taken to end the impunity for the systematic human rights violations committed in the secret detention program operated by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), under authorization granted by former President George W. Bush after the attacks of 11 September 2001 (9/11).

The USA also told the Human Rights Committee that it “supported transparency” in relation to this issue. Yet by the end of 2015, more than twelve months after the publication of the declassified summary of the report by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence into the CIA program, the committee’s full 6,700-page report, containing details of the treatment of each detainee, remained classified top secret. Most, if not all, of the detainees were subjected to enforced disappearance and to conditions of detention and/or interrogation techniques which violated the prohibition of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. Classification of the report continued to facilitate impunity and the denial of remedy. During 2015, military prosecutors reportedly learned of a cache of some 14,000 photographs relating to CIA “black sites” in Afghanistan, Thailand, Poland, Romania, Lithuania and possibly elsewhere, including images of naked detainees being transported. The photographs had not been made public by the end of 2015.²⁰⁸

²⁰⁵ Victoria Kim, “Legal Fight over Century-Old Korean Papers Found in L.A. Ends,” Los Angeles Times (24 February 2016); USC Libraries Research Guides, “Documents of the KNA Building.”

²⁰⁶ Sarah Brown & Katherine Mangan, “Fallout at Mount St. Mary’s Spreads as Scholars Protest Firings,” Chronicle of Higher Education (10 February 2016).

²⁰⁷ Sean Coughlan, “Harvard Law School Scraps Official Crest in Slavery Row,” BBC News (4 March 2016); Sean Coughlan, “Harvard Abolishes ‘Master’ in Titles in Slavery Row,” BBC News (25 February 2016).

The City of Chicago, Illinois, passed an ordinance to provide reparations to over 100 survivors of torture committed by members of the Chicago Police Department from 1972 to 1991. The ordinance included a US$ 5.5 million fund for survivors, a formal apology from the Chicago City Council, free college education for survivors and their families, an educational component in Chicago Public Schools on the history of torture by the Chicago Police Department, a public memorial to torture survivors and a counseling center for torture survivors.²⁰⁹

See also Afghanistan, Angola, China, Cuba, El Salvador, Israel, Korea, South, Lebanon, Peru, Poland, Sierra Leone, Spain, Uganda, Vietnam.

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013, 2015.

In May 2015, a presidential decree established the Truth and Justice Working Group to investigate human rights violations that occurred between 1968 and 1985. The group was to be formed of seven members having fulfilled autonomy and independence criteria throughout their careers, as well as the president and vice-president of Uruguay. A 2013 Supreme Court ruling remained an obstacle to ensuring justice; the ruling had overturned key articles of Law 18.831, adopted in 2011, which established that crimes committed during the period of civil and military rule between 1973 and 1985 were crimes against humanity and that no statute of limitations could be applied.²¹⁰

On 28 March 2016, information of the Grupo de Investigación en Arqueología Forense (GIAF, Research Group in Forensic Archaeology; <http://alafforense.org/grupo-de-investigacion-en-arqueologia-forense-del-uruguay-giaf/>) of the Humanities and Educational Sciences Faculty, Universidad de la República Uruguay, Montevideo, was stolen and members of the group were reportedly threatened. GIAF was collecting data about those who disappeared under the military dictatorship (1973–1985) by excavating human remains in unmarked graves.²¹¹

²⁰⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 388.

²⁰⁹ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 389.

²¹⁰ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 392.

²¹¹ “Informe: La sociedad uruguaya reacciona frente al robo del laboratorio del equipo de Antropología forense” (Universidad de la República; 28 March 2016); “Declaración del Consejo” (Universidad de la República; 30 March 2016).

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2014.

13 May 2015 marked ten years since government forces killed hundreds of largely peaceful protesters in the city of Andijan. Defying numerous calls to allow an independent investigation into the massacre, Uzbek officials continued to state that the matter was “closed.” On the massacre’s tenth anniversary, both the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights and former United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour renewed calls for an independent investigation. In 2015, Human Rights Watch interviewed dozens of Uzbeks, many outside the country, who expressed fear about speaking on the record about Andijan, citing threats to themselves and family members who remained in Uzbekistan. They stated that authorities still regularly called their relatives in for questioning, and forced them to sign statements saying that those who fled abroad after the massacre were terrorists. The wife of one Andijan refugee said that since the massacre, officials had interrogated her monthly, including about her husband’s whereabouts, and threatened to force her into prostitution in retaliation for his participation in the protest.²¹²

See also Kyrgyzstan.

²¹² Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 628.

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011, 2015.

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012, 2014.

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2013.

In May 2014, Nguyen Huu Vinh (Nguyễn Hữu Vinh; male), co-founder in 2007 of the popular blog, Anh Ba Sam, known for its anti-China posts, and his assistant, Nguyen Thi Minh Thuy (Nguyễn Thị Minh Thúy; female), were arrested on charges of “abusing democratic freedoms.” In February 2015, the indictment was issued, detailing also charges in connection with two other political blogs—Dan Quyên (Dân Quyền; Citizens’ Rights) and Chep Su Viet (Chép sử Việt; Writing Vietnam’s History), both of which were critical of government policies and officials, and had been shut down by the authorities. The indictment stated that the two blogs had more than 3.7 million page views. No trial date was set. Nguyen Huu Vinh was a former policeman and son of a former high-ranking government official and member of the ruling Communist Party of Vietnam, who was ambassador to the former Soviet Union.²¹³

In January, April, and July 2015, police prohibited unsanctioned Buddhist Hoa Hao groups from commemorating the anniversaries of the birth and death of Hoa Hao founder Huynh Phu So (1920–1947) and of his establishment of the Hoa Hao faith. Participants were intimidated, harassed, and assaulted.²¹⁴

On 14 March 2015, alleged pro-government commentators insulted online activists and hindered them as they gathered offline in Hanoi to commemorate the Johnson South Reef Skirmish between China and Vietnam on 14 March 1988, in which more than seventy Vietnamese died. The reef, also called Gac Ma

²¹³ Amnesty International, “Demand Release of Blogger and Assistant” (ASA 41/2801/2015; 4 November 2015); Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 399.

²¹⁴ Human Rights Watch, World Report 2016: Events of 2015 (New York: Seven Stories Press, 2016), 640.

Reef, was part of the Spratly Islands. The government denied that the commentators acted on its behalf.²¹⁵

Draft legislation on the National General Education Curriculum Design prepared by the Ministry of Education and Training since 2013 and put out for consultation in November 2015, suggested that in secondary schools history should be integrated into a new course, “Citizenship and the Motherland,” which combined history, citizenship and national security. Many historians and others criticized this as a further devaluation of the importance of history, which was reportedly taught in an unattractive manner (A few years ago, when the decision was taken not to include history in the high school graduation exam, thousands of students in Nguyen Hien school ripped their history books up and threw them away).²¹⁶

On 1 January 2016, history teacher Phuong tried to commit suicide during a ceremony held by Le Quy Don High School for the Gifted to celebrate the school’s 15th anniversary. When the ceremony almost ended, Phuong unexpectedly came to the stage and gave a paper to the chair of the Binh Dinh provincial People’s Committee and then tried to stab his stomach but people prevented the action. “The school’s management board and the trade union repressed and defamed me and offended my human dignity,” he declared. In the past, he had sent petitions to management agencies showing wrongdoings at the school many times. Eventually, the Quy Nhon City Education and Training Department and Binh Dinh provincial authorities had sent inspectors, who discovered eight violations. A member of the Vietnam Veterans Association (having joined the anti-American resistance war for which he received a medal), he had received flowers and congratulations every 22 December on the occasion of the Vietnamese People’s Army Day. However, after he had denounced the wrongdoings in 2014, he did not receive flowers or congratulations anymore. Phuong also complained that the headmaster refused to sign and confirm his civil servant résumé.²¹⁷

See also Cambodia.

²¹⁵ Freedom House, Freedom on the Net 2015 (Washington: Freedom House, 2015), 933.

²¹⁶ Ly Pham, “How Should We Teach History?” University World News (20 November 2015).

²¹⁷ “History Teacher Tried to Commit Suicide at 15th Anniversary of School Establishment,” Vietnamnet (4 February 2016).

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco / Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010, 2013–2015.

Yemeni authorities failed to hold thorough and independent investigations into past human rights violations, including unlawful killings and other serious abuses committed by government forces in connection with mass popular protests in 2011. In September 2015, President Abd Rabbu Mansour Hadi decreed the establishment of a national commission of inquiry to investigate all violations committed since the beginning of 2011.²¹⁸

²¹⁸ Amnesty International, Report 2015/16 (London: Amnesty International, 2016), 404.

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2015.

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2015.

INTRODUCTION

The twenty-first Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It mainly covers events and developments of 2014 and 2015.

Disclaimer. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

Download this report at:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/15.pdf>

Cite this report as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2015

(<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ar/15.pdf>).

For the complete set of NCH Annual Reports, see:

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content/ar.html>

All Annual Reports (1995–2015) were compiled by Antoon De Baets.

Please send any comments to: antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org

AFGHANISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2014.

Early in 2014, the Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission presented President Hamid Karzai with a copy of its 800-page report mapping war crimes and crimes against humanity in Afghanistan since the Communist era (1978–2001). Completed in December 2011, the report would provide a foundation for future steps to prosecute those implicated in past abuses. Karzai rejected calls to release the report publicly. Although Karzai's successor, President Ashraf Ghani had vowed before the election to release the report, in early 2015 there was no planned release date. (See also NCH Annual Reports 2013–2014.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 49.]

ALBANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2012.

Former political prisoners organized hunger strikes in protest against the government's failure to fairly distribute compensation for their imprisonment by the communist government (1944–1991), when thousands were imprisoned or sent to labor camps and subjected to torture and other ill-treatment.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 54.]

In April 2015, the parliament passed a law opening up files from the secret police (Sigurimi) of the Communist era (1944–1991) to people who were spied upon and barring former Sigurimi members from holding public office in the future. An estimated 7,000 opponents of the regime were killed and more than 100,000 deported to labor camps. In 1991 many of the files had been destroyed.

[Source: "Albania Opens Communist Secret Police Files," BBC News (<http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-32552372>; 1 May 2015).]

See also Serbia/Kosovo.

ALGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001–2014.

The 2006 Law on Peace and National Reconciliation continued to afford legal immunity to perpetrators of torture, enforced disappearances, unlawful killings and other serious rights abuses during the internal armed conflict of 1992–2000. The law also criminalized any expression that authorities believed denigrated state institutions or security forces for their conduct during that conflict. However, there appear to have been no prosecutions based on this law to date. The United Nations Human Rights Committee ruled on five cases of enforced disappearance and urged the authorities to investigate them thoroughly, bring the perpetrators to justice and provide effective remedies to the relatives of the disappeared. (See also NCH Annual Reports 2007–2010.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 56; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 56.]

On 20 April 2014, police used excessive force to disperse demonstrators in Tizi-Ouzou city who were commemorating the violent repression of protesters in 2001 in the Kabylia region.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 55–56.]

On 1 November 2014, the 60th anniversary of the outbreak of the war of liberation against France (“the November Revolution”), Tayeb Zitouni, the Minister of Mujahideen (independence war veterans) declared that “France refuses to hand over the remaining archives to Algeria or lingers to do. She will never hand over the archives that might disturb her.” In February 2015, he added that France had returned only 2% of the archives in its possession. Critics observed that the Algerian archives about the Revolution remained closed themselves. (See also NCH Annual Report 2013.)

[Sources: Algeria Press Service, History Writing: 4,000 Hours of Living Testimonies Recorded (28 October 2014; <http://www.aps.dz/en/algeria/4671-history-writing-4,000-hours-of-living-testimonies-recorded>); “La France n’est pas prête à restituer les archives,” Le Matin.dz (16 February 2015; <http://www.lematindz.net/news/16601-la-france-nest-pas-prete-a-restituer-les-archives.html>); M. Oudina, “France Will Never Accept To Admit Defeat in its War against Algeria (Minister)” (31 October 2014; <http://www.ennaharonline.com/en/news/8484.html>).]

See also Morocco / Western Sahara.

ANGOLA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2009.

ARGENTINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2014.

Several cases of human rights violations committed during Argentina's military dictatorship (1976–1983) were reopened in 2003 after Congress annulled existing amnesty laws. Subsequently, the Supreme Court ruled that the amnesty laws were unconstitutional, and federal judges struck down pardons favoring former officials convicted of, or facing trial for, human rights violations. As of August 2014, 121 trials had been conducted for crimes against humanity originating from the dictatorship, resulting in 503 convictions. The Center of Legal and Social Studies (CELS) reported that 42 people had been acquitted during the trials, and another 1,611 suspects were under investigation. Given the large number of victims, suspects, and cases, prosecutors and judges faced challenges in bringing those responsible to justice while also respecting due process rights of the accused. Argentina made significant progress in identifying children of the disappeared who were illegally appropriated during the dictatorship, and connecting them to their biological families. In July 2014, the National Bank of Genetic Data identified the grandson of Estela de Carlotto, the founder of Grandmothers of Plaza de Mayo (See also NCH Annual Reports 2003 and 2014). As of August, 115 grandchildren had been found. In early 2015, a legal challenge to a 2009 law that would limit collection of DNA samples to cases of the dictatorship was pending before the Supreme Court. In Buenos Aires, 22 accused were prosecuted for their alleged involvement in the Plan Condor, an agreement between the military governments of Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay to eliminate their political opponents. Also, trials were held for more than 100 defendants accused of crimes committed in the clandestine detention and torture centers in the School of Navy Mechanics in Buenos Aires, and La Perla in Córdoba, among others.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 61; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 65.]

18 July 2014 marked the twentieth anniversary of the attack against the building of the Argentine Israelite Mutual Association in Buenos Aires, which left 85 people dead. The government failed to provide justice and reparation to the victims. Iran refused to comply with an Argentine court order which called for the capture of five suspects. In 2013, the Argentine and Iranian governments signed an agreement to interrogate these suspects in Tehran, but it did not take effect. In Argentina, high-ranking officials, including former president Carlos Menem, were tried for diverting the investigation. The public trial was pending at the end of 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 61.]

See also Paraguay, Spain.

ARMENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2006, 2010, 2014.

During a series of protests in June 2014, Yerevan police detained activists protesting the demolition of the Afrikyan House, a historical monument.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 69.]

See also Azerbaijan, Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2001, 2003, 2007–2009, 2014.

In November 2014, the Federal Court was to hear a “top secret” appeal by the Australian government—including a government witness only identified as “X”—aimed at suppressing information from files containing Australian diplomatic papers and intelligence about East Timor and sought by political scientist Clinton Fernandes. Fernandes commented: “The Australian Government is pursuing a secret appeal against a secret judgement about the secret evidence of a secret witness. This goes against the English tradition of fairness from which our legal system springs.” (For background, see NCH Annual Report 2014.)

[Source: Philip Dorling, “Attorney-General Appeals against the Release of Secret Diplomatic Information on East Timor,” Brisbane Times (<http://www.brisbanetimes.com.au/federal-politics/political-news/attorneygeneral-appeals-against-the-release-of-secret-diplomatic-information-on-east-timor-20141116-11npr.html>); 16 November 2014).]

On 18 April 2015, police in Melbourne arrested five suspects who were reportedly planning to target police on Anzac Day, 25 April 2015. The evidence suggested that they were influenced by Islamic State. Their leader was charged with conspiring to commit a terrorist act. Anzac Day is an annual day of remembrance for servicemen and women from Australia and New Zealand. A series of events were planned on 25 April 2015 to coincide with the 100th anniversary of the landings at Gallipoli (Ottoman Empire).

[Source: “Australian Teenagers Held over Alleged Melbourne Terror Plot,” BBC News (18 April 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-australia-32361721>).]

AUSTRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2005–2007, 2009.

See Turkey, Turkmenistan.

AZERBAIJAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–1998, 2008–2013.

In 2010, after fifteen years of teaching history at Lenkeran State University, southeast Azerbaijan, Yadigar Sadigov was dismissed allegedly for being the adviser to the chair of the opposition political party Musavat and for publishing criticism of government policies in its daily newspaper as well as on Facebook. On 27 June 2013, he was arrested on false hooliganism charges for allegedly beating up an invalid Nagorno-Karabakh war veteran after the latter had provoked him in a teahouse. He was held in pretrial detention. In January 2014, a court sentenced Sadigov to six years’ imprisonment. In July 2014, an appeals court reduced the sentence to four years.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, “Azerbaijan: Government Repression Tarnishes Chairmanship: Council of Europe’s Leadership Should Take Action” (28 September 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/print/news/2014/09/29/azerbaijan-government-repression-tarnishes-chairmanship>); Human Rights Watch, Tightening the Screws: Azerbaijan’s Crackdown on Civil Society and Dissent (New York: Human Rights Watch, 2013), 17–19.]

On 30 July 2014, the authorities charged Leyla Yunus ([1954]–), director of the Institute for Peace and Democracy (IPD; established in 1995), and her husband, Arif Yunus, with treason, tax evasion, and illegal entrepreneurship. Both are historians by training and authors of many historical works. Many believed that the real reason for the arrests were the fact that Leyla Yunus had called for peaceful relations with Armenia and for a boycott of the European Games to be held in Baku in June 2015. A court sent Leyla Yunus to pretrial custody for three months but Arif Yunus was released under police supervision because of his poor health. But on 5 August 2014, police rearrested him as he was on his way to deliver food and medication to his wife. Despite his health concerns, the court sent him also to pretrial detention in a Ministry of National Security prison for three months for allegedly violating the terms of his house arrest. The Prosecutor's Office also sealed the office of Leyla Yunus's organization.

On 28 April 2014, the Azerbaijani authorities had prevented the Yunuses from boarding a flight to attend a conference in Brussels, confiscated their passports, questioned them at length, and searched their home and office. They were told that they were barred from traveling abroad because they were witnesses in a criminal investigation against journalist Rauf Mirgadirov. In the 1980s, the Yunuses had compiled a list of political prisoners in Azerbaijan and disseminated it worldwide. In 2012, they helped create a joint Azerbaijani-Armenian website, where representatives of civil societies of both countries engaged in public dialogue.

[Sources: "Dinara Yunus Speaks at the OSCE Conference," (25 September 2014; http://leylaarifyunus.blogspot.nl/2014_09_01_archive.html); "Letter from Leyla Yunus in prison to Arif Yunus in prison" (in Dutch; <http://weblogs.amnesty.nl/mensenrechtenvandaag/2015/01/15/yunus>); Rachel Denber, "Dispatches: Towering Figures, Silenced in Azerbaijan's Crackdown" (Human Rights Watch, 5 August 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/news/2014/08/05/dispatches-towering-figures-silenced-azerbaijan-s-crackdown>); Giorgi Gogia, "Dispatches: Azerbaijan Jails Yet Another Rights Defender (Human Rights Watch, 8 August 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/news/2014/08/08/dispatches-azerbaijan-jails-yet-another-rights-defender>); Human Rights Watch, "Azerbaijan: Government Repression Tarnishes Chairmanship: Council of Europe's Leadership Should Take Action" (28 September 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/print/news/2014/09/29/azerbaijan-government-repression-tarnishes-chairmanship>); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 80; Veronika Szente Goldston, "'Dark Times' in Azerbaijan," (Human Rights Watch, 7 October 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/news/2014/10/07/dark-times-azerbaijan>).]

BAHRAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2008–2012.

On 18 March 2015, the Special Procedures of the United Nations Human Rights Council expressed “concern at what appears to be a policy of removing from public space and public memory the symbol of the pro-democracy movement in Bahrain, and therefore, of preventing the expression of narratives deviating from official discourses regarding the events of February and March 2011.” They referred to the destruction by government security forces, on 18 March 2011, of the Pearl Roundabout in Manama, a monument which served as the center of the February 2011 peaceful uprising and which had since become a symbol of the pro-democracy movement. Human rights groups said that by destroying the Pearl Roundabout and removing all imagery associated with it, the government rewrote history and pretended that the uprising never happened.

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, “Bahrain’s Pearl Roundabout: A Government’s Attempt at Rewriting History” (23 March 2015; https://www.ifex.org/bahrain/2015/03/23/pearl_roundabout_destroyed/?utm_source=whatcounts&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=itw_25march2015).]

BANGLADESH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2014.

In May 2013, Mohammad Kamaruzzaman, assistant secretary-general of Jamaat-e-Islami (the largest Islamist party of Bangladesh) was found guilty of genocide and torture by the International Crimes Tribunal (ICT, set up in 2010) and sentenced to death. On 3 November 2014, the Supreme Court upheld the trial court’s sentence, despite serious fair trial concerns. Kamaruzzaman was not granted a right to appeal. In late October 2014, the ICT had also sentenced party leaders Motiur Rahman Nizami and Mir Quasem Ali to death. The first person executed on orders of the ICT was Jamaat-e-Islami senior leader Abdul Kader Mullah (Abdul Qader Mollah)—in December 2013, following hastily enacted retrospective legislation which is prohibited by international law. In September 2014, the Supreme Court had commuted the death sentence given to party leader Delwar Hossain Sayeedi to life imprisonment. Article 47A (1) of the Constitution specifically stripped war crimes accused of their right to a fair trial. All the crimes had been committed during the nine-month war of independence from Pakistan in 1971. Critics of the ICT said that the government used it to target political opponents, but the Awami League, leading the government, asserted that it was necessary to help Bangladesh come to terms with its past. (See also NCH Annual Reports 2011–2014.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 72, 73–74; “Bangladesh Islamist Delwar Sayeedi Death Sentence Commuted,” BBC News (17 September 2014; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-asia-29233639>); “Bangladesh Upholds Islamist Kamaruzzaman Death Sentence,” BBC News (3 November 2014; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-asia-29875827>); Human Rights Watch, “Bangladesh: Halt Execution of War Crimes Accused” (9 November 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/news/2014/11/09/bangladesh-halt-execution-war-crimes-accused>); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 97, 98.]

The exact number of people killed in the 1971 war was unclear: while official estimates were three million, independent researchers said it was closer to 500,000. In February 2014, a lawyer filed a court application claiming that three articles on the blog Bangladesh War Crimes Tribunal (November 2011) by British investigative journalist David Bergman were in contempt of the International Crimes Tribunal (ICT). In the blogs, Bergman had questioned the toll of three million deaths during the 1971 independence war as being unrealistically high. He had referred to a passage in an ICT order, writing: “The Tribunal in its order does not provide or refer to any evidence or material on record to support the figure of 3 million, treating it as a historical fact...Although this number is treated as an official government figure, there is as far as I can see little evidence, if any, to support it.” The ICT demanded an “explanation” of the posts and held an oral hearing. On 17 April 2014, it issued contempt proceedings. At a hearing on 2 December 2014, Bergman was found guilty of contempt and ordered to pay a fine. Bergman, based in Bangladesh, edited the English-language daily New Age and wrote for the Daily Telegraph. He made the award-winning film War Crime Files.

[Sources: David Bergman, “Summary of Legal Argument on Blog Contempt Charges” (<http://bangladeshwarcrimes.blogspot.co.uk/2014/10/summary-of-legal-argument-on-blog.html>); PEN International, “British Journalist Found Guilty of Contempt in Bangladesh for Questioning 1971 War Death Toll,” (2 December 2014; https://www.ifex.org/bangladesh/2014/12/02/contempt_british_journalist/?utm_source=whatcounts&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=itw_3december2014).]

Amateur historian Ami Rahman Pial ([1968–]) was assaulted four times in recent years because he criticized the fundamentalists for their role in the 1971 independence war on his blog (since 2006) and Facebook page (53,000 followers). Pial was one of the founders of Shahbagh, a movement supporting the death penalty for leaders of Jamaat-e-Islami (the main Islamist party) who in 2009–2013 were sentenced by the International Crimes Tribunal for war crimes in the 1971 war. Pial’s name topped a hit list of 84 targets compiled by Islamists. Three authors on the list were already murdered in 2015.

Pial's wife and child went into exile. In clashes between Jamaat e-Islami supporters, Shahbagh protesters and security forces in February 2013, more than a hundred people had died.

[Source: Floris van Straaten, "De Bengaalse bloggers zijn doodsbang," NRC Handelsblad (7 July 2015), 16–17.]

BELARUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2000, 2005–2007, 2009–2011, 2014.

Eight were arbitrarily arrested during or immediately after they attended a peaceful march commemorating the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear disaster. They were charged with "petty hooliganism" and "disobeying police orders." Eight others, all known for their political activism, were detained in the days before the march under similar charges. (See also NCH Annual Reports 1996–1997, 2006–2007, 2014.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 75; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 101.]

BELGIUM

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

BELIZE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

BOLIVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2014.

Five decades after the military and authoritarian regime (1964–1982), no progress in providing justice to victims of political violence or measures to implement a mechanism to unveil the truth of the human rights violations committed during that period was made. A contributing factor was the unwillingness of the armed forces to provide information on the fate of people killed or disappeared during this period. A proposal to create a truth commission to investigate the crimes—made up of seven members, including four appointed by the government—was pending before the Plurinational Assembly in early 2015. The authorities ignored national and international bodies' concerns about the lack of transparency and unfairness of the reparation process that ended in 2012 and in which just over a quarter of applicants qualified as beneficiaries. In February 2014, a campsite of the victims' organization, Platform of Social Activists against Impunity, for Justice and Historical Memory of the Bolivian People, outside the Ministry of Justice was set on fire and files and documents were destroyed. Preliminary investigations indicated that the fire was caused by an electrical fault. However, the organization complained that it was an intentional attack. Criminal investigations were ongoing at the end of 2014.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 78; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 104–105.]

In July 2014, a second request to extradite former President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada to Bolivia was filed in the United States. He faced charges in connection with the “Black October” case, when 67 people were killed and more than 400 injured during protests in El Alto, near La Paz, in late 2003. A previous extradition request was rejected in 2012. In May 2014, a Federal Judge in the United States had allowed a civil lawsuit against the former President and his Minister of Defense for their responsibility in the events.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 78.]

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2014.

Proceedings continued at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) against former Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadžić and former General Ratko Mladić, for genocide, crimes against humanity and violations of the laws or customs of war, including at Srebrenica. In October 2014, the hearing in the Karadžić case ended; a verdict was expected in the second half of 2015. At the national level, progress in ensuring accountability for war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during the various conflicts in the former Yugoslavia remained slow. The number of new indictments remained low, trials dragged on and political attacks on national war crimes courts continued. War crimes courts, prosecutors and investigative units remained understaffed and under-resourced as the lack of political will to deliver justice increasingly hid behind the expressed desire to move on. The War Crimes Chamber of the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina made slow progress in the prosecution of crimes under international law, and was undermined by repeated criticism by high-ranking politicians. During 2014, the Republika Srpska entity prime minister repeatedly challenged the legitimacy of the State Court and Prosecutor's Office, claiming that they were unconstitutional, and called for their abolition. Across the region, civilian victims of war, including victims of sexual violence, continued to be denied access to reparations due to the failure to adopt comprehensive legislation regulating their status and guaranteeing their rights. The Criminal Code continued to fall short of international standards relating to the prosecution of war crimes of sexual violence. Entity courts continued to apply the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; impunity prevailed in the absence of a definition of crimes against humanity, command responsibility, and crimes of sexual violence. Impunity for war crimes of sexual violence remained rampant; between 2005 and the end of 2014 less than a hundred cases had come to court. The estimated number of victims of rape during the war ranged between 20,000 and 50,000. In July 2014, the State Court began the first retrial of a war crimes suspect among the dozens whose convictions were quashed following a 2013 ruling of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) that stated that Bosnian courts had wrongly applied law not in force at the time of the offences committed during the Bosnian war (1992–1995). The decision in November 2014 by the State Court to quash under the ECHR ruling the genocide conviction of Milorad Trbic, a former commander with Bosnian Serb forces, and the prospect of his release from custody pending retrial, prompted concern from United Nations experts, who called on the government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to ensure victim protection, the right to truth and justice, and the adoption of a comprehensive transitional justice strategy. The case had been transferred to the Bosnian court from the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia in 2007. In September 2014, Croatia, Serbia and Bosnia and Herzegovina signed a regional co-operation agreement with a view to accelerating the to-date slow progress in resolving the fate and returning the bodies of 7,800 people still missing since the conflict. The rights and livelihoods of relatives in all three countries continued to be undermined by the lack of legislation on missing persons. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Law on Missing Persons had not been implemented at the end of 2014, leaving the families of the missing with no access to reparation.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 36–37, 81–82; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 111–112.]

See also Netherlands, Serbia/Kosovo.

BRAZIL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2014.

In May 2012, a National Truth Commission began investigating the systematic human rights violations that occurred during military rule from 1964 to 1985, including extrajudicial killings, forced disappearances, torture, arbitrary detention, and the curtailment of free expression. This had led to the creation of more than 100 truth commissions in states, cities, universities and trade unions. These engaged in investigations into cases such as the enforced disappearance of former congressman Rubens Paiva in 1971. They also highlighted less well-known violations against indigenous Peoples and rural workers, such as the military attacks (1968–1975) against the Waimiri-Atroari in the Amazon and the torture of peasant farmers during the Araguaia guerrilla conflict (1967–1974). The Truth Commission published its final report on 10 December 2014.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 84; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 119–120.]

In April 2010, the Supreme Court reaffirmed lower court rulings that the 1979 amnesty law barred most prosecutions of state agents for the crimes. However, six months later, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights had ruled that this interpretation violated Brazil's obligations under international law, and that the amnesty should not be an obstacle to prosecuting serious human rights violations committed under military rule. The 2014 Truth Commission report repeated the court's view. Federal prosecutors trying to bring the perpetrators of these crimes to justice condemned the law as incompatible with international human rights treaties. To date, judges have rejected these arguments. However, at the end of 2014, three bills were before Congress which proposed changes to the interpretation of the amnesty law so that it would no longer apply to agents of the state charged with crimes against humanity.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 84; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 119–120.]

BULGARIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2002, 2006, 2009, 2012, 2014.

On 27 May 2015, the Defense Ministry announced that it had opened the Communist-era military intelligence archives to research. (For background, see NCH Annual Report 2014).

[Source: Agence France-Presse, “Bulgaria Opens Up Communist-era Military Archives,” Global Post (27 May 2015; <http://www.globalpost.com/article/6562655/2015/05/27/bulgaria-opens-communist-era-military-archives>).]

See also Macedonia.

BURKINA FASO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2004, 2005, 2013.

In a ruling in March 2014, the African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights held that the Burkinabé state—in its failure to diligently investigate and bring to justice those responsible for the assassination of journalist Norbert Zongo and three of his companions, found burned to death in a car in 1998—had violated the right to freedom of expression by causing “fear and worry in media circles.”

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 90.]

See also Guinea.

BURUNDI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2014.

On 15 May 2014, Burundi adopted a law establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to cover grave violations of human rights and international humanitarian law committed between 1962 and 2008. The law failed to include clear language on the setting up of a special tribunal to prosecute individuals responsible for crimes under international law, including war crimes and crimes against humanity. The TRC officially began on 10 December 2014 as eleven Commissioners were sworn into office.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 92; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 131.]

See also Rwanda.

CAMBODIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2014.

On 7 August 2014, eight years after the creation of the United Nations-assisted Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, former Khmer Rouge leaders Nuon Chea (88, the former second-in-command) and Khieu Samphan (83, the former head of state) were sentenced to life imprisonment for crimes against humanity, including extermination and political persecution. They were convicted of the forced relocations of Cambodians from urban areas to the countryside and around the countryside in 1975, during which many were executed. Both appealed the sentences. The two continued to face trial on other charges, including genocide, in connection with Khmer Rouge policies and practices from 1975 to 1979. However, given their advanced age, it was far from certain that a second trial would ever be completed. Prime Minister Hun Sen's public opposition to trials of other Khmer Rouge suspects made it unlikely that others responsible for the deaths of as many as two million people would be held accountable. While the trial had initially generated considerable interest, the drawn-out proceedings over many years resulted in the Cambodian public showing little interest by the trial's end.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 94; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 136.]

CAMEROON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2012–2014.

CANADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000, 2002–2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2009, 2012–2014.

In May 2015, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police admitted that 1,017 indigenous women and girls had been murdered between 1980 and 2012, a homicide rate at least four times higher than that faced by women in the rest of the population. Despite mounting demands, including by provincial and territorial governments, the federal government refused to initiate a national action plan or public inquiry.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 19, 97.]

See also Rwanda.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2009, 2011–2012, 2014.

The transitional authorities and the United Nations failed to effectively investigate crimes under international law, including war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in the country, therefore perpetuating the cycle of violence and fear. In July 2014, Amnesty International published a dossier naming twenty individuals, including anti-Balaka and Séléka commanders, against whom it had credible evidence to suspect that they could be responsible for war crimes, crimes against humanity and other serious human rights abuses committed since December 2013.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 102.]

On 9 April 2014, interim President Catherin Samba-Panza issued a decree establishing a special investigative cell to prosecute serious crimes committed in the country since 2004. The United Nations (UN) peacekeeping mission also consulted with the transitional government on the establishment of a judicial mechanism to enable the judiciary to work alongside international actors to tackle impunity. In August 2014, the peacekeeping mission and the government signed a Memorandum of Understanding to create a Special Criminal Court to try grave human rights violations and violations of international humanitarian law. On 24 September 2014, the International Criminal Court (ICC) prosecutor announced that her office would open a second investigation in the country for crimes committed since 2012, following an earlier request from Samba-Panza. In 2007, the ICC had opened its first investigation in the country for crimes committed during the 2002–2003 civil war. The investigation led to the arrest of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, a Congolese national and former vice president of the Democratic Republic of Congo. His trial was ongoing at the ICC in early 2015.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 147–148.]

CHAD

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

Former Chadian President Hissène Habré remained in custody awaiting trial before the Extraordinary African Chambers created by the African Union (AU) in 2012 to try him in Senegal. Habré was arrested on 30 June 2013 and charged on 2 July 2013 with crimes against humanity, torture and war crimes committed in Chad between 1982 and 1990. In August 2014, the court rejected the Chadian government's request to be a civil party (partie civile) in the case. At the end of 2014, the Chambers was finalizing its investigation into alleged crimes by Habré. If the investigating judges decided that there was sufficient evidence, his trial would start in May 2015.

On 14 November 2014, the trial of 26 former state security agents connected to the Habré era commenced in Chad. International and local human rights organizations expressed concern that the trial could undermine the upcoming trial of Habré in Senegal. In October 2014, the Chambers requested Chad to send these suspects to Dakar but Chad declined to transfer them and refused another request by the Chambers to travel to Chad to interview them. There were also concerns from the victims and human rights organizations that the trial might not meet international fair trial standards. (For background, see previous NCH Annual Reports.)

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 104, 318.]

CHILE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2014.

On 31 December 1974, Carlos Guerrero Gutiérrez (1954–?1975), history student at the Universidad de Chile and activist of the Movimiento de Izquierda Revolucionario (MIR; Revolutionary Left Movement), was arrested by the Dirección de Inteligencia Nacional (DINA; National Intelligence Directorate). A number of witnesses testified that he was held at the detention site Villa Grimaldi and tortured and that he disappeared from there while in the hands of the DINA. He was last seen alive on 25 January 1975. In October 2014, the Supreme Court convicted former DINA members, including its former head Manuel Contreras Sepúlveda, of the enforced disappearance of Guerrero Gutiérrez.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 106; Report of the Chilean National Commission on Truth and Reconciliation (Notre Dame/London 1993), 544; “Carlos Eduardo Guerrero Gutiérrez,” <http://www.memoriaviva.com/Desaparecidos/D-G/gue-gut.htm>.]

Some progress was made in bringing to justice those responsible for human rights violations committed under General Pinochet's regime (1973–1990). According to the President of the Supreme Court, by March 2014 there were 1,022 active cases, of which 72 related to allegations of torture. Official data from the Ministry of the Interior Human Rights Program indicated that, by October 2014, 279 people had been convicted in connection with the crimes and 75 were serving prison sentences. In September 2014, the government announced its intention to speed up the discussion of a 2006 bill to overturn the 1978 amnesty law. The debate around the law was ongoing before the Congress at the end of 2014. The Observatory of Transitional Justice at Diego Portales University, Santiago, which monitors human rights trials, found that in enforced disappearance cases the Supreme Court often confirmed prison sentences that complied with Chile's obligation to hold perpetrators accountable through appropriate punishments. In extrajudicial execution cases, however, the court often reduced prison terms and allowed alternatives to prison if significant time had elapsed since the criminal act.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 106; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 152.]

In 2014, forty years after the Augusto Pinochet dictatorship, the human rights collective Londres 38 (named after a former detention center) launched a campaign known as No más archivos secretos (no more secret archives) to open up secret archives related to the dictatorship (1973–1990). It labeled secret three types of archives: those of Chile's two official truth commissions, which judges ordered sealed for a period of fifty years; the archives of the German enclave Colonia Dignidad; and those of the armed forces, police and intelligence services.

[Source: Alexia Richardson, “Lifting the Sentence of Secrecy in Chile,” Worldpress.org (2 September 2014; <http://www.worldpress.org/Americas/4026.cfm>).]

CHINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2014.

In April 2014, filmmaker Shen Yongping (1980–) was detained and in June formally arrested because he had made a documentary, “A Hundred Years of Constitutionalism,” about the history of China’s constitution. The documentary had been posted online and was freely downloadable. Four thousand copies of it were discovered in Shen’s apartment. In December 2014, Shen was sentenced to one year’s imprisonment for illegal business activities.

[Source: Oscar Garschagen, “Grote Papa Xi doceert China,” NRC Handelsblad (2 February 2015), 4; “Shen Yongping,” Wikipedia (6 February 2015; http://en.wikipedia.org/w/index.php?title=Shen_Yongping&oldid=641805985).]

In May 2014, a book edited by Wang Keming and Song Xiaoming, We Repent (women chanhui)—a collection of public apologies mostly from former Red Guards during the Cultural Revolution (“Wenge”; 1966–1976)—was published in simplified Chinese in a censored version by China CITIC Press in Beijing in May 2014. The uncut version (in traditional Chinese) was published by Great Mountain Culture in Hong Kong in June.

[Source: C.K. Martin Chung, “We Repent: Comparing Chinese and European Remembrance of National (Co-) Perpetratorship” (unpublished paper; Hong Kong 2014), 1–2, 16.]

On 26 May 2014, Shi Ping (pen-name: Shi Yu), journalist for Time Weekly, was reportedly arrested in connection with his alleged attendance at a small-scale Tiananmen memorial event. He was accused of “gathering a crowd to disturb social order,” but released on bail on 3 July 2014 pending investigation. It remained unclear whether he had been formally charged.

[Source: Pen International Writers in Prison Committee, Case List January-June 2014 (London: PEN, December 2014).]

In September 2014, writer Tie Liu ([1933–]) (pen name of Huang Zerong) was detained because in an essay he had claimed that Liu Yunshan, President Xi Jinping’s subordinate in charge of ideology and propaganda, undermined the latter’s purported liberal tendencies. On 23 October 2014, the police in Beijing formally charged Tie with “illegal business activities” for privately publishing the testimonies of victims of the 1957 Anti-Rightist campaign. Tie had published these memoirs for many years, but they had been ignored until recently. He was also charged with “creating a disturbance” for a dozen essays he had published on the internet and in Chinese publications abroad criticizing Mao Zedong and other leaders of the Chinese Communist Party. Tie faced several years’ imprisonment if convicted.

[Source: Chris Buckley, “Beijing Formally Charges Writer Who Published Memoirs of Victims of Mao Era,” New York Times (24 October 2014; http://www.nytimes.com/2014/10/24/world/asia/beijing-charges-writer-tie-liu.html?_r=0).]

On 10 October 2014, the State Administration for Press, Publication, Radio, Film and Television said it had banned books by at least eight writers and intellectuals, including historian Yu Ying-shih (1930–) without mentioning any reason. An emeritus professor at Princeton University, Yu openly voiced support for pro-democracy movements in mainland China, Taiwan and Hong Kong.

[Sources: Didi Tang, “China Bans Books by Pro-Hong Kong Protest Author,” AP (14 October 2014; <http://bigstory.ap.org/article/e44dd8b6939d4f3293f04fe21a02e6e3/china-bans-books-pro-hong-kong-protest-author>); Sui-Lee Wee & Megha Rajagopalan, “China Detains Scholar, Bans Books in Crackdown on Moderate Voices,” Reuters (13 October 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/10/13/us-china-rights-idUSKCN0I20NU20141013>).]

On 20 October 2014, Xie Chuntao, director of the History Teaching and Research Department of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) School, which trained officials, said that the CCP would likely never open all the files on its recent past, including the Great Leap Forward (1958–1960) and the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), and that it saw no need to reassess those periods. He added that certain topics remained almost completely taboo, including Lin Biao’s death in 1971. According to Xie, only a “small number” of the CCP historical files were still sealed. “Some involve the state’s core interests, and some are not convenient to be released,” he added. “From a historical research [viewpoint]...it would be best if they [were] all opened. But I fear this cannot happen, and may never happen.”

[Source: Reuters (Ben Blanchard), “China Likely Will Never Open All Files on Painful Past, Official Says” (20 October 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/10/20/us-china-politics-history-idUSKCN0I90R420141020>).]

In January 2015, Education Minister Yuan Guiren urged a tightening of control over textbooks that spread “Western values,” requiring instructors to fill out investigation forms about the presence and use of “foreign textbooks in original languages” in class. Certain academic subjects—journalism, politics, economics, sociology and history—were reportedly singled out. Yuan added that university lecturers were forbidden to complain in the classroom and to transmit “harmful moods” to the students. Universities had to step up propaganda and teaching of Marxism on campus. Western textbooks would be restricted. Critics said that Marxism itself came from the West. (For background, see NCH Annual Report 2014.)

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 155; Laura He, “China Probes College Textbooks for ‘Western values’,” Market Watch (17 March 2015); <http://www.marketwatch.com/story/china-probes-college-textbooks-for-western-values-2015-03-17>); Jeminah Steinfeld, “Return of the Red Guards,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 45; Linda Yeung, “Campus crackdown on ‘Western values’,” University World News (6 February 2015); <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150206084252332>); Verna Yu, “On China’s Campuses, Scholars Battle Ideology and Red Tape,” Christian Science Monitor (<http://www.csmonitor.com/World/Asia-Pacific/2015/0607/On-China-s-campuses-scholars-battle-ideology-and-red-tape>; 7 June 2015).]

In April 2015, leading presenter on China Central Television (CCTV) Bi Fujian was filmed at a private banquet singing a song from a Mao-era opera, “Taking Tiger Mountain by Strategy,” but in a parody changing the lyrics to say “We’ve suffered enough” and calling Mao “that old son of a bitch,” prompting fellow guests to laugh. After the video emerged, Bi apologized for his remarks, which had had “a detrimental impact in society.” His annual New Year variety show is reputed the most-watched television program in the world. The video was censored, and Bi had to suspend his anchor activities while the case was investigated.

[Sources: “Chinese TV Anchor Bi Fujian Sorry for Criticising Mao,” BBC News (9 April 2015); <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-asia-china-32230844>); NRC Handelsblad (11–12 April 2015), 11.]

In the 90-minute documentary “Mr. Deng Goes to Washington” (Chinese title: “Nine Days in the Whirlwind”), about former CCP leader Deng Xiaoping’s nine-day trip to the United States after China established diplomatic ties with the United States in 1979, a reference in English to the 1979 conflict between China and Vietnam was edited out in Chinese. The film, directed by Fu Hongxing (former head of the official China Film Archive), was made ahead of Xi Jinping’s first state visit to the United States as Chinese president in September 2015. Xi was reportedly inspired by Deng.

[Source: “A Mighty Vision: An Historical Documentary Uses the Past To Serve the Present,” Economist (23 May 2015), 50.]

In the summer of 2015 it was reported that the CCP-run Liaoning Daily newspaper in north-east China dispatched reporters to spy on teachers in university classrooms in Beijing, Guangzhou, Shanghai, Shenyang and Wuhan. It criticized some teachers for holding a dismissive attitude toward socialist theory, including by comparing Mao Zedong with Chinese emperors.

[Source: Jeminah Steinfeld, “Return of the Red Guards,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 47.]

Macau

On 4 June 2014, Eric Sautede, a French political scientist at the University of Saint Joseph (2007–2014) in Macau, was dismissed. Sautede, who also wrote an opinion column in the Macau Daily Times, suggested three reasons for his dismissal: his recent comments on the outgoing chief executive's lack of charisma; pressure from the Tertiary Education Services Office, which oversees higher education in Macau; and his organization in April 2014 of a conference about a book banned on the mainland, The Tragedy of Liberation: A History of the Chinese Revolution 1945–1957. The writer, historian, Frank Dikötter was a speaker at the conference. After the conference, Sautede was replaced as the university's academic events manager. In one of his latest columns, Sautede had reflected on the June 4th vigil in Macau, which had an unprecedented turnout of 2,000 people. "It is unquestionable that [it] appears, if not yet as a turning point, at least as a landmark," he wrote. The university's rector, Peter Stilwell, admitted that Sautede's political commentary was behind his dismissal. He urged the staff not to intervene in local political debates. Sautede said the decision to dismiss him was "contrary to the principle of 'one country, two systems' and contradicts several key points of the Basic Law."

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 112; Raquel Carvalho, "Macau Scholars Warn of Rising Censorship, Loss of Confidence in 'One Country, Two Systems'," South China Morning Post (22 July 2014; <http://www.scmp.com/news/china/article/1557068/macau-scholars-warn-rising-censorship-loss-confidence-one-country-two>); Raquel Carvalho, "Hong Kong, Macau Academics Seek Meeting over Firing of Eric Sautede," South China Morning Post (29 July 2014; <http://www.scmp.com/news/hong-kong/article/1561331/hong-kong-macau-academics-seek-meeting-over-firing-eric-sautede>); Martin Chung, personal communication (October 2014).]

See also Nepal, Russia.

COLOMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2004, 2006–2014.

A report published by the official National Center of Historic Memory in 2013 concluded that between 1985 and 2012 almost 220,000 people were killed, 80% of them civilians. At least 25,000 people were victims of enforced disappearances, carried out mostly by paramilitaries and the security forces. Some 27,000 people were kidnapped between 1970 and 2010, mostly by guerrilla groups, and more than five million people were forcibly displaced between 1985 and 2012. By November 2014, the government had registered more than seven million victims.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 114.]

The Justice and Peace Law (Law 975 of 2005), through which thousands of paramilitaries who laid down their arms in a government-sponsored process were to benefit from a maximum of eight years' imprisonment in return for confessions about human rights violations, failed to respect the right of victims to truth, justice and reparation. The process began in 2005, but by September 2014, only 63 paramilitaries had been convicted of human rights violations under Law 975. Most of the 30,000 paramilitaries who reportedly laid down their arms failed to submit themselves to the limited scrutiny of Law 975.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 115.]

On 23 September 2014, the representative of the guerrilla group Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia-Ejército del Pueblo (FARC-EP; Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia–People's Army) in La Havana, Iván Márquez, called for the end of paramilitarism in Colombia. "Without the end of paramilitarism, and without the elucidation of its origin and responsible people," its end "would be uncertain." He stressed the need "to open-up all the archives, to declassify and lift all the legal prohibitions covering the most responsible people, and to impede the destruction of archives that has been occurring. The general attorneys should explain to the country why the most serious denunciations of the military leaders have been thrown to the bin of indifference and calculated oblivion. They should provide a coherent explanation to the country as to why they have permitted the loss of hours and hours of recordings revealing who were the true authors behind the author." The statement came a few days after the Colombian Senate debated the alleged links between the former president and current senator Alvaro Uribe, paramilitarism and drug traffickers. On 4 March 2015, FARC commander Joaquín Gómez reiterated the demand for the government to declassify secret files on the armed conflict and request documents from the United States on the subject, in order to seek the truth. This would include the creation of a special archive committee.

[Sources: "FARC Demand Declassification of Paramilitary Related Archives," Telesur (23 September 2014; <http://www.telesurtv.net/english/news/FARC-Demand-Declassification-of-Paramilitary-Related-Archives-20140923-0067.html>); "FARC Asks Colombian Government to Declassify Archives," Telesur (4 March 2015; <http://www.telesurtv.net/english/news/FARC-Asks-Colombian-Government-to-Declassify-Archives-20150304-0033.html>).]

On 10 February 2015, a commission of twelve Colombian historians led by Manuel Moncayo, former National University rector, and Eduardo Pizarro, current ambassador to the Netherlands, presented their 800-page study of the “origins, causes, aggravators and consequences of Colombia’s 50-year long armed conflict” in Cuba, where peace talks were held between the administration of President Juan Manuel Santos and the FARC. Laying the foundation for determining responsibility for the nearly seven million victims, the report was seen as input for a future truth commission. It did not describe one “historic truth” or “official history” but agreement and disagreement among scholars. Scholars agreed that among the main causes of the conflict were decades of rural injustice and inequality, the inability of leftist political forces to assume power without violence, and drug trafficking. They disagreed about other causes: for example, one scholar traced the causes of the conflict back to the 1920s, others to “la Violencia,” a ten-year period of violence in 1948–1958; still others to the surge of guerrilla and paramilitary groups in the 1980s resulting in a massive increase in victimization.

[Sources: “Peace Talks: Historic Commission Releases Report on Causes of Colombia Conflict” (11 February 2015; <http://colombiareports.co/historic-commission-releases-report-causes-colombia-conflict>); “Colombia Peace Talks Resume with Focus on Conflict’s Victims The FARC delegation in Havana for the peace talks,” (3 May 2015; <http://www.telesurtv.net/english/news/Colombia-Peace-Talks-Resume-with-Focus-on-Conflicts-Victims-20150503-0017.html>).]

At the peace talks, the parties agreed on 2 June 2015 to install a Truth Commission following a proposal from FARC delegates. The commission would not have judicial powers and its documentation would not serve as legal evidence but it would gain access to secret state documents.

[Source: “Latin America Colombian Government and FARC Agree to Create Truth Commission,” (4 June 2015; <http://www.telesurtv.net/english/news/Colombian-Government-and-FARC-Agree-Truth-Commission-20150604-0046.html>).]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2000, 2003–2014.

In 2014 the International Criminal Court (ICC) confirmed the verdict and sentence in the Thomas Lubanga Dyilo case—he had been found guilty in 2012 of the war crimes of enlisting and conscripting children under the age of fifteen and using them to participate actively in hostilities in the Democratic Republic of Congo. On 7 March 2014, the ICC convicted Germain Katanga, commander of the Force de Résistance Patriotique en Ituri (Patriotic Resistance Front in Ituri; FRPI), of crimes against humanity and war crimes. The crimes were committed on 24 February 2003 during an attack on the village of Bogoro, in Ituri district. On 23 May 2014, he was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment. He decided not to appeal the decision and issued an apology to the victims. Sylvestre Mudacumura, alleged commander of the armed branch of the Forces Démocratiques de Libération du Rwanda (FDLR), remained at large despite the issuance by the ICC of an arrest warrant for war crimes on 13 July 2012. The leader of the armed group March 23 (M23), General Bosco Ntaganda, had turned himself in at the United States embassy in Kigali in 2013 and asked to be transferred to the ICC, which had issued a warrant for his arrest in 2006. On 9 June 2014, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber II confirmed charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity against Ntaganda allegedly committed in 2002 and 2003 in Ituri district. The trial was scheduled for June 2015. Other M23 leaders in exile in Uganda and Rwanda continued to enjoy impunity for the crimes they had reportedly committed in Rutshuru and Nyiragongo territories. In May 2014, parliament rejected a legislative proposal on the domestication of the ICC Rome Statute, along with a proposal to create specialized criminal chambers to deal with crimes under international law committed before the entry into force of the Rome Statute in 2002. A draft Congolese law to establish specialized mixed chambers to try war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in Congo since the 1990s was adopted by the Council of Ministers on 22 April 2014 and presented to the National Assembly on 2 May 2014. The proposed chambers would benefit initially from the presence of non-Congolese staff. Citing technical concerns, members of parliament rejected the admissibility of the text on 8 May. Government officials said they would correct the technical errors and resubmit the draft law to parliament.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 10–11, 130, 131; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 191.]

See also Central African Republic.

CONGO (Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

COSTA RICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

CÔTE D'IVOIRE

See Ivory Coast.

CROATIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2001, 2003–2013.

In March 2014, Croat army officer Božo Bačelić became the first person to be convicted in national courts for war crimes committed during the Operation Storm in 1995. Two further trials relating to war crimes committed during Operation Storm were ongoing by the end of 2014. In total, eight members of Croatian military formations and 15 members of Serb formations stood trial for war crimes during 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 122.]

The European Court of Human Rights initiated communication with the government on 17 cases submitted by civilian victims of war alleging violations of the right to life due to the failure of the state to carry out effective investigations into the killing or disappearance of their relatives. Croatia continued to stall on the adoption of a comprehensive legislative framework that would regulate the status of, and access to reparation for, all civilian victims of war. In a positive development in March, the Ministry of Veterans' Affairs presented a draft Act on the Rights of Victims of Sexual Violence in the Homeland War (1991–1995), which would grant victims access to psychosocial and medical support, free legal aid, and monetary compensation. However, the draft law failed to specify the level of financial compensation that would be made available. In August 2014, Croatia signed a regional declaration on missing persons, and committed to pursuing measures to establish the fate and whereabouts of the 2,200 still missing in Croatia. Croatia had yet to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance. The rights of relatives of missing persons continued to be undermined by the absence of a law on missing persons.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 122.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Serbia/Kosovo.

CUBA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2002, 2006, 2010–2012.

Members of the Damas de Blanco (Ladies in White)—a group founded by the wives, mothers, and daughters of political prisoners and which the government considers illegal—were routinely detained before or after they attended Sunday mass. On 4 May 2014, for example, more than eighty women were detained before attending mass throughout the island. On 13 July 2014, 129 members of the group were detained as they prepared to attend commemorative ceremonies honoring Cubans who died attempting to leave the island in 1994. (See also NCH Annual Report 2011.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 182.]

See also Colombia, United States.

CYPRUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2005, 2008–2011, 2013.

In May 2015, the leaders of the two Cypriot communities (President of Cyprus Nicos Anastasiades and Turkish-Cypriot leader Mustafa Akinci) jointly called on “anyone who might possess information on possible burial sites of missing persons to share this information with the Commission on Missing Persons. The Pancyprian Organization of the Relatives of Undeclared Prisoners and Missing Persons called upon the Turkish army to open its archives regarding the fate of their beloved ones. Hundreds disappeared during the intercommunal fighting which took place between 1963 and 1964, and during the Turkish invasion in 1974. Between January and August 2014, the Committee of Missing Persons in Cyprus exhumed the remains of 65 people, bringing the total number of exhumations since 2006 to 948. Between August 2006 and August 2014, the remains of 564 missing individuals (430 Greek Cypriots and 134 Turkish Cypriots) had been identified and restored to their families. However, no perpetrators were identified or prosecuted for the disappearances and killings in either Cyprus or Turkey at the end of 2014.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 125; A. Makris, “Relatives of Missing Persons in Cyprus: Turkish Army Must Open its Archives,” Greek Reporter (31 May 2015; <http://greece.greekreporter.com/2015/05/31/relatives-of-missing-persons-in-cyprus-turkish-army-must-open-its-archives>).]

CZECH REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2010, 2013–2014.

In August 2014, over four years after the government's apology for the enforced sterilization of Roma women, the Human Rights Minister announced a draft law offering financial compensation of between 3,500 and 5,000 euros to individual victims. According to the NGO Czech Helsinki Committee, almost 1,000 women were forcibly sterilized between 1972 and 1991 and should be entitled to financial remedy.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 126.]

Following a mission to the country in 2014, Amnesty International reported in 2015 that a majority of schools it visited (23 out of 24) did not include teaching on Roma history or culture in their educational curricula. This fell short of international standards required by the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination in its General Comment no. 27 and the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in its Recommendation R (2000) 4.

[Source: Amnesty International, Must Try Harder: Ethnic Discrimination of Romani Children in Czech Schools (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 32, 43–44, 48–49.]

See also Slovakia.

DENMARK

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2007, 2013.

See Rwanda.

DJIBOUTI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

ECUADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2007, 2009–2014.

Efforts to hold Ecuadoran officials to account for human rights violations committed from 1984 to 2008 continued to make slow progress. In December 2013, the National Assembly passed a law guaranteeing the right to reparation to relatives and victims of human rights violations between 1983 and 2008 documented by the Truth Commission established in 2007. In January 2014, former Police Chief Edgar Vaca was arrested in the United States pending his extradition. Vaca was one of ten former police and military officers accused of torture and enforced disappearances during León Febres Cordero's presidency (1984–1988). His extradition was pending in early 2015. This was the first case of members of the security forces being tried for crimes against humanity. In 2010, a special prosecutorial unit was formed to investigate 118 cases involving 456 victims (including 68 victims of extrajudicial execution and 17 of enforced disappearance) documented by the truth commission. In early 2015, prosecutors had brought charges in seven cases, including two in which suspects were convicted and one in which they were acquitted.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 136; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 198.]

In October 2014, the government apologized to the Kichwa [Quechua] People of Sarayaku, accepting that the state had put their lives and livelihoods at risk when in 2002 and 2003 it allowed an oil company to conduct exploration work in their territory. The Kichwa People of Sarayaku had won a legal battle before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in 2012. However, at the end of 2014 Ecuador had not yet finalized the removal of 1.4 tons of explosives left in the indigenous community's territory and had not regulated the right to consultation and free, prior and informed consent for all indigenous peoples as ordered by the Inter-American Court in 2012.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 136.]

EGYPT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2001, 2003, 2006–2007, 2010–2014.

A court retrying former President Hosni Mubarak on charges of killing protesters during the 2011 uprising dismissed the case against him in November 2014 on a legal technicality. His Interior Minister and several security officials were also acquitted of the same charges. A government-appointed fact-finding committee, established after security forces killed hundreds of protesters on 14 August 2013, announced its findings in November 2014. Ignoring disparities between security forces casualties and protesters, it concluded that protesters had started the violence. The committee downplayed human rights violations by security forces, merely calling for them to receive training in policing demonstrations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 140.]

In December 2014, Egypt banned the film Exodus: Gods and Kings by director Ridley Scott on the grounds of “historical inaccuracies.” The film was based on the Bible’s book Exodus. The censors denounced the film’s claims that an earthquake sparked the famous Parting of the Red Sea, rather than a divine miracle, and that Jews built the pyramids. The film was also banned in Morocco but for a different reason (Muslims believe that Moses is a prophet and should not be depicted on the screen). The film was also banned in the United Arab Emirates.

[Sources: Jess Denham, “Exodus: Gods and Kings Banned in Egypt for ‘Historical Inaccuracies,’” Observer (26 December 2014; <http://www.independent.co.uk/arts-entertainment/films/news/exodus-gods-and-kings-banned-in-egypt-for-historical-inaccuracies-9945523.html>); NRC Handelsblad (31 December 2014), 15.]

In March 2015, a curriculum development panel at the Education Ministry recommended deletion of some religious texts and passages on historical Islamic figures from primary and secondary school curricula. These figures included historical heroes such as Uqba ibn Nafi (622–683), the Arab general who led the Islamic conquest of the Maghreb for the Umayyad dynasty, and Saladin ([1137]–1193), the Muslim ruler who liberated Jerusalem from the Crusaders in 1187. Some fatwas and hadith (sayings of Prophet Muhammad) were also omitted (including one saying, “I was ordered to fight people until they testify that there is no god but Allah”). Prime Minister Ibrahim Mehleb endorsed the recommendations, saying that radical Islamic ideologies exploited outdated ideas to incite youngsters to violence. Leaders of the Al-Nour and Salafist Call political parties condemned the deletions as a distortion of history. In January 2015, the Education Ministry had also revised psychology and sociology curricula and texts that had been altered previously by the Muslim Brotherhood government (2012–2013). One high school course removed was “The Difference between a Revolution and a Coup.” Textbooks that included biographies of Islamist leaders were pulped and reprinted after amendments were made.

[Source: Jamie Dettmer, “Egypt Reforms School Textbooks to Counter Extremism,” Voice of America (22 April 2015; <http://m.voanews.com/a/egypt-reforms-school-textbooks-to-counter-extremism/2730247.html>).]

On 2 July 2015, a French sociology student (known as “Fanny”) from the School for Advanced Studies in the Social Sciences (EHESS) in Paris was deported after being arrested by a unit of security forces, in apparent relation to her research on the 6 April youth movement. She had interviewed members of the movement in the Nile Delta city of Damietta for her master’s degree. The 6 April movement was a key pro-democratic protest force during the 25 January Revolution and subsequent demonstrations. Following a crackdown on activism after the July 2013 regime change, however, the movement was driven underground and in 2014 it was banned.

[Source: Emil Nader, “French Student Arrested, Deported from Egypt for Researching 6 April,” Daily News Egypt (7 July 2015; <http://www.dailynewsegypt.com/2015/07/07/french-student-arrested-deported-from-egypt-for-researching-6-april>).]

EL SALVADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2014.

The 1993 amnesty law, which for over two decades has ensured impunity for those responsible for human rights violations during the 1980–1992 conflict, remained in place. In October 2013, the authorities issued a decree establishing a reparations Program for survivors who suffered human rights violations during the conflict. At end of 2013, the Attorney General’s Office reopened the investigation into the 1981 El Mozote massacre in which more than 700 civilians, including children and elderly people, were tortured and killed by the military in the village of El Mozote and nearby hamlets over a three-day period. The investigation was continuing at the end of 2014. In February 2014, the Supreme Court ordered that an investigation be reopened into the San Francisco Angulo massacre in which 45 people, mostly women and children, were killed, allegedly by members of the army, in 1981. The investigation was continuing at the end of 2014. In August 2014, 32 years after the events, the state finally acknowledged the 1982 El Calabozo massacre, in which more than 200 people were killed by the army. However, no one had been brought to justice for the crime by the end of 2014. In October 2014, in its ruling in the case of Rochac Hernandez et al. v. El Salvador, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights found the state responsible for failing to investigate the enforced disappearance of five children between 1980 and 1982 in the context of military counter-insurgency operations during the conflict.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 143.]

ERITREA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

ESTONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2010.

On 12 October 2014, Russian ethnologist and historian Valery Tishkov, member of the Russian Academy of Sciences and noted scholar of Chechnya, was denied entry into Estonia when he landed at Tallinn airport to attend an event organized by a press club. He was not told the reason despite having a valid visa. He brought his case in a court in Tallinn.

[Source: Valery Tishkov, "Estonian Case Highlights Issue of EU Bans on Russian Academics, Celebrities," Transitions Online (20 November 2014; <http://www.tol.org/client/article/24570-kosovo-parties-break-deadlock-russian-scholar-sues-estonia-for-entry-ban.html>).]

ETHIOPIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2011.

According to Amnesty International, the government interpreted expressions of Oromo history and culture as manifestations of dissent: hundreds of people were arrested, including in 2011 and 2012, for celebrating their cultural identity as Oromos, wearing traditional clothing, singing or writing about their culture, often during traditional Oromo festivals. Participating in societies to discuss and promote Oromo culture and history also caused harassment and, in some cases, arrest. Writing or singing about Oromo history, including representing it as a history of oppression, was met with hostility by the government as expressions of dissent. A young man who had published a book of poems which he said related to Oromo history, culture and language was arrested for a week and interrogated about the political intentions of his poems.

[Source: Amnesty International, “Because I Am Oromo”: Sweeping Repression in the Oromia Region of Ethiopia (London: Amnesty International, 2014), 22, 37, 44–45, 117.]

Early in 2014, a “study” conducted by the Press Agency and Ethiopian News Agency and published in the government-run Addis Zemen newspaper targeted seven independent publications, alleging that they had printed several articles which “promoted terrorism,” denied economic growth, belittled the legacy of former Prime Minister Meles Zenawi (governed 1995–2012), and committed other “transgressions.” In August 2014, the government announced that it was bringing charges against several of the publications, causing over twenty journalists to flee the country. In October 2014, the owners of three of the publications were sentenced in their absence to over three years’ imprisonment each for allegedly inciting the public to overthrow the government and publishing unfounded rumors.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 149.]

FIJI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006, 2010.

FINLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

FRANCE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1999, 2001–2009, 2011–2014.

See Algeria, Egypt, Rwanda.

GEORGIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2003, 2010–2012, 2014.

GERMANY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–2000, 2003, 2006–2013.

In early December 2014, Peter Burschel, director of the Humboldt University history department, issued a statement calling on students and teaching staff to counter what he called a campaign against historian Jörg Baberowski. The student branch of the Trotskyist Party for Social Equity had repeatedly criticized Baberowski who advocated an aggressive stance toward the Islamic State and called him an intellectual trailblazer for a worldwide German war policy. In February 2014, Baberowski had caused controversy when he told Der Spiegel that he shared Ernst Nolte's views in the 1986 "Historikerstreit" on the singularity of the Holocaust.

[Source: Michael Gardner, "University Defends Controversial Scholar," University World News (5 December 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=2014120412203676>).]

See also Greece, Rwanda, United States.

GHANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2004–2008.

GREECE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2004–2011, 2013–2014.

Police used excessive force and misused chemical irritants against protesters and journalists on several occasions throughout 2014. A large number of the reported abuses took place during two student protests, one against a university lock-out on 13 November 2014, and another during a protest for the anniversary of the 1973 students' uprising on 17 November.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's

Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 165.]

On 28 August 2014, the parliament passed a new anti-racist law that, among others, criminalized denial of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity, provided they were recognized as such by international courts or the Greek parliament. A group of Greek historians warned that such a blanket criminalization could lead to the prosecution of scholars. In March 2015, a prosecutor in Crete decided to indict German historian Heinz Richter (formerly of the University of Mannheim) over a book he wrote on the May 1941 battle of Crete on the grounds that it constituted a “denial of the crimes of Nazism against the Cretan people with derogatory content.” The trial was scheduled for 2 September 2015.

[Sources: Antonis Liakos, personal communication (23 March 2015); Damian Mac Con Uladh, personal communication (23 March 2015); Σε δίκη παραπέμπει τον καθηγητή Χ. Ρίχτερ ο εισαγγελέας Πεθύμνο (18 March 2015; <http://www.neakriti.gr/?page=newsdetail&DocID=1221065>).]

GRENADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2014.

The right to truth, justice and reparation for victims of crimes against humanity during the internal armed conflict (1960–1996), in which 200,000 people were killed and 45,000 people were forcibly disappeared, remained a concern. In May 2013, former President Efraín Ríos Montt was convicted of committing genocide and crimes against humanity against members of the Maya-Ixil indigenous community during his presidency and sentenced to 80 years’ imprisonment. The Constitutional Court overturned his conviction ten days later on a technicality, a devastating outcome for victims and their relatives who had waited for more than three decades for justice. Ríos Montt was the President and Commander-in-Chief of the Army in 1982–1983 when 1,771 Mayan-Ixil indigenous people were killed, tortured, subjected to sexual violence or displaced during conflict. A retrial was scheduled to commence in 2015. In February 2014, the Attorney General’s term was cut short by the Constitutional Court. There were concerns that her removal was the result of her role in ensuring that Ríos Montt was brought to trial, and her commitment to investigate human rights violations that occurred during the internal armed conflict. Ríos Montt has also been charged in a separate case involving the massacre of 300 men, women, and children in the town of Dos Erres in 1982. The trial was stalled pending the resolution of an appeal by defense attorneys who had called into question the independence of the presiding judge.

In May 2014, Congress passed a non-binding resolution stating that genocide had not occurred during the internal armed conflict. The resolution directly contradicted a 1999 United Nations investigation which concluded that genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity had occurred during the internal armed conflict. Over 80% of those killed and disappeared were of indigenous Maya ethnicity. President Otto Pérez Molina (president since 2012) had previously expressed his support for a public letter signed by a group of politicians calling genocide charges against former military officers a “fabrication.”

In June 2014, three former members of the National Police were arrested in connection with the murder of prominent human rights activist Myrna Mack. Mack was killed in 1990 for her role in documenting abuses committed during the civil war. In July 2014, Felipe Solano Barillas became the first ex-guerrilla to be convicted in connection with atrocities committed during the civil war (1960–1996). Found guilty of ordering the massacre of 22 residents of the town of El Aguacate in 1988, he was ordered to serve ninety years’ imprisonment.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 16, 166–167; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 257–258.]

GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2014.

Investigations continued into the massacre in the Grand Stade de Conakry on 28 September 2009, when security forces killed more than a hundred peaceful demonstrators and injured at least 1,500 others. Dozens of women were raped and others disappeared. Moussa Dadis Camara, then head of the military junta, was questioned in Burkina Faso in July 2014. Since 2009 Guinea has remained under preliminary investigation by the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) for the crimes. She concluded that there were reasonable grounds to believe that these amounted to crimes against humanity, including murder, torture, rape and other forms of sexual violence, persecution and enforced disappearances. A delegation from her office visited Guinea in February 2014 and noted that investigations had advanced, but not sufficiently. In June 2014, Sékouba Konaté, then Minister of Defense, submitted a list of suspects to the prosecutor. In September 2014, on the fifth anniversary of the Guinea stadium killings, the High Commissioner for Human Rights urged the government to take steps to advance the investigation and ensure accountability for those responsible. The Office of the United Nations Special Representative of the Secretary-General on Sexual Violence in Conflict continued to support accountability for crimes committed during the 2009 stadium massacre and rapes.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 169; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 263, 266.]

In 2014, the Reflection Commission, created by presidential decree in June 2011 to promote reconciliation, made little progress in fulfilling its mandate.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 262, 265.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2012.

By the end of 2014, no one had been held accountable for human rights violations committed in the context of the 2012 coup, nor for the political killings that had occurred since 2009.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 170.]

GUYANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997.

HAITI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2000–2003, 2006, 2008–2009, 2013–2014.

Former President Jean-Claude Duvalier returned to Haiti in January 2011 after nearly 25 years in exile. He was charged with financial and human rights crimes allegedly committed during his 15-year tenure as president. From 1971 to 1986, Duvalier commanded a network of security forces that committed serious human rights violations, including arbitrary detentions, torture, disappearances, summary executions, and forced exile. In 2012, the investigating judge in the case found, contrary to international standards, that the statute of limitations prevented prosecuting Duvalier for his human rights crimes. An appellate court heard testimony in a challenge to the ruling in 2013, with Duvalier appearing in court and answering questions posed by the court and victims' attorneys. In a historic ruling on 20 February 2014, the Port-au-Prince Court of Appeal found that the statute of limitations could not be applied to crimes against humanity and ordered additional investigation into charges against Duvalier. In May 2014, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights called on all Organization of American States (OAS) member states to make their archives and official files on the human rights abuses committed under Duvalier open for use as evidence in the investigation. It was unknown whether OAS member states had complied with the commission's request. However, Duvalier died on 4 October 2014 without having been brought to trial. In early 2015, a reopened investigation into crimes committed by Duvalier's collaborators was still pending.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 173; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 268, 270.]

HONDURAS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998, 2001–2002, 2009–2014.

Following a military coup in June 2009, the de facto government suspended key civil liberties, including freedom of the press and assembly. In the ensuing days, security forces responded to generally peaceful demonstrations with excessive force and shut down opposition media outlets, causing several deaths, scores of injuries, and thousands of arbitrary detentions. A truth commission established by former President Porfirio Lobo published a report in July 2011 that documented twenty cases of excessive use of force and killings by security forces. In August 2014, José Arnulfo Jiménez, a former military officer, was sentenced to five years' imprisonment for the arbitrary closure of Channel 36 in June 2009. In early 2015, there had been little progress in prosecuting other abuses committed during the post-coup period.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 272.]

HONG KONG

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996. See China.

HUNGARY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997, 2004, 2007–2014.

On 12 January 2014, the deputy leader of the governing allied Christian Democrats (KDNP), Bence Retvari, called on the opposition Socialist Party to transfer their Communist-era documents (1944–1989), stored in the archives of the Institute of Political History (PTI; established by the Socialists), to the National Archives. He said that the 2012 amendment to the archives law obliged the PTI to hand over the documents to the National Archives because it defined documents filed in 1944–1989 as state property. On 11 June 2014, the Supreme Court rejected the PTI appeal and ordered the transfer.

[Sources: MTI, “KDNP Calls on Socialists to Hand over Communist Era Files” (<http://www.politics.hu/20140112/kdnp-calls-on-socialists-to-hand-over-communist-era-files>; 12 January 2014); MTI, “Pre-1989 Communist Documents To Be Transferred to National Archives,” (<http://www.politics.hu/20140612/pre-1989-communist-documents-to-be-transferred-to-national-archives>; 12 June 2014).]

See also United Kingdom.

INDIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1997, 2000–2014.

Progress in investigations and trials in cases related to the 2002 violence in Gujarat, which killed at least 2,000 people, mostly Muslims, continued to be slow. In November 2014, the Nanavati-Mehta Commission, appointed in 2002 to investigate the violence, submitted its final report to the Gujarat state government. The report was not made public. Perpetrators of past violations in Jammu and Kashmir, Nagaland, Manipur, Punjab and Assam continued to evade justice. November 2014 marked the thirtieth anniversary of violence in Delhi in 1984 which led to the massacre of thousands of Sikhs. [Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 28, 179, 181.]

Weeks after the Hindu nationalist BJP-led National Democratic Alliance (NDA) government was elected in May 2014, the Minister for Human Resources Development, Smriti Irani, announced that the government would “Hinduize” the content of textbooks. In July 2014, she appointed Yellapragada Sudershan Rao, history professor at Kakatiya University in Telengana and openly linked to the Hindu nationalist Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), as chairman of the Indian Council of Historical Research (ICHR; a supposedly autonomous body of the education ministry), a decision which was much criticized. In May 2015, the ICHR disbanded the editorial board and advisory committee for its journal Indian Historical Review, including advisory board member Romila Thapar. After his appointment, Rao told The Telegraph (Calcutta) that he would help fund projects seeking to prove the historical legitimacy of the Hindu epics Ramayana and Mahabharata—something deemed impossible because these were mythological works. Out of the eighteen new members appointed to the ICHR, four were selected from RSS affiliates.

[Sources: Suchitra Behal, “Amartya Sen Row with Government over ‘Dream’ University,” University World News (27 February 2015; universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150227081045897); Alya Mishra, “Higher Education Policy Lacks Direction, Say Academics,” University World News (21 May 2015; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150521173238702>); Siddharth Narrain, “Text Messaging,” Index on Censorship (2014 no. 3), 87; Suhrith Parthasarathy, “Ideas Under Review,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 28–29.]

On 21 August 2014, the Indian government barred the release of the film Kaum de Heere (Diamonds of the Community). The film was based on the 31 October 1984 assassination of former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi by two Sikh guards. The movie had already obtained a clearance from the Central Board of Film Certification (CBFC) but the certified film was reexamined during a new screening attended by the Home Ministry. National security grounds were cited; in addition, the film's title was deemed provocative.

[Source: Hartosh Bai & Omair Ahmad, "A New Initiative To Defend Free Speech in India," Free Speech Debate (2 October 2014; <http://freespeechdebate.com/en/discuss/a-new-initiative-to-defend-free-speech-in-india>).]

December 2014 marked the thirtieth anniversary of the Bhopal gas leak disaster (2–3 December 1984). Survivors continued to experience serious health problems linked to the leak and to continuing pollution from the factory site. In November 2014, a Bhopal court asked for its criminal summons against the Dow Chemical Company to be re-issued, after the company failed to comply with an earlier summons. In the same month, the government agreed to use medical and scientific data to increase a multi-million US dollar compensation claim against Union Carbide. The Indian government had yet to clean up the contaminated factory site.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 30, 180.]

In December 2014, Anand Patwardhan's socio-political documentary film Ram Ke Naam (1992), about the politics of religion leading to the December 1992 demolition of the Babri Masjid mosque in Ayodhya (see NCH Annual Reports 2002–2004, 2006–2007, 2010–2011), was to be screened at the Indian Law Society college in Pune. It was called off, however, after the college received threats. Another documentary maker, Sanjay Kak, whose film Jashn-e-Azadi (2007) was critical of the army's role in Kashmir, was attacked on venues that planned to show it.

[Source: Meena Vari, "Creative and Academic Freedom under Threat from Religious Intolerance in India," The Conversation (1 July 2015; <http://theconversation.com/creative-and-academic-freedom-under-threat-from-religious-intolerance-in-india-43743>).]

See also Sri Lanka.

INDONESIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2001–2002, 2004–2013.

Victims of past human rights violations and abuses continued to demand justice, truth and reparation for crimes under international law which occurred under the rule of former President Suharto (1965–1998) and during the subsequent reformasi period. These included unlawful killings, rape and other crimes of sexual violence, enforced disappearances, and torture and other ill-treatment. No progress was reported on numerous cases of alleged gross violations of human rights that were submitted by the National Human Rights Commission (Komnas HAM) to the Attorney General's office after a preliminary pro-justicia inquiry [an investigation, which could eventually lead to prosecution in a human rights court] was conducted by the Commission.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 26, 185; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 292.]

More than ten years after the murder of prominent human rights defender Munir Said Thalib, the authorities had failed to bring all the perpetrators to justice. No progress was reported in 2014 on a new law on a national Truth and Reconciliation Commission. The government failed to implement recommendations made by the bilateral Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship, in particular to establish a commission for disappeared persons tasked with identifying the whereabouts of all children from Timor-Leste who were separated from their parents around the 1999 independence referendum.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 185.]

By the end of 2014, the National Human Rights Commission Komnas HAM had completed only two out of five pro-justicia inquiries into "gross human rights violations" during the Aceh conflict (1989–2005). These included the 1999 Simpang KKA incident in North Aceh when the military shot dead 21 protesters and the Jamboe Keupok case in South Aceh where four people were shot dead and twelve burned alive by soldiers in May 2003. An Aceh Truth and Reconciliation by-law (qanun) passed in December 2013 was not implemented.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 185.]

On 25 April 2014, ten political activists from Maluku province were arrested by police in Ambon for planning to commemorate the anniversary of the Republic of South Maluku (RMS) movement's 1950 declaration of independence and carrying "Benang Raja" flags—a prohibited symbol of the movement. Nine of them were subsequently charged with "rebellion" under Articles 106 and 110 of the Criminal Code (crimes against the security of the state). Their trial began in September 2014 and had not been completed by the end of 2014.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 184; Human Rights Watch, World Report

2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 291.]

On 29 December 2014, The Look of Silence, a secretly filmed documentary of American director Joshua Oppenheimer, was banned because it did not encourage religion or the nation's unity. It was also called "subjective" because the protagonist was the son and brother of supposed Indonesian Communist Party members (who died during the 1965–1966 murders). Pre-ban stagings of the film (an estimated 25) generated intimidation and protests, including in Malang and at Gajah Mada University in Yogyakarta, Java, where the hard-line Islamic People's Forum interrupted the film because it "encouraged the revival of communism." The film's protagonist, Adi Rukun, moved from North Sumatra to an unknown place in Indonesia. The film was the sequel of The Act of Killing (see NCH Annual Report 2013).

[Sources: Dana Linssen, "De gruwel van het zwijgen," NRC Handelsblad (1 April 2015), C5; Willem van Rooijen, "'Op deze film hebben we ons hele leven gewacht'," Wordt Vervolgd (March 2015), 24–27.]

See also Netherlands, Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2014.

On 23 September 2014, at a war exhibition by the Sepah (Revolutionary Guard Corps) to mark the anniversary of the Iran-Iraq War (1980–1988) in Tehran, it was remarked that independent historians could not yet investigate the subject to examine the government's official version. Possibly as many as 190,000 Iranians were killed and 672,000 were injured in the war. Shirzad Abdollahi, a Tehran-based social analyst, said that the official narrative of the Iran-Iraq War had three themes: the conflict between Islam and infidels (religious); imperial powers attempting to destroy the Islamic Republic (political); defending honor, dignity and land (emotional). After the emergence of the Green Movement, under the leadership of Mir-Hossein Mousavi following the 2009 presidential elections, the Iran-Iraq War gradually had become a topic of serious discussion among political activists because Mousavi had been Iran's prime minister during the war.

[Source: A Correspondent in Tehran, "Iran-Iraq War Off-Limits to Historians in Iran," Al Monitor (6 October 2014; http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/10/iran-iraq-war-saddam-hussein-irgc.html?utm_source=Al-Monitor+Newsletter+%5BEnglish%5D&utm_campaign=61068533d7-October_7_2014&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_28264b27a0-61068533d7-93088897#).]

See also Argentina, Iraq, United States.

IRAQ

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2014.

On or around 6 August 2014, fighters of the Islamic State (IS; formerly Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, ISIS) stormed the city of al-Hamdaniya (also referred to as Qaraqosh). Many witnesses stated that they pillaged and destroyed buildings, including historic Christian cathedrals and churches. Staff from the Centre numérique des manuscrits orientaux (CNMO; Digital Center for Oriental Manuscripts) fled to Erbil in the face of the advance by IS. The staff managed to bring the manuscripts of the Dominican Priory of Mosul and the Chaldean Patriarchate in Baghdad with them. After the Dominicans had been compelled to leave Mosul in 2008, the CNMO had been reestablished in Qaraqosh.

[Sources: Columba Stuart, “Update from HMML about Manuscripts in Iraq and Syria,” (<https://groups.google.com/forum/#!topic/nascas/I1O-RfC5uZU>; 12 September 2014); United Nations Human Right Council, Report of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the Human Rights Situation in Iraq in the Light of Abuses Committed by the So-called Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant and Associated Groups (13 March 2015; ohchr.org/EN/HRBodies/HRC/RegularSessions/Session28/Documents/A_HRC_28_18_AUV.doc).]

In September 2014, in the territories occupied by the IS (including Mosul in Iraq and Raqqa in Syria), classes in many disciplines, including history, were removed from the school curriculum because they were deemed incompatible with the law of God. Biology teachers could not refer to the evolution theory. The concepts of nationalism and patriotism became taboo and were supposed to be replaced with the idea of the caliphate (Islamic state). Classes about Christianity were annulled. Sufi and Shiite clerics were forbidden from giving Koranic lessons at mosques. Many universities were closed; European culture and history and similar subjects were abolished. Saudi textbooks were reportedly used in IS-held areas.

[Sources: CBS/AP, “ISIS Eradicates Art, History and Music from Curriculum in Iraq” (15 September 2014; www.cbsnews.com/news/isis-eradicates-art-history-and-music-from-curriculum-in-iraq); Zaid Al Fares, “Frontline Isis: How the Islamic State is Brainwashing Children with Stone Age School Curriculum,” International Business Times (1 September 2014; <http://www.ibtimes.co.uk/frontline-isis-how-islamic-state-brainwashing-children-stone-age-school-curriculum-1463474>); “ISIL Teaching Saudi Textbooks at Schools in Syria, Iraq: Report” (7 October 2014; <http://www.presstv.ir/detail/2014/10/07/381388/isil-teaching-saudi-textbooks-at-school>); Gilgamesh Nabeel, “Islamic State Advance in Iraq Closes Eight Universities,” al-FanarMedia (22 August 2014; <http://www.al-fanarmedia.org/2014/08/islamic-state-advance-iraq-closes-eight-universities>); Gilgamesh Nabeel, “What Education Is Like Under the Islamic State,” al-FanarMedia (14 September 2014; <http://www.al-fanarmedia.org/2014/09/education-like-islamic-state>).]

On 29 and 30 September 2014, a Kurdish delegation received an electronic copy of the documents known as the Captured Iraqi Secret Police Files (spanning the period from the 1960s to 1991) at the University of Boulder, Colorado, where they had been stored since 1998. The repatriated files would be housed at the Zheen Archive Center in Sulaimaniyah (Kurdistan region of Iraq). See also NCH Annual Report 2008, United States entry.

[Source: “Visiting Kurdish Delegation to Receive Iraqi Secret Police Documents from CU-Boulder Human Rights Archive” (22 September 2014; <http://www.colorado.edu/news/releases/2014/09/22/visiting-kurdish-delegation-receive-iraqi-secret-police-documents-cu>).]

In January 2015, a spokesperson of the Kurdish Democratic Party said that Islamic State (IS) militants blew up large parts of the 2,700-year old, restored wall of Nineveh in the al-Tahrir quarter of Mosul. Nineveh was an ancient Mesopotamian city, capital of the Neo-Assyrian Empire, located on the Tigris. The IS also destroyed graves and grave monuments, including the mosque shrines of the prophets Seth, Jirjis and Jonah (Yunus). In February 2015, they further destroyed parts of the Central Library of Mosul (this included burning the collection of Iraqi newspapers from the early twentieth century and maps and books from the Ottoman Empire) and the University of Mosul’s library. An anonymous history professor at the university declared that there was heavy damage to the archives of the Sunni Muslim library of the 265-year-old Latin Church and Monastery of the Dominican Fathers and the Mosul Museum Library (which contained works dating back to 5000 BCE). Member of parliament Hakim al-Zamili compared the IS to raiding medieval Mongols, who in 1258 ransacked Baghdad.

[Sources: Sinan Salaheddin & Sameer N. Yacoub, “Iraqi Libraries Ransacked by Islamic State Group in Mosul” AP (31 January 2015; <http://bigstory.ap.org/article/1ec4e2a1bb5b4dce97faa462478f7c0e/iraqi-libraries-ransacked-islamic-state-group-mosul>); Dirk Vlasblom, “Koerden: IS blies stadsmuren van Nineveh op,” NRC Handelsblad (30 January 2015), 12.]

On 26 February 2015, the Islamic State released a video in which its members were seen destroying statues in Mosul at the Nergal Gate, the Ninawa Museum, and the palace of King Sennacherib. This included a stone winged-bull Assyrian protective deity from the seventh century BCE and a statue of Assyrian King Sargon II [reigned 722 – 705 BCE]. UNESCO labeled the intentional destruction of heritage an act of “cultural cleansing” and a “war crime,” called for an emergency meeting of the United Nations Security Council to discuss how to protect Iraq’s cultural heritage as an issue of national security, and appealed to the International Criminal Court’s prosecutor to launch an investigation. IS militants said that the statues were “false idols.” On 5 March 2015, IS militants also began bulldozing the ruins of the ancient Assyrian city of Nimrud (founded in the 13th century BCE; originally called Kalhu), located on the Tigris, south-east of Mosul and reputedly the best preserved Assyrian site in Iraq. On 7 March 2015, IS militants Islamic State militants destroyed ruins at the ancient temple city of Hatra (Arab name: al-Hadr), south-west of Mosul (founded in the third or second century BCE during the Seleucid Empire and later a part of the Parthian Empire). There were also reports of destruction in other IS-occupied cities such as Tal Afar (Ottoman city walls), Tikrit (Islamic tombs) and Bashir (Shiite mosques and graves).

[Sources: Association of Art Museum Directors, Archaeological Institute of America, Society for American Archaeology, American Schools of Oriental Research, American Anthropological Association and Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, Joint Statement on Cultural Destruction in Iraq (26 February 2015; <http://www.archaeological.org/news/aianews/18742>); Toon Beemsterboer & Dirk Vlasblom, “Hoe rovers en beeldenstormers erfgood slopen,” NRC Handelsblad (4 March 2015), 10–11; “Islamic State ‘Demolishes’ Ancient Hatra Site in Iraq,” BBC News (7 March 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-31779484>); “Islamic State ‘Destroys Ancient Iraq Statues in Mosul’,” BBC News (26 February 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-31647484>); “Islamic State Statue-Smashing in Iraq Was ‘War crime,’ UN Says,” BBC News (27 February 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-31663557>); “Islamic State: Ancient Nimrud Ruins ‘Bulldozed’ in Iraq,” BBC News (5 March 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-31759555>); “Nimrud: Outcry as IS Bulldozers Attack Ancient Iraq Site,” BBC News (6 March 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-31760656>); Jane O’Brien, “IS Looting Provokes Call for Global Response,” BBC News (17 April 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/magazine-32329681>); “UNESCO Calls for Mobilization to Stop ‘Cultural Cleansing’ in Iraq,” (27 February 2015; http://www.unesco.org/new/en/media-services/single-view/news/unesco_calls_for_mobilization_to_stop_cultural_cleansing_in_iraq/#.VPCr6-JzGYQ); United Nations Security Council, Resolution 2199 (12 February 2015; <http://www.un.org/en/sc/documents/resolutions/2015.shtml>); Dirk Vlasblom, “Assyrische stad zou door IS zijn verwoest,” NRC Handelsblad (7–8 March 2015), 5.]

On 16 March 2015, the mausoleum of ousted leader Saddam Hussein (1937–2006) was destroyed in the village of al-Awja, near Tikrit, when Iraqi forces and Iranian-backed Shia militias drove Islamic State (IS) militants from Tikrit.

[Source: “Iraq Conflict: Saddam's Tomb Destroyed In Tikrit Fighting,” BBC News (16 March 2015; bbc.com/news/world-middle-east-31901568).]

See also Syria, United Kingdom.

IRELAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000, 2002, 2004, 2006, 2013.

In February 2013, the government published a report purporting to clarify the state’s interaction with the religious-run “Magdalene Laundries.” The report and the voluntary compensation scheme announced thereafter fell below adequate standards of truth, justice and reparations. In June 2014, following international outcry at allegations of past abuses of women and children in so-called “mother and baby homes,” operated by religious orders with state funding between the 1920s and 1990s, the government committed to establishing an independent Commission of Investigation.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 196.]

See also United Kingdom.

ISRAEL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000–2003, 2008–2014.

See Argentina, Jordan, United States.

ITALY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2003, 2008, 2010, 2012.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2014.

In December 2013, the government renewed the mandate of the Special Investigation Commission tasked with investigating crimes committed during the 2010–2011 post-electoral violence as well as the mandate of the Commission for Dialogue, Truth and Reconciliation (CDVR). The CDVR published its findings in December 2014 and expressed concern about selective justice. In March 2014, Ivory Coast surrendered Charles Blé Goudé, a former youth minister and leader of a pro-Gbagbo militia accused of crimes against humanity committed during the post-electoral violence, to the International Criminal Court (ICC). In December 2014, the ICC confirmed four charges of crimes against humanity against him and committed him to trial. Former President Gbagbo remained in custody of the ICC. In June 2014, the ICC confirmed the charges against him and committed his case to trial. He would be tried for crimes against humanity. The trial was set for July 2015. In December 2014, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber rejected Ivory Coast's challenge to the admissibility of the case against Simone Gbagbo, who was charged by the ICC in February 2012 with murder, sexual violence, persecution and other inhuman acts, allegedly committed during the post-electoral crisis. Ivory Coast filed an appeal against the decision.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 11, 120–121; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 174, 175–176.]

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2014.

In June 2014, the results were made public of a government-appointed study which re-examined the drafting process of the Kono Statement (a landmark government apology made in 1993 to the survivors of the military sexual slavery system before and during World War II). Although previous discussions and decisions were respected, the review itself increased tensions with neighboring countries such as the Republic of Korea, as it was seen as an attempt to deny governmental responsibility. Several high-profile public figures made statements to deny or justify the system. The government continued to refuse to officially use the term “sexual slavery,” and to deny effective reparation to its survivors.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 29, 206.]

In December 2014, the controversial national security law (see NCH Annual Report 2014) took effect; the government was estimated to designate around 460,000 documents as “special secrets.”

[Sources: Eric Johnston, “State Secrets Law Could Constrain Researchers,” Japan Times (14 January 2015; <http://www.japantimes.co.jp/news/2015/01/14/national/state-secrets-law-could-constrain-researchers-some-say-although-impact-remains-unclear/#.VLooky6wmQd>); Kyodo, “Under New Law, about 460,000 Documents Likely To Become ‘Special Secrets’,” Japan Times (1 December 2014; <http://www.japantimes.co.jp/news/2014/12/01/national/politics-diplomacy/new-law-460000-documents-likely-called-special-secrets/#.VH1qDsm26nkv>).]

In December 2014, Hokusei Gakuen University, a Christian college in Hokkaido, northern Japan, decided to renew the part-time teaching contract of former Asahi Shimbun journalist Takashi Uemura (1958–), despite demands from ultranationalists since August 2014 that he be dismissed. The university had received threats of bombings and students endured attacks because of newspaper articles that Uemura wrote in 1991 about Korean comfort women. In October 2014, a group of more than thousand scholars, lawyers and journalists formed to support Uemura. In the same month, the police had arrested a 64-year-old man in Niigata, a region to the north of Tokyo, for making phone calls in which he threatened to “hurt students” and “blow up the university” if it did not dismiss Uemura. Uemura and his relatives had faced many personal attacks and threats for his journalistic work written in 1991 and based on the testimony of a former Korean “comfort woman.” In January 2015, Uemura filed a defamation suit against a publisher and against Tsutomu Nishioka, a right-wing professor at Tokyo Christian University, who denied the crimes against comfort women. The attacks against Uemura had begun when the liberal newspaper Asahi Shimbun in August 2014 suddenly retracted eighteen stories from the 1980s and 1990s about the comfort women that it admitted were based on the false testimony of a single former Japanese soldier. In the wake of the withdrawal, more than 10,000 ultranationalists had sued the newspaper for compensation for vilification of the national honor.

[Sources: Martin Fackler, “Japanese University Retains Ex-Journalist Facing Far Right’s Ire,” New York Times (17 December 2014; http://www.nytimes.com/2014/12/18/world/asia/hokusei-gakuen-university-retains-takashi-uemura-in-japan.html?_r=1); Suvendrini Kakuchi, “Scholars Welcome Global Challenge to Revisionism,” University World News (12 May 2015; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150512145634690>); Floris van Straaten, “Troostmeisjes? Klopt niks van,” NRC Handelsblad (29 January 2015), C17.]

The book Traditions and Encounters: A Global Perspective on the Past, written by Jerry Bentley and Herbert Ziegler (1999; fifth edition, 2010; McGraw Hill), historians at the University of Hawaii-Manoa, contained two sentences about the comfort women issue, saying that the Japanese army “forcibly recruited, conscripted, and dragooned as many as 200,000 women aged 14 to 20 to serve in military brothels, called ‘comfort houses’” and that the Japanese imperial army “massacred large numbers of comfort women to cover up the operation.” In late 2014, Ziegler reportedly received an e-mail from an official in the Japanese Consulate in Hawaii, requesting a meeting to discuss the passages. After he declined, two officials reportedly showed up in his university office and told him that he was wrong. Ziegler called the Japanese request to remove the paragraphs an infringement of his freedom of speech and academic freedom. McGraw Hill refused to change the textbook, saying that “scholars are aligned behind the historical fact of ‘comfort women’” and that it “unequivocally” stood behind the book. Recently, Prime Minister Shinzo Abe had declared in parliament that he was “shocked” by the textbook and that the government had to step up its efforts to disseminate the “correct” view abroad. In February 2015, a group of nineteen American historians, led by Alexis Dudden from the University of Connecticut, issued a call to their Japanese counterparts to remain steadfast in the face of pressure from the Abe government to play down the issue of “comfort women.” On 5 May 2015, an international group of 187 scholars wrote an Open Letter in Support of Historians in Japan to conservative Prime Minister Shinzo Abe calling for an end to the nationalistic distortion of the sexual slavery practised by the Imperial Army in World War II. It also criticized the government for whitewashing past war crimes and called for further research “free from government manipulation, censorship and private intimidation.”

[Sources: Anna Fifield, “U.S. Academics Condemn Japanese Efforts To Revise History of ‘Comfort Women,’” Washington Post (9 February 2015; http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/asia_pacific/american-academics-condemn-japanese-efforts-

to-revise-history-of-comfort-women/2015/02/09/e795fc1c-38f0-408f-954a-7f989779770a_story.html); Suvendrini Kakuchi, “Scholars Welcome Global Challenge to Revisionism,” University World News (12 May 2015; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150512145634690>).]

See also Korea, North, Russia.

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004.

In 2014, a controversy broke out after the Education Ministry deleted a lesson in the third grade history book about a Jordanian pilot killed in the 1967 war with Israel. Many argued that the deletion was required by the peace agreement with Israel. The ministry denied the accusation and said it was modernizing the curriculum.

[Source: Benjamin Plackett, “Arab Classrooms Frequently Ignore History,” Al-Fanar Media (10 March 2015; al-fanarmedia.org/2015/03/arab-classrooms-frequently-ignore-history).]

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2014.

The International Criminal Court (ICC) trial of Deputy President William Samoei Ruto and journalist Joshua arap Sang for alleged crimes against humanity committed during the 2007–2008 post-election violence continued throughout 2014. The trial was undermined by alleged witness intimidation and bribery, and the withdrawal of other witnesses. The Trial Chamber issued summonses to nine prosecution witnesses who no longer wished to appear voluntarily. By the end of 2014, three of the nine witnesses had testified via video-link from an undisclosed location in Nairobi.

On 5 December 2014, the ICC prosecutor withdrew charges against President Uhuru Kenyatta. He had been charged with crimes against humanity committed during the post-election violence. The prosecutor explained that the evidence at her disposal was insufficient to prove Kenyatta's alleged criminal responsibility beyond reasonable doubt. She stated that efforts by her office to gather relevant evidence had been hampered by the death of several key witnesses, intimidation of prosecution witnesses leading to the withdrawal of at least seven testimonies, and non-cooperation by the Kenyan government. On 3 December 2014, while rejecting the prosecutor's request for a further adjournment of the case, the ICC Trial Chamber ruled that the Kenyan government's conduct in the case fell short of the standard of good faith cooperation but declined to refer a formal finding of non-cooperation to the Assembly of States Parties. The government continued its efforts to discredit and weaken the ICC. In March 2014, Kenya submitted to the United Nations Secretary-General five proposed amendments to the ICC Statute, including that Article 27 be amended to preclude the ICC from prosecuting heads of state and government while in office. In November 2014, the Kenyan government requested the inclusion of a supplementary agenda item titled "Special session to discuss the conduct of the Court and the Office of the Prosecutor," to the provisional agenda of the 13th session of the Assembly of State Parties in December. The request was denied.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 10, 213–214; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 334.]

Perpetrators of crimes committed during the post-election violence of 2007–2008 remained unpunished at the national level. In February 2014, the Director of Public Prosecutions announced that a review of more than 4,000 post-election investigation files had failed to identify any prosecutable cases due to lack of evidence. No concrete steps were taken to establish the International Crimes Division of the High Court or to implement the recommendations of the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission. In October 2014, an opposition political party submitted to Parliament a draft bill titled “The Post-Election Violence Tribunal Bill—2014.” The draft bill proposed the establishment of a tribunal to try perpetrators of crimes against humanity committed during the post-election violence. Provisions in the draft bill included trials in the absence of the accused, the death penalty and posthumous convictions. The draft bill was pending at the end of 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 214.]

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011, 2013–2014.

In 2014, it became mandatory for secondary schools to introduce the history of supreme leader Kim Jong-un’s life as an official school subject.

[Sources: “N Korea: Schools Begin 81-hour Course on Kim Jong-un,” BBC News (<http://www.bbc.com/news/blogs-news-from-elsewhere-30208609>; 26 November 2014); “N. Korea Requires Students to Take 81-hour Course on Kim Jong-un” (http://world.kbs.co.kr/english/news/news_Po_detail.htm?No=106892; 25 November 2014).]

In May 2014, the government engaged in meetings with Japan to address the issue of abductions, and launched a special committee to reinvestigate cases of Japanese nationals abducted during the 1970s and 1980s. The initial report of the reinvestigation was, however, rejected by Japan as it contained no new information about the twelve Japanese nationals already officially admitted by North Korea as having been abducted from Japan by North Korean security agents.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 218.]

See also Japan.

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012–2013.

See Japan.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2013.

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008.

The Communist-era secret-police (KGB) files remaining in Latvia— hundreds of thousands—were accessible to the public, but the names of the 30,000 KGB agents and informers remained coded. Their real identities were listed on 4,300 cards, stored in sacks and guarded by the authorities. The last KGB chief in Latvia, Edmunds Johanson, declared that “opening up the files...would tear Latvian society apart”: key data was taken back to Moscow when the Soviets left in 1991, leaving the remaining documents incomplete and unreliable.

[Sources: Damien McGuinness, “Latvians Refuse to Lift Lid on KGB Past,” BBC News (20 May 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-32788317>); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News (May 2015).]

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2014.

The trial of four defendants (members of Hezbollah) accused in connection with the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005 opened in January 2014 before the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) in the Netherlands. The four defendants, and a fifth whose trial was joined to theirs by the STL in February, all remained at large and were tried in their absence.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 229; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 352.]

The fate of thousands who were forcibly disappeared, abducted or otherwise unlawfully deprived of their liberty during and after the 1975–1990 civil war, mostly remained undisclosed. In October 2012, Justice Minister Shakib Qortbawi put forward a draft decree to the cabinet to establish a national commission to investigate the fate of Lebanese and other nationals who disappeared during and after the 1975–1990 civil war. The cabinet formed a ministerial committee to examine the draft, but no further action was taken in 2014. In March 2014, however, the Shura Council ruled that the full, as yet unpublished, report of the 2000 Official Committee of Inquiry to Investigate the Fate of Kidnapped and Missing Persons in Lebanon should be made available to the families of those missing. After the dismissal of appeals against this decision (on the grounds that it might endanger civil peace), the full report was provided to a lawyer representing the families in September 2014. Lebanon signed the International Convention against Enforced Disappearance in 2007 but had yet to ratify it.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 229; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 352.]

On 22 December 2014, Education Minister Elias announced that in January 2015 the government would receive a long-awaited draft of a unified history curriculum covering Lebanon's modern history. The old history curriculum ended with Lebanon's independence in 1943 but the new one would cover the period until the 2005 assassination of Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

[Source: Wassim Mroueh, "Bou Saab: Modern Lebanese History Curriculum Imminent," Daily Star (23 December 2014; <http://www.dailystar.com.lb/News/Lebanon-News/2014/Dec-23/282000-bou-saab-modern-lebanese-history-curriculum-imminent.ashx>.)

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2014.

In 2013, the Special Court for Sierra Leone upheld the fifty-year prison sentence of former Liberian President Charles Taylor for his role in Sierra Leone's armed conflict (1991–2002), completing the court's mandate to try those bearing the greatest responsibility for crimes committed during the conflict. However, thousands suspected of committing crimes during the conflict have not been investigated and brought to justice. The issue of accountability for human rights violations was highlighted when the United Nations Panel of Experts on Liberia uncovered the presence of alleged arms dealer Ibrahim Bah, a Senegalese national, in Sierra Leone in 2013. A private prosecution was brought against him by victims of the conflict supported by a civil society organization, the Center for Accountability and Rule of Law. Sierra Leone deported Ibrahim Bah to Senegal days before he was due to appear in court.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 323.]

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2014.

The authorities failed to carry out meaningful investigations into alleged war crimes and serious human rights abuses committed during the 2011 armed conflict or to address the legacy of past violations under Mu'ammār al-Gaddafi's rule (1969–2011), including the 1996 mass killing of over 1,200 detainees in Abu Salim Prison. The trial of 37 former officials from Mu'ammār al-Gaddafi's rule for their alleged roles during the 2011 revolution began in March 2014 amid serious due process concerns. Defense lawyers were denied access to some evidence, given insufficient time to prepare, and were intimidated. Saif al-Islam al-Gaddafi, one of Mu'ammār al-Gaddafi's sons and the main defendant, appeared in court only by video link as he remained in militia custody in Zintan, casting doubt on the court's authority over him. Authorities controlling al-Hadba Prison complex, which hosts the courtroom, denied access to some independent trial observers including Amnesty International. A video of the "confessions" of another of Mu'ammār al-Gaddafi's sons, Saadi al-Gaddafi, was broadcast on Libyan television following his extradition from Niger and imprisonment at al-Hadba. Prison authorities interrogated him without access to a lawyer, and denied access to him by the United Nations Support Mission in Libya (UNSMIL), Amnesty International and others, despite the prosecution authorizing these visits. In Zawiyā, west of Tripoli, scores of al-Gaddafi loyalists were detained for periods of up to 18 months beyond the date they should have been released, as sentencing did not take into account the period of arbitrary detention by militias.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 233, 273; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 357–358.]

The authorities failed to surrender Saif al-Islam al-Gaddafi to the International Criminal Court (ICC) to face prosecution on charges of crimes against humanity. In May, the ICC Appeals Chamber confirmed Libya's legal obligation to transfer him to ICC custody. In July, the ICC Appeals Chamber upheld a decision that Abdallah al-Senussi [Sanussi], a former military intelligence chief accused of crimes against humanity, could be tried domestically. Serious concerns remained, however, about violations of his due process rights, including restricted access to a lawyer of his choice. The ICC prosecutor initiated a second case and began compiling evidence against suspects residing abroad in accordance with a 2013 agreement with the Libyan government on prosecutions of former al-Gaddafi officials. Despite expressing concern in November 2014 that "crimes within the ICC jurisdiction are being committed," the ICC prosecutor failed to begin investigations into crimes committed by militias.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 233–234.]

In September 2014, forces of the Islamist coalition Libya Dawn reportedly raided the offices of the National Commission for Human Rights and removed its archive of individual complaints, raising concerns of reprisals against victims of abuses.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 232.]

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009.

In 2014, Russian historian Aleksandr Dyukov, a member of the Historical Memory Foundation, - Russia, was denied entry to the country without explanation.

[Source: Valery Tishkov, “Estonian Case Highlights Issue of EU Bans on Russian Academics, Celebrities,” Transitions Online (20 November 2014; <http://www.tol.org/client/article/24570-kosovo-parties-break-deadlock-russian-scholar-sues-estonia-for-entry-ban.html>).]

LUXEMBOURG

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

See Turkey.

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2014.

Impunity continued for war crimes and crimes against humanity which occurred during the 2001 internal armed conflict. No measures were taken to locate the bodies of 13 persons still missing after the armed conflict.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 236.]

On 31 July 2014, Parliament had elected a new Lustration Commission team. The old team had been criticized by the opposition for allegedly blacklisting suspected Communist-era collaborators for political reasons. Five members of the old team kept their positions, including lawyer Tome Adziev as the commission chairman. Among the six new members was historian Sasko Janev. Ever since the commission started work in 2009, it had been marred by controversy. The opposition argued that it has been misused to target government critics and in December 2012, it removed two of its members from the commission in protest. Parliament had passed a first lustration law in 2008 and a second one in 2012 after the constitutional court scrapped many key provisions from the original legislation, narrowing its time span and the range of professions to be subjected to checks. Since 2009, the commission had combed over 29,000 personal files and uncovered more than 140 people who allegedly collaborated with the Yugoslav Communist-era police or ordered surveillance of others for ideological reasons.

In October 2014, the commission said that, after reviewing classified police archives, it had concluded that the most prominent historian from Yugoslav-era Macedonia and Macedonia's early independence years, Ivan Katardziev (1926–), had been an informer for the Communist secret police and spied on history students who came from Pirin Macedonia in Bulgaria in the 1950s, when he was head of the University Library in Skopje and of the Diaspora Office, as well as secretary of the Macedonian National History Institute. Katardziev denied the claims and insisted that he had been under police surveillance himself, adding that as head of the Diaspora Office, he had to submit reports to the authorities by virtue of his position. In the past few years, Katardziev, who was born in western Bulgaria, had publicly opposed the tendency of the ruling VMRO DPMNE political party to rehabilitate some Ottoman-era revolutionaries who had been blacklisted in Communist Yugoslavia for being too close to the Bulgarian cause. Katardziev told local media that he had no intention to submit a complaint to the administrative court about the commission's decision.

Sources: Sinisa Jakov Marusic, "New Macedonia Lustration Commission Resumes Collaborator Probe," Balkan Insight (1 August 2104; <http://www.balkaninsight.com/en/article/old-head-to-lead-> [macedonia-s-lustration-commission?utm_source=Balkan+Transitional+Justice+Daily+Newsletter&utm_campaign=414d537400-RSS_EMAIL_CAMPAIGN&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_561b9a25c3-414d537400-311109073); Sinisa Jakov Marusic, “Macedonia Names Top Historian as Communist Informer,” Balkan Insight (15 October 2014; http://www.balkaninsight.com/en/article/macedonia-lustrates-its-leading-historian?utm_source=Balkan+Transitional+Justice+Daily+Newsletter&utm_campaign=c78187cced-RSS_EMAIL_CAMPAIGN&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_561b9a25c3-c78187cced-311109073).]

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011.

See also Philippines, Sri Lanka.

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2013.

MALI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013–2014.

The government made little progress in holding to account those from all warring factions responsible for laws of war violations committed during the 2012–2013 armed conflict. The government’s provisional release in 2014 of over forty men associated with the conflict, including several commanders credibly implicated in abuses, raised concern of a de facto amnesty for these crimes. The government characterized the releases, which began in late 2013, as “confidence building measures” in advance of negotiations. They were carried out without regard as to whether the men might have been responsible for serious crimes in violation of international law. Supreme Court orders passed in 2013 permitted a Bamako court to hear criminal cases from the three northern provinces, and during 2014, dozens of families filed complaints to judicial authorities. With few exceptions, the latter failed to investigate any of these cases or others that human rights groups and journalists brought to their attention. There was, however, meaningful progress in the investigation into the torture and enforced disappearance of 21 elite “Red Berets” in 2012. In late 2013 and early 2014, some 25 soldiers, including former coup leader General Amadou Haya Sanogo, were charged in connection with the crimes. In July 2012, Mali, a state party to the International Criminal Court (ICC), referred “the situation in Mali since January 2012” to the ICC prosecutor for investigation. On 16 January 2013, the ICC prosecutor formally opened an investigation into grave crimes allegedly committed in the northern three regions of Mali, and during 2014, ICC investigators conducted several missions to the country.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 243; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 374.]

After assuming office in September 2013, President Ibrahim Boubacar Keita dissolved a pre-existing truth commission and, by two executive orders, established a Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission; on 20 March 2014, the National Assembly ratified the orders. The commission had a three-year mandate, would cover the period from 1960 to 2013, and consist of 15 members and 7 working groups. It would function under the Ministry of National Reconciliation and Development of the North. By late 2014, the commissioners had yet to be appointed and the body's credibility was limited because of the failure to consult sufficiently with a wide variety of stakeholders on its members, mandate powers, and degree of independence.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 242; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 374–375.]

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

A lawsuit by the Marshall Islands accusing the United States of failing to begin negotiations for nuclear disarmament was thrown out of a federal court in California in February 2015. The Marshall Islands also pursued legal action against India, Pakistan and the United Kingdom in the International Court of Justice, for failing to negotiate nuclear disarmament as required in the 1968 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. In the past, the United States had accepted responsibility for the damage caused by experimental nuclear tests between 1946 and 1958 and established a compensation fund administered by a Tribunal set up by the Marshall Islands government. (For background, see NCH Annual Report 2013.)

[Source: Josh Butler, “Marshall Islands Lawsuit Against US Thrown Out Of Court,” IPS (14 February 2015; eurasiareview.com/14022015-marshall-islands-lawsuit-us-thrown-court/?utm_source=feedburner&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=Feed%3A+eurasiareview%2FVsnE+%28Eurasia+Review%29).]

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011.

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2014.

Abductions and enforced disappearances continued to occur widely. The whereabouts of most victims remained undisclosed. During 2014, federal officials made a series of contradictory statements regarding the number of persons reported disappeared or missing and whose whereabouts remained undisclosed. In August, the government acknowledged some 22,611 missing persons, 9,790 of whom went missing during the present administration and 12,821 during the administration of President Felipe Calderón (2006–2012). The government failed to make public how it had arrived at this figure. Impunity remained the norm for cases of enforced disappearance. In April 2014, the government stated that only seven convictions had ever been achieved for the crime of enforced disappearance at the federal level between 2005 and 2010.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 247, 248–249.]

On 26 September 2014, more than 100 students from the Raúl Isidro Burgos Rural Teachers' College of Ayotzinapa traveled to the nearby city of Iguala to protest what they argued was a lack of funding for their school. They aimed to raise money to send a student delegation to Mexico City, where they hoped to join a march commemorating the 2 October 1968 Tlatelolco massacre, in which Mexican troops fired on and killed scores, possibly even hundreds, of student protesters. Following a confrontation with municipal police, as they returned to campus, 43 of them were kidnapped. Shots were fired and six people were killed, including three students. Witnesses alleged that police subsequently took a number of the students into custody, and handed them over to a local narcotics gang known as Guerreros Unidos. Media reports suggest that the gang members killed them. An investigation of the case was ongoing. The authorities arrested Iguala's mayor and his wife on suspicion of involvement in the abduction.

[Source: Scholars at Risk, Free to Think: Report of the Scholars at Risk Academic Freedom Monitoring Project (New York: Scholars at Risk, 2015; http://salsa4.salsalabs.com/o/50943/content_item/freetothink), 18.]

In mid-March 2015, the PRI government implemented the 2012 Federal Law of Archives by reclassifying previously accessible documents related to the Guerra Sucia (Dirty War), which between 1964 and 1982 left an estimated 2,000 people disappeared and an unknown number of political dissenters dead, most of them leftist guerrillas, college students, and activists. The documents had been open to the public since 2001 (under the National Action Party government) but the reclassification made access conditional upon approval by the intelligence agency CISEN and expired only after thirty years (and if they contained personal information after seventy years). Critics argued that evidence about human rights violations should not be considered as a personal matter, but as a matter of public interest and as part of the national memory, and feared that the measure could also impact other records, such as those related to the thousands of disappearances that occurred during the Felipe Calderón administration (2006–2012) (see above).

Source: Gabriela Gorbea & Andrea Noel, "Mexico Quietly Placed Archives Related to Its 'Dirty War' Under Lock and Key," VICE News (1 April 2015; <https://news.vice.com/article/mexico-quietly-> [placed-archives-related-to-its-dirty-war-under-lock-and-key].]

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2013.

See Iraq.

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2013.

In June 2014, both the United Nations Committee against Torture and the United Nations Working Group on Enforced Disappearances found that the courts had failed to fully apply domestic law and misinterpreted international humanitarian law in cases prosecuted since 2008. On 31 December 2013, a former Yugoslav Army commander and seven reservists were acquitted of the murder in April 1999 of 18 refugees from Kosovo in the village of Kaluđerski Laz near Rozaje. In February 2014, the Appellate Court upheld the conviction of four former Yugoslav Army reservists for the torture and other ill-treatment of around 250 Croatian war prisoners at Morinj detention camp in 1991–1992. They were sentenced to periods of imprisonment that were less than the statutory minimum and failed to reflect the gravity of their crimes. In March 2014, seven former prisoners held at Morinj camp were each awarded compensation of between 20,000 and 30,000 euros for their ill-treatment. A further two hundred former prisoners were claiming reparation. Also in March, former police officials acquitted of war crimes in 2013 opened a case for compensation against Montenegro for 1 million euros, on the grounds that they were unlawfully detained and deprived of their liberty. In August 2014, Montenegro signed a regional declaration on missing persons, and committed to establishing the fate and whereabouts of 61 missing people.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 254.]

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013.

Despite progress on judicial reforms, the authorities made no progress on other key recommendations of the Equity and Reconciliation Commission concerning security sector reform and a national strategy to combat impunity. Victims of the serious human rights violations perpetrated between 1956 and 1999 continued to be denied justice, and several cases of enforced disappearance remained unresolved.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 258.]

Moroccan authorities continued to clamp down on all advocacy of Sahrawi self-determination in Western Sahara, annexed by Morocco in 1975. Sahrawi political activists, protesters, human rights defenders and media workers faced an array of restrictions affecting their rights to freedom of expression, association and assembly, and were liable to arrest, torture and other ill-treatment and prosecution. The authorities did not permit protests and forcibly dispersed gatherings when they did occur, often using excessive force. Moroccan officials in Western Sahara frustrated attempts by human rights groups such as the Sahrawi Association of Victims of Grave Human Rights Violations Committed by the Moroccan State (ASVDH) to obtain official registration, which they required to operate legally, have official premises, hold public events, and apply for funding. At least 39 foreign journalists and activists reported that Moroccan authorities barred them from entry or expelled them from Western Sahara in 2014. In April 2014, the United Nations (UN) Security Council again extended the mandate of the UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) for a year, but without adding a human rights monitoring component.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 257.]

Polisario Camps

The Tindouf camps in Algeria's Mhiriz region that accommodated Sahrawis who fled Western Sahara at the time of its annexation by Morocco (1976) continued to lack regular independent human rights monitoring. The Polisario Front took no measures to end impunity for those accused of committing human rights abuses in the camps during the 1970s and 1980s.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 259.]

See also Egypt.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2014.

Immunity from prosecution for past violations by the security forces and other government officials remained codified in Article 445 of the 2008 Constitution. Victims of past human rights violations and their families continued to be denied truth, justice, compensation and any other form of reparation.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 264.]

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011.

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2014.

On 25 April 2014, the parliament passed the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) Act, establishing two commissions, a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and a Commission on Enforced Disappearances, with the power to recommend amnesties, including for serious human rights violations. This was despite a Supreme Court ruling in January that a similar 2013 TRC ordinance with the power to recommend amnesties contravened international human rights law and the spirit of the 2007 Interim Constitution. Victims' families filed a petition with the Supreme Court for the provisions on amnesties to be amended. In July 2014, the United Nations (UN) Office of the High Commissioner on Human Rights issued a technical note pointing out that the TRC Act did not conform to Nepal's international legal obligations, including because it allowed amnesties for serious international crimes. Five experts at the UN Human Rights Council voiced similar concerns.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 267; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 395–396.]

A coalition government led by Nepali Congress leader Sushil Koirala took power in February 2014 after months of political stalemate but there was little progress on justice for serious abuses committed during the civil war (1996–2006), in which an estimated 13,000 people died. Efforts to ensure prosecutions in civilian courts for serious human rights and humanitarian law violations during the conflict remain stalled. While Nepal delivered interim monetary and in-kind compensation to the families of those who were disappeared or killed during the conflict, other victims, such as victims of sexual violence or torture, did receive no compensation from the state.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 395.]

Tibetans in Nepal were forbidden from participating in public celebrations of the Dalai Lama's birthday or the Tibetan New Year. Buddhist religious sites and monasteries were openly under government surveillance. (See also NCH Annual Report 2009.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 397.]

See also Sri Lanka.

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2014.

On 6 September 2013, the Netherlands Supreme Court found the Dutch state liable for the deaths of three men during the 1995 Srebrenica genocide. Dutch troops serving as United Nations peacekeepers in Srebrenica sent three Bosniak Muslim men, part of a larger group of over 300 men, away from a “safe area” on 13 July 1995, effectively handing them over to Bosnian Serb forces, who killed the majority of those handed over. In July 2014, the Hague District Court ruled that the Dutch state was liable for the loss suffered by the families of the more than 300 men and boys mentioned above, but not for the acts of the Dutch troops prior to the fall of Srebrenica, or the failure of those troops to hold the “safe area.” The court ordered compensation payments to the victims.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 270; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 114.]

In July 2014, the United Nations Working Group of Experts on People of African Descent welcomed the debate on the traditional “Black Pete” (Zwarte Piet) figure of the Sinterklaas festival and called for a respectful tone by media during the discussions.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 243.]

On 30 July 2014, the Raad van State (Council of State) ruled in a case confronting a biographer from Nijmegen (name unknown) and the Ministry of the Interior and Kingdom Relations regarding access to internal security files about the failed coup against Indonesian President Sukarno on 23 January 1950. The biographer was writing a work about Raymond Westerling (1919–1987), a Dutch military officer of the KNIL (Royal Netherlands East Indies Army) who had organized the failed coup. After a first request from the biographer for data about the coup, the minister had made accessible a file of eleven redacted pages. The biographer complained that it was implausible that such an important historical event had yielded only one modest file. He argued that, according to Dirk Engelen’s book about the history of the Internal Security Service BVD, Westerling’s file alone consisted of twelve volumes and that, according to reports of the Military Police and to a secret Exterior Ministry note, members of the Dutch army command had been involved in the attempt. In November 2012, the Minister rejected the complaint, a decision confirmed by the court in The Hague in October 2013. On higher appeal, however, the Council of State ruled that the minister had not searched the relevant BVD archives in their entirety, having used only the key-terms “coup against Sukarno in 1950” and excluded personal files such as Westerling’s. It ordered a new search.

[Source: Raad van State, X versus Ministry of the Interior and Kingdom Relations (2014; <http://uitspraken.rechtspraak.nl/inziendocument?id=ECLI:NL:RVS:2014:2866>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/355.pdf>].]

On 4 September 2014, a lecture by Catalan author Albert Sánchez Piñol about his historical novel, Victus: The Fall of Barcelona (2014), was canceled at the Cervantes Institute in Utrecht after the Spanish embassy intervened. The institute was financed by the Spanish government. The novel treated the end of Catalan independence in 1714, a sensitive issue in light of the referendum about Catalan independence on 9 November 2014.

[Source: Sabine Kok, “Teleurstelling na afblazen lezing Piñol door Spaanse ambassade” (5 September 2014; <http://www.boekblad.nl/teleurstelling-na-afblazen-lezing-pinol-door.239489.lynkx>)].]

A report on an archival search commissioned by the Ministry of Defense, published on 20 November 2014, did not corroborate the excessive violence and execution thesis in the case of the train hijack by South Moluccan activists in 1977 ending in the execution of six of the hijackers (See NCH Annual Report 2014.)

[Sources: Bas Blokker, “Uitschakelen. Niet doodschieten,” NRC Handelsblad (8–9 November 2014), 4–5; Emilie van Outeren, “Ook zonder verzet werd geschoten,” NRC Handelsblad (20 November 2014), 3.]

See also Colombia, Lebanon, Rwanda, Serbia/Kosovo.

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007.

See Australia.

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2013.

See Libya.

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2013.

See South Sudan.

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012.

See Rwanda.

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012, 2014.

See Bangladesh.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2013–2014.

One history student (name unknown) was reported injured during the hostilities between Israelis and Palestinians in Gaza (7 July to 26 August 2014).

[Source: UNESCO & Enabling Education Network CIC (EENET), Rapid Assessment of Higher Education Institutions in Gaza: Data Analysis Report (Paris: UNESCO, 2015; <http://www.eenet.org.uk/resources/docs/UNESCO%20HEI%20Assessment%20Gaza%20Report%20FINAL-January%202015.pdf>), 21.]

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2013.

In September 2014, the Supreme Court of Justice decided that Manuel Noriega, former de facto ruler of the country (1983–1989), should face trial for his alleged role in the killing of a soldier in 1969. The decision came as Noriega was serving sentences related to the killing of two political opponents. He also faced new trials for enforced disappearances and killings during his presidency.

Despite previous pledges to search for people forcibly disappeared during the 1970s and 1980s, the government failed to make any progress. A Special National Commission to search for victims of enforced disappearance, which the government pledged to create in 2012, had still not been established by the end of 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 288–289.]

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012.

On 4 November 2013, writer and teacher Nelson Aguilera was sentenced to 30 months' imprisonment for alleged plagiarism of Maria Eugenia Garay's novel El túnel del tiempo (Criterio Ediciones 2005; The Tunnel of Time) in his novel for children Karumbita: La patriota (Alfaguara Infantil 2010; Karumbita: The Patriot). The lawsuit had been filed on 1 July 2010. In June 2014, his conviction and sentence were upheld by the Chamber of Appeal in Asunción. Aguilera lodged an appeal to the Supreme Court of Justice. Six independent experts and writers found that the similarities in the two works could not be described as plagiarism, but, according to Aguilera, 40 witnesses were prevented from testifying in his defense during the trial as the judge ruled that they had been presented too late. In the story, the magical turtle Karumbita dreams that she builds a time machine with two children allowing them to participate in Paraguay's struggle for independence in May 1811. In the dream the characters meet several figures of historical significance. Garay's novel told the story of two children, Jerónimo and Rodrigo, who also travel through time, meeting various mythological and historical characters along the way. One of their stops is the Paraguayan declaration of independence.

[Sources: Jorge Coronel, "Escritores lamentan sentencia por plagio," ABC Color (4 November 2013); <http://www.abc.com.py/espectaculos/cultura/escritores-lamentan-sentencia-por-plagio-635803.html>; PEN International, "Paraguay: On Day of the Imprisoned Writer, PEN calls for the release of Nelson Aguilera" (12 November 2014; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/75.pdf>); Pen International Writers In Prison Committee, Caselist (January–December 2014), 101; Wolfgang Streich, "Yo no soy un plagiario, sentenció Nelson Aguilera," Prensa Mercosur (no date; <http://prensamercosur.org/mercosur/index.php/paraguay/1672-yo-no-soy-un-plagiario-sentencio-nelson-aguilera.html>).]

In April 2014, the Aché National Federation filed in Argentina an additional criminal complaint to the one already presented in 2013 by victims of human rights violations committed during the regime of General Alfredo Stroessner (1954–1989), in view of the persistent reluctance of the authorities to investigate those crimes. The criminal complaint was subject to an investigation under universal jurisdiction.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 291.]

In June 2014, after more than twenty years of fighting for their traditional land, an expropriation law was passed to return land to the Sawhoyamaya indigenous community. In September 2014, a constitutional action to revoke the expropriation law was rejected by the Supreme Court. However, indigenous peoples in the region continued to encounter social, political and economic threats to their collective well-being and their very existence. Their cultural heritage, ancestral lands and right to self-determination were under constant attack. Both state and non-state actors, such as businesses and powerful landowners, continued to forcibly remove them from their lands in the name of social and economic development. Development programs often resulted in environmental and cultural destruction and community displacement. Those living in voluntary isolation were at even greater risk, particularly in the Amazon Basin.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 19, 291.]

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2014.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents. In a landmark trial, former President Alberto Fujimori was sentenced in 2009 to 25 years' imprisonment for killings and disappearances in 1991 and 1992. His intelligence advisor, Vladimiro Montesinos, three former army generals, and members of the Colina group, a government death squad, were also serving sentences ranging from 15 to 25 years for the assassination in 1991 of 15 people in the Lima district of Barrios Altos, and for six disappearances. Courts made much less progress in addressing violations that occurred under the earlier administrations of Fernando Belaúnde (1980–1985) and Alan García (1985–1990). In a report issued in August 2013 to mark the tenth anniversary of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's report, the human rights ombudsman found that, despite initial efforts, Peru had failed to consolidate a specialized judicial system with sufficient staff and resources to bring most cases to court. As of 2013, 48 percent of 2,880 cases of human rights violations during the armed conflict reported to prosecutors had been dismissed, largely because the latter were unable to identify perpetrators and the Ministry of Defense was unwilling to provide documents to facilitate investigations. Only about two percent of the cases had been brought to trial, according to Human Rights Trials in Peru, a project based at George Mason University that monitored human rights prosecutions. In 2014, court hearings continued in their fourth year in two emblematic cases: torture and disappearances at the Los Cabitos military base in Ayacucho in 1983 and a massacre at Accomarca in 1985 in which an army unit killed 62 peasants. In a recent trend, the Supreme Court overturned an increasing number of convictions on appeal. While the court sometimes based its decisions on contradictions in witness testimony, it ruled in a January 2014 verdict that the disappearance in 1983 of six people whose bodies were found and identified more than twenty years later was subject to a statute of limitations, contravening Peru's obligations to hold accountable those responsible for enforced disappearances. In June 2014, President Ollanta Humala appointed as minister of the interior Daniel Urresti, a former army intelligence officer who was facing charges for his alleged role in the 1988 murder of Hugo Bustíos, the Ayacucho correspondent for Caretas magazine. Two soldiers were convicted in 2007 for Bustíos's murder, one of whom testified that Urresti had commanded the soldiers who ambushed and shot Bustíos before blowing up his body with a grenade. Urresti's appointment was highly questionable considering the gravity of the charge and that his public position as minister could influence the judicial outcome of his case and undercut the right to justice of Bustíos's relatives. In addition, Humala's public statements in advance of the trial supporting Urresti's claims of innocence were an inappropriate interference in ongoing judicial proceedings.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 431–432.]

In January 2014, the Public Prosecutor's Office in Lima closed the cases of over 2,000 indigenous and campesino women who were allegedly forcibly sterilized in the 1990s. After an investigation, which started in 2004 and lasted nearly ten years, the prosecutor only filed charges against some health professionals allegedly responsible in one of the cases. No charges were filed against any of the government authorities responsible for implementing the family planning program, which resulted in these sterilizations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 294.]

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2014.

The Philippines acknowledged state accountability for human rights violations during the martial law under the Ferdinand Marcos regime (1965–1986) and established a Human Rights Victims' Claims Board to determine the eligibility of claims for human rights violations and award reparations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 294.]

Trials in the civil and criminal cases relating to the 2009 Maguindanao massacre, in which state-armed militias led by government officials killed 58 people including 32 media workers, were ongoing. However, most of the proceedings were bail hearings only. By the end of 2014, around 85 of the 197 suspects for whom arrest warrants had been issued remained at large and no convictions had been handed down. Witnesses to the massacre and their families remained at risk of attacks, including killings, highlighting a lack of government protection. In November 2014, Dennis Sakal and Butch Saudagal, both of whom were due to testify against primary suspects in the massacre, were shot by unidentified gunmen in Maguindanao province, killing Dennis Sakal. In December, Kagui Akmad Ampatuan, who reportedly convinced these witnesses to testify for the prosecution, survived a similar ambush in Maguindanao. At least eight witnesses and their family members had been killed in similar attacks since November 2009. No one was held accountable for these killings.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 295–296.]

In [September 2014], the government and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF) established a three-person Transitional Justice and Reconciliation Commission during their peace talks in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. The commission was to “undertake a study and recommend...appropriate mechanisms to address legitimate grievances of the Bangsamoro [or Moro] people, correct historical injustices and address human rights violations and marginalization through land dispossession toward healing and reconciliation.” The commission, which was given one year to submit its report, was part of the Mindanao peace process leading to the establishment of a new Bangsamoro autonomous entity and would be headed by senior Swiss diplomat Mo Bleeker. The MILF agreed to disarm its 12,000 armed members, and “private armies” in the area were also to disarm.

[Sources: International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of October 2014 (2014), 8; Manolo B. Jara, “Manila, MILF Form Panel for Reconciliation,” The Gulf Today (2 October 2014; <http://gulftoday.ae/portal/1b2e517a-0b7c-4976-9f00-8c7ecd3899e2.aspx>).]

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011, 2014.

In Communist Poland, Donald Tusk (1957–) was a historian, a dissident journalist (writing under the pseudonym “Anna Barycz”) and an activist for the Solidarity Trade Union. During and after the 1981 martial law, he was blacklisted for employment in state-operated institutions because of his anti-Communist convictions. He did all sorts of menial jobs. In 1991, however, he was elected in the Sejm (parliament). From 2007 until 2014, he was Prime Minister of Poland. In 2014, he became President of the European Council. In the 1990s, he compiled a bestselling book with photographs about the prewar German past of the city of Gdansk.

[Source: “De keizer van Europa,” NRC Handelsblad (29–30 November 2014), 15–16.]

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2014.

The perpetrators of the 2009 killing of leading Chechen human rights defender and historian Natalia Estemirova had still not been brought to justice in early 2015 (See NCH Annual Reports 2010–2012.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 448.]

On 24 September 2014, the Justice Ministry filed a lawsuit against the NGO Memorial over technical issues related to its legal registration with a view to dissolving it. On 28 January 2015, the Supreme Court dismissed the lawsuit because Memorial had addressed all of the ministry's complaints. (For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2013–2014.)

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 308; Michael Birnbaum, "Russia's Justice Ministry Targets Memorial, a Human Rights Defender," Washington Post (13 October 2014; http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/europe/russias-justice-ministry-targets-memorial-a-human-rights-defender/2014/10/13/8d20755a-52e0-11e4-b86d-184ac281388d_story.html); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 444; Waclaw Radziwinowicz, "Sans l'association Memorial, le Kremlin pourra réécrire l'histoire russe," Gazeta Wyborcza (14 October 2014; <http://www.courrierinternational.com/article/2014/10/14/sans-l-association-memorial-le-kremlin-pourra-ecrire-son-histoire>); Alexei Timofeichev, "Victory for Memorial in Court Ruling but Survival Battle is Only Half-won" (3 February 2015; http://rbth.com/politics/2015/02/03/victory_for_memorial_in_court_ruling_but_survival_battle_is_only_hal_43343.html).]

In December 2014, the European Court of Human Rights declared inadmissible the application of Yevgeny Dzhugashvili regarding statements allegedly defamatory of Joseph Stalin in two Novaya Gazeta articles. It held that the articles concerned an event of significant historical importance and that both the event and historical figures such as Stalin inevitably remained open to public scrutiny and criticism. The Court reaffirmed that "[I]t is an integral part of freedom of expression, guaranteed under Article 10 of the Convention, to seek historical truth. It is not the Court's role to arbitrate the underlying historical issues, which are part of a continuing debate between historians (...). A contrary finding would open the way to a judicial intervention in historical debate and inevitably shift the respective historical discussions from public forums to courtrooms.” (For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2010–2011.)

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Dzhugashvili versus Russia (2014; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/378.pdf>).]

In 2014, at the request of the Federal Security Bureau (FSB; the successor agency to the Soviet-era KGB), a Moscow court denied historian Sergei Prudovsky access to a set of documents dealing with Japan’s efforts to recruit right-wing Russian émigrés as spies. When the security service SBU in Ukraine (most notably, chief archivist Ihor Kulyk), heard this, it published its copy of these “top secret,” Stalin-era files. The papers, signed off in 1937 by Stalin’s secret police chief Nikolai Yezhov, regarded the tens of thousands of Russians who had fled the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution and escaped to Harbin in China. In 1931–1935, thousands of these Russians reentered the USSR to escape the Japanese occupation of Harbin. According to Memorial, almost 50,000 of these Russians were arrested on charges of having spied for Japan, and more than 30,000 of them were shot.

[Source: “Ukraine: Secret Service Publishes Stalin Files,” BBC News (1 August 2014; <http://www.bbc.com/news/blogs-news-from-elsewhere-28604779>).]

In 2014 and 2015, about four foreign scholars [names unknown] were denied access to, or removed from state archives by migration officials due to alleged visa violations. Among them were a scholar (male) studying the nineteenth-century Russian economy who was fined, deported and banned for five years and a PhD student (female) from the University of Nottingham working on female prostitution in Russia between 1900 and 1930 in the Arkhangelsk region.

[Source: RFE/RL, “Western Scholars Alarmed by Russian Deportations, Fines,” EurasiaNet.org (31 March 2015; <http://www.eurasianet.org/node/72811>).]

On 12 March 2015, the rector’s office of St. Petersburg State University canceled Ivan Kurilla’s professorship opening at its Smolny College. Kurilla, a historian of American-Russian relations and the sole applicant for the position, had arrived from Volgograd University on a temporary contract in February. On 25 March 2015, he was informed that the position was canceled because it had been opened in error and an administrative review had determined that existing staffers could manage the teaching workload. After students organized a petition on his behalf which gathered 15,000 signatures, Kurilla’s contract was extended until the end of the semester. Some saw a purge pattern: in the same month of March, Dmitry Dubrovsky, a lecturer on international relations and human rights, was dismissed; in May 2015, political science lecturer Pavel Kononenko’s contract was not renewed.

All taught courses in Smolny College's international relations, political science and human rights major. Kurilla believed that he was eventually not hired after the rector possibly saw his Facebook posts, which included links to an article he wrote in business daily RBC about the February 2015 murder of opposition leader Boris Nemtsov.

[Source: Matthew Luxmoore, "Students Allege Political Purge at Russia's Oldest University," Aljazeera (23 May 2015; <http://america.aljazeera.com/articles/2015/5/23/students-allege-political-purge-at-russias-oldest-university.html>).]

Crimean Tatars, an ethnic group indigenous to the Crimea peninsula (deported to remote parts of the Soviet Union in 1944 and not allowed to return until the late 1980s), were particularly targeted by the de facto authorities for the public expression of pro-Ukrainian views. Starting in March 2014, there were a number of abductions and beatings of Crimean Tatars which the de facto authorities failed to investigate. On 3 March Reshat Ametov, a Crimean Tatar, was led away by three men from the "self-defense" forces after staging a one-man protest in front of the Crimean Council of Ministers building in the region's capital Simferopol. His body was found almost two weeks later, showing signs of torture. His abductors were not identified. The de facto authorities started a campaign to close the Mejlis, a body elected by the Crimean Tatar assembly (Kurultai) and recognized by the Ukrainian authorities as the representative organ of the Tatar community. Mustafa Dzhemiliev [Dzhehmiliev], a veteran human rights defender and founder of the Mejlis, was banned from entering Crimea. He was repeatedly denied entry, including on 3 May when he tried to cross through a checkpoint at Armyansk. Hundreds of Crimean Tatars came to meet him. The de facto authorities claimed that this was an unlawful assembly, and dozens of participants were fined. The homes of several Crimean Tatar leaders were subsequently searched and at least four Crimean Tatars were arrested, charged with "extremism" and transferred to Russia for investigation. On 5 July 2014, Refat Chubarov, who succeeded Dzhemiliev as the leader of the Mejlis, was also prevented from returning to Crimea and banned for five years. The newly appointed de facto Prosecutor of Crimea travelled to the border crossing to warn him that the activities of the Mejlis violated the Russian law on extremism. On 19 September, the Russian authorities confiscated the headquarters of the Mejlis on the grounds that its founder (Dzhemiliev) was a foreign citizen, who had been banned from entering Russia. On 16 May 2014, just two days before the planned annual events to mark the 70th anniversary of the deportation of Crimean Tatars in 1944, the de facto Prime Minister of Crimea Sergei Aksionov announced that all mass meetings in Crimea would be banned until 6 June 2014, in order to "eliminate possible provocations by extremists" and to prevent "disruption of the summer holiday season." Just one commemorative Crimean Tatar event was allowed on the day, on the outskirts of Simferopol, with a heavy police presence. See also NCH Annual Report 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 386–387.]

See also Estonia, Lithuania, Ukraine, United Kingdom.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2014.

Trials of people suspected of involvement in the 1994 Rwandan genocide continued in national courts outside Rwanda. On 18 February 2014, former mayor Onesphore Rwabukombe was found guilty of aiding and abetting genocide and was sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment by a German court. On 14 March, a former Rwandan army captain, Pascal Simbikangwa, was found guilty by a French court of complicity in genocide and crimes against humanity. The court found that he played a key role in drawing up lists of Tutsi and moderate Hutu leaders to be targeted and contributed to the setting up of Radio Mille Collines, which broadcast messages inciting violence. He was sentenced to 25 years in prison. It was the first time a French court had tried a genocide suspect. Six other genocide suspects in France were awaiting trial or on trial at the end of 2014. On 7 May 2014, the Québec Superior Court upheld Désiré Munyaneza's conviction by a Canadian court for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. On 19 June 2014, a Swedish court confirmed the sentence of life imprisonment for Stanislas Mbanenande for his role in five massacres in Kibuye during the genocide. Extradition trials of four genocide suspects in the United Kingdom continued during the year. In April 2014, a Norwegian court sentenced Sadi Bugingo to 21 years' imprisonment for his role in the genocide. His appeal was pending at the end of 2014. The request to the Norwegian authorities for the extradition of another genocide suspect was approved, but pending appeal at the end of 2014. In the Netherlands, the extraditions of two men were pending at the end of 2014 and in Denmark another genocide suspect was awaiting trial. The International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) prepared to close down its operations. It had one case pending appeal at the end of 2014. The tribunal had completed 75 cases, 14 of which ended in acquittals and ten were transferred to national jurisdictions. Nine suspects wanted by the ICTR continued to evade justice. The ICTR and the United Nations mechanism for international criminal tribunals launched a new initiative in July 2014 to track and arrest these remaining fugitives.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 156, 162, 279–280, 312–313; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 458.]

Déogratias Mushayidi, a former journalist and outspoken government opponent in exile, was arrested in Burundi in March 2010 and handed over to Rwandan authorities. In September 2010 he was acquitted of “divisionism” and “minimization of the genocide” but convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment on other charges. In June 2014, he was released after serving a four-year sentence for endangering national security and divisionism (see NCH Annual Report 2011).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 311; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 453.]

On 24 October 2014, the Rwanda Utilities Regulatory Authority (RURA) suspended the British Broadcasting Corporation's (BBC) Kinyarwanda service's broadcasts in Rwanda. RURA said it had received complaints of incitement, hatred, divisionism, genocide denial and revision from members of the public after the 1 October 2014 BBC television documentary, “Rwanda's Untold Story,” was broadcast. On 19 November 2014, a commission of inquiry, established by RURA and headed by former Prosecutor General Martin Ngoga, began investigations into these allegations against the BBC. It was expected to produce its report in three months.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 456.]

See also Congo, Democratic Republic.

SAINT VINCENT

Previous Annual Report entries: 2014.

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011, 2013.

See Iraq, Tunisia.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009, 2013.

See Chad, Liberia.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2014.

Investigations continued into the murders of independent journalists, Dada Vujasinović, Slavko Ćuruvija and Milan Pantić, allegedly killed by state agents in 1994, 1999 and 2001 respectively. Four suspects were charged with the murder of Ćuruvija, including former national security chief, Radomir Marković, previously convicted for the assassination of former President Ivan Stambolić in 2000.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 320.]

In January 2014, the Appeals Chamber at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) upheld the conviction of Vlastimir Djordjević, former Serbian Assistant to the Minister of the Interior, for murder and persecution—including sexual assaults as crimes against humanity—and the forced deportation of 800,000 Kosovo Albanians. His sentence was reduced on appeal, along with those of three other senior officials, Nikola Šainović, Sreten Lukić and Vladimir Lazarević. Former military commander Nebojša Pavković's 22-year sentence was affirmed. Vojislav

Šešelj, leader of the Serb Radical Party, indicted in 2003 for war crimes and crimes against humanity, including the forced deportation and persecution of non-Serbs in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and Vojvodina, was granted provisional release in November 2014 to receive treatment for cancer and returned to Serbia after twelve years in detention. Domestic prosecutions were hampered by insufficient resources in the Office of the War Crimes Prosecutor and inadequate police investigations. Five indictments were published, and verdicts reached at first instance in only one case. The Head of the Witness Protection Unit, which was alleged to have intimidated protected witnesses, was dismissed in June 2014, allegedly for corruption. Prosecutors, police and witnesses received threats from war veterans while investigating the abduction of 19 civilians by Bosnian Serb paramilitaries in Štrpci in 1992. Fifteen suspects were subsequently arrested in December 2014, in a joint operation with the Bosnian authorities. An investigation started in August 2014 into Major General Dragan Živanović's command responsibility for war crimes in Kosovo, between 1 April and 15 May 1999, when he was commander of the 125th Motorized Brigade. He was suspected of failing to prevent "a campaign of terror against Albanian civilians," including murder, the destruction of houses, plunder and forced expulsion. A new law proposed in December 2014 failed to ensure adequate reparation for civilian victims of war, including relatives of the missing and victims of sexual violence.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 319–320.]

Kosovo

In April 2014, the Kosovo parliament approved the establishment of a special court located outside Kosovo and presided over by international judges to adjudicate criminal prosecutions arising from the work of the European Union (EU) Special Task Force established in 2011 to investigate serious abuses during and after the Kosovo war (1998–1999). The Special Task Force based its work on findings of a 2010 Council of Europe report. The court will be based in the Netherlands and was expected to become operational once the Kosovo Assembly adopted necessary legislative changes. The mandate of the European Union-led Police and Justice Mission (EULEX) was extended until June 2016. Under the new agreement, international judges no longer formed the majority on judicial panels in cases of serious crimes. In July 2014, a Special Investigative Task Force, established by EULEX to investigate allegations against senior Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) members, announced that unnamed individuals would be indicted for war crimes and crimes against humanity, including the unlawful killing, abduction, illegal detention, sexual violence against and forced displacement of Kosovo Serbs and Albanian civilians, unlawfully transferred to Albania in 1999. Suspects would be indicted and tried by a special court, yet to be established, outside of Kosovo in order to ensure effective witness protection. In September 2014, the retrial opened of Fatmir Limaj and nine others accused of the torture and ill-treatment of Albanian civilians at the Klečka/Klecka camp in 1999. They had been acquitted in September 2013, following the suicide of a protected witness on which the prosecution case relied. Kosovo Serb political leader Oliver Ivanović, arrested in January 2014, was indicted in August for incitement to commit war crimes in 1999, and incitement to aggravated murder in February 2000. In March 2014, President Atifete Jahjaga launched a national council for the survivors of wartime sexual violence, to encourage them to come forward to claim reparation, including compensation, as set out in legal amendments adopted by the Assembly later that month. Despite the exhumation of the bodies of 53 Kosovo Albanian civilians at Raška, where they had been reburied in 1999, and further investigations at Batajnica, where over 800 bodies were exhumed in 2000–2001, there was no progress in bringing to justice those who organized the transfer of the bodies from Kosovo. Relatives of the disappeared protested against legal provisions ending their monthly compensation of 135 euros after the body of their family member was found. By November 2014, 1,655 people remained missing after the armed conflict.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 320, 321–322; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 471–473.]

In March 2014, the Council of Europe Venice Commission published its opinion on an amendment of the Law on Freedom of Religion in Kosovo, outlining the need for a number of improvements, including expanding the list of religious communities that “constitute the historical, cultural and social heritage of the country” from five groups to include all other established religious groups.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 476.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina.

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007.

See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

See Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011.

On 10 September 2014, the Media Development Authority (MDA) banned Tan Pin Pin's documentary, To Singapore with Love, on the grounds that it undermined national security. This award-winning documentary contained a series of interviews with former activists who fled Singapore rather than face political persecution and possible detention under the abusive Internal Security Act (ISA), some already for five decades. The title referred to the fact that the film was shot entirely outside Singapore. The MDA said that "legitimate actions of the security agencies to protect the national security and stability of Singapore are presented in a distorted way," that "the individuals in the film have given distorted and untruthful accounts of how they came to leave Singapore and remain outside Singapore," and that "a number of these self-professed 'exiles' were members of, or had provided support to, the proscribed Communist Party of Malaya (CPM)." Tan appealed the MDA decision, stating that people should be able to air "differing views about our past, even views that the government disapproves," and meanwhile did not agree to any private screenings of the film. On 12 November 2014, the Film Appeals Committee rejected the appeal by a 9–3 vote. Tan Pin Pin had been on the board of the National Archives of Singapore (2007–2009).

[Sources: Patrick Frater, "Banned Singapore Director Tan Pin Pin To Be Part of Celebratory 'Jubilee'" (25 September 2014; <http://variety.com/2014/film/news/banned-singapore-director-tan-pin-pin-to-be-part-of-celebratory-jubilee-1201313553>); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 477; "Tan Pin Pin," Wikipedia (6 October 2014); "Singapore Film Ban Creates Free Speech Issue" Voice of America (26 October 2014; <http://www.voanews.com/content/singapore-film-ban-creates-free-speech-issue-for-yale-nus-college/2494081.html>).]

On 27 March 2015, sixteen-year-old Amos Yee (1998–) was arrested and charged with wounding religious feelings, harassment and obscenity for uploading an eight-minute YouTube video on former Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew (1923–2015), considered Singapore's founding father, who had died on 23 March. The video was entitled “Lee Kuan Yew is Finally Dead!”, likened Lee to Jesus Christ and harshly criticized both and Christians in general. Later, Yee posted a cartoon depicting Lee having sex with Margaret Thatcher, a personal and political ally of Lee’s. On 12 May 2015, Yee was convicted to a suspended sentence.

[Source: “Amos Yee,” Wikipedia (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Amos_Yee; retrieved 13 May 2015); Tessa Wong, “Amos Yee: The Boy Who Criticised Lee Kuan Yew,” BBC News (12 May 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-asia-32604122>).]

On 29 May 2015, the National Arts Council (NAC) withdrew a publishing grant of 8,000 Singapore dollar from the graphic novel The Art of Charlie Chan Hock Chye by artist-illustrator Sonny Liew. Khor Kok Wah, senior director of the NAC’s literary arts sector, said: “The retelling of Singapore’s history in the work potentially undermine[d] the authority or legitimacy of the government and its public institutions, and thus breache[d] our funding guidelines.” The book contained the story of comic-book artist Charlie Chan during the formative years of Singapore’s modern history, and featured personalities such as first Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew (1923–2015) and opposition politician Lim Chin Siong (1933–1996), and events such as the Hock Lee bus riots (12 May 1955) and Operation Spectrum (or “Marxist Conspiracy,” 1987). News of the withdrawal boosted sales of the book; the first print run sold out in a weekend.

[Source: Mayo Martin, “Graphic Novel ‘Undermines Govt’s Authority’: NAC,” Channel NewsAsia (3 June 2015; <http://www.channelnewsasia.com/news/singapore/graphic-novel-undermines/1889140.html>).]

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2013–2014.

In September 2014, the official (Slovak) Institute of National Memory (ÚPN; established to provide access to the records of the Štátna Bezpečnosť—ŠtB; secret police—of communist Czechoslovakia in 1949–1989) complained that the Czech Republic did not carry out a 2007 agreement to provide Slovakia with Slovakia-related files. It noted that the Czech Republic archived its files in a way that violated the 2007 agreement and considered them to be its own property. The Czech Security Services Archive in Kanice claimed that it would be impossible to provide only Slovakia-related documents since these could not be easily separated from other documents. Later it was agreed that Slovakia would receive digital copies of the central registry of ŠtB archives and of records that included data on Slovak citizens.

[Sources: “Files of Slovak Communist Agents Still in Czech Republic,” Slovak Spectator (22 September http://spectator.sme.sk/articles/view/55338/10/files_of_slovak_communist_agents_still_in_czech_republi_c.html); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of October 2014 and News of December 2014.]

2014;

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2013.

Despite some positive measures, the authorities failed to guarantee the rights of some former permanent residents of Slovenia originating from other former Yugoslav republics, known as the “erased,” whose legal status was unlawfully revoked in 1992. The 2010 Legal Status Act, which offered an avenue for the erased to restore their legal status, expired in July 2013. About 12,000 of the 25,671 “erased” had had their status restored by this date. In December 2013, legislation was adopted creating a compensation scheme for those whose status had been regulated. The scheme provided 50 euros for each month spent without legal status.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 327–328.]

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012–2014.

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012–2014.

On 9 March 2015, students at the University of Cape Town (UCT) called for the removal of the statue of British colonial figure Cecil John Rhodes (1853–1902) [prime minister of the Cape colony, mining magnate, British imperialist and philanthropist] from the campus center, labeling it a symbol of the colonial past and of white supremacy and racism. Vice-chancellor Max Price and Higher Education Minister Blade Nzimande supported relocation of the statue. On 8 April 2015, the university decided to effectively remove the statue, unveiled in 1934. At Rhodes University, Grahamstown (Eastern Cape province), students wanted the name of the university changed. In Zimbabwe (formerly South Rhodesia), most monuments dedicated to Rhodes were removed after the 1980 independence. Rhodes had funded the creation and operation of universities such as Cape Town, the Witwatersrand and Rhodes (the last one named after him). Elsewhere, in the capital Pretoria, a statue of Afrikaner leader and former President Paul Kruger (1825–1904) was vandalized with green paint.

[Sources: Munyaradzi Makoni, “Student Revolt against the Statue of Cecil John Rhodes,” University World News (27 March 2015; universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150326130155803); Reitumetse Pitso, Shaun Smillie & Poppy Louw, “‘Rhodes Rage’ Shifts Up a Gear,” Times Live (19 March 2015; timeslive.co.za/thetimes/2015/03/19/rhodes-rage-shifts-up-a-gear); Reuters, “South African University to Remove Rhodes Statue Following Student Protests,” University World News (8 April 2015; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2015/04/08/us-safrica-rhodes-idUSKBN0MZ24420150408>); Bram Vermeulen, “De koloniale held moet van de sokkel, eisen studenten,” NRC Handelsblad (19 March 2015), 19.]

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

The government did not conduct prompt, thorough, impartial and independent investigations with a view to prosecuting and holding accountable individuals suspected of crimes under international law and serious violations of human rights. President Salva Kiir established a committee to investigate human rights abuses allegedly committed during an attempted coup on 15 December 2013. The committee’s eight members were selected by the President’s Office, its activities were funded by the presidency and it was mandated to report directly to the President. No report, or update on its findings, was made public by the end of 2014. On 30 December 2013, the African Union (AU) Peace and Security Council called for the establishment of an AU Commission of Inquiry into human rights violations and abuses committed during the armed conflict (December 2013–January 2014). Its mandate included recommending measures to ensure accountability and reconciliation. Members of the commission, chaired by the former president of Nigeria, Olusegun Obasanjo, were sworn in by March 2014. In its June 2014 interim report, the commission said it was not yet in a position to determine whether crimes under international law had been committed. The commission submitted its final report to the AU in October, but it had not been publicly released by the end of 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 336, 337, 339.]

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2014.

The definitions of enforced disappearance and torture in Spanish legislation continued to fall short of international human rights standards. Amendments to legislation governing universal jurisdiction in Spain that entered into force on 14 March 2014 limited the powers of Spanish authorities to investigate crimes under international law, including genocide, enforced disappearance, crimes against humanity and torture, committed outside Spain. The reforms were criticized by the United Nations (UN) Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances and the UN Special Rapporteur on the promotion of truth, justice, reparation and guarantees of non-recurrence in July 2014, when the Spanish authorities were urged to strengthen efforts to establish the fate and whereabouts of persons disappeared during Francisco Franco's rule (1939–1975).

More in general, the rights to truth, justice and reparation for victims of crimes committed during the Civil War (1936–1939) and under Franco's rule continued to be denied. Spanish authorities failed to adequately assist the Argentine judiciary, which has been exercising universal jurisdiction to investigate crimes under international law committed during the Franco era. In April 2014, the Spanish Court of Justice rejected petitions to extradite two former security agents to Argentina.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 61, 342; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 246.]

In July 2015, the mayor of Madrid, Manuela Carmena, announced that she intended to remove 168 street names which referred to General Francisco Franco's dictatorship (1939–1975), including the Avenida del Comandante Franco.

Source: Koen Greven, "Linkse burgemeester verwijdert dictator Franco na 40 jaar uit straatbeeld," [NRC Handelsblad (7 July 2015).]

See also Netherlands.

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2014.

Serious violations of international law committed during the civil war (1983–2009), including enforced disappearances, extrajudicial executions and the intentional shelling of civilians and protected areas such as hospitals, remained unaddressed. The government continued to deny that such violations occurred until 15 July 2014, when it announced that it was expanding its Disappearances Commission to investigate other alleged crimes under international law. The ad hoc Presidential Commission to Investigate into Complaints Regarding Missing Persons (the Disappearances Commission) was appointed in August 2013 to examine complaints between 10 June 1990 and 19 May 2009. It received some 15,000 civilian complaints as well as some 5,000 cases of missing armed forces personnel. By August 2014, the commission had reportedly begun inquiries into less than five percent of these cases, or 462 complaints. Some complaints, which the commission said were being analyzed for further investigation, were potentially over a decade old.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 61, 343–344.]

Between the end of the civil war (1983–2009), in which the army defeated Tamil Tiger separatists, and 2015, the Tamil were not allowed to publicly commemorate their dead. Political party offices and media institutions were watched and roads to Hindu religious shrines closed in order to deny any attempts at commemoration. Only after the new President, Maithripala Sirisena, was elected in January 2015, did this change. The name of the official celebration to mark the end of the war was changed from “Victory Day” into “Remembrance Day” to mark the sacrifices made by all sides, irrespective of ethnicity. On 18 May 2015, Tamil politicians in the former war zones in the north and east were allowed to hold a memorial event for dead civilians for the first time on the beach of Mullivaayikkal in Mulaithivu district, the place of the final battle. According to United Nations estimates, between 80,000 and 100,000 people were killed in the conflict. About 40,000 Tamil civilians may reportedly have been killed in the final few weeks.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 345; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 505; “Sri Lanka Shift on Civil War Anniversary,” BBC News (19 May 2015; <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-asia-32805544>).]

The 2013 British documentary No Fire Zone: The Killing Fields of Sri Lanka, directed by Callum Macrae, was banned until the presidential elections of January 2015 brought a government change.

The film treated the final 138 days of the civil war (1983–2009), in which thousands of Tamil people were shelled or extrajudicially executed by the Sri Lankan Army. Screening the film was also obstructed or banned in India, Malaysia and Nepal.

[Source: “No Fire Zone: The Killing Fields of Sri Lanka,” Wikipedia (9 April 2015; wikipedia.org/wiki/No_Fire_Zone).]

The United Nations Human Rights Council initiated an international inquiry into reports of war crimes committed during the civil war (1983–2009). Government officials and supporters threatened human rights defenders not to have contact with the investigators or to contribute to the inquiry.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 4, 26–27.]

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2014.

The International Criminal Court (ICC) had charges pending against five individuals, including President Omar al-Bashir, for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide in connection with atrocities in Darfur. Khartoum refused to cooperate with the ICC and obstructed its work. In September, the ICC issued an arrest warrant and vacated the November 2014 trial start for Abdallah Banda, a Darfur rebel commander accused of attacking a United Nations base in 2007.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 513.]

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012–2013.

Following a request by the accused in 2013, the Court of Justice ordered the resumption of Edgar Ritfeld’s trial in a military court in January 2014. Ritfeld, who claimed to be innocent, was one of 25 people accused of the extrajudicial executions of fifteen opponents of the then military government in December 1982. The trial had been halted since 2012 following an amendment to the 1992 amnesty law granting immunity for the alleged torture and extrajudicial executions committed in December 1982. The 25 accused, including current President Desiré Delano “Dési” Bouterse, who was the country’s military leader at the time of the killings, were put on trial before a military court in November 2007 for the killings. Although the Court of Justice decided that the Ritfeld case should resume, the military court decided in October 2014 not to resume the trials of the 24 others, including Bouterse. In August 2014, families of the fifteen people killed in December 1982 filed a case before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 349.]

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013.

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

See Rwanda.

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009, 2014.

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2014.

In March 2012, Bassel Khartabil (also known as Bassel Safadi) was imprisoned. A specialist in open-source software development, he co-founded the research company Aiki Labs and was the chief technology officer of Al-Aous, a publishing and research institution dedicated to archaeological sciences and arts in Syria. His work included a 3D photorealistic reconstruction of the old city of Palmyra in Syria. In December 2014, he was still reported in prison.

[Source: “Break the Silence: Campaign for Jailed Human Rights Activists,” (<http://advocacy.globalvoicesonline.org/2014/12/10/break-the-silence-campaign-for-jailed-human-rights-activists>; 10 December 2014).]

In May-June 2014, a new wave of organized archaeological looting began at Dura-Europos, the Ottoman period gate at the eastern Syrian city of Deir Ez-Zor was bombed, a medieval Christian graveyard was desecrated, and the Jewish Synagogue in Jobar and the Omayyad mosque in Aleppo were destroyed. On 24 June 2014, the Ministry of Culture and Family Affairs for the Syrian Interim Government announced the creation of a Heritage Task Force to help protect Syrian cultural heritage. [Source: Syrian Coalition, “Interim Government Establishes Heritage Task Force” (National Coalition of Syrian Revolution and Opposition Forces; <http://www.etilaf.us/heritagetf>; 24 June 2014).]

In September 2014, fighters from the Islamic State (IS) reportedly desecrated an Armenian genocide memorial complex in Deir Ez-Zor. Near the site, vast numbers of Armenian refugees were forced to march to their deaths in 1915. The complex encompassed a church (containing the remains of victims of the Armenian genocide), a museum, a monument and an archive, and was often compared to the Auschwitz death camp in Poland. In February 2015, the United Nations Security Council banned all trade in artefacts from Syria, accusing IS militants of looting cultural heritage to strengthen its ability “to organize and carry out terrorist attacks.” On 21 February 2015, Turkish troops entered northern Syria to evacuate the tomb of Suleyman Shah (c. 1178–1230), grandfather of the founder of the Ottoman Empire, Osman I, in order to prevent it from falling into the hands of IS. According to a 1921 treaty, the site was a Turkish exclave.

[Sources: Simon Cox, “The Men Who Smuggle the Loot that Funds IS,” BBC News (17 February 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/magazine-31485439>); “IS Is Said to Destroy Armenian Genocide Memorial,” Times of Israel (22 September 2014; <http://www.timesofisrael.com/is-reportedly-destroys-armenian-genocide-memorial>).]

See also Australia, Germany, Iraq.

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012.

See China.

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2014.

In October 2013, Patiwat Saraiyaem ([1991–]), a student at Khon Kaen University's Fine and Applied Arts Faculty, and activist Pornthip Munkong [Mankong] (f) ([1989–]), a graduate of the Faculty of Political Science at Ramkhamhaeng University, performed the play Jao Sao Ma Pa (The Wolf Bride), about a fictitious monarchy, performed to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of the October 1973 pro-democracy student protest at Thammasat University. In mid-August 2014, they were arrested, imprisoned and in October 2014 charged with lèse majesté. Denied bail, they pleaded guilty on 29 December 2014 in order to reduce their sentence. On 23 February 2015, they were each sentenced to two and a half years' imprisonment.

[Sources: Charlie Campbell, "The Draconian Legal Weapon Being Used to Silence Thai Dissent," Time Magazine (31 December 2014; <http://time.com/3650981/thailand-lese-majeste-article-112>); PEN International Rapid Action Network, "Thailand: Student Activists Sentenced for Insulting the Monarchy in a Play" (24 February 2015); "Thammasat University" (<http://monitoring.academicfreedom.info/reports/2014-10-27-thammasat-university>; 27 October 2014).]

In August 2014, the new military junta ordered high school students to use the history textbook written by Thanom Anarmwat under a new curriculum that aimed to instill patriotism in Thai youth. The junta emphasized the themes of the monarchy and the glories of the ancient kingdoms of Siam. In September 2014, the author declared that the Ministry of Education cut the name of former Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra (2001–2006) from his textbook. To coup supporters, Thaksin was seen as a threat to their power. Winai Rodjay, the chairman of a committee on the teaching of history and civic duty, said that the omission of Thaksin was an error that he could not explain. The new textbook described Thaksin's government as one that used "many policies designed to gain popularity from people through huge budgets." A subheading described the protests that preceded Thaksin's ouster by the military in 2006 as "the people's movement against dictatorial power, corruption and embezzlement." Before the May 2014 coup, schools were allowed to choose from a variety of history textbooks. The one in use since August 2014 was commissioned by the previous military junta, which seized power from Thaksin in 2006. Thaksin's sister, Yingluck Shinawatra, was prime minister from 2011 until she was removed from office in May 2014.

[Source: Thomas Fuller, "Loved and Hated, Former Premier of Thailand Is Erased from Textbook," New York Times (15 September 2014; <http://www.nytimes.com/2014/09/16/world/asia/loved-and-hated-thaksin-shinawatra-former-premier-of-thailand-is-erased-from-textbook.html>).]

On 18 September 2014, a number of academics and student activists were detained for holding a public forum on democracy, entitled "The Fall of Foreign Dictatorships" and held at Thammasat University's Rangsit campus. It was staged for thirty minutes before dozens of police and military officers intervened. The four speakers, including Niddhi Eosewong (1940–), a historian retired from Chiang Mai University, and the student organizers were interrogated and released after a few hours. A letter issued by the military prior to the event explained that the forum "could affect the government's attempts to fix national problems" and might create "rifts in society."

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 534; Lamubol, "Academics, Students Arrested."; "Thammasat University" (<http://monitoring.academicfreedom.info/reports/2014-09-18-thammasat-university>; 18 September 2014).]

In early September 2014, Thammasat University in Bangkok pre-emptively ordered a ban on the annual 6 October commemoration of the student crackdown and ensuing massacre at the university on 6 October 1976. University administrators declared that this was done to prevent rifts and division in society. On 6 October 2014, the commemoration of the 38th anniversary of the massacre was effectively canceled. Under conditions set by the university, only a religious service and ceremonial speeches were allowed, but the traditional academic panel on the historical context of the massacre was forbidden. The order was in line with the military junta's ban on all political activities. Law student and student leader Rangsiman Rome said that Thammasat University wanted to "erase" the student massacre from history. In defiance of the ban, however, the Thai Student Center for Democracy (TSCD) organized a mini-concert in commemoration of the massacre. Prominent social critic Sulak Sivaraksa (1933–) (see below and see NCH Annual Reports 1995 and 2008) attended the event and said in a speech that Thammasat University administrators had turned themselves into “servants of the dictators.” The 1976 massacre was carried out by police officers and hooligans who stormed the university’s Tha Prachan campus to disperse thousands of leftist students who were holding a peaceful rally there. Official records says 46 people were killed in the crackdown, but historians believe that between 50 and 100 leftist student protesters were tortured and killed, hundreds more injured, and thousands arrested. The United States National Archives and Records Administration opened more than 75 declassified records about the event. The Thai government was called upon to open its own archives on the massacre.

[Sources: Khaosod English, “Student Activist Decries University’s ‘Silencing’ of 1976 Massacre” (6 October 2014; <http://www.khaosodenglish.com/detail.php?newsid=1412603816>); Suluck Lamubol, “Academics, Students Arrested for Democracy Forum,” University World News (<http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140919125856959>; 19 September 2014); Emily Willard, “Declassified U.S. Documents Help Fill Void Left by Thailand’s Silence on 38th Anniversary of Thammasat University Massacre” (10 October 2014; <http://nsarchive.wordpress.com/2014/10/10/declassified-u-s-documents-help-fill-void-left-by-thailands-silence-on-38th-anniversary-of-thammasat-university-massacre>).]

On 20 October 2014, two retired army officers filed a complaint for lèse majesté against veteran social campaigner Sulak Sivaraksa (1933–) (see above and see NCH Annual Reports 1995 and 2008) over remarks he made at an academic seminar entitled “Construction and Deconstruction of Thai History” on 12 October 2014 about Naresuan the Great (1555–1605), a king of the Ayutthaya kingdom (1590–1605) known for his campaigns to free Siam from Burmese invaders. He questioned the traditional accounts of an elephant battle featuring King Naresuan. If convicted, Sulak could be imprisoned for up to fifteen years.

[Sources: Mark Fenn, “Battle Royal,” Index on Censorship (2014 no. 4), 24; Reuters, “Thai Scholar Faces Royal Insult Charge over Mediaeval King,” (20 October 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/10/20/thailand-lesemajeste-idUSL3N0SF1TH20141020>).]

In December 2014, historian Somsak Jeamteerasakul—living in exile following martial law declared by the National Council for Peace and Order (NCPO; the military junta) on 22 May 2014—submitted his resignation but in February 2015 Thammasat University summarily dismissed him instead, which caused him to lose his university pension. There was no appeal possibility. Thammasat University rector Somkid Lertpaitoon issued the order on 24 February 2015; the grounds cited was that he had ignored orders to report for duty for fifteen consecutive days. (For background, see NCH Annual Report 2014.)

[Sources: “Scholars Condemn Somsak’s Dismissal,” Thai PBS (5 March 2015; <http://englishnews.thaipbs.or.th/scholars-condemn-somsaks-dismissal>); Suluck Lamubol, “International Outcry over Eroded Academic Freedom,” University World News (13 March 2015; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20150312205039591>).]

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2013.

Little progress was made in addressing crimes against humanity and other human rights violations committed by Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries from 1975 to 1999. Many suspected perpetrators remained at large in Indonesia where they were safe from prosecution. In August 2014, the Court of Appeal upheld the sentence of a former AHI (Aileu Hametin Integrasaun) militia member imprisoned for crimes against humanity committed in Aileu district around the 1999 independence referendum. The Timorese government failed to implement recommendations from the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR) and the bilateral Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF) relating to impunity. Parliament continued delaying consideration of two draft laws providing for a National Reparations Program and the establishment of a “Public Memory Institute,” a body which would implement the recommendations of the CAVR and CTF, including the reparations Program. A commission to examine enforced disappearances, recommended by the CTF, had not been established by the end of 2014. Initiatives undertaken with the Indonesian government to reunite children separated from their families in 1999 lacked transparency and adequate consultation with civil society.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 366–367.]

See also Australia, Indonesia.

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2013.

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2014.

Since 2011, Tunisian authorities have taken some steps to prosecute perpetrators of human rights violations, notably those committed during the uprising that began on 17 December 2010, and ended in February 2011. An official investigation concluded that the authorities' attempt to crush the uprising using excessive force caused the deaths of 132 protesters and injuries to hundreds more. The trials of those accused of responsibility for these killings began in late 2011 before military courts, which had sole jurisdiction over cases involving members of the military and security forces. First instance military courts that began investigations in July 2011 determined that the accused should stand trial in groups, organized geographically, and trials opened in the military tribunals of Tunis and Le Kef in November and December 2011. Defendants included the former President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali, charged in absentia, two former interior ministers, five general directors of the Interior Ministry, and several high- and mid-level security force commanders. When the tribunals delivered their verdicts in June and July 2012, they convicted Ben Ali, his interior minister at the time, and five directors of the Interior Ministry and imposed prison sentences ranging from 15 years to life. On 12 April 2014, the military court of appeals confirmed the life imprisonment sentence in absentia of Ben Ali but significantly reduced the sentences of all other former senior officials. The government's failure to press effectively for Ben Ali's extradition from Saudi Arabia to stand trial in Tunisia undermined accountability.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 543.]

Following the adoption of a Transitional Justice law in December 2013, an Instance Vérité & Dignité (IVD; Truth and Dignity Commission) was established in June 2014 to investigate human rights violations and arbitrate on cases of official corruption between 1 July 1955 and December 2013. An independent body chaired by Sihem Bensedrine (a former journalist and human rights activist, considered by some as too close to the conservative party Ennahda), the IVD was also mandated to provide both material and symbolic reparations to victims and to draft recommendations to prevent the recurrence of human rights violations and the misuse of public funds and to promote democracy. The IVD, which has a four-year mandate extendable for up to one year, began its work in December 2014 after developing its rules and methods of operation. Public hearings were scheduled to begin in June 2015. Plaintiffs could lodge complaints up until 14 December 2015 and the IVD would be able to access government archives. On 26 December 2014, however, the IVD had a conflict with the national archives: instead of accessing and consulting the presidential archives, it wanted to take them over. The December 2013 law also established mechanisms for institutional reform, vetting of civil servants, and national reconciliation, and provided for the establishment of Special Judicial Chambers to investigate and prosecute human rights violations committed by state agents. In March 2014, the Ministry of Justice appointed a technical committee to draft a decree on how these specialized chambers would function.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 372; Carlotta Gall, "Women in Tunisia Tell of Decades of Police Cruelty, Violence and Rape," New York Times (28 May 2015; http://www.nytimes.com/2015/05/29/world/africa/women-in-tunisia-tell-of-decades-of-police-cruelty-violence-and-rape.html?_r=0); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 544; Julie Schneider, "Tunisian Truth Commission Opens Despite Internal Turmoil," International Justice Tribune (17 December 2014; <https://www.justicetribune.com/articles/tunisian-truth-commission-opens-despite-internal-turmoil>); Julie Schneider, "Tunisia's Truth Commission Carries on Despite Red Tape and Lacking Funds" (28 January 2015; <https://www.justicetribune.com/articles/tunisias-truth-commission-carries-despite-red-tape-and-lacking-funds>); TAP, "Le DG des Archives nationales appelle l'IVD à revoir sa méthode de travail" (2 January 2015; <http://www.gnet.tn/actualites-nationales/le-dg-des-archives-nationales-appelle-livd-a-revoir-ses-methodes-de-travail/id-menu-958.html>); "Tunis: L'IVD autorisée à accéder aux archives de la Présidence," African Manager (27 May 2015; <http://www.africanmanager.com/186558.html>).]

In April 2014, the authorities released some of the former senior officials imprisoned in connection with the unlawful killings of protesters during the 2010–2011 uprising after the Military Court of Appeal amended the charges on which they had previously been convicted by military courts and reduced their sentences. Those released included former Minister of the Interior Rafiq Haj Kacem, whose twelve-year sentence was reduced to a three-year term, including time spent in custody awaiting trial. Several family members of people killed or injured during the uprising went on hunger strike in protest.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 372.]

On 18 March 2015, two armed men attacked the Bardo Museum, adjacent to the parliament in Tunis, much visited by tourists because of its rich archaeological collection, killing at least twenty foreign tourists and two Tunisians. The Islamic State (IS) claimed responsibility for the assault. The gunmen were killed.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, "Tunisia: Deadly Attack on Museum-goers: Response of Authorities Will Test Commitment to Rights" (18 March 2015; hrw.org/news/2015/03/18/tunisia-deadly-attack-museum-goers).]

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2014.

The retrial of a group of young men for the January 2007 murder of journalist Hrant Dink continued. In July 2014, the Constitutional Court ruled that the murder investigation had not been conducted in an effective manner. (For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2006–2014.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 552.]

In November 2014, the General Staff removed from its website archival documents under the heading “Armenian activities in 1914–1918,” which included photographs of Turks massacred by Armenian rebels. This move was interpreted as underscoring Turkey’s desire for the centenary of the 1915 genocide to pass in a calm atmosphere.

[Source: Tulay Cetingulec, “Armenians Dig Out Their Ottoman Land Deeds,” Almonitor: Turkey Pulse (12 November 2014; [http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/11/armenians-dig-out-ottoman-title-deeds.html?utm_source=Al-Monitor+Newsletter+\[English\]&utm_campaign=8d63b8d54a-November_13_2014&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_28264b27a0-8d63b8d54a-93088897](http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2014/11/armenians-dig-out-ottoman-title-deeds.html?utm_source=Al-Monitor+Newsletter+[English]&utm_campaign=8d63b8d54a-November_13_2014&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_28264b27a0-8d63b8d54a-93088897)].]

On 24 December 2014, police arrested a sixteen-year-old student, listed by the initials MEA, on charges of insulting President Recep Tayyip Erdogan after criticizing the ruling AK Party during a speech given to commemorate the killing of a Turkish soldier by Islamists in the 1920s at a student protest in the city of Konya. In the speech, the student defended secularism and Kemalist principles and criticized Erdogan over recent corruption allegations, as the crowd chanted “everywhere is bribery, everywhere is corruption.” On 28 December 2014, the student was released after dozens of lawyers had signed a petition on his behalf.

[Sources: “Turkish Police Arrest Boy, 16, for Insulting Erdogan,” BBC News (<http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-30602250>; 25 December 2014); “Turkey Teenager Accused of Insulting President Released,” BBC News (<http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-30603709>; 26 December 2014).]

In early 2015, Reşat Barış Ünlü, a historian of political movements during the Ottoman Empire (1299–1918) at Ankara University’s political sciences department, asked his students to analyze the 1978 Kurdistan manifesto written by Abdullah Öcalan, the imprisoned leader of the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK). The newspaper Vahdet wrote that this amounted to treachery and concluded that some academics hid their “terrorist activities” “behind the cloak of freedom of expression.”

Because of the article and a hate campaign on social media, Ünlü received multiple death threats. Ünlü was the biographer of socialist leader Mehmet Ali Aybar (1908–1995).

[Source: Kaya Genç, “Silence on Campus,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 10–11.]

In [February] 2015, students from Istanbul University’s communication faculty planned to show a documentary film about the Dersim massacre, a military operation that resulted in the deaths of thousands of Kurds in 1936–1938 (see NCH Annual Reports 1998, 2002, 2008 and 2012.) The university administration considered the showing of the film on its premises unacceptable (although President Erdogan had apologized for the massacre in 2013).

[Source: Kaya Genç, “Silence on Campus,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 12.]

In March 2015, Istanbul University’s art history club decided to organize a panel called A History of Beauty: Through the Lens of Art History. The event was promoted with a poster featuring Tiziano’s 1514 painting, “Amor sacro e Amor profano” (“Sacred and profane love”; also: “Venus and the bride”). The university administration told students that the image was “too explicit” and asked them to remove it from the poster.

[Source: Kaya Genç, “Silence on Campus,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 12.]

When academics from Turkish universities and the University of California wanted to organize a conference about the 1915 Armenian genocide, at the same venue, Bilgi University, of a similar 2005 conference (see NCH Annual Report 2006), the university refused, saying that it had not received an application. The organizers responded that the university had not only accepted their application but even announced the event before deleting it from its website.

[Source: Kaya Genç, “Silence on Campus,” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 13.]

During April and May 2015, Turkey withdrew its ambassadors from Austria, Luxembourg and the Vatican, because the latter recognized that the 1915 massacres of Armenians had a genocidal character.

[Source: “Turkije roept weer ambassadeur terug om genocide-erkenning,” Volkskrant (7 May 2015; <http://www.volkskrant.nl/buitenland/turkije-roept-weer-ambassadeur-terug-om-genocide-erkenning~a4006648>).]

See also Australia, Cyprus, Syria.

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012.

According to the Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights (TIHR), a Vienna-based group, several books written by and about President Gurbanguly Berdymukhamedov, who used the title “Arkadag” (Protector), were added to the secondary-school curriculum in January 2014, replacing the study of writings by former President Saparmurat Niyazov. TIHR also reported that in May 2014, parents of school children in Ashgabat were obliged to sign a pledge to raise their children in accordance with Turkmen traditions. In one school, the pledge obliged students to “become faithful sons and daughters” of the president.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 555.]

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2013.

International Criminal Court arrest warrants issued in 2005 remained in force for Joseph Kony, the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) leader, and three LRA commanders. The men were still at large at the end of 2014. Former LRA commander Thomas Kwoyelo, who in 2011 pleaded not guilty before the International Crimes Division of the High Court to charges of murder, willful killing and other offences committed in the context of the conflict in northern Uganda, remained remanded in prison. The government appeal against the Constitutional Court's decision that Kwoyelo was entitled to amnesty under the Amnesty Act of 2000 remained pending before the Supreme Court. A complaint submitted by Kwoyelo to the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights challenging his continued detention by the government remained pending.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 382.]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic).

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011, 2014.

On 28 September 2014, nationalist protesters tore down a statue of Lenin in the center of Kharkiv; they were supported by the governor of the region. See also NCH Annual Report 2014.

[Source: "Ukraine Nationalists Tear Down Kharkiv's Lenin Statue," BBC News (28 September 2014; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-29405089>).]

On 18 June 2014, Sergei Dolgov, editor of Vestnik Pryazovya and Khochu v SSSR ("I want to go to the USSR"), was abducted from his office in Mariupol by six masked men in civilian dress bearing automatic weapons. His whereabouts and the identity and motive of his abductors remained unknown for five days. On 23 June 2014, the Security Service of Ukraine in Mariupol announced that he was "alive and in good health" and being held at an anti-terrorism center in Zaporozhye. In December 2014, however, the Security Service reportedly told Amnesty International that it had no record of Dolgov's detention. Dolgov's wife said that she had been contacted by an anonymous source who alleged that he had been held with Dolgov in military base A1978 in Zaporozhye until the former's release in October 2014. Dolgov's colleagues thought that his abduction was linked to Khochu v SSSR, which publishes historical articles about the Soviet era.

[Source: Pen International Writers in Prison Committee, Case List January-December 2014 (London: PEN, May 2015), 230–231.]

The ministry of education introduced patriotic history education at schools and universities. In their turn, universities on the territory of the self-declared republics abolished the history of Ukraine as a separate course and proposed their own vision of Ukraine's history, based on Russian textbooks.

[Source: Tatyana Malyarenko, "Universities under Fire in Ukraine's War," Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 17.]

See also Russia.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

See Egypt.

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2014.

In May 2013, the High Court ruled that the Iraq Historic Allegations Team (IHAT), a unit within the Ministry of Defence set up to investigate allegations of abuses of Iraqi civilians by United Kingdom (UK) armed forces between March 2003 and July 2009, was failing to meet its obligations to uphold the right to life. The judge ruled that small inquiries modelled on inquests were needed, but rejected the claimants' arguments that IHAT lacked independence and should be replaced by a single, public inquiry. In May 2014, the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court reopened a preliminary investigation into allegations that UK armed forces committed war crimes involving systematic detainee abuse in Iraq.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 390–391.]

In 2014, Thomas Docherty, professor of English and comparative literature at the University of Warwick, was suspended, barred from contacts with colleagues and students, barred from campus and prevented from attending and speaking at a conference about historian E. P. Thompson (1924–1993) after he had been accused of “undermining a colleague and asking critical questions of [his] superiors.” None of the charges were upheld at a university tribunal later.

[Source: Thomas Docherty, “Open-door Policy?” Index on Censorship (2015 no. 2), 37–39.]

In June 2014, the Irish television channel RTÉ broadcast newly discovered archival material suggesting that the United Kingdom (UK) had misled the European Court of Human Rights in Ireland v. UK (1978; Application no. 5310/71), over the use of five torture techniques used by British security forces in Northern Ireland in 1971–1972. In December 2014, the Irish government sought a reopening of the case by the court. Lawyers for the victims also called for an independent, human rights-compliant investigation in the UK into the new evidence.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 392.]

Secret files disclosed in a redacted format on 24 October 2014 revealed that the security service MI5 had subjected historians Eric Hobsbawm (1917–2012) and Christopher Hill (1912–2003) to persistent surveillance for decades, tapping their telephone, intercepting their correspondence and monitoring their contacts because they were Communist Party of Great Britain (CPGB) members. The surveillance started in 1935 (Hill—when he visited the USSR) and 1942 (Hobsbawm). There was no evidence in the files of any attempt by either Hobsbawm or Hill to spy for the USSR. Hobsbawm was refused access to his files when he asked to see them in 2009. According to transcripts of MI5's bugged conversations, the files showed that the CPGB leadership considered dismissing Hobsbawm in 1956 after he, Hill and the writer Doris Lessing attacked its “uncritical support...to Soviet action in Hungary” in a letter referring to the crushing of the uprising there. That support was “the undesirable culmination of years of distortion of facts.” After the CPGB paper, Daily Worker, refused to publish the letter, it was later run by the left-wing weekly Tribune. MI5 also opened personal files on historian A.J.P. Taylor (1906–1990) after he had signed a letter supporting a march against the nuclear bomb in 1959.

[Source: Richard Norton-Taylor, “MI5 Spied on Leading British Historians for Decades, Secret Files Reveal,” Guardian (24 October 2014; <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/oct/24/mi5-spied-historians-eric-hobsbawm-christopher-hill-secret-files>).]

In May 2015, it became known that British Foreign and Commonwealth Office in 2014 had located a new cache of colonial-era government documents (170,000 historic files), including from the former Colonial Office's Intelligence and Security Department (ISD).

[Source: Katie Engelhart, "Exclusive: The UK Has Just Unearthed New 'Top Secret' Colonial-Era Government Files," VICE News (11 May 2015; <https://news.vice.com/article/exclusive-the-uk-has-just-unearthed-new-top-secret-colonial-era-government-files>).]

Northern Ireland

In Northern Ireland, the mechanisms and institutions mandated to address "legacy" (conflict-related or historical) human rights violations in previous decades operated in a fragmented and incremental manner. The Historical Enquiries Team (HET), mandated since 2006 to re-examine all deaths attributed to the conflict in Northern Ireland, was closed following wide criticism. In July 2013, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary had found that the HET reviewed cases involving the state with less rigor than non-state cases. The transfer, announced in December 2013, of some of HET's work to a Legacy Investigative Branch within the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) prompted concerns over the independence of future case reviews. Positive reforms to the Office of the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland (OPONI) continued throughout 2013 and 2014. A 30 September 2014 report by Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland found that confidence in the OPONI's investigation of historical cases had been "fully restored." However, on the same day, cuts to the OPONI's budget led to a loss of 25% of staff working on legacy cases, and to serious concerns about the OPONI's ability to complete "legacy" casework. The government remained unwilling to establish public inquiries into legacy cases. In September 2013, inter-party talks chaired by former United States diplomat Richard Haass began with the aim of reaching agreement on parades and protests; the use of flags, symbols and emblems; and how to deal with "the past." The talks ended without agreement on 31 December 2013. The draft Haass proposals detailed two mechanisms: a Historical Investigation Unit (HIU) and an Independent Commission for Information Retrieval (ICIR). Further talks, which concluded in December 2014, agreed in principle to take forward the Haass proposals of an HIU and ICIR, although details of finance, resourcing, timeframes and legislation were not completely resolved at the end of 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 37, 391–392.]

The legal battle to get access to some of the Boston tapes (see NCH Annual Reports 2012–2014) continued in 2015. In the Winston "Winkie" Rea case, the European Court of Human Rights in late May or early June 2015 refused to grant an interim prohibition as part of efforts to stop the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) from obtaining his taped testimony.

[Sources: "Boston College Tapes: Police Get Access to Ex-Loyalist Prisoner Winston Rea's Interviews," BBC News (5 June 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/uk-northern-ireland-33017930>);

Alan Erwin, “Court Refuses to Hear Winkie Rea’s Appeal over Boston Tapes,” Irish Times (19 May 2015; <http://www.irishtimes.com/news/crime-and-law/court-refuses-to-hear-winkie-rea-s-appeal-over-boston-tapes-1.2218168>); Alan Erwin, “Ex-loyalist Prisoner Seeks Emergency Hearing to Block Boston Tapes; Winston ‘Winkie’ Rea to Have Final Roll of Dice in European Court of Human Rights,” Irish Times (21 May 2015; <http://www.irishtimes.com/news/crime-and-law/ex-loyalist-prisoner-seeks-emergency-hearing-to-block-boston-tapes-1.2221052>).

See also Bangladesh, Russia, Rwanda.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2014.

On 19 July 2013, an appeals court in Virginia ruled that New York Times reporter James Risen had to testify at the criminal trial of former Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) agent Jeffrey Sterling who was prosecuted on charges of espionage for leaking classified information to Risen which was subsequently included in the latter’s book State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration (2006). The court maintained that Risen could not claim a reporter’s privilege. On 15 October 2013, a federal appeals court declined to hear Risen’s appeal. On 2 June 2014, the Supreme Court rejected Risen’s appeal. Non-compliance with the subpoena (first issued in 2008) could result in a prison sentence or heavy fine. On 12 January 2015, when federal prosecutors filed a motion before a district court that Risen not be called as a witness in the case against Sterling, the United States Department of Justice eventually withdrew its subpoena. Critics asked the department to revise the guidelines on media subpoenas. The leaked information concerned a top-secret CIA operation to sabotage Iran’s alleged nuclear program.

[Sources: Committee to Protect Journalists, “U.S. Will Not Force Risen to Testify in Leak Case” (14 January 2015; https://www.ifex.org/united_states/2015/01/14/risen_subpoena_withdrawn/?utm_source=whatcounts&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=itw_14january2015); Pen International Writers in Prison Committee, Case List January-December 2014 (London: PEN, May 2015), 106–107.]

The United States (US) appeared before three United Nations treaty bodies in 2014. In April, the Human Rights Committee criticized the US on a range of issues—including the lack of accountability for abuses in the counter-terrorism context, solitary confinement in prisons, racial disparities in the criminal justice system, targeted killings by drones, excessive use of force by law enforcement officials, the treatment of migrants and the death penalty. In August, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination also made numerous recommendations to the US. In November, the Committee against Torture's concluding observations similarly covered a range of issues.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 393.]

In [the summer of] 2014, the Advanced Placement United States history course (APUSHC)—based on a newly revised “framework” for teachers—was the target of intense criticism for weeks from conservatives who charged that it was anti-American. In August 2014, the Republican National Committee (RNC) adopted a resolution attacking the APUSHC because it “emphasize[d] negative aspects of our nation’s history while omitting or minimizing positive aspects.” The RNC said that it did not give sufficient weight to important American historical figures, such as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin or Martin Luther King, Jr., and spent too much time on the darker episodes in American history (like slavery, Japanese internment camps, and the A-bomb). In their turn, high school students and teachers from the Jefferson County District in Colorado protested against this attempt to make the course more patriotic. As a result of the conflict, the College Board, which owned the APUSHC and denied that it belittled American history, published a revised version of the framework in late September with new instructions (but unchanged historical content) to try to assuage critics of the framework’s first version. On 17 February 2015, Oklahoma House Republicans on the Common Education Committee voted to ban Advanced Placement United States history courses, because they thought that the latter showed “what was bad about America.” This reportedly included subjects such as the lynchings of African-Americans and the killing of Native Americans at Washita Battlefield.

[Sources: Rebecca Klein, “Fox News’ Ben Carson Thinks New AP U.S. History Course Will Make Students Join ISIS,” The Huffington Post (1 October 2014; http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2014/10/01/ben-carson-ap-us-history_n_5910982.html); Valerie Strauss, “College Board Says It ‘Revised’ Controversial AP U.S. History Framework (Update),” Washington Post (1 October 2014; <http://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/answer-sheet/wp/2014/10/01/college-board-says-it-revised-controversial-ap-u-s-history-framework>); Steven Thrasher, “Sorry, Oklahoma: You Don’t Get To Ban History You Don’t Like,” Guardian (18 February 2015; <http://www.theguardian.com/education/commentisfree/2015/feb/18/oklahoma-ban-advanced-placement-history>).]

In August 2014, President Barack Obama acknowledged that the United States (US) used torture in its response to the 11 September 2001 terrorist attacks (“9/11”), under a secret detention program authorized by his predecessor, George W. Bush, and operated by the Central Intelligence Agency

(CIA). He stated that torture was carried out under “some” of the “enhanced interrogation techniques” used in the program, not just the one known as “waterboarding” (a mock execution by interrupted drowning). Nevertheless, Obama remained silent on accountability and redress, reflecting the US’s continuing refusal to meet its international obligations on these issues. Neither did he make any reference to enforced disappearance, a crime under international law to which most, if not all, of those held in the secret program were subjected, some of them for years. On 3 April 2014, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (SSCI) voted to submit for declassification the summary of its report into the CIA’s secret detention and interrogation program operated between 2002 and 2008. Release of the summary came on 9 December 2014 and the 500-page document contained some new details on the program and the torture and other human rights violations committed in it. The full 6,700 page report—containing “details of each detainee in CIA custody, the conditions under which they were detained, [and] how they were interrogated”—remained classified top secret, held, according to SSCI Chairperson Senator Dianne Feinstein, “for declassification at a later time.” Although there has for years been much information in the public domain about the CIA program, no one has yet been brought to justice for the human rights violations, including the crimes under international law of torture and enforced disappearance, carried out under that program. By the end of 2014, 127 men remained in indefinite military detention at the United States naval base at Guantánamo Bay in Cuba. [Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 21–22, 393–394.]

In November 2014, Bill Harbaugh, economics professor at the University of Oregon (UO), requested and on 3 December 2014 received 25,000 pages of unfiltered electronic records of four former UO presidents from the UO archives. The records contained emails, reports and other papers, including confidential data about students and staff. Harbaugh returned them in January 2015 at the request of the UO administration. The two archivists involved were placed on paid administrative leave pending an investigation after UO accused them of not having first filtered out identifying information or other records the UO wished to withhold under exemptions to the Oregon public records law. One of the two archivists, James Fox, director of UO Special Collections and University Archives and associate professor in the UO history department, was dismissed (effective 30 June 2015). The other, Kira Homo, electronic records archivist at UO Special Collections and the secretary of the union United Academics, resigned for personal reasons on 1 March 2015. Fox said that Homo acted without informing him and intended to sue UO for defamation. Over the past four years, Harbaugh had formally asked the UO for public records 229 times and posted many of them on his watchdog blog uomatters.com. UO had learned about the release after Harbaugh had posted a memo from a UO lawyer (saying that the staff gave up its voice in university governance when it unionized and advocating dissolution of the UO Senate) on his blog. Harbaugh declared he had no intention of harming the university but rather had wished to point to UO's obsessive secrecy.

[Sources: Diane Dietz, "University Of Oregon: Professor Returns UO Documents," The Register-Guard (<http://registerguard.com/rg/news/local/32704897-75/story.csp>; 29 January 2015); Laura Frazier, "UO Archivist Involved in Records Leak Left Job for Personal Reasons, Union Says," The Oregonian/OregonLive (27 March 2015; http://oregonlive.com/education/index.ssf/2015/03/university_of_oregon_archivist_1.html); "University Of Oregon: Professors' Letter Urges Archivist's Reinstatement: More than 100 UO Faculty Members Sign a Document in Support of James Fox, Who Lost His Job at the Library," The Register-Guard (<http://registerguard.com/rg/news/local/32974405-75/more-than-100-uo-profs-sign-letter-urging-archivists-reinstatement.html.csp>; 13 April 2015); Richard Read, "Archivist James Fox Says UO Interim President Scott Coltrane's Team Betrayed, Scapegoated Him," The Oregonian/OregonLive (http://www.oregonlive.com/education/index.ssf/2015/04/archivist_james_fox_says_uo_in.html; 17 April 2015).]

On 4 January 2015, three anti-Israel resolutions submitted by Historians against War at the annual meeting of the American Historical Association (AHA) in New York were not voted on. The resolutions had been submitted on 22 December 2014, weeks after the 1 November deadline, and AHA members declined by a vote of 144 to 54 to suspend the AHA bylaws. One resolution accused Israel of violating academic freedom, saying Israel "arbitrarily limits the entry of foreign nationals who seek to lecture, teach and attend conferences at Palestinian universities." Another resolution called on the AHA to condemn the "acts of violence and intimidation by the State of Israel against Palestinian researchers and their archival collections, acts which can destroy the Palestinians' sense of historical identity as well as the historical record itself." It also accused Israel of bombing the Islamic University in Gaza in August 2014.

[Source: JTA & Rebecca Shimoni Stoil, "American Historical Association Rejects Anti-Israel Resolutions Vote," Times of Israel (11 January 2015; <http://www.timesofisrael.com/american-historical-association-rejects-anti-israel-resolutions-vote>).]

On 4 March 2015, after years of delay, the National Security Archive filed suit against the State Department under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to force release of the last 700 transcripts of former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger's telephone calls (telcons). Kissinger had removed more than 16,000 telcons from the State Department when leaving office in late 1976 but returned them, when notified to do so, in 2001. The State Department released most of them but, starting in 2007, withheld some 700, claiming they were "pre-decisional" or covered by executive privilege—claims that according to the National Security Archive should long since have expired in the case of forty-year-old records.

[Source: National Security Archive, “Archive Sues State Department Over Kissinger Telcons” (4 March 2015).]

In April 2015, the estate of Joseph Goebbels (minister of propaganda in Nazi Germany) sued Random House for royalties for the use of extensive extracts from his diaries in the English translation of a Goebbels biography (2010) written by German historian Peter Longerich and due to be published in May 2015. Random House initially agreed to pay a fee, but later said it had moral objections to paying a war criminal’s estate. Longerich argued that a private person (in this case, Cordula Schacht, daughter of Hjalmar Schacht, a minister in the Nazi regime, who owned the copyright to Goebbels’ diaries) should not be given control of important historical documents.

[Source: “Goebbels’ Estate Sues Random House for Diary Royalties,” BBC News (18 April 2015; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-32363846>).]

See also Bolivia, China, Colombia, Congo (Democratic Republic), Iraq, Japan, Marshall Islands, Thailand, Turkey.

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013.

The fight for justice regarding human rights violations committed during the period of civil and military rule (1973–1985) faced a possible step back following a decision in February 2013, when the Supreme Court overturned two key articles of Law 18.831, adopted in 2011, which established that crimes committed during 1973–1985 were crimes against humanity and that no statute of limitations could be applied. The Supreme Court also concluded that no crimes against humanity were committed at the time because they were made criminal under national law only in 2006, and therefore they were subject to a statute of limitations. During 2014 little progress was made to ensure that complaints for past human rights violations would be fully investigated. The trial of a former police officer, charged in 2012 with complicity in the killing of teacher and journalist Julio Castro in 1977, continued at the end of 2014.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 398.]

On 20 May 2015, President Tabaré Vázquez Rosas issued a decree establishing a Truth and Justice Working Group to investigate crimes committed by the police and army during the dictatorship

(1973–1985) and during a state of emergency preceding it (13 June 1968–1973). Vázquez’s Frente Amplio (Broad Front) party included former members of the Tupamaros guerrilla group. The announcement came as activists prepared to hold the twentieth annual march of silence calling for justice for the hundreds of people who disappeared during the dictatorship.

[Source: Agence France-Press, “Uruguay to Probe Dictatorship Crimes,” (20 May 2015; <http://news.yahoo.com/uruguay-probe-dictatorship-crimes-172729498.html>).]

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2014.

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011.

In November 2014, Pope Francis took the position that the secret records about World War II should be opened after the legal and other matters were sorted out. (For background, see NCH Annual Report 2004).

[Source: “Francis Wants to Open Holocaust-era Vatican Archives as Quickly as Possible” (http://www.worldjewishcongress.org/en/news/15409/francis_wants_to_open_holocaust_era_vatican_archives_as_quickly_as_possible; 28 November 2014).]

See also Turkey.

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012, 2014.

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2013.

See China.

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco / Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010, 2013–2014.

The authorities made little progress in addressing the widespread human rights abuses of previous years. The government took no steps to clarify the fate of hundreds of political activists and others who were subjected to enforced disappearance under the former regime, headed for decades by Ali Abdullah Saleh (President of North Yemen, 1978–1990, President of Yemen, 1990–2012, or to bring those responsible to justice, despite the reappearance of a number of people forcibly disappeared decades earlier. In January 2012, the parliament voted to give former President Ali Abdullah Saleh and his aides immunity from prosecution. In September 2012, however, Saleh's successor, President Abdrabuh Mansour Hadi, decreed the creation of an independent commission of inquiry to investigate alleged rights abuses committed during the 2011 uprising, and recommend measures to hold perpetrators accountable and afford redress to victims. By November 2014, Hadi had still to nominate the inquiry's commissioners and no progress had been achieved. After numerous drafts that fell far short of safeguarding justice and accountability for past crimes, a draft Law on Transitional Justice and National Reconciliation, created at the behest of the ten months-long National Dialogue Conference (NDC), was submitted for cabinet approval in May 2014 but had not been made law by the end of 2014. Two other commissions that the president had announced in 2013 were inundated with claims. One commission, tasked with addressing the issue of land confiscation in southern Yemen in the 1990s, had received over 100,000 claims by May 2014 while the other, set up to review the forced dismissal of southerners from government employment, had registered 93,000 claims by the same time. Neither, however, appeared sufficiently resourced to address and resolve the claims they received. In September 2014, the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council adopted a resolution on Yemen that highlighted the need for investigations into past abuses, the passage of a transitional justice law, and the creation of an independent national human rights institution. In its report presented to the Human Rights Council and released in August 2014, the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights encouraged the international community to establish an independent, international mechanism to investigate violations of human rights that took place in 2011.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World's Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 409; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 620–621, 628.]

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009.

On 12 March 2014, 49 young people were arrested by police during a march to commemorate Youth Day in the capital Lusaka. The young activists were arrested for wearing T-shirts and carrying placards bearing the message “Give us our constitution now.” They were separated and detained for at least six hours, before being cautioned and released. Four of the youths were reportedly assaulted by police officers who beat them with their fists during their detention at Lusaka Central Police Station, resulting in one sustaining a serious ear injury. The activists were allegedly forced to remove their T-shirts, leaving some, including young women, partially undressed.

[Source: Amnesty International, Amnesty International Report 2014/15: The State of the World’s Human Rights (London: Amnesty International, 2015), 410–411.]

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2014.

Lack of accountability for past abuses remained a serious problem. The government failed to ensure justice for victims more than five years after the 2008 politically motivated violence in which the ruling Zimbabwe African National Union- Patriotic Front (ZANU-PF), backed by state security forces, committed widespread and systematic abuses that led to the killing of up to 200 people, the beating and torture of 5,000 more, and the displacement of about 36,000 people.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2015 (Washington: Human Rights Watch, 2015), 632.]

See also South Africa.

INTRODUCTION

The twentieth Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It mainly covers events and developments of 2013 and 2014.

Disclaimer. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

The complete set of Annual Reports (1995–2014) was compiled by Antoon De Baets. Please send any comments to: <antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org>.

Please cite this report as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2014 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org>).

AFGHANISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013.

Although praised globally as an effective human rights body, the Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC) was largely in limbo from December 2011 until June 2013 due to multiple commissioner vacancies that President Hamid Karzai did not fill for 1.5 years. However, after donors set a deadline for filling these positions as part of the follow-up to the 2012 Tokyo Conference, at which donors pledged US$16 billion in development aid in return for commitments by the Afghan government including support for human rights, Karzai in June 2013 filled all vacant seats, albeit without the consultation with civil society that the 1993 Principles Relating to the Status of National Institutions (Paris Principles) requires. Several of the five new appointees had little or no experience in human rights or had expressed overt hostility to the concept of universal human rights. Abdul Rahman Hotak, a former member of the Taliban government, after his appointment publicly criticized the 2009 EVAW Law (Law on the Elimination of Violence against Women). In June 2013, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay took the unusual step of raising “serious concerns” about the appointments and called for the government “to reconsider the recent appointments and re-open the selection process.” One of the AIHRC’s key achievements in recent years was the completion of an 800-page report, Conflict Mapping in Afghanistan Since 1978, that mapped war crimes and crimes against humanity in Afghanistan since the communist era. Completed in December 2011, it would provide a foundation for future steps to prosecute those implicated in past abuses. However, at the end of 2013 there was no planned release date for the report: Karzai blocked the release with the encouragement of international donors including the United States and the United Kingdom, which argued that releasing the report could be destabilizing in the current tense security environment since it likely implicated a number of powerful figures. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 289–290.]

See also Ukraine.

ALBANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2012.

See Serbia / Kosovo.

ALGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001–2013.

Security forces and armed groups continued to enjoy impunity for atrocities they committed during the civil war (1992–2000).

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 522.]

See also France.

ANGOLA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2009.

ARGENTINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2013.

On 26 November 1977, Laura Estela Carlotto ([1954]–1977), a history student at the Universidad Nacional de La Plata (National University of La Plata) and a member of the Juventud Universitaria Peronista (JUP, Peronist University Youth) was abducted together with her partner Walmir Óscar Montoya and transported to the clandestine prison of La Cacha in La Plata. Walmir was assassinated but Laura, being pregnant, was kept alive. She gave birth to her baby in the Hospital Militar (military hospital) in Buenos Aires on 26 June 1978. On 25 August 1978, she was murdered under the responsibility of General Carlos Guillermo Suárez Masón. Her body was given to her mother, Estela de Carlotto, the same day. On 27 August 1978, she was buried in La Plata. The baby, of Italian-Argentinian nationality, was named Guido (Montoya Carlotto) by the family. He was taken away and adopted by another family, received the name of Ignacio Hurban and became a musician. Uncertain about his origin, he took a DNA test in 2014, which proved his kinship with the Carlotto family. On 5 August 2014, judge María Servini de Cubría informed his grandmother, Estela de Carlotto, who was the president of the Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo (the Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo), about the DNA test result. This was the 114th case (out of possibly 500) of a baby stolen during the Dirty War (1976–1983) whose identity could be traced. In December 2000, Suárez Masón (1924–2005) was sentenced in absentia to life imprisonment in Italy.

[Sources: “Apareció Guido Carlotto,” Abuelas Plaza de Mayo Website (5 August 2014; http://www.abuelas.org.ar/comunicados.php?comunicados=restituciones.php&der1=der1_varios.php&der2=der2_dif.php); “Conocé la historia de Laura, hija de Estela de Carlotto,” Nuevo diario web (5 August 2014; <http://www.nuevodiarioweb.com.ar/nota/pais/544666/conoce-historia-laura-hija-estela-carlotto.html>); Corte di assisi di Roma, Italy versus Carlos Guillermo Suárez Masón and Others: Judgment and Sentence (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/356.pdf> and <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/357.pdf>; 2000); “Laura Estela Carlotto Detenida–Desaparecida en Noviembre 1977” (<http://www.desaparecidos.org/arg/victimas/carlotto>); NRC Handelsblad (7 August 2014), 13.]

Several cases of human rights violations committed during Argentina’s military dictatorship (1976–1983) were reopened in 2003 after Congress annulled existing amnesty laws. The Supreme Court subsequently ruled that the amnesty laws were unconstitutional, and federal judges struck down pardons favoring former officials convicted of, or facing trial for, human rights violations. By September 2013, out of 2,316 persons investigated by the courts for crimes against humanity, 416 had been convicted and 35 had been found not guilty, according to the Center of Legal and Social Studies (CELS). There were 11 ongoing oral trials involving multiple victims and suspects. In December 2012, for example, a federal court convicted Jaime Smart, a minister of Buenos Aires province during the dictatorship, for the torture and subsequent death of one individual, and the illegal detention and abuse of 43 others. The first civilian government official convicted for these crimes, Smart was given life imprisonment. The tribunal also convicted 22 security officials for the same abuses, and requested the investigation of a prosecutor, members of the judiciary, and the Catholic Church for their alleged involvement. Given the large number of victims, suspects, and cases, prosecutors and judges faced challenges bringing those responsible to justice while respecting the due process rights of the accused. [Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 206–207.]

At the end of 2013, no one had been convicted for the 1994 bombing of the Argentine Israelite Mutual Association (AMIA) in Buenos Aires that killed 85 people and injured over 300. Judicial corruption and political obstruction hindered criminal investigations and prosecutions from the investigation’s outset. Iran, which was suspected of ordering the attack, refused Argentina’s requests for the extradition of former Iranian President Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani and seven Iranian officials suspected of participating in the crime. In January 2013, Argentina and Iran signed a memorandum of understanding that created an international commission of jurists with powers to review evidence against Iranians accused by Argentine judicial authorities of being responsible for the bombing, and to interrogate some of the suspects. Legislators from the party of President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner ratified the agreement in February. In Iran, it was ratified by the Council of Ministers, but it was unclear from the agreement's vague terms whether it could be implemented without Iranian parliamentary approval, or if the Iranians' statements would be admissible as evidence in Argentine criminal proceedings. In September 2013, President Fernández called on Iran to ratify the agreement during her speech before the United Nations General Assembly. A legal challenge to the agreement filed in April by Jewish community leaders before Argentine courts remained pending at the end of 2013.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 206.]

See also Spain, Venezuela.

ARMENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2006, 2010.

In April 2014 Armenian National Archive director Amatuni Virabyan announced that the archive would draft a list of the names of victims of the 1915 genocide based on surviving records. According to the International Association of Genocide Scholars, more than a million were exterminated.

[Source: "Armenia Compiles List of 1915-1916 Victims as Anniversary Approaches," Transitions Online (http://www.tol.org/client/article/24227-the-baltics-get-a-us-guarantee-poland-speeds-up-missile-defense.html?utm_source=TOL+mailing+list&utm_campaign=8204d5e55e-TOL_newsletter_27_8_2012&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_35d0a711b5-8204d5e55e-298065710).]

See also Switzerland, Turkey.

AUSTRALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2001, 2003, 2007–2009.

In October 2013, researchers Lynnette Silver and Di Elliot declared to the press that many World War II files appeared to have been censored over the past 20 years by the National Archives of Australia (NAA) for privacy reasons. The information withheld included names of collaborators, locations of graves of murdered civilians and details of torture and murder meted out to Australian soldiers. Among them were an investigation filed into the massacre of 160 Australian soldiers at the Tol Plantation in New Guinea and the files of missing lieutenants Clifford Perske and John Sachs, murdered by the Japanese. NAA Director-General David Fricker denied the claims.

[Source: Rory Callinan, “WWII Files on Torture Censored: Researchers,” Brisbane Times (12 October 2013).]

On 2 April 2014, the Administrative Appeal Tribunal (AAT) confirmed an earlier decision of the National Archives of Australia (NAA) to deny Clinton Fernandes, a University of New South Wales associate professor in the International and Political Studies Program, access to parts of two Department of Foreign Affairs & Trade (DFAT) files containing Australian diplomatic papers and intelligence about East Timor. In 2012, the NAA had released the files, but denied access to 140 of the 600 pages on the grounds that they could damage Australia’s international relations (with Indonesia) or that they were provided in confidence by another government (the United States). The folders were part of a set of folders dating back to 1946 and entitled “Portuguese Timor—Political—General,” created and maintained by the DFAT in Canberra; specifically, they contained reports about a major Indonesian military offensive against the Fretilin-led resistance across East Timor in late 1981 and early 1982, known as Operasi Keamanan. In the operation, the Indonesian army used East Timorese civilians as human shields; it reportedly ended with a massacre of hundreds of people.

[Sources: Philip Dorling, “Australia Wins Legal Battle To Suppress Secret Papers on East Timor ‘for Fear of Upsetting Indonesia’,” Sydney Morning Herald (3 April 2014; <http://www.smh.com.au/federal-politics/political-news/australia-wins-legal-battle-to-suppress-secret-papers-on-east-timor-for-fear-of-upsetting-indonesia-20140403-zqq73.html>); “Keeping Secret (Some) Australian Government Archives,” Timor Archives (no date; <http://timorarchives.wordpress.com/2014/04/16/keeping-oz-archives-secret>).]

See also India.

AUSTRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2005–2007, 2009.

See Russia.

AZERBAIJAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–1998, 2008–2013.

BAHRAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2008–2012.

BANGLADESH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2013.

After the Awami League came to power again in 2009, it established an International Crimes Tribunal (ICT) to try the crimes committed during the 1971 India-Pakistan war leading to the independence of Bangladesh. In 2011–2013, suspects from the Jamaat-e-Islami (the main Islamist party) and the Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP), charged with gross crimes for assisting the Pakistani army to commit genocide, were found guilty in controversial trials and received harsh punishments. The trials sparked protests from those who accused the government of pursuing a political vendetta on the one hand and from those who called on Jamaat-e-Islami leaders to face their crimes on the other. In clashes between both groups, more than a hundred people died. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.] [Sources include: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 75–76; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 297–298, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 280, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 298–300; Human Rights Watch, “Bangladesh: Post-Trial Amendments Taint War Crimes Process: Protesters, Security Forces Should Exercise Restraint” (14 February 2013); Human Rights Watch, “Crackdown on Bloggers, Editors in Bangladesh” (17 April 2013); Index on Censorship, 2014, no. 1, 119–122.]

In February 2013, Bangladesh was gripped by large-scale protests, political unrest, and violence after the International Crimes Tribunal (ICT) sentenced a leader of the Jamaat-e-Islami party, Abdul Qader Mollah, to life in prison instead of death for war crimes committed during the independence war of 1971. Hundreds of thousands of people throughout Bangladesh took to the streets in peaceful protests to demand that Mollah be hanged. The situation took a more violent turn after the ICT, on 28 February 2013, sentenced another Jamaat leader, Delwar Hossain Sayedee, to death for war crimes committed during the same war. Following this verdict, Jamaat supporters took to the streets and were responsible for a number of deaths, but the security forces killed many more with often indiscriminate attacks on protesters and bystanders. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

At the end of 2013, the International Crimes Tribunal (ICT) had handed down eight convictions, five of which resulted in death sentences. While human rights organizations have long called for fair trials of those responsible, the trials fell short of international human rights standards. In December 2012, the Economist published damning evidence of collusion between judges, prosecutors, and the government showing that judges were instructing the prosecution on the conduct of the trials, the questioning of witnesses, and written submissions. The revelations led to the resignation of the ICT's chief judge, but defense motions for retrials were rejected. Although the ICT had the authority to order measures for victim and witness protection, it summarily dismissed credible claims of witness insecurity. In the Delwar Hossain Sayedee case, judges dismissed credible evidence that an important defense witness was abducted from the courthouse gates and did not order an independent investigation into the allegation. Contradictory statements by key prosecution witnesses were not taken into account in several cases, and judges severely limited the number of defense witnesses. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court reversed the life sentence given to Abdur Qader Mollah and imposed the death penalty after the government pushed through retrospective amendments to the ICT Act, in clear violation of Bangladesh's obligations under article 15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (the legality or non-retroactivity principle). The amendment allowed the prosecution to appeal against the life sentence handed down by the trial judges, which the ICT Act had not previously allowed. Human Rights Watch and the Economist, journalists and television show guests were issued orders by the ICT to show cause for contempt for critical remarks and reporting on the tribunal. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 298–300; “Trying War Crimes in Bangladesh,” The Economist (15 December 2012).]

In April 2013 two former leaders of Al Badr (Al Badar Razakar; an extreme right-wing Islamist militia group) were charged before the ICT with instructing the killing of eighteen intellectuals during the 1971 genocide (which led to the independence of East Pakistan, renamed Bangladesh; see above entries), including the following three historians assassinated on 13 December 1971 (days before the surrender of the Pakistani army):

- Ghyasuddin [Ghiasuddin] Ahmed (1933–1971) an assistant history professor at Dhaka University specialized in European and contemporary world history. During the war of liberation, he supported the cause of the freedom fighters by raising funds for injured freedom fighters and families of the fallen. In September and November 1971, the Pakistani army had twice picked him up for interrogation. On 4 January 1972, his mutilated body was identified in Mirpur area.
- Santosh Chandra Bhattacharya (1915–1971), a senior history lecturer specialized in Sanskrit literature and the ancient history of Bengal and India.
- Abul Khair [Khayer] (1929–1971), an associate history professor at Dhaka University specialized in the history of Indo-Pakistani relations and a supporter of the Bangladesh movement.

On 25 April 2013, Chowdhury Mueen Uddin and Ashrafuzzaman Khan were charged in absentia on 16 counts of war crimes before the ICT. According to one of the charges, a gang of five to six armed Al-Badr men led by them “abducted” Ahmed, Bhattacharyya, Khair and five other intellectuals on the university campus, brought them to the Mirpur killing field and killed them. After 16 December, the mutilated bodies were recovered and identified from a Mirpur mass grave. Ahmed was found listed as one of the targets of intellectual killing in a diary recovered from Ashrafuzzaman Khan’s house after independence. Al-Badr was provided with arms and support by the Pakistan army. The intent of the killings was reported as “to cripple the intelligentsia and eliminate the future leaders of the new nation.” 14 December is commemorated as Shaheed Buddhijibi Hatya Dibash (Martyred Intellectuals’ Day). In 1997, Ahmed’s sister Farida Banu, had filed a criminal case in Ramna against Chowdhury Mueen Uddin and Ashrafuzzaman Khan for the killing of her brother and seven others. On 20 August 2002, the investigator ruled that the trial had to be held under the International Crimes (Tribunals) Act of 1973. After formation of the ICT in March 2010, the investigation agency started to probe the alleged crimes of the duo on 25 September 2011 and submitted its report to the prosecution in October 2012.

[Sources: Kalyan Chaudhuri, Genocide in Bangladesh (Bombay 1972), 149–150; “Killing of Intellectuals,” Banglapedia (http://www.bpedia.org/K_0261.php; 6 November 2013); “1971 Killing of Bengali Intellectuals,” Wikipedia (6 November 2013); “Mueen, Ashraf Indicted; Face 11 Charges for Killing Intellectuals in 1971,” The Daily Star (<http://www.thedailystar.net/beta2/news/mueen-ashraf-indicted-2/>; 26 June 2013).]

See also Pakistan.

BELARUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2000, 2005–2007, 2009–2011, 2013.

In April 2013, police held four environmental activists in preventive custody to stop them from attending a march in Minsk to commemorate the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear disaster. Police severely beat a protester at the peaceful march and detained four journalists who covered it.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 421.]

In the summer of 2007, Pavel Tereshkovich (1958–), a historian and anthropologist at the anthropology department of Belarusian State University, Minsk (1991–2008), was forced to meet a KGB officer and then accused of collaboration with the European Humanities University-in-exile

(EHU) in Vilnius, Lithuania (founded in 1992 in Minsk; reopened in exile since 2005), which he indeed had joined in 2005. He had also refused to press students for early voting in the 2006 presidential elections. The same day, the police accused him of having stolen a mobile phone. After several months of intense psychological pressure on him, his relatives, and his collaborators, he resigned. In March 2008, he became a visiting professor of EHU and academic co-director of the Center for Advanced Studies and Education (CASE) in Lithuania and Belarus. In December 2008, he was appointed dean at the EHU Arts and History Department. He became chairman of EHU's Senate, in which capacity he criticized the EHU board over its appointment of top personnel in a conflict that had started in late 2012. On 5 February 2014, his contract as a professor was not renewed, a move against which the other Senate members and the EHU students' union protested.

[Sources: "Open Letter in Support of Pavel Tereshkovich" (<http://www.change.org/petitions>); Matthew Reisz, "No Imminent Return for Free Thinkers of Exiled Institution," Times Higher Education (7 February 2013); Scholars at Risk, Summary Report of 2008 SAR/EHU Meeting & Symposium in Vilnius, Lithuania (1 October 2008), 10; Pavel Tereshkovich, personal information (June & December 2008; 23 February 2014).]

In the summer of 2013, the History Department of Janka-Kupala State University (founded in 1954) ceased to exist as an independent entity. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Uladzimir Matskevich, "Belarus: Academic Freedom Persecuted" (29 November 2013; <http://www.indexoncensorship.org/2013/11/belarus-academic-freedom-persecuted>).]

On 29 October 2013, Day of Remembrance of the Victims of Political Repressions, several journalists—including Natallia Valakida, Siarhei Krauchuk, Natallia Benitsevich, Dzianis Nosau and Aliaksandr Korsakau—were among a group of 20 persons detained by the police in Minsk while covering the Mourning Marathon, an unofficial event to commemorate victims of the repression under Stalin. The Mourning Marathon started from the Kalvaryja cemetery and followed a route of places of mass killings and burials of the victims. After a one-hour-and-a-half search and interrogation at the district police department, the detainees were released. On the Day of Remembrance of the Victims of Political Repressions, 29 October, more than 100 intellectuals were executed in Minsk NKVD prison in 1937.

[Source: Belarusian Association of Journalists, "Journalists Detained on the Day of Commemorating Victims of Stalinist Repressions" (<http://baj.by/en/node/22701>; 29 October 2013).]

BELGIUM

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

BELIZE

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

Around 10 May 2013, a construction company seeking gravel for road filler leveled the Noh Mul temple, located in northern Belize, estimated to be 2,300 years old and one of Belize's largest Mayan pyramids. The complex was located on private land, but under Belizean law any pre-Hispanic ruins came under government protection. Bulldozing Maya mounds was called an endemic problem in Belize. Prosecutors were considering bringing criminal charges against the company.

[Sources: BBC News (14 & 15 May 2013); Keesings historisch archief (2013), 341.]

BOLIVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2013.

Bolivia made little progress investigating and prosecuting human rights violations committed under authoritarian governments between 1964 and 1982. A contributing factor was the unwillingness of the armed forces to provide information that might clarify the fate or whereabouts of people killed or disappeared during this period. Plans to create a truth commission announced by the Evo Morales administration in 2008 did not materialize. Bolivia also failed to fulfill commitments to compensate victims of political violence during that period. A 2004 law budgeted US$3.6 million in government funds for this purpose, which would only cover about 20 percent of the proposed costs. The remaining funds were to be obtained from private donors, but were never raised. In April 2012, Congress passed a law announcing one-off payments equivalent to roughly 20 percent of the compensation amounts approved in 2004. As of December 2012, 1,418 of the 1,714 approved beneficiaries had received one of these reduced payments, according to the government. Many additional potential beneficiaries said they were rejected due to overly stringent documentary evidence required by the government commission appointed to review claims.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 211.]

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013.

In February 2013, the new chief state prosecutor publicly committed to expedite some 600 pending war crime investigations and prepare for an increased caseload once the mandate of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) expired at the end of 2014. Implementation of the national war crimes strategy was hindered by insufficient capacity and funding, particularly at the local level. In March 2013 the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) launched a judicial capacity program that included district and cantonal courts. By November 2013, the War Crimes Chamber of the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina had reached verdicts in 25 cases, raising the number of completed cases to 199. The State Prosecutor's Office signed a cooperation agreement on the prosecution of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide with its counterparts in Serbia and Croatia.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 426.]

In February 2013, the ICTY Appeals Chamber acquitted Momčilo Perišić, wartime chief of the General Staff of the Yugoslav Army, who had been convicted to 27 years in prison for aiding and abetting crimes against humanity and violations of the laws or customs of war. The Appeals Chamber found that the criterion of specific direction as an element of aiding and abetting liability was not proven beyond reasonable doubt. The ICTY trial of Bosnian Serb wartime General Ratko Mladić, charged with genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity—including the murder of at least 7,000 men and boys from Srebrenica in July 1995—continued, subject to repeated interruptions due to Mladić's ill-health. In the case of Bosnian Serb wartime president Radovan Karadžić, on trial at the ICTY for many of the same crimes as Mladić, a charge of genocide in seven Bosnian municipalities was reinstated in July 2013 by the ICTY Appeals Chamber, after being dropped in 2012 on the grounds of insufficient evidence. On 3 September 2013, Karadžić sought to have the decision overturned.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 426–427.]

In June 2013, the United Nations Human Rights Committee found several violations of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights in the case of five individuals who were tortured and then forcibly disappeared in 1992, marking the first time Bosnia and Herzegovina was held accountable for forced disappearances during the war (1992–1995). In July 2013, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the application of the 2003 criminal code in two war crimes cases at the State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina violated the right to protection from retroactive criminal law under article 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights. In response, in October and November the State Court ordered the retrial of 12 convicted war criminals, including six involved in the 1995 Srebrenica massacre, and their release from custody pending retrial.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 427, 429.]

In September 2013, the Dutch Supreme Court found the Netherlands responsible for the death of three Bosnian Muslims during the 1995 Srebrenica genocide because Dutch peacekeepers had sent the men away from the United Nations (UN) compound. The decision was the first to hold a government liable for events occurring under a UN mandate, highlighting that principles of accountability also applied to peacekeeping missions.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 429.]

On 23 January 2014, the Bosnian Serb municipal authorities of Višegrad, backed up by police, entered the Straziste Muslim cemetery to remove the word “genocide” from a memorial to Bosniak war victims. The Bosnian Serb mayor, Slaviša Mišković, described it as an illegally erected monument and told the press that the word was offensive to local people because there “was no proof or verdict about genocide in Višegrad.” The wording on the memorial now reads: “To all killed and missing Bosniak men, women and child victims... in Višegrad.” The authorities previously attempted to remove the word from the memorial in December 2013, but this was postponed after protests by Bosniaks. One Bosniak war victim, Bakira Hasečić, said that the authorities defaced the memorial and added that the families of Bosniak victims used red lipstick to reinstate the word genocide on the memorial. So far, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia did not pass a genocide verdict for Višegrad, but several Bosnian Serbs were found guilty of crimes against humanity in the town during the 1992–1995 conflict.

[Source: Denis Dzidic, “Bosnian Serbs Delete ‘Genocide’ From Visegrad Memorial,” Balkan Insight (23 January 2014; <http://www.balkaninsight.com/en/article/visegrad-authorities-remove-genocide-from-monument>).]

On 7 February 2014, during large anti-government protests, a fire at the state archives of Bosnia and Herzegovina in Sarajevo destroyed mostly documents from 1878 to 1918 (when Bosnia was part of the Austro-Hungarian empire), but also material from the Ottoman period (1384–1878) and documents from the war crimes commission after World War II. Archive director Adamir Jerković condemned it as an “act of vandalism.”

[Source: Philip Oltermann, “Bosnia-Herzegovina Fire Feared to Have Destroyed Ottoman Archives,” (<http://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/feb/09/bosnia-herzegovina-fire-ottoman-archives>; 9 February 2014).]

See also Serbia / Kosovo.

BRAZIL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2013.

Article 20 of the civil code, reformed in 2002, made it mandatory for biographical films and books to have prior authorization from the subject of the work before public release, which caused many authors to practice self-censorship. Several defamation cases took place as a result of the publication of unauthorized biographies, such as in the case of the relatives of footballer Manuel Francisco dos Santos Manuel Francisco dos Santos [“Garrincha”] (1933–1983) against journalist Ruy Castro in 1995 (before the reform); or the case of singer Roberto Carlos against historian and journalist Paulo César de Araújo in 2007 (after the reform; see below). Di Glauber, a highly acclaimed film from 1979 about the life of painter Di Cavalcanti was banned for 34 years for violating article 20. Family members also put a stop to already written biographies about football player Pelé, singer Vinicius de Moraes and gaúcho actor and singer Teixeirinha (the latter’s biography was written by journalist Daniel Feix). Legislative attempts to have the clause repealed failed in 2011–2013. In July 2012, the Associação Nacional dos Editores de Livros (ANEL; National Association of Book Publishers) filed a petition with the Federal Supreme Court to have the clause declared unconstitutional, arguing that it generated censorship. In April 2014, the Chamber of Deputies passed bill 393/2011 (the so called “biographies’ law”), allowing the disclosure of biographical information without prior authorization. A last-minute amendment was added, however, establishing that “the persons who [felt] affected in their honor, good reputation or respectability” could request the section offensive to them to be excluded in future reproductions of the work. If approved by the senate, the law would go to President Dilma Rousseff for approval and enter into force. The Order of Lawyers of Brazil, the Brazilian Historical and Geographical Institute, the Brazilian Academy of Letters and Article 19 Brazil all supported eliminating censorship of unauthorized biographies.

[Sources: Index on Censorship, 2013, no. 3, 133–135; Simone Marques, “Brazil’s Banned Biographies: When Public Figures Want to Control the Message,” Index on Censorship (16 July 2014; https://www.ifex.org/brazil/2014/07/16/banned_biographies/?utm_source=whatcounts&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=itw_16july2014).]

In February 2007, Roberto Carlos em detalhes (Planeta publishers, 2006), a best-selling unauthorized biography of the popular singer Roberto Carlos, written by historian and journalist Paulo César de Araújo after a decade of research, was banned because it contained sensitive passages about the singer's relationships with women. During the trial, judge Maurício Chaves de Lima ruled that Carlos's reputation was harmed and his privacy invaded and that the book could only be published with the singer's previous agreement. The publisher was also requested to take back copies of the book already distributed to bookshops (47,000 copies were sold already). On the other hand, Carlos's request for an indemnity and the accusation of wrongdoing against his honor were withdrawn. On 15 May 2014, Carlos filed a petition to the Supreme Court to take part in the process of discussing publication of unauthorized biographies. He created the Instituto Amigo, to participate in the case as an amicus curiae. (See the entry above.) Meanwhile, Araújo wrote another book about Carlos, O Réu e o Rei (The Accused and the King). Launched on 22 May 2014, it discussed the lawsuit and contained new information on the singer. In the past, Carlos had also banned publication of a Master's degree thesis on Jovem Guarda, the musical movement in which he participated in the mid-1960s. In the 1980s, he had also obstructed the publication of magazine articles about him.

[Sources: Patrícia Araújo, "Editora aceita recolher livro de Roberto Carlos, que desiste de indenização," Notícias da Globo (7 April 2007); Pedro Caldas, personal communication (26 December 2010); Index on Censorship, 2013, no. 3, 133–135; Simone Marques, "Brazil's Banned Biographies: When Public Figures Want to Control the Message," Index on Censorship (16 July 2014; https://www.ifex.org/brazil/2014/07/16/banned_biographies/?utm_source=whatcounts&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=itw_16july2014).]

In May 2012, a national truth commission began investigating the systematic human rights violations that occurred during military rule (1964–1985), which included extrajudicial killings, forced disappearances, torture, arbitrary detention, and the curtailment of free expression. The perpetrators of these crimes had been shielded from justice by a 1979 amnesty law. In April 2010, the Brazilian Supreme Court reaffirmed the interpretation of lower courts that the amnesty barred most prosecutions of state agents for these cases. However, six months later, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that this interpretation violated Brazil's obligations under international law, and that the amnesty should not be an obstacle to prosecuting serious human rights violations committed under military rule.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 221.]

On 28 May 2013, historian Dulce Pandolfi (1949–) testified before the Rio de Janeiro branch of the National Truth Commission about her torture in 1970–1971. In 1968, Pandolfi, then a politically active student of social sciences at the Federal University of Pernambuco, Recife, joined the Ação Libertadora Nacional (ALN), a left-wing armed organization. In 1970 she was persecuted and fled to Rio de Janeiro, where on 20 August 1970, she was arrested. During her detention at the Destacamento de Operações de Informações–Centro de Operações de Defesa Interna (DOI-CODI; Department of Information Operations–Center for Internal Defense Operations) in Rio, she was tortured for more than three months. In December 1970, she was transferred to Talavera Bruce prison, where she stayed for almost six months. Then she was transferred to a prison in Recife, where she was conditionally released on 14 December 1971. She became a historian specialized in Brazilian political history and political sociology. She was a researcher of the CPDOC (Centro de Pesquisa e Documentação de História Contemporânea do Brasil of the Fundação Getúlio Vargas) from 1978 to 2013. On 6 September 2013, the CPDOC director summarily dismissed her because she did not submit a report of her recent activities as she was to reach the retirement age a few months later.

[Sources: “Abaixo-assinado Carta de Solidariedade a Dulce Pandolfi e outros pesquisadores do CPDOC-FGV” (<http://www.peticaopublica.com.br/?pi=P2013N43949>; 6 September 2013); Dulce Pandolfi, “Íntegra do depoimento da historiadora Dulce Pandolfi à Comissão Estadual da Verdade do Rio de Janeiro” (30 May 2013; <http://racismoambiental.net.br/2013/05/integra-do-depoimento-da-historiadora-dulce-pandolfi-a-comissao-estadual-da-verdade-do-rio-de-janeiro/>).]

BULGARIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2002, 2006, 2009, 2012.

In [August 2013], the government dismissed Martin Ivanov, director of the State Archives since 2011, and appointed Ivan Komitski, a retired official from the State Agency for National Security, in his place. In an open letter sent to Prime Minister Plamen Oresharski, 56 academics protested the reshuffle. Ivanov had started the digitization of records and uploaded Politburo files on to the internet as well as the police files of communist dictator Todor Zhivkov (1911–1998) and others. As an employee of the interior ministry archives service in 1990, Komitski had helped carry out orders to destroy the files from the communist-era secret State Security Service (DS; Darzhavna Sigurnost).

[Source: “Bulgarian Historians Protest State Archives Reshuffle,” Sofia Globe (<http://sofiaglobe.com/2013/09/02/bulgarian-historians-protest-state-archives-reshuffle>; 2 September 2013).]

In October 2013, the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP) and nationalist party Ataka submitted amendments to the Dossier Act so as to prevent the disclosure of DS records proving the collaboration with the DS of persons who had held senior positions in the civil and military intelligence services since 1991. The amendment aimed at restoring the provision preserving the DS records from disclosure by the Dossier Commission (the body established in 2006 to publicly disclose former DS members holding positions of influence), which had been revoked in late 2012 by the center-right

GERB (Citizens for European Development of Bulgaria) government (2009–2013). In March 2013, the Dossier Commission had uncovered a first set of names, among which the name of the current head of the National Intelligence Service, Dragomir Dimitrov. The military and civil intelligence services did not yet submit their full archives to the Dossier Commission. The BSP reportedly also had plans to move the Dossier Commission under the aegis of the State Archives (see entry above). On 1 February 2014, the Day of Recognition and Honoring of the Victims of the Communist Regime, President Rosen Plevneliev (GERB) called for full disclosure of the DS records and their transfer to the State Archives.

[Sources: “Bulgaria President Urges Opening of Communist-Era State Security Files,” Novinite.com (<http://www.novinite.com/articles/157791/Bulgaria+President+Urges+Opening+of+Communist-Era+State+Security+Files>); “Bulgaria to Reintroduce Ban on Disclosure of Communist-Era State Security Files of Senior Intelligence Officers,” Sofia Globe (6 October 2013); “Bulgarian Socialist Party MPs Mulling Moves to Muzzle Dossier Commission—Reports,” Sofia Globe (20 October 2013).]

BURKINA FASO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2004, 2005, 2013.

See Guinea.

BURUNDI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2013.

In late 2013, parliament had not yet adopted a draft law establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission to cover crimes committed since 1962, despite assurances by President Pierre Nkurunziza that the commission would be established by the end of 2012. The draft law did not provide for the establishment of a special tribunal to prosecute those accused of the most serious offenses. On 17 April 2014, the ruling CNDD-FDD (Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie–Forces pour la défense de la démocratie; National Council for the Defense of Democracy–Forces for the Defense of Democracy) party voted to launch the commission and let Nkurunziza select its members. Opposition parties said that this would shield the CNDD-FDD from accountability for past crimes.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 88; Patrick Nduwimana, “Burundi Creates Reconciliation Body that Divides Public Opinion,” (18 April 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/04/18/us-burundi-politics-idUSBREA3H0E020140418>).]

CAMBODIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2013.

The United Nations-assisted Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) continued to suffer the long-term effects of government obstruction of, and non-cooperation with efforts to bring leaders of the Khmer Rouge to justice for genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes committed during their rule from 1975 to 1979. The ECCC had fully tried and convicted only one person since it was established in 2006, the head of the Tuol Sleng torture center, Deuch. It was currently trying two Khmer Rouge senior leaders, Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan, both elderly and in ill-health, and only for a few of the crimes for which the ECCC originally indicted them in 2010. Another ECCC indictee, Leng Sary, died on 14 March 2013. Government non-cooperation slowed United Nations investigations into five other suspects begun in 2006, one of whom died in 2013. Popular interest and support for the ECCC had greatly waned. (On 7 August 2014, Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan were convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment.)

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 317.]

On 7 June 2013, the National Assembly approved the Law Against Non-recognition of the Crimes Committed during the Democratic Kampuchea. “Non-recognition” included “downplaying,” “denying,” “disputing” or “lauding” the existence of these crimes. This “memory law,” which had still to be approved by the Senate, was first proposed by Prime Minister Hun Sen on 27 May 2013 after the president of the opposition party Cambodian National Rescue Party, Kem Sokha, allegedly claimed that Khmer Rouge atrocities were actually staged in Vietnam—an allegation the latter denied. The law was seen as a tool of the government to curb political opposition and thwart historical research contradicting official views. It was criticized for criminalizing the broad range of expressions considered as “public non-recognition of the crimes committed during the Democratic Kampuchea period” and for imposing a harsh regime of penalties.

[Source: Article 19, Cambodia: Law Against Non-Recognition of the Crimes Committed during Democratic Kampuchea: Legal Analysis (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/to/318.pdf>; June 2013).]

See also Thailand.

CAMEROON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2012–2013.

Sometime between 23 and 24 March 2013, unidentified men abducted filmmaker Richard Fouofie Djimeli from his home. On 3 April 2013, he was found alive, though one of his fingers was amputated. The director and actors from his film 139...Les derniers prédateurs (139...The Last Predators) received death threats weeks before the film's launch. The film, about a 139-year-old totalitarian regime in an imaginary country named Chimpanz, satirized Paul Biya's regime, which had held power in Cameroon since 1982.

[Source: Article 19, Artistic Censorship Report: Filmmaker Abducted, Street Artists Fined (http://www.ifex.org/international/2013/05/14/artistic_censorship; 14 May 2013).]

CANADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000, 2002–2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2009, 2012–2013.

In 2008, the government created a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to investigate how between the 1870s and 1996 it removed about 150,000 indigenous children from their homes and sent them to church-run schools, where many suffered physical and sexual abuse and about 4,100 died. Its mandate included to hold public hearings where victims could tell their stories, collect records and establish a National Research Centre. The TRC sued the government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper because it transferred only part of the relevant material available in the Library and Archives Canada. On 30 January 2013, the court ordered the government to provide millions of school-related documents to the TRC. In early 2014, no steps were taken for the transfer, which imperiled the submission of the TRC report by June 2015.

In 2013, the federal government apologized for the residential school system of the 1800s and 1900s. Approximately 150,000 indigenous children had been removed from their families and communities and placed in the schools, where they had been forbidden to speak their own languages or practice their culture. Many had also suffered physical and sexual abuse. In 2013, information surfaced indicating that some children in residential schools in the 1940s and 1950s had been subjected to medical experimentation.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 639–640; Mark Kennedy (Postmedia News), “Documents Delay Hampers Truth, Reconciliation Process: Residential Schools Scandal; Approval Hasn’t Been Granted for Estimated $14-Million Retrieval Job,” Montreal Gazette

(<http://www.montrealgazette.com/news/Documents+delay+hampers+truth+reconciliation+process/9479485/story.html>; 7 February 2014).]

On 9 March 2014, historian Veronica Strong-Boag claimed that she was censored by the Canadian Museum for Human Rights in Winnipeg after her blog post on International Women's Day she was invited to write was first posted and then removed from the museum's website. The museum said that the blog post was politicized as it criticized the conservative's government "anti-woman" record rather than giving personal experiences. Strong-Boag posted her article on the website ActiveHistory.ca instead.

[Source: "Female Historian Says Human Rights Museum Censored Her," CBC News

(<http://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/manitoba/female-historian-says-human-rights-museum-censored-her-1.2565885>; 9 March 2014).]

See also India, Rwanda.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2009, 2011–2012.

The Central African Republic first accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) in 2001, when it became a state party to the Rome Statute. On 22 December 2004, the government went one step further and referred the situation in the country to the ICC prosecutor, after a Bangui court of appeals ruled that domestic courts were unable to prosecute grave international crimes effectively. In 2007, the ICC opened an investigation into crimes committed during the 2002–2003 civil war. The investigation led so far to only one case, that of Jean-Pierre Bemba Gombo, a Congolese national and former vice-president of the Democratic Republic Congo. Bemba and his Mouvement pour la Libération du Congo (Movement for Liberation of Congo) forces were invited to the Central African Republic in 2002 by then-President Ange-Félix Patassé to support resistance of a coup attempt by François Bozizé. Bemba was currently on trial at the ICC for war crimes and crimes against humanity. ICC Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda continued to monitor developments in the country and indicated that she might exercise jurisdiction over more recent crimes. She issued public statements on 22 April and 7 August 2013, warning those responsible for recent abuses that their crimes may fall under the ICC's jurisdiction and that her office would investigate and prosecute those most responsible for committing serious crimes "if necessary."

On 22 May 2013, a presidential decree established a national commission of inquiry to investigate human rights violations committed since 2002 and to identify the persons most responsible for these crimes. The commission, comprising judges, human rights defenders, and police officers, was also tasked with identifying individual victims and assessing levels of damage for eventual compensation. The commission was initially incapable of doing its work due to a lack of funding, but in September 2013 it received technical assistance and vehicles from the government to conduct investigations. Some civil society actors questioned the ability of a national commission to achieve results and called for the establishment of an international commission of inquiry.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 92, 94.]

CHAD

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

CHILE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2013.

In an interview prior to the 40th anniversary of the 11 September 1973 military coup, President Sebastián Piñera acknowledged civilian complicity in abuses under the dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet (1973–1990), stating that “there are many who were passive accomplices [of human rights violations], who knew and did nothing, or did not want to know.” The National Association of Magistrates of the Judiciary made an apology for the action of its members under the military regime. The chief justice publicly acknowledged that the Supreme Court failed during the dictatorship to act against human rights violations and to protect victims. In September 2013, he announced that the appellate judges in Santiago who were responsible for trying perpetrators of abuses committed during the dictatorship would be ordered to dedicate themselves exclusively to these cases.

The chief justice had stated in March 2013 that 1,104 cases of human rights violations were under adjudication by the courts. According to the human rights program of the Ministry of the Interior, a party to 837 of these cases, as of September 2013 courts had convicted 355 perpetrators, 262 of whom had received a final sentence. Sixteen of those convicted had held the rank of general in the armed forces or police and 39 had been colonels before retirement. Sixty-six were serving sentences in prison. Nevertheless, as of July 2013, only 33 cases of torture—a systematic practice under Augusto Pinochet’s dictatorial regime—were under adjudication, according to the Human Rights Observatory of Diego Portales University, which monitored the progress of trials for dictatorship-era abuses. In many cases, the Supreme Court used its discretionary powers to issue lenient sentences against officials who committed serious human rights abuses by arguing that significant time had elapsed since the criminal act. In other cases, the court commuted the sentences of others previously convicted for such crimes. These practices raised concerns about Chile's fulfillment of its obligation to hold accountable perpetrators of crimes against humanity by imposing appropriate punishments or sanctions.

[Sources: BBC News (4 September 2013); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 226–227.]

CHINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2013.

According to many historians, China had gradually restricted scholarly access to its historical archives—including the Chinese Communist Party [CCP] archives, the Second Historical Archives of China in Nanjing (collecting official archives from the Republic of China period [1912–1949]), and the foreign ministry archives) since January 2013 with the excuse of having to digitize them. Some believed that the restrictions were related to heightened sensitivity over historical claims in the East China Sea: an article in a Japanese newspaper in December 2012 had quoted a 1950s document from the Chinese foreign ministry archives which apparently used the Japanese name Senkaku for the Diaoyu Islands, appearing to undermine China's historical claims. Others thought that it was due to control of the historical image of the CCP and to less tolerance for criticism of Mao Zedong's conduct.

[Source: Yojana Sharma, "China Restricts Academic Access to Historical Archives," University World News (<http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140311231740373>; 14 March 2014).]

2012 films like Argo (a film on the 1979 hostage crisis in Iran, see NCH Annual Report 2013) and Zero Dark Thirty (A chronicle of the hunt for al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden) were banned, the former because China maintained good relations with Iran, the latter because it was against the war in Iraq.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (16 October 2013), C3.]

On 13 May 2013, the General Office of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party

(CCP) issued a secret memorandum, “Concerning the Situation in the Ideological Sphere” (sometimes called Document no. 9), inspired by CCP Secretary-General Xi Jinping and presenting a “Seven Speak-Not” policy in the wake of, inter alia, the confrontation at the Southern Weekly [see NCH Annual Report 2013]. It banned teaching or discussing seven topics at universities, including “historical mistakes by the Communist Party” (such as the Cultural Revolution of 1966–1976 or the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre). Other topics were Western constitutional democracy, universal values of human rights, freedom of the press, civil society, the privileged capitalist class, and judicial independence. While not overtly enforced, the topics created a chilling effect on campuses. The memo was also seen as an attempt to defend the legacy of Mao Zedong. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Sources: Chris Buckley, “China Takes Aim at Western Ideas,” New York Times (19 August 2013; http://www.nytimes.com/2013/08/20/world/asia/chinas-new-leadership-takes-hard-line-in-secret-memo.html?pagewanted=all&_r=2&); Oiwan Lam, “Chinese Government Bans Seven ‘Speak-Not’ Subjects,” Global Voices (<http://globalvoicesonline.org/2013/05/16/chinese-government-bans-seven-speak-not-school-subjects>; 16 May 2013); Nozomu Hayashi, “Chinese Authorities Ban Human Rights, Political Discussions at Universities,” Asahi Shimbun (<http://ajw.asahi.com/article/asia/china/AJ201305120046>; 12 May 2013); Yojana Sharma, “Crackdown on Academics in Ideology Campaign,” University World News (30 August 2013).]

In June 2013, Xia Yeliang, an economics professor at Beijing University since 2000 and one of the first Charter '08 signatories, was told by a CCP official that he would face a faculty vote on whether he would be dismissed. No reason was mentioned but most thought it was linked to his liberal political views and his outspoken criticism of the government. Since 2009, he had made a series of remarks in favor of free speech and constitutional governance. In 2009 he had written an open letter to Liu Yunshan, the then director of the CCP propaganda department (and since 2012 a member of the Politburo Standing Committee), calling for an end to state censorship. The state-run Global Times newspaper published an editorial stating that Xia had failed to pass a teaching evaluation and that his liberal beliefs were “in conflict with mainstream values.” A visiting scholar at Stanford University in California, where he taught classes in American economic history and institutional economics, Xia said that he wanted to return to Beijing to fight the expulsion. In September 2013, more than hundred faculty members at Wellesley College, United States, urged Beijing University in an open letter not to expel Xia. In October 2013, Beijing University School of Economics voted to terminate Xia’s contract on 31 January 2014 in a 30–3 vote, with one abstention, officially for “poor teaching.” [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Sources: Patrick Boehler, “Liberal Peking University Professor Threatened with Expulsion,” South China Morning Post (8 July 2013); Ian Wilhelm, “Peking U. Fires Scholar, Threatening Academic Freedom and Wellesley Ties,” Chronicle of Higher Education (18 October 2013); Amy Li, “Don’t Expel Liberal Professor, US Academics Urge Peking University,” South China Morning Post (12 September 2013); “Professor Says He May Be Fired in Political Crackdown,” Chronicle of Higher Education (14 September 2013); South China Morning Post (23 October 2013).]

In July 2013, Zhu Jianrong ([1957–]), a Chinese professor of international relations and history based at Toyo Gakuen University in Tokyo, was detained in Shanghai. He was released on 17 January 2014. He was questioned for months about materials he had gathered as a researcher of modern history and his role in promoting Japanese-Chinese relations (he was the chairman of the Society of Chinese Professors in Japan).

[Sources: “Chinese Scholar Detained in Home Country Returns to Japan,” Asahi Shimbun (1 March 2014; http://ajw.asahi.com/article/behind_news/social_affairs/AJ201403010029); Jane Perlez, “China Is Said to Be Holding a Professor Based in Japan,” New York Times (1 October 2013; http://www.nytimes.com/2013/10/02/world/asia/china-is-said-to-be-holding-professor-over-his-activities-in-japan.html?_r=2&); Yojana Sharma, “China Restricts Academic Access to Historical Archives,” University World News (14 March 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140311231740373>).]

On 21 August 2013, the Public Security Ministry announced the detention of Yang Xiuyu, founder of the online promotion company Beijing Erma Interactive Marketing and Planning, employee Qin Zhihui and two others for slanderous Internet postings which questioned the frugality of the model soldier Lei Feng (1940–1962). Lei had been promoted as a model of humility and selflessness for the past four decades (including on a “Learn from Lei Feng” day).

[Source: “Questioning of Lei Feng’s Frugality Leads to Detention,” Wall Street Journal (21 August 2013; <http://blogs.wsj.com/chinarealtime/2013/08/21/four-detained-for-questioning-lei-fengs-frugality>).]

On 10 September 2013 (fifteen months before the end of his sentence), freelance journalist and poet Shi Tao ([1975–]) was released. [See NCH Annual Reports 2005 and 2007; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/56.pdf>.]

[Source: PEN, News Release (10 September 2013).]

On 26 October 2013, a 12-minute projection sequence depicting historical stages such as the Ming Dynasty (1368–1644), Qing Dynasty (1644–1911), the provisional Republic of China (1937–1940) and the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), was cut from a production of the Hong Kong Ballet. The Ballet denied that the cuts were political self-censorship.

[Source: Article 19, Artistic Freedom Report (19 November 2013).]

On 13 November 2013, the blogs written by liberal historian Zhang Lifan (1950–) and containing critical remarks about the lack of political reform in China, were simultaneously removed from a number of large Chinese portals. In September 2013, a campaign had been initiated to punish the online posting of libelous messages, of which Zhang may have been the first victim. Zhang was educated at the Institute of Modern History of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences (CASS).

[Sources: Chris Luo, “‘I Am like a Ghost Now,’ Says Censored Outspoken Scholar Zhang Lifan,” South China Morning Post (<http://www.scmp.com/news/china-insider/article/1355832/i-am-ghost-now-says-censored-outspoken-scholar-zhang-lifan>; 14 November 2013); NRC Handelsblad (13 November 2013); Wikipedia (7 December 2013).]

In December 2013, the Archives Action Group criticized Hong Kong’s inadequate arrangements for safeguarding public records in a complaint it submitted to the Ombudsman. It denounced the fact that no archives law existed and that records were destroyed at a massive rate.

[Sources: Don Brech, “Hong Kong’s Colonial Era Records Remain Intact,” South China Morning Post (8 December 2013); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of January 2014, 4; Howard Winn, “Destruction of Archives Is One More Dirty Government Secret,” South China Morning Post (16 November 2013).]

In February 2014, Xu Yangsheng, the president of the Shenzhen branch of the Chinese University of Hong Kong to be opened in September 2014, said that academic discussion of the Tiananmen Square crackdown in 1989 would not be taboo. He pledged to defend the academic freedom of the new institution.

[Source: Johnny Tam, “Tiananmen Won’t Be Taboo at New CUHK-Shenzhen Campus, Says President,” South China Morning Post (<http://www.scmp.com/news/hong-kong/article/1422223/tiananmen-wont-be-taboo-new-cuhk-shenzhen-campus-says-president>; 7 February 2014).]

On 7 March 2014, the Japan-based Chinese-born historian and political philosopher Wang Ke ([1956–]), a specialist in the history of modern Chinese philosophy at the Graduate School of Intercultural Studies at Kobe University, Japan, was detained by police in Quanzhou, Fujian Province, during a trip to China to conduct interviews among Muslim minorities. He was released on 24 March 2014. In 1996, his book about the Uighur independence movement during the 1930s and 1940s had been awarded the Suntory Prize for Social Sciences and Humanities.

[Sources: “Kobe University Chinese Scholar Goes Missing in China,” Asahi Shimbun (22 March 2014; http://ajw.asahi.com/article/behind_news/social_affairs/AJ201403220037); “Wang Ke,” Scholars At Risk Academic Freedom Monitor Digest (March-May 2014) (<http://monitoring.academicfreedom.info/reports/2014-03-07-university-kobe>).]

On 3 May 2014, at least 15 people—writers, scholars, activists—held a seminar at a private residence (the “2014 workshop on Beijing’s June 4”) in Beijing to commemorate the upcoming 25th anniversary of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre. In a statement released after the meeting, they called on the Chinese government to launch an official investigation into the events and to compensate the victims. On 4 and 5 May 2014, some of the participants were taken in for questioning by police. Most were released after interrogation, but at least five were criminally detained for “creating a disturbance in a public place, causing serious disorder.” They included university lecturer, political activist and dissident writer Hu Shigen [see NCH Annual Reports 2008–2009], Xu Youyu, a noted historian and research fellow of the CASS Institute of Philosophy, dissident blogger Liu Di [see NCH Annual Reports 2003–2004], Hao Jian, a professor at the Beijing Film Academy, and civil rights lawyer Pu Zhiqiang, who was one of the students protesting in Tiananmen Square in 1989. All but Pu were released on bail on 5 June 2014.

[Sources: International PEN, “China: Renewed Crackdown on Writers and Journalists ahead of 25th anniversary of Tiananmen Protests” (7 May 2014); Yojana Sharma, “25 years after Tiananmen, Scholars Protest Detentions,” University World News (23 May 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140523131816311>).]

On 15 May 2014, Chow Po-chung, an associate professor at Chinese University’s department of government and public administration, Hong Kong, had his lecture on freedom and social justice at Sun Yat-sen University in Guangzhou canceled a day after he had shared on social media a photograph of a group of students staging a fast during the 1989 protests at Tiananmen Square in Beijing. The photo was deleted from Weibo, but remained on Chow’s Facebook page. On 23 May 2014, the microblog of Kong Qingdong, professor of Chinese studies at Peking University, was blocked, possibly in response to a comment he posted on the 1989 protests. Kong was a neo-Maoist and reportedly a 73rd-generation descendant of Confucius. A student at Peking University in 1989, he had been a member of his school’s organizing committee then. He was able to resume his academic career after the protests were suppressed.

[Sources: Austin Ramzy, “Tiananmen Comment Eyed after Professor’s Microblog Vanishes” (26 May 2014; <http://sinosphere.blogs.nytimes.com/2014/05/26/tiananmen-comment-eyed-after-professors-microblog-vanishes/>); Jennifer Ngo, “Academic’s Talk on Freedom Cancelled after Sharing Tiananmen Image Online,” South China Morning Post (15 May 2014; <http://www.scmp.com/news/hong-kong/article/1512794/academics-talk-freedom-cancelled-after-> sharing-tiananmen-image-online).]

On 4 June 2014, the 25th anniversary of the Tiananmen Square crackdown on democracy protests, the authorities imposed blanket security in mainland China to prevent attempts to mark the anniversary. On 3 June 2014, United Nations High Commissioner of Human Rights Navi Pillay had called on China to release dozens of activists detained ahead of the anniversary. As in previous years, internet searches related to the Tiananmen massacre were blocked. Some of the relatives of those killed during the massacre were allowed to visit the graves under police guard. In Hong Kong, a large vigil was held on 4 June 2014; it was attended by more than 100,000 mourners. On 26 April 2014, the world's first museum on the 1989 pro-democracy protests, the June 4 Memorial Museum, had opened its doors. By 4 June, it had attracted 7,000 visitors. The museum faced a lawsuit for violating the deeds of the building in which it was housed. Historian Wang Dan [see NCH Annual Reports 1995–1998, 2000, 2009] was forbidden entry in Hong Kong.

[Sources: AFP, “Beijing Targets Artists, Students on Tiananmen Anniversary,” Radio Free Asia (3 June 2014; <http://www.rfa.org/english/news/china/anniversary-06032014173537.html>); Amnesty International, “China’s Tiananmen Anniversary Blackout” (20 May 2014; <http://livewire.amnesty.org/2014/05/20/chinas-tiananmen-anniversary-blackout/>); “H.K. Turns Away Taiwanese Scholar Heading for June 4 Conference,” Global Post (30 May 2014; <http://www.globalpost.com/dispatch/news/kyodo-news-international/140530/hk-turns-away-taiwanese-scholar-heading-june-4-confere>); NRC Handelsblad (4 June 2014), 10–11; Marianna Tzabiras, “How the Chinese Are Taking on the Challenge of Talking about Tiananmen 25 Years Later,” Ifex Alert (4 June 2014; https://www.ifex.org/china/2014/06/04/tiananmen_anniversary/); “Tiananmen Anniversary Marked at Huge Hong Kong Vigil,” BBC News (4 June 2014).]

In July 2014, Elliot Sperling, an American professor of Tibetan history, was denied entry at the airport in Beijing, although he held a one-year visa. Sperling believed that he was being punished for his support of Ilham Tohti, a politically moderate Uighur economics professor under arrest on charges of inciting separatism, but he was not informed why his visa was canceled.

[Source: “Blacklisting Scholars: Editorial,” New York Times (17 July 2014).]

On 7 July 2014, authorities in Hangzhou once more detained writer and human rights activist Lu (Lü) Gengsong (1956–) on suspicion of “incitement to subvert state power,” although according to his wife the real reason for his arrest was his advocacy work on behalf of ordinary people with grievances against the Chinese Communist Party. Others thought that his detention could be linked to recent posts he had made online regarding official corruption and to his reports about petitioners in Jiangsu province. Lu had been detained under similar charges in November 2013. He had been under 24-hour surveillance since February 2014.

A history graduate from Zhejiang University, Hangzhou (1982), Lu taught at the Zhejiang Higher Professional School of Public Security (a police training academy) before being expelled in 1993 because of his pro-democracy activities. He went on to become a freelance writer and he published several books on political reform, including A History of Corruption in the Community Party of China (Hong Kong 2000). He was known for his reporting on human rights violations and his political commentaries published on the Internet. He was also an active member of the China Democracy Party (CDP; banned in 1998). He was imprisoned from 2007 until 2011.

[See also NCH Annual Reports 2008 and 2012; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/50.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/50f1.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/56.pdf>.]

[Source: Gao Shan & Grace Kei Lai-see, “Veteran Chinese Opposition Activist Held on Subversion Charges,” Radio Free Asia (10 July 2014; <http://www.rfa.org/english/news/china/activist-07102014111324.html>).]

See also India, Japan.

COLOMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2004, 2006–2013.

During 2012, two history professors from the Universidad Pedagógica Nacional (National Pedagogic University), Bogotá, were intimidated by means of leaflets containing death threats anonymously distributed on campus and issued by the paramilitary groups “Águilas Negras” (Black Eagles) and the “Bloque Capital de las Autodefensas.” (Self-defense Bloc from the Capital). They were accused of supporting insurgents and encouraging the radical and violent thought of subversive groups from their professorial chairs. One of them, Renán Vega Cantor, left the country in August 2012, the other, Adolfo Atehortúa, dean of the humanities faculty, stayed. A list with “terrorist” students also circulated. Vega Cantor wrote the four-volume Gente muy rebelde: Protesta popular y modernización capitalista en Colombia (1909–1929) (Very Rebellious People: Popular Protest and Capitalist Modernization in Colombia (1909–1929)); Atehortúa wrote Estado y fuerzas armadas en Colombia: 1886–1953 (1994; State and Army in Colombia: 1886–1953), El poder y la sangre: Las historias de Trujillo (Valle) (1995; Power and Blood: The Histories of Trujillo [Valle]) and Sueños de inclusión: Las violencias en Cali, años 80 (1998; Dreams of Inclusion: Violence in Cali, 1980s).

[Sources: César Augusto Duque Sánchez, personal communication (February 2014); “Universidad Pedagógica: en medio de panfletos y amenazas,” Semana (29 November 2012);

<http://www.semana.com/nacion/articulo/universidad-pedagogica-medio-panfletos-amenazas/268589-3>.)]

The administration of President Juan Manuel Santos promoted constitutional changes concerning transitional justice and the military justice system that threatened to ensure impunity for egregious abuses by guerrillas, paramilitaries, and the military. In proceedings before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, the government denied the military's participation in atrocities for which military members had already been convicted in national courts. The Colombian government and Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) guerrillas had been engaged in peace talks in Cuba since 2012. Colombia's internal armed conflict had taken approximately 220,000 lives since 1958, 81.5 percent of whom were civilians, according to a report published in 2013 by the government-created National Center for Historical Memory.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 230.]

Colombia's internal armed conflict (1958–) continued to result in serious abuses by irregular armed groups in 2013, including guerrillas and successor groups to paramilitaries. More than 5 million Colombians were internally displaced, and upward of 150,000 continue to flee their homes each year, generating the world's second largest population of internally displaced persons (IDPs).

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 230.]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2000, 2003–2013.

In December 2012, the International Criminal Court (ICC) acquitted and released Mathieu Ngudjolo Chui, who had been charged with crimes against humanity and war crimes allegedly committed in northeastern Congo in 2003. The trial of Ngudjolo's co-accused, Germain Katanga, continued. On 18 March 2013, Bosco Ntaganda turned himself in to the United States embassy in Kigali, Rwanda, and was flown to The Hague, where he faced charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity at the International Criminal Court (ICC). Sylvestre Mudacumura, the military commander of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda (FDLR), sought on an arrest warrant from the ICC for war crimes, remained at large in late 2013. The Congolese government issued arrest warrants for several leaders of the M23 rebel group. Government officials stated clearly that they would neither provide an amnesty nor integrate into the army those allegedly responsible for war crimes.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 106–107.]

See also Central African Republic, Rwanda, United States.

CONGO (Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

COSTA RICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

CÔTE D'IVOIRE

See Ivory Coast.

CROATIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2001, 2003–2013.

See Bosnia and Herzegovina, France.

CUBA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2002, 2006, 2010–2012.

See Colombia.

CYPRUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2005, 2008–2011, 2013.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2010, 2013.

In mid-May 2013, President Miloš Zeman refused to confer the title of professor upon Martin Putna ([1967–]), a literary historian and scholar of the Catholic church at Charles University, Prague, because he disliked the latter's social activism for gay rights. After a wave of criticism from students and academics, Zeman abandoned his opposition. Putna had openly criticized Zeman before his election as president in January 2013.

[Sources: Blade, "Czech President in University Row over Gay Rights Activist," France 24 (<http://www.france24.com/en/20130521-czech-president-university-row-over-gay-rights-activist>; 21 May 2013); Sean Carney, "Czech President Yields to Pressure, Faces Ire of Cardinal," Wall Street Journal (22 May 2013); Nick DeSantis, "Yielding to Critics, Czech President Won't Block Professor's Appointment," Chronicle of Higher Education (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/ticker/jp/yielding-to-critics-czech-president-wont-block-professors-appointment>; 22 May 2013).]

On or about 31 January 2014, Jiří Fiedler (1935–2014) and his wife Dagmar (1939–2014) were murdered in their apartment in Prague. A non-Jewish translator and copy editor at Albatros (a publisher of children's literature), Fiedler documented the local heritage and history of Jews in the Czech lands. From the 1970s onward, he worked mostly alone, unpaid and anonymous in his spare time. His work aroused the suspicion of the authorities, and he was regularly called in by the secret police. Fiedler repeatedly tried to gain access to the archive of the Jewish Museum in Prague, but it was closely watched by the secret police. Academics researching Jews in Renaissance Prague were able to do their work, but applications by individuals researching more recent history were closely tracked and reported. In 1996, Fiedler became a research director at the Jewish Museum in Prague (1996–2012). He published Židovské památky v Čechách a na Moravě (1992; Jewish Sights of Bohemia and Moravia) and worked on an electronic "Encyclopedia of Jewish Communities in the Czech Republic." The dead bodies were not discovered until two weeks after the murder. The apartment was not forced open and nothing was stolen. The police had no suspect and no motive. An announcement posted on the website of the Jewish Museum of Prague read: "The circumstances of his death have not yet been fully clarified." The funeral was held on 3 March 2014.

[Sources: Helen Epstein, "Eulogy for a Source," New York Times (8 March 2014; http://www.nytimes.com/2014/03/09/opinion/sunday/eulogy-for-a-source.html?_r=1); "Jiří Fiedler (1935–2014)," <http://www.jewishmuseum.cz/aindex.php>; JTA, "Murder of Jiri Fielder, Researcher of Jewish Heritage, Being Probed in Prague" (9 March 2014; opinion/world/murder-of-jiri-fielder-jewish-heritage-researcher-being-probed-in-prague).]

See also Russia, Slovakia.

DENMARK

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2007, 2013.

See Rwanda.

DJIBOUTI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

ECUADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2007, 2009–2013.

Efforts to hold accountable those responsible for human rights violations committed by governments from 1984 to 2008 made significant progress in 2013. In 2010, a special prosecutorial unit was formed to investigate 118 cases involving 456 victims (including 68 victims of extrajudicial execution and 17 of enforced disappearance), which had been documented by a truth commission created by the administration of President Rafael Correa. In 2012, the number of cases under investigation rose to 138. In October 2013, two former government defense ministers and eight retired military and police officers were charged with enforced disappearance and torture in connection with the illegal arrest in 1985 and torture of three people linked to a guerrilla group. As of October 2013, work by a human rights investigative unit attached to the Attorney General's Office had led to charges being filed against 36 government agents in three other cases from the period covered by the truth commission report.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 246.]

EGYPT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2001, 2003, 2006–2007, 2010–2013.

In February 2012, a court in Assiut (Upper Egypt) sentenced Makarem Diab, a Christian school teacher, to six years' imprisonment on charges of defaming Islam brought by Islamist colleagues who accused him of mocking the Prophet Mohammed.

In late September 2012, Nevine Gad, a Coptic social studies teacher at a preparatory school in Manfalout, Assiut province, was suspended from teaching, arrested and charged with contempt of religion and insulting the Prophet Mohammed after a pupil, the latter's Salafist father and some colleagues complained about one of her lessons on Islamic history (taught on 26 September 2012) with a section on Mohammed's life. On 3 October 2012, she was released and reinstated because of lack of evidence. All charges were dropped.

[Sources: Sherry El-Gergawi, "Saga of Coptic teacher 'maliciously' accused of insulting Islam ends," Ahram Online (<http://english.ahram.org/News/54832.aspx>; 5 October 2012); Global Coalition to Protect Education from Attack, Education under Attack 2014 (New York 2014), 135.]

There was no effort to account for the crimes of the Hosni Mubarak era (1981–2011) or those killed by the police and military during and after the January–February 2011 uprising. In January 2013, President Mohamed Morsy received a report by a fact-finding committee he had set up on police and military abuses against protesters, but refused to make its findings or recommendations public. The interim government that took power after the 3 July 2013 coup established a Ministry for Transitional Justice but it took no steps towards accountability. The government failed to set up a fact-finding committee to look into the mass killing of protesters, despite Interim President Adly Mansour’s 8 July 2013 promise to do so.

In a rare case of police accountability, a court in March 2013 sentenced one officer to three years imprisonment for shooting protesters during the protests in Mohamed Mahmoud Street in Cairo in November 2011. Only 5 of the 38 trials of middle and low-ranking police officers accused of killing protesters in January 2011 resulted in prison sentences. Two of them were suspended, so that only two officers served actual prison time. In January 2013, the Court of Cassation overturned the conviction of former president Hosni Mubarak. His retrial opened in May and was ongoing at the end of 2013.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 533–534.]

In 2013, in a very controversial move, Iman Ezzeldin, director of the National Library, and Abdel-Wahed, Sabry El-Daly and Nevine, employees of the Egyptian National Archives (ENA), were dismissed on accusations of corruption. The new ENA director Khaled Fahmy, who announced himself publicly as a Muslim Brotherhood member (and not to be confused with Khaled Fahmy, the head of the history department at the American University in Cairo), defended the dismissal. Employees had claimed that El-Daly had been involved in the theft of documents and Abdel-Wahed (former ENA head) never promoted or fairly rewarded the hard-working employees. Some expressed fears that the Muslim Brotherhood wanted to destroy or confiscate some sensitive archives (like those about the Brotherhood itself). After the coup of 3 July 2013, Ezzeldin and most others got their job back.

[Sources: Joshua Hersh, “The Battle of the Archives: What Egypt’s Intellectuals Lost,” New Yorker (4 September 2013; <http://www.newyorker.com/news/news-desk/the-battle-of-the-archives-what-egypts-intellectuals-lost>); Mary Mourad, “Historian Fahmy Argues for Easing Access to Egyptian National Archives,” Ahram Online (<http://english.ahram.org.eg/NewsContentP/18/74745/Books/Historian-Fahmy-argues-for-easing-access-to-Egypti.aspx>; 24 June 2013).]

In [June] 2013, Monica Hanna ([1983–]), a post-doctoral student of archaeology at Humboldt University, Berlin, was threatened by several men at an ancient burial site because of her campaign to expose the looting of Egyptian antiquities. Antiquity looting had exploded since the 2011 revolution: 2,000 art objects had been stolen, of which 1,000 were reported still missing in 2014. Together with three other women who remained anonymous, Hanna started Egypt’s Heritage Task Force. She was threatened regularly.

[Sources: Betsy Hiel, “Egyptologist Risks Life, Career to Expose Looting,” TribLive (15 June 2013; <http://triblive.com/news/editorspicks/4198483-74/hanna-heritage-archaeological#axzz2WZUhBSED>); “Monica Hanna to Receive 2014 SAFE Beacon Award” (<http://www.savingantiquities.org/2014-beacon-award>; 8 December 2013); NRC Handelsblad (30 January 2014), C12.]

On 24 November 2013, Egyptian-German novelist and teacher of Islamic history Hamid Abdel Samad (1972–) was kidnapped. He reappeared on 26 November 2013. Once an Islamist himself, Samad became a staunch critic of Islamism in Germany (where he had lived since 1995), one of his novels bearing the title “Fall of the Islamic World.” He had been appointed body guards after he was threatened by Islamists in early June 2013. In the summer of 2013, he had held a lecture in Cairo about Islamic fascism, after which a fatwa to kill him had been issued.

[Sources: “Egyptian-German Novelist Hamid Abdel Samad Kidnapped in Cairo” (<http://www.expatcairo.com/egyptian-german-novelist-hamid-abdel-samad-kidnapped-in-cairo>; 25 November 2013); Sonja Zekri, “Hamed Abdel-Samad Verlag sorgt sich um Verbleib von Autor” (<http://www.sueddeutsche.de/kultur/hamed-abdel-samad-im-machtkampf-am-nil-angekommen-1.1828785>; 26 November 2013); Trouw (26 November 2013).]

See also Israel.

EL SALVADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013.

On 30 September 2013, the archbishop of San Salvador, José Luis Escobar Alas, abruptly closed his legal office, Tutela Legal del Arzobispado (founded in 1982 as successor to Socorro Jurídico), leaving the status of its archives containing 50,000 files of documentation of crimes against humanity uncertain. Tutela Legal had brought some of these cases to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, which in 2012 ruled that the 1993 amnesty law violated the international treaties, after which the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court on 20 September 2013 agreed to hear arguments about the constitutionality of the amnesty law. The closure was widely criticized, including by President Mauricio Funes. Although the archbishop and the attorney general reached an agreement about the archives and the Supreme Court ruled that they would be retained by the archdiocese, their fate remained uncertain.

In October 2013, it was reported that the archives of the Co-Madres (Comité de Madres Monseñor Romero; Mothers' Committee Archbishop Romero), a non-governmental association of mothers and relatives of those disappeared and/or killed during the military regime and the armed conflict (1979–1992), set up in 1977, had been stolen five times.

On 14 November 2013, armed men broke into the offices of Pro-Búsqueda (a non-governmental organization [founded in 1994] working to locate children missing from the armed conflict), stole its computers and set fire to its archives containing 1,200 cases. About 80% of the archives were destroyed. The government's special prosecutor for human rights condemned the attack.

The International Council on Archives wrote to archbishop Escobar Alas asking that the records of Tutela Legal be preserved and to the special prosecutor for human rights, urging that those who had destroyed the records of Pro-Búsqueda be held accountable.

[Sources: Frederick B. Mills, "El Salvador: Closure of Human Rights Office Threatens Vital Archives," Latin American Bureau (8 October 2013; <http://lab.org.uk/el-salvador-closure-of-human-rights-office-threatens-vital-archives>); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of October 2013, 7; News of November 2013, 1, 9; News of December 2013, 2; International Center for Transitional Justice, "Twenty Years Later, A Chance for Accountability in El Salvador" (1 October 2013); Sarah Maslin, "El Salvador—Destruction of Historical Memory," Latin American Bureau (1 December 2013; <http://lab.org.uk/destruction-of-historical-and-human-rights-archives>).]

ERITREA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008.

ESTONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2010.

ETHIOPIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2011.

FIJI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006, 2010.

FINLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

FRANCE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1999, 2001–2009, 2011–2013.

In 2012, the project of a major exhibition about writer Albert Camus (1913–1960) in Aix-en-Provence was delayed because its curator, Benjamin Stora (1950–), a historian of colonial Algeria, was dismissed (after working on the exhibit since 2009) and his successor, philosopher Michel Onfray, a biographer of Camus, withdrew from the project in September 2012. Among the reasons mentioned for Stora's dismissal (brought about by the conservative mayor of Aix, Maryse Joissains-Masini) were his reported intention to emphasize Camus's problematic status as a "French" writer (being born on North African soil) and his identity as a pied-noir (a former settler in Algeria who had returned to France) who opposed both the Organisation de l'armée secrète (OAS; the terrorist Secret Army Organization) and the Algerian Front de Libération Nationale (FLN; National Liberation Front).

[Sources: Simon Buisson, "Camus Exhibit Sparks Controversy" (23 August 2012); Le Monde (15 & 17 September 2012); Delphine Munos, "Who's Afraid of Albert Camus? The Memorialization of French Algeria and the Controversy over Camus' Legacy" (<http://orbi.ulg.ac.be/handle/2268/150214>; 23 March 2013); NRC Handelsblad (8 November 2013).]

In August 2013, the Barreau de Paris (the association of lawyers) intervened to stop the sale by the Drouot auction house of the professional notes of Jacques Vergès (1925–2013), who had been the lawyer for Gestapo leader Klaus Barbie during the latter's war crimes trial in 1987. The lawyers argued that the principle of professional secret (lawyer-client confidentiality) made it unacceptable to sell the notes and said that the historically significant papers of attorneys could be stored properly in the association's museum.

[Sources: International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of June 2014, 5; "Procès Barbie: des avocats obtiennent le retrait de la vente d'archives de Jacques Vergès," Le

Progrès (29 July 2014; <http://www.leprogres.fr/rhone/2014/06/19/proces-barbie-des-avocats-obtiennent-le-retrait-de-la-vente-d-archives-de-jacques-verges>.)]

In October 2013, following a complaint of the Council of Croats in France (CRICCF), United States singer and song writer Bob Dylan (1941–), who visited France to receive an award, was placed under judicial investigation on charges of “public injury” and “incitement to racial hatred” toward Croats. In September 2012, Dylan had given an interview to Rolling Stone magazine, in which he allegedly compared the relationship between Jews and Nazis to that of Serbs and Croats. He reportedly said: “Blacks know that some whites didn’t want to give up slavery—that if they had their way, they would still be under the yoke, and they can’t pretend they don’t know that. If you got a slave master or [Ku Klux] Klan in your blood, blacks can sense that. That stuff lingers to this day. Just like Jews can sense Nazi blood and the Serbs can sense Croatian blood.” The latter was interpreted as a reference to the crimes committed by the Ustasha Independent State of Croatia state (Nezavisna Drava Hrvatska or NDH; 1941–1945). Several Croatian radio stations stopped playing his songs in protest over his comments.

[Sources: Article 19, “France: Bob Dylan Charged with Incitement to Racial Hatred”

(https://www.ifex.org/international/2014/02/12/artist_alert/; London 12 February 2014); BBC News (2 December 2013).]

See also Rwanda, Saint Vincent, Switzerland.

GEORGIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2003, 2010–2012.

In response to over 20,000 complaints about alleged past abuses, the authorities charged 35 former officials from a variety of ministries with, inter alia, abuse of office, embezzlement, and false arrest; 14 of them were in custody at the end of 2013. The authorities did not explain the criteria they used to determine which cases of past abuses to investigate. While investigating past abuses prosecutors questioned over 6,000 persons.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 455.]

GERMANY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–2000, 2003, 2006–2013.

See Egypt, France, Palestinian Authority, Poland, Russia.

GHANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2004–2008.

GREECE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2004–2011, 2013.

When in June 2013, historian and history textbook author Maria Repousi (Repoussi), then a member of parliament for the Democratic Left, stated that “the Dance of Zalongo” was a national myth, she was attacked by composer Mikis Theodorakis, who called her viewpoint a form of “national nihilism.” The term Dance of Zalongo referred to an event in Greek history involving a mass suicide of women from Souli and their children during the Souliote War of 1803, near the village of Zalongo in Epirus. The name also referred to a popular dance-song commemorating the event. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2007–2008.]

[Source: Maria Korologou, “Theodorakis to Repousi: Leave If You Don’t Love Greece”

(greece.greekreporter.com/2013/06/03/theodorakis-to-repousi-leave-if-you-dont-love-greece; 3 June 2013).]

GRENADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2013.

In a landmark ruling, former head of state Efraín Ríos Montt was found guilty in May 2013 of genocide and crimes against humanity, and sentenced to 80 years' imprisonment. The retired general led a military regime from 1982 to 1983 that carried out hundreds of massacres of unarmed civilians. However, the verdict was overturned 10 days later, when the Constitutional Court ruled that all proceedings in the final three weeks of the trial had been invalid due to irregularities relating to an incident in March, when Ríos Montt was briefly without his own defense attorney. The case would likely have to be retried in full, with witnesses testifying once more before a different criminal court. Proceedings were scheduled to begin in January 2015. In November 2013, representatives of the victims filed a petition before the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights, accusing the Guatemalan state of failing to provide justice in the case. Ríos Montt's defense made repeated requests for the former leader to be protected from prosecution under amnesty legislation. In April 2013, while the genocide trial was ongoing, President Otto Pérez Molina expressed his support for a public letter signed by a group of prominent politicians that called genocide charges against members of the army a "fabrication," and said that the charges endangered peace.

Ríos Montt was also charged in a separate case involving a 1982 massacre in the town of Dos Erres, in the Petén region, in which soldiers murdered more than 250 people, including children. Proceedings, which were ongoing, were delayed by legal challenges from Ríos Montt's lawyers. Five former members of army special forces received lengthy prison sentences for their role in the Dos Erres massacre, while several high-level former members of the security forces were convicted in recent years of human rights crimes committed in previous decades. They included former National Police Chief Hector Bol de la Cruz, who received a 40-year sentence in September 2013 for ordering the disappearance of a student activist in 1984.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 249–250.]

GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2013.

The domestic investigation into members of the security forces implicated in the September 2009 massacre of some 150 people and the rape of over 100 women during the military regime of Moussa Dadis Camara had yet to conclude. In 2010, the then-government committed to bringing the perpetrators to justice, and a Guinean prosecutor appointed a panel of three judges to investigate the crimes. The panel made important strides, having interviewed more than 300 victims and charged at least eight suspects including several high-level members of the security forces. However, progress continued to be stymied by insufficient government support, including its failure to place high-level suspects on leave from their government posts pending investigation and to satisfactorily resolve the judges' outstanding request to question the former Guinean president, who was living in Burkina Faso. Some suspects had been in pretrial detention longer than the two years Guinean law permits.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 125.]

During 2013, the “Reflection Commission,” created by presidential decree in June 2011 to promote reconciliation, made no visible progress in fulfilling its mandate. The interim co-presidents appeared to limit its mandate to promoting reconciliation largely through prayer, while local human rights groups pushed for a commission that could meaningfully address impunity. Progress in setting up the independent human rights institution, as mandated by the 2010 constitution, was undermined by delays in holding legislative elections; the constitution stipulated that the institution could only be established through a law voted on by the national assembly. While the Ministry for Human Rights and Civil Liberties, newly created in 2012, lacked resources, the minister actively advocated for strengthening the judiciary, an end to impunity for abuses, and respect for freedom of the press.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 126.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2012.

GUYANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997.

See Saint Vincent.

HAITI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2000–2003, 2006, 2008–2009, 2013.

Former President Jean-Claude Duvalier returned to Haiti in January 2011 after nearly 25 years in exile. He was charged with financial and human rights crimes allegedly committed during his 15-year tenure as president. From 1971 to 1986, Duvalier commanded a network of security forces that committed serious human rights violations, including arbitrary detentions, torture, disappearances, summary executions, and forced exile. In January 2012, the investigating judge in the case found, contrary to international standards, that the statute of limitations prevented prosecuting Duvalier for his human rights crimes. On 20 February 2014, however, the Court of Appeals ordered the reopening of the investigation into human rights abuses. It concluded that international law was part of Haitian domestic law, and that, therefore, statutory limitations did not apply to crimes against humanity. In May 2014, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights called on the member states of the Organization of American States to open their archives on the human rights violations committed under Duvalier's regime so as to make possible the right of access to justice for his victims.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 256; Human Rights Watch, "Haiti: Duvalier Ruling Disappoints Justice" (31 January 2012); "Press Release: IACHR Calls on Member States to Open their Archives on the Human Rights Violations Committed under the Regime of Jean-Claude Duvalier" (http://www.oas.org/en/iachr/media_center/PReleases/2014/048.asp; 5 May 2014).]

HONDURAS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998, 2001–2002, 2009–2013.

Following the June 2009 military coup, the de facto government (ruling from June 2009 to January 2010) suspended key civil liberties, including freedom of the press and assembly. In the ensuing days, security forces responded to generally peaceful demonstrations with excessive force and shut down opposition media outlets, which caused several deaths, scores of injuries, and thousands of arbitrary detentions. A truth commission established by President Porfirio Lobo (in power from January 2010 to January 2014) published a report in July 2011 that documented 20 cases of excessive use of force and killings by security forces. Honduras made very little progress prosecuting the abuses in 2013.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 261–262.]

In 2013, individuals working for the Ministry of Culture reportedly “denounced the theft of documents and cultural relics, as well as the censorship of [...] historical documents.”

[Source: International PEN, Honduras: Journalism in the Shadow of Impunity (London: International PEN, 2014), 55.]

In August 2013, the mayor of Danlí banned the installation of a statue made by sculptor Johnny Mac Donald in a public park because he deemed its subject—a depiction the Mayan corn goddess Yum Kaax—sacrilegious. He called it a diabolic figure.

[Source: International PEN, Honduras: Journalism in the Shadow of Impunity (London: International PEN, 2014), 54.]

HONG KONG

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996. See China.

HUNGARY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997, 2004, 2007–2013.

In March 2013, the far-right political party Jobbik sued historian and Holocaust researcher László Karsai [see also NCH Annual Report 2010] for defamation because he had labeled Jobbik “neo-Nazi” in a television program. The Budapest District Court ruled that Jobbik did not hold Nazi views per se in historical terms, portraying itself not as neo-Nazi but rather as a national radical Christian conservative party. It found Karsai’s statement “gratuitously offensive.”

[Source: Tamás Szigeti, “Why Shouldn’t a Hungarian Historian Call Jobbik “Neo-Nazi”?” Free Speech Debate (18 July 2013).]

On 12 January 2014, the deputy leader of the governing allied Christian Democrats (KDNP), Bence Retvari, called on the opposition Socialist Party to transfer their communist-era documents (1944–1989), stored in the archives of the Institute of Political History (PTI; established by the Socialists), to the Hungarian National Archives. He said that the 2012 amendment to the archives law obliged the PTI to hand over the documents to the archives because it defined documents filed in 1944–1989 as state property. On 11 June 2014, the Supreme Court rejected the PTI appeal and ordered the transfer.

[Sources: MTI, “KDNP Calls on Socialists to Hand over Communist Era Files”

(<http://www.politics.hu/20140112/kdnp-calls-on-socialists-to-hand-over-communist-era-files/>; 12 January 2014); MTI, “Pre-1989 Communist Documents to Be Transferred to National Archives,” (<http://www.politics.hu/20140612/pre-1989-communist-documents-to-be-transferred-to-national-archives>; 12 June 2014).]

INDIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1997, 2000–2013.

In 2013, some Tamil Nadu politicians claimed that the Nadar community was depicted in a poor light in a social science textbook of the National Council for Educational Research and Training (NCERT) for Class IX, India and the Contemporary World-1. A chapter entitled “Clothing: A Social History” mentioned that the Nadars were “toddy-tappers” and had migrated to the southern Travancore state in the 19th century to work under Nair landlords. The recommendation of the NCERT’s textbook development committee (that had prepared the book) to delete these references was carried out.

[Source: Basant Kumar Mohanty, “Assam Boy Forces Textbook Revision,” Telegraph (5 February 2014; http://www.telegraphindia.com/1140206/jsp/nation/story_17905703.jsp#.U5gLsShkzAB).]

During the communal violence that erupted in Gujarat state after a train carrying Hindu pilgrims in 2002 caught fire, killing 59 passengers, 230 shrines, tombs and mosques were vandalized or destroyed, including the grave of poet Wali Muhammad (1667–1707) and the Dada Hari and Malik Asin mosques in Ahmedabad. Over 1000 people were killed. In a legal case before a court in Ahmedabad, Gujarat, in August 2013, a lawyer alleged that the Gujarat government had tampered with or destroyed many records about the violence shortly after the Supreme Court had appointed a Special Investigation Team to investigate it.

[Sources: Robert Bevan, The Destruction of Memory: Architecture at War (London 2006), 139; “SIT Overlooked How Modi Govt Destroyed Records, Says Zakia’s Lawyer,” FirstPost (http://www.firstpost.com/india/sit-overlooked-how-modi-govt-destroyed-records-says-zakias-lawyer-1065097.html?utm_source=hp-footer; 27 August 2013).

On 3 March 2010, Dinanath Batra (1942–), national convener of the Hindu nationalist group Shiksha Bachao Aandolan Samiti (SBAS; Save Education Movement), sent a legal notice to Wendy Doniger, the Mircea Eliade distinguished service professor of the history of religions at the University of Chicago, and the Penguin Group with the request to withdraw certain passages of her book The Hindus: An Alternative History (New York: The Penguin Press, 2009). According to him, the book’s malicious intent was to ridicule, hurt and defame the Hindus, denigrate the Hindu traditions, create and spread pornographic and hate literature, and create disharmony and promote enmity among various religious sections of India. He also demanded that Doniger issue an apology. Seven petitioners brought a civil case in 2011 against Penguin India (on the basis of sections 153A, 298 and 295A of the Indian Penal Code allowing people to seek legal redress on grounds of their religious or ethnic sensibilities being offended) arguing that Doninger’s book was insulting to Hindus and heretical. They said that Doniger was incorrect in describing the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) as the militant wing of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) or that it was behind the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948; Gandhi was shot dead by a former RSS member). On 4 February 2014, after it reached an out-of-court settlement with SBAS, Penguin India decided to recall and pulp all copies of the book on Indian territory, saying that it had to respect the law and that it had a duty to protect its employees against threats. The decision was widely criticized. Within hours of being banned, Doniger's book came out online.

In March 2014, SBAS threatened to sue publisher Aleph Books if it did not withdraw Doniger's On Hinduism (a different book than The Hindus). Under pressure from Batra, publisher Orient Blackswan put several books "under review for comprehensive assessment" in May 2014, including Communalism and Sexual Violence: Ahmedabad Since 1969, a study by Megha Kumar of sexual violence perpetrated mostly on Muslim women during riots in Ahmedabad in 1969, 1985 and 2002, and From Plassey to Partition: A History of Modern India by Sekhar Bandyopadhyay (the latter because it allegedly included inflammatory passages about the RSS).

Doniger had also encountered difficulties in the past. After the 2002 publication of the online essay "Wendy's Child Syndrome," written by Rajiv Malhotra, an entrepreneur and activist living in New Jersey, United States, in which Doniger was criticized for her controversial Freudian interpretations of ancient Hindu texts, she received a dozen negative emails. In November 2003, she was thrown an egg at when giving a lecture on the Hindu Ramayana text at the University of London. As a result, she canceled a lecture in Bombay. In September 2002, her article on Hinduism for Microsoft's online Encarta encyclopedia was criticized for its "negative portrayal of Hinduism," especially when compared to the entries on other religions. Microsoft replaced the essay with one by Arvind Sharma, a McGill University professor of comparative religion.

[Sources: Article 19, "Satirist Returns to Egyptian TV, Film Banned in Malaysia and Other Artistic Freedom News" (https://www.ifex.org/international/2014/03/17/artist_alert/; 17 March 2014); BBC News (14 February 2014); Amy Braverman, "The Interpretation of Gods," University of Chicago Magazine (December 2004); Faisal Devji, "What Really Threatens Free Expression in India," Free Speech Debate (http://freespeechdebate.com/en/2014/02/what-really-threatens-free-expression-in-india/?utm_source=FSD+newsletter&utm_campaign=5c52af0465-Newsletter_21_06_13&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_0cfc6f2a44-5c52af0465-304640457; 6 March 2014); Index on Censorship, 2014, no 2, 123; Malini Nair, "Under Pressure, Publisher Puts Books under 'Review,'" Times of India (4 June 2014; <http://timesofindia.indiatimes.com/india/Under-pressure-publisher-puts-books-under-review/articleshow/36024216.cms>); Rama Lakshmi, "The 'Ban Man': India's Self-Appointed Book Censor Wields Real Clout," Washington Post (23 June 2014; http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/asia_pacific/the-ban-man-indias-self-appointed-book-censor-wields-real-clout/2014/06/23/6f71eca2-b73f-4102-96e0-21d5a52e59a7_story.html); NRC

Handelsblad (14 February 2014), 13; PEN International, Rapid Action Network 05/14 (18 February 2014; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/73.pdf>); “Petitioning Members of Both Houses of the Indian Parliament, and the Honorable Law Minister, Government of India: Reconsider and Revise Sections 153 (A) and 295 (A) of the Indian Penal Code to Protect Freedom of Expression in India!” (<https://www.change.org/en-IN/petitions/members-of-both-houses-of-the-indian-parliament-and-the-honorable-law-minister-government-of-india-reconsider-and-revise-sections-153-a-and-295-a-of-the-indian-penal-code-to-protect-freedom-of-expression-in-india>); Reuters, “Publisher Penguin Warns of India’s Free Speech Curbs after Withdrawing Book on Hindus,” (14 February 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/02/14/us-india-book-idUSBREA1D0TX20140214>); Supreme Court of India, Dina Nath Batra’s Legal Notice to Wendy Doniger & Penguin Books (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/264.pdf>; 2010); Out-of-court settlement (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/333.pdf>).

In March 2014, parts of the top-secret Henderson Brooks-P.S. Bhagat report (April 1963) were leaked online by Neville Maxwell, an Australian retired New Delhi correspondent of The Times. Maxwell, who always had had access to the report, decided to put parts of it in the public domain because of India’s unwillingness to release it. The report—of which only one copy existed which was kept under lock and key in the (Indian) Military Operations Directorate at Army Headquarters—contained a very critical internal review by the Indian army of its (lost) border war with China in 1962, about which Maxwell had written India’s China War (1970). In April 2010, Indian Defence Minister A.K. Antony had written to the lower house of Parliament that the contents of the report were “extremely sensitive” and “of current operational value.” The battlefield records on which the report was based (the so-called After Action Reports) had been destroyed, presumably to cover-up errors (flawed military plans, deficient army leadership, disastrous implementation of the “forward policy” of then Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru (1889–1964) [the policy of forward deployment in the high mountains]) leading to defeat. For hours, the leaked excerpts could not be accessed from India.

[Sources: Agence France-Presse, “1962 Sino-Indian War Still Stirs Bitter Controversy,” South China Morning Post (19 March 2014; <http://www.scmp.com/news/asia/article/1452590/1962-sino-indian-war-still-stirs-bitter-controversy>); Neeta Lal, “Revealing India’s Failures in 1962 War with China Can Help Clear the Air,” South China Morning Post (31 March 2014; <http://www.scmp.com/comment/insight-opinion/article/1461062/revealing-indias-failures-1962-war-china-can-help-clear-air>); Vishal Thapar, “1962 War Records Destroyed To Cover Up Lapses,” Sunday Guardian (22 March 2014; <http://www.sunday-guardian.com/news/1962-war-records-destroyed-to-cover-up-lapses>).

On 2 June 2014, a young Muslim information technology graduate, Mohsin Shaikh (–2014), lost his life to an angry mob in Pune, Maharashtra, due to violence that erupted after offensive pictures of (probably) Shivaji (1627–1680) and Shiv Sena founder Bal Thackeray (1926–2012) appeared on Facebook and WhatsApp.

[Sources: Mahima Kaul, “India’s ‘Social Peace Force’: Reporting ‘Anti-Social’ Posts to Facebook,” Index on Censorship

(https://www.ifex.org/india/2014/07/02/social_media_peace_force/?utm_source=whatcounts&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=itw_2july2014; 2 July 2014); “Pune Techie Murder Case,” Wikipedia (http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pune_techie_murder_case; 6 August 2014).]

In June 2014, it was reported that the Ministry of Home Affairs had destroyed some 150,000 files (including about Lord Louis Mountbatten, Mahatma Gandhi and Rajendra Prasad) over the past month in a cleanliness drive instead of transferring them to the National Archives. The orders apparently came from the Office of Prime Minister Narendra Modi. Although no malicious intent was suspected, many criticized the new government’s gross negligence. On 11 July 2014, Home Minister Rajnath Singh declared in Parliament that 11,000 files had been destroyed between 5 June and 8 July 2014 but denied that any of them related to the three historical figures mentioned.

[Sources: “11,100 files Destroyed, Mahatma Gandhi Assassination Records Safe: MHA,” IBN Live (11 July 2014; <http://ibnlive.in.com/news/11100-files-destroyed-mahatma-gandhi-assassination-records-safe-mha/485293-37-64.html>); Jaideep Prabhu, “Why Historians Feel the Destruction of 1.5 Lakh Government Files Is Akin to the Taliban Destruction of the Bamiyan Buddha Statues,” DNA India (27 June 2014; <http://www.dnaindia.com/analysis/standpoint-why-historians-feel-the-destruction-of-15-lakh-government-files-is-akin-to-the-taliban-destruction-of-the-bamiyan-buddha-statues-1998173>).]

On 1 August 2014, Congress Party members in Vadodara, Gujarat, organized a demonstration against the inclusion of books written by Dinanath Batra (see entry above) in the school curriculum. They ended up burning the notification issued by the government for including the books in the curriculum and one of the books’ cover page, which carried photographs of well-known national leaders such as Mahatma Gandhi, Swami Vivekananda, Rabindranath Tagore, Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, Maharshi Aurobindo and Vinoba Bhave. The governing Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) accused Congress of insulting national leaders. In response, Congress said they were opposed to the government’s attempt to spread “RSS ideology” (“Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh ideology”) by introducing books that distorted historical and geographical facts in their favor.

[Sources: “Cong Burns Dinanath Batra’s Books,” Times of India (2 August 2014; <http://timesofindia.indiatimes.com/city/vadodara/Cong-burns-Dinanath-Batras-books/articleshow/39458264.cms>); “Cong, BJP Spar over Burning Copies of Batra’s Books,” The Indian Express (3 August 2014; <http://indianexpress.com/article/cities/ahmedabad/cong-bjp-spar-over-burning-copies-of-batras-books>.)]

See also Bangladesh, Pakistan.

INDONESIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2001–2002, 2004–2013.

See Australia, Netherlands.

IRAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2013.

In 2012, women were barred from 77 courses in 36 universities across the country, including archaeology.

[Source: Amnesty International, Silenced, Expelled, Imprisoned: Repression of Students and Academics in Iran (London: AI, June 2014), 24.]

On 28 October 2013, the authorities shut down the reformist daily, Bahar, five days after it published a controversial article thought to question the historical veracity of events involving the first Shia imam Ali (600–661 CE).

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 542.]

See also Argentina, China.

IRAQ

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2013.

Ten years after the 2003 United States (US)-led invasion of Iraq, the United States government turned a blind eye to serial human rights abuses. Accountability for abuses committed by Coalition Forces remained almost non-existent.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 552.]

On 28 December 2013, according to a police source, historian and Islamic scholar Bashar Awad Marouf (–2013) was killed by unknown gunmen in the New Mosul neighborhood, (West-Mosul). Marouf wrote fifteen books and various other studies. In 2008, he gave a series of lectures at the Bibliotheca Alexandrina about the following topics: “Hadith and History: A Study of Methodological Influences,” “Approaches to Manuscript Authentication: Text Editing and Commentary Writing,” “The Historiography of Baghdad,” “Shamsul-Din al-Dhahabi,” and “Education in Baghdad until the End of the Abbasid Period: Means and Methodologies.”

[Sources: Bibliotheca Alexandrina, “Dr. Bashar Awad Marouf A Resident Scholar at the BA” (6 July 2008; http://www.bibalex.org/News/NewsDetails_EN.aspx?id=2196&Keywords=&fromDD=1&fromMM=7&fromYY=2008&toDD=31&toMM=7&toYY=2008&PageSize=5&searching=&Dir=7); Scholars at Risk, “SAR Academic Freedom Monitor Digest (December 2013–February 2014)” (24 March 2014; <http://monitoring.academicfreedom.info/reports/2013-12-28-al-imam-al-aadam-college-iraq-mosul>).]

In June 2014, the Islamic State (IS; formerly Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, ISIS) destroyed a Shia mosque near Mosul. Later it destroyed three Husseiniyas (Shia ceremonial commemoration halls) in Bashir village, Kirkuk province. Not much was known yet about the destruction of cultural heritage by the IS.

On 17 July 2014, UNESCO held a consultation with Iraqi and international cultural heritage experts and agreed on an Emergency Response Action Plan to safeguard Iraq’s cultural heritage.

[Sources: “Are These the Photos Being Used to Further Terrify Christian Refugees from Mosul?” (<http://conflictantiquities.wordpress.com/2014/07/23/syria-iraq-mosul-burned-syriac-catholic-cathedral-source-photographs>); “Islamic State Urbicide in Iraq: Destruction of Shia Cultural Property and State Structures in Bashir (Kirkuk)” (<http://conflictantiquities.wordpress.com/2014/07/18/syria-iraq-kirkuk-bashir-urbicide-destruction-islamic-state>); UNESCO, “Emergency Response Action Plan to Safeguard Iraqi Heritage” (17 July 2014; <http://www.unesco.org/new/en/media-services/single-view/news/-a36765f929/back/9597/#.U-ti82MqaZF>).]

See also China.

IRELAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000, 2002, 2004, 2006, 2013.

See United Kingdom.

ISRAEL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000–2003, 2008–2013.

In March and June 2013, veterans of the 1973 Yom Kippur War with Egypt demanded that closed state archival material relating to the war be opened to the public. Israel's State Archives had planned to release in September 2013 classified minutes of 1973 cabinet meetings and meetings of the Ministerial Committee on National Security Affairs relating to the war on its fortieth anniversary, but the office of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that 50 years of classification was the term provided by law and that it would not use its legal privilege to deviate from the rule because of "historical, academic or public interest." Other archives released classified material on the war in advance of the anniversary: the Israel Defense Forces and Defense Establishment Archives published the full testimony of witnesses who appeared before the Agranat Commission, which had investigated the war after it ended.

[Sources: Ofer Aderet, "Forty Years On: State Blocking Publication of Yom Kippur Documents," Haaretz (11 September 2013); Ben Caspit, "Do the Right Thing: Open All the Archives!" Jerusalem Post (5 October 2013); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, Newsletter of September 2013 (October 2013), 9.]

See also Argentina, Czech Republic, Palestinian Authority, United States, Venezuela.

ITALY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2003, 2008, 2010, 2012.

See Argentina.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2013.

In 2013, the Alassane Ouattara government failed to deliver on its promise to render fair and impartial justice for crimes committed during the 2010–2011 post-election crisis. This crisis was the culmination of a decade of political-ethnic conflict in which security forces, rebel forces, and allied militia groups regularly committed serious crimes with complete impunity. Ivorian authorities investigated and charged more than 150 civilian and military supporters of former President (and historian) Laurent Gbagbo for their role in the post-election violence. However, they failed to charge a single member of the pro-Ouattara Republican Forces for the serious crimes they committed during the crisis. Ongoing investigations also appear one-sided. A national commission of inquiry reported in August 2012 that both sides had committed hundreds of summary executions, yet the United Nations reported that, as of July 2013, only three of the 207 investigations subsequently opened related to perpetrators from pro-Ouattara forces. Military trials against several key military leaders under Gbagbo were set to start in late November 2013. In late 2013, civilian courts had yet to begin trials for post-election crimes, meaning that most pro-Gbagbo defendants had languished in pre-trial detention for 2.5 years, violating their right to a trial within a reasonable time. Ivorian authorities did provisionally release 14 pro-Gbagbo defendants in early August 2013.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 98.]

On 30 September 2013, the International Criminal Court (ICC) unsealed an arrest warrant against Charles Blé Goudé, the youth minister under former President Laurent Gbagbo, for four counts of crimes against humanity, following the unsealing in 2012 of arrest warrants against Laurent and Simone Gbagbo. Many Ivorians grew disenchanted with the lack of progress in the investigation of crimes by pro-Ouattara forces, although the Office of the Prosecutor stressed that its investigations would ultimately target both sides.

On 15 February 2013, Cote d'Ivoire (Ivory Coast) ratified the ICC Statute, taking a positive step in the fight against impunity. In October 2013, 18 months after the ICC issued an arrest warrant against Simone Gbagbo, the Ivorian government filed an admissibility challenge contesting her transfer on the grounds that national proceedings were ongoing for substantially the same crimes. The government had yet to respond to the warrant against Blé Goudé, raising further concerns about its intent to cooperate fully with the ICC. In June 2013, the ICC's Pre-Trial Chamber asked the prosecutor to consider providing additional evidence in the case against Laurent Gbagbo, as it decided whether to confirm charges for four counts of crimes against humanity.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 98–99.]

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2013.

On 1 March 2007, then Prime Minister Shinzo Abe affirmed the existence of the comfort women system but also asserted that there was no evidence for the military's role in coercing or abducting the women, thus undercutting the 1993 Kono Declaration. On 17 April 2007, a group of historians, including Yoshiaki Yoshimi (an expert who in 1992 had provided the evidence which led to the Kono Declaration), said that there was ample evidence of coercion. On 30 July 2007, the United States Congress approved a resolution demanding that the Declaration be observed. On 4 November 2012, then opposition leader Abe was among signatories to a United States newspaper advertisement which denied that the Japanese Imperial Army forced women into military sexual slavery during World War II. In February 2014, Shinzo Abe (again Prime Minister since December 2012) again raised the possibility of revising the Kono Declaration—under protest from China and South Korea.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 141; BBC News (27 January 2014; 28 February 2014; 1 March 2014); Index on Censorship, 2007, no. 2, 195, 198; Keesings historisch archief (2007), 471–472.]

On 26 August 2013, a school board in Matsue, south-west Japan decided to prevent pupils from viewing Hadashi no Gen (Barefoot Gen), a ten-volume manga series by Keiji Nakazawa (originally appearing from 1973 to 1985), depicting and explaining crimes committed during the Pacific War (1931–1945). Copies of the series were removed from all of the school libraries. The prohibition came after a citizen complained that the series “depicted actions that were not committed by Japanese troops during the war.” The removal was also due to the series's images of graphic violence.

[Source: Article 19, Artist Alert (https://www.ifex.org/international/2013/10/22/artist_alert) (22 October 2013).]

On 8 December 2013, the Diet passed a controversial national security law of which its overbroad definition of “national security” (including a list of 23 vaguely worded categories of information which might be declared secret on national security grounds); its provision to grant too much power to officials to classify information as secret; its provision to provide prison terms of up to ten years for those divulging and publishing state secrets; and its stipulation that secrets were embargoed for sixty years, were severely criticized. The government said that the law was intended to bolster national security, protect diplomatic efforts, and fight terrorism and espionage. Japanese academics feared that it would threaten constitutional rights, academic freedom and the public's right to know, and prevent scrutiny of controversial policy issues. One of the organizers of the protest was historian Hiroaki

Ozawa from Chiba University.

[Sources: Centre for Law and Democracy, “Japan; Harsh Secrecy Law Fails to Respect International Standards” (5 December 2013); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of November 2013, 9, 13–14 (“Emergency Statement by the Records Management Society of Japan concerning the Contentious State Secrets Bill Proposed for the National Diet of Japan: From the Perspective of Archives Management Rules and Human Rights”); NRC Handelsblad (26 November 2013), 13; “Over Scientists’ Objections, Japan Set to Adopt State Secrets Law,” Science (6 December 2013).]

See also Australia, China.

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004.

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2013.

President Uhuru Kenyatta, his deputy William Ruto, and former radio journalist Joshua arap Sang faced charges of crimes against humanity at the International Criminal Court (ICC) for their alleged roles in the 2007–2008 post-election violence. Ruto and Sang’s trial began in September 2013, while Kenyatta’s trial was expected to start in February 2014. Kenya pledged to continue cooperating with the ICC, but since the March 2013 elections, the new government had actively campaigned at the United Nations and the African Union to have the cases dropped, deferred, or referred to a local justice mechanism. In September 2013, the National Assembly and the Senate approved a motion calling on the Kenyan government to withdraw from the Rome Statute, the treaty establishing the ICC, which Kenya signed in 2005. The government took no steps to act on that motion, and any prospective withdrawal from the Rome Statute would not affect the ongoing cases at the ICC. The ICC intervened in 2010 and summoned six people alleged to bear the greatest responsibility after parliament defeated a bill that would have established a domestic tribunal to try those responsible for the violence in 2007–2008. In 2012, a committee appointed by the director of public prosecutions said there was insufficient evidence in the 5,000 files it had reviewed, to proceed with criminal prosecutions. In 2012, the chief justice announced plans to set up an International Crimes Division to deal with post-election violence and other related cases in the future, but the Judicial Service Commission was still assessing the modalities of setting up the division. The ICC cases in Kenya were marred by withdrawals of prosecution witnesses, allegedly because of bribery and intimidation; the defendants also alleged evidence tampering or intimidation of witnesses. The ICC prosecutor described the level of witness tampering in the Kenyan cases as “unprecedented.”

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 129–130.]

On 21 May 2013, the official Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC) released its four-volume report. It said that during the period it was mandated to investigate—from independence on 12 December 1963 until February 2008—the state adopted policies that resulted in the economic marginalization of five key regions in Kenya. It also confirmed the finding of a 2008 government commission that had said that historical injustices such as unequal land distribution were partly responsible for the 2007–2008 post-election violence. Kenyan media reported that the TJRC had been under pressure from individuals in and out of government to edit out sections of the report implicating certain people on illegal land allocations. The international commissioners working for the TJRC allegedly said that the Office of the President forced the TJRC to submit to it an advance copy of the final report and then exerted pressure to make changes in the report's chapter on historical land injustices. University of Seattle Professor Ronald Slye, one of them, did not sign the chapter because he did not approve of the changes. Judge Gertrude Chawatama from Zambia, another international commissioner, also did not sign the chapter on land.

[Sources: International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of June 2013, 8; Tom Odula, "Kenya's Truth Report: Killings, Land Grabs, Graft" (Associated Press; 22 May 2013).]

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011, 2013.

On 7 December 2013, North Korean state television removed images of Jang Song-thaek (1946–2013)— a powerful uncle, Politburo member and key aide to Kim Jong-un, North Korea's leader since December 2011— by adjusted focus and framing from a documentary about Kim, The Great Comrade, following Jang's dismissal on 3 December 2013. Despite his family ties to the leadership and senior status, Jang had been targeted by purges in the past: he had disappeared from public view in 2004 but two years later he had been reinstated. On 9 December 2013, Jang was arrested and on 12 December, summarily tried, found guilty of treason and executed. In the days before and after his execution, his image and name, as well as those of his wife (Kim Il-sung's daughter), were massively erased from photographs, footage, newspapers, press releases, and over 35,000 online articles. In addition to these original Korean language articles, translations into English, Spanish, Chinese and Japanese were also deleted from the archives, bringing the total to nearly 100,000 missing articles. Furthermore, 20,000 articles had been removed from the archives of Rodong Sinmun, North Korea's state newspaper. North Korean media web portal Naenara had reportedly deleted the digital archives of its monthly and quarterly Foreign Language Publishing house materials on previous occasions.

[Sources: BBC News (7 December 2013); Chad O'Carroll, "In 1984 Moment, N. Korea Deletes Near Entirety of News Archives (<http://www.nknews.org/2013/12/in-1984-moment-n-korea-deletes-near-entirety-of-news-archives>; 16 December 2013); Human Rights Council, Report of the Detailed Findings of the Commission of Inquiry on Human Rights in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (A/HRC/25/CRP.1; 7 February 2014), paragraph 212; "KCNA Deleted, then Restored Old Reports on Jang" (11 December 2013; <http://www.northkoreatech.org/2013/12/11/kcna-deleted-then-> restored-old-reports-on-jang/); Sybil Jones (Index on Censorship), “North Korea Is Deleting History” (17 December 2013); Sybil Jones, “Real-Time News Slips out of North Korea,” Index on Censorship, 43 no. 2 (Summer 2014), 154; NRC Handelsblad (14–15 December 2013), 22–23.]

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012–2013.

See Japan.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2013.

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008.

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2013.

In February 2012, the United Nations Special Tribunal for Lebanon announced that the in absentia trial of four indicted members of Hezbollah for the killing of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005, would go forward. The trial was tentatively scheduled to begin on 13 January 2014.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 576.]

In October 2012, Justice Minister Shakib Qortbawi put forward a draft decree to the cabinet to establish a national commission to investigate the fate of Lebanese and other nationals who “disappeared” during and after the Lebanese civil war (1975–1990). The cabinet formed a ministerial committee to examine the draft, but no action was taken. In September 2013, a criminal case brought by Najat Hashisho against three members of the Lebanese Forces militia for “disappearing” her husband over 30 years ago was dismissed for lack of evidence. Hashisho and her attorney argued that there was significant evidence against the accused and planned to appeal the decision.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 576.]

On 3 January 2014, the Al-Saeh library, belonging to Greek Orthodox priest Ibrahim Sarrrouj and containing about 80,000 books and ancient manuscripts, was set ablaze by Islamists in Tripoli after the discovery of a pamphlet inside one of its books deemed insulting to Islam and the Prophet Mohammed. Two-thirds of the texts were destroyed. The next day, hundreds of local Muslims staged a demonstration against the act of arson.

[Sources: Jessica Elgot, “Lebanon Library Torched, 78,000 Books Burned By Islamists,” The Huffington Post (5 January 2014); “Religion, Libraries and War: The Acrid Smell of Burning Books,” The Economist (6 January 2014).]

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2013.

In 2013, the government made some progress in implementing the recommendations the Truth and Reconciliation Commission had made since 2009. In June 2013, it released a plan for promoting national peacebuilding and reconciliation, and in October launched the National Palava Hut Program, envisioned to foster reconciliation through community and grassroots dialogue. The plan advocated for reparations, but ignored the commission's call for prosecutions of those responsible for war crimes committed during the armed conflict (1979–2003), for which there had still been no accountability.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 137.]

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2013.

Some members of the General National Congress, Libya's first elected parliament, were removed due to a sweeping lustration law that banned from office persons who had held any office in the Muammar Gaddafi era (1969–2011). The interim government failed to demobilize militias or merge fighters who fought against Gaddafi's forces in the 2011 uprising into government forces with proper vetting procedures.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 577.]

At the end of 2013, the General National Congress had yet to pass the draft transitional justice law, which called for a commission to investigate abuses, refer perpetrators for prosecution, and compensate victims directly. It would cover abuses committed during the Gaddafi era (1969–2011) and during the transitional phase following the 2011 uprising.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 580.]

At the end of 2013, the general prosecutor had not concluded an investigation into the killing of Muammar Gaddafi (1942–2011) and his supporters in October 2011. On 19 September 2013, Libyan authorities started the pre-trial stage of domestic proceedings against one of Gaddafi's sons, Saif al-Islam Gaddafi, his intelligence chief, Abdullah Sanussi, and 36 other senior Gaddafi-era officials. They faced charges of murder, torture and indiscriminate killings committed during the 2011 uprising. The trials of these former officials were expected to start in December 2013.

Saif al-Islam Gaddafi and Abdullah Sanussi, who were also wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for crimes against humanity, remained in Libyan custody, without access to lawyers. Libya filed a legal bid at the ICC to prosecute Gaddafi domestically in May 2012, and was told it could postpone surrendering him to the court until the ICC made its decision. In May 2013, the ICC judges rejected Libya's bid and reminded the Libyan authorities of their obligation to surrender him. Libya appealed the decision. On 11 October 2013, the ICC ruled Sanussi's case inadmissible thereby granting Libya the right to try him domestically. Sanussi's lawyers at the ICC appealed that decision. At the end of 2013, the ICC had yet to rule on the appeal.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 580–581.]

On 5 February 2014, the General National Congress amended Gaddafi-era article 195 of the penal code. Article 195 said: “Any person making what could be regarded as an attack on the Great Al-Fateh Revolution [of 1 September 1969] or its leader is liable to be punished with imprisonment. [...]” The penalty was three to fifteen years. It was changed into “[A]ny person stating something that is detrimental to the 17 February Revolution [of 2011] is liable to be punished with imprisonment [...]”

[See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Reporters without Borders, “Free Expression in New Libya Approached with Same Draconian Gaddafi-era Law” (19 February 2014).]

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009.

See Belarus.

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2013.

On 31 July, Parliament elected a new Lustration Commission team. The old team had been criticized by the opposition for allegedly blacklisting suspected Communist-era collaborators for political reasons. Five members of the old team kept their positions, including lawyer Tome Adziev as the commission chairman. Among the six new members was historian Sasko Janev. Ever since the commission started work in 2009, it has been marred by controversy. The opposition argued that it has been misused to target government critics and in December 2012, it removed two of its members from the commission in protest. Parliament passed a first lustration law in 2008 and a second one in 2012 after the constitutional court scrapped many key provisions from the original legislation, narrowing its time span and the range of professions to be subjected to checks.

[Source: Sinisa Jakov Marusic, “New Macedonia Lustration Commission Resumes Collaborator Probe,” Balkan Insight (1 August 2104; http://www.balkaninsight.com/en/article/old-head-to-lead-macedonia-s-lustration-commission?utm_source=Balkan+Transitional+Justice+Daily+Newsletter&utm_campaign=414d537400-RSS_EMAIL_CAMPAIGN&utm_medium=email&utm_term=0_561b9a25c3-414d537400-311109073).]

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011.

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2013.

MALI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013.

War crimes and other serious abuses were committed by all sides during Mali's recent armed conflict (2012–2013). These abuses included, among others, the destruction of religious and cultural shrines by armed Islamist groups [See NCH Annual Report 2013]. In July 2012, the government, a state party to the International Criminal Court (ICC), referred “the situation in Mali since January 2012” to the ICC prosecutor for investigation. On 16 January 2013, the ICC prosecutor formally opened an investigation into grave crimes allegedly committed in the northern three regions. At the end of 2013, no arrest warrants had been issued. The government and military high command gave mixed signals regarding abuses by Malian soldiers, at times flatly denying violations and at others promising to hold alleged perpetrators to account. While the authorities investigated a few incidents, numerous others had not been investigated, and no soldiers implicated in recent abuses had been put on trial.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 145.]

In March 2013, the interim government established the Commission for Dialogue and Reconciliation, but its efficacy was undermined by an unclear mandate and the hasty appointment of commissioners. In addition, the interim government failed to consult sufficiently with a wide variety of stakeholders. Because its mandate and powers appear limited to promoting reconciliation, some Malians pushed for a commission that could address impunity for abuses and recommend individuals for prosecution.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 146.]

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011.

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2012.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2013.

On 2 July 2013, (Óscar) Samuel Malpica Uribe ([1955]–2013), social anthropologist and historian, researcher at the Department of Historical Research into the Workers' Movement (DIHMO) of the Benemérita Universidad Autónoma de Puebla (BUAP; Distinguished Autonomous University of Puebla), and leftist activist, was shot dead by unidentified gunmen. He was a former rector of the BUAP (1987–1989). Investigators looked at a number of possible motives, including allegations made by Malpica about the existence of a corruption network at the BUAP. On 13 June 2013, he had filed an official request with the state comptroller's office for an investigation into the alleged irregularities. According to his widow, he was planning to stage a hunger strike to press for an investigation of the BUAP.

As the founder of the Ecomuseo de Metepec (ECUML) in Atlixco—in which the workers' patrimony of a textile factory was preserved—he received the National Prize Francisco de la Maza of the Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia (INAH) [Francisco de la Maza (1913–1972) was a Mexican historian of colonial art]. Malpica also investigated the astronomy and culture of the Mayas. He was unsuccessful in his attempt to become Puebla's mayor in 2008 for the Workers' Party and Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD). In 1989, Malpica had been removed as rector, arrested on fraud charges in 1990 and in 1992–1993 imprisoned for one year during the administration of Governor Mariano Piña Olaya of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), but not convicted. He declared that he had been a political prisoner.

[Sources: “La Benemérita Universidad Autónoma de Puebla lamenta la muerte del ex Rector Samuel Malpica Uribe” (3 July 2013);

http://www.buap.mx/portal_pprd/wb/comunic/la_benemerita_universidad_autonoma_de_puebla_lamen); “Former University President Murdered in Mexico,” Latin American Herald Tribune

(<http://www.laht.com/>; EFE, 3 July 2013).]

See also United States.

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2013.

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2013.

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2013.

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2013.

The Law on Peaceful Assembly and Peaceful Processions was applied haphazardly in 2013, with the authorities permitting some demonstrations and denying permission for others. They permitted a major gathering on 8 August 2013 to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the 1988 democratic uprising. After the 1988 military coup, cultural, historical, economic, or religious studies of ethnic minorities had been suppressed. Any discussion of the pro-democracy rebellion or the coup had been banned until 2013.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 308, 310.]

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011.

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2013.

Instead of taking steps to ensure the prosecution of those responsible for the worst crimes committed during the country's civil war (1996–2006)—during which at least 13,000 people were killed and over 1,300 subjected to enforced disappearance—the cabinet pushed an ordinance that could lead to an amnesty for the perpetrators. Nepal's Truth, Reconciliation and Disappearance Ordinance, signed into law by President Ram Baran Yadav in March 2013, called for a high-level commission to investigate serious conflict-related violations. The law did not define which crimes were eligible for amnesty and which were excluded, giving commissioners potentially wide discretion to make determinations. As a result, some perpetrators of torture, war crimes, and crimes against humanity could win amnesties in contravention of international law. The high-level commission had yet to be formed, and in April the Supreme Court suspended the ordinance pending further review. About the amnesties, United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay said: "Such amnesties would not only violate core principles under international law but would also weaken the foundation for a genuine and lasting peace in Nepal."

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 356–357, 359–360.]

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2013.

On 18 October 2013, the Court in Amsterdam ordered cultural anthropologist and management consultant Martijn van Oorschot not to publish his manuscript which was commissioned by the Nederlandse Loodscorporatie (NLC; Dutch Pilots' Corporation). The manuscript contained a history of the years between the privatization of the NLC in 1988 and 2013. The court ruled that the oral agreement between van Oorschot and the maritime pilots gave the latter the copyright. The conflict began when van Oorschot submitted the manuscript and NLC chairman Eric van Dijk had the text substantially edited in July 2013, especially the places where twenty interviewees were quoted.

Van Oorschot refused to change his text, and when Van Dijk annulled the agreement and ordered Van Oorschot to destroy his source materials, Van Oorschot refused and expressed his intention to publish the manuscript himself. Subsequently, the NLC chairman and interviewees sued Van Oorschot in summary proceedings. Sensitive passages of the manuscript reportedly included the post-1988 period in which retirement age and pension schemes were at stake and a later period in which computerized distant piloting was discussed. Van Oorschot, who had already written a book chapter containing a history of the maritime pilots in 2004, appealed the decision.

[Sources: Martijn van Oorschot, personal communication (February 2014); NRC Handelsblad (7, 11, 21 October 2013); Rechtbank Amsterdam, Nederlandse Loodsencorporatie versus Martijn van Oorschot (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/310.pdf>; 18 October 2013).]

On 19 November 2013, NRC Handelsblad newspaper reported that archives of the military information services MARVO and MARNSVO documenting crimes committed by the Dutch military in Indonesia during the independence war of 1945–1949 had been destroyed or hidden. The archive of the military information service DLC had been heavily censored.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (19 November 2013), 11.]

On 30 November 2013, the Volkskrant newspaper published classified documents showing that the violent end to a 20-days' train hijack by South Moluccan activists in 1977 ended in the execution of six of the hijackers, disproving the official version that the aim had not been to kill the latter. Nine armed Moluccans had taken over a train close to De Punt in Drenthe in an effort to force the Dutch government to recognize an independent South Maluku, as it had promised during the Indonesian independence talks in the late 1940s. The official documents on the ending of the siege were sealed until 2053. Two hostages were also killed during the siege.

[Sources: "MPs Want Answers on Moluccan Train Siege Ending in 1977"

(http://www.dutchnews.nl/news/archives/2013/12/mps_want_answers_on_moluccan_t.php; 2

December 2013); M. Nadeem, "MPs Question 'Rain of Bullets' on Moluccan Train in 1977"

(<http://www.nltimes.nl/2013/12/04/mps-question-rain-bullets-moluccan-train-1977>; 4 December 2013).]

On 7 February 2014, the Volkskrant newspaper sued De Nederlandsche Bank (DNB; the central bank of the Netherlands) with the purpose to disclose a secret two-volume internal DNB history about the sale and nationalization of ABN Amro bank in 2007–2008. Written by DNB historian Corry van Renselaar and consisting mainly of the discussions among DNB direction members, the text was intended to be published under the title Bank in brokken (Bank into pieces) but it never appeared. In March 2012 the Volkskrant had become aware of the history and in April 2012 filed a Wet

Openbaarheid Bestuur (WOB; Freedom of Information Act) request, but DNB had rejected it with the argument that the WOB was not applicable to it.

[Source: Robert Giebels & Gijs Herderscheë, “De Volkskrant daagt DNB voor de rechter om informatie verkoop ABN,” Volkskrant (7 February 2014).]

On 30 July 2014, the Raad van State (Council of State) ruled in a case confronting a biographer from Nijmegen (name unknown) and the Ministry of the Interior and Kingdom Relations regarding access to internal security files about the failed coup against Indonesian President Sukarno on 23 January 1950. The biographer was writing a work about Raymond Westerling (1919–1987), a Dutch military officer of the KNIL (Royal Netherlands East Indies Army) who had organized the failed coup. After a first request from the biographer for data about the coup, the minister made accessible a file of 11 redacted pages. The biographer complained that it was implausible that such an important historical event had yielded only one modest file. He argued that, according to Dirk Engelen’s book about the history of the Internal Security Service BVD, Westerling’s file alone consisted of 12 volumes and that, according to reports of the Military Police and to a secret Exterior Ministry note, members of the Dutch army command had been involved in the attempt. In November 2012, the Minister rejected the complaint, a decision confirmed by the Court in The Hague in October 2013. On higher appeal, however, the Council of State ruled that the minister had not searched the relevant BVD archives in their entirety, having used only the key-terms “coup against Sukarno in 1950” and excluded personal files such as Westerling’s. It ordered a new search.

[Source: Raad van State, X versus Ministry of the Interior and Kingdom Relations (2014; <http://uitspraken.rechtspraak.nl/inziendocument?id=ECLI:NL:RVS:2014:2866>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/355.pdf>).]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Saint Vincent, Rwanda.

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007.

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2013.

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2013.

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012.

See Rwanda.

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012.

On 28 March 2014, journalist and human-rights defender Raza Rumi was the victim of an assassination attempt while driving home after completing his weekly television program in Lahore. His driver was killed and his security guard left paralyzed. Lahore police ordered Rumi to hide. They arrested six men for the attack, saying that Lashkar-e-Jhangvi—an anti-Shia Muslim armed group that claimed responsibility for hundreds of killings across Pakistan—was responsible. Rumi had frequently received threatening messages on Twitter and Facebook because of his work; his name was on several hit-lists. He declared that the reasons for the attempt on his life were his views on minority rights; his book Delhi by Heart: Impressions of a Pakistani Traveller (2013), his demand to include the 11 August 1947 speech by Quaid Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), Pakistan’s first governor-general, in the Constitution; and his plea for rational engagement with the West and the outside world. The 2013 book—on the shared history of India and Pakistan—dealt with how ancient and medieval Delhi led to the evolution of the north Indian cuisine, music, Urdu language and other expressions of everyday life.

[Sources: Amnesty International, “A Bullet Has Been Chosen For You”: Attacks On Journalists In Pakistan (London 2014), 7–8, 35, 39–40; Hassan Naqvi, “Delhi by Heart: Writing ‘Home’” (7 July 2013; <http://tribune.com.pk/story/571876/delhi-by-heart-writing-home>); Raza Rumi, “Escaping Death in the Land of the Pure,” The Express Tribune (29 March 2014; <http://tribune.com.pk/story/688869/escaping-death-in-the-land-of-the-pure/>).

See also Bangladesh.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2013.

In November 2013, Brandeis and Syracuse Universities in the United States suspended their ties with Al-Quds University after a protest on 5 November 2013 on the campus in which demonstrators used the traditional Nazi salute and honored “martyred” suicide bombers. The suspension came although university president Sari Nusseibeh repeatedly denounced the protest.

[Source: Elizabeth Redden, “Syracuse to Cut Ties with Al-Quds, Bard to Keep Partnership,” Inside HigherEd (25 November 2013).]

In [March] 2014, Mohammed S. Dajani (1946–), political scientist, library director and founder of the American studies program at al-Quds University in East Jerusalem, took 27 Palestinian college students to visit the Auschwitz concentration camp in Poland as part of a project designed to teach empathy and tolerance and funded by the German Research Foundation. While the Palestinian students were visiting Auschwitz, a parallel group of Jewish Israeli students from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, Beer-Sheva, and Tel Aviv University went to Bethlehem to hear Palestinians from the Dheisheh refugee camp tell their story. The responses of both groups of students—Israelis and Palestinians—would then be analyzed.

Following media reports about the trip, online commentators in April branded Dajani a traitor, reproached him to teach the Holocaust rather than the Nakba (the latter meaning “catastrophe”; the term used by Palestinians to describe the expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians from Israel in 1948) and urged him not to return to the university. The online version of an article about the trip published in the major Palestinian newspaper al-Quds was taken down by the publishers, reportedly because it was heavily attacked in the comments section. On 18 May 2014, following weeks of pressure, death threats and campus riots, Dajani resigned. He said that he had hoped the university would reject his resignation and, in so doing, support academic freedom. Instead, his resignation was accepted. The university issued a statement saying that Dajani and the students had made the trip in a “personal capacity.”

In the past, Dajani had been trained as a guerrilla with the Palestine Liberation Organization and banned from Israel for 25 years (until 1993) because of his role as head of Fatah’s English-language propaganda arm. In 2007, he had founded Wasatia (“moderation” in Arabic), a group promoting the Muslim tradition of compromise and non-violence.

Sources: William Booth, “Palestinian University Students’ Trip to Auschwitz Causes Uproar,” Washington Post (13 April 2014; http://www.washingtonpost.com/world/middle_east/palestinian-university-students-trip-to-auschwitz-causes-uproar/2014/04/12/c162ba42-c27d-11e3-9ee7-02c1e10a03f0_story.html); Inna Lazareva, “Palestinian Professor Resigns over Students’ Trip to Auschwitz,” Telegraph (10 June 2014; <http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/middleeast/palestinianauthority/10885313/Palestinian-professor-resigns-over-students-trip-to-Auschwitz.html>); “Mohammed S. Dajani,” Scholars at Risk Academic Freedom Monitor Digest (March-May 2014) (<http://monitoring.academicfreedom.info/reports/2014-04-10-al-quds-university>); Matthew Kalman, “Palestinian Teaches Tolerance via Holocaust,” New York Times (20 April 2014; http://www.nytimes.com/2014/04/21/world/middleeast/palestinian-teaches-tolerance-via-holocaust.html?_r=0); Yifa Yaakov, “Palestinian Lecturer Who Led Auschwitz Trip Quits after Backlash,” Times of Israel (8 June 2014; [auschwitz-trip-quits-after-backlash/#ixzz34Pz6kMKq.)]

See also United States, Venezuela.

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2013.

PAPUA NEW GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

See Australia.

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012.

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013.

Peru's Truth and Reconciliation Commission estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents. Former President Alberto Fujimori was sentenced in 2009 to 25 years in prison for killings and “disappearances” in 1991 and 1992. His intelligence advisor, Vladimiro Montesinos, three former army generals, and members of the Colina Group, a government death squad, were also serving sentences ranging from 15 to 25 years for the assassination in 1991 of 15 people in the Lima district of Barrios Altos, and for six enforced disappearances.

In June 2013, President Ollanta Humala rejected a petition to grant Fujimori a presidential pardon requested by his family on grounds of ill-health. Media reports indicated that a commission on presidential pardons had determined that Fujimori was not suffering from a terminal or degenerative illness or grave psychological problems. Judicial investigations into other cases were subject to long delays and resulted in few convictions. In a report issued in August 2013 to mark the tenth anniversary of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's report, the human rights ombudsman found that, despite initial efforts, Peru had failed to implement a specialized judicial system with sufficient staff and resources to bring most cases to court. According to the ombudsman, as of April 2013, 113 of the 194 cases it monitored had been closed or were in the early stages of investigation, and only 32 had resulted in a sentence.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 273–274.]

In June 2013, the Constitutional Court held that a 1986 massacre in El Frontón prison during the first administration of former President Alan García, in which at least 130 inmates were killed, was subject to a statute of limitations since it did not constitute a crime against humanity. The court's opinion disregarded a 2000 ruling of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in the case of Durand and Ugarte, which ordered Peru to investigate these events and hold those responsible accountable. In September 2013, the Ministry of Justice asked the Constitutional Court to correct the ruling on the grounds that a majority of the judges had rejected the petitioners' argument that the opening of trial proceedings in the El Frontón case was unconstitutional, and that the court had not been asked to rule on whether the crimes committed were crimes against humanity. As of October 2013, the court had not responded.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 274.]

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2013.

In 2014, sustained efforts were underway to collect records documenting human rights violations during the martial law years (1972–1986) in order to enable victims to file reparation claims.

[Source: Mike Frialde, "CHR putting together 'Martial Law Files'," The Philippine Star (1 February 2014; <http://www.philstar.com/headlines/2014/02/01/1285324/chr-putting-together-martial-law-files> <http://newsinfo.inquirer.net/579055/how-much-is-suffering-under-marcos-worth>).]

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011.

The actors of the 2012 film Pokłosie (The Aftermath), directed by Władysław Pasikowski, were insulted and received death threats because the film supposedly defamed Poland. It showed two brothers returning to their village and trying to break the silence about a wartime pogrom; it was inspired by Jan Tomasz Gross's book Neighbors (2001), concerning a pogrom in which at least 340 Jews were killed by Polish villagers in Jedwabne in July 1941. The movie was praised but also widely criticized by nationalists and banned in some towns.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (26 March 2014), C2 and (21 May 2014), C4; Wikipedia (27 March 2014).]

On 14 October 2013, a statue made by Jerzy Szumczyk, a fifth-year student at the Academy of Fine Arts, was removed in Gdansk. Entitled Komm Frau (Come Here, Woman), the statue was illegally installed on 12 October 2013 and represented a Soviet soldier raping a pregnant German woman. Szumczyk was detained and released after questioning. Historians estimated that over one million German women were raped by Soviet soldiers in 1944–1945. A Red Army War Memorial in Berlin became known as the “tomb of the unknown rapist.”

[Sources: Tara Brady, “Polish Town Tears Down Statue Marking the Rape of Millions of German Women by Russian Soldiers,” Daily Mail (14 October 2013); “Red Army Rape Statue Removed in Gdansk,” News from Poland (<http://www.thenews.pl/1/9/Artykul/149969,Red-Army-rape-statue-removed-in-Gdansk>; 14 October 2013).]

See also Palestinian Authority, Russia.

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2013.

According to a study conducted by Anti-Plagiarism, one of Russia's leading analytical agencies in the field of intellectual property, one out of every ten theses on history defended in Russia involved plagiarism.

[Source: Eugene Vorotnikov, "Government to Combat Plagiarism and Illegal Degrees," University World News Global Edition, Issue 309; (24 February 2014); <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140224162330475>).

Over several years, there had been a campaign of criminal persecution against people who read or distributed the works of Said Nursi. Nursi (1868–1960) was a Muslim Kurdish scholar, Sufi teacher and political leader. [See also NCH Annual Report 2012, under Turkey.]

[Source: Index on Censorship, 2013, no. 4, 39.]

In July 2013, the City Court in Dzerzhinsk rejected the petition filed by the local prosecutor's office to ban a 1,200-page book written by Stanislav Dmitrievsky, an archaeologist and writer, Oksana Chelysheva and Bogdan Guareli, and entitled International Tribunal for Chechnya: Prospects of Bringing to Justice Individuals Suspected of War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity during the Armed Conflict in the Chechen Republic (2009) under the anti-extremism legislation. In October 2013, an appeals court upheld this decision. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 473.]

On 25 August 2013, when ten Moscovites wanted to repeat a demonstration on the Red Square in Moscow held on 25 August 1968 by eight dissidents against the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia, they were arrested and held for a few hours. Now as then, the demonstrators carried a banner with the slogan "For your and our liberty." Former dissident Natalya Gorbanevskaya (1936–2013), a poet, participated in both demonstrations. She died a few months later.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (27 August 2013), 9; (9 December 2013), 12.]

On 21 October 2013, the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights reduced the scope of an earlier 2012 judgment on the 1940 Katyń massacre [See NCH Annual Report 2012]. It found, first, that the court was indeed not competent to examine the adequacy of an investigation into the events. In order to establish whether a “genuine connection” between the deaths of the victims in 1940 and the ratification, 58 years later, of the European Convention of Human Rights by Russia was possible, that connection had to be determined by two criteria: the period of time between the event and the entry into force of the Convention had to be reasonably short and not exceeding in any event ten years, and a major part of the investigation ought to have been carried out after the entry into force. In applying these criteria, it determined that the period between 1940 (the time of the events) and May 1998 (the time the Convention entered into force in Russia) was too long for a “genuine connection” to be established between both. In particular, Russia had undertaken real investigative steps in the early 1990s but not after May 1998 and the investigation itself was only formally terminated in 2004. No relevant piece of evidence had come to light since 1998. There were no elements capable of providing a bridge from the distant past into the recent post-1998 period. Accordingly, the Court had no temporal jurisdiction to examine the complaint.

Secondly, the Court’s jurisdiction only extended to the period starting in May 1998: by then, the death of the Polish prisoners of war had become established as a historical fact and no lingering uncertainty as to their fate—which might have given rise to a breach of article 3 (prohibition of inhuman treatment)—had remained. What could initially have been a “disappearance” case had to be considered a “confirmed death” case.

The Grand Chamber also underlined, third, that under article 38 (obligation to furnish necessary facilities for examination of the case) Russia was obliged to comply with its requests for evidence and found that, in refusing to submit the key procedural decision of September 2004 which remained classified, Russia had failed to do so. The Russian courts had not scrutinized the assertion that that material had to be kept secret more than 70 years after the events. They had not addressed the argument of the NGO Memorial that the decision brought to an end the investigation into a mass murder of unarmed prisoners. Finally, they had not performed a balancing exercise between the alleged need to protect the information held by the Federal Security Bureau (FSB; successor to the NKVD and KGB) and the public interest in a transparent investigation into the crimes of the previous totalitarian regime. The Grand Chamber was unable to accept that the submission of a copy of the September 2004 decision could have affected Russia’s national security.

[Sources: BBC News (21 October 2013); European Court of Human Rights, Janowiec and Others versus Russia: Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/259.pdf>; 2102); European Court of Human Rights (Grand Chamber), Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/312.pdf>.)]

In December 2013, a court in Saint Petersburg ruled that the International Society Memorial’s local anti-discrimination division—which assisted victims of discrimination and xenophobia—had to register as a foreign agent. Memorial intended to appeal the ruling. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.] In July 2013, Memorial’s office in Sochi had been inspected.

[Sources: Kristina Gorelik & Tom Balmforth, “A Quarter Century of Rights Activism: Memorial Turns 25,” Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (29 January 2014); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of August 2013, 9.]

On 1 March 2004, the day that the Federation Council (the upper house of the Duma) authorized President Vladimir Putin to send troops to Ukraine, historian and theologian Andrei Zubov compared Moscow’s incursion into the Crimea with Nazi Germany’s annexation of Austria in March 1938 in an opinion article (entitled “This Has Already Happened”) published on the daily Vedomosti’s website. On 24 March 2014, the Moscow State Institute of International Relations (MGIMO; Moscow’s diplomatic academy with ties to the foreign ministry), where Zubov had worked since 2001, dismissed him for criticizing Russia’s foreign policy, noting “Let the inappropriate and offensive historical analogies and characterizations lay on Zubov’s conscience, the leadership of MGIMO views it as impossible for A. B. Zubov to continue working at the institute.” Many protested the dismissal. Zubov declared that he thought that MGIMO was put under pressure “by higher authorities” and planned to challenge his dismissal in court. In late April 2014, he was temporarily reinstated after the dismissal proved to be unlawful because Zubov was a member of an election commission for a district in Moscow and he could not be dismissed while serving on that commission. But Zubov’s contract with the commission was due to expire on 30 June 2014 and would not be extended. After that, his dismissal would take effect. MGIMO lecturer Elina Kolesnikova resigned the day after Zubov was dismissed, denouncing the violation of academic freedom. Zubov also directed the history of religions department at Saint John Russian Orthodox University and edited two volumes of Russian History: 20th Century.

[Sources: Sergey Berzin, “Russian Academics Spooked by Zubov’s Dismissal,” University World News (11 April 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140410172832334>); Sergey Berzin, “New Twist in Outspoken Professor Zubov’s Dismissal,” University World News (18 April 2014); Matthew Bodner, “Professor Says Sacked Over Opinion Article Against Possible Ukraine Invasion,” Moscow Times (5 March 2014; <http://www.themoscowtimes.com/news/article/professor-says-sacked-over-opinion-article-against-possible-ukraine-invasion/495616.html>); Reuters, “Russian Professor Compares Russia’s Actions to Nazi Annexation of Austria,” Voice of America (<http://www.voanews.com/articleprintview/1864112.html>; 4 March 2014); Reuters, “Russian Professor Sacked over Criticism of Actions in Ukraine” (24 March 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/03/24/us-ukraine-crisis-professor-> idUSBREA2N1BM20140324); “Russian Historian Fired over Putin-Hitler Comparison,” Transitions Online (<http://www.tol.org/client/article/24198-russia-plans-permanent-link-to-crimea-armenia-on-threshold-of-customs-union>; 5 March 2014); Andrei Zubov, “Это уже было,” Vedomosti.ru (1 March 2014; <http://www.vedomosti.ru/opinion/news/23467291/andrej-zubov-eto-uzhe-bylo>.)]

In May 2014, the Chechen film “Ordered to Forget” («Приказано забыть») —produced by Ruslan Kokanayev and dealing with the burning alive of 700 people in the Chechen village of Haybakh at the time of the deportation of the entire Chechen and Ingush nations in February 1944 on Stalin’s orders—was to be premiered in Grozny, the capital of Chechnya. However, Russia’s Ministry of Culture refused to certify the film for public distribution on the grounds that, since the archives of the People’s Commissariat for Internal Affairs (NKVD, the forerunner of the present-day Federal Security Bureau, FSB) contained no evidence of the crime, the film constituted “a falsification of history” that could give rise to interethnic hatred. Kokanayev said that the Ministry of Culture did not raise any objections when he first submitted the scenario for approval, and that, when the finished film was first screened in Moscow in early February 2014, it was praised. Kokanayev planned to contest the ban in court.

He challenged the Ministry of Culture’s claim that no documentary evidence of the mass killing existed; he had used a scholarly work about the killing for writing his script. The findings of a Khrushchev-era probe were never made public, however, and Haybakh remained a taboo subject until the late 1980s. In response to a newspaper article, the prosecutor’s office in Chechnya’s Urus-Martan district had opened a criminal case in 1989. Similar mass killings had taken place in other Chechen and Ingush villages (Melkhesty, Kezenoy-Am, Targim) in February 1944. On 20 June 2014, “Ordered to Forget” was screened at the Moscow International Film Festival.

[Sources: International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of June 2014, 7; RFE/RL (Liz Fuller), “Banned Chechen Movie Screened At Moscow Film Festival” (23 June 2014; <http://www.rferl.org/content/caucasus-report-banned-chechen-movie-haybakh/25432647.html>.)]

In early May 2014, a new version of the law “On Combating the Rehabilitation of Nazism, Nazi Criminals or Their Collaborators in the Newly Independent States on the Territory of the Former Union of Soviet Socialist Republics” [see NCH Annual Report 2010] was reportedly reintroduced and signed by President Vladimir Putin.

[Source: Neil Macfarquhar, “Russia Revisits Its History to Nail down Its Future,” New York Times (11 May 2014; http://www.nytimes.com/2014/05/12/world/europe/russia-revisits-its-history-to-nail-down-its-future.html?_r=0.)]

On 17 May 2014, the de facto authorities in Crimea, annexed by Russia in March 2014, banned all public gatherings until 6 June 2014. Pro-Moscow Crimean leader Sergei Aksyonov cited violence in southeast Ukraine as the reason for his decision to ban rallies. On 18 May 2014, the Mejlis—the main representative body of the Crimean Tatars—called for a rally in the center of Simferopol, Crimea’s capital, to mark the 70th anniversary of the deportation of the Crimean Tatars by Stalin. It called instead for Tatars to gather at religious centers and other locations. Dozens of people gathered at a memorial near Simferopol’s railway station, the departure point for thousands of Tatars sent into internal exile. Later that day, at least 10,000 people participated in the rally on the outskirts of Simferopol, carrying placards calling for self-determination. Refat Chubarov, chairman of the Mejlis, described the decree as an “inhuman act.” Crimean Tatar leader Mustafa Dzhemilev was banned by de facto Russian authorities in Crimea from returning to the peninsula. On May 18 1944, Soviet authorities began deporting Crimean Tatars to Central Asia; many of the 200,000 deportees died on their way into exile.

[Source: RFE/RL, “Crimean Tatars Mark 70th Anniversary of Deportation,” (18 May 2014; <http://www.rferl.org/content/ukraine-crimea-tatars-deportation/25389125.html>).]

See also Poland, Ukraine.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2013.

In October 2013, a revised version of the 2008 law on genocide ideology was promulgated. It contained several improvements, including a more precise definition of the offense and the requirement to demonstrate intent behind the crime, thereby reducing the scope for abusive prosecutions. However, several articles retained language that could be used to criminalize free speech. The new law reduced the maximum prison sentence from 25 to 9 years. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2009–2011, 2013.]

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 158.]

The trial of Léon Mugesera, a former government official extradited from Canada to Rwanda in 2012 and accused of planning and inciting genocide, took place in the High Court in Kigali. It was ongoing at the end of 2013. In July 2013, the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) transferred genocide suspect Bernard Munyagishari to face trial in Rwanda. After preliminary hearings, the trial of Jean Bosco Uwinkindi, the first such case to be transferred by the ICTR to Rwanda in 2012, was postponed and had not begun in substance at the end of 2013. Criminal trials of Rwandan genocide suspects on the basis of universal jurisdiction took place in the national courts of Norway, Sweden, and the Netherlands, leading to convictions and prison sentences.

A United States (US) court convicted a Rwandan of immigration fraud for concealing her role in the genocide, stripped her of US citizenship and sentenced her to 10 years' imprisonment. A genocide suspect in Norway was extradited to Rwanda while two others in Sweden and Denmark lost their appeals against extradition. Extradition cases were pending in several other countries, including the United Kingdom, Netherlands, and France.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 157–158.]

On the twentieth anniversary of the 1994 genocide, on 7 April 2014, French ambassador Michel Flesch was barred from attending the commemoration ceremony in Kigali. The measure came after French Justice Minister Christiane Taubira had canceled plans to attend the ceremony following an accusation by President Paul Kagame that France had participated in the genocide.

[Source: BBC News (7 April 2014).]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic).

SAINT VINCENT

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

On 11 March 2014, the Caribbean Community (Caricom), based in Georgetown, Guyana, approved a ten-point plan for reparations from the former slave-owning states of Europe at a two-day meeting in Saint Vincent and the Grenadines. Caricom said that European governments had been responsible for conducting slavery and genocide, and imposed racial apartheid and suffering on freed slaves and genocide survivors. It also declared that they had “refused to acknowledge such crimes or to compensate victims and their descendants.” The plan would pursue a full formal apology for slavery, repatriation to Africa, a development plan for the native Caribbean peoples and funding for cultural institutions. It also sought to address chronic diseases and psychological rehabilitation for trauma inflicted by slavery, technology transfer to make up for technological and scientific backwardness resulting from the slave era, and support for payment of domestic debt and cancelation of international debt. Slavery ended throughout the Caribbean in the 1800s in the wake of slave revolts. By the end of April 2014, a formal complaint would be presented to the European governments (including the United Kingdom, France and the Netherlands). If the latter would reject it, the Caricom nations would take their individual cases to the International Court of Justice.

[Source: Aileen Torres-Bennett, “Caribbean Nations Agree to Seek Slavery Reparations from Europe,” Reuters (11 March 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/03/11/us-caribbean-slavery-idUSBREA2A1ZR20140311>.)]

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011, 2013.

See Tunisia.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009, 2013.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2013.

Despite a historic agreement in April 2013 by the European Council to start European Union membership talks in January 2014 with Serbia, human rights concerns persisted. Prosecutions for war crimes committed in 1991–1995 progressed slowly in 2013. The Belgrade War Crimes Chamber reached convictions in six cases and acquitted two people in one case. The Office of the War Crimes Prosecutor indicted three people for crimes against civilians. Fourteen prosecutions were pending at the end of 2013. In February 2013, Serbia signed a war crimes protocol with Bosnia facilitating the mutual transfer of information and evidence of war crimes. In July, this resulted in an agreement to cooperate on investigations against 30 suspected war criminals believed to live in Serbia. In April 2013, Serbian President Tomislav Nikolić offered an apology on Bosnian TV in the name of the Serbian people for war crimes committed by Serb forces in Bosnia during the 1992–1995 war. The apology stopped short of calling the 1995 massacre in Srebrenica genocide. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 483–484.]

Kosovo

In the first nine months of 2013, the European Union Rule of Law Mission (EULEX) judges handed down five war crimes judgments, reaching acquittals in all but one case. The September acquittal of Fatmir Limaj and nine others in a case concerning the 1998 mass murder of Serb and Albanian civilians in Klecka by Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) forces illustrated weaknesses in Kosovo's witness protection program and challenged to prosecute crimes committed during and after Kosovo's 1998–1999 war. In October 2012, the EULEX special prosecutor charged 15 people with war crimes against civilians and prisoners in 1998 at a KLA detention center in Likovac. Hundreds of cases were pending before the Kosovo Special Prosecution Office, the War Crimes Investigative Unit of the Kosovo Police, and EULEX. At the end of 2013, 13 arrest warrants were outstanding concerning Serbs who were believed to reside outside Kosovo. EULEX continued to investigate 94 war crimes cases from the 1998–1999 war, including massacres in Meja, Dubrava, and Krusha thought to involve more than 1,000 victims. At the end of August, the Human Rights Review Panel (HRRP), an independent body set up by EULEX staff in 2009 to review allegations of human rights violations, handed down 15 decisions, finding violations in 5 cases.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 488–489.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina.

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007. See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011.

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011, 2013.

On 16 October 2013, chairman Ondrej Krajňák of the official Institute of National Memory (ÚPN; established to provide access to the records of the activities of the secret police of Czechoslovakia in 1939–1989) refused to open the extraordinary session of the ÚPN board and left the meeting. The other board members then unanimously approved a resolution which stated concern over what it called Krajňák's attempts to disable the operation of the ÚPN board. Krajňák perceived the publicized accusations as an effort of some board members to discredit him.

[Source: Slovak Spectator (17 October 2013; http://spectator.sme.sk/articles/view/51715/10/upn_head_accused_of_sabotaging_institute_responds_in_part_of_discrediting_campaign.html.)]

See also Russia.

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2013.

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012–2013.

In government-controlled areas, targeted killings, including of traditional elders, increased. The perpetrators were frequently unknown, although the Islamist armed group Al-Shabaab was often believed to be responsible.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 162.]

On 15 October 2011, Al-Shabaab issued a directive imposing its interpretation of Islam in all primary schools in the Middle Shabelle region. It threatened or killed teachers for refusing to comply with its demands. This included a ban on the teaching of geography and history, imposing its own teachers in schools, and using class time to teach extreme Islamist ideology. Al-Shabaab fighters toured the schools in the main districts of Middle Shabelle and donated new textbooks in Arabic ostensibly to replace the geography and history textbooks. In September 2009, Al-Shabaab had already warned against using United Nations-provided textbooks, claiming that they were teaching students “un-Islamic” subjects.

[Sources: Global Coalition to Protect Education from Attack, Education under Attack 2014 (New York 2014), 179; Mohammed Shiil, “Al-Shabaab Bans Teaching Geography and History, It Remains Unclear Why The Militant Group Issued The Order,” Somalia Report (http://www.somaliareport.com/index.php/post/1777/Al-Shabaab_Bans_Teaching_Geography_and_History; 16 October 2011).]

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012–2013.

In September 2010, National Archivist Graham Dominy [1953–] and archivist Clive Kirkwood were suspended by the Department of Arts and Culture on a series of administrative charges (related to the alleged favoring in late 2008 of a bidding company whose manager was a former national archives employee and to Dominy’s request to attend the International Council on Archives conference in Malta in November 2009). Both were later dismissed. In the ensuing legal case, not one of the charges was substantiated. In rulings of March 2012 and, after appeal, of May 2013, the Labour Court ordered the department to reinstate Dominy and Kirkwood or otherwise fully compensate them for loss of income.

[Sources: Tim Dunne, “Questions That Need Answers,” Mail & Guardian Online (6 July 2012; <http://mg.co.za/article/2012-07-06-questions-that-need-answers>); Shula Marks, “Do Not Let Our Archives Turn to Dust,” Mail & Guardian Online (29 June 2012; <http://mg.co.za/article/2012-06-28-do-not-let-our-archives-turn-to-dust>); Shula Marks, personal communication (August 2013).]

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2013.

In 2012, the Francisco Franco Foundation sued artist Eugenio Merino because they found that his artwork “Always Franco” (a Franco sculpture in a fridge shown at the ARCO international art show in Madrid in 2012) defamed Franco. They sought 18,000 euros in damages. In July 2013, a judge ruled that the sculpture was a legitimate piece of artistic expression. The foundation appealed the decision. [Source: Guy Hedgecoe, “Spanish Left Cold over ‘Franco in a Fridge’” (<http://www.dw.de/spanish-left-cold-over-franco-in-a-fridge/a-17029255>; 19 August 2013).]

On 25 June 2013, the Juzgado de Instrucción (court of first instance) No. 37 of Madrid interrogated internet journalist Gerardo Rivas Rico who was accused of defamation by the Falange (Falange española y de las JONS) because of the publication on 22 March 2012 of an article on www.plural.com in which he stated that the Falange was an organization with a long record of crimes against humanity since its foundation by José Antonio Primo de Rivera in 1933.

[Sources: Academia solidaria (<http://www.h-debate.com>; 3 June 2013); “La Falange se querrela contra la libertad de expresión e información” (<http://ala.org.es/la-falange-se-querrela-contra-la-libertad-de-expresion-e-informacion/>; 25 June 2013).]

In October 2013, a judge in Argentina exercised universal jurisdiction and requested extradition of two officials of the former Francisco Franco regime (1939–1975) for torture. In November 2013, the United Nations (UN) Committee on Enforced Disappearances urged Spain to investigate all enforced disappearances regardless of when they were committed, and concluded that incommunicado detention breached the prohibition of secret detention under the UN Convention on Enforced

Disappearance. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 450.]

On 10 December 2013, three Spanish nationalist parties—the governing People’s Party (PP), the unionist Ciutadans–Partit de la Ciutadania (C’s) and the Spanish nationalist and populist Unió Progreso y Democracia (UPyD)—requested the immediate cancelation of an academic symposium, “Spain against Catalonia: A Historical Overview (1714–2014).” They also filed a complaint against it for “incitement to discrimination, hate, or violence” (article 510 of the penal code) in the Superior Tribunal of Catalonia. The symposium, scheduled for 12–14 December 2013 and organized by the independent Institute of Catalan Studies (IEC; Catalonia’s Science and Language Academy) and the Center of Contemporary History of Catalonia (CHCC; linked to the Catalan government), sought to discuss long-term patterns of repression by the Spanish state against Catalan institutions. UPyD leader Rosa Díez compared the event with “Nazism.” Spanish Foreign Affairs Minister José Manuel García-Margallo said that the event was “a flagrant falsification of history” made by “excluding and nationalistic pseudo-historians.” The spokesperson of the Catalan government, Francesc Homs, accused the critics of having “double standards,” because they criticized the event but “shut up when Nazism [was] trivialized.” The symposium organizers, among whom were leading Catalan historians such as Jaume Sobrequés and Josep Fontana, emphasized the academic nature of the event. More than 200 people registered for the symposium and the IEC had to open an extra hall to accommodate the overflow crowd. The PP’s Catalan leader, Alicia Sánchez-Camacho, announced that the PP would organize its own “symposium of the truth.”

[Sources: Academia solidaria (<http://www.h-debate.com>; 12 December 2013); “Controversial Historical Symposium Begins by Praising Catalonia’s Affection towards Spanish Society” (12 December 2013; <http://www.catalannewsagency.com/politics/item/controversial-historical-symposium-begins-by-praising-catalonia-s-affection-towards-spanish-society>); “Spanish Nationalists Want to Close an Academic History Symposium in Catalonia” (11 December 2013; <http://www.catalannewsagency.com/politics/item/spanish-nationalists-want-to-close-an-academic-history-symposium-in-catalonia>); “Suing a Symposium: Spain against Catalonia” (11 December 2013; <http://www.newscatalonia.com/2013/12/spain-against-catalonia.html>).]

See also Switzerland.

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2013.

The government of President Mahinda Rajapaksa made little progress in 2013 in addressing accountability for serious human rights abuses committed during the country's nearly three-decades-long civil war (1983–2009). Sri Lanka's failure over several years to address war crimes allegations prompted the United Nations (UN) Human Rights Council (HRC) in March 2013 to issue a resolution calling on Sri Lanka to independently and credibly investigate violations of international humanitarian and human rights law. The resolution also called on UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay to give an oral update on the human rights situation in Sri Lanka during the HRC's September session, and to present a written report at the March 2014 session. Following the HRC resolution, the government issued several updates regarding its implementation of recommendations of its own Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission (LLRC), including investigations into a few war crimes allegations. Many of its claims were difficult to verify due to lack of government transparency, and, even if accurate, in important respects fell far short of the steps called for in the resolution. Special army courts of inquiry established in 2012 wholly exonerated the army of any laws of war violations despite significant evidence to the contrary. In response to LLRC concerns about enforced disappearances, the government established the latest in a long line of special commissions with a limited mandate and no clarity as to whether the government would publicize its findings. By September 2013, the government continued to detain 230 of the estimated 12,000 members and supporters of the defeated Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) held at the end of the civil war for "rehabilitation." High Commissioner Pillay travelled to Sri Lanka in August 2013. Her September oral report to the HRC was a scathing critique of the government's failures on postwar accountability. Pillay said she found no evidence of government efforts "to independently or credibly investigate the allegations" of war crimes and reported that the government had failed to implement many of the LLRC recommendations. Pillay said that the separation of the police from the Ministry of Defense, a key LLRC recommendation, remained incomplete as the police were placed under the command of a former army officer.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 387–388.]

In early May 2014, the registrar of Jaffna University sent out a circular announcing that the university would remain closed from 16 to 20 May 2014, coinciding with the days that the civil war (1983–2009) ended. The Science Teachers' Association condemned the closure and said that some university professors and student leaders had received death threats warning them against holding any commemoration for the war casualties, alleging that they were trying to revive the defeated Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE). Pointing to the official "Victory Day" celebration to mark the end of the war, the teachers asked why the Tamils alone were barred from remembering and mourning their dead.

[Source: Meera Srinivasan, “Jaffna Varsity Teachers Assert Right to Mourn,” The Hindu (14 May 2014; <http://www.thehindu.com/news/international/south-asia/jaffna-varsity-teachers-assert-right-to-mourn/article6006123.ece>).]

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2013.

In 2013, Sudan did not cooperate with the International Criminal Court (ICC). Arrest warrants or summonses for six men, including President Omar al-Bashir, on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes remained outstanding. A case involving alleged war crimes committed by one rebel leader proceeded at the ICC, while proceedings against a second rebel leader were terminated following his death.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 183.]

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012–2013.

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011, 2013.

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998.

See Rwanda.

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009.

In late 2012, Iris Ritzmann (1962–), a professor (1997–2013) and interim director (2010–2013) at the Medizinhistorischen Institut (MHIZ; Institute of the History of Medicine) at the University of Zürich, and her husband, ethnologist Eberhard Wolff, were temporarily arrested on charges of having provided the MHIZ annual report and a confidential expert report about the MHIZ Medical History Museum to a journalist of the Tages-Anzeiger newspaper. The expert report contained criticism of Christoph Mörgeli, the museum curator and also a right-wing Swiss People's Party member of parliament and member of the Swiss National Council. She also gave the journalist access to the university's learning platform. Following publication of the critical article, Mörgeli claimed to be harassed by colleagues because of his political views, but he was subsequently dismissed from his position. In November 2012, Ritzmann was suspended pending a legal investigation initiated against her. Although the public prosecutor of the Canton of Zürich did not release any results, Ritzmann was dismissed on 29 October 2013. On 6 November 2013, the rector, Andreas Fischer, resigned over the affair. On 8 November 2013, 600 academics from around the world signed a petition asking for Ritzmann's reinstatement. The petition also asked for "deeply rooted" problems at the MHIZ to be made public and for an explanation into if and why the Zürich public prosecutor had been given access to university emails.

[Sources: "Petition Regarding Dismissal of Prof. Dr. Iris Ritzmann"

(<http://corpsetmedecine.hypotheses.org/5322>; 30 October 2013); "University Sacking Attracts Protest from Abroad," Swissinfo.ch (8 November 2013); Wikipedia (14 December 2013).]

In May, July, and September 2005, Doğu Perinçek (1942–), chairman of the Turkish Workers' Party, asserted in Lausanne, Opfikon (during a lecture commemorating the 1923 Lausanne Treaty) and Köniz that the Armenian genocide was an "international lie." He also distributed a tract in German entitled "The Great Powers and the Armenian Question" in which he denied that the 1915 massacres constituted genocide. On 15 July 2005, the Association "Switzerland-Armenia" filed a suit. Under the penal code, any act of denying, belittling or justifying genocide was a violation of the anti-racism legislation. On 9 March 2007, the police court found Perinçek guilty of racial discrimination and ordered him to pay a fine, declaring that the Armenian genocide was an established historical fact. The verdict was confirmed by the Vaud cantonal appeal court in June 2007 and by the Federal Court on 12 December 2007. It was the first time that the Federal Court ruled in a case of Armenian genocide denial. It declared that Perinçek's sentence served to protect the human dignity of the members of the Armenian community, who derived part of their identity from the memory of the

1915 genocide. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2008 and 2009.]

On 17 December 2013, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that Perinçek's right to free expression was violated and that his criminal conviction for denial that the atrocities perpetrated against the Armenian people in 1915 and later years constituted genocide was unjustified. The court found that Perinçek's opinion did not incite hatred or violence, or express contempt for the victims of the events and that, therefore, Perinçek did not abuse his rights. It further doubted that there could be a general consensus as to those events, especially their legal characterization as genocide, given that historical research was by definition open to discussion. It also observed that the twenty States which had officially recognized the Armenian genocide had not found it necessary to enact laws imposing criminal sanctions on individuals questioning the official view. The Court also distinguished the present case from Holocaust denial cases, in which the applicants had denied the historical facts (such as the existence of the gas chambers) and the Nazi crimes which had been found by an international court to be clearly established. The court also referred to the Spanish Constitutional Court, which in November 2007 had taken the view that the mere negation of a crime of genocide did not constitute direct incitement to violence, and to the French Constitutional Council which in February 2012 had declared unconstitutional a law which made it a criminal offence to deny the existence of the genocides recognized by the law, finding it to be incompatible with freedom of expression and freedom of research. Finally, it pointed out that in 2011 the United Nations Human Rights Committee had expressed its conviction that "[l]aws that penalize[d] the expression of opinions about historical facts [were] incompatible with the obligations that the Covenant [on Civil and Political Rights] impose[d] on States parties..." and that the "Covenant [did] not permit general prohibition of expressions of an erroneous opinion or an incorrect interpretation of past events."

[Sources include: European Court of Human Rights, Cas de Perincek: Exposé des faits (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/180.pdf>; 2010); European Court of Human Rights, Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/325.pdf>; 2013); Tribunal d'arrondissement de Lausanne, Jugement rendu par le Tribunal de Police le 9 mars 2007 à 11:45 heures dans la cause Dogu Perincek (http://www.concernedhistorians.org/content_files/file/le/70.pdf; 2007); Tribunal fédéral suisse, Cas de Perincek (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/179.pdf>; 2007).]

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2013.

More than 90 percent of the most valuable archaeological sites were reportedly situated in high-conflict areas. All the six world heritage sites of Syria (ancient villages of Northern Syria, Bosra, Crac des Chevaliers, Palmyra, Damascus and Aleppo, which was one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the world) were damaged. Many museums (e.g., in Homs and Hama) were looted and sculptures, inscription tablets, coins and tesserae (tiles used in making mosaics) were put on sale abroad. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

In May-June 2014, a new wave of organized archaeological looting began at Dura-Europos, the Ottoman period gate at Deir Ez-Zor was bombed, a medieval Christian graveyard was desecrated, and the Jewish Synagogue in Jobar was destroyed. On 24 June 2014, the Ministry of Culture and Family Affairs for the Syrian Interim Government announced the creation of a Heritage Task Force to help protect Syrian cultural heritage.

[Sources: Rasha Faek, "Hidden Victim of Syria's Conflict: Historical Heritage," Al-Fanar Media (<http://www.al-fanarmedia.org/2014/02/hidden-victim-of-syrias-conflict-historical-heritage>; 20 February 2014); Syrian Coalition, "Interim Government Establishes Heritage Task Force" (National Coalition of Syrian Revolution and Opposition Forces; <http://www.etilaf.us/heritagetf>; 24 June 2014).]

A scholar of medieval Islamic architecture and urban architectural history (name unknown) was threatened with arrest because he was seen as expressing sympathy for the opposition in speaking out against Syrian ministers. Despite his efforts to promote Syria's cultural heritage, he went into exile.

[Source: Allan E. Goodman, "Protecting Scholars of Art from Persecution," Huffington Post (3 April 2014; http://www.huffingtonpost.com/allan-e-goodman/protecting-scholars-of-ar_b_5086911.html?utm_hp_ref=tw).]

See also Iraq.

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012.

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010.

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2013.

In May 2013, the Supreme Court ruled that defaming past monarchs was a crime under the lèse majesté law, thereby making explicit a situation already in existence for decades. Details of this decision became known on 8 November 2013, when the court treated the case of a journalist (name withheld by the court) who had criticized slavery during Rama IV's reign (1851–68) in a 2005 radio broadcast. (Slavery was abolished in 1905 under Rama V only.) The Supreme Court ruled that this view defamed the monarchy, saying that it could lead to the misunderstanding that Thailand was badly governed under Rama IV and had no freedom at the time. It added that defaming the former king could affect the present king and create dissatisfaction among those revering deceased kings, impacting on national security. The journalist received a four-year prison sentence, later reduced to a two-year suspended sentence.

Kullada Kesboonchoo Mead, a political scientist from Chulalongkorn University, author of The Rise and Decline of Thai Absolutism, said the ruling affected her work about past monarchies: she was reportedly advised to review it to make it compatible with the law because it was being translated into Thai. The Thai studies program at her university had banned her (English) book, along with those of historians Somsak Jeamteerasakul and Suthachai Yimprasert [see NCH Annual Reports 2010–2011.] Thikan Srinara, a historian at Srinakharinwirot University in Bangkok, said that the ruling affected historical research and that the law should be abolished because it severely limited academic freedom, especially in history and political science.

[Source: Suluck Lamubol, "Lèse Majesté Ruling on Past Monarchs a Research Blow," University World News (29 November 2013).]

On 1 November 2013, the House of Representatives passed an amnesty bill proposed by the Pheu

Thai Party that promised a full amnesty for protesters from all political sides charged with or convicted of actions against the state (political violence and corruption) from 2004 to 2011, for authorities who ordered crackdowns on protesters, for soldiers who carried out the crackdowns, and for individuals convicted of corruption after the 2006 coup. Even though the Senate rejected this bill on 11 November, anti-amnesty protests in Bangkok and other provinces escalated. More than 100,000 people took to the streets in what protest leaders publicly called an attempt to topple the government of Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra and eliminate the political network of former Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra. Clashes on 30 November between pro and anti-government groups left at least 4 dead and 60 wounded. Protesters from the People's Democratic Reform Committee (PDRC) and other anti-government groups clashed with police when they tried to storm the Government House and the Bangkok Metropolitan Police headquarters on 1 and 3 December, leading to more than 200 injuries—mostly side-effects from exposure to teargas.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 394.]

On 11 November 2013, the International Court of Justice unanimously ruled that the territory surrounding the Preah Vihear temple was Cambodian. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2009, 2011–2013.]

[Sources: International Court of Justice, Case Summaries: Case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear (Merits)—Judgment of 15 June 1952 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/193.pdf>); <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/240.pdf>); International Court of Justice, Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 15 June 1962 in the Case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear (Cambodia v. Thailand) (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/313.pdf>; 2013).]

On 12 February 2014, assailants fired repeated shots and threw homemade bombs at the home and car of historian Somsak Jeamteerasakul, an outspoken critic of the monarchy [see also NCH Annual Report 2011.] Somsak was at home but was not harmed in the attack.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, “Thailand: ‘Red Shirt’ Activist Murdered—Prominent Poet Opposed Law Barring Criticism of Monarchy” (23 April 2014; <http://www.hrw.org/news/2014/04/23/thailand-red-shirt-activist-murdered>).]

On 24 May 2014, two days after the National Council for Peace and Order (NCPO; the military junta) took power and declared martial law, it ordered some 35 pro-democracy scholars and writers to report to military authorities or face possible arrest or fines. Among them was historian Somsak Jeamteerasakul. [See also entries above and NCH Annual Report 2011.] On 28 May 2014, the junta also summoned exiled writers facing lèse majesté charges, including Joe Gordon [see NCH Annual Reports 2011–2012], to appear in Bangkok by 9 June 2014. In total, more than 500 politicians, academics and activists were eventually summoned and/or detained for up to seven days under martial law to ensure “cooperation” and “attitude adjustment.” In early July 2014, the junta revoked Somsak’s passport after he failed to report following several summonses and an arrest warrant.

[Sources: Academic Freedom Monitor (24 May 2014; <http://monitoring.academicfreedom.info/reports/2014-05-24-various-universities>); Suluck Lamubol, “Academics, Students Flee As Military Takes Over in Latest Coup,” University World News (31 May 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140530122322452>); “35 Politicians, Scholars Summoned,” Bangkok Post (24 May 2014; <http://www.bangkokpost.com/news/politics/411535/35-politicians-scholars-summoned>); Suluck Lamubol, “Junta Is Still Threatening Academics during ‘Talks’,” University World News (9 July 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=2014070916510040>); Yojana Sharma, “Pressure on Thai Students, Scholars Extends Overseas,” University World News (4 June 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140604122501561>).]

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2013.

See Australia.

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2013.

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2013.

In June 2013, the National Constituent Assembly (NCA) began considering a draft transitional justice law, which proposed the creation of a Council of Truth and Dignity to uncover the truth about past rights abuses. At the end of 2013, the law had yet to be enacted.

Military courts had tried several groups of defendants accused of killing protesters during the revolution which toppled former President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali (December 2010–January 2011).

A military court also sentenced Ben Ali, who remained in Saudi Arabia, to life imprisonment for complicity in murder, after trying him in absentia, and jailed several former high-ranking officials. These trials appeared to respect defendants' rights and enabled some victims to pursue justice, but several factors undermined their value towards achieving accountability, notably the authorities' failure to identify the direct perpetrators of killings and lack of an adequate legal framework to prosecute senior officers with command responsibility for crimes that their subordinates committed. The government's failure to press effectively for Ben Ali's extradition from Saudi Arabia also undermined accountability. Although Ben Ali's security forces used torture extensively, the new authorities had failed to investigate the majority of torture cases. In the one torture-related trial that took place, a court convicted former Interior Minister Abdallah Kallel and three security officials of "using violence against others either directly or through others," and sentenced them to two year prison terms. The case arose from the arrest and detention of 17 senior military officers in 1991 in connection with an alleged plot by the Islamist group Al-Nahdha against Ben Ali.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 620–621.]

In December 2013, 36 civil society organizations signed an open letter urgently demanding the legal protection of the archives of the Ben Ali dictatorship (1987–2011) (. [See also NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: "Appel de 36 associations et organisations de la société civile pour la protection des archives de la dictature" (Webdo; 14 December 2013; <http://www.webdo.tn/2013/12/14/appel-de-36-associations-et-organisations-de-la-societe-civile-pour-la-protection-des-archives-de-la-dictature>).]

On 17 June 2014, the court of appeals confirmed the acquittal of historian Habib Kazdaghli, dean of the Faculty of Letters, Arts and Humanities at the Manouba campus of the University of Tunis. [See NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Source: Scholars at Risk, News Release (20 June 2014).]

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2013.

Great obstacles remained in securing justice for victims of abuses by police, military, and state officials. The lifting of the statute of limitations for the prosecution of torture was a positive element in the April 2013 reform bill, though prosecution of unlawful killings by state perpetrators was still subject to a 20-year time limit, raising concerns about impunity for abuses committed in the early 1990s. Following a visit in November 2012, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary or Arbitrary Executions had concluded that “the most important and urgent challenge [was] the lack of accountability in cases of killings, both those perpetrated recently and those from the 1990s.”

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 503.]

In May 2013, Turkish-Armenian writer Sevan Nişanyan (1956–) was sentenced to 13.5 months’ imprisonment on blasphemy charges because in a September 2012 blog he had discussed the YouTube video Innocence of Muslims in which he said that lampooning the Prophet Mohammed was not hate speech. Nişanyan studied history, philosophy and political systems of Latin America at Yale and Columbia Universities.

In 2008 he had written a critical book about Atatürk, Kemalism and the origins of the Turkish Republic (Yanlış Cumhuriyet: Atatürk ve Kemalizm Üzerine 51 soru [The False Republic: 51 Questions about Atatürk and Kemalism]). In 2010 he had published the book Adını Unutan Ülke: Türkiye’de Adı Değiştirilen Yerler Sözlüğü. (The Country that Forgets Its Names: Dictionary of Locations with New Names in Turkey). On 15 June 2010, the Radio and Television Supreme Council (RTÜK) had decided to impose a broadcast ban on the Haber Türk television station after Nişanyan had commented on the 1915 Armenian genocide as a guest on the “One to One” program. RTÜK said that Nişanyan “exceeded the limits of criticism” with his statements that allegedly “humiliated the Republic of Turkey.”

[Sources: Bianet, Ifex Alert (6 July 2010); “Blasphemischer Blogeintrag: Türkisch-armenischer Autor zu über einem Jahr Haft verurteilt,” Deutsch Türkische Nachrichten (<http://www.deutsch-tuerkische-nachrichten.de/2013/05/476384/blasphemischer-blogeintrag-tuerkisch-armenischer-autor-zu-ueber-einem-jahr-haft-verurteilt>); 22 May 2013); Arpi Hamalian, personal communication (26 January 2014); Reporters without Borders, Ifex Alert (15 March 2013); Nadya Uygun, Urgent Action! Freedom for Sevan Nisanyan (n.d. [January 2014]); Wikipedia (French and German versions; 27 January 2014).]

In late July 2013, some 60 archaeologists, historians, architects, and activists criticized the official policy favoring government-backed development projects that threatened the historic Ottoman sites of Istanbul. Among this threatened heritage were the Ottoman shipyard Tersane and the Yedikule gardens. Remarkably, the government fashioned itself as reviving the Ottoman past.

[Source: Clare M. Gillis, “Scholars in Turkey, at Some Risk, Fight Destruction of Historic Ottoman Sites,” Chronicle of Higher Education (9 September 2013).]

The retrial of a group of young men for the January 2007 murder of journalist Hrant Dink [see NCH

Annual Reports 2006–2013] began in September 2013 following the Court of Cassation decision to quash the first verdict on procedural grounds. To date there has been inadequate investigation of evidence of state collusion in Dink's murder.

The trial of coup plotters against the ruling Justice and Development Party (the "Ergenekon gang") [see NCH Annual Reports 2010–2013] ended in August 2013 with 259 defendants receiving a range of long sentences and 21 acquitted. The case was under appeal. While the Ergenekon case represented a milestone in civilian control over the military, it illustrated the serious concerns regarding the proliferation in recent years, and the fairness, of "mass trials" in which multiple defendants were alleged to have been part of terrorist groups. In the Ergenekon case, there were concerns too that there was no investigation of the human rights abuses in which a core group of military suspects were implicated.

In September 2013, the trial began of 103 retired members of the top military (5 in detention at the end of 2013) charged with removing the government of former Prime Minister Necmettin Erbakan in 1997.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 503–504.]

On 12 December 2013, the Turkish-Armenian weekly Agos revealed that academics working on dissertations about the 1915 Armenian genocide were scrutinized by the Turkish Historical Society (TTK). According to Agos, the TTK asked the Higher Education Board for the details of such academics, which, in turn, asked universities to provide them. In 2013, only four theses were written on the issue and, speaking of "Armenian genocide claims," they all reflected the official denialist position on the massacres. The secret profiling of Armenian genocide scholars was indirectly confirmed by two former presidents of Boğaziçi University, Istanbul.

[Source: Orhan Kemal Cengiz, "Turkish Academia and the Armenian Genocide," Al-Monitor (http://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2013/12/turkey-armenia-genocide-academic-research-media-exposure.html?utm_source=&utm_medium=email&utm_campaign=8781#; 23 December 2013).]

On 20 December 2013, historian Ayşe Berktaş was released pending trial. She stood as a candidate for mayor in the Istanbul district elections of 30 March 2014. [See NCH Annual Report 2013.]

[Sources: "Ayşe Berktaş Talks to PEN: Turkish Writer and Activist Ayşe Berktaş Talks to PEN" (<http://www.pen-international.org/03/2014/ayse-berktay-talks-to-pen>; 8 March 2014); International PEN Rapid Action Network, RAN 23/13 (12 June 2013), [Update 1] (24 September 2013), [Update 2] (20 December 2013); <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/71.pdf>.]

On 23 April 2014—the eve of the 99th anniversary of the 1915 Armenian genocide—Prime Minister

Recep Tayyip Erdoğan offered condolences for the events for the first time. He said the events of 1915 had had “inhumane consequences,” and expressed hope that those who died were at peace but stopped short of describing the mass killings as “genocide.” It was the first time that a Turkish leader formally offered condolences for the mass killings. Erdoğan also repeated calls to set up a joint historical commission into the events surrounding the killings—a request so far denied by the Armenian authorities. He also said that Turkey had opened its archives to all researchers, a statement that was strongly qualified by historians (access to open archives, including military archives, was still obstructed). The Turkish and Armenian governments had agreed to normalize relations in October 2009, but peace efforts had since stalled. Armenia said that up to 1.5 million people died during the 1915 events, whereas Turkey maintained that the number was much smaller. The reactions to Erdoğan’s message were mixed.

[Sources: Bianet, “Open Archives Are Faulty, Military Archives Are De Facto Closed” (24 April 2014; <http://www.bianet.org/english/world/155390-open-archives-are-faulty-military-archives-are-de-facto-closed>); “The Message of the Prime Minister of the Republic of Turkey, Recep Tayyip Erdoğan on the Events of 1915 (unofficial translation),” Today’s Zaman (24 April 2014; <http://www.todayszaman.com/news-345906-erdogan-offers-turkeys-first-condolences-to-armenians-for-1915.html>); “Erdoğan Offers Turkey’s First Condolences to Armenians for 1915,” Today’s Zaman (24 April 2014; <http://www.todayszaman.com/news-345906-erdogan-offers-turkeys-first-condolences-to-armenians-for-1915.html>); “Turkey Offers Condolences to Armenia over WWI killings,” BBC News (23 April 2014; <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-27131543>).]

See also Armenia, Switzerland, United States.

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012.

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2013.

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011, 2013.

On 8 December 2013, when hundreds of thousands of people took to the streets of Kiev to protest against a customs union of Ukraine with Russia (which was to replace a European Union association agreement), some toppled a statue of Soviet leader Vladimir Lenin (1870–1924) at the top of Shevchenko Boulevard and smashed it with hammers. Prime Minister Mykola Azarov compared the act to the destruction of the Bamiyan Buddhas in Afghanistan in 2001. Lenin symbolized Ukraine's shared history with Russia. Other statues of his were toppled in Kotovsk and Dnepropetrovsk. In total, 25 Lenin statues were reported country-wide to be dismantled between December 2013 and February 2014. In Dnepropetrovsk, Lenin Square was renamed into Heroes of Maidan Square. On 23 February 2014, the "Soviet Soldier"—a monument erected in 1965 and commemorating the collective sacrifice of the Soviet army against Nazi forces—was toppled in Stryi, Lvov region.

[Sources: BBC News (8 December 2013); "Monument to Soldiers who Died Liberating Ukraine from Nazis Toppled" (<http://rt.com/news/war-monument-toppled-ukraine-351>; 23 February 2014); NRC Handelsblad (9 December 2013: 13; 24 February 2014: C9); Trouw (8 December 2013).]

On 20 February 2014, a day of bloody clashes between government troops and the opposition, Bohdan Solchanyk (1985–2014), a leading activist and historian in Lviv, was shot dead in Kiev as he walked to a protest tent that he had been mistakenly informed was under opposition control. On 22 February 2014, hundreds of mourners gathered in Lviv for a church service marking his death. Solchanyk had been due to submit his doctoral dissertation.

[Source: Tom Balmforth, "Tears In Lviv For A Fallen 'Hero'," Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (<http://www.rferl.org/articleprintview/25273844.html>; 22 February 2014).]

When on 22 February 2014 President Viktor Yanukovich fled the country, his staff attempted to get rid of tens of thousands of sheets of paper by burning or shredding them or by dumping them into a reservoir. In the weeks following his ouster, the documents saved from the reservoir were uploaded onto a new website called Yanukovich Leaks. A group of volunteers tried to piece together the shredded documents in the hope of uncovering corruption. Former General Prosecutor Viktor Pshonka and former Energy Minister Eduard Stavvytsky also reportedly tried to hide incriminating evidence.

[Source: BBC News (1 April 2014).]

On 1 March 2014, during the Russian occupation of the Crimea, men with guns stormed and occupied the offices of the Crimean Center for Investigative Journalism. The staff fled, managing to take only part of their files and equipment. Over the rest of the weekend, the Center was supported by the Internet Archive to preserve their web material.

[Source: Ian Milligan, "Preserving History as It Happens: The Internet Archive and the Crimean Crisis," ActiveHistory.ca (25 March 2014; <http://activehistory.ca/2014/03/preserving-history-as-it-happens>).]

On 16 March 2014 (the day Crimeans voted in a referendum to rejoin Russia), during protests against the new pro-Western government in Kharkiv, pro-Russian demonstrators broke into the offices of the Ukrainian cultural center Prosvita (Enlightenment), destroyed a portrait of the poet Taras Shevchenko (1814–1861) and burned Ukrainian-language books, including a volume devoted to the Holodomor (the famine that as a result of Stalin's farm collectivization program killed millions of people in 1932–33).

[Sources: Lina Kushch, "Pro-Russian Demonstrators Burn Books, Storm Buildings in Eastern Ukraine," Reuters (16 March 2014; <http://www.reuters.com/article/2014/03/16/us-ukraine-east-idUSBREA2F0P220140316>); NRC Handelsblad (17 March 2014), 6; (28 March 2014), 11.]

On 25 March 2014, after the Euromaidan protests, the new government appointed a new director of the Ukrainian National Memory Institute, Volodymyr Viatrovykh (1978–). As Director of the Security Service of Ukraine Archives in 2008–2010, he had opened the archives of the KGB (Komitet gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti; Committee of State Security) to the public. The Security Service of Ukraine appointed a new archive director, Ihor Kulyk (1983–), an expert with access to the archives of the Center for Research on the Liberation Movement (www.cdvr.org.ua; a non-governmental research institution founded by Viatrovykh in 2002 and containing the majority of the KGB archival materials). Kulyk intended to facilitate access to KGB materials and transfer the archival materials from 1918–1991 to the National Memory Institute.

[Sources: "KGB Archives in Ukraine Will Be Open to Public," Euromaidan Wache Berlin (1 April 2014; <http://euromaidanberlin.wordpress.com/2014/04/01/kgb-archives-in-ukraine-will-be-open-to-public>); Kyiv Post (24 February 2011); Inna Zavorodnya & Vladyslav Hrynevych, "Erasing Ukraine's Memories," Transitions Online (17 July 2012; <http://www.tol.org/client/article/23261-ukraine-culture-history-russia.html>).]

See also Belarus, Russia.

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2013.

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2013.

In October 2013, it was revealed that the Ministry of Defence unlawfully held more than 66,000 files in breach of the 30-year rule (stipulated in the 1958 Public Records Act and providing transfer of these files to the National Archives), including documents about the Troubles in Northern Ireland (1969–1998). The existence of the Northern Ireland files (most from the 1970s and early 1980s) was not declared to the Historic Enquiries Team (HET), a police unit that reviewed hundreds of violent deaths during those years.

[Source: Ian Cobain, “Ministry of Defence Holds 66,000 Files in Breach of 30-Year Rule,” Guardian (6 October 2013).]

In October 2013, it was also revealed that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO; or Foreign Office) had unlawfully stored in a secret archive near London 1.2 million files of historic documents (called “the Special Collections”) dating as far back as the 1840s (and the 1856 treaty of Paris, which concluded the Crimean war) that should have been declassified and handed over to the National Archives. The FCO was expected to devise a plan for declassification and transfer of the archive. The news came after the FCO admitted in 2011 that an archive of 8800 colonial-era documents (“the migrated archive”) had been stored for decades in a secret archive near London [see NCH Annual Report 2013]. Most of the latter archive was made public, with the exception of certain files. The reason why “certain files” had to remain secret was secret itself. The FCO never explained why these massive file collections were hidden, but fears for embarrassment, litigation and damage to diplomatic relations were cited among the reasons.

[Sources: Ian Cobain, “Foreign Office Hoarding 1m Historic Files in Secret Archive,” Guardian (18 October 2013); Ian Cobain, “Academics Consider Legal Action to Force Foreign Office to Release Public Records,” Guardian (13 January 2014); Ian Cobain, “Foreign Office Excludes Public from its Public Records Day,” Guardian (17 March 2014).]

The Belfast Project was the name of an oral history archive, stored by the Centre for Irish Programs at Boston College, United States, and believed to contain some 46 taped testimonies, gathered between 2001 and 2006, from both Irish Republican and Loyalist paramilitaries in Northern Ireland about their experiences during the Troubles (1969–1998). The British authorities sought—and in court gained—access to the archive despite the pledge of the interviewers that the tapes would remain confidential until after the death of the interviewed [see NCH Annual Reports 2012–2013]. In July 2013, it became known that Boston College did not have all the codes that identified the participants in the interviews and also did not have some of the deeds of gift for the interviews, thereby greatly diminishing the evidential value of the interviews.

On 22 March 2014, ex-IRA senior commander Ivor Bell Ivor was charged with aiding and abetting in the shooting and disappearance of Jean McConville [see NCH Annual Reports 2012–2013] on the basis of an interview he gave to the Belfast Project under the name “Z.” On 30 April 2014, Gerry Adams, the president (1983–present) of the Irish republican political party Sinn Féin (and allegedly second in command of the Belfast IRA in 1972), was arrested as part of the interrogation in the McConville case. As a result, Belfast Project interviewer Anthony McIntyre reportedly feared for his safety. Since Adams’s arrest, McIntyre and Ed Moloney, Belfast Project director, faced sustained verbal attacks. Sinn Féin councilors and their supporters labeled them “Boston College touts” —a euphemism for informers. McIntyre’s wife’s messages to United States diplomats were possibly intercepted and leaked to an Irish Sunday tabloid.

Meanwhile, NBC News petitioned the United States district court in Boston for full access to the archives. On 22 May 2014, the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) said that it would seek access to the entire Belfast Project archive. On 18 June 2014, the United States non-governmental organization MuckRock filed a Freedom of Information Act request to the United States Department of Justice for all its records on the United Kingdom’s request for access to the oral histories made by the Belfast Project.

[Sources: Krishnadev Calamur, “Sinn Fein Leader’s Arrest Ignites Debate Over Academic Freedom” (2 May 2014; <http://www.npr.org/blogs/thetwo-way/2014/05/02/308949576/sinn-fein-leader-s-arrest-ignites-debate-over-academic-freedom>); “Case against McConville Accused Based on US Interviews,” Irish Times (22 March 2014; <http://www.irishtimes.com/news/crime-and-law/case-against-mcconville-accused-based-on-us-interviews-1.1735104>); International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of July 2013, 5, 10; News of August 2013, 6; Henry McDonald, “Ex-IRA Commander Accused of Role in Notorious Troubles-era Murder,” Guardian (22 March 2014; <http://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2014/mar/22/ira-troubles-murder-ivor-bell-court-jean-mcconville>); Henry McDonald, “From IRA Militant to Troubles Historian ... and Now Living in Fear after Adams Arrest,” Guardian (3 May 2014; http://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2014/may/03/gerry-adams-ira-anthony-mcintyre-hate-campaign?CMP=tw_t_gu); Henry

McDonald, “Call for Investigation of Alleged Boston College-IRA Archive Spying,” Guardian (18 June 2014; <http://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2014/jun/18/call-investigation-boston-college-ira-spying>); Beth McMurtrie, “Secrets from Belfast: How Boston College’s Oral History of the Troubles Fell Victim to an International Murder Investigation” (<http://chronicle.com/article/Secrets-From-Belfast/144059>; 26 January 2014); Beth McMurtrie, “Northern Irish Police Seek Boston’s Entire Oral History Archive,” University World News (30 May 2014; <http://www.universityworldnews.com/article.php?story=20140530122611229>).]

See also Rwanda, Saint Vincent, United States.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2013.

A 1991 statute mandated that the State Department publish the documentary record of United States foreign policy (a historical series called Foreign Relations of the United States or FRUS) no later than 30 years after the events described. But on 26 June 2013, the State Department’s Historical Advisory Committee (HAC) issued a report (“Report of the Advisory Committee on Historical Diplomatic Documentation, January 1–December 31, 2012”) that concluded that government programs to declassify national security information did not meet public expectations, the needs of historians, or the requirements of law. It noted “substantial delays in the declassification and publication processes” and criticized the substantial percentage of records reviewed by the National Declassification Center that were not cleared for release to the public.

[Source: Steven Aftergood, “Historians See Crisis in Declassification” (<http://blogs.fas.org/secretcy/2013/07/crisis-in-declass>; 2 July 2013).]

Emails from January 2010 obtained in July 2013 by the Associated Press through a public records request showed that former Governor Mitch Daniels of Indiana (2005–2013) exerted his influence to keep A People’s History of the United States (1980, 2003), a best-selling book by left-wing historian Howard Zinn (1922–2010), out of the classrooms in favor of America: The Last Best Hope (2 volumes; 2006–2007), a book by William Bennett (former education secretary under President Ronald Reagan). Daniels had dubbed Zinn “anti-American.” The news sparked a surge in demand for the book at Indiana libraries.

[Source: Tom LoBianco, “Daniels: Teach Bennett Text Instead of Zinn,” Courier Press (<http://posttrib.suntimes.com/news/22017618-418/daniels-teach-bennett-text-instead-of-zinn.html#.U-> ZgdGOjeno; 18 August 2013).]

In August 2013, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) closed its Historical Document Declassification Office for budgetary reasons, handing the latter's workload over to the office that handled Freedom of Information Act requests. The move was widely criticized.

[Source: Tim Cushing, "Blaming Sequestration, CIA Closes Historical Document Declassification Office" (<http://www.techdirt.com/articles/20130822/13141424284/blaming-sequestration-cia-closes-historical-document-declassification-office.shtml>; 23 August 2013).]

In October 2013, Matthew Papay, a second-year student at the University of Rochester, was ordered to take down a Confederate flag he had put in the window of his room on campus a week before. He declared that, by doing so, college officials violated his right to express his cultural identity. He also said that he had no intention to offend anyone. The flag was seen by many as a symbol of hate and racism that represented white domination of African-Americans.

[Source: James Goodman & Sean Dobbin, "Confederate Flag Raises Issues, Ire at a N.Y. College," USA Today (23 October 2013).]

On 22 October 2013, the Tucson Unified School District voted to reinstate previously banned books on Chicano history, which could be used in United States history and world history classrooms in high and middle school. [See NCH Annual Report 2012.]

[Source: Hector Tobar, "Tucson School Board Lifts Ban on Latino Studies Books," Los Angeles Times (25 October 2013; <http://articles.latimes.com/2013/oct/25/entertainment/la-et-jc-tucson-school-board-latino-studies-books-20131025>).]

On 4 November 2013, Columbia College in Chicago decided to remove one section of the course "The Israeli/Palestinian Conflict" scheduled for the spring of 2014. The move followed a few days after an anonymous student complained about "bias" in the same course taught by Iymen Chehade, a historian and part-time faculty member, in the fall of 2013. Chehade had screened the Oscar-nominated film 5 Broken Cameras (2012; 94 minutes), chronicling non-violent Palestinian resistance as Israel Defense Forces constructed a separation wall in the village of Bil'in on the West Bank. Steven Corey, chair of the Department of Humanities, History, and Social Sciences (HHSS), asked Chehade to address the subject matter in a more "balanced" way. A petition was organized to request the course's reinstatement. After conducting an independent investigation, the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) issued a finding on 25 March 2014 that Columbia College was in violation of Chehade's academic freedom by canceling the section. It read, inter alia: "His academic freedom gives him the right to introduce controversial course-related topics, and materials into his classroom. He need not insure that equal time in the name of balance is given on every topic brought into class. A course on slavery need not proffer arguments for and against the racist, dreaded institution. A course on gay rights or the history of genocide need not ‘balance’ the number of arguments in favor of gay rights and in opposition to genocide with those that support discrimination against homosexuals and mass murder.” The college objected to the AAUP conclusions, but eventually reinstated the canceled section in late March 2014. The Israeli director of the documentary, Guy Davidi, wrote to Chehade, saying that his film had been officially accepted to the cultural program of the Israeli Ministry of Education. It had been screened in dozens of Israeli schools.

In the fall of 2011, some student members of Hillel (a foundation for Jewish Campus Life) had signed a petition also charging Chehade with bias, later citing as examples that he used terms such as (the accurate) “Occupied Territories” (rather than “Disputed Territories”) to refer to the West Bank and Gaza, and “ethnic cleansing” to refer to the expulsion of about 750,000 Palestinians from Israel in 1948. In response, dozens of students circulated and signed a petition in Chehade’s defense.

[Sources: American Association of University Professors (Illinois Conference), Finding in the Case of Iymen Chehade (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/341.pdf>; 25 March 2014); “Columbia College Chicago Reinstates Professor Chehade’s The Israel/Palestinian Conflict Course” (press release; 31 March 2014); Faten Dabis, “Respect Academic Freedom! Petition by Faten Dabis” (http://www.change.org/petitions/llove-colum-edu-respect-academic-freedom?recruiter=2769606&utm_campaign=signature_receipt&utm_medium=email&utm_source=s_hare_petition); Faten Dabis, “Update about ‘Llove@colum.edu: Respect Academic Freedom!’ on Change.org” (20 & 27 March 2014; 14 April 2014); Nick DeSantis, “Columbia College Chicago Is Accused of Violating Academic Freedom,” Chronicle of Higher Education (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/ticker/columbia-college-chicago-is-accused-of-violating-adjuncts-academic-freedom/74909>; March 27, 2014); “A Statement in Support of Columbia College Instructor Iymen Chehade: Respect for Academic Freedom Is about Deeds, not Lip Service” (20 March 2014).]

In December 2013, the State Department released records documenting the covert CIA actions in Congo in 1960–1968, including plans to assassinate Prime Minister Patrice Lumumba (1925–1961) and the provision of military support to the government to quell provincial rebellions. The 1994 Foreign Relations of the United States volume on the Congo Crisis had omitted such information.

[Source: Steven Aftergood, “Two-Decade Review Yields History of Covert Action in Congo” (<http://blogs.fas.org/secrecy/>; 23 December 2013).]

In December 2013, Michael F. Scheuer, a former CIA official who as an adjunct faculty member has taught in the Center for Security Studies of Georgetown University’s School of Foreign Service, wrote a blog post criticizing President Barack Obama and Prime Minister David Cameron, denouncing their governments' interventions in the Muslim world and questioning the actions of the National Security Agency. Scheuer quoted Algernon Sidney (1623–1683), an English politician and republican political theorist, who was executed for allegedly plotting against King Charles II of England: "If he [a political leader] be justly accounted an enemy of all, who injures all; he above all must be the publick enemy of a nation, who by usurping power over them, does the greatest and most publick injury that a people can suffer. For which reason, by an established law among the most virtuous nations, every man might kill a tyrant; and no names are recorded in history with more honor, than of those who did it." In an interview with the university's student newspaper, The Hoya, he again alluded to violence against the two politicians. The university received many negative comments about Scheuer, but defended Scheuer's academic freedom.

[Source: Nick DeSantis, "Georgetown Backs Academic Freedom of Adjunct Who Alluded to Assassinating Obama," Chronicle of Higher Education (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/ticker/georgetown-backs-academic-freedom-of-adjunct-who-alluded-to-assassinating-obama/71413>; 15 January 2014).]

On 17 January 2014, Timothy McGettigan, a professor of sociology at Colorado State University-Pueblo, sent out an email to students and faculty members in which he urged them to oppose impending personnel cuts and attend a rally against them. His subject line was "Children of Ludlow," referring to a 1914 massacre of striking coal miners and their families in southern Colorado, instigated by mine owners in Denver. He compared the way the university administration treated its personnel to the way these mine owners treated their workers in 1914 and concluded that, then as now, those without power were being mistreated. Hours after he sent the email, the university removed his email account. In a memo, it stated that he had violated a rule banning use of email to "intimidate, threaten, harass other individuals or interfere with the activity of others to conduct university business." Faculty leaders, while finding the email offending and the images violent, condemned the move and emphasized McGettigan's concern with the university's welfare. McGettigan himself invoked his right to criticize campus policies.

[Source: Scott Jaschik, "Colorado State Removes Email Account of Professor Who Criticized Cuts," Inside HigherEd (<http://www.insidehighered.com/news/2014/01/20/colorado-state-removes-email-account-professor-who-criticized-cuts#ixzz2rLwq4MvN>; 20 January 2014).]

In February 2014, historians Lisa Guinn and her husband Thomas Jorsch, who had tenure-track jobs at Upper Iowa University, Fayette, Iowa (2010–2014), were given terminal contracts without a reason. Reports said that this de facto dismissal was partly the result of their vocal opposition since the fall of 2012 to administrative plans to eliminate the history major and replace it with a hybrid social science major that would have little value for students. Both were able to find positions at Bethany College, Kansas.

[Source: Colleen Flaherty, “Faculty Members at Upper Iowa U. Say They Lost Jobs for Questioning Curricular Changes,” Inside HigherEd (22 July 2014); <http://www.insidehighered.com/news/2014/07/22/faculty-members-upper-iowa-u-say-they-lost-jobs-questioning-curricular-changes#ixzz38VNm1gQI>.]

On 1 March 2014, the President of Kennesaw State University (KSU), Georgia, removed an installation—commissioned by KSU to Ruth Stanford, artist and associate professor of sculpture at Georgia State University—from the exhibition See through Walls intended to open the new KSU Zuckerman Museum of Art. The subject of the installation was the homestead of author Corra Harris (1869–1935), who had written an article in 1899 in which she had explained lynching and used racist language. KSU administrators did not find it sufficiently celebratory. On 5 March 2014, largely in response to a petition protesting the removal, KSU officials agreed to reinstate the work.

[Sources: Art supporters, personal communication (March 2014); “Reinstate Artwork Censored by Kennesaw State University President: Petition by Burnaway.org” (<http://petitions.moveon.org/sign/reinstate-artwork-censored>); Scott Jaschik, “Censoring Art and History,” Inside HigherEd (<http://www.insidehighered.com/news/2014/03/03/kennesaw-state-orders-museum-remove-are-racist-past-woman-whose-land-was-given#ixzz2vD5eRz00>; 3 March 2014).]

On 22 April 2014 Ismail Beşikçi (1939–), a Turkish scholar of Kurdish history who was invited to speak at American University in Washington D.C., and his companion (the director of a non-profit cultural foundation), were turned away at Istanbul airport despite possessing valid visas to travel to the United States. Airport personnel reportedly told Beşikçi that the refusal to let him board the flight originated with United States government authorities. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2002, 2009–2010 under Turkey.]

[Source: “Turkish Scholar Denied Right to Board U.S.-Bound Flight,” Inside HigherEd (16 May 2014; <http://www.insidehighered.com/quicktakes/2014/05/16/turkish-scholar-denied-right-board-us-bound-flight#ixzz31tPOdytA>).]

On 20 May 2014, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit confirmed (2 to 1) that volume 5 of the CIA’s internal 1200-page five-volume Top Secret Official History of the Bay of Pigs Invasion, written between 1974 and 1984, could be withheld [see NCH Annual Reports 2011–2013]. The majority said that as a draft, the volume was “predecisional and deliberative” and could be withheld, even though the guidance to Federal agencies by the United States Department of Justice prescribed that drafts should not be withheld solely because they are drafts.

[Sources: International Council on Archives Human Rights Working Group, News of May 2014, 10;

National Security Archive, Update (14 April & 1 August & 15 August 2011, 17 April & 10 May & 7 December 2012 & 13 December 2013 & 21 May 2014).]

See also Australia, China, Congo (Democratic Republic), France, India, Iraq, Japan, Kenya, Palestinian Authority, Rwanda, Turkey, United Kingdom.

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2013.

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2013.

Eight years on, authorities continued to refuse an independent investigation into the 2005 government massacre of hundreds of people in Andijan. They persecuted anyone suspected of having witnessed the atrocities or who attempted to speak publicly about them. On 13 May 2013, they arrested activists Elena Urlaeva and Adelaida Kim as they attempted to lay a wreath of flowers at a public monument in Tashkent to commemorate the massacre's eighth anniversary. [See also NCH Annual Reports 2006–2010, 2012–2013.]

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 519.]

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011.

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012.

On 1 July 2013, the National Center of Cinematography (CNAC), the official body in charge of registering and sponsoring films produced in Venezuela, forced cinemas to screen a short documentary “about the struggle of the Palestinian people” immediately before the film Esclavo de Dios (God’s Slave; a film telling the story of the deadly attack against the Israeli embassy in Argentina in 1992, when 29 civilians were killed and 242 others injured.) The film maker Joel Novoa said that he had received threats on Twitter and Facebook because of the alleged “pro-Israeli” content of his film.

[Source: Article 19, “Venezuela: Government Body Orders Palestinian Film Shown,” Artistic Freedom Report (14 August 2013).]

On 13 February 2014, two persons were killed in a shootout during an anti-government student demonstration in Caracas. The students had demonstrated against the detention of fellow students on the previous day. On 12 February, Día de la Juventud (Day of Youth), the victory of rebel student militias under José Félix Ribas against Spanish troops in the 1814 Battle of La Victoria was commemorated.

[Source: BBC News (13 February 2014).]

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2013.

See Cambodia.

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco / Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010, 2013.

In 2012, the parliament granted President Ali Abdullah Saleh and his aides immunity from prosecution, and the current President, Abdu Rabu Mansour Hadi, did not create mechanisms to provide accountability for past abuses. In September 2012, Hadi decreed that an independent commission of inquiry had to be created to investigate alleged violations committed during the 2011 uprising and recommend accountability for perpetrators and redress for victims. Over one year later, he had still not nominated the commissioners. Hadi presented a deeply flawed draft transitional justice law to parliament in January 2013, but it had yet to be passed. The draft law did not grant victims judicial redress, but was merely a victim compensation scheme, limited in time to the 2011 events.

In September 2012, the trial began of 78 defendants—but not the key suspects—for the deadliest attack of the 2011 uprising, in which pro-government gunmen killed 45 protesters and wounded 200 on 18 March 2011. It was marred by political interference, failure to follow leads that might have implicated government officials, and factual errors. In April 2013, a trial judge ordered prosecutors to reinvestigate former president Saleh and 11 top aides in connection with the incident.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2014 (Washington 2014), 626–627.]

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009.

See Kenya.

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2013.

Between February 2009 and September 2013, as the office of prime minister was temporarily restored and occupied by Morgan Tsvangirai of the Movement for Democratic Change (MDC), youth militia established by the ZANU-PF political party reportedly attempted to control primary schools history curricula. Some youth militia were running history clubs at schools. History teachers in rural areas said that the setting up of militia bases at schools intimidated them; they felt forced to teach the ZANU-PF version of history or stop teaching history altogether. In 2011, the Progressive Teachers' Union of Zimbabwe (PTUZ) reported that district-level officials summoned history teachers to reorientation meetings and ordered them to invite veterans of the pre-1980 liberation war to give history lessons. The Minister of Education, Sports and Culture, David Coltart, told Parliament in March that the government would not allow war veterans to offer history lessons of the liberation struggle to students in schools. In a September 2011 press statement, the PTUZ said that the history curriculum emphasized military history and neglected economic, technological and social aspects. [See also NCH Annual Report 2010.]

[Sources: Global Coalition to Protect Education from Attack, Education under Attack 2014 (New York 2014), 206; Lance Guma, "War Vets Demand to Teach History in Schools" (10 March 2011; <http://www.zimeye.org/war-vets-demand-to-teach-history-in-schools>); Vladimir Mzaca, "Union Accuses Zanu-PF of Distorting History in Schools" (4 September 2011; <http://www.davidcoltart.com/2011/09/union-accuses-zanu-pf-of-distorting-history-in-schools>); "Political Violence Growing in Rural Areas" (Irinnews, 27 July 2009); UNESCO, Education Under Attack 2010 (Paris 2010), 242; "Zimbabwe Teachers Union Says ZANU-PF Forcing History Syllabus on Schools" (2 September 2011; <http://www.voanews.com/zimbabwe/news/Zimbabwe-Teachers-Union-Says-ZANU-PF-Is-128899388.html>); Chengetai Zvauya, "Stop Meddling in Education: Coltart," The Zimbabwe Situation (9 March 2011; http://www.zimbabwesituation.com/mar10_2011.html#Z10).]

INTRODUCTION

The nineteenth Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It mainly covers events and developments of 2012 and 2013.

Disclaimer. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

The complete set of Annual Reports (1995–2013) was compiled by Antoon De Baets. Please send any comments to: <antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org>.

Please cite this report as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2013 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org>).

AFGHANISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

In December 2011, Conflict Mapping in Afghanistan Since 1978, a 800-page report on human rights abuses in Afghanistan from 1978 (before the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan) to 2001 (the fall of the Taliban), prepared by forty researchers of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission since 2005 (when it was commissioned as part of a reconciliation and justice effort ordered by President Hamid Karzai), was completed. It identified the locations and details of 180 mass graves of civilians or prisoners, many of them secret and none of them (save one) excavated properly. It also compiled testimony from survivors and witnesses to the mass interments, and detailed other war crimes as well. It named more than 500 Afghans as responsible for mass killings. It tallied more than a million people killed in the conflict and 1.3 million disabled, although not all of those were necessarily victims of war crimes. The report was not released, however, and the researchers accused senior Afghan officials—powerful former warlords, including the first vice president, Marshal Muhammad Qasim Fahim, a Tajik from the Jamiat Islami Party—of suppressing the work. Three Afghan and foreign human rights activists who worked as researchers and analysts on large sections of the report spoke about its contents on condition of anonymity, both out of fear of reprisal and because the commission had not authorized them to discuss it publicly. Karzai dismissed three commissioners, including the author of the report, Ahmad Nader Nadery. Nadery's dismissal was denied by a government spokesperson who said that he had finished two five-year terms as a commissioner and that the president was legally entitled to replace him. A fourth position had been vacant since January 2011 when the commissioner responsible for children's rights was killed in a Kabul bombing. Western governments (particularly the United States) backed Karzai's efforts to suppress the report. Meanwhile, evidence in the graves was being destroyed, sometimes as a function of poor care of the sites and sometimes intentionally.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 273–274; Rod Nordland, "Top Afghans Tied to '90s Carnage, Researchers Say," New York Times (22 July 2012).]

In 2012, Afghanistan remained under preliminary analysis by the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC). Since 2007, the ICC has been looking into allegations of crimes, including torture, recruitment of child soldiers, attacks on humanitarian targets and the United Nations, and attacks on objects or locations protected under international law that were not military targets.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 275.]

See also United States.

ALBANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2012.

See Serbia.

ALGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001–2012.

In October 2011, General Khaled Nezzar, ([1937–]), former army chief of staff (1988–1990) and defense minister (1990–1993), was arrested in Geneva, interrogated, and later released on bail. The Swiss Federal Criminal Court started investigations against him for war crimes and crimes against humanity for his role in commanding the repression of armed resistance and civil unrest in Algeria from 1992 to 2000. In July 2012, the court rejected his appeal to drop the case. He remained on bail pending the completion of the investigation and the commencement of the trial. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2003.]

[Sources: Chicago Tribune (31 July 2012); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 518–519.]

Security forces and armed groups continued to enjoy broad impunity for atrocities committed during the “dirty war” (1992–2000). The ordinance on the implementation of the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation (Law 06-01), adopted in February 2006, offered immunity from prosecution both for security force members and members of armed groups, with certain exceptions, for atrocities they perpetrated during the conflict. The charter also sought to muzzle continuing debate and scrutiny of the atrocities committed during that period: it provided for up to five years’ imprisonment for anyone who “exploit[ed] the wounds of the national tragedy, with a view to harming Algerian institutions, harming the honor of its agents who served it with dignity, or tarnishing the image of Algeria at the international level.” No one was known to have been imprisoned under this provision. Families of the disappeared were required to accept death certificates in order to receive compensation but were denied information about the fate of their disappeared relatives. Those who continued to call for truth and justice faced harassment.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 22; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 517–518.]

In May 2012, Algeria's human rights record was assessed under the United Nations Universal Periodic Review. The government failed to address, inter alia, recommendations to abolish laws originating under the state of emergency (1992–2011), and to recognize the right to truth of families of victims of enforced disappearances during the 1990s.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 21.]

In June 2012, Mohamed Smaïn, former head of the Algerian League for the Defense of Human Rights (LADDH) in Relizane and an advocate of truth and justice for the families of the disappeared, was arrested when he failed to respond to a summons from the Relizane prosecutor. The summons was in connection with a two-month prison sentence and fines imposed on him after he criticized the authorities for moving corpses from a mass grave in Relizane in 2001. His sentence had been confirmed by the Supreme Court in 2011. He was released under a presidential pardon issued in July 2012 on health grounds. [Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 22.]

When Algeria became independent in 1962, the French government exported many official documents to France, thus taking with them vital sources of Algerian history. The 1962 Evian treaty that resulted in Algeria's independence did not include a statement on the disposition of archives or the return of artifacts removed between 1830 (the start of French rule) and 1962. An agreement was reached in 1966 to return the historical archives, notably Ottoman-era documents, and technical documents from the 1830–1962 period, but it was never executed because Algeria reportedly claimed more. Around the fiftieth anniversary of independence, on 5 July 2012, Algeria refused a proposal that it would be given access to copies of the disputed archival items on the condition that it abandoned its claim to them. Abdelmadjid Chikhi, director of the national archives, declared that he was not going to sign away the national heritage. According to him, France still had about 50,000 manuscripts which originated on Algerian soil, as well as large numbers of other historical artifacts, some dating from before 1830. It included the library of Emir Abdelkader, the Islamic scholar who led a rebellion against French rule in the two decades after the French arrived. France argued that since the archives and artifacts were collected by French officials when Algeria was part of France, it now owned them. Algeria argued that French rule was imposed against its will and that documents or artifacts originated on Algerian soil were Algerian property.

[Sources: D. Cox, "Controversy between Algeria and France over Archives" (http://www.docexblog.com/2012_07_01_archive.html; 6 July 2012); David Gordon, Self-determination and History in the Third World (Princeton 1971) 159; Christian Lowe, "Algeria, France Tussle over Archives 50 Years after Split" (Reuters; 4 July 2012).]

See also France.

ANGOLA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2009.

ARGENTINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2012.

Several important human rights cases from Argentina's last military dictatorship (1976–1983) were reopened in 2003 after Congress annulled the 1986 "Full Stop" law, which had stopped prosecution of such cases, and the 1987 "Due Obedience" law, which had granted immunity to all members of the military, except those in positions of command. In 2005, the Supreme Court upheld the unconstitutionality of the amnesty laws, originally decided by a judge in 2001 in a case brought by the Center for Legal and Social Studies (CELS) and the Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo (Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo). From that moment, federal judges struck down pardons that then-President Carlos Menem had issued between 1989 and 1990 to former officials convicted of, or facing trial for, human rights violations.

As of August 2012, the number of persons accused of crimes against humanity had increased to 1,926, from 922 in 2007, according to CELS. 799 people faced charges for these crimes and 262 were convicted and sentenced. Trials were delayed at the appellate level, with appeals normally taking more than two years to be heard after the sentence of the trial court. As of August 2012, the Supreme Court had confirmed final sentences in only eight of the cases reactivated after the annulment of the amnesty laws.

On 5 July 2012, a federal court sentenced Jorge Videla (1925–2013), de facto president from 1976 to 1981, to 50 years in prison for implementing a plan to steal babies from women who gave birth while they were being held in torture centers before they were killed, and to hand them over to military families for adoption. The head of the last military junta, Reynaldo Bignone (1982–1983), received a fifteen-year prison sentence. The court concluded that the theft of babies was a "systematic and generalized practice." Videla had been convicted in 1985 for crimes against humanity and was already serving a life sentence. The trial, pursued by the Association of the Grandmothers of the Plaza de Mayo, was based on the cases of 35 children, now adults, who had been identified through DNA testing as sons and daughters of disappeared victims of the dirty war (1976–1983). The Grandmothers estimated that more than 500 children were captured along with their parents or born in captivity; after their parents were executed, many were raised by security officers' families who hid their true identities. More than 100 of the children have already been identified.

The “mega-trial” of state agents responsible for crimes committed at the Navy Mechanics School (ESMA) continued in 2012. In October 2011, a federal court sentenced twelve of the perpetrators to life imprisonment for the illegal arrest, torture and murder of detainees held at the center. A second trial commenced in November 2012, in which 67 state agents faced similar charges. Seven of them were being tried for their alleged participation in “flights of death,” in which prisoners held at ESMA were drugged and dropped from planes into the Atlantic.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 26; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 192–193; National Security Archive, “Stolen Babies: Argentina Convicts Two Military Dictators” (5 July 2012).]

During 2012, investigations in Argentina based on universal jurisdiction continued into crimes committed in Spain between 1936 and 1977, including the period of the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) and the Franco regime (1939–1975).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 25.]

See also Germany.

ARMENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2006, 2010.

See Azerbaijan.

AUSTRALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2001, 2003, 2007–2009.

See Iraq.

AUSTRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2005–2007, 2009.

AZERBAIJAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–1998, 2008–2012.

On 29 January 2013, officials from the ruling political party Yeni Azerbaijan publicly called on Akram Aylisli (1937–; pen name of Akram Najaf oglu Naibov), a novelist and former Member of Parliament (2005–2010), to withdraw a recently published novel and ask for the nation’s forgiveness. The novel, Daş Yuxular (Stone Dreams; completed in 2007), was published in the Russian-language literary journal Druzhba Narodov (Friendship of the Peoples) in Russia in December 2012. Set during the conflict on the disputed region of Nagorno-Karabakh, an Armenian-majority separatist enclave in Azerbaijan (1988–1994), the novel provided a sympathetic view of Armenians in the conflict. It only referred to Azeri violence against Armenians, including during the 1920s and during pogroms in Sumgait and Baku in January 1990, but not to Armenian violence against Azeris, such as during the Khojali massacre in February 1992.

The call was the start of a hostile campaign of intimidation against Aylisli. On 31 January 2013, a crowd of about 70 people gathered outside Aylisli’s home in Baku, shouting “shame” and burning his portrait and books. On 1 February 2013, Azerbaijani lawmakers meeting in parliament began to question Aylisli’s ethnicity, suggesting that he take a DNA test and be forced to emigrate to Armenia. One of them commented that the novel “insulted not only Azerbaijanis, but the whole Turkish nation,” because it referred to the Ottoman Empire’s historical persecution of Armenians. Ali Hasanov, a high-level official from the presidential administration, denounced Aylisli for disrespecting the memory of thousands of martyrs. Aylisli’s wife and son were dismissed from their jobs. Aylisli was also expelled from the Union of Azerbaijani Writers.

On 7 February 2012, President Ilham Aliyev stripped Aylisli of his honorary title of “people’s writer” and cut off his presidential monthly pension, which he had drawn since 2002. Aliyev reportedly argued that the measures were a just punishment “for distorting facts in Azerbaijani history and insulting the feelings of the Azerbaijani people.” Stone Dreams had also made negative references to former President Heydar Aliiev (father of the current president). NGOs and support groups for veterans and refugees suggested that they could take legal action against Aylisli. On 10 February 2013, the chairman of the pro-government Müasir Müsavat Partiyası political party (Modern Equality Party), Hafiz Hajiyev (Haciyev), announced that he would pay a ransom to anyone who cut off the writer’s ear. The Interior Minister subsequently announced that such calls for violence were unacceptable and would be investigated.

[Sources: Network of Concerned Historians (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/70.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/70f1.pdf>); “Azerbaijani Party Leader Offers Reward for Writer’s Ear,” RFE/RL News (11 February 2013); Human Rights Watch, “Azeri Writer Harassed over Novel about Azeri-Armenian conflict” (http://www.ifex.org/azerbaijan/2013/02/12/azerbaijan_stop_harassing; 12 February 2013); Keesings Historisch Archief (2013), 152; PEN International Rapid Action Network, “RAN 08/13: Azerbaijan—Writer Akram Aylisli under Threat” (12 February 2013); Daisy Sindelar, “Azeri Author Sends Unpopular Message To Armenians: ‘We Can Live Together,’” RFE/RL News (1 February 2013); Daisy Sindelar, “In Azerbaijan, Anger at an Author, but not Necessarily at His Argument,” RFE/RL News (8 February 2013); Wikipedia (16 February 2013).]

BAHRAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2008–2012.

See United Arab Emirates.

BANGLADESH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2012.

In 2010 the Bangladeshi government established the International Crimes Tribunal (ICT) to investigate those accused of collaborating with Pakistani forces who attempted to stop East Pakistan (later: Bangladesh) from becoming independent during the 1971 war (during which between half a million and three million people were killed). Twelve people in total stood trial, including several leaders of the main Islamist party, Jamaat-e-Islami, and a former minister from the opposition Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP). The trial chamber allowed several prosecution witnesses statements as evidence, without any live testimony being heard. While the prosecution claimed the witnesses were unavailable, the defense produced safehouse logbooks that showed they were available at the time when they were meant to appear in court. However, the ICT rejected the defense's claims. United States war crimes ambassador, Stephen Rapp, and several international groups asked to amend the ICT Act to ensure that it complied with international fair trial standards.

In December 2012, Mohammed Nizamul Huq, the presiding judge resigned after allegations that at least 230 of his emails and over seventeen hours of his recorded telephone calls (published on YouTube) contained proof of undue governmental pressure (to speed up the court proceedings) and by Ahmed Ziauddin, the director of the Bangladesh Center for Genocide Studies in Brussels who secretly advised the judge and the prosecutor and prepared drafts for the charges and indictments. On 11 April 2013, the police arrested Mahmdur Rahman, the editor of the opposition newspaper, Amar Desh; he was charged with sedition and unlawful publication of the hacked conversation between the ICT judges and Ziauddin.

Meanwhile, on 21 January 2013, in the first conviction, former leader of the Jamaat-e-Islami party Abul Kalam Azad was found guilty in absentia of eight charges of genocide and crimes against humanity and sentenced to death. On 5 February 2013, the ICT found another Jamaat-e-Islami party leader, Abdul Kader Mullah (Abdul Qader Mollah), guilty on five out of six counts, including of murder and rape as crimes against humanity and war crimes, and sentenced him to life imprisonment. He denied all the charges. Later that month, amendments to the ICT Act were offered to enable an appeals court to overturn the life sentence and impose the death penalty.

The trials sparked protests from those who accused the government of pursuing a political vendetta on the one hand and Shahbagh protesters who called on Jamaat-e-Islami leaders to face their crimes on the other hand. Both groups clashed violently. Hundreds of thousands throughout Bangladesh took to the streets in peaceful protests to demand that Mullah be hanged. The violence increased after the ICT, on 28 February 2013, sentenced Delwar Hossain Sayedee, vice-president of the Jamaat-e-Islami party, to death by hanging after finding him guilty of war crimes. Following this verdict, Jamaat party supporters, Shahbagh protesters and security forces attempting to control the protests clashed with each other. More than a hundred people died, most of them in police firing according to media and human rights groups.

On 15 July 2013, the ICT found Ghulam Azam, leader of the Jamaat-e-Islami party from 1969 to 2000, guilty of five charges, sentencing him to 90 years' imprisonment for his involvement in mass killings and rape during the war. He denied all the charges.

[Sources: Article 19, "Journalists and Protesters Injured in Bangladesh Demonstrations" (22 February 2013); "Bangladesh: Abdul Kader Mullah Gets Life Sentence for War Crimes," BBC News (5 February 2013); "Bangladesh Islamist Ghulam Azam Found Guilty of War Crimes," BBC News (15 July 2013); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 280; Human Rights Watch, "Bangladesh: Post-Trial Amendments Taint War Crimes Process: Protesters, Security Forces Should Exercise Restraint" (14 February 2013); Human Rights Watch, "Crackdown on Bloggers, Editors in Bangladesh" (17 April 2013); Keesings Historisch Archief (2013), 286–287; NRC Handelsblad (8 March 2013), 15; "Trying War Crimes in Bangladesh," The Economist (15 December 2012).]

BELARUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2000, 2005–2007, 2009–2011.

In the summer of 2012, David Marples, a historian from the Department of History and Classics at the University of Alberta, Canada, president of the North American Association for Belarusian Studies, did not receive a visa to study the uses of history in Belarus. No reason was given.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2012 no. 3), 138.]

In 2012, Hrodnaznaustva, a book about the history of Hrodna (Grodno), a town in Western Belarus, was published in Poland. The KGB interrogated the authors and asked them why the narrative stopped in 1991, leaving out treatment of President Alexander Lukashenka's rule from 1994. As a result several were dismissed from Janka-Kupala State University in Hrodna, including Andrej Czarniakiewicz (Czarniakevich, Charniakevich), a historian specialized in the early-twentieth-century history of Hrodna and a campaigner for the historical heritage of its old town. As official reasons for his dismissal in late September 2012, two versions circulated; one was that he had been late five minutes for two of his lectures, which was a “harsh violation of work discipline;” another that the work was published abroad with an “unclear” funding source. In October 2012, the European Humanities University called the dismissal a violation of academic freedom. In late March 2013, Viachaslau Shved, another contributor, was dismissed as the dean of the Department of Belarusian Culture and Regional Tourism and as a professor. Another historian, Igor Kuzmin, resigned from the university in protest against the dismissals.

[Sources: “Aufruf: Belarusian Historian A. Czarniakiewicz Driven Out of His Hrodna Based University” (<http://www.dbg-online.org/2012/10/10/aufruf-belarusian-historian-czarniakiewicz-driven-out-his-hrodna-based-university>; 10 October 2012); Paula Borowska, “Belarusian Historians Struggle to Find Their Place” (<http://belarusdigest.com/story/cultural-politics-13646>; 11 April 2013); “EHU Senate Condemns Dismissal of Belarusian Historian,” <http://www.ehu.lt/en/news/show/ehu-senate-condemns-dismissal-of-belarusian-historian> (12 October 2012).

BELGIUM

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

See Bangladesh, Senegal.

BOLIVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2012.

Delays in bringing to justice those responsible for human rights violations under military governments (1964–1982) persisted. In April and May 2012, legislation was passed reducing compensation payments for the victims of the time and providing for the publication of the names of people entitled to compensation. There were concerns about the lack of transparency and unfairness of the reparation process. Of 6,200 applicants, only around 1,700 qualified as beneficiaries. Victims of human rights violations and their relatives maintained months-long protests in front of the Ministry of Justice to demand greater transparency. Many alleged that they were denied access to compensation because they had to produce documentary evidence to support their claims, such as medical proof of torture, death certificates, and other documents.

The only notable advance in recent years was the sentencing in August 2011 of five generals to 10 to 15 years' imprisonment each for killing 67 people during anti-government protests in September and October 2003, when the army used lethal force to quell violent demonstrations in the highland city of El Alto. Two members of former President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada's cabinet received three-year suspended sentences for their part in the events, often referred to as "Black October." In September 2012, the United States government rejected a Bolivian request to extradite Sánchez de Lozada and two ministers of his administration to face trial on charges including genocide, homicide and torture, for their alleged responsibility for the deaths and injuries during "Black October."

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 40; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 198–199, 201.]

The armed forces failed to turn over files that might clarify the fate or whereabouts of people who were killed or "disappeared" before democracy was restored in 1982. In July 2012, in response to protestors who were demanding that files from the government of Luis García Meza (1980–1981) be declassified, Vice President Alvaro García stated that only one filing cabinet had been found and the rest had been stolen "years ago."

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 198.]

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2012.

A March 2012 report on postwar justice in the Western Balkans from outgoing Council of Europe Human Rights Commissioner Thomas Hammarberg recommended that Bosnian authorities strengthen local courts' capacity to try war crimes and protect witnesses, and expressed support for a regional truth and reconciliation commission.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 416.]

By the end of 2012, five cases concerning Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) were pending before the Trial Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY). Three other cases were on appeal. Proceedings against former Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadžić continued. In June 2012, the ICTY Trial Chamber issued an oral decision dismissing the motion for acquittal on 10 counts of the indictment. However, it granted it in relation to count one, in which the accused was charged with genocide for crimes committed in several municipalities in BiH between March and December 1992. The ICTY reported that the evidence “even if taken at its highest, did not reach the level from which a reasonable trier of fact could infer that genocide occurred in the municipalities.” On 16 May 2012, the trial against Bosnian Serb wartime General Ratko Mladić commenced at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). It was periodically delayed by his ill-health. Mladić was charged with genocide (including the murder of 8,000 men and boys from Srebrenica in 1995), war crimes, and crimes against humanity.

The War Crimes Chamber of the BiH State Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina reached verdicts on 13 cases between September 2011 and 2012. Inadequate capacity and funding for war crimes prosecutions continued to hamper implementation of the National Strategy for Prosecution of War Crimes (Strategy) in local courts. In May 2012, the Office of the International High Representative and ICTY chief prosecutor discussed ways to strengthen local prosecutors and courts on war crimes cases. The mandate of the international judges and prosecutors was scheduled to expire by the end of 2012, having been extended once in 2009.

The justice system continued to work on the large backlog of war crimes cases. In early 2012, the BiH Prosecutor’s Office obtained an overview of cases investigated in all jurisdictions within BiH. It handed them over to the State Court of BiH to decide, in accordance with the criteria set in the Strategy, which cases should be prosecuted at the state or entity levels. There were 1,271 cases reviewed in the process, 592 (47%) of which were transferred to the entity Prosecutors’ Offices, and 679 (53%) were pending before the State Prosecutor’s Office. This represented a positive development as the significant delay in establishing the exact number of criminal case files was holding up the implementation of the Strategy. The possibility of parallel investigations and prosecutions at state and entity levels was also greatly reduced. However, around half of these case files had already been pending in entity Prosecutors’ Offices for many years prior to the review and transfer process. The fact that an additional 120 case files were transferred to the entity Prosecutors’ Offices did not automatically accelerate the investigations.

Verbal attacks on the War Crimes Chamber of the BiH State Court and other judicial institutions dedicated to investigating and prosecuting those crimes, along with the denial of crimes under international law—such as the genocide in Srebrenica in July 1995—by high-ranking politicians, undermined the state’s efforts to prosecute them. In February 2012, a coalition party from Republika Srpska (RS) filed a motion to abolish the BiH State Court and the BiH Prosecutor’s Office. The draft proposals were rejected by the BiH Parliament, but politicians continued to make public declarations undermining the work of the state judicial institutions. The entity courts continued to apply the Criminal Code of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in prosecuting crimes committed during the conflict. As noted in the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee in November, this Code had serious gaps, including the absence of a definition of crimes against humanity and command responsibility.

Around 10,000 people who disappeared during the 1992–1995 war were still unaccounted for. The state’s failure to implement the 2004 Law on Missing Persons led to problems for the families of the disappeared, including the denial of their rights to justice and reparation. The Fund for Providing Assistance to the Families of Missing Persons envisaged by the 2004 Law had still not been established. Many judgments of the BiH Constitutional Court in cases involving enforced disappearances remained unimplemented.

The state failed to adopt the draft Law on the Rights of Victims of Torture and Civilian War Victims, the Strategy on Transitional Justice, and the Program for Victims of Sexual Violence in Conflict.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 42–43; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 414–415.]

In a German article about history textbook reform in Bosnia-Herzegovina, two of the three history teachers interviewed were given pseudonyms.

[Source: Natalija Bašić, “Angst und Gedächtnis” Eckert: Das Bulletin (Summer 2012), 21–23.]

In [January 2013], the Sarajevo-based NGO Research and Identification Center published the “Bosnian Book of the Dead.” [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2009.]

[Source: Denis Dzidic, “‘Bosnian Book of the Dead’ Published,” Balkan Insight (22 January 2013).]

See also The Netherlands, Serbia.

BRAZIL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2012.

In May 2012, President Dilma Rousseff established the National Truth Commission (NTC). The NTC was mandated to investigate human rights violations from 1946 to 1988, including during the country’s military dictatorship (1964–1985). In September, the NTC announced that it would only investigate grave human rights violations committed by or on behalf of state agents and began hearing testimonies and investigating records, although some concern was expressed at the use of some in camera hearings. The establishment of the TC led to the creation of several truth commissions at state level, for example in the states of Pernambuco, Rio Grande do Sul and São Paulo.

However, concerns remained about the ability to address impunity for crimes against humanity as long as the 1979 amnesty law remained in place. This law has thus far been interpreted to bar most prosecutions of state agents, an interpretation that the Supreme Court reaffirmed in April 2010. However, this law had been declared “null and void” by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in December 2010. Federal prosecutors initiated criminal prosecutions of members of the security services accused of kidnappings during the dictatorship, arguing that it was a “continuous crime” and thus not covered by the amnesty law.

Brazil had granted more than United States $1 billion in financial compensation to more than 12,000 victims of abuses committed by state agents during the dictatorship.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 44; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 202, 205–206.]

In July 2012, the office of Tortura Nunca Mais (Torture Never Again), a civil society group seeking to raise awareness of the abuses during the military dictatorship (1964–1985), was burglarized and archives with torture victim reports were stolen.

[Source: New York Times (4 August 2012).]

BULGARIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2002, 2006, 2009, 2012.

BURKINA FASO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2004, 2005.

In June 2012, Parliament passed an amnesty law for heads of state enshrining impunity.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 49.]

BURUNDI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2003, 2005–2012.

In 2012, no progress was made to investigate and establish the truth behind grave violations of human rights committed between 1962 and 2008. A revised draft law establishing a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) was submitted to parliament but not discussed; it left open the possibility of amnesties, including for those accused of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, torture, enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions. It did not specify that the Special Tribunal, the judicial mechanism that would follow the TRC, should have an independent prosecutor who can investigate and prosecute cases referred by the TRC as well as new cases.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 50; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 86.]

CAMBODIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2012.

In the trial of leaders of the Khmer Rouge period (1975–1979), political interference from Prime Minister Hun Sen’s ruling Cambodian People’s Party (CPP) effected via government-appointed judges, prosecutors and other personnel at the Extraordinary Chambers of the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC; the Khmer Rouge Tribunal), precipitated the resignation in May 2012 of Laurent Kasper-Ansermet, an investigating judge nominated by the United Nations secretary-general. Kasper-Ansermet claimed that governmental interference and lack of cooperation made it impossible for him to do his work. His court submissions detailed how that interference had blocked his efforts to investigate five suspects whom Hun Sen had not approved. United States Judge Mark Harmon replaced him in October 2012, but no further progress in the cases was reported. The CPP’s longstanding strategy of attempting to control the court via delaying tactics and passive non-cooperation contributed to reducing the prosecution of Nuon Chea, Ieng Sary, and Khieu Samphan—three Hun Sen-authorized indictees among former Khmer Rouge leaders—to a “mini-trial” in which only a few of the crime against humanity counts against them would be adjudicated. It appeared unlikely that they would ever go on trial for the additional charges of genocide and war crimes laid against them in December 2009, even though the ECCC was the most expensive international or hybrid criminal tribunal ever, calculated in terms of cost per accused put on trial. Ieng Thirith, one of four alleged senior Khmer Rouge leaders on trial in Case 002, was declared unfit to stand trial and released into the care of her family in September. She was believed to have Alzheimer’s disease.

In February 2012 the ECCC upheld the conviction of prison chief Kaing Guek Euv, known as Duch, for war crimes and crimes against humanity, and increased his sentence from 35 years to life in prison.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 52; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 293, 295–296.]

See also Thailand.

CAMEROON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010, 2012.

On 29 November 2011, writer, historian and politician Dieudonné Enoh Meyomesse ([1954]–) was arrested upon returning from a business trip to Singapore, and charged with armed robbery of gold and organizing a coup. In December 2012, he was found guilty of armed robbery and illegal sale of gold and sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. It was believed that his trial was related to his critical writings, his political activities and his role as a dissident within the Bulu ethnic group (to which also President Paul Biya belongs). Meyomesse wanted to run for president on 9 October 2011 under the banner of the United National Front (UNF) but the Supreme Court did not validate his candidacy. Among his works written in prison that were confiscated was a manuscript, The Elite against the People from 1884 to the Present Day.

[Source: International Pen, "Letter to President Paul Biya" (17 April 2013).]

Sometime between 23 and 24 March 2013, unidentified men abducted filmmaker Richard Fouofie Djimeli from his home. On 3 April 2013, he was found alive, though one of his fingers was amputated. The director and actors from his film 139...Les dernières prédateurs (139...The Last Predators) received death threats weeks before the film's launch. The film, about a 139-year-old totalitarian regime in an imaginary country named Chimpanz, satirized Paul Biya's regime, which has held power in Cameroon since 1982.

[Source: Article 19, Artistic Censorship Report: Filmmaker Abducted, Street Artists Fined (http://www.ifex.org/international/2013/05/14/artistic_censorship; 14 May 2013).]

CANADA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000, 2002–2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2009, 2012.

The mandate of the Canadian Truth and Reconciliation Commission included "the history, purpose, operation and supervision of the Indian Residential School (IRS) system, the effect and consequences of IRS (including systemic harms, intergenerational consequences and the impact on human dignity) and the ongoing legacy of the residential schools." An estimated 100,000 First Nations children were taken from their families and forced to attend 130 residential schools over more than a century (1880s–1996). The majority of the schools were operated by Roman Catholic entities, about a quarter of the schools run by the Anglican Church, and the remainder by Presbyterians and the United Church.

[Source: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of September 2012, 2.]

See also Belarus, India, Iran, Rwanda.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2009, 2011–2012.

CHAD

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

See Senegal.

CHILE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2012.

More than three-quarters of the 3,186 documented extrajudicial executions and enforced disappearances during General Augusto Pinochet's military regime (1973–1990) were heard by courts or are now under court jurisdiction, according to Diego Portales University's Human Rights Observatory, a nongovernmental organization that monitored progress in human rights trials. Between 2000 and September 2011, more than 800 former state security agents had been indicted or convicted, and as of August 2012, 64 agents were serving prison sentences. In many cases, the Supreme Court had used its discretionary powers to reduce sentences against human rights violators in recognition of the time elapsed since the criminal act. Others had their sentences commuted. These practices raise concerns about Chile's fulfillment of its obligation to hold accountable perpetrators of crimes against humanity by imposing appropriate punishments or sanctions.

Following a visit to Chile in August 2012, the United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances welcomed progress in investigations of human rights violations during Pinochet's regime. However, it expressed concern that few of the convicted perpetrators were in fact serving a sentence because of the short penalties imposed. The Working Group also called for the 1978 amnesty law to be repealed; for a national plan to search for the disappeared; and for the allocation of additional resources in order to expedite judicial proceedings.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 60; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 209, 211–212.]

CHINA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2012.

From 2005 on, the businessman and former government official Fan Jianchuan ([1957–]) opened six museums commemorating the Cultural Revolution in Chengdu and elsewhere. He avoided scenes of violence and did not use the term “Cultural Revolution.” According to a museum assistant, who requested anonymity, the period was instead referred to as the more neutral “Red Era.” Fan had a collection of 100 tons of documents, including 20,000 diaries, about the period. Most government-funded museums in China avoid mentioning the Cultural Revolution altogether (The National Museum, renovated in 2011, commemorated the era with one photograph and three lines of written text).

[Source: AFP, “China’s Painful Past Displayed under Political Shadow in Businessman Fan Jianchuan’s Six Museums,” Artdaily.org (http://artdaily.com/index.asp?int_sec=2&int_new=58732#.UJe1PyaVySp; 5 November 2012).]

Tombstone: The Great Chinese Famine, 1958–1962 (Chinese 2008; English 2012), by Yang Jisheng (1940–), deputy editor of the historical journal Yanhuang Chunqiu and a former editor at the Xinhua News Agency, was banned in mainland China. Yang said that a full exposure of the famine in which a reported 36 million starved to death (making it the worst famine in history) could undermine the legitimacy of the Chinese Communist Party. From the early 1990s, Yang visited more than a dozen provinces, interviewed over a hundred witnesses, and collected thousands of documents. He could get access to archives containing confidential reports of the famine only under the pretext of “researching agricultural policies” or “studying the food issue.” When the book was published in Hong Kong in 2008, pirated texts and internet summaries found their way into the mainland.

[Sources: International Herald Tribune (8–9 December 2012); New York Times (13 November 2012).]

On 15 September 2010, Li Tie (1962–), human rights activist, dissident writer and signatory of Charter 08 [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2009, 2010], was arrested by the Wuhan City Public Security Bureau. On 22 October 2010, the initial charge against him (“inciting subversion of state power”) was changed into the more serious “subversion of state power.” On 18 January 2012, the Wuhan Intermediate People’s Court sentenced him to ten years’ imprisonment. The evidence against him included membership of the banned China Social Democracy Party and critical online writings, in particular an article entitled “Human Beings’ Heaven Is Human Dignity.” Li did not receive a fair trial. During the past decade, Li organized activities to honor the memory of Lin Zhao, the Beijing University student imprisoned in the 1950s and executed by the government in 1968 for her views and writings.

[Source: International PEN, Caselist—January to June 2012 (London 2012), 29.]

On 19 September 2010, Lu Jiaping [Lü Jiaping] (1944–), a member of the Chinese Research Society on the History of World War II and a retired soldier from Beijing, was arrested. In early May 2011, he was charged with “inciting subversion of state power” (defined as “spreading rumors or slanders or any other means to subvert state political power or overthrow the socialist system”) and secretly sentenced to ten years’ imprisonment by the Beijing First Intermediate Court. His close associate, Jin Andi ([1954–]), probably also a historian, received a sentence of eight years. The sentences were linked to articles published by Lu between 2000 and 2010, which discussed the family background and private life (including some scandals) of former Chinese Communist Party chairman Jiang Zemin. Lu’s wife, Yu Junyi, was released from house arrest in February 2012, after which the cases of Lu and Jin became known. On 1 December 2012, they were still in prison.

[Sources: Committee to Protect Journalists, “Challenged in China: The Shifting Dynamics of Censorship and Control (New York 2013), 13–14, 17; Epoch Times Editorial Board, “Anything for Power: The Real Story of China’s Jiang Zemin” (<http://www.theepochtimes.com/news/5-9-20/32517.html>; 20 September 2005); International PEN, Caselist—January to June 2012 (London 2012), 32; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-Yearly Caselist to December 2012 (London 2013), 31–32; Sydney Morning Herald (17 November 2012).]

In 2011 Liao Yiwu (?1960–), writer, poet and musician, fled to Germany via Vietnam. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2003.]

[Source: IFEX, “IFEX Marks World Refugee Day, 20 June 2013” (6 June 2013).]

A policy to raze traditional Uighur neighborhoods and relocate or forcibly evict inhabitants, accompanied by a campaign to settle the majority of the nomadic and pastoralist population of Xinjiang, were the most visible aspects of a comprehensive development policy launched in 2010 that was supposed to reduce socioeconomic disparities and lift the livelihood of ethnic groups and help “smash separatist sentiment.”

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 312.]

On 7 January 2013, hundreds of demonstrators staged a protest in support of the progressive weekly newspaper Nanfang zhoumo (Southern Weekly) in Guangzhou, Guangdong, which had been forced to transform an editorial calling on the new leadership for political reform into a tribute praising the Chinese Communist Party. Eighteen academics signed an open letter calling for the dismissal of Tuo

Zhen, a provincial propaganda minister blamed for the censorship. They included legal professors, liberal economists, historians and writers. The original text—entitled “China’s Dream, the Dream of Constitutionalism” and written by senior editor Dai Zhiyong in a reformist tone as a New Year editorial—was cut down from 2,000 to 1,000 words and changed into a propaganda piece entitled “We Are Closer to Our Dream than Ever Before.” The original contained a sweeping view of history since the 1840s and displayed a willingness to learn lessons from the rest of the world.

[Sources: Guardian (7 January 2013); Liu Jin, “Pressing for Freedom: The Protest over China’s ‘Southern Weekly,’” Free Speech Debate (27 February 2013); “The Southern Weekly Affair: No Closer to the Chinese Dream?” Free Speech Debate (27 February 2013).]

On 13 May 2013, the Chinese Communist Party Central Committee General Office issued a memorandum, “Concerning the Situation in the Ideological Sphere,” which presented a “Seven Speak-Nots” policy: it banned teaching or discussing seven topics at universities, including “historical mistakes by the Communist Party” (such as the Cultural Revolution). Other topics were universal values, freedom of the press, citizen rights, civil society, the privileged capitalist class, and judicial independence.

[Sources: Oiwan Lam, “Chinese Government Bans Seven ‘Speak-Not’ Subjects,” Global Voices (<http://globalvoicesonline.org/2013/05/16/chinese-government-bans-seven-speak-not-school-subjects>; 16 May 2013); Hayashi Nozomu, “Chinese Authorities Ban Human Rights, Political Discussions at Universities,” Asahi Shimbun (<http://ajw.asahi.com/article/asia/china/AJ201305120046>; 12 May 2013).

In July 2013, economics professor Xia Yeliang, one of the first signatories of Charter 08 [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2009, 2010], was threatened with expulsion from Beijing University. Since 2009, he had made a series of remarks in favor of free speech and constitutional governance. A visiting scholar at Stanford University in California, where he taught classes in American economic history and institutional economics, Xia said that he wanted to return to Beijing to fight the expulsion.

[Source: Patrick Boehler, “Liberal Peking University Professor Threatened with Expulsion,” South China Morning Post (8 July 2013).]

See also Japan, Mongolia, Sri Lanka.

COLOMBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2004, 2006–2012.

In 2012, Colombia began to implement the Victims and Land Restitution Law, which aimed to return millions of acres of abandoned and stolen land to internally displaced persons (IDPs) who fled their homes over the past two decades. Implementation advanced slowly, and there were threats and attacks against individuals seeking land restitution, in some cases by paramilitary successor groups or others interested in maintaining control over the stolen land.

The Colombian government and Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) guerrillas formally initiated peace talks in October 2012. The negotiations represented Colombia's first opportunity in over a decade to reach a settlement to end the nearly 50-year conflict.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 214.]

Over the past decade, the Colombian army committed a large number of extrajudicial killings of civilians. In many cases—commonly referred to as “false positives”—army personnel murdered civilians and reported them as combatants killed in action, apparently in response to pressure to boost body counts. The government did not keep statistics for cases of “false positives” as a separate category of crimes. However, as of August 2012, the Human Rights Unit of the attorney general's office was investigating 1,727 cases of alleged extrajudicial executions committed by state agents throughout the country involving nearly 3,000 victims. Most cases were attributed to the army and occurred between 2004 and 2008. There was a dramatic reduction in cases of alleged extrajudicial killings attributed to the security forces since 2009; nevertheless, some cases were reported in 2011 and 2012.

As of August 2012, the Human Rights Unit had obtained convictions for less than 10 percent of the 1,727 cases under investigation. The successful prosecutions led to the convictions of 539 army members, of whom 77 were officers, including two lieutenant colonels and two colonels. The office of the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) reported in November 2012 that the existing judicial proceedings in false positive cases “ha[d] largely failed to focus on the persons who might bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of these crimes.” Accountability achieved to date was due to the fact that civilian prosecutors were investigating most cases. However, the administration of President Juan Manuel Santos was promoting a constitutional amendment that would result in military atrocities—including extrajudicial killings, torture, and rape—being investigated and tried by the military justice system. The amendment would likely also lead to the transfer of past cases of “false positives” from civilian prosecutors to the military justice system, which would virtually guarantee impunity for such crimes.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 67; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 217–218.]

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2000, 2003–2012.

In July 2012, the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued its first-ever conviction and sentenced Congolese armed group leader Thomas Lubanga Dyilo—the alleged founder and president of the Union of the Congolese Patriots and chief commander of its armed wing, the Forces patriotiques pour la libération du Congo (FPLC; Patriotic Forces for the Liberation of Congo)—to 14 years' imprisonment. On 14 March, he had been convicted of the war crimes of conscripting and enlisting children under the age of 15 and using them to participate actively in hostilities in Ituri district in eastern Congo in 2002 and 2003.

In May 2012, the evidence phase of the trial of Mathieu Ngudjolo and Germain Katanga, leaders of an armed group that opposed Lubanga's group in Ituri, was completed. Ntaganda, Lubanga's co-accused at the ICC, remained at large by the end of 2012; he has been wanted by the ICC since 2006 for recruiting and using child soldiers, crimes which he continued to commit in 2012. In July, the ICC issued a warrant against him for war crimes and crimes against humanity, also in connection with his activities in Ituri. Congolese authorities refused to arrest and surrender Ntaganda prior to his defection from the Congolese army in April.

There was little progress on the government's proposal to establish a specialized mixed court with jurisdiction over war crimes and crimes against humanity committed since 1990 and on the adoption of legislation implementing the ICC statute. In September 2012, the justice minister pledged to adopt the ICC implementing legislation promptly. In October, she took initial steps to revive draft legislation on the specialized mixed court.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 80–81; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 100–101.]

CONGO (Republic)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

COSTA RICA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2010.

CÔTE D'IVOIRE

See Ivory Coast.

CROATIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2001, 2003–2012.

Despite some progress in prosecuting crimes under international law committed during the 1991–1995 war, the measures taken to address impunity remained inadequate. Many crimes allegedly committed by members of the Croatian Army and police forces against Croatian Serbs and other minorities remained uninvestigated.

In January 2012, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) ended its Croatia presence after more than 15 years, following several years of winding down operations, leaving a significant monitoring gap related to domestic war crimes accountability. Croatia continued to proceed in negotiations to join the European Union (EU), scheduled for July 2013. The October 2012 EU monitoring report noted that Croatia needed to intensify efforts to tackle impunity for war crimes.

The trial at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) of Croatian Serb wartime leader Goran Hadžić, president of the self-proclaimed Republic of Serbian Krajina, charged with the killing and deportation of Croats and other non-Serbs began on 17 October 2012. Hadžić was the last of 161 indictees to be brought before the ICTY as it wound down its operations.

In November 2012, the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY acquitted two generals, Ante Gotovina and Mladen Markač. The Appeals Chamber reversed their convictions for crimes against humanity and war crimes, for which they had received sentences of 24 and 18 years. The verdict resonated strongly in region, prompting a surge in nationalistic rhetoric in both Croatia and Serbia. While the two generals were welcomed back to Croatia by government officials, human rights defenders in the region reiterated the importance of holding perpetrators accountable for the crimes committed against Serb civilians between 1991 and 1995.

Fifteen domestic war crimes prosecutions were transferred in late 2011 and early 2012 from local county courts to four courts designated for war crimes cases (in Osijek, Rijeka, Split and Zagreb), with only two remaining in local courts as of August 2012. Following the transfer, the designated courts suspended several cases, particularly those affecting Serbs, because the trials had been conducted in absentia, a long-standing concern about war crimes cases heard in local courts.

Impunity for war crimes was exacerbated by the use of the 1993 Basic Criminal Code in the prosecution of crimes committed during the 1991–1995 war, although it failed to meet international standards. It did not include crimes against humanity and most crimes of sexual violence, while superior and command responsibility for crimes under international law was also not recognized. Those gaps led to impunity.

Some progress was made in providing witness support, but witness protection measures continued to be inadequate. Those responsible for intimidation of witnesses were not brought to justice. The authorities failed to provide victims and their families access to reparation.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 72–73; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 418, 422.]

See also Serbia.

CUBA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2002, 2006, 2010–2012.

See United States.

CYPRUS

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2005, 2008–2011.

During 2012, the Committee of Missing Persons in Cyprus exhumed the remains of 43 people, bringing the total number of exhumations since 2006 to 857. By the end of 2012, the remains of 336 missing individuals (269 Greek Cypriots and 67 Turkish Cypriots) had been identified and restored to their families. However, no perpetrator was identified or prosecuted in either Cyprus or Turkey by the end of 2012.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 76.]

CZECH REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–1998, 2000, 2010.

On 10 April 2013, the supervisory board of the Czech Institute for the Study of Totalitarian Regimes (ÚSTR) in the capital Prague, dismissed ÚSTR director Daniel Herman (1963–), a former priest, dissident and Czech Bishops' Conference spokesman, citing dissatisfaction with his management of ÚSTR and chaotic digitization of documents. In protest against the decision, the fifteen-member academic council—including its chairman Michael Kraus, Cardinal Miloslav Vlk, Igor Lukeš (a professor of history and international relations at Boston University), Alena Šimánková (National Archive) and Mark Kramer (Harvard University)—resigned. Herman and the government Civic Democratic Party (ODS) declared that the board (itself appointed by the Senate) was controlled by the left and that the dismissal was the result of cooperation between the opposition social-democrats (ČSSD) and communists (KSCM) who allegedly wanted to prevent liberal access to the files. Petruška Šustrová (1947–), philosopher, former dissident and ÚSTR board chairwoman, dismissed the charge of politicization expressed by Prime Minister Petr Nečas (ODS). Left-wing parties accused the right of using the ÚSTR to discredit the left; in their turn, right-wing parties accused the left of using the ÚSTR to cover traces of politicians with a Communist past.

The ÚSTR board elected translator Pavla Foglová, head of the Czech Center in Warsaw, as interim director. When military historian Eduard Stehlík, first deputy to Herman, failed to reach agreement with Foglová, he resigned from his post. Herman considered taking legal steps against his dismissal. On 11 April 2013, Lubomir Augustin, head of the Security Services Archive (ABS; the part of ÚSTR managing the records), filed a criminal complaint against the five ÚSTR board members who voted for Herman's dismissal.

In 2008, Parliament had established the ÚSTR to do research into the periods of Nazi occupation (1939–1945) and communist rule (1948–1989). It contained records of the former Communist state security police StB. In its five years of existence, the ÚSTR had had four directors. Herman served from 2010 until 2013.

[Sources: B. C., "Czech Politics: A Row about the Institute for the Study of Totalitarian Regimes," The Economist (<http://www.economist.com/blogs/easternapproaches/2013/04/czech-politics-1>; 22 April 2013); Rob Cameron, "More Turmoil for Body Overseeing Secret Police Archives as Director Sacked," Radio Praha (11 April 2013); "Members of Academic Council Resign in Protest of Herman Sacking," Prague Daily Monitor (12 April 2013); NRC Handelsblad (19 April 2013), 13; "Remaining Members of Academic Council Resign Following Herman Sacking," Radio Praha (<http://www.radio.cz/en/section/news/news-2013-04-15>; 15 April 2013); Nick DeSantis, "Yielding to Critics, Czech President Won't Block Professor's Appointment," Chronicle of Higher Education (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/ticker/jp/yielding-to-critics-czech-president-wont-block-professors-appointment>; 22 May 2013).]

In mid-May 2013, President Miloš Zeman refused to confer the title of professor upon Martin Putna ([1967–]), a literary historian and scholar of the Catholic church at Charles University, Prague, because he disliked the latter's social activism for gay rights. After a wave of criticism from students and academics, Zeman abandoned his opposition. Putna had openly criticized Zeman before his election as president in January 2013.

[Sources: "Czech President in University Row over Gay Rights Activist," France 24 (<http://www.france24.com/en/20130521-czech-president-university-row-over-gay-rights-activist>; 21 May 2013); S. Carney, "Czech President Yields to Pressure, Faces Ire of Cardinal," Wall Street Journal (22 May 2013); N. DeSantis, "Yielding to Critics, Czech President Won't Block Professor's Appointment," Chronicle of Higher Education (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/ticker/jp/yielding-to-critics-czech-president-wont-block-professors-appointment>; 22 May 2013).]

DENMARK

Previous Annual Report entries: 2006–2007.

On 24 October 2012, two men were arrested for stealing records from the state archives relating to the Nazi occupation of Denmark during World War II. The materials reportedly included police reports, court files, and cases about deserters related to the war.

[Sources: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, Newsletter (October 2012), 5; Telegraph (25 October 2012).]

On 5 February 2013, Lars Hedegaard (1942–), a controversial Marxist historian, journalist and radical critic of Islam, was shot by an unknown man in front of his house in Frederiksberg. The perpetrator missed his target and Hedegaard survived. Hedegaard was the head of the International Free Press Society, a group claiming that Islam threatens press freedom. In 2011, he had been convicted of hate speech against Muslims but in April 2012, the Supreme Court acquitted him because his words were uttered in private without the intent to disseminate them in public.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (6 February 2012), 9; Ann Snyder, “Danish Supreme Court Acquits Hedegaard,” The Legal Project (21 April 2012); Wikipedia (6 February 2013); <http://blog.indexonensorship.org/2013/02/05/index-index-international-free-speech-round-up-050213/>.]

DJIBOUTI

Previous Annual Report entry: 2008.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

In February 2012, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights established state responsibility for the enforced disappearance of journalist Narciso González Medina in 1994. In October, the Court found the state responsible for the killing of seven Haitian migrants by members of the armed forces in 2000.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 83.]

ECUADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2007, 2009–2012.

A truth commission created by the administration of President Rafael Correa published a report in June 2010 documenting 118 cases of human rights violations committed between 1984 and 2008 involving 456 victims (including 68 victims of extrajudicial execution and 17 of enforced disappearance). As of November 2012, more than two years after the creation of a special prosecutorial unit charged with investigating the 118 cases, prosecutors had charged one perpetrator, a police captain, with the fatal shooting of Damián Peña Bonilla, a high school student, during a 2002 demonstration.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 228–229.]

EGYPT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2001, 2003, 2006–2007, 2010–2012.

In 2012, the Office of Censoring Publications banned the previously allowed textbook A History of the Modern Middle East, by William Cleveland and Martin Bunton, because it contained a number of maps that put Halayeb and Sahlateen on the Sudanese side of the Egyptian-Sudanese border. Copies of the book to be used at the American University in Cairo were unbanned only after the office corrected the maps by hand.

[Source: Khaled Fahmy, “Egypt’s One-Way Traffic in Books,” Free Speech Debate (21 September 2012).]

There has been no process of transitional justice to account for the crimes of the Mubarak era (1981–2011) nor has there been real accountability for the violence during the January 2011 uprising, which left 846 dead. On 2 June 2012, a judge sentenced former President Hosni Mubarak (19981–2011) and his former Minister of Interior Habib al-Adly to life imprisonment for failing to protect the protesters during the 2011 uprising from attacks by “criminal foreign elements.” The judge acquitted the four other assistant ministers of interior because he was not convinced that “the police was connected with the protester deaths.” The prosecution argued that the lack of evidence against them was due to a lack of co-operation from General Intelligence and the Ministry of Interior. Truth and justice remained elusive for hundreds of victims of the uprising and their families.

No Supreme Council of the Armed Forces (SCAF) members faced justice for the killings of protesters during their 17-month rule. In July 2012, President Mohammed Morsi set up a fact-finding committee of officials, civil society activists and victims' families to identify the perpetrators of the killing and injury of protesters during the 2011 uprising and the SCAF's rule. In November 2012, Morsi passed a law creating a court to try cases of violence against protesters.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 87; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 531.]

In [2013], Abdel-Wahed, Sabry El-Daly and Nevine, employees of the Egyptian National Archives (ENA), were dismissed on accusations of corruption. The new director Khaled Fahmy, who announced himself publicly as a Muslim Brotherhood member (and not to be confused with Khaled Fahmy, head of the history department at the American University in Cairo), defended the controversial dismissal. Employees had claimed that El-Daly had been involved in the theft of documents and Abdel-Wahed (former ENA head) never promoted or fairly rewarded hard-working employees. [Source: Mary Mourad, "Historian Fahmy Argues for Easing Access to Egyptian National Archives," Ahram Online (<http://english.ahram.org.eg/NewsContentP/18/74745/Books/Historian-Fahmy-argues-for-easing-access-to-Egypti.aspx>; 24 June 2013).]

Egyptian authorities confiscated some 1.7 million documents on the brink of being exported to Israel via Jordan. The documents (some dating back to 1863) contained details of Jewish ownership of land and assets in Cairo and were reportedly stolen during riots on 16 December 2011 from the Egyptian Scientific Institute in Cairo. The documents were supposed to be used in an Israeli lawsuit involving Jewish property lost in Egypt during the 1952 revolution.

[Sources: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, Newsletter (October 2012), 4; Times of Israel (28 October 2012); PressTV (29 October 2012).]

On 13 March 2013, state security officials blocked the release of an (Egyptian) documentary entitled Jews of Egypt, directed by Amir Ramses (a Copt) and produced by Haytham el-Khamissy. The film had already been approved by censorship officials in 2010. It treated the exodus of an estimated 65,000 to 70,000 Jews in the nationalist climate between 1948 and 1973, and its aftermath. According to Khamissy, the authorities feared that the film's title could cause a public uproar after calls by politician Essam Mohamed Hussein el-Erian in 2012 for Jews to return to Egypt. A week later, on 20 March 2013, the documentary was approved for release. According to Ramses, the publicity surrounding the ban increased the number of viewers in Cairo.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (13 & 21 March & 19 April 2013); Washington Post (13 March 2013).]

See also Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates.

EL SALVADOR

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2012.

In January 2012—in accordance with a 2010 ruling by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights—President Carlos Mauricio Funes Cartagena apologized on behalf of the state for the massacre of over 700 men, women and children in El Mozote and surrounding hamlets in Morazán province. The victims had been tortured and killed by the armed forces over a three-day period in 1981. In December 2012, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights set down its final decision on the massacre, ordering the state to conduct investigations and to hold those responsible to account. The ruling also called on the state to ensure that the 1993 amnesty law was not an obstacle to the prosecution of war criminals; to continue compiling a list of victims; to conduct exhumations; and to ensure reparations for the relatives.

Impunity for many other human rights violations committed during the armed conflict (1980–1992) persisted. In August 2012, survivors and relatives of victims marked 30 years of impunity for the 1982 El Calabozo massacre in which more than 200 women, men and children were killed by the armed forces. In a public event in November 2012, representatives of the relatives and survivors handed in over 5,000 signatures urging the government to take action and respond to the demands of victims and their relatives for truth, justice and reparation.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 89–90.]

ERITREA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2008.

ESTONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2010.

ETHIOPIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2011.

FIJI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006, 2010.

FINLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

FRANCE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1999, 2001–2009, 2011–2012.

In 2010, far-right leader Marine Le Pen said at a rally of her political party Front National in Lyons that Muslims using the streets to pray because mosques were overflowing was an “occupation” of French territory, thereby alluding to the Nazi occupation of France (1940–1944). In late May 2013, she lost her immunity as a European Parliament member, as a result of which she could face criminal charges for inciting racism.

[Source: BBC News (1 June 2013).]

In October 2012, President François Hollande attended a commemoration of the massacre following a demonstration on 17 October 1961 in favor of Algerian independence by Algerians in Paris, thereby officially recognizing it. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2001, 2002.]

[Sources: BBC News (20 December 2012); NRC-Handelsblad (18 December 2012), 11.]

On 21 May 2013, far-right historian Dominique Venner (1935–2013) committed suicide by gunshot in the Notre-Dame Cathedral, Paris, after condemning both same-sex marriage and Islamist influence in France in writings before his death. Venner was a former Algerian War veteran and far-right militant. From 1961 until the autumn of 1962, he was imprisoned for 18 months for his activities with the terrorist Secret Army Organization (OAS) (an organization opposing Algerian independence). He was a prolific writer of historical works.

[Sources: BBC News (22 May 2013); NRC Handelsblad (22 May 2013); Wikipedia (22 May 2013).]

See also Algeria, Panama, Senegal, Turkey.

GEORGIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2003, 2010–2012.

GERMANY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997–2000, 2003, 2006–2012.

On 27 June 2013, the federal administrative court ruled that the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND; the German foreign intelligence agency overseen by Chancellor Angela Merkel's office) could black out passages from the Adolf Eichmann files sought by Gabriele Weber. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2010, 2011.]

[Source: "Germany Can Keep Eichmann Records Secret, Court Rules," (Associated Press; 28 June 2013).]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, China, Congo (Democratic Republic), France.

GHANA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2004–2008.

GREECE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2004–2011.

On 28 October 2012, Ochi Day (No Day)—a national holiday to commemorate Greek resistance during World War II after the Italian army's invasion in 1940—a citizen journalist took pictures of anti-fascist groups confronting a gathering of the Golden Dawn (the neo-Nazi party) next to the official parade on the island of Corfu and posted them on Facebook. He was arrested.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2013 no. 1), 28.]

GRENADA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2012.

In March 2012, a former member of army special forces, Pedro Pimentel, was sentenced to 6,060 years in prison for his role in the Dos Erres massacre (a 1982 massacre in the town of Dos Erres, in the Petén region, in which soldiers murdered more than 250 people, including children). His conviction followed the sentencing in 2011 of four other retired officers who participated in the massacre and received similar sentences. In October 2012, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights held the state responsible for a series of massacres in Río Negro, Baja Verapaz department, between March 1980 and May 1982. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2012.]

In June 2012, Secretary of Peace Antonio Arenales Forno announced that the government was closing the Office of the Peace Archives, created in December 2008 to systematize and analyze official documents from the internal conflict, such as secret police records. While the government said that over two million documents had been digitalized and would remain accessible, the office's closure ended the staff's efforts to document evidence of past abuses, which had played a key role in the prosecution of former officials.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 110; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 232, 233–234.]

On 31 January 2013, the landmark criminal trial of Efraín Ríos Montt—a retired general who led the military regime from 1982 to 1983 that carried out hundreds of massacres of unarmed civilians—opened. He had been immune from prosecution between 2000 and 2012 while serving in Congress. Guatemalan courts had denied appeals by his lawyers for amnesty under the National Reconciliation Law. Ríos Montt, along with his chief of army intelligence José Mauricio Rodríguez Sánchez, was charged with genocide and crimes against humanity for ordering and overseeing a counterinsurgency campaign that sought to wipe out guerrilla forces and their supporters. Ríos Montt was accused of bearing command responsibility for hundreds of massacres and a “scorched earth” policy targeting Indigenous Peoples while he was the de facto head of state (March 1982–August 1983). The indictment specifically accused the two retired generals of responsibility for fifteen massacres in the Ixil region, Quiché department, resulting in the deaths of 1,771 unarmed men, women and children.

The prosecution wanted to hear 142 witnesses and 64 experts. The evidence included military records, counterinsurgency campaign plans, field reports, and the findings of the 1999 United Nations-sponsored Historical Clarification Commission (which in 1999 concluded that 200,000 civilians died or disappeared in the 36-year conflict). Commenting on Ríos Montt's prosecution, President Otto Pérez Molina, a former military officer who was elected in 2011, asserted that while state actors may have carried out serious abuses, the crimes committed during the civil war (1960–1996) did not constitute genocide. He denied that genocide had ever occurred during the conflict

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 109, 110; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 232; National Security Archive (Kate Doyle), “Guatemalan Genocide on Trial: Court Case Begins Today against Former Dictator Rios Montt (31 January 2013).]

On 17 January 2013, the premises of the Asociación para el Avance de las Ciencias Sociales (AVANCSO; Association for the Advance of Social Sciences) were broken into and some documents, archives and equipment were stolen. AVANCSO (established 1986) supported a proposed Integrated Rural Development Law #4084, which was the subject of strong criticism by the Chamber of Agriculture and the business sector. AVANCSO was also on the brink of publishing a report carried out in the Historical Archive of the National Police on the history of the police, and a number of archives and photographs relating to this investigation were also taken during the break-in.

[Source: “Guatemala: Break-in and robbery at the offices of Association for the Advance of Social Sciences (AVANCSO),” <http://www.frontlinedefenders.org/node/21359>.]

Sofía Menchú, journalist for El Periódico, was reportedly intimidated by a former cabinet member after publishing an article in early March 2013 in which she suggested that retired army captain Byron Lima Oliva, who served twenty years in prison for the assassination of Juan Gerardi [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2008.], enjoyed privileged relations with the prison director, with President Otto Pérez Molina and with Vice President Roxana Baldetti.

[Sources: PEN International Rapid Action Network, “Guatemala: One Journalist Shot Dead, Another Threatened” (RAN 13/13; 26 March 2013); El Periódico (29 March 2013).]

GUINEA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007, 2009–2012.

The government made some progress in holding accountable members of the security forces implicated in the September 2009 massacre of some 150 people and the rape of over 100 women during the military regime of Moussa Dadis Camara. A 2009 report by the United Nations-led International Commission of Inquiry concluded that the abuses committed by security forces very likely constituted crimes against humanity. In 2010, the then-government committed to bringing the perpetrators to justice, and a Guinean prosecutor appointed three investigating judges to the case. As of late 2012, the judges had interviewed over 200 victims and charged at least seven suspects in connection with the crimes, including Colonel Moussa Tiegboro Camara, Guinea's current minister in charge of fighting drug trafficking and organized crimes, and Colonel Abdoulaye Chérif Diaby, Guinea's former health minister. However, as of late 2012, the investigation had yet to be completed and some suspects had been detained longer than the two year limit under Guinean law. Meanwhile some 100 victims continued to wait to provide statements to the judges. Also, potential mass graves with bodies of those allegedly disposed of secretly by the security services had yet to be investigated, and the judges had yet to question members of the security forces who might have knowledge of the crimes. The government's refusal for much of 2012 to provide adequate financial support to the investigating judges, coupled with President Alpha Condé's failure to suspend men in his administration who were suspected of involvement in the massacre, brought into question the government's commitment to ensure justice for the crimes.

The International Criminal Court (ICC), which in October 2009 confirmed that the situation in Guinea was under preliminary examination, visited the country in April 2012 to assess progress made in national investigations, bringing the number of visits since 2010 to six.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 112; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 121–122.]

The "Reflection Commission," created by presidential decree in June 2011 to promote reconciliation, made no visible progress in defining, much less fulfilling, its mandate. Progress was undermined by inadequate consultation with victims and civil society about the goals, composition, or powers of the commission, and inadequate financial support. The interim co-presidents appeared to limit its mandate to promoting reconciliation largely through prayer, while local human rights groups pushed for a commission that could meaningfully address impunity. Rising ethnic tensions, as well as concerns about corruption, demonstrated the urgent need for a truth-telling mechanism with the capacity to make recommendations to address Guinea's human rights challenges.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 122, 124.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2012.

GUYANA

Previous Annual Report entry: 1997.

See United Kingdom.

HAITI

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2000–2003, 2006, 2008–2009, 2012.

Those responsible for serious human rights violations, including enforced disappearance, torture, rape and extrajudicial executions, over the past four decades continued to evade justice. In January 2012, an investigating judge dismissed complaints of crimes against humanity filed by 22 victims against former President Jean-Claude Duvalier (who had returned to Haiti in January 2011 after nearly 25 years in exile [1986–2011]). During his rule in 1971–1986, Duvalier had commanded a network of security forces that committed serious human rights violations, including arbitrary detentions, torture, disappearances, summary executions and forced exile. The judge concluded that Duvalier should be tried only for corruption and misappropriation of public funds and found, contrary to international standards, that the statute of limitations prevented prosecuting Duvalier for his human rights crimes. An appeal by victims and their relatives was pending at the end of 2012.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 116; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 239–240.]

HONDURAS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998, 2001–2002, 2009–2012.

Following the June 2009 military coup, the de facto government suspended key civil liberties, including freedom of the press and assembly. In the ensuing days, the military occupied opposition media outlets, temporarily shutting their transmissions. Police and military personnel responded to generally peaceful demonstrations with excessive force. This pattern of the disproportionate use of force led to several deaths, scores of injuries, and thousands of arbitrary detentions. In July 2011, a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, established by President Porfirio Lobo's administration to investigate events before and after the coup, issued a report documenting 20 cases of excessive use of force and killings by state security forces. The commission also reported that police and army officials were responsible for "systematic obstruction" of investigations into these abuses. As of October 2012, only one police officer had been held accountable for any of the serious abuses that occurred in the context of protests in support of the ousted president, Manuel Zelaya. Human rights prosecutors faced obstacles conducting investigations, including limited collaboration by security forces, lack of sufficient resources, and an ineffective witness protection program.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 241.]

HONG KONG

Previous Annual Report entry: 1996. See China.

HUNGARY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1997, 2004, 2007–2012.

In 2012, there were several anti-Semitic attacks against Jewish leaders and memorials.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 434.]

See also Slovakia.

INDIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1997, 2000–2012.

A film based on Salman Rushdie's novel Midnight Children (London 1981) was shot secretly in Sri Lanka by India-born Canadian-based director Deepa Mehta (1949–) between 2008 and 2011. Mehta said that she chose the location over India or Pakistan to avoid protests from religious groups. After Iran complained to Sri Lanka when the location leaked out, the production was suspended, but President Mahinda Rajapaksa overturned the ban. The film was eventually released in 2013, but reportedly did not find a distributor in India, which was governed by the Congress Party, headed by Indira Gandhi's daughter-in-law Sonia Gandhi.

[Sources: BBC News (10 September 2012); Index on Censorship (2012 no. 4), 77–78.]

On 20 February 2013, David Cameron became the first serving British prime minister to pay his respects at the scene of a massacre in Amritsar, Punjab, on 13 April 1919, when hundreds of people at a public meeting were shot dead by British troops. Past prime ministers expressed their regret, but Cameron was the first to pay his respects at the site in person. The prime minister laid a wreath at the Jallianwala Bagh memorial, bowing his head and standing in silence.

[Source: "David Cameron Marks British 1919 Amritsar Massacre," BBC News (20 February 2013).]

Suspected perpetrators of enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions in Assam (in 1998 and 2001), Manipur, Nagaland and other states, remained at large.

Widespread impunity prevailed for violations of international law in Kashmir, including unlawful killings, extrajudicial executions, torture and the enforced disappearance of thousands of people since 1989.

In April 2012, the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) closed its inquiry into alleged unlawful killings and mass cremations by police during the Punjab conflict (1984–1994), without recommending criminal investigations. It awarded 279.4 million Indian rupees (US$5.78 million) in compensation to the families of 1,513 of the 2,097 dead. The findings of a Central Bureau of Investigation probe into the killings remained unpublished.

During 2007–2012, the NHRC distributed cash compensation to the families of 191 out of 1,671 people killed in India, after determining they had been extrajudicially executed. Criminal investigations into the majority of such killings failed to make serious progress.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 119–121.]

In March 2012, Hindu fundamentalists exerted pressure not to extend the visa of American historian

Peter Heehs, who had lived in India for 41 years. They objected to his book about spiritual leader Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950), The Lives of Sri Aurobindo (Columbia University Press, 2008) saying that it misrepresented the latter’s relationship with his female collaborator Mirra Richards (1878–1973). On 30 March 2012, several leading historians wrote a letter to Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and home minister P[alaniappan] Chidambaram protesting the impending withdrawal. On 13 February 2009, a report of the Orissa government’s IG Police Intelligence had stated that the book appeared “blasphemous.” Two months later, Orissa banned the book on that basis. Court filings prevented the book’s distribution in India.

[Sources: Gautam Chikermane, “Don’t Expel Us Historian, Govt Told,” Hindustan Times (31 March 2012); “Indian Academics Object to Treatment of American Historian” (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/global/indian-academics-object-to-treatment-of-american-historian/32734>; 3 April 2012).]

A government-appointed six-member committee (“the Thorat committee”) set up to look into the use of cartoons in textbooks for classes IX to XII submitted its report on 27 June 2012. On 6 August 2012, the National Council for Educational Research and Training (NCERT) Textbook Development Committee (TDC) agreed to drop 3 of the 21 cartoons termed “educationally inappropriate” by the Thorat committee and to accept wholly or partially some of its suggested deletions and modifications in four textbooks. The cartoons were the Ambedkar cartoon [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2012], which would be replaced by a photograph showing Rajendra Prasad, president of the Constituent Assembly, greeting Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar, chair of the constitution drafting committee; a cartoon in which Sheikh Mohammed Abdullah (1905–1982), chief minister of Jammu and Kashmir, was kneeling in front of Indira Gandhi and a cartoon on anti-Hindi agitation in Tamil Nadu. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2012.]

[Sources: Antoon De Baets, “India’s Textbook Cartoon Affair,” Free Speech Debate (<http://freespeechdebate.com/en/discuss/indias-textbook-cartoon-affair>; 20 August 2012); The Hindu (14 July & 9 August 2012); Hindustan Times (19 May 2012); India Today (15 July 2012); Index on Censorship (2012 no. 3), 111; “NCERT Stands Up to Political Bosses, Will Drop just 3 of 21 Controversial Cartoons,” Daily News and Analysis (<http://www.dnaindia.com>; 17 August 2012); Times of India (5 July 2012).]

See also Sri Lanka, United Kingdom.

INDONESIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2001–2002, 2004–2012.

The Act of Killing (Indonesian: Jagal), a 2012 Indonesian-language documentary by American director Joshua Oppenheimer (1974–), shot mostly in Medan, Sumatra, between 2005 and 2011, was not officially released in Indonesia because its theme were the death squads and paramilitary organizations who in 1965–1966 helped the army torture and kill hundreds of thousands of alleged communists. It consisted of interviews with the former perpetrators (who were never tried) and the reenactment of massacre scenes by the latter. Many of Oppenheimer's Indonesian collaborators were listed as anonymous in the closing credits. Oppenheimer himself was declared persona non grata in Indonesia. In March 2013, the Jakarta Globe estimated that film had been shown privately more than 260 times in the country.

[Sources: Guardian (14 September 2012); NRC Handelsblad (13 February & 22 March 2013), Wikipedia (16 February 2013); Wordt Vervolgd (March 2013), 6–11.]

In July 2012, Komnas HAM (the National Human Rights Commission) submitted its report to the Attorney General on possible crimes against humanity committed against members of the Indonesian Communist Party (PKI) and suspected communist sympathizers in the context of the 1965 failed coup. The commission called on the Attorney General to initiate an official investigation, to bring the perpetrators to justice in a Human Rights Court and to establish a truth and reconciliation commission. No progress was reported.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 125.]

On 23 July 2012, after more than three years of investigation during which testimony from 349 witnesses was gathered, the Komnas HAM (National Commission on Human Rights) issued a 800-page report which stated that the systematic prosecution of alleged members of the Indonesian Communist Party after the failed 1965 coup, in which at least 500,000 were killed, was a crime against humanity. The report, coordinated by Johny Simanjuntak, also urged that military officials involved in the purge be brought to trial. On 25 July 2012, the government said that it supported the conclusion and the recommendation of Komnas HAM but would further study the commission's findings. Earlier attempts under the presidency of Abdurrahman Wahid (1999–2001) to install a truth and reconciliation commission were frustrated after Wahid's term had ended.

[Sources: Jakarta Post (25 July 2012); NRC Handelsblad (27–28 October 2012), 4–5; Wordt Vervolgd (March 2013), 10.]

There was little progress in delivering justice, truth and reparation for past human rights violations, including in Aceh, Papua and Timor-Leste (formerly East Timor). Survivors of sexual violence had yet to receive adequate medical, psychological, sexual and reproductive, and mental health services or treatment. In September 2012, the Indonesian government announced at the United Nations Human Rights Council that they were finalizing a new law on a Truth and Reconciliation Commission; however, no progress was reported. A multi-agency team set up by President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono in 2011 to devise a plan to resolve past human rights violations had yet to announce any concrete plans.

In September 2012, the Acehnese provincial parliament announced a delay to setting up an Aceh truth and reconciliation commission. This left victims and their families without an official mechanism to establish the truth about the violations they suffered during the conflict or to establish the fate or whereabouts of their loved ones who were killed or had disappeared.

The government failed to implement recommendations made by the bilateral Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship, in particular to establish a commission for disappeared persons tasked with identifying the whereabouts of all Timor-Leste children who were separated from their parents and notifying their families.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 124–125.]

The President failed to act on Parliament's recommendations in 2009 to bring to justice those involved in the enforced disappearance of 13 prodemocracy activists in 1997 and 1998, to conduct an immediate search for activists who had disappeared, and provide rehabilitation and compensation to their families.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 125.]

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2012.

As from September 2012, in the context of what was called an islamicization policy of higher education started in 2009 by the Science and Technology Ministry, some universities began offering majors for only one gender. At Esfahan University, men were no longer allowed to major in, among other subjects, history, sociology and philosophy. Universities were also reported as having reduced or limited social science curricula, which were often viewed by authorities as causing critical and “un-

Islamic” thought. The regulations violated the right to education without discrimination, guaranteed under several international agreements to which Iran is signatory.

[Sources: Endangered scholars worldwide (3 December 2012), xiii–xiv; Human Rights Watch, “Iran: Ensure Equal Access to Higher Education: Scrap Policies that Ban Students from Studies on Basis of Gender” (22 September 2012).]

Argo, an American Oscar-winning film on the 1979 hostage crisis directed by Ben Affleck (2012), was banned for being “anti-Iranian.” Mohammad Hosseini, the minister of culture and Islamic guidance, described it as “an offensive act” motivated by “evil intentions.” The film portrayed the rescue (“exfiltration”) of six stranded American diplomats hidden in the Canadian ambassador’s home after the American embassy was occupied in November 1979; other embassy personnel was held hostage for 444 days. The state-affiliated Arts Bureau announced that film maker Ataollah Salmanian would produce Setad Moshtarak (The General Staff), a film about twenty American hostages who were delivered to the United States by the revolutionaries, intended as a response to “the ahistorical film Argo.”

[Source: Guardian (11 January 2013).]

See also India.

IRAQ

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2012.

Accountability for abuses committed by coalition forces in Iraq (2003–2012) remained almost non-existent. On 24 January 2012, a military court sentenced Staff Sergeant Frank Wuterich to a reduction in rank and forfeited two-thirds of his pay for three months for leading the “Haditha Massacre”—in which United States forces killed 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians, including women and children, in the town of Haditha in 2005. Wuterich, who pled guilty for negligent dereliction of duty for telling his men to “shoot first, ask questions later,” was originally charged with murder.

In April 2012, The Guardian reported that Australian military personnel working in Iraq in 2003 transferred 64 detainees to a secret prison where the American and British intelligence services CIA and MI6 carried out interrogations that year. Two of the detainees died during the transfer and may have been beaten to death by British soldiers, the paper said.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 549–550.]

In 2012, Saad Eskander (Saad Iskander) ([1964–]), the director of the Iraqi National Library and Archives (INLA) in Baghdad (2003–), reportedly pushed controversial legislation that would criminalize the publication of Saddam-era records without the consent of the victims and perpetrators mentioned in them in order to prevent abuse of the records.

[Sources: Bangkok Post (26 September 2012); Leonard Kniffel, “Terror Has Not Withdrawn: Daily Life for Librarians in Iraq,” American Libraries Magazine (28 November 2012); NRC Handelsblad (10–11 May 2008), 5.]

In July 2012, 169 Iraqi citizens were granted permission to seek a judicial review in order to argue that the Iraq Historical Allegations Team—established to investigate allegations of torture and other ill-treatment of Iraqi citizens by United Kingdom armed forces—was still not sufficiently independent despite structural changes made by the government. Lawyers for the claimants argued that a public inquiry was necessary in order to properly investigate allegations of human rights violations by United Kingdom armed forces in Iraq.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 285.]

See also Turkey.

IRELAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000, 2002, 2004, 2006.

On 11 February 2013, David Fitzpatrick, a professor of modern history at Trinity College, Dublin, and member of the Royal Irish Academy, delivered the annual Charles Stewart Parnell lecture at Magdalene College, Cambridge University, entitled “The Spectre of Ethnic Cleansing in Revolutionary Ireland.” While delivering it, he sang a self-penned ballad to the tune of the rebel song “Galtee Mountain Boy.” Gillian Coughlan, the mayor of Bandon (Cork County), called it “insulting” and “an attempt to create artificial divisions” because it referred to killings by the Irish Republican Army of two Protestant men in April 1922.

[Source: Justine McCarthy, “Lecturer Ballad ‘Insults’ Victims of Dunmanway,” Sunday Times (17 February 2013).]

On 19 February 2013, the Irish Prime Minister (Taoiseach), Enda Kenny, formally apologized in parliament on behalf of the state for its role in the Magdalene laundries. Some 10,000 women and girls were made to do unpaid manual labor in laundries run by Roman Catholic nuns in Ireland between 1922 and 1996. More than a quarter of those who spent time in the laundries had been sent there by the Irish state. Compensation was proposed for the victims who survived. Amnesty International accused the government of ignoring women who were exploited in laundries that operated across the border in Northern Ireland.

[Sources: “Magdalene Laundries: Irish PM Issues Formal Apology,” BBC News (19 February 2013); see also Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee to Establish the Facts of State Involvement with the Magdalen Laundries (<http://www.justice.ie/en/JELR/Pages/MagdalenRpt2013>).]

See also United Kingdom.

ISRAEL

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000–2003, 2008–2012.

Impunity continued for war crimes committed by Israeli forces during Operation “Cast Lead” in 2008–2009. In May 2012, the military authorities closed their investigation into the killing of 21 members of the Samouni family, including young children, during the operation. The family was sheltering in a house into which Israeli soldiers had ordered them to move, when they were killed, apparently by shelling. The authorities ruled that the deaths did not result from negligence by Israeli troops. In August 2012, a soldier who shot dead two Palestinian women holding a white flag during Operation “Cast Lead” received a 45-day prison sentence for “illegal use of a weapon” as the result of a plea bargain.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 134.]

In May 2012, during the week of the anniversary of the establishment of the state of Israel, student groups at Israeli universities planned events acknowledging Nakba day. Tel Aviv University granted a permit for an event to take place on university premises. After a heated debate in the Knesset education committee, Minister of Education Gideon Saar pressured the university to stop the event. On 14 May 2012, 400 students and faculty attending were met by about 200 right-wing protesters. On 16 May 2012, Haifa University canceled the Nakba day event organized by university students and scheduled to take place on campus, despite the fact that the necessary permits had been granted. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2012.]

[Sources: Index on Censorship (2012 no. 3), 76–77; Times of Israel (17 June 2012).]

On 26 June 2012, three ultra-Orthodox Jewish men were arrested, suspected of vandalizing the national Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial with anti-Zionist graffiti. Some ultra-Orthodox Jews believed that a Jewish state could be established only after the coming of the Messiah and therefore opposed the state of Israel as an illegitimate creation.

[Source: BBC News (26 June 2012).]

See also Egypt, Palestinian Authority, Tunisia, United Kingdom.

ITALY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2003, 2008, 2010, 2012.

See also Greece.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Previous Annual Report entries: 2004, 2006–2012.

On 29 November 2011, the government surrendered former President Laurent Gbagbo to the International Criminal Court (ICC), where he was charged as an indirect co-perpetrator with four counts of crimes against humanity. On 2 November 2012, the court ruled that Gbagbo was fit to stand trial, following a closed hearing on the issue. On 22 November 2012, the ICC unsealed an arrest warrant against his wife Simone Gbagbo and asked the authorities to surrender her to the court. Diplomats and civil society had previously voiced concern over whether the government would cooperate with the ICC in executing additional arrest warrants, as the government increasingly asserted that it could handle all cases going forward. Many perceived this as an effort by the government of President Alasanne Ouattara to protect its military commanders from potential prosecution for their own serious crimes between 2002 and 2011. The office of the prosecutor continued to stress that additional investigations were ongoing, including against pro-Ouattara forces. However, frustration grew among Ivorian civil society and human rights groups over the ICC's significant delay in issuing an arrest warrant against someone from the Ouattara side.

The government repeatedly stated its willingness to try those responsible for crimes committed during the post-election crisis (2010–2011). In August 2012, a national commission of inquiry established by Ouattara in June 2011 published a report on crimes committed during the post-election crisis. Although lacking in details on specific incidents, the report's balance in situating responsibility was noteworthy—documenting 1,009 summary executions by pro-Gbagbo forces and 545 summary executions by the Ivorian military, known as the Republican Forces. However, by the end of 2012 no judicial proceedings were known to have been instigated against alleged perpetrators. While the authorities charged more than 140 civilian and military leaders linked to the Gbagbo camp with crimes related to the crisis, no member of the forces of Ouattara was arrested, much less charged, for such crimes. There was growing impatience among Ivorian civil society and some diplomats to see tangible progress made toward impartial justice. Delays and shortcomings to the legal proceedings against Gbagbo's relatives and aides raised concerns that they may be held for a lengthy period without trial, or that they would be subject to trials which failed to meet international standards of fairness. Between May and July 2012, eight people were charged with genocide, including Simone Gbagbo, wife of former President Gbagbo.

On 2 October 2012, the first trial for post-election crimes opened in a military court against four officers from pro-Gbagbo forces, including the former head of the Republican Guard, Brunot Dogbo Blé, who was sentenced to 15 years for kidnapping, illegal detention, and murder. Justice officials indicated that trials in civilian courts, including against high-level officials like Simone Gbagbo, would begin in late November 2012.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 71–72; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 92–93.]

The United Nations Operation in Côte d'Ivoire (UNOCI) actively documented human rights violations and visited detention sites, though it rarely published reports or publicly criticized the government, including on issues such as one-sided justice. The United Nations Security Council did still not publish the findings of the 2004 commission of inquiry that investigated serious human rights and international humanitarian law violations during the 2002–2003 armed conflict.

Created in July 2011, the Dialogue, Truth and Reconciliation Commission faced organizational and financial difficulties and was called to “review and accelerate its activities” by UNOCI in May 2012. In June 2012, it publicly denounced illegal arrests, but public calls for reconciliation and dialogue were not followed by concrete developments.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 72; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 95.]

JAPAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2012.

In June 2012, South Korean photographer Ahn Se-Hong held an exhibition, “Layer by Layer: Korean Women Left Behind in China Who Were Comfort Women of the Japanese Military,” displaying pictures of ageing “comfort women” in the Shinjuku Nikon Salon, the building of camera maker Nikon in Tokyo. Japanese right-wing groups held small rallies in protest against the exhibition and threatened Ahn. Ahn was also placed under surveillance and his visitors were searched by security hired by Nikon. In May 2012, Nikon had first abruptly canceled the exhibition plan (probably out of fear for conservative pressure after it received numerous complaints against the exhibition) but the Tokyo District Court then had ordered it to sponsor the location.

[Sources: Article 19, Artist Alert June 2012 (23 July 2012); Lee Yoo Eun, “Japan: Korean ‘Comfort Women’ Photo Exhibit Sabotaged” (Free Speech Debate, 28 June 2012).]

When Japan’s human rights record was assessed under the United Nations Universal Periodic Review in October 2012, government officials claimed that compensation for former “comfort women” had already been resolved under the 1952 San Francisco Peace Treaty, bilateral agreements and treaties. On 4 November 2012, then opposition leader Shinzo Abe was among signatories to a United States newspaper advertisement which denied that the Japanese Imperial Army forced women into military sexual slavery during the Pacific War (1931–1945).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 141.]

JORDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2004.

See Israel.

KAZAKHSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2001, 2007, 2012.

KENYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2012.

In 2012, no steps were taken to bring people responsible for crimes and human rights violations, including possible crimes against humanity, allegedly committed during the post-election violence of 2007–2008, to justice, despite the government saying several times that investigations were continuing. In February 2012, the Director of Public Prosecutions established a taskforce to deal with the prosecution of 5,000 pending cases. It was the third time that a taskforce had been created to look into the caseload. In August, the taskforce revealed that most of the evidence was not of a sufficient standard for trial. The United Nations Human Rights Committee expressed concern at the lack of investigations and prosecution of those responsible for the violence.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 146.]

The International Criminal Court (ICC) set April 2013 trial dates in cases against four prominent Kenyans charged (William Ruto, Joshua arap Sang, Uhuru Kenyatta—currently President of Kenya—and Francis Muthaura) with committing crimes against humanity during the post-election violence of 2007–2008. In July 2012, the ICC announced that the trials would commence in April 2013. The ICC prosecutor raised concerns with the government that the email accounts of witnesses had been hacked and correspondence accessed, and warned publicly against witness tampering. In March 2012, the Kenyan police arrested blogger Denis Itumbi on suspicion of hacking into the ICC email system, although he was never charged. The government had pledged to cooperate with the ICC and had committed to national trials of additional perpetrators of the 2007–2008 violence. The Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) initially announced that his office would review up to 5000 cases with the view to prosecuting them ahead of the 2013 elections, but a DPP-appointed committee to review the cases said in August 2012 it was finding it difficult to obtain evidence and the cases did not proceed.

In April 2012, an extraordinary summit of East African heads of state attended by then President Mwai Kibaki, recommended that the mandate of the East African Court of Justice be expanded to include trials for crimes against humanity. The African Union Assembly in July 2012 deferred adoption of a protocol to expand the jurisdiction of the African Court of Justice and Human Rights (ACJHR) to include the prosecution of individuals for international crimes in order to study further the financial and structural implications of any such expansion. Kenya supported these initiatives, apparently motivated by its interest in creating competing jurisdictions in order to derail the ICC's Kenyan investigations.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 147–148; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 132.]

On 21 May 2013, the official Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission released its four-volume report. It named President Uhuru Kenyatta and Deputy President William Ruto as being among those suspected of planning and financing the 2007–2008 postelection violence (sparked off by a dispute over who won the December 2007 presidential election) in which more than 1,000 people died and 600,000 were evicted from their homes. Both Kenyatta and Ruto already faced trial at the International Criminal Court (ICC). The commission said that during the period it was mandated to investigate—from independence on 12 December 1963 until February 2008—the state adopted policies that resulted in the economic marginalization of five key regions in Kenya. It also confirmed the finding of a 2008 government commission that had said that historical injustices such as unequal land distribution were partly responsible for the 2007–2008 violence.

Kenyan media reported that the commission had been under pressure from individuals in and out of government to edit out sections of the report implicating certain people on illegal land allocations. The international commissioners working for the commission allegedly said that the Office of the President forced the commission to submit to it an advance copy of the final report and then exerted pressure to make changes in the report's chapter on historical land injustices. University of Seattle Professor Ronald Slye, one of them, did not sign the chapter because he did not approve of the changes. Judge Gertrude Chawatama from Zambia, another of them, also did not sign the chapter on land.

The commission, formed in August 2009, was supposed to take two years to complete its work. It said that despite the challenges, it had managed to collect more than 40,000 statements, more than any other truth commission in the world.

[Sources: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of June 2013, 8; Tom Odula, "Kenya's Truth Report: Killings, Land Grabs, Graft" (Associated Press; 22 May 2013).]

See also United Kingdom.

KOREA, NORTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2006–2007, 2009–2011.

A potential breakthrough deal between the United States and North Korea in February 2012 to provide substantial United States food assistance in exchange for an end to uranium enrichment and missile testing by North Korea, and a return of International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) inspectors, fell apart when North Korea insisted on attempting to launch a rocket carrying a satellite to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of North Korean founder Kim Il-Sung (1912–1994). [Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 346.]

KOREA, SOUTH

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1998–2001, 2003, 2006, 2008–2010, 2012.

In May 2012, the Ministry of Education, Science and Technology (MEST) announced that revised editions of high school textbooks would leave out discussion of two examples of evolution (the Archaeopteryx, an ancient ancestor to birds, and ancestors of the modern horse). The creationist group Society for Textbook Revision (STR), who argued that the references to bird and horse evolution promoted “atheist materialism,” had proposed the revisions. After a petition of protest from scientists, MEST on 24 June 2012 announced that it would appoint a panel of experts from the Korean Academy of Science and Technology and from the Korean Federation of Science and Technology Societies to reevaluate the STR request. Government regulations mandated that all Korean science textbooks include a section on evolutionary theory with a discussion of the fossil record.

[Sources: Rachel Nuwer, “South Korea to Reconsider Plan to Drop Evolution Examples From Textbooks,” Science Insider: Breaking News and Analysis from the World of Science Policy (<http://news.sciencemag.org/scienceinsider/2012/07/south-korea-to-reconsider-plan.html>, 6 July 2012); Soo Bin Park, “South Korea Surrenders to Creationist Demands: Publishers Set to Remove Examples of Evolution from High-School Textbooks,” Nature (7 June 2012), 14; Trouw (8 July 2012).]

In August 2012, the Supreme Court ordered the government to compensate 492 families of a group of about 400 suspected North Korean sympathizers executed in 1950 by South Korean security forces without proper trials. During the Korean War (1950–1953), many left-wing activists were targeted in South Korea, as part of the government’s anti-communism campaign. The families filed the lawsuit in 2009. The court rejected the government's argument that the claim of the families had exceeded the statute of limitations. It upheld an earlier decision by a lower court in April 2012.

[Source: "South Korea to Pay Families of Slain Activists," BBC News (27 August 2012).]

See also Japan.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999–2000, 2004–2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2010–2012.

Despite initiatives taken by the authorities in 2011–2012—often in the face of considerable internal opposition—they failed to fairly and effectively investigate the June 2010 violence and its aftermath in the cities of Osh and Jalal-Abad and provide justice for the thousands of victims of the serious crimes and human rights violations, including crimes against humanity. The Osh City Prosecutor stated in April 2012 that out of 105 cases which had gone to trial in relation to the June 2010 violence, only two resulted in acquittals.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 154.]

LATVIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2006, 2008.

LEBANON

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2003, 2006–2012.

In 2011, as part of the United Nations Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review process, the government pledged to establish an Independent National Commission to investigate the fate of those Lebanese and other nationals who "disappeared" during and after the Lebanese civil war (1975–1990) and to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances. In October 2012, Justice Minister Shakib Qortbawi put forward a draft decree to the cabinet to establish the commission, which in turn formed a ministerial committee to examine the draft. Representatives of certain families of the disappeared and other groups proposed a draft law to set up the committee.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 158; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 578.]

In 2011 and 2012, reports continued to emerge of Syrians and Lebanese kidnapped in Lebanon being taken to Syria. An official joint Syrian-Lebanese committee established in May 2005 to investigate cases of Lebanese who "disappeared" at the hands of Syrian security forces had not published any findings as of late 2012.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 579.]

In February 2012, the United Nations's Netherlands-based Special Tribunal for Lebanon announced that it would proceed with an in absentia trial of four indicted members of Hezbollah for the killing of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in 2005. In July 2012, the trial court rejected motions by the defense arguing that in absentia proceedings violated human rights. The trial was set to begin in March 2013.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 158; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 579.]

See also Syria.

LIBERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2001, 2004–2012.

Most of the 2009 recommendations of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) were yet to be implemented. These included establishing a criminal tribunal for prosecuting crimes under international law, as well as other legal and institutional reforms, and recommendations relating to accountability, and reparations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 159.]

LIBYA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2005–2012.

On 2 May 2012, the National Transitional Council, Libya's interim rulers, adopted a broad new law (Law 37) that banned the distribution of "false news and information" or "propaganda" that "endangered national security, terrorized the public or undermined public morale," including "glorifying the tyrant [Muammar al-Gaddafi]" and "damaging the 17 February Revolution." The law included sanctions up to life imprisonment. International human rights groups demanded to repeal the law. On 14 June 2012, the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional. Al-Gaddafi's criminal code had also penalized any attack on "the Great Al-Fateh Revolution or its Leader."

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (18 June 2012); Ifex Communiqué (9 May 2012); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 580; Reporters without Borders, "Repressive New Law Criminalizes Insulting Government Institutions" (7 May 2012); Reporters without Borders, "Wisdom Prevails: Libyan Supreme Court Strikes Down Law Aimed at Curbing Free Speech" (14 June 2012).]

The authorities vowed to investigate gross human rights violations committed under Muammar al-Gaddafi's government (1969–2011) and initiated investigations into a number of former high-level officials and alleged al-Gaddafi loyalists. In May 2011, the National Transitional Council (NTC; established on 2 March 2011 and leading the opposition to al-Gaddafi, in power until 8 August 2012) passed Law 17 to establish a Fact-Finding and Reconciliation Commission. It was unclear whether the Commission's mandate covered only crimes committed by the former government or included those committed by others. No effective investigations were known to have been carried out by the Commission by the end of 2012. Law 35 on Amnesty, approved by the NTC in May 2012, failed to comply with Libya's obligation under international law to investigate alleged crimes against humanity, war crimes, enforced disappearances and extrajudicial executions, and prosecute alleged perpetrators. Law 38 of May 2012 provided blanket immunity to militiamen for acts deemed to have been committed with the aim of "protecting the 17 February Revolution."

As of late 2012, no one had been charged or arrested for the apparent execution of 53 al-Gaddafi supporters in Sirte in October 2011, or for the apparent execution of Muammar al-Gaddafi and his son Muatassim. An NTC-formed commission to look at al-Gaddafi's death released no results. In contrast, the judicial authorities began proceedings against several former al-Gaddafi officials. Abuzaid Dorda, the former prime minister and head of foreign intelligence, was injured after jumping from a two-story building while detained by a militia. Dorda said he jumped in order to avoid abuse.

The Libyan authorities refused to hand over Muammar al-Gaddafi's son Saif al-Islam and former intelligence chief Abdullah Sanussi—both in Libyan custody—to the International Criminal Court (ICC) to face charges on two counts of crimes against humanity. At the end of 2012, the ICC pre-trial chamber had yet to rule on an admissibility challenge filed by the government on 1 May to try Saif al-Islam al-Gaddafi under Libyan rather than ICC jurisdiction. However, as of late 2012, Libya was still under an obligation to surrender Sanussi to the ICC pursuant to United Nations Security Council resolution 1970. From 7 June to 2 July 2012, the militia in Zintan holding al-Gaddafi arbitrarily detained ICC staff members, who traveled to Libya to meet with al-Gaddafi in a visit authorized by the ICC judges and agreed to by Libya.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 163; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 583–584.]

See also Niger.

LITHUANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005, 2009.

MACEDONIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2006–2008, 2010–2012.

In August 2012, the ruling VMRO-DPMNE party (Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization—Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity) proposed a draft law to provide reparations to Macedonian military and police forces (or their relatives) that fought and suffered losses in the 2001 armed conflict. In October 2012, the bill was derailed in parliament by the coalition party, the Albanian Democratic Union for Integration, because it did not provide for the National Liberation Army (NLA) combatants, an armed group which had fought the government forces.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 165–166.]

MALAYSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2002, 2007–2008, 2010–2011.

See United Kingdom.

MALAWI

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

MALDIVES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009–2010.

In January 2012, President G. Kenereege Mohamed Nasheed (1967–), a journalist and historian, was accused of illegally ordering the arrest of a judge accused of corruption. On 7 February 2012, he resigned after what he called “a coup” and many others “a voluntary departure.” On 7 October 2012, he was arrested. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2001, 2003, 2004, 2006, 2009.]

[Sources: BBC News (7 February 2012); Keesings historisch archief (2013), 85; NRC Handelsblad (8 February 2012), 10–11.]

MALI

Previous Annual Report entry: 2011.

In [May] 2012, UNESCO put Timbuktu—a fifth-century desert crossroads and a center of learning from the 13th to the 17th centuries known as the “City of 333 Saints”—on its list of endangered world heritage sites. On 3 April 2012, Islamist fighters from Ansar Dine (Ansar ud-Din; Defenders of Faith)—a group led by Iyad Ag Ghaly (a former nationalist leader) and Abou Dardar, controlling much of northern Mali since March 2012, practicing hard-line Wahhabism, and linked to al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM)—imposed the sharia in most of the key towns of northern Mali and began attacking the sixteen shrines of Muslim saints in Timbuktu, including the mausoleum of Sufi Saint Sidi Mahmoud Ben Amar (1463/64–1547/48) (the latter shrine was already set on fire by Ansar Dine in April 2012). On 10 July 2012, the tombs of two Muslim saints within the compound of Timbuktu’s largest mosque, Djingareyber, were destroyed. Earlier, in April 2012, Islamist fighters had destroyed the tomb of Aljoudidi Tamba Tamba; on 2 June 2010, they destroyed the tomb of Sidi Yahya. Eight shrines were also destroyed; Islamists regarded them as idolatrous. Mosques in which Sufi saints were venerated and cemeteries were also targeted. Timbuktu residents were forbidden to visit the graves of their deceased family members or to listen to, perform, or play local folklore music.

Islamist forces also seized the town of Gao from ethnic Tuareg rebels. The seventeenth-century tomb of Songhai Emperor Askia Mohammad I (ca. 1443–1538), located in Gao, was also placed on the UNESCO list. Most Malians practice an open form of Sufi Islam. One Dogon cultural site was also destroyed. On 1 July 2012, International Criminal Court Chief Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda warned Ansar Dine that the destruction of historical monuments and religious buildings was a war crime.

Also at risk in Timbuktu was a collection of between 100,000 and 700,000 handwritten texts in Arabic and in African languages in the Arabic script (mainly Fulani and Songhai) dating back to the thirteenth century. The manuscripts (treatises on history, geography, religion, medicine, astronomy, literature, mathematics, chemistry, law and philosophy) were evidence of ancient African and Islamic written scholarship, contradicting the myth of a purely oral tradition in Africa. The government-run Ahmed Baba Institute in Timbuktu held 30,000 to 40,000 of them. But Ansar Dine rebels seized the institute, looted its computers and used its new building as a sleeping quarters. On 23 January 2013, the institute and its manuscripts (possibly as many as 2,000) were partly ransacked and damaged. Vast parts of the collection (the large majority), however, owned by some 30 families, were taken to safety and hidden in early 2012 (before northern Mali was seized); thousands of them were digitized and hard disks containing images of them were smuggled out of the city. On 27 January 2013, Timbuktu was liberated by French troops.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 174; “Bulk of Timbuktu Manuscripts Survived Occupation by Rebels,” Today’s Zaman (31 January 2013); BBC News (30 June & 17 July & 23 December 2012; 30 January & 2 February 2013); Robin Denselow, “Mali Music Ban by Islamists ‘Crushing Culture To Impose Rule’,” Guardian (15 January 2013); ”Human Rights Watch, “Mali: Islamist Armed Groups Spread Fear in North (25 September 2012); Serge Daniel, “Timbuktu Shrine Destruction a ‘War Crime’: ICC” (AFP; 1 July 2012); Keesings Historisch Archief (2012), 575–76; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 134, 136; Navina Kottoor, “How Timbuktu’s Manuscripts Were Smuggled to Safety,” BBC News (3 June 2013); Ishaan Tharoor, “Mali’s Crisis: Terror Stalks the Historic Treasures of Timbuktu,” Time (5 April 2012); Ishaan Tharoor, “Timbuktu’s Destruction: Why Islamists Are Wrecking Mali’s Cultural Heritage,” Time (2 July 2012); NRC Handelsblad (29 January & 22 February 2013), 4; Trouw (2 July 2012); World University Service (15 February 2013); Geoffrey York, “The Secret Race To Save Timbuktu’s Manuscripts” Globe and Mail (27 December 2012).]

In July 2012, the government of Mali, as a state party to the International Criminal Court (ICC), referred “the situation in Mali since January 2012” to the ICC prosecutor for investigation. The prosecutor’s office visited Mali in August, October, and November 2012 and would determine at a future date whether it could take jurisdiction of the situation. Meanwhile, there was no effort by the government to investigate or hold to account members of the security forces implicated in serious abuses during the political upheaval generated by the military coup in March 2012 and the ensuing Tuareg rebellion and Islamist occupation of the north.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 138.]

MALTA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2012.

MARSHALL ISLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

In 2012, the United Nations Human Rights Council heard a report from the Special Rapporteur on Toxic Wastes on his mission to the Marshall Islands. He recommended that the United States “[g]rant full access of the Marshall Islands to United States information and records regarding the environmental and human health ramifications of past and current United States military use of the islands, as well as full access to United States medical and other related records on the Marshallese, in accordance with the right to information and the principle of transparency.”

Between 1946 and 1958 the people of the Marshall Islands endured 67 experimental nuclear tests detonated by the United States (at the time the administrator of the Trust Territory of Micronesia, which included the Marshall Islands). The residents of four atolls were exposed to fallout contamination that compromised their health, made their lands uninhabitable and destroyed their marine and faunal resources. In 1986 the Islands gained sovereignty as the Republic of the Marshall Islands (RMI) when the United States and the RMI governments entered into a Compact of Free Association, under which the United States accepted responsibility for the damage caused by the tests and established a compensation fund administered by a Tribunal set up by the RMI government. In order to fairly distribute the proceeds of the fund, the RMI government and its Nuclear Claims Tribunal had to know precisely what happened before, during and after the tests; and therefore they needed access to United States archives. United States authorities began identifying and declassifying relevant United States government records, and although thousands of pages of documents were delivered to the RMI, some documents were declassified only in part and some were totally withheld. The Tribunal, pressed to begin making compensation payments, went ahead based on incomplete information. But the RMI government refused to close the question of what really happened in the islands until all the records were open; they insisted that there could be “No Closure without Full Disclosure.”

[Sources: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of September 2012, 2, 3; Keesings Historisch Archief (2012), 123–124, 698; “US Assistant Secretary Makes Second Annual Visit to Marshall Islands,” YokweOnline (<http://www.yokwe.net/index.php?module=News&func=display&sid=3074>; 7 August 2012).]

MAURITANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2009, 2011.

See Libya.

MAURITIUS

Previous Annual Report entry: 2012.

See United Kingdom.

MEXICO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2001–2012.

Impunity for grave human rights violations committed during the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s persisted. The United Nations Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances conducted a fact-finding mission to Mexico in 2011, concluding that, “sufficient efforts are not being made to determine the fate or whereabouts of persons who have disappeared, to punish those responsible and to guarantee the right to the truth and reparation.”

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 177; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 252–253.]

On 2 July 2013, (Oscar) Samuel Malpica Uribe ([1955]–2013), social anthropologist and historian, researcher at the Department of Historical Research into the Workers’ Movement (DIHMO) of the Benemérita Universidad Autónoma de Puebla (BUAP; Distinguished Autonomous University of Puebla), and leftist activist, was shot dead by unidentified gunmen. He was a former rector of the BUAP (1987–1989). Investigators looked at a number of possible motives, including allegations made by Malpica about the existence of a corruption network at the BUAP. On 13 June 2013, he had filed an official request with the state comptroller’s office for an investigation into the alleged irregularities; according to his widow, he was planning to stage a hunger strike to press for an investigation of the BUAP.

As the founder of the Ecomuseo de Metepec (ECUML) in Atlixco—in which the workers’ patrimony of a textile factory was preserved—Malpica received the National Prize Francisco de la Maza of the Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia (INAH) [Francisco de la Maza (1913–1972)] was a Mexican historian of colonial art]. Malpica also investigated the astronomy and culture of the Mayas. He was unsuccessful in his attempt to become Puebla’s mayor in 2008 for the Workers’ Party and Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD). In 1989, Malpic was removed as rector, arrested on fraud charges in 1990 and in 1992–1993 imprisoned for one year during the administration of Governor Mariano Piña Olaya of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), but not convicted. At that occasion, he declared that he had been a political prisoner.

[Sources: “La Benemérita Universidad Autónoma de Puebla lamenta la muerte del ex Rector Samuel Malpica Uribe” (3 July 2013; http://www.buap.mx/portal_pprd/wb/comunic/la_benemerita_universidad_autonoma_de_puebla_lamen); “Former University President Murdered in Mexico,” Latin American Herald Tribune (<http://www.laht.com/>; EFE, 3 July 2013).]

MOLDOVA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2003, 2010.

MONGOLIA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2007.

On 6 May 2012, historian Rolmaajidiin Tsengel, a former citizen from China’s Inner Mongolia region, who has lived in Mongolia since 1993 and obtained a doctorate in Mongolian history from the National University of Mongolia, was accused of an “attempt to overthrow the government of Mongolia and conspiracy of a coup” because he had translated Chinese documents for the film “Galdan Boshogt,” a historical documentary about a Mongolian national hero (1644–1697) who fought in the seventeenth century against Manchu expansion and strived to unify Mongolia. He was arrested in Ulaanbaatar and reportedly tortured. Three others were also arrested on conspiracy charges, including filmmaker Gurragchaa Badamragchaa. When the latter three, all citizens of Mongolia, were released after a court hearing in late May 2013 failed to find any evidence to support the charge, Tsengel went on hunger strike. According to human rights sources, he was held because of his origins. After renouncing his Chinese citizenship, Tsengel had become a stateless person who was seeking citizenship status in Mongolia. Tsengel reportedly also worked as an adviser to another documentary film entitled “Horjiiloo” (“Triumph of Mongolia”), which dealt with how the Bogd Khan government (1911–1921) sent armies through five different routes to liberate Southern Mongolia from Chinese domination in 1913.

[Sources: Southern Mongolian Human Rights and Information Center (SMHRIC), “Southern Mongolian Historian on Hunger Strike in Mongolian Jail (http://www.smhric.org/news_487.htm; 12 June 2013); Rachel Vandenbrink, “Inner Mongolian Historian on Hunger Strike in Ulan Bator Jail,” Radio Free Asia (http://www.rfa.org/english/news/china/mongolia_-06122013170523.html; 12 June 2013).]

MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2009, 2011–2012.

In April 2012, the prosecution appeal against the acquittal in 2011 of army reservists and police officials charged with inhuman treatment of Bosniaks in Bukovica in 1992 was dismissed. The court found that at the time of the offense, the defendants' actions "did not constitute a criminal act in the eyes of the law," although inhuman treatment was defined as a crime against humanity in the 2003 Criminal Code which ought, under established principles of international law, to have been applied retroactively.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 183.]

See also Serbia.

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

The authorities again failed to implement recommendations made by the Equity and Reconciliation Commission in November 2005, including ratification of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, or to ensure justice for those who suffered serious human rights violations between 1956 and 1999.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 185.]

The Polisario Front again failed to take any steps to hold to account those responsible for human rights abuses committed in camps under its control in the 1970s and 1980s.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 185.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997–2001, 2003, 2005–2006, 2008–2012.

The National Human Rights Commission did not have the authority to receive and investigate complaints of human rights violations which had taken place prior to its formation on 5 September 2011. There was no comprehensive and independent mechanism to investigate possible war crimes and crimes against humanity, leaving victims and their relatives with inadequate access to measures of truth, justice and reparations. Many of those involved in grave human rights violations had not been brought to justice.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 190.]

NAMIBIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2006–2009, 2011.

NEPAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2012.

Nepal's six-year peace process between government forces and Communist party of Nepal (Maoist) combatants remained in limbo in 2012, and human rights commitments undertaken in the 2006 Comprehensive Peace Accord (CPA) remained unfulfilled. Impunity for wartime abuses continued and the government failed to provide redress for crimes committed during the conflict (1996–2006), including enforced disappearances, torture, rape, and extrajudicial executions. Efforts to ensure accountability for human rights violations and victims' rights to justice, truth and reparation were seriously undermined by the government's promotion of individuals alleged to have committed human rights violations to senior public positions. The government continued to request the withdrawal of criminal cases against individuals affiliated with political parties, as part of a commitment under the CPA and subsequent agreements to withdraw cases of a "political" nature. No clear definition of a "political case" was provided, and many cases recommended for withdrawal involved murder, abduction and other serious crimes.

On 28 August 2012, the Council of Ministers proposed an ordinance to establish a Commission of Inquiry on Disappeared Persons, Truth and Reconciliation, sidelining plans for two separate commissions to cover these issues. The new Commission would have power to recommend amnesties for serious human rights violations but no mandate to recommend prosecutions for alleged crimes, ignoring Nepal's legal obligations to prosecute crimes under international law. The framework for a Truth and Reconciliation Commission was part of the CPA. However, granting amnesty for crimes against humanity clearly violated international law and Nepal's Supreme Court decisions.

The army continued to shield alleged perpetrators of human rights abuses. In July 2012, it recommended the promotion of Colonel Raju Basnet, implicated in dozens of cases of enforced disappearance and torture, to the rank of brigadier general. The cabinet approved the promotion in October. In September 2012, the government promoted Kuber Singh Rana to inspector general of police. Rana was a suspect in ongoing criminal investigations that the Supreme Court ordered in February 2009 related to the October 2003 enforced disappearance and extrajudicial killings of five students from Dhanusha district in Nepal's southern plains.

The United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights released a report in October 2012 on violations of international human rights law and humanitarian law committed during Nepal's armed conflict (1996–2006), together with an archive of approximately 30,000 supporting documents and cases.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 191–192; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 336–337.]

NETHERLANDS

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 2004–2005, 2007–2012.

In April 2012, the Dutch Supreme Court delivered a judgment on whether the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) could be held responsible for deaths of Bosnian Muslims during the 1995 Srebrenica genocide. The Court ruled that the United Nations (UN) held immunity from prosecution before national courts. The families of the victims appealed the decision to the European Court of Human Rights, which upheld the Dutch decision. It stated that the appeal was inadmissible because “the granting of immunity to the UN served a legitimate purpose” and giving national courts jurisdiction over UN operations would allow states “to interfere with the key mission of the UN to secure international peace and security.”

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 193; Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of June 2013, 2.]

In 20 August 2012, a report by a commission supervising the security services criticized the AIVD (General Intelligence and Security Service) for its systematic lack of declassification activity and its unwillingness to transfer noncurrent records to the National Archives.

[Sources: Constant Hijzen, “AIVD, open je archief,” Historisch Nieuwsblad (26 September 2012); Historisch Nieuwsblad (December 2012), 15–16.]

See also Lebanon, Russia, Suriname.

NEW ZEALAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2003, 2005, 2007.

NICARAGUA

Previous Annual Report entry: 1998.

NIGER

Previous Annual Report entry: 2009.

In February 2012, under an Interpol operation, Saadi al-Gaddafi, son of the former Libyan President Mu'ammār al-Gaddafi, was put under house arrest in the capital Niamey after he appeared on Arab television and threatened Libya with an imminent uprising. He was still subject to restrictions to his movements and communications at the end of 2012. In May 2012, the authorities expressed their readiness to examine the Libyan authorities' request to hand over several high-ranking Libyan officials from al-Gaddafi's government, who had sought refuge in Niger.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 196.]

NIGERIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2006, 2008, 2010–2012.

In 2012, at least 100 people were charged with treason in south-eastern Nigeria after a march supporting independence for Biafra. On 4 November 2012 the Biafran Zionist Movement (BZM) gathered to mark the birthday of former Biafran leader Chukwuemeka Ojukwu (1933–2011), who died in November 2011 and was buried in March 2012. Later, BZM members declared independence, raised the Biafran flag and marched through the region's main town, Enugu. More than one million people died during the 1967–1970 Biafran conflict—mostly from hunger and disease. On 30 May 2007, another separatist movement, the Movement for the Actualisation of the Sovereign State of Biafra (Massob), had accused the government of marginalizing Biafra, but the latter had dismissed Massob members as “common criminals” and “armed robbers.”

[Source: BBC News (30 May 2007, 5 November 2012).]

NORWAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2009, 2012.

OMAN

Previous Annual Report entry: 2010.

PAKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2004, 2006, 2009–2012.

See Bangladesh.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2002, 2008–2010, 2012.

The Hamas authorities failed to investigate allegations of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity committed by Hamas's forces and other Palestinian armed groups in Gaza during Israel's military Operation "Cast Lead" in 2008–2009 and during the eight-day conflict in November 2012. Neither the Palestinian Authority nor Hamas credibly investigated allegations of torture and other abuses by their security forces or held perpetrators to account.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 206–207.]

See also Israel, Syria.

PANAMA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003, 2008, 2012.

Efforts to ensure justice for victims of human rights violations during the military governments (1968–1989) made slow progress. In January 2012, the government established a Special National Commission to assist in locating and identifying the remains of victims of enforced disappearance. A Truth Commission, which reported in 2002, estimated that 207 people had been forcibly disappeared and killed under the military governments. Manuel Noriega, head of state from 1983 to 1989, who had been extradited from France in 2011, remained in custody throughout 2012 awaiting trial. He was charged with human rights violations, including extrajudicial executions.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 207.]

PARAGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2005, 2007, 2009–2010, 2012.

PERU

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2012.

Efforts to prosecute those responsible for the abuses committed during the internal armed conflict (1980–2000) have had mixed results. In 2003, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission had estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearance during the country's armed conflict between 1980 and 2000. Many were victims of atrocities by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups; others were victims of human rights violations by state agents. Former President Alberto Fujimori was sentenced in 2009 to 25 years' imprisonment for killings and "disappearances" in 1991 and 1992. His intelligence adviser, Vladimiro Montesinos, three former army generals and members of the Colina group (a government death squad) were also serving sentences ranging from 15 to 25 years for the assassination in 1991 of 15 people in the Lima district of Barrios Altos, and for 6 "disappearances."

In July 2012, the Permanent Criminal Chamber of the Supreme Court reduced the sentences in the Barrios Altos case on appeal. By denying that the crimes were crimes against humanity, the court undercut the jurisprudence established by the Supreme Court's Special Criminal Chamber in the Fujimori case. The Ministry of Justice and Human Rights filed an appeal for the sentence to be annulled on constitutional grounds. In September 2012, however, the Permanent Criminal Chamber rescinded the sentence, after the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled that it was incompatible with Peru's obligations to ensure that the events were fully investigated and those responsible held accountable.

Progress to hold accountable those responsible for human rights violations under earlier governments was very limited. Prosecutors did not yet present charges or they closed hundreds of cases, partly due to the Ministry of Defense and the army failing to cooperate in providing information essential to identify perpetrators. Legislation granting access to reparation for all victims of sexual violence was approved by Congress in May, but had not come into force by the end of 2012. As a result, victims of sexual violence, other than rape, committed during the internal armed conflict (1980–2000) continued to be denied reparation.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 211; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 254, 255–256, 260.]

In December 2011, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights asked the Inter-American Court of Human Rights to open a case against Peru for the alleged extrajudicial execution of three former members of the Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement (MRTA) who were killed in April 1997 during a commando operation to free hostages held by the MRTA in the Lima residence of the Japanese ambassador. The commission recommended that the case, which a military court had closed in 2004, reopen under civilian jurisdiction. In October 2012, a Lima court found that one of the MRTA members had been extrajudicially executed, but acquitted the three main suspects, including Vladimiro Montesinos.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 260.]

PHILIPPINES

Previous Annual Report entries: 2011–2012.

Impunity for torture, enforced disappearances and unlawful killings continued despite the government's stated commitment to eradicate these crimes and bring perpetrators to justice. Court cases arising from human rights violations during martial law (1972–1981) under former President Ferdinand Marcos were dismissed or languished in court. In November 2012, President Benigno S. Aquino III ordered the establishment of an interagency committee to investigate more recent cases of these grave crimes.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 212.]

POLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2001, 2004–2005, 2007–2011.

See Belarus.

QATAR

Previous Annual Report entry: 2010.

ROMANIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2003, 2005, 2007–2008, 2010.

RUSSIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–1998, 2001, 2004–2006, 2008–2012.

In May 2012, in one of his last acts as president, Dmitry Medvedev dissolved the Commission for Actions against Falsification of History to the Detriment of Russia's Interests, known as the "Historical Truth Commission." (In a 17 June 2009 letter to Medvedev, the American Historical Association had asked to disband the commission as it contradicted the principle of intellectual freedom) [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2009.]

On 16 August 2012, historian Mikhail Suprun filed an application to the European Court of Human Rights against violation by Russia of Articles 7 (no punishment without law) and 10 (freedom of expression) of the European Convention on Human Rights [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2010–2012.].

On 21 September 2012, the International Society Memorial announced that it would fight the federal law on "Amendments to Certain Legislative Acts of the Russian Federation pertaining to the Regulation of the Activity of Non-profit Organizations, which Perform the Function of a Foreign Agent," to come into effect on 21 November 2012. It called the law illegal (because it gave the government judicial power) and recalled that by forcing civic organizations that received donations from abroad to put themselves on a list of "organizations–foreign agents," the law conjured up the 1930s when hundreds of thousands of people were also coerced into calling themselves "foreign agents." On the day of the entry into force of the law, Memorial discovered graffiti with the inscription "Foreign Agent. I love USA" spray-painted on the walls of its headquarters in Moscow. [Sources: Keesings Historisch Archief (2012), 548; Observatory for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders, Violations of the Right of NGOs to Funding: From Harassment to Criminalisation—2013 Annual Report (Geneva 2013), 59; Statement by International Society "Memorial" on the Law on "Foreign Agents" (21 September 2012).]

A Dutch documentary, 900 Days (2012), directed by Jessica Gorter and containing interviews with survivors of the Nazi siege of Leningrad (now St. Petersburg) in 1941–1944 (leaving one million dead from starvation), could be shown during film festivals and in selected cinemas in September 2012 but not on the television channel Kultura (although no ban was issued). The reason was that the film implied silent criticism of the official story of heroic resistance of the population.

[Source: NRC Handelsblad (27–28 September 2012), 36–37.]

The request by historian Nikita Petrov, deputy chair of the Council of Memorial, to access documents of the KGB (Komitet gosudarstvennoi bezopasnosti; Committee of State Security) from 1946 to 1956 was rejected by the Federal Security Service (FSB) on the grounds that they contained state secrets. When Petrov lodged a complaint, both the Moscow City Court and the Supreme Court ruled that the requested documents were created before the 1993 Law on State Secrets and therefore not covered by it. This meant that declassification of Soviet-era documents was dependent on internal decisions made by relevant archive holders. Petrov applied to the Constitutional Court, which on 22 November 2012 ruled not to consider his complaint but at the same time affirming that the 30-year classification limit provided for in the 1993 law applied to information defined as state secret both before and after 1993.

[Source: Svetlana Savranskaya, “Russian Court Ruling Aids Release of Soviet Era Secrets,” (<http://www.freedominfo.org/2013/01/russian-constitutional-court-rules-on-law-on-state-secrets>); 15 January 2013).]

On 6 December 2012, the City Court in Dzerzhinsk (Nizhny Novgorod region) held a hearing on a petition filed by the local prosecutor’s office to ban a 1,200-page book written by Stanislav Dmitrievsky [Dmitriyevsky], an archaeologist and writer, Oksana Chelysheva, and Bogdan Guareli, and entitled International Tribunal for Chechnya: Prospects of Bringing to Justice Individuals Suspected of War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity during the Armed Conflict in the Chechen Republic (2009) under the anti-extremism legislation. The book, with a print-run of 700 copies and also available on the website of the independent newspaper Novaya Gazeta, provided a detailed analysis of the human violations by all parties during the Chechnyan conflict; it emphasized the responsibility borne by the top Russian leadership. In a statement of 11 January 2013, Russian PEN complained that the two prosecutors had not read the book and that the two experts summoned by them did not make the distinction between negative evaluations and extremism or between statements by the author and quotations. The next hearing was to be held on 11 April 2013. Since 2005, local authorities have persecuted Dmitrievsky with administrative arrests, a criminal prosecution, intrusive inspections, orders to close his office and arson attacks. Upon appearance of the monograph in 2009, Moscow investigators had already conducted a criminal inquiry into the alleged presence of extremist content, but they had not found sufficient grounds then to open a case.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, “Russia: Stop Efforts to Ban Human Rights Book—Local Authorities Go After Activist’s Account of Chechnya Conflict” (3 December 2012); PEN

International Rapid Action Network, RAN 77/12 (14 December 2012); PEN America, “Russia: Stanislav Dmitrievsky” (21 December 2012); “PEN Russia Issues Statement on Stanislav Dmitrievsky” (<http://www.pen-international.org/01/2013/pen-russia-issues-statement-on-stanislav-dmitrievsky>; 11 January 2013); Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, “Tenacious Russian Activist Girds for yet Another Battle” (4 December 2012).]

In February 2013, the Justice Ministry put recent writings of liberal historian Yuri Afanasiev (1934–) on a “Federal List of Extremist Material.” They included his 2011 essay about the frustrated democratization of Russia, in which Afanasiev held that post-1991 liberals, like the Bolsheviks in 1917, had failed because they based their reforms on abstract theory instead of historical experience and that this had led to neo-totalitarian rather than democratic power. All publications on the list were banned. A court in Omsk, Siberia, also banned the essay. In 2005, together with Aleksandr Yakovlev (1923–2005; a close adviser to Mikhail Gorbachev and also a historian), Afanasiev had already warned against a re-Stalinization.

[Sources: Charles Gurin, “Russian Historians Denounce Re-Stalinization,” Eurasia Daily Monitor (6 May 2005); NRC Handelsblad (26 February 2013).]

On 21 March 2013, five officials from the Prosecutor’s Office, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, the Ministry of Justice, and the Tax Inspectorate arrived at Memorial society without warning to conduct an inspection. A television crew from the pro-Kremlin station NTV arrived with the inspectors to film the proceedings; it aired a news report alleging that Memorial could be in violation of the “foreign agents” law (requiring groups that accept foreign funding and engage in “political activity” to register as a “foreign agent”).

In March 2013, teams of officials inspected at least 30 groups in Moscow, and many more in other regions. The inspections were part of a broader crackdown on civil society that began in 2012. A document leaked (to the media) that provided instructions to local prosecutors’ offices for conducting inspections urged them to analyze sources of foreign funding for the groups and their involvement in political activities, as well as any evidence of “extremism.”

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, “Russia: New Pressure on Civil Society: Government Inspects Dozens of Groups with Foreign Funding in NGO Crackdown” (21 March 2013); NRC Handelsblad (22 & 27 March 2013).]

See also Azerbaijan.

RWANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2000–2012.

In June 2012, the Council of Ministers approved an amended version of the 2008 genocide ideology law, which has been used to silence critics. As of late 2012, the revised law was before parliament. The revised law contained improvements (a narrower definition of the offense and a reduction in prison sentences) but retained the notion of “genocide ideology” as a criminal offense punishable by imprisonment and contained vague language that could be used to criminalize free speech.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 223; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 150.]

Community-based gacaca courts, set up to try cases related to the 1994 genocide, closed in June 2012, after trying almost two million cases, according to government statistics. The trial of former Pastor Jean Bosco Uwinkindi, the first case transferred to Rwanda by the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), opened in Kigali. Several other cases were also transferred in 2012. Two ICTR staff members were assigned to monitor referral cases on a temporary basis, pending agreement on trial monitoring with the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights. They were required to file monthly reports through the Registry to the President of the ICTR, or the President of the Mechanism for International Criminal Tribunals, as appropriate.

In January 2012, academic and former government official Léon Mugesera was sent back to Rwanda from Canada to face charges of planning of and incitement to genocide. Preliminary court hearings took place in Kigali. Court proceedings against Rwandan genocide suspects took place in several other jurisdictions, including Belgium Canada, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Germany, and the Netherlands.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 223–224; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 147, 150–151.]

In June 2012, the Council of Ministers approved an amended version of the 2008 genocide ideology law. As of late 2012, the law was before parliament. It law contained improvements (a narrower definition of the offense and a reduction in prison sentences) but retained the notion of “genocide ideology” as a criminal offense punishable by imprisonment and contained vague language that could be used to criminalize free speech. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2009–2011.]

In April 2012, Epaphrodite Habarugira, an announcer at Radio Huguka, was arrested and charged with genocide ideology after apparently mistakenly, during a news broadcast, mixing up words when referring to survivors of the genocide. He spent three months in prison before being acquitted in July.

The state prosecutor appealed against his acquittal.

On 5 April 2012, the Supreme Court reduced the sentences of Agnès Uwimana Nkusi, editor of the privately-owned bimonthly Umurabyo, and Saidati Mukakibibi, deputy editor and reporter at Umurabyo, to four and three years respectively. The Supreme Court cleared Uwimana of “genocide ideology” and “divisionism” charges but upheld a conviction for defamation. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2011.]

On 30 October 2012, the High Court in Kigali found Victoire Ingabire guilty of conspiracy to undermine the established government (for financially supporting anti-Rwandese rebels in East Congo) and denying the genocide (based on a 2003 law rather than on the 2008 genocide ideology law) and sentenced her to eight years’ imprisonment. There were doubts about the reliability of some evidence. (Confessions of two co-accused incriminating Ingabire were made after a prolonged period of detention in a military camp where torture was used to coerce confessions; a defence witness claimed he had been held in military detention with one of the co-accused and alleged that the individual’s confession had been forced.) [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2011.]

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 223; Human Rights Watch, “Rwanda: Eight-Year Sentence for Opposition Leader—Victoire Ingabire Found Guilty of Two Charges in Flawed Trial” (30 October 2012); Human Rights Watch, “Rwanda: Eight-Year Sentence” (30 October 2012); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 147–150; Keesings Historisch Archief (2013), 96–97; NRC Handelsblad (31 October 2012).]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic).

SAUDI ARABIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2001, 2006, 2010–2011.

On 20 July 2012, the first day of the ramadan month of fasting, Omar, a 31-part historical television drama produced by the Saudi Middle East Broadcasting Center (MBC), said to be the largest ever Arabic production and depicting the life of the second Caliph Omar ibn al-Khattab (586/590–644), a close companion of Prophet Muhammad who oversaw the expansion of the Muslim empire in the seventh century), sparked a controversy in the Arab world with thousands opposing the depiction of the Prophet Muhammad and his companions. Although such visual depictions were not banned in the Quran, Sunni scholars generally agreed that personifications of religious figures were banned because they could lead to idolatry. Official Islamic institutions like Al-Azhar in Egypt and Dar al-Ifta, the legal research center of Saudi Arabia, issued fatwas against the series, but other scholars, including Sheikh Yusuf Al-Qaradawi from Egypt, praised the series's historical accuracy.

[Sources: AFP, "TV Depiction of Revered Islamic Figure Causes Stir" (23 July 2012); NRC Handelsblad (24–25 July 2012), 32; "Prophet Companions TV Series Stirs Debate," On Islam (<http://www.onislam.net/english/news/middle-east/458110-prophet-companions-tv-series-stirs-debate.html>; 23 July 2012).]

See also Tunisia, United Kingdom.

SENEGAL

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2004, 2006, 2009.

On 24 July 2012, Senegal agreed to establish a special court to try former Chadian President Hissène Habré, who resided in the country since 1990. On 20 July 2012, the International Court of Justice had found that Senegal had violated its legal obligations under the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment and ordered Senegal to bring Habré to justice "without further delay" either by prosecuting him in Senegal or extraditing him to Belgium. After four days of talks in Dakar, Senegal agreed to an African Union (AU) plan to try Habré before a special court in the Senegalese justice system with AU-appointed judges presiding over his trial. A 1992 National Truth Commission in Chad had accused Habré's government (1982–1990) of systemic torture and up to 40,000 political assassinations. Between 2001 and 2005, a Belgian judge and his team had investigated the crimes before indicting Habré on charges of crimes against humanity, war crimes, and torture in 2005, leading Belgium to request his extradition from Senegal.

On 22 August 2012, an agreement was signed between Senegal and the AU to establish a special court to try Habré. In September 2012, Chadian authorities stated that they had confirmed their financial contribution of CFA 2 billion (around US$4 million) for the trial. On 19 December 2012, the National Assembly adopted a law establishing special chambers within the existing court structure. However, some key elements to the successful conduct of a fair trial had not been set up, such as a program for protection of victims and witnesses, and an effective mutual legal assistance agreement with other countries, including France and Chad, where victims, witnesses, evidence and assets may be located.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 227, 228; International Federation for Human Rights, “Chad: After World Court Ruling, Plan to Try Chad’s Ex-Dictator in Senegal with African Judges” (25 July 2012).]

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2008–2012.

In 2012, both incoming President Tomislav Nikolić and former President Boris Tadić made statements that genocide had not taken place in Srebrenica. On the day of his inauguration, 31 May 2012, Nikolić said that the massacre in Srebrenica was a serious crime but no genocide in an interview with the Montenegrin national broadcaster RTCG. He invoked the National Assembly of the Republic of Serbia, which adopted a Srebrenica Resolution in March 2010 condemning the “serious crime” committed against the Bosniak population in Srebrenica.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 228; J. G., “Reactions to Statements from Newly Elected President of Serbia, Tomislav Nikolić,” RECOM Initiative !Voice (<http://www.scribd.com/doc/98868941/RECOM-Initiative-Voice-7-2012>; 2012 no. 7), 12–14.]

There was ongoing progress in domestic war crimes prosecutions. In September 2012, the Belgrade War Crimes Chamber convicted 11 members of the Kosovo Liberation Army’s (KLA) “Gnjilane group” to a combined total of 116 years’ imprisonment for crimes against civilians, mainly Roma and Ashkali, during the 1999 Kosovo war. In June 2012, the chamber sentenced 14 former members of the Yugoslav People’s Army (JNA) to a combined total of 126 years’ imprisonment for war crimes against Croat civilians in the Croatian village of Lovas in 1991.

However, in a report from June 2012, Chief Prosecutor Serge Brammertz at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) criticized Serbia’s lack of efforts to uncover the networks that helped war crimes fugitives wanted by the ICTY to evade justice. The Serbian war crimes prosecutor's office subsequently began investigating 13 suspects, including a former high-ranking security official. In his report, Brammertz also criticized Serbia's failure to sign a proposed protocol on war crimes cooperation between the Serbian prosecutor and his Bosnian counterpart.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 229; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 470.]

In November 2012, it was reported that one of the main reasons why the role of the Yugoslav People's Army (JNA) in the breakup of Yugoslavia remained unclear was that JNA archives were still kept secret.

[Source: "Role of JNA in the 1990s Wars Still Remains Unclear" (Balkan Transitional Justice; 2 November 2012).]

On 20 January 2013, two hundred elite police officers supervised the removal of a controversial memorial from a central square in the southern Serbian town of Presevo, an area with a significant Albanian community. The monument, erected in December 2012, was dedicated to 27 ethnic Albanian rebels who fought against Serbia and were killed during a 2000 insurgency in Presevo, a spillover of the 1999 Kosovo conflict. Serbia regarded the rebels as terrorists. At least 2,000 ethnic Albanians rallied in Presevo to protest against the removal.

[Sources: "Serbia Removes Ethnic Albanian Memorial," Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (20 January 2013); "Albanians Protest Removal of Presevo Monument," Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (21 January 2013).]

Kosovo

On 21 September 2012, a study by the Humanitarian Law Center in Kosovo—directed by Kreshnik Sylejmani, conducted at a number of secondary schools across Kosovo and based on interviews with 15- to 17-year-olds—was presented in Pristina. It showed that the history textbooks did not mention—and pupils were ignorant of—the facts of the war in 1998–1999, particularly the number of victims who were killed and disappeared on both sides. (The war, between Serb security forces and the insurgent Kosovo Liberation Army, claimed around 10,000 victims, the majority Kosovo Albanians, and ended after a 78-day NATO air-bombing campaign in 1999 that ousted Serb armed forces from the province, which was then put under United Nations administration). Shkelzen Gashi, a political scientist from Kosovo, presented his comparative study of seventh-grade primary school history textbooks in Kosovo, Albania and Serbia, finding falsification and distortion of events (such as the 1389 battle and the 1999 war) in both Albanian and Serb textbooks. He also found that the textbooks contained hate speech: Kosovar books talked about state genocide against the Albanians; Serb books presented Kosovo Albanians as terrorists and fascists.

[Source: Fatmir Aliu, “Kosovo Kids Taught False History, Study Shows,” Balkan Insight (<http://www.balkaninsight.com/en/article/kosovo-kids-taught-wrongly-a-study-shows>; 24 September 2012).]

On 29 November 2012, the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) acquitted Ramush Haradinaj, the former prime minister of Kosovo, and his two co-defendants, Lahi Brahimaj and Idriz Balaj, former Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) commanders, after their retrial for crimes against humanity against Serb Roma and Albanian civilians in the Jablanica detention camp in 1998.

The European Union Rule of Law Mission (EULEX) special investigation team continued its investigation into allegations that some KLA members, including senior officials in Kosovo, had participated in post-war abductions, enforced disappearances, killing of Serbs, and organ trafficking. In the first nine months of 2012, EULEX judges handed down three war crimes judgments and confirmed one new war crimes indictment in October. During January and September 2012, local judges handed down 20 other verdicts. As of October 2012, 78 war crimes cases were under investigation.

In December 2012, the Human Rights Advisory Panel (HRAP), established to decide on alleged human rights violations by the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), considered three complaints, in which they decided that UNMIK had violated the right to life of Kosovo Serbs abducted following the 1999 armed conflict, by failing to conduct an effective investigation.

The Kosovo Government Commission for Missing Persons largely failed to implement the 2011 Law on Missing Persons. Relatives demanded that the authorities address the issue of missing persons in talks with Serbia.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 228–230; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 478.]

See also Croatia.

SERBIA / MONTENEGRO

Previous Annual Report entries: 1999, 2001–2007. See Montenegro and Serbia / Kosovo.

SIERRA LEONE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2000–2012.

SINGAPORE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2009–2011.

SLOVAKIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 2002, 2007, 2009, 2011.

On 21 August 2009, the government of Prime Minister Robert Fico barred Hungarian President László Sólyom from making a controversial visit during which he had planned (at the invitation of an association based in Slovakia) to unveil the statue of Saint Stephen (975–1038), the founder and first king of the Hungarian State, in the southern (predominantly ethnic Hungarian) town of Komárno, on the River Danube, which separates Slovakia and Hungary (20 August was a national holiday in Hungary, in commemoration of Saint Stephen). No Slovak officials had been invited to the event, which coincided with the anniversary of the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia by five armies, including Hungary's. The incident heightened bilateral tension over Slovakia's treatment of its ethnic Hungarians, who made up about ten per cent of the population. On 16 October 2012, the Court of Justice of the European Union found that European Union law did not oblige Slovakia to guarantee access to its territory to Sólyom, because of the specific status of a head of state.

[Sources: BBC News (21 & 25 August 2009); Court of Justice of the European Union, Hungary versus Slovak Republic: Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/277.pdf>; 16 October 2012); NRC Handelsblad (28 August 2009) 5; Keesings Historisch Archief (2010), 17; (2012), 500.]

SLOVENIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2007–2009, 2011–2012.

Former permanent residents of Slovenia originating from other former Yugoslav republics, whose legal status was unlawfully revoked in 1992 (known as the “erased”), continued to be denied restoration of their rights. Past legislative initiatives failed to provide them with reparation for the violations of rights they suffered as a result, or to guarantee their access to these rights in future. The authorities also failed to present any new measures to fully restore their rights. On 26 June 2012, the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights ruled in the pilot case Kuric versus Slovenia that the “erasure” and its consequences constituted a violation of the applicants’ rights to family and private life and to effective legal remedy. The Grand Chamber also found that the applicants had suffered discrimination in relation to these rights, and set a one-year deadline for the creation of a domestic compensation scheme for victims. By the end of 2012, there was no indication that the authorities had made efforts to set up such a scheme.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 235.]

SOMALIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2003, 2006, 2012.

Given the gravity of the crimes committed in Somalia since 1991, accountability at the international level, notably through establishing a United Nations commission of inquiry, or a comparable, appropriate mechanism, was critical to document serious crimes and recommend appropriate measures.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 158.]

SOUTH AFRICA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2004, 2006–2010, 2012.

The reintroduction of the Traditional Courts Bill in 2012, after the government withdrew it in 2008 following widespread criticism, may have dire consequences for the rights of women. The bill aimed to affirm the traditional justice system based on restorative justice and reconciliation. As such, it emphasized the position of traditional leaders in the administration of justice, and effectively centralized their power as the arbiters of customary law. The bill would give traditional leaders the authority to enforce controversial versions of customary law such as the practice of ukutwala (forced marriage), adjudicate compliance and enforce penalties. The penalties were of particular concern as section 10 of the bill imposed sanctions including fines, forced labor, and the withdrawal of customary benefits, such as the enjoyment of communal land. Section 4 provided for the minister of justice to appoint traditional leaders who were recognized in the Traditional Leadership and Governance Framework Act as presiding officers of traditional courts. Most traditional leaders were men, and the bill did not assign women any role in the courts. A significant concern with the traditional justice system was its entrenchment of patriarchy, as well as discriminatory social and economic practices, such as access to land, inheritance and forced marriage.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 161.]

South Africa continued to play a leadership role in affirming the need to uphold obligations to the International Criminal Court (ICC), although it had yet to block African Union decisions, which called for states not to cooperate with the court in the arrest of suspect Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. The first domestic criminal case in South Africa for international crimes committed in Zimbabwe also commenced, although it was initially challenged by South's Africa's police and prosecuting authority.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 162.]

See also Sudan.

SOUTH SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

An investigation established in August 2011 into allegations against the former Director of Public Security and Criminal Investigations remained ongoing at the end of 2012. The investigation was examining torture, corruption, the creation of illegal detention centers, and a case of enforced disappearance. Violations perpetrated by the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA) and the South Sudan Police Service (SSPS) Auxiliary Force during the Jonglei (one of the ten states of South Sudan) state-wide civilian disarmament campaign Operation Restore Peace, launched in March 2012, remained largely unaddressed by the government.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 244.]

SPAIN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999, 2002–2012.

On 27 February 2012, the Supreme Court acquitted former judge Baltasar Garzón of exceeding his authority. Garzón was prosecuted, among other things, for violating the 1977 amnesty law by launching an investigation in 2008 into the enforced disappearances of 114,266 people between July 1936 and December 1951. Despite the acquittal, the Supreme Court concluded that Garzón had wrongfully interpreted the law when considering the facts under investigation as crimes against humanity. According to the Court, the crimes were not defined as crimes against humanity within domestic law at the time they were committed. This judgment by the Supreme Court could rule out the possibility of investigating past crimes under international law in Spain.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 248.]

In October 2012, Minister of Education José Ignacio Wert (of the Partido Popular political party) declared in the Cortes that a lack of emphasis on the Spanish language and history in Catalan schools had helped foster support for independence in the region and that secondary school children there should be “hispanicized” by bringing the curriculum under greater central control. He also said that the common history of Spain and Catalonia was minimized in Catalan schools. The statement was rejected as unfounded by both Catalan and other critics, including Irene Rigau, Catalonia’s education minister.

[Sources: El País (10 & 11 October 2012); Financial Times (10 October 2012).]

See also Argentina.

SRI LANKA

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2004, 2008–2012.

Sri Lanka made no progress in 2012 toward ensuring justice for the victims of numerous violations of human rights and the laws of war committed by both sides during the 26-year-long conflict between the government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) (1983–2009). These violations included the government’s indiscriminate shelling of civilians and the LTTE’s use of civilians as “human shields” in the final months of the conflict, which ended in May 2009. The government continued to ignore the 2011 report of the panel of experts appointed by United Nations (UN)

Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, which recommended establishing an independent international mechanism to monitor the government's implementation of the panel recommendations, conduct an independent investigation, and collect and safeguard evidence.

In March 2012, the UN Human Rights Council (HRC) adopted a resolution finding that the government's Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission (LLRC) did not adequately address serious allegations of violations of international law, and called on Sri Lanka to take all necessary steps to ensure justice and accountability. It requested that the government expeditiously present a comprehensive plan detailing the steps it had taken to implement the LLRC's recommendations and to address accountability. The government responded by publicly threatening human rights defenders who had advocated for the resolution. In July 2012, however, it announced that it had adopted Plan of Action on the LLRC recommendations. The plan vaguely called for the government to look into civilian deaths and prosecute any wrongdoers. It sets out a 12-month timeframe to conclude disciplinary inquiries and 24 months for prosecutions. But the government proposal merely left responsibility for investigations with the military and police, the entities responsible for the abuses. There was no information regarding actions of the special army courts of inquiry, supposedly established in 2012 to look into allegations of war crimes.

Sri Lanka's human rights record was assessed under the UN Universal Periodic Review in November 2012; Sri Lanka maintained that it did not need independent investigations into alleged human rights violations and past crimes under international law despite concerns raised by UN members. A report by the UN Secretary-General's Internal Review Panel on UN Action in Sri Lanka, released on 14 November 2012, acknowledged the UN's failure to protect civilians during the country's armed conflict. At the March Human Rights Council session, the government tried to block the council from adopting a resolution focusing on accountability. The resolution, which passed with 24 votes in favor, 15 against, and 8 abstentions, effectively overturned a May 2009 council resolution that ignored serious human rights concerns during the Sri Lankan war. The resolution called on the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights to report back in March 2013.

India (which faced pressure from Tamil Nadu state and civil society activists demanding accountability) continued to press the Sri Lankan government to address allegations of human rights violations, implement the LLRC recommendations, and initiate a reconciliation process with the Tamil minority. China has emerged in recent years as an important ally of Sri Lanka's government. In addition to investing heavily in developing Sri Lankan infrastructure, China had several high-level diplomatic and military missions to Sri Lanka during 2012 and vocally opposed the council resolution. [Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 149; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 368–370, 372–373.]

See also India.

SUDAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002–2003, 2006–2012.

Seven years after the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued arrest warrants or summons to appear against six individuals, Sudan continued to refuse to cooperate with the ICC or to meaningfully prosecute the crimes in its own courts. In 2005, the United Nations Security Council had referred the situation in Darfur to the ICC, which issued the warrants or summons to appear against President Omar al-Bashir and five others (including Ahmed Haroun, Governor of Southern Kordofan, and Ali Mohammed Ali Abdelrahman, a former Janjaweed militia leader), on charges of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide, although the charges were not confirmed against one of the suspects, Bahar Idriss Abu Garda. On 1 March 2012, the ICC issued a warrant of arrest against Abdel Raheem Muhammad Hussein, current Minister of National Defense, for 41 counts of crimes against humanity and war crimes allegedly committed in the context of the situation in Darfur.

Sudan made none of the justice reforms recommended in the 2009 report from the African Union's High-level Panel on Darfur, headed by former South African President Thabo Mbeki.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 251; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 174–175.]

See also Egypt, South Africa.

SURINAME

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009–2010, 2012.

In April 2012, the National Assembly approved an amendment to the 1992 amnesty law, extending the period covered by the law from April 1980 to August 1992, thereby covering the torture and extrajudicial execution of 15 opponents of the then military government in December 1982 (the so-called December Murders). Twenty-five people, including President Dési Bouterse, the country's military leader at the time, had been put on trial before a military court in November 2007 for the killings. The amended law granted an amnesty to those who “have committed criminal offenses and/or are suspected of having done so within the framework of the defense of the State and/or overthrow of the lawful authorities such as the events occurring during December 1982 and the Guerrilla War” in order to “promote national unity and the further uninterrupted development of the Republic of Suriname.” Bouterse argued that the new amnesty law would help to reconcile the country. However, there were demonstrations in Paramaribo, the capital, in April and May against this initiative to grant immunity to Bouterse and the other co-accused. International criticism of the law included statements by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights that “laws that seek to leave serious human rights violations in impunity are incompatible with Inter-American human rights obligations.” In April 2012, following the approval of the law, the Netherlands withdrew their ambassador. On 11 May 2012, the military court adjourned the trial until the Constitutional Court could review the new amnesty law. This decision was confirmed by the Office of the Public Prosecutor on 12 December 2012. However, this could result in a lengthy delay as, although the 1987 Constitution provides for the creation of a constitutional court, no such court had been established by the end of 2012. In November 2012, youth activist Sharona Lieuw On, chair of Youth against Amnesty, filed a complaint after receiving a bullet through the post along with a letter warning her not to continue her protests against the amnesty law. She later withdrew her complaint as she feared for her safety.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 253–254.]

SWAZILAND

Previous Annual Report entry: 2011.

In April 2012, police disrupted events organized by the Trade Union Congress of Swaziland (TUCOSWA) and other groups to commemorate the 1973 ban on political parties and to call for democratic reforms. Fifteen trade union members were arrested. Ahead of the protests, the government had issued a notice of de-registration of TUCOSWA.

[Source: Front Line Defenders, 2013 Annual Report: Global Trends in 2012 for Human Rights Defenders (Blackrock 2013), 6.]

SWEDEN

Previous Annual Report entry: 1998.

SWITZERLAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1997, 1999–2000, 2004, 2007–2009.

See Algeria.

SYRIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2002, 2004–2012.

During the armed conflict, which began in March 2011 and which later turned into a civil war, many monuments were either damaged and looted or destroyed, including the Crac des Chevaliers (one of the world's best-preserved Crusader castles); ruins in the ancient city of Palmyra; and the souk (the medieval covered market) and Umayyad mosque in Aleppo's walled Old City (the latter two in October 2012). Both rebels and regime forces had turned some of the historic sites into bases, including citadels, Turkish bath houses and the Umayyad mosque.

[Source: "Aleppo Mosque is Latest Casualty of Syria's Civil War," Telegraph (16 October 2012).]

In February 2012, scenarist and writer Khaled Khalifa (1964–) published an open letter accusing the Syrian regime of committing genocide against its own population; he was attacked by the secret police. In 2006, his novel In Praise of Hatred, centering on a family in Aleppo and mainly about "the Events" (the armed conflict in 1976–1982 between the Muslim Brotherhood and the security forces of the secular Baath Party, which left at least 10,000 dead in the city of Hama in 1982), a taboo topic, had been banned upon publication. In 2007, it was republished in Beirut.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (1 June 2011, 4–5 April 2013); Robert Worth, "A Bloody Era of Syria's History Informs a Writer's Banned Novel," New York Times (12 April 2008).]

On 17 July 2012, citizen journalist Fatima Khaled Saad was reportedly transferred to the headquarters of the general intelligence department in Damascus. In late June, Saad was detained for possession of recordings about the country's revolution (which began in March 2011). She was reportedly a victim of violence and ill-treatment while in custody.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2012 no. 4), 136.]

In 2012, government forces and their associated militias committed war crimes while rampaging through cities, towns and villages perceived to be opposition strongholds in areas including Homs, Idlib, Hama, Damascus and Aleppo governorates. They carried out indiscriminate attacks that killed or injured thousands of civilians. Many of the deaths resulted from the government's improper use of imprecise battlefield weapons in densely populated civilian areas. In addition to dropping free-fall, unguided bombs from aircraft, security forces fired mortars, artillery, incendiary weapons and rockets in residential areas. They also used internationally banned weapons, including anti-personnel mines and cluster munitions, and systematically looted, destroyed and burned property and sometimes the bodies of those they killed.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 259.]

Government forces withheld information on the fate of hundreds, possibly thousands, of detainees held in connection with the conflict in conditions that amounted to enforced disappearance. The authorities also continued their failure to account for some 17,000 people who disappeared in Syrian custody since the late 1970s. They included hundreds of Palestinians and Lebanese nationals who were arrested in Syria or abducted from Lebanon by Syrian forces or by Lebanese and Palestinian militias.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 261.]

The government took no steps to investigate the numerous allegations against their forces or to bring anyone to justice for alleged gross human rights violations, crimes against humanity or war crimes. The government maintained a regime of impunity, including legislation giving members of the security forces effective immunity for unlawful killings, torture, enforced disappearances and other human rights violations. Nor did the authorities take any steps to investigate and hold to account those responsible for gross violations committed in the past, including thousands of enforced disappearances and the killing of prisoners at Saydnaya prison in 2008 and Tadmur prison in June 1980. In February 2012, the Independent International Commission of Inquiry (established in 2011) gave the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights a sealed list of senior officials whom it said should be investigated for crimes against humanity. Armed opposition groups also failed to respect international humanitarian law, including by failing to prevent war crimes such as torture and the summary killings of captives.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 261–262.]

On 11 February 2013, the Islamist opposition movement al-Nusra decapitated the head of a statue of Abul Ala al-Maarri (973–1058) in Aleppo. An Arab philosopher, al-Maarri had condemned religious dogmas, which was the reason for the attack. On 4 March 2013, rebels tore down a statue of former President Hafez al-Assad (1971–2000) while conquering the town of Raqqa.

[Sources: “Beeld oude Assad omvergetrokken” (<http://nos.nl/artikel/480864-beeld-oude-assad-omvergetrokken.html>); 4 March 2013); Trouw (2 February 2013).]

See also Lebanon.

TAIWAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998, 2001, 2008–2010, 2012.

TANZANIA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2010.

THAILAND

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995, 1999, 2001–2002, 2005, 2007–2012.

At least 90 people died and more than 2,000 were injured during violent political confrontations from March to May 2010 as a result of unnecessary or excessive use of lethal force by Thai security forces, as well as attacks by “Black Shirts,” a militant armed group operating in tandem with the anti-government United Front for Democracy against Dictatorship (UDD), known as the “Red Shirts.”

In January 2012, the government of Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra agreed to provide financial compensation to victims of the 2010 violence. However, many victims and their families said they feared that financial compensation had been offered as a substitute to full investigations and commitment to bring perpetrators of violence to justice. In May 2012, a National Reconciliation Bill that included an amnesty provision for those involved in the 2010 violence led to more protests. The Bill was put on hold in July 2012. After a court found security forces responsible for the May 2010 killing of an anti-government protester, murder charges were lodged against former Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva and his former deputy Suthep Thaugsuban in December 2012. They were the first officials to be charged in connection with the 2010 violence. The trials of 24 UDD protest leaders charged with terrorism also started in December 2012.

On 17 September 2012, the independent Truth for Reconciliation Commission of Thailand (TRCT) presented its final report, which blamed both sides for the 2010 violence but indicated that the security forces were responsible for the majority of deaths and injuries. The commission urged the Yingluck government to “address legal violations by all parties through the justice system, which must be fair and impartial.” At the same time, the status of investigations into alleged crimes by “Black Shirt” militants remained unclear. A number of those accused of violence against soldiers, police officers, and anti-UDD groups were released on bail with the expectation they would not be prosecuted. The UDD leadership and their supporters, including those holding positions in the government and the parliament, dismissed the TRCT findings and asserted that there were no armed elements within the UDD during the events of 2010. [Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 267; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 374–375.]

On 23 April 2013, the Ministry of Culture banned Boundary, a Thai-made documentary, about the 1000-year-old dispute over the Cambodian-Thai border, and made by filmmaker Nontawat Numbenchapol, because it included “information on incidents that were still being deliberated by the Thai court and that had not yet been officially concluded. The documentary highlighted stories about the thousands of people that were killed and displaced during a series of clashes in April 2011 around the Preah Vihear temple in the Dângrêk mountains. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2009, 2011, 2012] [Source: Article 19, Artistic Censorship Report: Filmmaker Abducted, Street Artists Fined (http://www.ifex.org/international/2013/05/14/artistic_censorship; 14 May 2013).]

TIMOR-LESTE

Previous Annual Report entries: 2003–2012.

Little progress was made in addressing crimes against humanity and other human rights violations committed by Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries from 1975 to 1999. The mandate of the Serious Crimes Investigation Team ended in December 2012, having failed to complete around 60 investigations into outstanding cases of serious human rights violations committed in 1999.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 268.]

The Timorese authorities failed to implement recommendations of the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation and of the bilateral Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship. The recommendations included providing reparation to victims and their families, and taking effective measures to identify victims of enforced disappearance and children separated from their families. [Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 268.]

In February 2012, Parliament began debating two draft laws establishing a national reparations program and a “Public Memory Institute.” However, the debate was postponed for the third time since June 2010, and no date was set for its resumption.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 268.]

See also Indonesia.

TOGO

Previous Annual Report entries: 2002, 2008–2012.

In April 2012, the Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC) issued its first report after conducting interviews with victims and alleged perpetrators of political violence between 1958 and 2005. President Faure Gnassingbé asked for forgiveness on behalf of the nation and the authorities committed to take appeasement actions and award compensation to victims. However, at the end of 2012, no concrete action had been taken.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 270.]

TUNISIA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2011–2012.

The uprising of December 2010–January 2011 was accompanied by the destruction or theft of administrative documents thought to contain evidence of the corruption of the formerly presidential families Ben Ali and Trabelsi. According to Hedi Jallab, the General Director of the National Archives, much of the archives of the Agence tunisienne de communication extérieure (ACTE, the agency distributing information to foreign media) were largely destroyed shortly after the revolution. The files of certain municipalities and local police bureaus, as well as most regional branches of the Rassemblement Constitutionnel Démocratique (RCD; Constitutional Democratic Rally), Ben Ali's ruling party, also disappeared.

[Sources: Mischa Benoit-Lavelle, "Director of Tunisia's National Archives: 'We Need Action' on Transitional Justice," Tunesialive (9 June 2012); "Tunisie: Vol et destruction des documents administratifs" (24 January 2011; <http://www.webmanagercenter.com/management/imprim.php?id=100948&pg=1>).]

On 2 November 2011, the board of the Faculty of Letters, Arts and Humanities at the Manouba campus of the University of Tunis, voted to ban the niqab (the full-face veil) on campus. On 28 November 2011, this provoked violent protest from Salafist groups. On 29 November, faculty dean and historian Habib Kazdaghli decided to deny outsiders access to the campus. However, a group that included non-students forced their way in the next day and confronted Kazdaghli, shoving him. In protest, the faculty halted classes for three days. On 6 December 2011, protesters prevented Kazdaghli from entering his office. After another incident, the dean closed the faculty. The ruling party

Ennahdha apparently did little to prevent the disruptions or prosecute Salafist excesses, which continued for at least six months. On 6 March 2012, two female students wearing niqabs forced their way into Kazdaghli's office and disrupted his papers. He removed them from the office and brought charges against them which were never processed by the police. Two weeks later, the two students themselves pressed charges against Kazdaghli. Originally accused of assault and facing fifteen days of imprisonment, the charge was changed in October 2012 to "violence committed by a civil servant while carrying out his duties," which could result in a five-year prison sentence. When Kazdaghli appeared in court on 2 January 2013, academics and trade unions demonstrated in his support. On 2 May 2013, the court acquitted Kazdaghli of all charges, ruling that there was no proof of an assault; the students were convicted of damaging property and interfering with a public servant carrying out his duties, and given a suspended sentence.

Kazdaghli wrote a PhD thesis about the history of the Tunisian Communist Party in 1982. A professor of contemporary history and member of the Société d'histoire des juifs de Tunisie, he is one of the few Tunisian non-Jews studying the history of Tunisian Jewry. This could have been an additional reason for the Salafist campaign against him.

[Sources: Associated Press (2 May 2013); Human Rights Watch, "Tunisia: Fundamentalists Disrupting College Campuses—Protect Universities from Threats of Violence" (9 December 2011); L'Humanité (19 April 2013); NRC Handelsblad (3 May 2013); Rob Prince, "Tunisia Culture Wars: the Case of Habib Kazdaghli, Dean of the University of Tunis-Manouba" (<http://www.opendemocracy.net>; 26 July 2012); Noah Rayman, "Trial Continues for University Dean Accused of Assaulting Veiled Student" (<http://www.tunisia-live.net/2012/11/21/trial-continues-for-univ-dean-accused-of-assaulting-veiled-student>; 21 November 2012); Martina Sabra, "Islamists Target Tunisia's Universities Freedom under Threat" (<http://en.qantara.de/Freedom-under-Threat/20958c23251i1p524>; 18 April 2013); University World News (24 October 2012; 13 January 2013); "Verdict in Tunisia Veil Trial Postponed," France 24 (28 March 2013).]

In the autumn of 2011, Salafists condemned Amel Grami, a professor of Arab language and intellectual history at the La Manouba campus of the University of Tunis, as a "kaafira" (infidel) for not wearing a veil when teaching and for not allowing any fully-veiled students to attend her courses. They accused her of carrying out missionary work and claimed that she was trying to convert students to Christianity or Judaism in her seminar on comparative religious studies. They also asked her students what had been discussed during the seminar.

[Source: Martina Sabra, "Islamists Target Tunisia's Universities Freedom under Threat" (<http://en.qantara.de/Freedom-under-Threat/20958c23251i1p524>; 18 April 2013).]

The Fact-Finding Commission on Abuses Committed from 17 December 2010 until the End of its Mandate (known as the Bouderbala Commission) issued its report in May 2012. The report described the events during the uprisings which overthrew former President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali's government in December 2010–January 2011, and listed the names of those killed and injured. It identified 132 people killed and 1,452 injured up to 14 January 2011, the day Ben Ali fled. However, it failed to identify the individuals responsible for the use of lethal force and human rights violations. Some families of people killed refused to accept compensation as they felt justice had not been done.

In July 2012, Ben Ali received a sentence of life imprisonment after the Tunis Military Tribunal convicted him in his absence over the killing and injuring of protesters in Greater Tunis. Thirty-nine former members of his security forces who were present in court were convicted and sentenced to prison terms of up to 20 years. Both cases were referred to a military appeal tribunal and had not been resolved by the end of 2012. The process of bringing former officials to justice for crimes committed during the uprisings was questionable on several grounds, notably because trials were held before military tribunals rather than the civil courts. Also, victims, their families and lawyers criticized what they saw as a failure by the prosecuting authorities to conduct thorough investigations, and complained that they were subject to intimidation by those under investigation or accused, some of whom remained in positions of authority. The lack of political will from the government to press for Ben Ali's extradition from Saudi Arabia was criticized.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 272–273; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 618–619.]

In January 2012, the government created a Ministry for Human Rights and Transitional Justice to develop strategies for addressing past human rights violations and to guarantee the future protection of human rights. In April 2012, the Ministry of Justice established a Technical Committee composed of officials and civil society representatives to consult people throughout Tunisia on issues of truth, justice, reparation and reform. The committee prepared a draft law proposing the creation of an independent Council of Truth and Dignity to oversee the process of transitional justice, which it submitted to President Moncef Marzouki and the National Constituent Assembly (NCA) in October 2012. Following his November visit, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the promotion of truth, justice, reparation and guarantees of non-recurrence expressed concern that Tunisia's transitional justice process was not comprehensive and was failing to give equal importance to each of the four elements of transitional justice.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 272.]

TURKEY

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–1998, 2000–2012.

There was no progress in uncovering the full plot behind the January 2007 murder of journalist Hrant Dink or probing state collusion, though in January 2012 an Istanbul court convicted Yasin Hayal of “directing” Ogun Samast (already convicted of the murder in a juvenile court) and others as accessories to murder. The Dink family immediately appealed these findings and called for a new investigation.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 275–276; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 490.]

Increasing public discussion of the past, and emerging new information on past crimes, provided new momentum for criminal investigations into human rights abuses by state actors in the 1980s and 1990s. The trial of the two surviving leaders of the 12 September 1980 military coup began in April 2012, an important opportunity to secure justice for the gross human rights violations committed after the coup.

The trial of the alleged anti-AKP (the ruling Justice and Development Party) coup plotters (known as the Ergenekon gang) whose defendants includes senior retired military, police, mafia, journalists, and academics, continued after separate proceedings were combined in April 2012 into one trial. In a related coup plot trial of serving military personnel (known as the Sledgehammer case), 324 out of 365 defendants received sentences of 13 to 20 years. All defendants were appealing their sentences as of late 2012. The serious fair trial concerns in these cases and the prolonged pre-trial detention of some defendants overshadowed the important contribution of these efforts to combat impunity of the military.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 492.]

Thousands charged with alleged terrorism offenses remained in prison throughout their trials, although some well-known figures like political scientist and historian Büşra Ersanlı, publisher Ragıp Zarakolu and journalists Ahmet Şık and Nedim Şener were released, though still face terrorism charges for activities amounting to exercising their rights to non-violent expression and association. Most of those in prison were Kurdish activists and officials of the Peace and Democracy Party (BDP) standing trial for alleged links to the Union of Kurdistan Communities (KCK/TM), a body connected with the outlawed Kurdistan Workers’ Party (PKK). [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2012.]

[Sources: Network of Concerned Historians (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/68.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/68f1.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/68f2.pdf>;

<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/68f3.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/68f4.pdf>; <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/68f5.pdf>; Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 275; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 488; International PEN, Rapid Action Network 56/11 (23 March & 16 July 2012); International PEN Rapid Action Network, RAN 23/13 [Update 1] (12 June 2013); Index on Censorship (2012 no. 3), 61–62, 113; International PEN, “Turkey: PEN International To Observe KCK Trial” (2 July 2012); “Urgent Appeal: Stop Arbitrary Detentions in Turkey!” (<http://www.ipetitions.com/petition/detentionsinturkey>).]

On 3 October 2011, Ayşe Berktaş was arrested as part of a crackdown related to the Party for Peace and Democracy (BDP). Berktaş was an author and translator of historical works, a women’s rights activist and a founding member of the World Tribunal on Iraq. Police arrested her and raided her home, seizing personal papers and materials, although no arrest or search warrant had been issued. Among her works were History and Society: New Perspectives (2008), The Ottoman Empire and the World Around (with Suraiya Faroqhi; 2007); among her translations were The Imperial Harem: Gender and Power in the Ottoman Empire, 1520–1656, by Leslie Penn Pierce, and The Ottoman Empire, 1700–1922, by Donald Quataert. Over the past decade, Berktaş conducted work at the History Trust, where she was part of the Prime Minister’s Advisory Board on Human Rights; the Women’s Human Rights Trust; the Compatriots for Peace Initiative; the Truth Behind Diyarbakir Prison Research and Justice Commission, where, in 2008, she met with individual prisoners that had been detained from 1980 to 1984; and the Women for Peace Initiative. She was charged under the Anti-Terror Law with “membership of an illegal organization” for allegedly “planning to stage demonstrations aimed at destabilizing the state, plotting to encourage women to throw themselves under police vehicles so as to create a furor, and attending meetings outside Turkey on behalf of the Kurdistan Communities Union (KCK).”

[Sources: Network of Concerned Historians (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/ca/71.pdf>); International PEN, Caselist—January to June 2012 (London 2012), 59, 62; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-Yearly Caselist to December 2012 (London 2013), 59; International PEN Rapid Action Network, RAN 22/13 (7 May 2013); International PEN Rapid Action Network, RAN 23/13 [Update 1] (12 June 2013); Petition (http://ifex.org/turkey/2013/05/06/free_ayse_petition/); Profile (<http://www.pen.org/defending-writers/ay%C5%9Fe-berktay>).]

Zeynep Kuray (female), a columnist for the newspaper BirGün, was arrested in the December 2011 round of KCK (Kurdistan Communities Union) arrests. Among the evidence delivered in her May 2012 indictment was a draft translation of a passage of French historian Jean-François Solnon’s book, Le Turban et la Stambouline: L’Empire ottoman et l’Europe, XVI–XXe siècles, affrontement et fascination réciproques (2009), by her stepfather Ali Berktaş, which documents the anti-

Turkish/Ottoman sentiment in Europe between the 16th and 20th centuries. The passage of 11 pages came from a chapter titled, “Are they any better than dogs or are they good people?” and included disparaging quotations about Turks from Erasmus and Martin Luther.

[Source: International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-Yearly Caselist to December 2012 (London 2013), 58–59.]

On 8 March 2012, anthropologist and writer Muge Tuzcuoglu (female), was arrested as part of the KCK (Kurdistan Communities Union) investigation in Diyarbakır but released pending trial in September 2012. The next hearing of her trial was set for 24 December 2012. Tuzcuoglu claimed that the charges related to a seminar on the history of civilization that she gave at a BDP (Party for Peace and Democracy) Politics Academy conference.

[Source: International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-Yearly Caselist to December 2012 (London 2013), 61.]

TURKMENISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2004, 2009, 2011–2012.

UGANDA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2009, 2011–2012.

The Ugandan armed rebel group, the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), continued to kill and abduct people across Central African Republic, southern Sudan, and northern Democratic Republic of Congo though at a reduced scale from previous years. In May 2012, Caesar Acellam Otto, a senior LRA commander, was captured by government forces. The same month, the Minister of Internal Affairs removed a provision in the Amnesty Act 2010 which had granted amnesty to LRA fighters. The law had previously shielded perpetrators of international crimes from prosecution and denied justice to victims. It was unclear whether Otto and others subsequently captured would be effectively prosecuted by the International Crimes Division of the High Court. The International Criminal Court's arrest warrants issued in 2005 remained in force for LRA leader Joseph Kony and three LRA commanders. The men were still at large at the end of 2012.

The War Crimes Division of the High Court did not begin its first trial of the only defendant in custody, former LRA fighter Thomas Kwoyelo, who was charged with willful killing, taking hostages, and extensive destruction of property. Kwoyelo had previously applied for amnesty. In January 2012, the High Court ordered the prosecutors to grant amnesty and release him, but the state appealed and the case was, as of late 2012, pending before the Supreme Court. The parliament permitted key provisions of the amnesty law to lapse (see above), meaning that for the first time since 2000, LRA fighters who ended up in custody could face criminal trial.

[Sources Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 279–280; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 183.]

UKRAINE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 2009–2011.

In July 2010, the Cabinet of Ministers appointed Valeriy Soldatenko, an ideologue of the Communist Party of Ukraine, as the new director of the Ukrainian Institute of National Memory. In December 2010 a presidential decree reorganized the institute, significantly reducing its capacity and power. In February 2011, Soldatenko and his two deputy heads were dismissed. The State Archive Service was headed by another communist, Olha Hinzburh, who had declared that restoring historical memory “may harm descendants.” The State Archive of the Security Service of Ukraine (SBU) remained under control of the Security Service and its former policy of openness and declassification of documents of Soviet security bodies about the Holodomor, the Stalinist repressions, the mid-twentieth century Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists and the nationalist Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA) was reversed. In 2012, the Verkhovna Rada (parliament) passed amendments to the law on the national archives that opened the possibility of destroying archival documents that had lost their cultural value, that had duplicate copies or that were irreparably damaged. It also permitted limiting access to documents containing “confidential information” for 75 years after the time of their creation. [Sources: Kyiv Post (24 February 2011); Inna Zavhorodnya & Vladyslav Hrynevych, “Erasing Ukraine’s Memories,” Transitions Online (17 July 2012).]

UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

Previous Annual Report entries: —.

In February 2013, Khaled Fahmy, professor and chair of the history department at the American University in Cairo, was scheduled to speak in Dubai at the inaugural launch event for Al Fanar, an editorially independent publication covering higher education in the Arab region. Although Fahmy was a member of the advisory board of Al Fanar, he refused to attend the launch after Kristian Coates Ulrichsen, a research fellow at the London School of Economics, was barred from entering the United Arab Emirates and sent back to London. Ulrichsen had planned to give a critical presentation at the American University in Sharjah about human rights violations in Bahrain. When, however, the government warned that no such discussion on the situation in Bahrain would be allowed from within another Gulf Cooperation Council state, the co-organizing London School of Economics canceled the event, entitled “The New Middle East: Transition in the Arab World.” Fahmy himself had planned to speak about the absence of the concept of liberal education and the lack of academic freedom at Arab universities. He also refused to attend a conference later at the New York University Abu Dhabi campus.

[Sources: Khaled Fahmy, “Why I Didn’t Go to Dubai,” Al Fanar (<http://www.al-fanar.org/2013/02/why-i-didnt-go-to-dubai>; 25 February 2013); Sarah Lynch, “Dwindling Academic Freedom in the Emirates,” Al Fanar (<http://www.al-fanar.org/2013/03/dwindling-academic-freedom-in-the-emirates>; 3 March 2013).

See also Egypt.

UNITED KINGDOM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998–2001, 2003–2004, 2006–2012.

In [June] 2009, four veterans of the Kenyan Mau Mau movement wanted to sue the British government in High Court (London) for compensation for torture, murder, sexual assault and other alleged abuses inflicted upon them by the British colonial administration while they were detained in special camps during the “Emergency” of 1952–1960. The government initially argued that according to the laws of state succession, the post-independence Kenyan state inherited the liabilities of the British colonial state and that, therefore, Kenya not, not the United Kingdom, was responsible for the atrocities committed against the Mau Mau. Allegations that the British abused suspected Mau Mau fighters had been uttered since the Kenyan Mwai Kibaki government lifted a 30-year ban on Mau Mau membership in 2003. On 21 July 2011, the High Court decided to allow the three plaintiffs (the fourth died in the meantime) to sue the Foreign Office. The case opened the way for other Kenyans to seek redress.

During the proceedings, on 17 July 2012, the British government officially acknowledged that colonial forces in Kenya tortured and abused detainees during the Mau Mau rebellion but it also argued that the actions occurred too long ago and that the availability of witnesses and documents was problematic. On 5 October 2012, the High Court decided that the complainants could proceed with their legal claims. They wanted an official apology and damages to set up a Mau Mau welfare fund. The government appealed against the decision but in April 2013 it adjourned the appeal. In May 2013 it negotiated payments to thousands of Kenyans in what would be the first compensation settlement resulting from official crimes committed under imperial rule. On 6 June 2013, Foreign Secretary William Hague said in the House of Commons that Britain was to pay out £19.9 million in costs and compensation to more than 5,000 elderly Kenyans who suffered torture and abuse during the uprising. Britain would also support the construction of a memorial in Nairobi to the victims of torture and abuse during the colonial era.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 285; BBC News (21 July 2011; 18 April & 17 July & 5 October 2012); Huw Bennet, “Kenyan Mau Mau: Official Policy Was To Cover Up Brutal Mistreatment,” Guardian (5 May 2013); Ian Cobain & Jessica Hatcher, “Kenyan Mau Mau Victims in Talks with UK Government over Legal Settlement,” Guardian (5 May 2013); Afua Hirsch, “UK ‘Using Obscure Legal Principle’ to Dismiss Torture Claims in Colonial Kenya,” Guardian (25 January 2010); Keesings Historisch Archief (2012), 574; Ben McIntyre, “50 Years Later: Britain’s Kenya Cover-Up Revealed,” Times (5 April 2011); Peter Mwaura, “Kenya: If Mau Mau Veterans Lose Compensation Case in London Court, Let the People Pay,” The Nation (<http://allafrica.com/stories/201106060803.htm>; 3 June 2011); NRC Handelsblad (7 June 2013), 14;

“UK To Compensate Kenya's Mau Mau Torture Victims, Guardian (6 June 2013).]

In January 2011, during the above High Court case, the government was forced to admit that thousands of files (covering the period 1930s–1970s) had been massively and systematically selected and destroyed or secretly sent to the United Kingdom from many of its colonies (Aden, Anguilla, Bahamas, Basutoland [Lesotho], Bechuanaland [Botswana], British Indian Ocean Territories, Brunei, Cyprus, Kenya, Malaya, Sarawak and the Seychelles), prior to their independence [See also NCH Annual Report 2012]. British colonial officials selected the “migrated files” (files for secret “migration” back to the United Kingdom), eventually using criteria set out in a 1961 memo by Secretary of State for the Colonies Iain Macleod (containing instructions to classify papers embarrassing for the British authorities according to unofficial classification categories, including removal, destruction and transfer to the United Kingdom). The aim was to deliberately remove incriminating evidence.

In April 2011, a vast cache of documents was discovered (200 boxes of some 18,000 files containing official records from 37 former colonies and protectorates. The cache was discovered by a number of historians, including David Anderson, professor of African politics at Oxford University, and Huw Bennet, a lecturer at Aberystwyth University, who were involved as experts in the court case of the Mau Mau veterans. Many of the boxes (containing more than 1500 files and filling 110 feet of shelving) of the cache were related to Kenya—30 of which were reportedly relevant to the above High Court case. Former Mau Mau detainees and their families had been told that the official and legal records had been lost or destroyed; historians had never been granted access to them.

On 18 April 2012, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) began releasing the first (1,200 records) of six tranches of the “migrated” files, coming from 12 former colonial territories; they covered such controversial episodes as the Mau Mau uprising in Kenya (1952–1956), the evacuation of the Chagos Islands, and the Malayan Emergency (the 1948–1960 conflict with communist insurgents). However, many important files (particularly related to periods of emergency) were still missing. The migrated files contained nothing from some colonies, like British Guiana (although in the latter there had been intense British and American military and security intervention from 1953 to 1964).

In April 2013, it emerged that the Foreign Office held back significant numbers of documents (including files containing minutes of cabinet meetings in colonial Kenya in 1963; files about the 1946 bombing of the British military headquarters in Jerusalem; and files containing telegrams sent by British diplomats from Mauritius in 1968, which could include information on the British decision to expel about 1,500 Chagos islanders a few years later, having agreed to lease Diego Garcia to the United States for use as a military base). Section 3.4 of the 1958 Public Records Act permitted government departments to withhold from public view any historic document “required for administrative purposes” or that “ought to be retained for any other special reason.”

[Sources: BBC News (21 July 2011; 18 April 2012); Ian Cobain & Jessica Hatcher, “Kenyan Mau Mau Victims in Talks with UK Government over Legal Settlement,” Guardian (5 May 2013); Caroline Elkins, “The Colonial Papers: FCO Transparency Is a Carefully Cultivated Myth,” Guardian (18 April 2012); Guardian (30 November 2012; 26 April 2013); Ben McIntyre, “50 Years Later: Britain’s Kenya Cover-Up Revealed,” Times (5 April 2011); Peter Mwaura, “Kenya: If Mau Mau Veterans Lose Compensation Case in London Court, Let the People Pay,” The Nation (<http://allafrica.com/stories/201106060803.htm>; 3 June 2011); Times (5 April 2011).]

In 2011, Benny Morris (1948–), history professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, was assaulted on a street by a group of Muslims before a conference at the London School of Economics. When Morris finished his lecture on Israel’s war of 1948, he was escorted through the back exit for safety reasons. At Cambridge University, his class was canceled after intimidation by Islamist groups. [Source: Giulio Meotti, “Western Universities Becoming Frightening Bastions of Anti-Israel, Anti-Jewish Hostility” (Ynetnews; 5 June 2012).]

In November 2011, Niall Ferguson, historian at Harvard University, threatened to sue Indian writer Pankaj Mishra for defamation because in a review of his book Civilization: The West and the Rest for the London Review of Books, the latter reportedly called Ferguson a racist. Mishra had criticized Ferguson for his views on imperial history and associated him to American racial theorist Theodore Lothrop Stoddard (author of The Rising Tide of Color against White World-Supremacy).

[Sources: “British Historian Threatens Defamation Suit,” Chronicle of Higher Education (<http://chronicle.com/blogs/pageview/british-historian-threatens-defamation-suit/29793>; 30 November 2011); Guardian (26 November & 4 December 2011).]

In late August 2012, after Channel 4 screened Islam: The Untold Story, presented by writer and historian Tim Holland, 550 complaints were received of viewers who claimed that the program distorted the history of Islam. Holland had said that there was little written contemporary evidence about the life of the Prophet Muhammad and claimed that the Quran made little or no reference to the holy city of Mecca.

[Source: Daily Mail (2 September 2012).]

Northern Ireland

In October 2012, an inquiry (established by the Northern Ireland Executive) into institutional child abuse during the period 1922–1995, commenced its work. In November 2012, Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary began a review of the work of the Historical Enquiries Team (HET), which was established to re-examine all deaths attributed to the conflict in Northern Ireland. The review would focus on whether HET investigations into cases involving the army were compliant with human rights and policing standards.

In December 2012, the Police Service of Northern Ireland confirmed that a criminal investigation into the killing of 13 civil rights marchers by British soldiers on Sunday 30 January 1972 (“Bloody Sunday”), would begin in 2013.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 286.]

On 6 July 2012, a United States appeals court ruled that Ed Moloney and Anthony McIntyre had no standing to prevent the interviews stored at Boston College to be disclosed and that the tapes with Dolours Price’s secret testimony could be handed over to the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) as part of its investigations into the 1972 Jean McConville murder [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2012]. The ruling led to the issue being discussed in the Dáil Éireann (the lower house, but principal chamber, of the Oireachtas [Irish parliament]). Irish Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Joe Costello said the affair could damage the peace process. As a result of the United States justice department’s pursuit of the Price interviews, police officers, soldiers and spies who fought the Irish Revolutionary Army (IRA) withdrew from a proposed parallel project. In October 2012, the court temporarily blocked the interviews from being turned over. On 13 April 2013, the American Supreme Court confirmed the ruling of the court of appeals to turn over the records to the American government.

[Sources: American Sociological Association, “Subjects from the Subpoena of Confidential Belfast Project Research Data” (21 February 2012); Fin Dwyer, “Who Owns History? The Boston College Subpoenas” (<http://bostoncollegesubpoena.wordpress.com>; 27 July 2012); The Epoch Times (15 April 2013); Index on Censorship (2012 no. 2), 144; (2012 no. 3), 83–88; 113; Irishcentral.com (16 April 2013); Henry McDonald, “US Court Says IRA Member’s Secret Testimony Can Be Handed Over to Police,” Guardian (8 July 2012); PA, “Old Bailey Bomber Price Found Dead,” Irish Times (24 January 2013); “Updates on the Threat to Oral History Archives” (<http://bostoncollegesubpoena.wordpress.com>; 2012).

See also India, Iraq, Ireland, United Arab Emirates.

UNITED STATES

Previous Annual Report entries: 1995–2012.

The absence of accountability for crimes under international law committed under the administration of President George W. Bush (2001–2009) in relation to the Central Intelligence Agency’s program of secret detention was further entrenched.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 288.]

In May 2012, Tennessee enacted legislation “to protect the academic freedom of teachers in public schools,” meaning that individual teachers had to be able to discuss creationism as against evolutionism. Analyst Heather Weaver called the law a “cover to teachers who want to undercut scientifically accurate lessons about evolution by injecting veiled creationist doctrine into science classes.”

[Source: Index on Censorship (2012 no. 3), 98–102, 113.]

On 10 May 2012, a District Court judge accepted that volume 5 of the five-volume Top Secret Official History of the Bay of Pigs Invasion, a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) work, was a “draft” that never was officially approved for inclusion in the official history, and therefore that it was exempt from declassification under the “deliberative process privilege” (FOIA exemption 5). In August 2012, the National Coalition for History and twelve other history and archival organizations requested a Federal appeals court to revise the ruling. They noted the precedential impact of the case and the chilling effect of the court decision on access to historical materials at other federal agencies. In December 2012, the court rejected a CIA motion “for summary affirmance” and affirmed that the case merited its full consideration. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2011, 2012.]

[Sources: “National Coalition for History Asks Federal Court to Review FOIA Decision” (<http://historycoalition.org/2012/08/30/national-coalition-for-history-asks-federal-court-to-review-foia-decision>; 30 August 2012); National Security Archive, Update (14 April & 1 August & 15 August 2011, 17 April & 10 May & 7 December 2012).]

In September 2012, it became known that the Roosevelt government covered up testimony by American prisoners of war (held in Nazi camps) supporting the claim of Soviet responsibility for the 1940 Katyn massacre; successive American governments remained silent about the massacre in order not to add to the tensions with the Soviets during the Cold War. [For background, see NCH Annual Reports 2005, 2009–2012.]

[Source: Vanessa Gera & Randy Herschaft (Associated Press), “Newly Declassified Memos Show US

Hushed up Soviet Massacre” (<http://newsmilitary.com/pages/6721822-newly-declassified-memos-show-us-hushed-up-soviet-massacre>).

In January 2013, Pentagon censors decided that 198 of the 433 passages of Anthony Shaffer’s book Operation Dark Heart (an insider’s memoir by a lieutenant colonel about his life as an intelligence officer in Afghanistan) could be printed without damaging national security. [For background, see NCH Annual Report 2011.]

[Source: New York Times (25 January 2013).]

See also Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bolivia, India, Indonesia, Iran, Iraq, Japan, Kenya, Korea (North), Marshall Islands, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, Yemen.

URUGUAY

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001–2012.

Steps were taken to end impunity for crimes committed during military rule (1973–1985), including efforts to establish the identity of victims of enforced disappearance. In March 2012, President José Alberto Mujica Cordano publicly recognized state responsibility for the enforced disappearance of María Claudia García Iruretagoyena de Gelman and the abduction of her baby daughter, María Macarena Gelman García, in 1976. Public recognition was one of the measures called for in a 2011 ruling on the case by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 291.]

UZBEKISTAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2005–2012.

The government continued to refuse an independent investigation into the 2005 massacre of hundreds of citizens in Andijan, who had gathered to protest socio-economic problems and civil and political grievances in the country in connection with the government’s prosecution of local business leaders on charges of terrorism. The Uzbek government’s persistent refusal to allow an independent international investigation denied justice to victims and failed to bring to account those responsible. Authorities continued to persecute anyone suspected of having participated in, or witnessed, the atrocities and to intimidate family members of Andijan massacre survivors who sought refuge abroad.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 506, 509.]

VATICAN

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996, 1998, 2000, 2004, 2009, 2011.

VENEZUELA

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003–2004, 2006, 2009–2010, 2012.

VIETNAM

Previous Annual Report entries: 1996–2006, 2009–2012.

Police in An Giang prevented members of the unregistered Pure Hoa Hao Buddhist Association from gathering to commemorate key events, including the anniversary of the disappearance of the group's founder Huynh Phu So.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 386.]

In April 2012, the government revealed a draft Decree on Management, Provision and Use of Internet Services and Information on the Network. As drafted, the decree will outlaw posting internet content that opposes the Vietnam government, national security, public order, customs and traditions, national unity, offends the reputation of an individual or group, or transgresses a number of other ill-defined areas of concern.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 383.]

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco/Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Previous Annual Report entries: 2001, 2003, 2010.

The fragile transition government that succeeded President Ali Abdullah Saleh in 2012 following mass protests faced multiple challenges in ending human rights violations. Fighting linked to the political upheaval decreased, but sectarian clashes continued in the north, and government forces fought with the Yemen branch of al Qaeda in the south. Saleh left office in February 2012, under an exit accord brokered by the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) and backed in most aspects by the United Nations (UN) Security Council, the United States, and European Union member states.

On 21 January 2012, the government enacted an immunity law, Law No.1 of 2012, in accordance with the power-transfer agreement. The law granted Saleh and all those who were employed by his government immunity from criminal prosecution for “politically motivated acts” carried out in the course of their duties during Saleh’s 33-year rule (1978–2012). Consequently, it prevented many victims of arbitrary detention, torture, extrajudicial execution, enforced disappearance and other violations carried out under Saleh’s long rule from obtaining justice, truth and reparation. As such, the immunity law breached Yemen’s international legal obligations to investigate and prosecute crimes under international law and other human rights violations.

Under a UN-facilitated “Implementing Mechanism” that served as a transition blueprint, the government was to bring security forces—including those run by Saleh’s relatives—under civilian command, pass a transitional justice law, draft a new constitution, reform the electoral and judicial systems, and hold general elections in 2014. It was also to convene a national dialogue conference to address grievances by groups including northern Huthi rebels and the Southern Movement (a coalition of groups seeking greater autonomy or secession for the former South Yemen). Transition measures were resisted by loyalists of Saleh, who remained in Yemen as head of the General People’s Congress. In July and August 2012, pro-Saleh troops and tribesmen stormed the Interior and Defense ministries, prompting gunfights that killed 21 people.

On 22 September 2012, President Abd Rabbu Mansour Hadi authorized the creation of an independent commission to investigate violations during the 2011 uprising, and recommend accountability for perpetrators and redress for victims, but it had not commenced at the end of 2012. A draft Transitional Justice and National Reconciliation Law was under discussion. However, the draft emphasized forgiveness as an element of reconciliation and did not provide justice for victims of past human rights violations.

In September 2012, a trial began for 78 defendants in the deadliest attack on protesters of the uprising, in which pro-government gunmen killed 45 and wounded 200 on 18 March 2011. Political interference and failure to investigate evidence that implicated government officials marred the prosecution's case. Most key defendants remained fugitives.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2013 (London 2013), 298; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 629–630.]

ZAMBIA

Previous Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Kenya.

ZIMBABWE

Previous Annual Report entries: 1998–2001, 2004, 2006, 2008–2012.

Human rights developments in 2012 were dominated by the drafting of a new constitution and the implementation of the Global Political Agreement (GPA), signed in 2008, which created the power-sharing coalition between the former ruling party, the Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front and the opposition party Movement for Democratic Change following the 2008 elections. There was little progress in implementing key aspects of the GPA, notably ensuring accountability for past human rights abuses.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2013 (Washington 2013), 185.]

See also South Africa.

INTRODUCTION

The eighteenth Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It covers events and developments of 2011 and 2012. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

Please cite as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2012 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org>).

The complete set of Annual Reports (1995–2012) was compiled by Antoon De Baets. Please send any comments to: <antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org>.

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In 2012, the new series of official obligatory high school history textbooks, in preparation since 2002 and funded by the United States Commander's Emergency Response Program (the United States military's foreign aid arm), did not cover post-1973 history, thus stopping their coverage with the ouster of King Mohammad Zahir Shah in 1973 by Mohammed Daoud Khan and omitting the following period of political instability, including the Soviet occupation (1979–1989), the mujaheddin (Muslims who struggle in the path of God) and the civil war (1989–1996), the Taliban (1996–2001), and the United States military presence (2001–2012). In order to promote a single national identity, the depoliticization and deethnification textbooks were deemed necessary. In the post-1979 period, the USSR distributed books emphasizing communism and Marxism. In the late 1980s, the United States financed textbooks supporting the struggle of the mujaheddin. During the Taliban's reign, conservative Islamic texts were imported from Pakistan. In western Afghanistan, Iranian textbooks openly praising Iran-backed militant groups such as Hizbollah and Hamas were for years distributed in public schools. The depoliticized approach was chosen as there was no agreement of how Afghanistan descended into civil war. Even mention of such key figures as the Northern Alliance commander Ahmad Shah Massoud or the Taliban's Mohammad Omar was controversial. Despite broad consensus about the approach, Mir Ahmad Kamawal, history professor at Kabul University, criticized the omissions.

[Source: Kevin Sieff, "Afghanistan; a new approach to teaching history: Leave out the wars," Washington Post (5 February 2012).]

See also Libya.

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 1996.

After the collapse of communism, former communist ruler Enver Hoxha (1908–1985) was written out of history. In February 1991, students and academics at Tirana University demanded and obtained the removal of his name from courses of study. His body was removed from a national memorial and reburied in a public cemetery. Napalm was used to wipe his name from a mountain side where it had been written in stone. A new law passed on 14 July 2011 approved a plan to tear down a pyramid-shaped landmark built on Tirana's main thoroughfare as a museum for Hoxha to open the way for a new parliament, to be built in honor of the 100th anniversary of Albania's independence in 1912 after 500 years of Ottoman domination.

[Sources: BBC News (19 November 2004); Derek Jones, ed., Censorship: A World Encyclopedia (London/Chicago 2001), 28; Keesings historisch archief (2011), 344; Benet Koleka, "Albania To Raze Hoxha's Pyramid for New Parliament" (Albanian.com; 14 July 2011).]

See also Macedonia, Serbia / Kosovo.

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The authorities again took no steps to investigate the thousands of enforced disappearances and other serious abuses that took place during the internal conflict (1992–2000) or to ensure that perpetrators were held accountable. They continued to implement the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation (Law 06-01), which gave impunity to the security forces, criminalized public criticism of their conduct and granted amnesties to members of armed groups responsible for gross human rights abuses. Families of people who disappeared faced pressure to accept generic certificates, which stated that their relatives were dead but did not specify the date or cause of death, as a precondition for claiming compensation. The security forces dispersed demonstrations organized by families of the disappeared.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 60, 61–62; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 532–533.]

See also France, Morocco / Western Sahara

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In February 2011, Felipe Noble Herrera and Marcela Noble Herrera, who were adopted children of one of the richest women in Argentina, lost their legal challenge to the DNA laws, which forced them to give DNA samples in an attempt to establish their true parentage. In May 2010, following the pair's refusal to provide samples, their house was raided, they were stripsearched and samples from clothing and toothbrushes were taken. A 2009 law gave the courts power to forcibly obtain DNA if someone refused to submit to a blood test. The law's origin dated back to the 1970s and 1980s when left-wing activists were kidnapped, tortured and imprisoned by the military dictatorship. Many of those detained were young couples with either newborns or mothers expecting a child; babies were taken away and given to military or police officials to bring up as their own. The government that followed the military dictatorship set up a National Bank of Genetic Data, where grandparents and relatives of the missing children contributed DNA samples for identification purposes. Although campaigners attempted to identify the children of the disappeared, not all of them wanted to know about their biological parents.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2011, no. 2), 140.]

In April 2011, former Brigade General Reynaldo Bignone and politician and former police officer Luis Abelardo Patti were sentenced to life imprisonment for several cases of murder, abduction and torture in the town of Escobar during the 1970s. In October 2011, former navy captain Alfredo Astiz and 15 others were given prison sentences of between 18 years and life for their role in 86 crimes against humanity committed at a secret detention center in the Buenos Aires naval school (Escuela Superior de Mecánica de la Armada, ESMA). Under military rule, hundreds of people had been held in the ESMA after being abducted; some were killed under torture while others were flung to their deaths from airplanes. Among those killed were human rights activists Azucena Villaflor, María Bianco and Esther Careaga, cofounders of the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 12, 65.]

In August 2011, Osvaldo Bayer (1927–), a left-wing historian and film director, film codirector Mariano Aiello and historian Felipe Pigna were sued for defamation by José Alfredo Martínez de Hoz, who accused them of falsifying history and damaging his “family's honor” and demanded a ban on the film Awka Liwen (Rebelde Amanecer; Rebel Awakening; September 2010) and heavy fines. In this film, Bayer, Aiello and Pigna analyzed the 1879 Campaña del Desierto (Desert Campaign) of Julio Argentino Roca, a military campaign against the indigenous peoples of Argentina (Mapuche and Tehuelce), during which part of the pampa and Patagonia was conquered. The film asserted that, in the preparation of the campaign, José Toribio Martínez de Hoz ([1823]–71) (José Alfredo Martínez de Hoz's great-great-grandfather), who had founded and presided the Sociedad Rural Argentina (Argentinian Rural Society) in 1866–70, had called for military intervention against the indigenous peoples, with the aim of evicting them and establishing latifundia with cattle instead.

[Sources: Rodrigo Alonso, “Osvaldo Bayer recibió el apoyo de centenares de santafesinos” (http://www.amsafelacapital.org.ar/Noticia_completa.php?ID=900); Amsafe [2011]); Osvaldo Bayer, “Los Martínez de Hoz al ataque,” Página 12 (3 September 2011).]

Several important human rights cases from Argentina's last military dictatorship (1976–1983) were reopened in 2003 after Congress annulled the 1986 “Full Stop” law, which had stopped prosecution of such cases, and the 1987 “Due Obedience” law, which granted immunity in such cases to all members of the military except those in positions of command. Starting in 2005, federal judges struck down pardons that then-President Carlos Menem issued between 1989 and 1990 to former officials convicted of or facing trial for human rights violations. As of October 2011, according to the Center for Legal and Social Studies (CELS), 379 cases involving killings, “disappearances,” and torture were under judicial investigation or being tried in court. Of 1,774 alleged perpetrators, 749 were facing charges for these crimes, and 210 had been convicted. Trials have been subject to delays at the appellate level. As of late 2011, the Supreme Court had confirmed final sentences in only four of the cases reactivated after the annulment of the amnesty laws. In March 2011 the First Federal Oral Court sentenced an army general to life imprisonment and three agents to prison terms between 20 and 25 years for the murder, torture and illegal arrest of detainees held in the 1970s in a secret detention center in Buenos Aires, known as Automotores Orletti. It was the first conviction in Argentina of participants in Plan Condor, a scheme by which the military rulers of the region coordinated the abduction, interrogation and “disappearance” of political opponents. More than 30 Uruguayans abducted in Argentina in 1976 were held at Automotores Orletti, before some were transferred back to Uruguay. Others “disappeared.”

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 206–207.]

As of late 2011, no one had been convicted for the 1994 bombing of the Jewish Argentine Mutual Association in Buenos Aires in which 85 died and over 300 were injured. Criminal investigations and prosecutions were hindered by judicial corruption and political cover-ups in Argentina, and by the failure of Iran (suspected of ordering the attack), to cooperate with the Argentine justice system. An Argentine federal court issued an international warrant for the arrest of former Iranian President Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani and six Iranian officials in 2006, but demands for their extradition fell on deaf ears. President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner repeatedly called for justice in annual speeches at the United Nations (UN) since taking office in 2007, as did her husband, former President Néstor Kirchner (died 2010). In September 2011 she told the UN that she would accept an Iranian government proposal to open a dialogue about the case, but only if it brought concrete results.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 209.]

On 22 March 2012, the government declassified the 1983 Rattenbach report, which reviewed the mistakes made by the military junta in going to war with Britain in 1982. The report was so critical of the military leadership that the junta (particularly Brigade General Reynaldo Bignone) ordered it kept secret for fifty years. A version of the report was leaked by General Tomás Sánchez de Bustamante in 1983 to support the then still fragile civil government and to remove any blame from the army (which was positively referred to in the report). The war cost more than 900 lives.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief (2012), 167; Washington Post (23 March 2012).]

See also Paraguay, Spain.

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 5 February 2011, history student Jabbar Savalan (Jabbar Savalanli) ([1991–]) was arrested when returning home from a meeting of the opposition Azerbaijan Popular Front Party (APFP) in Sumgayit. He was interrogated for two days without access to a lawyer and reportedly slapped and threatened until he signed a confession that he used drugs—despite a blood test showing that he had not. According to Savalan, the drugs were planted on him by the police. On 4 May 2011, he was convicted of possessing illegal drugs for personal use and sentenced to 2,5 years' imprisonment. On 26 July 2011, the Sumgayit appeal court and on 29 November 2011, the Azerbaijan Supreme Court upheld this decision. The real reason was widely believed to be his peaceful anti-government activism. His activities included using the Facebook website to share a newspaper article criticizing President Ilham Aliyev, and calling for Egypt-inspired anti-government protests. On 26 December 2011, Savalan was released under a pardon decree issued by the president.

[Sources: Amnesty International, The Wire (October/November 2011), 41, no. 5, (insert); Amnesty International, "Jailed Azerbaijani Youth Activist Freed (Press release; 27 December 2011); Institute for Reporters' Freedom and Safety, Ifex Alert (29 December 2011).]

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In late June 2011, King Hamad bin ‘Issa Al Khalifa appointed the Bahrain Independent Commission of Inquiry (BICI), comprising five international legal and human rights experts, to investigate alleged human rights violations committed in connection with the mass pro-reform protests that had started on 14 February 2011. Most demonstrators were from the majority Shi’a community, who believed they were discriminated against by the ruling Sunni minority. BICI reported to the King on 23 November 2011. It said that it had examined more than 8,000 complaints; interviewed more than 5,000 individuals, including male and female detainees; and visited various prisons, detention centers and the Salmaniya Medical Complex in Manama. It confirmed that many detainees had been tortured by security officials who believed they could act with impunity; that police and other security forces had repeatedly used excessive force against protesters, resulting in unlawful killings; and that legal proceedings before the National Safety Court (NSC; a special military court set up under the state of emergency) had been seriously defective. Among its recommendations, the BICI called for all allegations of torture to be independently investigated, for those responsible for abuses to be held criminally liable whatever their rank, and for the release of all those imprisoned on account of their legitimate exercise of freedom of expression. The king and government undertook to implement BICI’s recommendations.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 72, 75.]

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In June 2011, the government amended the International Crimes (Tribunals) Act of 1973, established to prosecute those responsible for atrocities during the 1971 India-Pakistan war leading to the independence of Bangladesh, but it still fell short of international standards. The definitions of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide did not conform to international standards and the government failed to amend the law to ensure due process. Defense lawyers, witnesses, and investigators said they had been threatened. Seven suspects, all coming from the two main opposition parties, were scheduled to be tried: Motiur Rahman Nizami, Ali Ahsan Muhammad Mojahid, Muhammad Kamaruzzaman, Abdul Quader Molla and Delwar Hossain Sayeedi [Delwar Hossein Sayedee] from Jamaat-e-Islami, and Salauddin Quader Chowdhury and Abdul Alim from the Bangladesh Nationalist Party. They were indicted for war crimes but they denied the allegations and accused the government of carrying out a vendetta. All but Abdul Alim, who was released on bail, remained detained. Five of the detainees were in custody for more than 18 months without charge. In October 2011, the tribunal began proceedings in its first case, that of Delwar Hossain Sayeedi, charged for allegedly assisting the Pakistani army to commit genocide; kill, torture and rape unarmed civilians; torch houses of local Hindus; and force Hindus to convert to Islam. No one was indicted for crimes committed immediately after the victory of independence forces in late 1971. According to official figures, more than three million people were killed and many more were left homeless. Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina was the daughter of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, who declared the country independent in 1971 and became its founding president after the war; he was later assassinated.

In May 2010, it was revealed that most of the official records of the 1971 war were shredded shortly after the war, probably deliberately. They included records documenting the creation of the Mukti Bahini (the Bangladesh freedom fighters) and the Indian army operations during the war. The Indian Army had housed and trained the Mukti Bahini in different camps across India; the fighters were later a part of the operations led by the eastern command.

[Sources include: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 75–76; BBC News (20 November 2011); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 297–298; J. Joseph, “Truth Lost? Most Military Records of Bangladesh War Missing,” Times of India (9 May 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2011), 562.]

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

BELGIUM

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In July 2008, Bart De Wever (1970–), a historian-turned-politician and chairman of the Nieuw-Vlaamse Alliantie (NV-A; New Flemish Alliance; a political party openly advocating the gradual breakup of Belgium), sued Belgian French-speaking writer Pierre Mertens (1939–), a professor of international law at the Free University of Brussels, for defamation. In October 2007, in reaction to an apology of Patrick Janssens, the Socialist mayor of Antwerp, for Antwerp’s overzealous role in the deportation of 1,2000 Jews in World War II, De Wever had called the apology “gratuitous” and “opportunistic” and said: “Those in power at the time had to take decisions in difficult circumstances. I do not find it courageous to stigmatize them now.” De Wever later apologized to Antwerp’s Jewish leaders. In December 2007, Mertens had written in the French daily Le Monde and the Flemish weekly Knack that De Wever was a “undiluted negationist leader.” On 14 February 2012, the court dismissed the charge because the prescription term of three months had been passed.

[Sources: “Flemish Politician, Called a ‘Negationist,’ Sues Belgian Writer” (European Jewish Press; 10 July 2008); Hugo Franssen, “‘Natrappen’: het ‘softe revisionisme’ van Bart De Wever,” De wereld morgen (14 December 2011); Knack (23 & 24 May 2011; 14 February 2012); Wikipedia (31 January 2012); Julien Vlassenbroek, “La plainte de Bart De Wever contre Pierre Mertens a été rejetée” (RTBF; 14 February 2012).]

See also Chad.

BOLIVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Those responsible for serious human rights violations, including enforced disappearance and extrajudicial executions, carried out before democracy was reestablished in 1982, continued to evade justice. By the end of 2011, the armed forces had not handed over to prosecutors information relating to past human rights violations, despite Supreme Court orders in April 2010 requiring them to declassify the information. The government did not press for the information to be disclosed.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 82; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 211.]

In August 2011, the Supreme Court convicted seven former high-ranking military and civilian officials for their part in the events known as “Black October,” which left 67 people dead and more than 400 injured during anti-government protests in El Alto, near La Paz, in September and October 2003. This was the first time that a trial of military officials accused of human rights violations had reached a conclusion in a Bolivian civilian court. Five former military officers received prison sentences ranging from 10 to 15 years, while two former ministers were sentenced to three years’ imprisonment, later suspended. Former President Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada and two of his ministers, who had fled to the United States soon after the violence, were facing extradition proceedings at the end of 2011. The trial, which began in May 2009, followed an impeachment procedure known as the “trial of responsibilities.”

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 12, 82; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 211.]

BOSNIA and HERZEGOVINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

At the end of 2011, six war crimes cases concerning Bosnia and Herzegovina were pending before the Trial Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY). In addition, three cases were on appeal. Proceedings against former Bosnian leader Radovan Karadžić continued. In 2011, the ICTY examined evidence around crimes in north-west Bosnia and Herzegovina, including “Manjača” and “Trnopolje” camps and unlawful killings at the Korićanske cliffs, as well as many other crimes committed during the 1992–1995 conflict.

On 31 May 2011, Ratko Mladić, former commander of the main staff of the Army of Republika Srpska was transferred to the ICTY. An amended indictment against him, containing charges of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes (including the massacre of up to 8,000 Bosnian men and boys from Srebrenica in July 1995 and the siege of Sarajevo from 1992 to 1995), was filed in October 2011. Originally charged in a single indictment, both Karadžić and Mladić had been indicted for genocide, as well as extermination, murder, persecution, deportation, inhumane acts, acts of violence, terror, unlawful attack on civilians and taking of hostages amounting to crimes against humanity and war crimes. In December 2001, the ICTY agreed with the prosecution proposal to reduce the indictment against Mladić from 196 to 106 crimes, and to limit the number of municipalities concerned from 23 to 15.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 83; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 431, 432.]

The domestic justice system continued to work on the large backlog of open war crimes cases. The implementation of the National Strategy for War Crimes Processing was delayed, primarily due to a lack of political and financial support. Progress in resolving war crimes cases was also hampered by political obstacles to improving regional cooperation, including failure to dismantle legal barriers to extradition of war crimes suspects between Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Serbia and Montenegro. A proposed bilateral agreement between Serbia and Bosnia and Herzegovina to resolve parallel investigations in war crimes cases reached a stalemate in June 2011.

Six cases relating to 10 mid- and low-level defendants transferred by the ICTY to the Bosnia and Herzegovina State Court, known as “11bis cases,” were completed. However, generally, prosecution of crimes under international law continued before the domestic judiciary in Bosnia and Herzegovina at a slow pace. The continued practice of nonharmonized application of criminal law in war crimes cases, due to the use of the 1976 Criminal Code in cases tried in courts in the different entities, resulted in serious obstacles to the fair and efficient delivery of justice. These included: inability to charge acts as crimes against humanity; failure to prosecute command responsibility; and inequality before the law owing to the low mandatory minimum and maximum sentences for war crimes.

The War Crimes Chamber of the Bosnia and Herzegovina State Court continued to play the central role in war crimes prosecutions. However, verbal attacks on this and other judicial institutions dedicated to investigating and prosecuting war crimes, along with the denial of war crimes—including the genocide in Srebrenica in July 1995—by high-ranking politicians, undermined efforts to prosecute war crimes cases. In addition, the authorities failed to collect data on the total number of investigations and prosecutions at all levels of crimes under international law.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 83–84.]

Despite problems with budget allocations for exhumations caused by the absence of the government, exhumations continued. In January 2011, the state prosecutor's office assumed control of exhumations previously conducted by local prosecutors, which had a positive impact in expediting the recovery of the remains of missing people from mass and clandestine graves. Around 10,000 people were still unaccounted for. Unwillingness of insider witnesses to provide information on mass graves remained the biggest obstacle in the process.

In February 2011, the Central Record of Missing Persons was created as a permanent database in Bosnia and Herzegovina. It gathered around 34,000 names from various existing databases and conducted verification of those names. It was expected that the database would help the national Missing Persons Institute to strategically address the remaining cases.

Despite the accurate DNA-led identifications made by the International Commission on Missing Persons over the past years, the identification process began to slow down. The Commission reported that around 8,000 bodies had already been identified through the classical methods of identification. However, due to the existence of hundreds of secondary, tertiary and quaternary mass grave sites, the recovery of body parts of already identified and buried people could continue for years. Despite progress made in the recovery and identification of disappeared people and the prosecution of perpetrators, victims' families were still denied the rights to justice and reparation. The nonimplementation of the 2004 Law on Missing Persons led to problems for the families of the disappeared, including the lack of independent functioning of the Missing Persons Institute and the nonexistence of the Fund for Providing Assistance to the Families of Missing Persons. In addition, many judgments of the Constitutional Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina in cases involving enforced disappearances remained unimplemented.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 84-85.]

See also Croatia, Montenegro, the Netherlands, Norway, Serbia.

BRAZIL

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 13 March 2012, federal prosecutors announced that they were charging Colonel Sebastião Curió Rodrigues de Moura with “aggravated kidnapping” for his alleged role in five enforced disappearances in Pará state in 1974. The five were members of a small guerrilla organization detained during military operations. Witnesses reportedly saw them last in military custody. Their fate remained unknown. The case was the first in which criminal charges were brought against a Brazilian official for the human rights crimes committed during the military dictatorship (1964–1985). More than 475 people were forcibly disappeared during that era, and thousands more were illegally detained or tortured. The Amnesty Law from 1979, however, had effectively barred criminal prosecutions of state agents for dictatorship-era abuses, an interpretation that the Supreme Court had reaffirmed in April 2010. In November 2010, however, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ruled in Gomes-Lund et alii (Guerrilha do Araguaia) versus Brazil that this law must not prevent the investigation and prosecution of serious human rights violations committed during military rule. As a party to the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance, ratified by Brazil in November 2010, Brazil had specific obligations to ensure that, whenever an offense occurred, there was effective investigation and prosecution, and a proper remedy for the victim. Moreover, while international law forbids the retroactive application of the criminal law, this prohibition was not intended to prevent the punishment of acts that were recognized as criminal under international law at the time that they were committed. On 18 November 2011, President Dilma Rousseff ratified laws limiting to 50 years the period state secrets could be held, and creating a Truth Commission to investigate human rights violations committed between 1946 and 1988. The Commission, made up of a seven-member panel (six lawyers and a psychoanalyst) appointed by the president, would hear evidence for two years, before issuing a report. Brazil also granted over US$1 billion in financial compensation to more than 12,000 victims of abuses committed by state agents during the military dictatorship from 1964 to 1985.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 12, 86; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 220; Human Rights Watch, “Brazil: Human Rights Prosecution a Landmark Step: First Criminal Charges for Abuses During Military Rule” (13 March 2012).]

BULGARIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 18 June 2011, an anonymous street artist transformed the Red Army soldiers on a Soviet war monument in Sofia into storybook characters (including such figures as Superman, Ronald McDonald, Santa Claus and the Joker). Underneath the memorial the artist spraypainted the caption: “In step with the times.” Russia urged Bulgaria to punish the “hooligans” behind the vandalism.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2011, no. 3), 172–173.]

BURKINA FASO

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

BURUNDI

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

A committee established to amend the 2004 Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) Law presented President Pierre Nkurunziza with a draft law in October 2011. If passed by parliament, the draft law would exclude civil society and religious groups from the TRC (which still had to be established), thereby compromising its independence. It could prevent the Special Tribunal, a judicial body recommended by the United Nations in 2005 and set up to follow the TRC, from prosecuting cases independently. The draft law did not explicitly prohibit the granting of amnesties, including for genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity. The TRC would cover grave crimes in Burundi since 1962. Bob Rugurika, chief editor of African Public Radio (RPA), was questioned by the public prosecutor’s office about programs that touched on the composition of the technical committee set up to prepare the TRC.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 6, 92, 94; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 93, 95.]

CAMBODIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Flawed proceedings and allegations of government interference with the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), the United Nations-backed Khmer Rouge tribunal, cast a shadow over its credibility. The Co-Investigating Judges announced the closure of Case 003 in April 2011, apparently without having undertaken full investigations. Case 004 remained with the Co-Investigating Judges. In October 2011, the pretrial chamber rejected an appeal by a victim to be recognized as a civil party in Cases 003 and 004. The two international judges who supported the appeal revealed that there had been several errors, including alleged manipulation of documents, which denied the rights of both victims and suspects. The international Co-Investigating Judge resigned a few days before these findings were made public, citing political interference. His replacement by Reserve Judge Laurent Kasper-Ansermet was delayed after the government failed to agree to the appointment. The trial of Nuon Chea, Ieng Sary and Khieu Samphan began in November 2011. All three, aged between 79 and 85, were alleged senior leaders during the Khmer Rouge period and defendants in Case 002. They were charged with crimes against humanity, war crimes and genocide. With ongoing concerns about the health of the accused, the Trial Chamber found defendant Ieng Thirith, aged 79, unfit to stand trial, stayed proceedings against her, and ordered her release. In December 2011, however, the Supreme Court Chamber overturned this decision and ordered her continued detention in hospital or in another appropriate facility, pending a medical examination and another fitness assessment.

On 10 August 2011, the Voice of America Khmer-language service (VOA) revealed confidential information about a case under investigation by the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC). In an article and a video posted on its website, VOA quoted verbatim an official confidential court document about Case 004—the fourth and last ECCC case—containing new allegations of mass killings by three Khmer Rouge officials between 1975 and 1979. On 31 August 2011, the ECCC Office of the Co-Investigating Judges (OCIJ) started contempt of court proceedings against VOA. Critics feared that this was a sign that the OCIJ actively sought to ensure the closure of the ECCC with the end of Case 002.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 27, 95–96; Cambodian Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (8 September 2011); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 310; Reporters without Borders, “Court Contempt: Special Khmer Rouge Court Starts Contempt Proceedings against VOA” (1 September 2011).]

See also Thailand.

CAMEROON

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In February 2011, at least eight political activists, including former members of a students' association, were arrested by members of the Directorate of Territorial Surveillance security service in Yaoundé. They had met to organize a demonstration to commemorate victims of human rights violations during demonstrations in February 2008. The detainees were denied access to lawyers and charged with endangering the security of the state. They were provisionally released but had not been brought to trial by the end of 2011.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 98.]

CANADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 15 April 2008, the Barrick Gold Corporation, Toronto, the world's biggest gold mining company, sued the publishing house Éditions Écosociété in Montréal for defamation and demanded six million Canadian dollars in damages. In June 2008, the Banro company also sued the same publisher for five million Canadian dollars in damages in Ontario. One of Écosociété's books, Noir Canada: Pillage, corruption et criminalité en Afrique (2008; Black Canada: Plundering, Bribery, and Crime in Africa), written by Alain Deneault (1970–), a lecturer at the Université de Québec à Montréal (UQAM), Delphine Abadie, and William Sacher, discussed Barrick's responsibility in the expulsion of thousands of self-employed miners and their families from the Bulyanhulu mine in Tanzania in August 1996, in the course of which 52 miners were reportedly buried alive. In a section called "Thèse 1: Homicide et génocide involontaires" ("Thesis 1: Killings and involuntary genocide"), the authors called for an independent public inquiry into the events. Barrick emphasized that the 1996 events took place before its purchase of the property from Sutton Resources, Vancouver, in 1999. Deneault declared that the book did not hold Barrick directly responsible for the incident, but rather presented opinions, including Barrick's, on the case. In October 2011, the parties settled the case, then before the Superior Court of Québec, out of court: Écosociété stopped publishing and reprinting the book and made a payment to Barrick. The authors acknowledged that they had no evidence of involvement of Barrick in Tanzania in 1996. Previously, Barrick had apparently threatened to sue Guardian journalist Greg Palast with defamation if he did not apologize for his report, which was the first publication containing these allegations.

[Sources: Alain Deneault, Delphine Abadie, William Sacher, Noir Canada: Pillage, corruption et criminalité en Afrique (Montréal: Écosociété, 2008) 17–26; The Gazette (15 April 2008); Globe and Mail (14 April 2008); The Militant (23 June 2008); Settlement of Barrick Gold Lawsuit against the Authors and the Publisher of Noir Canada (18 October 2011).]

In October 2011, the Canadian government failed to arrest former United States President George W. Bush when he travelled to British Columbia, despite clear evidence that he was responsible for crimes under international law, including torture.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 13.]

A Truth and Reconciliation Commission, mandated to document and raise awareness of the abuses against First Nations, Metis and Inuit children, and broader harms caused by Canada's historic residential school system, held sessions throughout 2011.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 100.]

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The trial of Jean-Pierre Bemba, former vice-president of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, continued before the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague. Bemba faced two counts of crimes against humanity and three counts of war crimes, accused of leading militias in the Central African Republic in 2002 and 2003 that killed and raped civilians. No other government or armed group leaders who committed war crimes and crimes against humanity in the Central African Republic were issued with an arrest warrant by the ICC or prosecuted by the national justice system.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 101–102.]

CHAD

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Although the African Union (AU) had stated since 2006 that former Chadian President Hissène Habré should be tried in Senegal “on behalf of Africa,” this failed to take place. In June 2011, a coalition of NGOs and victims of Habré's government brought a case against Senegal before the International Court of Justice for failing to try or extradite him. In July 2011, however, the Senegalese government announced its decision to return Habré to Chad, where he has been sentenced to death in his absence, but this was suspended after protests by United Nations (UN) bodies and human rights organizations. During the same month, the AU Commission identified Rwanda as “the country most suitable to be entrusted with the Habré trial.” This followed the meeting of the Assembly of Heads of States and Governments of the AU that urged Senegal to try Habré or extradite him to another country willing to do so. Human rights organizations, Chadian victims and their lawyers stated their preference for the trial to take place in Belgium, which had investigated the case, charged Habré with serious violations of international human rights and humanitarian law, and made an extradition request to Senegal in 2005, reiterated in November 2011. The Chadian government publicly supported this option. In November 2011, the UN Committee against Torture called on Senegal to comply with its obligation to prosecute or extradite Habré.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 5, 105, 290, 291.]

CHILE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In early January 2011, the National Education Council decided that the dictatorship of General Augusto Pinochet should not be called a “dictatorship” but a “military regime” in primary school history textbooks. Left-wing opposition parties accused the center-right government of President Sebastián Piñera of trying to whitewash history.

[Sources: ANP, “Woord ‘dictatuur’ uit lesboek Chili gehaald” (6 January 2012; <http://www.nu.nl/buitenland/2708494/woord-dictatuur-lesboek-chili-gehaald.html>); BBC News (5 January 2012).

In May 2011, the remains of former President Salvador Allende (1908–1973) were exhumed as part of a new judicial investigation into his death. In July 2011, international forensic experts confirmed that his death during the 1973 military coup led by General Augusto Pinochet was not the result of third parties.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 106.]

In August 2011, the Valech II Commission issued a report confirming five additional cases of enforced disappearance, 25 political killings and 9,795 cases of torture. The commission had been established in 2010 to assess cases of enforced disappearance, political killings, political imprisonment and torture that had not been presented to the Rettig and Valech Commissions. By the end of 2011, the total number of people officially recognized as disappeared or killed during the Pinochet dictatorship (1973–1990) stood at 3,216 and survivors of political imprisonment and/or torture at 38,254. The number of cases of human rights violations under investigation by the courts rose to its highest level yet following the submission in January 2011 by a court prosecutor of 726 new criminal complaints and more than 1,000 complaints filed over the years by relatives of those executed on political grounds. According to the Interior Ministry Human Rights Program, as of May 2011 there were 1,446 ongoing investigations. Between 2000 and the end of May 2011, 773 former members of the security forces had been charged or sentenced for human rights violations and 245 had had final sentences confirmed. However, only 66 were in prison, the rest having benefited from noncustodial sentences or sentences that were later reduced or commuted. In many cases, the Supreme Court had used its discretionary powers to reduce sentences against perpetrators in recognition of the time elapsed since the criminal act.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 12, 106; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 226.]

On 8 June 2012, relatives of victims of Augusto Pinochet's military rule (1973–90) held a rally in Santiago, calling for the screening of a new pro-Pinochet documentary, entitled Pinochet, to be banned. On the day of the screening at the Caupolicán theater (10 June 2012), thousands of Pinochet supporters turned up for the screening, including right-wing politicians and former members of the Chilean military. Hundreds of demonstrators clashed with the police.

[Source: BBC News (8 & 11 June 2012).]

CHINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In June 2011, historian Xu Zerong (1954–) was released [see NCH Annual Report 2002].

[Source: Lik Hang Tsui (Free Speech Debate), “History Reclassified as State Secret: the Case of Xu Zerong” (<http://freespeechdebate.com/en/case/history-reclassified-as-state-secret-the-case-of-xu-zerong>; 16 March 2012)].

On 23 August 2011, Lü (Lu) Gengsong (1956–) was released from prison in Hangzhou. He refused the conditions of deprivation of political rights imposed on him. The prison administration reportedly did not return to Lü the six diaries he kept in prison and the manuscript of a book he wrote [see NCH

Annual Report 2008].

[Source: Human Rights in China, “Writer Lü Gengsong Released from Prison; Refuses Conditions of Deprivation of Political Rights” (24 August 2011).]

In August 2011, during Chinese Vice Premier Li Keqiang’s threeday visit to Hong Kong, police set up “core security areas” keeping protesters and press away from him. Police dragged away one resident wearing a t-shirt commemorating the 1989 Tiananmen massacre.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 110.]

On 15 August 2011, Chen Zhong, president of the Guangzhou-based biweekly Nanfeng Chuang (Window on the South), was removed from his post (though not dismissed); editor Zhao Lingmin was suspended during an internal meeting. These measures were related to Zhao’s interview with Taiwanese historian Tang Chi-hua, working at National Chengchi University, Taipei, on 25 July 2011. The Nanfeng Chuang’s editorial committee had taken issue with Tang’s criticism of Sun Yat-sen (1866–1925), the founding father of modern China. Tang had said that Sun had been prepared to cede Chinese territory to the Japanese in return for military support against a local warlord and that the historical narratives of the Chinese Communist Party might not be factual.

[Source: Committee To Protect Journalists, Ifex Alert (22 August 2011).]

In October 2011, during the commemoration of the centenary of the 1911 Revolution, books on the revolution were carefully scrutinized, apparently to block parallels between the lack of reforms during the last stage of the Qing empire and the present situation. Two new biographies of Sun Yat-sen (1866–1925), the founder of the Republic of China in 1911, were withdrawn by their publishers. On 30 September 2011, the premiere of an opera featuring Sun was canceled. Some Chinese-American historians were denied entry in the country.

[Sources: BBC News (10 October 2011); NRC Handelsblad (10 October 2011), 10–11 and (15–16 October 2011), 28.]

On and around 4 June 2012, the authorities blocked all internet access to search terms relating to the twenty-third anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre. The search terms “six four,” “23,” “June 4+truth,” “candle,” “commemorate,” “mourn” and the expression “never forget” were added to the list of words banned under Chinese censorship rules. Names of famous student leaders and titles of old books and plays about injustice were also banned. Users of Sina Weibo (China’s largest social network site with perhaps as many as 300 million users) were greeted by a message warning them that their search results could not be displayed “due to relevant laws, regulations and policies.” Sina Weibo also prevented users from changing display photos to block the distribution of images commemorating the anniversary (although some images slipped through). Tens of thousands of bloggers complained that their posts were “harmonized” (a censorship-friendly word for “censored”) within minutes of being posted; the complaints themselves were also removed. A new book by the former mayor of Beijing in 1989, questioning the use of the army to stop the students, was banned. Commemorative demonstrations in Hong Kong, which were allowed, were not covered by the media in the rest of the country. In 2011, protesters had defeated censors by referring to the anniversary as “May 35” instead of “June 4,” but in 2012 even that nonexistent date was added to the list of blocked terms.

[Sources: Sophie Beach, “Google Gives Chinese Web Users Glimpse into Censorship” (5 June 2012); Human Rights Watch, “Impunity for June 1989 Massacre Impedes Needed Legal Reform” (1 June 2012); Ifex Communiqué (6 June 2012); NRC Handelsblad (4 June 2012), 9; Reporters without Borders, “Anniversary Crackdown: Beijing Authorities Step Up Censorship and Repression in June” (5 June 2012).]

Hong Kong

On 4 June 2011, police held 53 people for illegal assembly in Hong Kong after a massive candlelight vigil to mark the anniversary of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre.

[Source: Mike Clarke, “Hong Kong Journalists Say Freedom under Threat” (AFP, 2 July 2011).]

Tibet

On 16 March 2011, Phuntsok Jarutsang ([1991–2011]), a monk at Kirti monastery, Aba (Tibetan: Ngawa) prefecture, Sichuan province, set himself on fire to commemorate the March 2008 uprisings in the region. Security personnel tried to extinguish the flames but also allegedly beat Phuntsok, who died the next day, leading to protests in the following days and weeks by more than 1,000 lay Tibetans and monks. Phuntsok’s death was followed by a series of self-immolations in later months.

[Sources: Human Rights Watch, “China: End Crackdown on Tibetan Monasteries” (12 October 2011); Keesings historisch archief (September 2011), 430–31.]

Xinjiang

When in 2011 historian Sergey Radchenko, a lecturer in history of American-Asian relations at the University of Nottingham in Ningbo, China, attempted to order Jonathan Spence’s The Search for Modern China, customs officials refused to allow the book shipment into the country. They proposed to manually cut out the censored sections—including photos of the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre and Spence’s account of the Cultural Revolution—to get the customs clearance. Key archives, especially post-1945 archives (including Chinese Communist Party archives), remained largely inaccessible, even though the Chinese archives law provided for the opening of official documents to the public after 30 years.

[Source: Washington Post (31 December 2011).]

COLOMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 22 May 2009, Miguel Ángel Beltrán Villegas (1965–), a historian, sociologist and associate professor (2005–) at the Universidad Nacional in Bogotá, was arbitrarily detained in Mexico where he did postdoctoral research at the UNAM, Mexico City, and deported to a prison in Colombia on the charge of being the member of the International Committee of the guerrilla movement FARC known as “Jaime Cienfuegos” and responsible for writing “ideological material and articles” for them. Even President Álvaro Uribe’s official website stated this. The evidence was based on supposed information from the “FARC computers” allegedly seized in the Colombian army’s raid on a FARC camp in Ecuador in 2008. Beltrán admitted that he met FARC leader Raúl Reyes (killed in March 2008) and other FARC members during peace talks hosted in Mexico and later interviewed Reyes as part of his academic research into the conflict, but denied being Cienfuegos. Beltrán’s trial began on 29 December 2009. He was charged with “rebellion” and “criminal conspiracy for terrorist purposes.” In early June 2011, the Supreme Court declared that evidence from the computers allegedly belonging to Reyes did not fulfil legal prerequisites and were therefore illegal. On 7 June 2011, Beltrán was released.

[Sources: Colombia Reports (8 June 2011); Education International, “Colombia: Political Prisoner Miguel Beltran Absolved of All Charges” (16 June 2011); International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Half-yearly Caselist to 31 December 2009 (2010) 25.]

On 28 April 2011, a judge sentenced retired General Jesus Armando Arias Cabrales to 35 years’ imprisonment for his role in the enforced disappearance of 11 people in November 1985 after the army stormed the Palace of Justice where people were being held hostage by members of the M-19 guerrilla group. The government and the military high command both made statements criticizing his conviction and that of retired Colonel Luis Alfonso Plazas Vega, sentenced in 2010 to 30 years’ imprisonment in the same case. Retired General Ivan Ramirez Quintero, who was charged with one of the disappearances, was acquitted in December 2011.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 13, 114.]

Over the past decade the Colombian Army committed an alarming number of extrajudicial killings of civilians. In many cases—commonly referred to as “false positives”—army personnel murdered civilians and reported them as combatants killed in action, apparently in response to pressure to boost body counts. The executions occurred throughout Colombia and involved multiple army brigades. The government did not keep statistics for cases of “false positives” as a separate category of crimes, but the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights in Colombia estimated that more than 3,000 people may have been victims of extrajudicial killings by state agents, and that the majority of cases were committed by the army between 2004 and 2008. There had been a dramatic reduction in cases since 2008; however, some alleged cases of extrajudicial killings attributed to state agents were reported in 2010 and 2011. Investigations into such cases advanced slowly: as of September 2011 the Human Rights Unit of the Attorney General’s Office was investigating 1,622 cases of alleged extrajudicial killings committed by state agents involving 2,788 victims, and had obtained convictions for 77 cases. In July 2011, a judge convicted former army Colonel Luis Fernando Borja Giraldo, the highest-ranking military officer to be sentenced for “false positives.” Accountability achieved to date was due to the fact that civilian prosecutors were investigating most cases. However, as of July 2011, more than 400 cases involving alleged extrajudicial killings remained in the military justice system, where there was little chance that justice would be obtained.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 231–232.]

The Justice and Peace process made little progress. Under this process, introduced in 2005, some 10 percent of the more than 30,000 paramilitaries who supposedly demobilized could qualify for reduced prison sentences in return for confessing to human rights violations. The remaining 90 percent received de facto amnesties. By the end of 2011 only 10 paramilitaries had been convicted under the process; most had appeals against their convictions pending at the end of 2011. In February 2011, the Constitutional Court ruled that Law 1424, which sought to grant de facto amnesties to tens of thousands of supposedly demobilized rank- and- file paramilitaries if they signed a so-called Agreement to Contribute to the Historic Truth and to Reparation, was constitutional.

As of late 2011, the government had backed two constitutional reform proposals that threatened to facilitate impunity for military abuses: a “justice reform” bill that would increase the likelihood that military abuse cases were handled by military courts, and a “transitional justice” bill that would allow Congress, at the president’s behest, to authorize the Attorney General’s Office to drop prosecutions for human rights violations, including those committed by members of the military.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 113; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 232.]

See also Ecuador.

CONGO (Democratic Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

There was mixed progress in the government's efforts to hold perpetrators of serious violations to account. Congo's judicial officials had some notable successes in prosecuting sexual violence and other crimes. On 25 March 2011, the High Military Court in Kinshasa began the trial of General Jérôme Kakwavu, on war crimes charges for rape and torture. Kakwavu was the first general in Congo's history to be arrested on rape charges.

The government took action in response to the 2010 human rights "mapping report" published by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), which documented 617 incidents of serious violations of international humanitarian law between 1993 and 2003. In August 2011, the Minister of Justice and Human Rights presented a draft law to parliament to establish a specialized mixed court with national and international judicial staff to try those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. Congolese civil society groups strongly supported the draft legislation, but on 22 August 2011 the Senate rejected it and asked the government to harmonize its proposal with other draft laws to combat serious human rights violations.

Efforts to combat impunity also suffered a serious blow with the promotion and growing power of former rebel leader Bosco Ntaganda, who faced an International Criminal Court (ICC) arrest warrant but remained in charge of military operations in eastern Congo. At the ICC three former Congolese armed group leaders were tried for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 128; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 108–109.]

On 14 March 2012, the International Criminal Court (ICC) found guilty Thomas Lubanga, charged with war crimes consisting of recruiting and using children aged under 15 for the Union des Patriotes Congolais armed group in Ituri. His sentence was expected in June 2012; the ICC prosecutor demanded a sentence of thirty years. The Lubanga trial would be the first to be concluded by the ICC, which was established a decade ago, in July 2002.

[Sources include: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 129.]

See also Central Africa Republic, Congo (Republic), Germany, Rwanda.

CONGO (Republic)

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

A delegation of the United Nations (UN) Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances visited Congo from 24 September to 3 October 2011 to gather information on efforts to investigate and prevent enforced disappearances. Discussions focused on the 1999 disappearance of some 350 refugees returning from the Democratic Republic Congo, and the 2005 trial of 16 security and government officials which failed to establish individual criminal responsibility. The UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances made several recommendations to the government, including enactment of a law criminalizing enforced disappearances.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 116.]

COSTA RICA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

CROATIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Five cases related to crimes under international law committed on Croatian territory during the 1991–1995 war were pending before the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in The Hague. In April 2011, the ICTY convicted two generals, Ante Gotovina and Mladen Markač, for crimes against humanity and war crimes. They were found guilty of having participated in a joint criminal enterprise during and after “Operation Storm” between August and November 1995, with the aim of permanently removing the ethnic Serb population from the Krajina region of Croatia. Gotovina held the rank of Colonel-General in the Croatian Army and was the Commander of the Split Military District at the time. Markač held the position of Assistant Minister of Interior in charge of special police matters. They were convicted of persecution, deportation, plunder, wanton destruction, murder, inhumane acts and cruel treatment of the civilian Serb population. They were sentenced to 24 and 18 years’ imprisonment respectively. The convictions of the generals led to days of protests by veterans’ groups and others opposed to the ruling, and condemnation from political leaders in Croatia, including Prime Minister Jadranka Kosor and President Ivo Josipovic. The Prime Minister stated repeatedly that the Croatian government found it unacceptable, and that the Croatian nation should be proud of all people who took part in the operation and contributed to the Croatian victory. In May 2011, both generals appealed against the judgment. In July 2011, Goran Hadžić was arrested in Serbia on charges of crimes against humanity and war crimes in eastern Slavonia in Croatia. He was transferred to the ICTY where he awaited trial at the end of 2011. Hadžić had been President of the self-declared Serb-controlled Republic of Serbian Krajina. He was charged with ordering the killing of hundreds and the deportation of thousands of Croats and other non-Serbs between 1991 and 1993. In August 2011, he pled not guilty to 14 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

The trial of Vojislav Šešelj, who was accused of crimes in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and the Vojvodina province of Serbia, continued. He was indicted for crimes against humanity, including persecution on political, racial or religious grounds, deportation and inhumane acts. He was also accused of war crimes, including murder, torture, cruel treatment, wanton destruction of villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity, destruction or wilful damage done to religious or educational institutions and plunder of public or private property. In October 2011, the Trial Chamber found him guilty of contempt for publishing confidential information on protected witnesses and sentenced him to 18 months' imprisonment for this additional charge.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 38, 120–121; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 436–437.]

In 2011, the number of war crimes trials conducted in absentia increased in Croatia, particularly in cases in which the defendant was a Serb. An ongoing plan by the Chief State Attorney's Office to revise past convictions rendered in absentia failed to address the continuing problem of conducting trials in absentia. In the first eight months of 2011, 20 of the 33 active war crimes trials took place at least partially in absentia, and of the 20 newly-indicted individuals in 2011, 10 were indicted in absentia, primarily Serbs. Suspects continued to face trial in regular district courts rather than the four courts specially designated for war crimes trials.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 436–437.]

See also Norway, Serbia.

CUBA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In February 2011, the authorities detained more than 100 people in a single day and placed over 50 people under house arrest in a pre-emptive strike designed to stop activists marking the death of activist Orlando Zapata Tamayo, who died in 2010 following a prolonged hunger strike while in detention. Reina Luisa Tamayo, Orlando Zapata's mother; her husband, José Ortiz; and Daniel Mesa, a human rights activist, were arrested on 22 February 2011 by about 15 state security agents as they left their home in Banes, Holguín province. The arrests were intended to prevent them from undertaking any activities in memory of Orlando Zapata on the first anniversary of his death on 23 February 2011. All three were released 12 hours later. In June 2011, Reina Luisa Tamayo went into exile in the United States with her family.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 122.]

In January 2011, the United States (US) government announced minor changes to the embargo against Cuba, allowing greater travel to Cuba for educational, cultural, religious and journalistic activities. In October 2011, for the 20th consecutive year, the United Nations (UN) General Assembly adopted a resolution calling on the US to lift its economic and trade embargo against Cuba, in place since 1961. UN agencies working in Cuba, such as the WHO, UNICEF and UNFPA, continued to report the negative effects of the US embargo on the health of the population, particularly members of marginalized groups. Access to specific commodities, equipment, medicines and laboratory materials remained scarce as a result of restrictions imposed on the importation of items manufactured by US companies and their subsidiaries or produced under US patents.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 123.]

See also United States of America.

CYPRUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

CZECH REPUBLIC

Last Annual Report entry: 2000.

DENMARK

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

DJIBOUTI

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ECUADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In June 2010, a truth commission created by the administration of President Rafael Correa published a report documenting 68 extrajudicial executions and 17 enforced disappearances between 1984 and 2008, and named 458 alleged perpetrators of abuses. According to the commission, few of those responsible for the abuses had been held accountable, due to statutes of limitations, jurisdictional disputes and procedural delays. In October 2010, the attorney general appointed a team of prosecutors to reopen investigations into cases reported by the commission. As of September 2011 the prosecutors were reported to have renewed investigations into several key cases, but no suspects had been charged. In October 2011, the Attorney General announced that he was replacing the team of prosecutors investigating the enforced disappearance of Colombian teenage brothers Carlos Santiago and Pedro Andres Restrepo in 1988 because of lack of progress.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 134; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 242–243.]

On 21 January 2012, in a public Saturday talk in the weekly series called “the enlace” (the bond), President Rafael Correa discussed the forthcoming celebrations of the hundredth anniversary of the death of General Eloy Alfaro on 28 January (1842–1912). Correa’s government, calling itself “alfarista,” was strongly inspired by Alfaro, a former liberal president (1895–1901, 1906–1911) who fought conservative Catholicism and was a proponent of secularism. In 1911 Alfaro had been deposed and upon return from exile, imprisoned; he was executed on 28 January 1912 in Quito in unclear circumstances, after which his corpse was burned. His remains were secretly buried. Correa declared that it was not “the people [of Quito] which assassinated Alfaro,” but “the dominant oligarchy, the corrupt press, the fundamentalist sectors of the church, and ‘these’ politicians.” Historians, including Enrique Ayala Mora, protested against this interpretation and accused Correa of trying to change the death certificate (dated 11 March 1912), which mentioned that “the people” killed Alfaro. On several occasions, including on 28 January 2012, Correa alluded to his version of Alfaro’s murderers, implying that they were also the enemies of today.

[Sources: Rafael Correa, Enlace (http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=jVrL-_h7uis; minutes 2:28–2:32; 21 January 2012); Rafael Correa, “Cien años de la hoguera bárbara, Parque el Ejido” (speech; Quito, 28 January 2012); Rafael Correa, “Conmemoración 100 años de la hoguera bárbara” (speech; Montecristi, 28 January 2012); Rafael Correa, “CXVII aniversario de la revolución alfarista de 1895” (speech; Montecristi, 5 June 2012); R.D. Buitrón & C. Rojas Araujo, “Interview with Enrique Ayala Mora,” El Comercio (22 January 2012); F. Criollo & P. Zamora, “Siete hitos fueron recorridos en el camino a la Hoguera,” El Comercio (29 January 2012); “La historia juzgó el crimen de Alfaro” (Interview with Érika Silva), El Comercio (26 January 2012); Luc Spanhove, personal communications (June 2012); Luc Spanhove, “Eloy Alfaro (deel 3): Wie vermoordde hem?” Esmeraldas (June 2012), 17–20; Wikipedia (13 June 2012).]

See also Colombia.

EGYPT

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The authorities prosecuted some of those allegedly responsible for orchestrating the killings in January and February 2011 but otherwise failed to deliver justice to the relatives of those killed and to people injured during the “25 January Revolution.” In April 2011, the trial began of former Interior Minister Habib Ibrahim El Adly and six of his former aides on charges arising from the killings of protesters. The case was joined to that of Hosni Mubarak and his two sons and all then went on trial in August 2011, charged with premeditated and attempted murder. The trial, whose first two sessions were broadcast on national television, was continuing at the end of 2011.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 138.]

On 17 December 2011, the Egyptian Scientific Institute, the oldest scientific institute in Egypt (founded in 1798 as the Institut d’Égypte by Napoléon Bonaparte during his Egyptian campaign and containing a historical archive), was largely destroyed by fire during clashes between soldiers and police and street protesters in Tahrir Square. Volunteers carried tens of thousands of fragments of charred books to the basement of the nearby National Archives. One of the most precious books in its collection was the original Description d’Égypte, a first-of-its-kind, 20-volume illustrated description of the country’s geography, landmarks, customs, and history that 150 scholars who accompanied the French expedition spent 20 years assembling. Eight of the 20 volumes were reportedly recovered.

[Source: Ursula Lindsey, “Egyptian Scholars Struggle to Protect Country’s History amid New Violence,” Chronicle of Higher Education (15 January 2012).]

EL SALVADOR

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The 1993 Amnesty Law remained in place, despite repeated decisions from the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ordering the state to repeal it. The Law sought to obstruct anyone, including the armed forces, from being held to account for human rights violations, including crimes against humanity, committed during the armed conflict (1980–1992). In March 2011, the case of 700 men, women and children who were tortured and killed by the armed forces over a three-day period in 1981 in El Mozote and surrounding hamlets, Morazán province, was referred to the Inter-American Court. This was one of the thousands of cases of human rights violations, including crimes against humanity committed by members of the military, where the 1993 Amnesty Law had prevented those responsible being brought to justice. In December 2011, during a ceremony to mark the anniversary of the massacres, the Minister of Foreign Affairs acknowledged state responsibility for the crimes against humanity perpetrated in El Mozote and surrounding hamlets. However, the minister gave no commitment to repealing the Amnesty Law or holding perpetrators accountable for their crimes.

In August 2011, the Supreme Court decided not to fulfil a red alert from Interpol, originating from the Spanish authorities. This demanded the arrest and extradition of nine former members of the military accused of the killing in 1989 of six Spanish Jesuit priests, their housekeeper and her daughter. The court demanded that further procedural steps be fulfilled by the Spanish authorities before they could consider the order.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 139–140.]

ERITREA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

ESTONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

ETHIOPIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

FIJI

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

FINLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In September 2011, appeal proceedings began in the Helsinki Court of Appeal in the case of François Bazaramba, who had been convicted for crimes of genocide committed in Rwanda in 1994. Some of the hearings were conducted in Rwanda and Tanzania to facilitate the hearing of witness testimony and allow the judges to visit locations relevant to the case.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 149.]

FRANCE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 22 December 2011, the National Assembly (lower house of parliament) backed a proposal criminalizing the public denial, contestation and “outrageous minimization” of genocides, explicitly including the Armenian genocide of 1915. On 23 January 2012, the Senate also endorsed the bill (with 127 to 86 votes). Under the bill, those guilty could face a year in prison and a fine of 45,000 euros. Foreign Minister Alain Juppé, however, condemned it as “useless and counter-productive.” Valérie Boyer, a member of the ruling conservative Union pour un Mouvement Populaire (UMP; Union for a Popular Movement) and the author of the bill, was threatened with death by Turkish nationalists. Many thought that the bill was inspired by the fact that the votes of half a million ethnic Armenians living in France would be important support for President Nicolas Sarkozy in the presidential elections of 2012. In reaction, Turkey halted military and diplomatic relations with France and announced plans for economic sanctions. Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan declared that “approximately 15% of the population in Algeria was subjected to a massacre by the French, starting from 1945. This is genocide.” France had formally recognized the Armenian killings as genocide in 2001. A proposal similar to the bill had been backed by the National Assembly in October 2006 but it had been voted down in the senate in May 2011. The NGO Article 19 rejected genocide denial laws as unnecessary interference by the state with the right to freedom of expression, in violation of international standards. It also said that “it is undesirable for States to interfere with the right to know and the search for historical truth, especially when those events took place in another country.” On 28 February 2012, the Constitutional Council ruled that the law was incompatible with the right to free expression and therefore unconstitutional.

[Sources: Article 19, “France: Senate Must Reject Armenian Genocide Law” (19 January 2012); Article 19, “France: Genocide-Denial Law Declared Unconstitutional” (29 February 2012); BBC News (22 & 23 December 2011; 4 & 24 January 2012); Conseil constitutionnel, “Décision no. 2012–647 DC du 28 février 2012: Loi visant à réprimer la contestation de l’existence des génocides reconnus par la loi”; Guardian (18 January 2012); NRC Handelsblad (19 & 24 January & 1 March 2012); Reporters without Borders, “After Victory for Free Speech in France, Turkey’s Turn Next?” (26 January 2012); Trouw (28 December 2011).]

See also Haiti, Morocco / Western Sahara, Panama.

GEORGIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Over three years after the Georgian-Russian conflict over South Ossetia, Georgian authorities had yet to ensure a comprehensive investigation into, and accountability for, international human rights and humanitarian law violations by their forces. During the war, the Georgian military used indiscriminate force including firing multiple rocket launchers, an indiscriminate weapon that should not be used in civilian areas. The Office of the Prosecutor at the International Criminal Court—to which Georgia was a party—continued with its preliminary examination of the situation.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 462–463.]

GERMANY

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In 2008, Germany's coalition government reached an "informal agreement" on the transfer of the Stasi files to the national archives in 2019, thirty years after the reunification of Germany. The new head of the Stasi Archives, however, objected, wanting to keep them as a separate institution.

[Source: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of May 2012, 7.]

In 2011, a commission of four independent historians (including Klaus-Dietmar Henke) found that in 2007 the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND; the German foreign intelligence agency) destroyed personnel files of 250 BND employees who had been in the SS or Gestapo and some of whom had been investigated after 1945 for war crimes. The incident raised suspicion that BND employees deliberately tried to obstruct the efforts by BND head Ernst Uhrlau to investigate the BND history. The historical commission had not yet been appointed in 2007, but Uhrlau had already announced that he planned to look into the Nazi past of the BND. The commission did not allege a deliberate cover-up. Reportedly, about 10% of BND recruits during the Cold War had previously served in the SS.

[Sources: BBC News (30 November 2011); Der Spiegel Online (2 December 2011).]

In May 2011, a criminal trial against Rwandan citizens Ignace Murwanashyaka and Straton Musoni was opened before the Higher Regional Court of Stuttgart. As the former President and Vice-President of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, they were accused of having commanded 26 crimes against humanity and 39 war crimes on Congolese territory between January 2008 and November 2009 via telephone and internet. This was the first trial in Germany based on the German Code of Crimes against International Law, which came into force in 2002.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 156.]

On 3 February 2012, in a case concerning jurisdictional immunities of a state (Germany versus Italy), the International Court of Justice found, by twelve votes to three, that Italy had violated its obligation to respect the immunity which Germany enjoyed by allowing civil claims to be brought against it (that is, Germany) in Italy based on violations of international humanitarian law committed by the German Reich between 1943 and 1945. Jurist noted that this ruling was “effectively ending thousands of reparations claims,” all of which relied on significant archival resources as evidence.

[Sources: Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of February 2012, 3; International Court of Justice, Judgement: Jurisdictional Immunities of the State (Germany versus Italy: Greece Intervening) (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/251.pdf>; 3 February 2012).]

See also Congo (Democratic Republic), the Netherlands.

GHANA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

GREECE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

GRENADA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

GUATEMALA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In March 2009, President Álvaro Colom created the Military Archive Declassification Commission, tasked with sorting and declassifying military documents from 1954 to 1996. In June 2011, the government made 12,287 declassified documents publicly available. According to a commission member, 55 were kept secret on national security grounds, but they could be consulted by a court if required. There were almost no documents presented from the crucial years 1980–1985, because according to the government these files were lost.

The government also announced that all the staff of the Peace Archives would be fired in June 2011. The Peace Archives, established by the previous government as part of the national office of the Secretary of Peace, helped declassify and digitize military archives from the period of the internal armed conflict (1960–1996) and provided expert testimony in several important human rights cases. The secretary said that the digitized records might be transferred to the General Archives of Central America located in Guatemala City.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 161; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 248–250; Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of May 2012, 7.]

In June 2011, General Héctor Mario López Fuentes, former defense minister in the de facto government of General Oscar Humberto Mejía Victores, was detained for his alleged role in massacres committed in 1982–1983. It was the first arrest of a top-ranking official for human rights violations.

In August 2011, four former members of an elite army unit were sentenced to lengthy prison terms for their role in the 1982 Dos Erres massacre of 250 men, women and children; many of the women and girls were raped. Of 626 documented massacres, the Dos Erres case was only the fourth to have led to a conviction.

Also in August 2011, four forensic experts from the Fundación de Antropología Forense de Guatemala (FAFG; Guatemalan Forensic Anthropology Foundation) received death threats after giving evidence in the 1982 Dos Erres massacre case. Four days earlier someone had slashed the tire of a pickup truck belonging to FAFG's director while he was waited in traffic in Guatemala City. As of October 2011, the attorney general's office had not identified those responsible for these threats.

In October 2011, the Constitutional Court ordered the Supreme Court to clarify its ruling that a civilian court should try those suspected of the 1992 enforced disappearance and torture of Efraín Bámaca Velásquez. They had already been tried and acquitted in a secret military trial in 1994.

Former generals Hector Lopez Fuentes, Oscar Mejía Víctores and José Mauricio Rodríguez Sánchez were charged with planning and overseeing genocide, organized sexual violence and the forced transfers of populations in 1982–1983. The three were awaiting trial at the end of 2011.

In January 2012, a Guatemalan court charged former dictator Efraín Ríos Montt with genocide for his brutal war against the country's Mayan people in the 1980s.

The discovery in July 2005 of approximately 80 million documents of the disbanded National Police, including files on Guatemalans killed or “disappeared” during the conflict, could play a key role in prosecutions for past human rights violations. Documents from the archive led to the arrest in March 2009 of two former National Police agents for their participation in the “disappearance” in 1984 of student leader and activist Edgar Fernando García. In October 2011, a court sentenced both men to 40 years in prison for the crime.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 161; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 247, 248–251; National Security Archive, Press Release (19 June 2012).]

See also Spain, United States of America.

GUINEA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

There was insufficient progress in holding to account members of the security forces implicated in the 28 September 2009 massacre of some 150 people and the rape of over 100 women during the military regime of Dadis Camara. A 2009 report by the United Nations-led International Commission of Inquiry concluded that the abuses committed by security forces very likely constituted crimes against humanity. In 2010 the then-government committed to bringing the perpetrators to justice, and appointed three investigating judges to the case. As of late 2011, there was little public evidence of the investigation's progress, and no evidence of government efforts to locate the over 100 bodies believed to have been disposed of secretly by the security forces. The government's refusal for much of 2011 to provide security to the investigating judges and President Alpha Condé's appointment of two men implicated in the massacre to high-level positions within his administration called into question his commitment to ensure justice for the crimes. The International Criminal Court (ICC), which in October 2009 confirmed that the situation in Guinea was under preliminary examination, visited the country in March, April, and October 2011 to assess progress made in national investigations. The ICC expressed its willingness to take on the case should the Guinean government fail to do so. In September 2011, the government disallowed a ceremony by human rights groups and a march by the political opposition to commemorate the 2009 massacre. Meanwhile, there had been no attempts by the authorities to investigate, much less hold accountable, members of the security forces responsible for the 2007 killing of some 130 demonstrators.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 128, 130.]

In June 2011, President Alpha Condé issued a presidential decree creating a “Reflection Commission” to promote reconciliation, and in August 2011 appointed two leading religious figures as copresidents. There was, however, inadequate consultation with civil society about the mandate, composition, or powers of the commission. While the president appeared to limit its mandate to promoting reconciliation, local human rights groups pushed for a commission that could meaningfully address impunity, including provisions to recommend individuals for prosecution. Communal violence in the southeast that left some 25 dead in May 2011, the appointment by the president of a disproportionate number of senior civil servants from his Malinke ethnic group, and rising tension between the Malinke and Peuhl communities demonstrated the urgent need for a truth and reconciliation mechanism with the capacity to make recommendations aimed at addressing the root causes of communal conflicts.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 126, 127.]

GUINEA-BISSAU

Last Annual Report entry: 1999.

In 2011, no one was brought to justice for the killings of politicians and high-ranking military officers in 2009 and before. In March 2011, the former Procurator General announced that investigations into the killings of President Joao Bernardo Vieira and the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces, General Tagme Na Waie, had reached a dead end because of difficulties in gathering evidence. In May 2011, he also announced that there was no evidence of an attempted coup in June 2009 and provisionally closed the investigation. He submitted the case of two politicians killed in the alleged coup to the Military High Court, which he said had jurisdiction over it. The Military High Court refuted this and the case was passed to the Supreme Court. No decision had been made by the end of 2011 on who should deal with the case. Thousands of people, however, took to the streets to demand an end to impunity.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 163, 164.]

GUYANA

Last Annual Report entry: 1997.

HAITI

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

On 16 January 2011, after nearly 25 years in exile in France, former President-for-Life Jean-Claude “Baby Doc” Duvalier returned to Haiti. He was quickly charged with financial and human rights crimes allegedly committed during his 15-year tenure. From 1971 to 1986, Duvalier commanded a network of security forces that committed serious human rights violations, including arbitrary detentions, torture, enforced disappearances, rape and summary executions. Thousands of Haitians were victims of extrajudicial killings or otherwise died from torture or inhuman detention conditions. Many more were forced to flee, building the modern Haitian diaspora. Duvalier’s prosecution faced many obstacles, including the fragility of the justice system. Lack of political will from the international community to support the prosecution left the government without the adequate resources or technical assistance needed for a robust judicial process. Victims and their families felt intimidated by Duvalier’s lawyers and supporters, who interrupted victims’ audiences before the investigative judge, yelled at victims in public markets, and otherwise created an environment that discouraged witnesses and victims from coming forward. The investigation into crimes against humanity committed under his government progressed slowly. The investigating judge submitted his findings to the Office of the Prosecutor of Port-au-Prince in July 2011. However, by the end of 2011, a decision from the Prosecutor’s Office on next steps remained pending. On 30 January 2012, a judge ruled that a statute of limitations could be invoked to prevent Duvalier from going to trial for murder, assassination, torture and extreme corruption under his rule, but not for misappropriation of public funds.

Many of Haiti’s public records were destroyed in the 2010 earthquake. Nevertheless, archives of Amnesty International in London, collected over the decades, would support the complaints relating to crimes against humanity filed in January 2011 against Duvalier by his victims and their families.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 13, 166, 167; Gerardo Ducos, “Amnesty Archives Support Case Against Haiti’s Former Dictator,” Wire (October/November 2011), 3; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 256–258; Human Rights Watch, “Haiti: Duvalier Ruling Disappoints Justice” (31 January 2012).]

HONDURAS

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Following the June 2009 military coup, the disproportionate use of force led to several deaths, scores of injuries and thousands of arbitrary detentions. In April 2011, the Porfirio Lobo government established a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to analyze the events leading up to and during the coup. In its report issued in July 2011, the TRC acknowledged that the events of 2009 did constitute a coup d'état and that multiple human rights violations occurred, including acts of excessive use of force by the military and police. By the end of 2011, no one had been brought to justice or held to account for these human rights violations. The commissioners documented the cases of 20 people, 12 of whom they concluded had been killed due to excessive police or army force, and eight of whom had died in selective killings by government agents. The TRC also reported that police and army officials were responsible for "systematic obstruction" of investigations into these abuses, including altering crime scenes and official documents and helping suspects escape.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 168; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 259–260.]

HUNGARY

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 20 May 2011, the executive director (2009–11) of the Holokauszt Emlékközpont (Holocaust Memorial Center), László Harsányi, was dismissed by the museum's new government-appointed board of curators headed by György Haraszti, a historian teaching at the Jewish Theological Seminary in Budapest. The board temporarily appointed historian Szabolcs Szita to take over his duties. The dismissal was preceded by a controversy over the center's permanent exhibition (mounted in 2006), which the government believed gave a distorted picture of Hungary's ties with Nazi Germany. At its core was a picture of Admiral Miklós Horthy (1868–1957), who led Hungary from 1920 to 1944 and who entered into an alliance with the Nazis in exchange for the restoration of territories (including southern Slovakia and northern Transylvania) lost under the 1920 Trianon Treaty. Undersecretary András Levente Gál of the Ministry of Justice said that picture unjustifiably linked Hungary's re-appropriation of territory with the deportation of Jews to Nazi concentration and death camps (some 560,000 Hungarian Jews perished in the Holocaust), shown in nearby pictures, and had asked the Interior Ministry from which the center depended that the exhibit be reassessed—something which Harsányi had refused. Historians accused the government of censorship.

[Sources: AFP, "Hungary Sacks Holocaust Museum Chief" (21 May 2011); Historisch nieuwsblad (July-August 2011), 29; "Hungary's Nazi Past in Spotlight as Kepiro Goes on Trial," The New Age (5 May 2011); "Rewriting History: The Fate of the Holocaust Memorial Center," Hungarian Spectrum (23 May 2011).]

INDIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 25 February 2008, Akhil Bharatiya Vidyarthi Parishad activists, led by Vikas Dahiya, vandalized the office of S. Z. H. Jafri, head of the history department at Delhi University, and allegedly manhandled him, in protest against the history syllabus. They claimed that the essay “Three Hundred Ramayanas: Five Examples and Three Thoughts on Translation,” a classic essay on the Ramayanas by the late linguist A.K. Ramanujan (–1993; an authority on pre-modern literature and culture who had taught at Chicago University), be removed from the reading list of the B.A. History honors course on ancient Indian culture (of which it had been part since 2006). The essay attracted the ire of the activists because it maintained that 300 versions of the epic existed, that the epic had had many different interpretations and variations, and that it contained supposedly “objectionable” references to Hindu gods. Student activists called it a perversion of tradition, especially the inclusion of early versions of the tale with numerous sexual references. The history department staff refused to comply. A writ petition was consequently filed in the High Court on the grounds that the essay hurt religious sentiments. The matter was then taken up by the Supreme Court, which directed the university to seek the opinion of experts and place it before the Academic Council. The names of the expert team were kept confidential. Three of the four historian-members stated that the essay ought to be read by students but the fourth expressed the opinion that second-year students may find it difficult. None of the experts found anything offensive. On 9 October 2011, the Vice Chancellor and the Academic Council overruled the majority opinion of this committee. The Academic Council declared that the essay was an inappropriate subject of history, given its religious theme. Only nine of the 120 council members dissented. In mid-October, students and teachers at Delhi University went on marches to protest against the removal. Publisher Oxford University Press informed the history department that there had been not a sufficient number of back orders since 2008 to justify a normal reprint of the book The Collected Essays of A.K. Ramanujan, edited by Vinay Dharwadker; it denied acting under pressure from right-wing protesters when reaching this decision. On 9 December 2011, however, it announced that it would reprint The Collected Essays, along with Many Ramayanas: The Diversity of a Narrative Tradition in South Asia, in which Ramanujan’s essay also appeared, and Questioning Ramayanas: A South Asian Tradition, both edited by Paula Richman.

[Sources: BBC News (18 October 2011); Chronicle of Higher Education (9 December 2011); Free Speech Debate, “Non-State Censorship in Modern-Day India” (<http://freespeechdebate.com/en/media/nonstate-censorship-in-modern-day-india>; 16 March 2012); “Historian’s Office in India Vandalized by Activists,” The Hindu (26 February 2008); IOC, 4/08: 167–68; Petition (<http://www.petitiononline.com/ramanuj/petition.html>); A. Maurya, personal communication (21 October 2011); Reuters (1 November 2011); Hasan Suroor, “Ramanujan Essay Row: OUP Denies ‘Censorship’,” The Hindu (30 November 2011); Nandini Thilak, “Removal of Ramanujan Essay Sends out Wrong Message,” Indian Express (4 November 2011); S.N. Vijetha, “Historians Protest as Delhi University Purges Ramayana Essay from Syllabus,” The Hindu (15 October 2011); S.N. Vijetha, “Ramayana Row: DU Council Ignored Opinion of Three Experts,” The Hindu (19 October 2011).]

On 11 May 2012, Union Human Resource Development minister Kapil Sibal asked the National Council for Educational Research and Training (NCERT) to withdraw the political science textbook for class XI, Indian Constitution at Work (2006)—produced within the National Curriculum Framework 2005 (a major attempt to reverse the much criticized National Curriculum Framework 2000)—after an uproar in both houses of parliament. Several members of parliament found that a cartoon in the textbook, made in 1949 by cartoonist Shankar, was denigrating and demanded its immediate withdrawal. It showed Jawaharlal Nehru with a whip chasing dalit leader Bharat Radna Ambedkar (1891–1956) sitting on a snail named “constitution,” an allusion to the slow speed with which the constitution was being drafted. The entire series to which the textbook belonged was effectively withdrawn from distribution. Sociologists Yogendra Yadav and Suhas Palshikar, head of the political science department at the University of Pune, resigned from their posts as chief advisers of the NCERT textbook committee. On 12 May 2012, Palshikar’s university office was ransacked. The Republican Panthers Party of India (affiliated to the Republican Party of India led by Ramdas Athawale) claimed responsibility for the attack. On 14 May 2012, members of parliament from various political parties demanded that cartoons be banned from textbooks altogether. Sibal welcomed the resignation of Yadav and Palshikar, apologized for the textbooks and declared: “We believe textbooks are not the place where these issues [cartoons] should be influencing impressionable minds. That is our position...I found many of the cartoons in textbooks offensive.” An inquiry committee set up by the government to look into the textbook use of cartoons would submit its report on 15 June 2012. The government would also conduct an inquiry into the role of those who sanctioned the inclusion of the “offending” material in the textbooks. Meanwhile, over 150 cartoons had been listed as offensive.

[Sources: “1949 to 2006, How Time Warps Sense of Humour” (<http://www.dnaindia.com>; 12 May 2012); The Hindu (12 & 14 & 16 & 23 & 29 May 2012); Hindustan Times (19 May 2012); Times of India (15 May 2012); “In Defence of Critical Pedagogy” (Petition to Kapil Sibal; goo.gl/TXe2q; 18 May 2012); Sanne van der Kaaij, personal communication (May–June 2012).]

Perpetrators of past enforced disappearances, extrajudicial executions and other human rights violations in Punjab (in 1984 and 1994), Assam (in 1998 and 2001), Nagaland and Manipur continued to evade justice.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012).]

Kashmir

Impunity prevailed for human rights violations in Kashmir, including unlawful killings, torture and the disappearance of thousands of people during the armed conflict (1989–present). In September 2011, a police investigation by the Jammu and Kashmir State Human Rights Commission (SHRC) found 2,730 bodies dumped into unmarked graves at 38 sites in north Kashmir. At least 574 were identified as the bodies of local Kashmiris. The SHRC asked the state authorities to use DNA profiling and other forensic techniques to identify the remaining bodies. The government had previously said that the graves held unidentified militants, most of them Pakistanis whose bodies had been handed over to village authorities for burial. Many Kashmiris believed that some graves contained the bodies of victims of enforced disappearances. The government of Jammu and Kashmir promised an investigation, but the identification and prosecution of perpetrators would require the cooperation of army and federal paramilitary forces. In the past, these forces resisted fair investigations and prosecutions, claiming immunity under the Armed Forces Special Powers Act and section 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 26, 173; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 329.]

Gujarat

Almost a decade after the 2002 riots which killed about 2,000 Muslims in Gujarat, the first convictions were announced. In March 2011, a Gujarat special court sentenced 11 people to death and 20 others to life for an arson attack on the Sabarmati express train which killed 59 Hindu pilgrims and triggered the riots. In November 2011, a Gujarat special court sentenced 31 of the 73 accused of the Sardarpura massacre—which killed 33 Muslims—to life imprisonment. This was the first of 10 major cases being monitored directly by India's Supreme Court. Those working to ensure justice for the victims of past violations in Gujarat continued to face harassment. In January, Teesta Setalvad of the Center for Justice and Peace and a team of lawyers defending the rights of victims and their families were harassed by Gujarat police, who charged them with concocting evidence about a mass grave of victims.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 173–174.]

See also Bangladesh.

INDONESIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In January 2011, the Opera Tan Malaka, made by composer Tony Prabowo and poet Goenawan Mohamad was banned from East Javan local television stations in Kediri (the town where Tan Malaka [?1894–1949] was probably shot), Surabaya, Batu, Malang, and Sumenep after visits from the police, intelligence officers or the military, apparently because the opera was considered to hold a leftist message amenable to disturb security and order in the community. The two-hour opera contained a scene in which communist symbols (the red flag with hammer and sickle), banned since 1965, were shown. The national station Metro TV canceled the program on the day it was scheduled. The opera had been performed in Jakarta in October 2010.

[Sources: Jakarta Post (25 October 2010, 11 January 2011); Historisch nieuwsblad (June 2011), 27; Opera Tan Malaka Banned (<http://www.engagemedia.org>; 28 January 2011).]

In June 2011, President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono appointed his brother-in-law Lieutenant-General Pramono Edhie Wibowo as the new army chief. Pramono commanded a Kopassus team (Army Special Force Command) that was deployed to East Timor in 1999. During that time, in the run up to a referendum on independence, pro-Indonesia militias or security forces killed more than 1,000 civilians.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 335.]

On 19 October 2011, a peaceful pro-independence celebration attended by at least 1,000 Papuans was held in Jayapura the capital of Papua province; five leaders of the celebration were charged with treason and sentenced to three years' imprisonment for raising the outlawed separatist flag and declaring the region's independence.

[Sources: Amnesty International, The Wire (October/November 2011), 41, no. 5 (insert); Ifex Alert (21 March 2012); Keesings historisch archief (2012), 178.]

The Attorney General's office failed to act on cases of serious human rights violations submitted by the National Human Rights Commission (Komnas HAM). These included crimes against humanity committed by members of the security forces. A Memorandum of Understanding between Komnas HAM and the Timor-Leste Provedor (Ombudsman for Human Rights and Justice) which called for, among other things, information on people who disappeared in 1999 in Timor-Leste, lapsed in January 2011 and was renewed in November 2011. No progress was reported. The government had yet to implement the 2009 recommendations of parliament to investigate and prosecute those responsible for the abduction and enforced disappearance of 13 political activists in 1997–1998.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 176–177, 335.]

See also Timor-Leste.

IRAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In Khuzestan, dozens of members of the Ahwazi Arab minority were said to have been killed before and during demonstrations in April 2011 to commemorate protests in 2005.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 178.]

See also Argentina, Morocco / Western Sahara.

IRAQ

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The Supreme Iraqi Criminal Tribunal (SICT) continued to try former senior Ba'ath and army officials associated with Saddam Hussain's rule (1979–2033) who were accused of war crimes, crimes against humanity and other offenses. The court, whose independence and impartiality had been undermined by political interference, imposed several death sentences. On 21 April 2011, Hadi Hassuni, 'Abd Hassan al-Majid and Farouq Hijazi, all former senior intelligence officers, were sentenced to death for the murder of Taleb al-Suhail, an opposition leader, in 1994 in Lebanon. The court's Appellate Chamber upheld the sentences, but at the end of 2011 they were still awaiting ratification by the Presidency. On 6 June 2012, 'Aziz Saleh al-Numan, a former senior Ba'ath party official, was sentenced to death after he was found guilty of crimes against humanity in connection with the suppression of the 1991 Shi'a uprising in southern Iraq.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 183.]

See also United Kingdom.

IRELAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

ISRAEL

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In January 2011, Israel's Turkel Commission concluded that Israeli forces had not violated international humanitarian law when they attacked a Gaza-bound aid flotilla in May 2010 and killed nine Turkish nationals, but failed to account for the nine deaths.

The authorities again took no steps to conduct credible, independent investigations into alleged war crimes and possible crimes against humanity committed by Israeli forces during Operation "Cast Lead" in 2008–2009, in which hundreds of Palestinian civilians were killed, although a few military police investigations into specific incidents continued.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 186, 188.]

In March 2011, the Knesset passed the so-called "Nakba Law," under which public funding would be denied to institutions that marked Nakba Day, debased "the honor of the flag or the state emblem" or expressed views rejecting Israel's existence as "Jewish and democratic."

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 189; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 575.]

On 15 May 2011, according to the United Nations, seven Palestinian refugees were killed and 111 people were injured when Israeli troops fired on Palestinian refugees and others who had gathered at the Lebanese border to commemorate Nakba Day, some of whom attempted to cross into Israel.

As Palestinians in the West Bank and Arab Israelis inside the Green Line planned to commemorate Nakba Day, the ultrarightist student group Im Tirtzu launched a campaign accompanied by a 70-page booklet written by film director Erez Tadmor and describing the Nakba as "a lie" and a catastrophe for which the Arabs themselves were responsible by refusing to accept the 1947 United Nations partition plan. On 15 May 2011, dozens of Im Tirtzu activists gathered outside the offices of UNRWA (United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East) in Jerusalem. Because of its attacks of democratic criticism, Im Tirtzu was described as a McCarthyite movement. It called itself after Theodor Herzl's phrase "Im tirtzu, ain zo agada" (If you will it, it is no dream).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 212; Haaretz (2 July 2010); Jerusalem

Post (13 May 2011); Wikipedia (15 June 2011).]

In July 2011, senior archaeologists criticized a proposal by Culture and Sports Minister Limor Livnat to amend the Antiquities Authority Law, ostensibly in order to change the make-up of the Israel Antiquities Authority's board of directors. They maintained that it was a move to prevent the appointment of Yoram Tsafir, one of Israel's foremost archaeologists and a member of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities, as board director. Tsafir was considered a leftist for having spoken out against the involvement of Elad, an organization identified with the political right, in excavations of the City of David in Jerusalem. The senior archaeologists also criticized the recent appointment of three archaeologists in the Archaeological Council (a body advising the board director and the minister) because all three were known for their work in excavations funded by Elad in East Jerusalem.

[Source: Haaretz (11 July 2011).]

In December 2011, the security department of Tel Aviv University (TAU) wrote to lecturers in the history, philosophy and literature departments requesting details about students who carried out protest activities on campus. A YouTube video clip was attached to the letter, showing students urging their friends to join the social protest they were planning at TAU. Students and lecturers accused TAU of resorting to "secret police" methods and oppressing student debate groups on campus.

[Source: Haaretz (22 December 2011).]

On 5 June 2012, Knesset legal adviser Eyal Yinon prevented thirty Knesset members, including Alex Miller, the head of the Knesset's Education Committee, from introducing a motion that would make holding Nakba Day events at universities illegal or a criminal offense. Yinon called the motion unconstitutional and undemocratic. He also rejected another motion put forward by Knesset member Ahmad Tibi to block funding for public institutions if they denied Nakba Day as a "real historical event." The motions came after Nakba Day events at Tel Aviv University on 14 May 2012, in which hundreds of students marked the Nakba. The university's decision to allow the ceremony had caused an uproar on campus and in the Knesset.

[Source: Times of Israel (17 June 2012).]

See also Palestinian Authority, United States of America.

ITALY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In April 2011, Gabriella Carlucci, member of parliament for the Popolo della libertà (PdL; The People of Freedom, Silvio Berlusconi's center-right political party), proposed to establish a parliamentary commission of inquiry to evaluate the impartiality of textbooks, especially history textbooks. She declared that "communist textbooks threw mud at Berlusconi." The draft law was widely criticized and not accepted.

[Source: "Communist Textbooks Throw Mud on Berlusconi" (<http://www.allvoices.com/contributed-news/8771908-communist-textbooks-throw-mud-on-berlusconi>; 13 April 2011).]

See also Germany.

IVORY COAST (Côte d'Ivoire)

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The capture of President (and historian) Laurent Gbagbo and his wife Simone in April 2011 began a wave of arrests against the former regime's military and political leaders. As of late 2011, military and civilian prosecutors had brought charges against at least 118 of these officials, including Gbagbo. The civilian prosecutor primarily limited the charges to economic crimes and crimes against the state—including charges against Gbagbo—whereas the military prosecutor included charges for murder, rape, and other violent crimes. In stark contrast, as of late 2011, not a single member of the forces loyal to President Alassane Ouattara had been charged for crimes committed during the postelection crisis.

In October 2011, the pretrial chamber of the International Criminal Court (ICC) authorized an investigation into crimes against humanity and war crimes perpetrated by both sides in Ivory Coast, limited to the postelectoral crisis since 28 November 2010. The temporal restriction drew criticism from many, including a coalition of Ivorian civil society organizations that stressed the importance of investigations going back to 2002, given the gravity, scale, and complete impunity for these crimes. In October 2011, the pretrial chamber authorized the prosecutor's investigation into the postelection crimes and requested that he provide further information on crimes committed between 2002 and 2010 to determine possible expansion of the investigation. In response, the prosecutor detailed specific incidents that may also amount to crimes falling under ICC jurisdiction, including the use of child soldiers. Although not a state party to the Rome Statute, the Ivorian government under Gbagbo had accepted ICC jurisdiction in April 2003. In October 2011, during a visit to Ivory Coast, the ICC prosecutor stated that between three and six people carrying the greatest responsibility for crimes under international law committed in Ivory Coast would be investigated. In November 2011, former President (and historian) Laurent Gbagbo was transferred to the ICC in The Hague, Netherlands, following the issuing of an arrest warrant. To preserve its credibility, the ICC had to ensure that crimes committed by pro-Ouattara forces were also investigated and individuals prosecuted.

In September 2011, a national Truth, Reconciliation and Dialogue Commission (DTRC) was officially inaugurated by Ouattara but had not begun its work by the end of 2011. Former Prime Minister Charles Konan Banny became the DTRC president. The DTRC's potential efficacy was undermined by inadequate consultation with the Ivorian civil society, lack of independence from the presidency, an unclear relationship with prosecution efforts, and ill-defined powers. The president also established a national commission of inquiry to provide conclusions on how and why massive human rights violations occurred. The commission, which began its work on 13 September 2011 and had a six-month mandate that could be extended for another six months, was tasked with identifying individuals who should be subject to criminal prosecution. However, the nomination of a commissioner perceived to be close to the president, as well as the process that created the commission, raised concerns about its independence from the presidency and commitment to faithfully and impartially investigate abuses perpetrated by both sides.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 3, 117, 118; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 98–101.]

JAPAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 30 March 2011, the Japanese government announced newly approved textbooks for middle school students. The textbooks emphasized Japan's claim of sovereignty over the Dokdo islets. This created a stir in Korea.

[Source: Sun So-young, "A Way Forward for Korea-Japan Relations" (Korea Joongang Daily, 10 June 2011).]

On 30 August 2011, the Constitutional Court of South Korea ruled it unconstitutional for the South Korean government to make no tangible effort to settle disputes with Japan over reparations for survivors of Japan's military sexual slavery system. Japan continued to refuse to compensate Korean women mobilized as sex slaves before and during World War II. The Constitutional Court noted that South Korea violated the basic rights of the former "comfort women" with its inaction. In October 2011, the South Korean government raised the issue of Japan's military sexual slavery system at the United Nations, saying that "this systematic rape and sexual slavery constitute[d] war crimes and also, under defined circumstances, crimes against humanity." The Japanese government responded that all issues had been settled under treaties. On 14 December 2011, activists and survivors in Seoul, South Korea, demonstrated for the 1,000th time in front of the Japanese embassy, in a weekly protest that began in 1992.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 195–196.]

See also Korea.

JORDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2004.

KAZAKHSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

On 16 December 2011, in the worst confrontation in recent history, celebrations of the 20th anniversary of Kazakhstan's independence in the south-western oil city of Zhanaozen were marred by violent clashes between protesters and police. At least 15 people were killed and more than 100 seriously injured. Officials reported 42 buildings burned down or destroyed, including the town hall. President Nursultan Nazarbaev imposed a 20-day state of emergency in Zhanaozen, sent in military reinforcements and set up a special commission to investigate the violence. All communications with the town were temporarily cut off. Nazarbaev, who visited the city on 22 December 2011, blamed the violence on "young hooligans" who had taken advantage of the dissatisfaction and anger of the striking workers to destroy and loot public and private property. He said that security forces had acted strictly within the law. However, the Prosecutor General's Office opened a criminal investigation into the use of force by security forces after video footage of the events was released. It also invited the United Nations to join an impartial investigation into the violence.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 199.]

KENYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Although the government stated several times that investigations were continuing into crimes and human rights violations, including possible crimes against humanity, allegedly committed during the postelection violence of 2007–2008, steps were not taken to bring perpetrators to justice. The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), in its Concluding Observations issued in April 2011, expressed concern that perpetrators of sexual and gender-based violence, including rape and gang rapes committed during the postelection violence, remained unpunished.

On 8 March 2011, the International Criminal Court (ICC) summonsed six Kenyan citizens believed to be responsible for crimes against humanity committed during the postelection violence. In April 2011, the six men appeared before the ICC in two separate cases. Confirmation hearings were conducted by the pretrial chamber in September and October 2011 to determine whether there was evidence to refer the cases to full trial. The ICC decision was pending at the end of 2011. In April 2011, the government had requested that the cases be declared inadmissible before the ICC, because amendments to Kenyan law, including the adoption of a new constitution and the enactment of the International Crimes Act, meant that “national courts were now capable of trying crimes from the postelection violence, including the ICC cases.” The ICC pretrial chamber rejected the application, maintaining that it had no evidence of ongoing investigation and prosecution of the six suspects, and that a promise to carry these out could not be used to pre-empt ICC jurisdiction over the cases. In March 2011, the government unsuccessfully sought a consideration by the United Nations Security Council for a deferral of the ICC cases. The government did not act on a parliamentary motion passed in December 2010 that urged it to start Kenya’s withdrawal from the Rome Statute and to repeal the International Crimes Act which incorporated the statute into Kenyan law.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 201–202; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 134–135.]

The Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC) conducted country-wide public hearings where individuals testified about alleged human rights violations, the impact of grand corruption, land injustices and other human rights violations committed in Kenya from 1963 to 2008. The TJRC planned to conclude these hearings by the end of January 2012, and conduct thematic hearings during February and March 2011. The final report documenting its findings and recommendations was planned for May 2012. TJRC work was hampered by insufficient funding. A tribunal appointed to investigate allegations into the credibility of the TJRC Chair had not started its work by the end of 2011; this was due to a pending court case filed by the Chair to stop the tribunal from investigating his alleged complicity in committing past human rights violations that were the subject of the TJRC’s mandate. The Chair remained suspended throughout 2011.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 202; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 135–136.]

See also United Kingdom.

KOREA, NORTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

See Japan.

KOREA, SOUTH

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

During Japan's colonization of the Korean peninsula (1910–45), 1205 volumes of documents, including the royal records of Korea's Joseon Dynasty (1392–1897), were taken to Japan. In 2012 the records would be returned.

[Human Rights Working Group of the International Council on Archives, News of June 2011, 4.]

The ruling Saenuri Party withdrew its selection of Lee Young-jo, former head of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (KTRC), as a candidate for the National Assembly elections in April 2012 amid growing criticism of his alleged “distortion of modern Korean history.” Lee had labeled the Gwangju Democratization Movement on 18 May 1980 as the “Gwangju Rebellion” and the Jeju Uprising of 3 April 1948 (which resulted in the deaths of some 30,000 to 60,000 people in factional fighting) as the “Jeju Revolt.” Experts said that these two civic movements were not acts of illegitimate violence but selfdefense after the repression of a peaceful protest against martial law in the former case and civil war in the latter. Lee refused to apologize for his remarks. Former KTRC employees sued Lee for abusing his authority because he had suspended the distribution of the English version of Historical Background of Korea's Past Settlement, written by historian Ahn Byung-ook (head of the KTRC before Lee). They claimed that, as head of the KTRC, Lee had banned the book because it maintained that the Korean Army, the police and right-wing organizations were responsible for the deaths of innocent civilians.

[Source: Korea Times (14 March 2012).]

See also Japan.

KOSOVO

See Serbia / Kosovo.

KUWAIT

Last Annual Report entry: 2005.

KYRGYZSTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Investigators and prosecutors failed to investigate and prosecute the vast majority of crimes against ethnic Uzbeks committed during and since the June 2010 violence, including crimes against humanity committed in Osh. In at least 200 documented cases of murders committed during the violence, either no criminal investigation was opened or the proceedings were suspended. However, many relatives were reluctant to follow up on the murders for fear of reprisals.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 38, 211.]

LATVIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

LEBANON

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In March 2011, as part of the United Nations Human Rights Council's Universal Periodic Review process, the government pledged to establish a national commission to investigate the fate of the thousands of Lebanese and other nationals who "disappeared" during and after the Lebanese civil war (1975–1990) and to ratify the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of all Persons from Enforced Disappearances. However, the government took no steps to fulfill these pledges. An official joint Syrian-Lebanese committee established in May 2005 to investigate cases of Lebanese who "disappeared" at the hands of Syrian security forces had not published any findings as of late 2011.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 214; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 592–593.]

The Special Tribunal for Lebanon, established by the United Nations Security Council to try those accused of assassinating former Prime Minister Rafic Hariri in 2005 and related crimes, issued its first indictments in June 2011 against four members of Hizbullah. The four were not arrested, and the pretrial chamber was seeking to initiate in absentia proceedings. The government's ongoing support for the tribunal was in doubt as leading parliamentary blocs, including Hizbollah and the Free Patriotic Movement, criticized the tribunal.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 212–213; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 593.]

See also Iraq, Israel.

LIBERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

No progress was made in bringing to justice people responsible for serious human rights violations and abuses during the years of armed conflict and violence (1979–2003). The recommendation of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) that a criminal tribunal be established to prosecute people identified as responsible for crimes under international law was not implemented, nor were most TRC recommendations on legal and other institutional reforms, accountability, and reparations. [Sources include: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 215.]

See also Sierra Leone.

LIBYA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Before its downfall in October 2011, Colonel al-Gaddafi's government took no steps to investigate past gross human rights violations or bring to justice those responsible. The National Transitional Council (NTC), that took over power, vowed to do so, but struggled to secure key evidence, such as archived material and government records, some of which had been burned and looted. In June 2011, the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued arrest warrants against al-Gaddafi, his son Saif al-Islam al-Gaddafi and security chief Abdallah al-Senussi for alleged crimes against humanity, including murder and persecution. Saif al-Islam was captured in November 2011. Despite statements by the NTC that it would seek to prosecute him before Libyan courts, by the end of 2011 no application had been made to the ICC challenging its jurisdiction.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 221.]

In [August] 2011, Human Rights Watch (HRW) discovered tens of thousands of archived documents containing evidence of crimes committed during Colonel Muammar Gaddafi's rule (1969–2011). The documents were found in the office of Musa Kusa, Gaddafi's former intelligence chief. In collaboration with the National Transitional Council (NTC), HRW attempted to secure the building and to keep the documents safe so they could be used as evidence in court. Among the files were documents confirming that both the United States Central Intelligence Agency and the United Kingdom's MI6 sent terrorism suspects to Libya for detention—despite Libya's notorious record for torturing prisoners.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, "Secret Intelligence Documents Discovered in Libya: Files Show Intimate Relationship between CIA, MI6, and Libya" (8 September 2011).]

On 24 February 2012, an Islamist armed group smashed the graves of British and Italian soldiers killed during World War II in Benghazi Military Cemetery in protest against the burning of the Koran by United States soldiers in Afghanistan. During World War II, British and Commonwealth troops fought heavy battles against German and Italian forces in Lybia.

[Source: C. Lowe, “British and Italian War Graves Desecrated in Libya in anti-Christian Outburst,” Reuters (4 March 2012).]

In early May 2012, the National Transitional Council adopted a broad new law that banned criticism of the 2011 revolution and the distribution of false news or “propaganda” that endangered the state, including glorification of deposed leader Gaddafi and his regime. The law included sanctions up to life imprisonment. International human rights groups demanded to repeal the law.

[Source: Ifex Communiqué (9 May 2012).]

LITHUANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

MACEDONIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In July 2011, parliament adopted a new interpretation of the 2002 Amnesty Law, which had granted amnesty to those involved in the 2001 armed conflict except in cases taken under the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). This interpretation stated that four war crimes cases returned in 2008 from the ICTY to Macedonia could only be prosecuted by the ICTY and not by domestic courts—in violation of Macedonia’s international obligations. As a result, Skopje Criminal Court dismissed the “Mavrovo” road workers case at the request of the Public Prosecutor in September 2011. In 2001 the road workers were allegedly abducted, ill-treated, sexually abused and threatened with death before release by the ethnic Albanian National Liberation Army (NLA). The court granted the victims leave to claim compensation in civil proceedings. The remaining cases were annulled by the end of October 2011. The “NLA Leadership” case included charges against Ali Ahmeti, leader of the ethnic Albanian Democratic Union for Integration (DUI), then leader of the NLA. Another case, “Neprosteno,” alleged the abduction of 12 ethnic Macedonians and one Bulgarian by the NLA. Impunity continued for the enforced disappearance in 2001 of six ethnic Albanians by the Macedonian authorities.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 38, 222.]

MALAYSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

See United Kingdom.

MALAWI

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In October 2011, the government faced widespread international criticism and condemnation by local and international civil society groups when it invited and hosted Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir at the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (COMESA) summit in Lilongwe. Despite being a state party to the International Criminal Court (ICC), Malawi did not arrest al-Bashir—who was wanted by the court on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes—upon his arrival in the country. Three ICC member states—Djibouti, Chad, and Malawi—welcomed al-Bashir to their territories, flouting their obligation to arrest him. China also welcomed him. The European Union, United States, United Kingdom, Germany, and France criticized the visits and urged Sudan and other states to cooperate with the court, including in the surrender of ICC suspects. Malaysia cancelled an anticipated visit by al-Bashir after public outcry.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 142, 184.]

MALDIVES

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

MALI

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

MALTA

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In February 1994, the English-language Sunday Times of Malta published a letter of journalist John Anthony Mizzi (1925–) to the editor in which he commented on the authorities' plans to build a yacht marina in the inner part of St. Paul's bay. The article discussed the history behind the project in passing, saying that when Sir Paul Boffa (1890–1962) was prime minister of Malta (1947–1950), permission was given to build on the bay "because Dr Boffa wanted to build there." The son and heir of Boffa sued Mizzi for defamation; he argued that the statement attributed false intentions to his father. The case went up all the way to Strasbourg, where the European Court of Human Rights ruled in November 2011 that Mizzi's right to freedom of expression was violated. It found that Mizzi's statement was not necessarily done with malicious intent, that it was a detail in an article which dealt with an entirely different subject, that Boffa was a public figure who had to tolerate broader limits of acceptable criticism and that the fact that he had died more than three decades before the article had been published made the possible damage to his reputation less serious.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, John Anthony Mizzi versus Malta: Judgment

(<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/241.pdf>; 22 November 2011).]

MAURITANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

MAURITIUS

Last Annual Report entry: —.

In December 2011, the Ministry of Tertiary Education announced that it might cancel courses in anthropology, history, international affairs and political science at the University of Mauritius, because they did not offer students job opportunities at the end of their studies. Vijaya Teelock, an historian and vice-president of the Truth and Justice Commission (TJC) criticized the plan, saying that the TJC had recently submitted a document in which it recommended compensation for slaves' descendants and emphasized the importance of the teaching of the history of Mauritius.

[Source: G. Gouges, "Mauritius: State Might Cancel 'Useless' Courses," University World News (18 December 2011).]

MEXICO

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

There was no action to ensure justice for the victims of gross human rights violations committed during Mexico's "dirty war" (1964–1982). Legal action against those responsible for grave human rights violations during the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s remained stalled.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 13, 234.]

See also Colombia.

MOLDOVA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

MONGOLIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

MONTENEGRO

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Verdicts in war crimes cases were inconsistent with international human rights and humanitarian law. Senior officials were rarely indicted. In April 2011, the retrial began of six former Yugoslav People's Army reservists, convicted in 2010 of war crimes against prisoners of war in Morinj camp in 1991–1992. This followed an appeal by the prosecution, which argued that the court had failed to consider the charges of war crimes against civilians detained in Morinj who had also been subject to torture and inhumane treatment.

In June 2011, appeals were lodged against the acquittal in March 2011 of nine former police officers and government officials who allegedly participated in the enforced disappearance of 79 Bosniak refugees in May–June 1992. They were acquitted of war crimes on the basis of the Podgorica Superior Court's flawed interpretation of international humanitarian law. Also in June 2011, the December 2010 verdict acquitting seven army and police reservists of crimes against humanity in their systematic ill-treatment of Bosniak civilians in Bukovica in 1992–1993 was overturned on appeal.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 241.]

MOROCCO / WESTERN SAHARA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The authorities failed to implement key recommendations made by the Equity and Reconciliation Commission in its November 2005 report. Victims continued to be denied effective access to justice for gross violations of human rights committed between Morocco's independence in 1956 and the death of King Hassan II in 1999.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 244.]

The Polisario Front took no measures to end impunity for those accused of committing human rights abuses in the 1970s and 1980s at the Tindouf camps controlled by the Polisario Front in Algeria's Mhiriz region.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 244.]

On 2 February 2012, the authorities confiscated an issue of the French magazine Le Nouvel observateur after it had published a French-Iranian article on Persepolis, a French animated film about the suffering of an Iranian family following the Iranian revolution in 1979 and the main character's subsequent exile to France. It included the picture of a scene showing a representation of God. On 3 April 2012, the director of the Tunisian satellite TV Nesma, Nébil Karoui, was fined in Tunis on public order and public morality grounds for showing the film dubbed into Arabic. It contained a scene showing a representation of God, which was seen as blasphemous in Sunni Islam.

[Sources: Arabic Network for Human Rights Information, Ifex Alert (2 February 2012); NRC Handelsblad (4 May 2012) 13.]

MYANMAR (BURMA)

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In February 2012, writer Aung Kyaw San, imprisoned during two years for doing volunteer work helping search for and burying corpses in the aftermath of Cyclone Nargis, was released. While in prison, he translated books by Burmese historian Than Tun (1923–2005) and he planned to publish the books, along with some books by dissident writer Ludu Daw Amar (1915–2008).

[Source: Mizzima News, Ifex Alert (2 February 2012).]

Government officials and military personnel who committed human rights violations, including some on a widespread or systematic basis, remained free from prosecution. Article 445 of the 2008 constitution codified total impunity for past violations. In September 2011, President Thein Sein appointed a National Human Rights Commission whose mandate included receiving and investigating human rights complaints, but the justice system continued to demonstrate a lack of impartiality and independence from the government. In January 2011, the government stated that there was “no widespread occurrence of human rights violations with impunity” in Myanmar.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 248.]

NAMIBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

NEPAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Nepal continued to backtrack on commitments to hold perpetrators of human rights abuses accountable before the law. Political parties in government actively subverted justice by demanding the withdrawal of criminal charges in hundreds of cases, including for serious human rights violations committed during the armed conflict (1996–2006). The United Nations Mission in Nepal, tasked with monitoring the 2006 Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA), ended operations in January 2011, but key elements of the CPA remained unfulfilled. Elected Prime Minister in February 2011, Jhala Nath Khanal resigned on 14 August 2011 after failing to make progress on the peace process, including seeing through the drafting of a new constitution. Baburam Bhattarai, vice chairperson of the Unified Communist Party of Nepal (Maoist) succeeded him, ultimately overseeing the extension of the mandate of the Constituent Assembly to 27 May 2012, and pledging to oversee completion of the new constitution.

Article 5 of Nepal's CPA provided for the creation of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission to investigate alleged human rights violations and crimes against humanity committed during the armed conflict. However, drafting of a bill to create the commission had yet to be completed. The government continued to make interim payments to families of "conflict victims," but failed to fulfil victims' rights to truth and justice. The government had yet to set up a commission to investigate thousands of enforced disappearances by parties to the conflict, despite promising to do so by September 2011.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 250; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 347–348.]

NETHERLANDS

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

From 2009, political activist Roel van Duijn (1943–), former founder of the anarchist movement

Provo in Amsterdam (1965–1967) and of the protest movement Kabouters (1969–74; Dwarfs), and member of several peace movements and left-wing and green political parties, tried to get access to the files that for decades the secret service Algemene Inlichtingen- en Veiligheidsdienst (BVD/AIVD) had kept on him, in order to write his memoirs. The AIVD granted access to the files encompassing the years 1962–1982 but rejected the request for later files on grounds of “source protection.” Van Duijn sued the AIVD to get an apology for what he considered a privacy invasion and to gain access to the files. On 16 February 2011, the judge ruled that source protection was not a valid reason for nondisclosure of police and public prosecutor files and that, in addition, there was no legal ground to deny Van Duijn access to files in which he was mentioned as an organizer. The judge, however, ordered the AIVD only to reconsider Van Duijn’s request to see the files. On 7 March 2011, Van Duijn appealed to the Council of State. On 21 December 2011, the Council of State ruled that the Interior Ministry had to give access to Van Duijn to the pre-1982 files but not to later files because access to later files could obstruct the work of the AIVD. In 2012 Van Duijn’s autobiography was eventually published as Diepvriesfiguur; autobiografie van PD106043 in samenwerking met de AIVD (Deepfreeze figure: autobiography of PD106043 in collaboration with the AIVD; Amsterdam).

[Sources: Rechtbank ’s-Gravenhage, Roel van Duijn versus Minister van Binnenlandse Zaken en Koninkrijksrelaties (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/214.pdf>; 2011); Keesings historisch archief (2012), 24; NRC Handelsblad (11–12 June 2011), 43; Volkskrant (16 February 2011); De Pers (7 March 2011).]

In July 2011, the appeals court in The Hague ruled that the government had been responsible for the deaths of three Bosnian Muslims during the 1995 Srebrenica genocide in Bosnia and Herzegovina. The court ruled that Dutch troops had forced the three to leave a “safe area,” effectively handing them over to Bosnian Serb forces, who in July 1995 went on to kill some 8,000 Bosnian Muslim men and boys.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 252.]

When on 29 February 2012, British historian Tom Holland (1968–), author of the book In The Shadow Of The Sword: The Battle for Global Empire and the End of the Ancient World (2012), gave a lecture about the seventh-century origins of Islam and the Quran, in the Cultural Center De Balie in Amsterdam, extra security measures were deemed necessary (In December 2011 a meeting in De Balie had been disrupted by Muslim extremists).

[Source: Wordt wervolgd (April 2012), 19.]

On 1 May 2012, the court in Haarlem ruled that Minister of Security and Justice Ivo Opstelten had acted responsibly in not disclosing to historian Jan de Roos (1) most of the criminal records (dating from 1947–1948) of convicted Dutch-German SS member and war criminal Klaas Carel Faber (1922–2012), (2) all of the (recent) correspondence with Germany about the case, (3) all of the letters and emails from citizens to the minister about the case, and (4) the ministry’s internal memos about the case. The reasons given were the following: (1) an exemption from the Wet Openbaarheid Bestuur (Freedom of Information Act) for criminal personal data, (2) the possibility of harming relations with Germany, (3) privacy, and (4) personal policy views of politicians. The court also ruled that (1) the names of witnesses and victims named in the judgments of the criminal cases and (3) the anonymized responses of the minister could be disclosed. De Roos wrote a biography about Faber who had been sentenced to death (later commuted to life imprisonment) but who in 1952 had escaped to Germany. [Source: Rechtbank Haarlem, Jan de Roos versus Minister of Security and Justice: Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/256.pdf>; 2012).]

NEW ZEALAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2007.

NICARAGUA

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

See United States of America.

NIGER

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

NIGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The authorities still had not prosecuted members of the police and military for the unlawful killing of more than 130 people during the November 2008 sectarian violence in Plateau State, the soldiers who massacred more than 200 people in Benue State in 2001, or the members of the military involved in the complete destruction of the town of Odi, Bayelsa State, in 1999.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 146.]

NORWAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

In April 2011, the Supreme Court confirmed the verdict against Mirsad Repak, a naturalized Norwegian citizen who served in the Croatian Defense Forces and who had been found guilty of “deprivation of liberty” during the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina (1992–1995). In its decision, the Supreme Court increased his sentence to eight years’ imprisonment due to the extremely serious nature of the crime.

In May 2011, a 45-year-old Rwandan national was arrested and charged with participation in the genocide in Rwanda in April 1994. The National Criminal Investigation Service, KRIPOS, had been investigating the case since 2008, following an international arrest order issued by the Rwandan authorities. He remained in custody at the end of 2011. A decision on whether to prosecute him in Norway was expected in 2012. On 24 November 2011, the Supreme Court ruled that a 58-year-old Rwandan national could be extradited from Norway to Rwanda to face charges of participation in the genocide there in 1994.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 260.]

OMAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

PAKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

A study from 2011 pointed out that the role of religious minorities (Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs, Christians) was ignored in the history curriculum. Many teachers saw non-Muslims as “enemies of Islam.” Some historical figures, such as Bhagat Singh, a Sikh who fought against colonial rulers, were omitted, as were significant contributions of some minority groups. The textbooks that were reviewed in the study frequently omitted references to the Hindu and Buddhist dynasties that once presided over modern-day Pakistan or in cases when they did refer to them, tended to focus on the negative aspects of non-Muslim societies or overemphasize the conditions that led to their downfall. A 2006 curricular guidelines reform in the public schools had not yet been implemented at the textbook level. The existing textbooks were reprinted with only minor adjustments.

[Sources: United States Commission on International Religious Freedom (Azhar Hussain & Ahmad Salim, with Arif Naveed), Connecting the Dots: Education and Religious Discrimination in Pakistan: A Study of Public Schools and Madrassas (Washington 2011), 13, 15, 26, 29, 47, 119; Washington Post (9 November 2011).]

See also Bangladesh, India.

PALESTINIAN AUTHORITY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The Hamas authorities failed to investigate alleged war crimes and possible crimes against humanity committed by Hamas’s military wing and other Palestinian armed groups in Gaza during Operation “Cast Lead.” (See Israel).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 267.]

See also Israel.

PANAMA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

When General Manuel Noriega, Panama's military dictator from 1983 to 1989, was ousted during an American invasion called Operation Just Cause, 15,000 boxes of documents from Noriega's offices and the Panamanian Defense Forces (including letters, bank account statements, secret police files and intelligence reports) were seized and transferred to the United States as evidence for Noriega's drug-trafficking trial or for showing connections between Noriega and the Central Intelligence Agency. After Noriega's trial in 1992 (during which scant use was made of the documents), the documents were forgotten. When Noriega was about to go back to Panama in 2011, there were calls to return the archives.

In December 2011, France effectively extradited Noriega who was serving a prison sentence for money laundering. In 2010, Noriega had finished serving a 20-year sentence for drug trafficking, money laundering and racketeering in the United States. During this time, Panamanian courts had tried and convicted him in his absence for the killing of political opponents, including Major Moises Giroldi Vera, the leader of a failed coup attempt in October 1989, and Hugo Spadafora, former Deputy Minister for Health in 1985, as well as for other offenses including unlawful detention. He was also due to stand trial for the enforced disappearance and execution in 1970 of Heliodoro Portugal, a trade union activist. Noriega's role in many other human rights violations committed both during and before his rule had yet to be investigated.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 13, 268; D. Cox, "The Noriega File," Los Angeles Times (5 October 2011).]

PARAGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In July 2011, Norberto Atilio Bianco, an army doctor at the Campo de Mayo clandestine detention center in Argentina in the 1970s, was extradited from Paraguay for a second time to face charges of appropriating babies born to women who had been victims of unlawful detention and enforced disappearance. In September 2011, the authorities reported that the remains found in a grave excavated in a police station in Asunción might be those of victims of human rights violations under the military government of General Alfredo Stroessner (1954–1989). The report of the Truth and Justice Commission published in August 2008 stated that at least 59 people had been executed and another 336 detainees were the victim of enforced disappearance during the period of military rule.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 270.]

PERU

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission had estimated that almost 70,000 people died or were subject to enforced disappearances during the country's internal armed conflict (1980–2000). Many were victims of atrocities committed by the Shining Path and other insurgent groups, as well as human rights violations by state agents. Efforts to prosecute those responsible for these abuses had mixed results. In August 2011, the Constitutional Tribunal rejected former President Alberto Fujimori's appeal requesting annulment of the verdict of a Supreme Court panel that had unanimously confirmed his 25-year prison sentence for killings and "disappearances" in 1991 and 1992. In July 2011, amid rumors that Fujimori might have cancer, politicians linked to President Alan García's political party and presidential candidate Keiko Fujimori advocated that he receive a "humanitarian pardon," but he continued to serve his sentence. Progress in other cases was slow. According to the Institute for Legal Defense (IDL), a human rights organization that monitored trials, by December 2010 the National Criminal Court—which was given jurisdiction in many human rights cases in 2004—had handed down only 20 sentences, of which 85 percent were acquittals. The only sentence of note by another court was the conviction of 19 former military personnel for kidnapping and killing 35 victims in three different incidents during Fujimori's government. A major obstacle was the military's failure to cooperate by identifying officers present at army bases during the conflict. The low conviction rate also reflected the National Criminal Court's insistence that there be direct and documentary proof of the responsibility of superior officers, and its unwillingness to credit the testimony of victims' relatives. Senior officials of García's administration, including the minister of defense and the vice-president, frequently criticized human rights trials. In August 2010, García had signed a decree that would have halted prosecutions in many cases by applying a statute of limitations. He later withdrew it after intense domestic and international criticism. Officials of the new government of Ollanta Humala (a former army colonel), elected in June 2011, also opposed human rights trials, including the Minister of Defense, retired General Daniel Mora, who said in a September 2011 radio interview: "I think that we should arrive at a full-stop solution and reconciliation of the country."

In June 2011, the executive promulgated a decree establishing the amount of reparations to be granted to individual victims of the armed conflict registered on the official Victims' Registry and stating that the process of determining the beneficiaries would close at the end of 2011. Organizations representing the victims rejected the ruling on various grounds.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 271; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 273–274.]

PHILIPPINES

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Hundreds of cases of enforced disappearance remained unresolved. According to figures released in August 2011 by Families of Victims of Involuntary Disappearance, the average number of enforced disappearances per year had barely changed since the overthrow of Ferdinand Marcos in 1986. There were 875 documented cases during his 21-year rule, compared with 945 in the 25 years since. In July 2011, the Senate passed a landmark bill to criminalize enforced disappearances. The bill, first filed in 1995, remained pending in the House of Representatives.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 272–273.]

POLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

See Russia.

QATAR

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

ROMANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2008.

RUSSIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 3 May 2011, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the right to fair trial of Igor Sutyagin [see NCH Annual Report 2010] had been violated on account of the length of his detention pending investigation and trial and on account of the length of the criminal proceedings. In addition, it held that the trial court had not been independent and impartial.

[Sources: European Court of Human Rights, Sutyagin versus Russia <http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/210.pdf>; Index on Censorship (2011, no. 4), 178; Keesings historisch archief (2011), 261.]

On 14 June 2011, in a trial that began in September 2010, Oleg Orlov [see NCH Annual Report 2010], chairman of the Memorial Human Rights Center was acquitted. The court decision was appealed a week later and appeal hearings started in October 2011, but libel was decriminalized later in 2011 and the charges were dropped. On 14 July 2011, Memorial, the International Federation of Human Rights, and Novaya Gazeta published a report on shortcomings in the official investigation of human rights activist and historian Natalia Estemirova's murder [see NCH Annual Report 2011]. These shortcomings included a failure to interview key witnesses, a failure to thoroughly analyze DNA material collected from Estemirova's body, and a failure to place at-risk witnesses under protection). Following its publication, the Head of the Investigation Committee promised that all possible leads in her murder would be explored, but he had not disclosed any new information by the end of 2011.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 281; Human Rights Watch, Ifex Alert (17 June 2011); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 479–480; Human Rights Watch, "Russia: Fully Investigate Estemirova's Murder" (14 July 2011); International PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 30 June 2011 (London 2011), 65.]

In September 2011, the closed trial of Mikhail Suprun, a professor of history and head of the history department at Pomorsky State University, Arkhangelsk, and police Colonel Aleksandr Dudarev (=Dudaryev), head of the archives of the Arkhangelsk Regional Ministry of Internal Affairs, before a first-instance court in Arkhangelsk [see NCH Annual Report 2011] began. On 8 December 2011, Suprun was found guilty but not punished because of statutes of limitations. Dudarev received a suspended sentence. The Suprun case had chilling effects: a regional archivist in the Altai region declared that he would be cautious in offering declassified records to researchers and a historian in the Komi region said that his plan to publish a list of political prisoners of the local concentration camp was in jeopardy because his access to the personal data of these prisoners was severely limited. The motives for the Suprun case remained unclear although official unwillingness to study the Stalinist repression and fear that memory books such as the one Suprun was working on could elicit compensation claims were mentioned.

[Sources: Inna Kremen, “Memory still under Investigation” (<http://www.svobodainfo.org>; 21 October 2011); Inna Kremen, “The Suprun Case—Or the Case of Russian Archives?” (<http://www.svobodainfo.org>; 31 October 2011); “Russian Historian On Trial For Violating Privacy Laws” (Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty; 18 October 2011); Johannes Vosswinkel, “Es bleibt Familiengeheimnis,” Die Zeit (2 February 2012).]

In early April 2012, school notebooks featuring a portrait of the Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin sparked controversy after going on sale as part of the series “Famous Russians.”

[Source: BBC News (4 April 2012).]

On 12 June 2012, thousands of Russian antigovernment protesters took part in a major rally (dubbed “The March of the Millions”) in Moscow calling for President Vladimir Putin’s resignation and for new elections to be held. Police searched the home of several opposition leaders on the eve of the rally, which triggered a wave of protest from Russian bloggers, who compared the actions to those of Stalin’s secret police in the 1930s. “Hello 1937” was the top Russian-language Twitter trend on 11 June, although few suggested that the searches resulted in anything resembling Stalin’s purges of 1937–1938.

[Sources: BBC News (11 June 2012); Ifex Communiqué (13 June 2012).]

In 2007 and 2009, fifteen Polish nationals—relatives of twelve victims of the 1940 Katyń war massacre—complained to the European Court of Human Rights that Russia’s investigation into the massacre and into the circumstances surrounding the deaths of the 1940 victims between 1990 and 2004 had been ineffective; that they themselves had not been recognized as victims by Russian courts and had not had access to any information about it; that their requests for rehabilitation of the 1940 victims had been rejected; and that the Russian authorities had displayed a dismissive attitude to all their requests. The court held that Russia had failed to cooperate with it by refusing to provide a copy of its (classified) decision to discontinue the investigation in 2004. It further found that it could not examine the adequacy of the Russian investigation because it was unable to establish a genuine connection between the deaths of the victims in 1940 and the ratification, 58 years later, of the European Convention of Human Rights by Russia. It recalled, however, the duty of states to investigate effectively unlawful or suspicious deaths, in particular when forming part of war crimes which international customary law already prohibited in 1940. The court finally found that ten of the applicants (one widow and nine children) had been the closest relatives of the 1940 victims and could therefore claim to be victims themselves of a violation of article 3 of the convention (prohibition of inhuman treatment). The court found that they had suffered a double trauma: losing their relatives in the war and not being allowed to learn the truth about their death for more than fifty years because of the distortion of historical facts by the Soviet and Polish communist authorities. In addition, they had not been given access to the investigation records not had they otherwise been officially informed. As for the five remaining applicants, the court thought they had never had personal contact with their missing fathers or other relatives, as a result of which the anguish they had experienced could not be examined under article 3. The court was struck by Russia's reluctance to recognize the Katyń massacre. The approach chosen by the Russian military courts to maintain, to the applicants' face and contrary to the established historic facts, that their relatives had somehow vanished in the Soviet camps, demonstrated a callous disregard for the applicants' concerns and deliberate obfuscation of the circumstances of the Katyń massacre. Furthermore, the Russian prosecutors had consistently rejected the applicants' requests for rehabilitation of their relatives, claiming that it was not possible to determine the specific legal basis for the repression against the Polish prisoners as the relevant files had disappeared. The court found that a denial of the reality of the mass murder, reinforced by the implied suggestion that the Polish prisoners might have been duly sentenced to death, demonstrated an attitude lacking in humanity. Furthermore, Russia had not made any serious attempts to account for the circumstances of their deaths and the location of their graves. The court also decided that the finding of a violation of article 3 constituted sufficient just satisfaction for the applicants.

[Source: European Court of Human Rights, Janowiec and Others versus Russia: Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/259.pdf>; 2102).]

See also Bulgaria, Georgia.

RWANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Community-based gacaca courts, which had tried more than 1.2 million genocide-related cases since 2005, had almost completed their work by the end of 2011. They left behind a mixed legacy, with a number of positive achievements—including the swift work of the courts, the extensive participation of the local population, and the revelation of information about events during 1994— alongside violations of the right to a fair trial, intimidation of witnesses, corruption of judges and other parties, and political interference. As gacaca prepared to close, the government was considering how to handle applications for reviewing gacaca courts' decisions. A new law determining how further allegations of involvement in the 1994 genocide would be investigated and prosecuted before ordinary courts was yet to be brought to parliament.

Numerous judgments were handed down by the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) during 2011, although nine indictees remained at large. The ICTR was due to close in 2012. In December 2011, the ICTR Appeals Chamber upheld the decision to transfer the case of Jean Uwinkindi to Rwanda. The ruling cited Rwanda's expressed intention to introduce legislation that would allow foreign judges to sit on transferred cases. It would be the first genocide case to be transferred or extradited to Rwanda.

Judicial proceedings against genocide suspects took place in Finland, Germany and Spain. The extradition requested by France and Spain of Kayumba Nyamwasa, a Rwandese national allegedly responsible for crimes against humanity committed in Rwanda, was still pending in South Africa, where he was granted asylum in 2010. Rwanda's request for extradition was turned down by the South African authorities. The European Court of Human Rights ruled in October 2011 that Sylvère Ahorugeze could be extradited from Sweden to Rwanda. Sweden had previously released Ahorugeze due to the length of his pretrial detention. Failure to impose effective safeguards for his appearance at trial meant that the rights to justice of Rwandan genocide victims could not be guaranteed. Norway ruled to extradite Charles Bandora. The case was subject to an appeal.

There were no investigations or prosecutions for allegations of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed by the Rwandan Patriotic Army in 1994 in Rwanda, and gross human rights violations by Rwandan armed forces in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as documented in the United Nations mapping report.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 285, 286; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 150, 154–155.]

See also Chad, Congo (Democratic Republic), Finland, Germany, Norway.

SAUDI ARABIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

SENEGAL

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Chad.

SERBIA / KOSOVO

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 26 May 2011, former Bosnian Serb General Ratko Mladić, wanted among other things for the 1995 genocide of 8,000 men and boys in Srebrenica, was arrested in Vojvodina. On 20 July 2011, Croatian Serb Goran Hadžić, the last remaining suspect wanted by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), was also detained in Serbia. In his visit to Serbia in September 2011, ICTY Chief Prosecutor Serge Brammertz commended the Serbian government for arresting Mladić and Hadžić, but also stressed the importance of Serbia's technical cooperation with the ICTY regarding ongoing trials. Additionally, he underlined the importance of regional cooperation in prosecuting war criminals. In October 2011, the European Commission (EC) recommended that Serbia be granted European Union (EU) candidate status. In December 2011, the European Council deferred their decision on Serbia's candidacy to February 2012, conditional on Serbia reaching an agreement on cooperation with Kosovo.

In August 2011, the partial retrial at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) of Ramush Haradinaj, former Kosovo prime minister, and Idriz Balaj and Lahi Brahimaj, Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) commanders, began on charges related to wartime prisoner abuse at a KLA detention facility. The retrial was ordered because of the threat that witness intimidation had posed to the trial's integrity, but once again, a key prosecution witness refused to testify.

Proceedings continued at Belgrade Special War Crimes Chamber in relation to war crimes in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia and Kosovo (1991–1995). No progress was made in the identification of further grave sites in Serbia. In March 2011, the United Nations Human Rights Committee urged the authorities to “urgently take action to establish the exact circumstances, which led to the burial of hundreds of people in Batajnica region [in 1999],” to ensure that all those responsible were prosecuted, and that relatives received adequate compensation.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 31, 291–292; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 488.]

Kosovo

The Rule of Law and Police Mission in Kosovo (EULEX) established a Brussels-based Task Force, headed by the former Head of the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK)’s Department of Justice. It aimed to investigate allegations in a report by Dick Marty adopted by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in January 2011, including that in 1999, Prime Minister Hashim Thaci and other members of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) had been responsible for the abduction, torture, ill-treatment and murder of Serb and Albanian civilians transferred to prison camps in Albania, some of whom were killed and their organs removed for trafficking. Some 1,799 missing people were still unaccounted for in November 2011. EULEX war crimes police investigated enforced disappearances, but lacked resources to effectively address the backlog of outstanding cases.

The Law on Missing Persons, promulgated in August 2011, applied to all persons reported missing up to December 2000, including Serbs and Roma abducted after the war. The law provided for the right of relatives to know the fate of their family members and for a database of missing persons. The Law on the Status and Rights of the Heroes, Invalids, Veterans and Members of the KLA, Families of Civilian Victims of War, adopted in December 2011, discriminated against the relatives of missing civilians, who received less than half the monthly compensation payable to the relatives of military victims.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 293–294; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 495–496.]

See also Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia.

SIERRA LEONE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 26 April 2012, former President of Liberia Charles Taylor was convicted on all counts of an eleven-count indictment which alleged that he was responsible for crimes committed by rebel forces during Sierra Leone’s civil war (1991–2002). In May 2012, he was sentenced to 50 years’ imprisonment. The Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) found unanimously that Taylor aided and abetted rebels of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) and the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) in the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity in Sierra Leone. The prosecutor had not alleged that Taylor had committed these crimes in person, but that he participated from Liberia in the commission of crimes by AFRC and RUF rebels and was individually responsible for them. The Chamber found that he had aided and abetted the rebels by providing them with arms and ammunition, military personnel, operational support and moral support, making him individually responsible for their crimes. He was not charged with crimes committed in Liberia, as the competence of the SCSL was limited to crimes committed in Sierra Leone.

The SCSL was the first “hybrid” tribunal, created by an agreement between the United Nations (UN) and the government of Sierra Leone. It was also the first modern court to have its seat in the country where the crimes took place and the first court to convict former rebel and militia leaders for the use of child soldiers, for forced marriage as a crime against humanity, and for attacks directed at UN peacekeepers.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 215, 295; National Security Archive, Press Release (26 April 2012); Special Court for Special Court for Sierra Leone (Outreach and Public Affairs Office), Press Release (26 April 2012).]

See also Liberia.

SINGAPORE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

SLOVAKIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

SLOVENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Despite some positive measures, the authorities failed to guarantee the rights of former permanent residents of Slovenia originating from other former Yugoslav republics (known as the “erased”), whose legal status was unlawfully revoked in 1992. Some of them were also forcibly removed from the country. In March 2011, the parliament adopted a law which allowed for restoration of permanent residency status to the majority of the “erased.” The introduction of the law was an important first step toward full restoration of their rights. However, it failed to provide them with reparation for the human rights violations they suffered. The authorities also failed to present further plans for full restoration of the rights of the “erased,” and a large number of people were excluded from provisions of the law. In July 2010 the European Court of Human Rights had ruled that the “erasure” of applicants’ identity had violated their rights to remedy, to family and to private life.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 301.]

SOMALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2006.

The United Nations (UN) independent expert on Somalia and some other key international actors recognized that accountability for past abuses in Somalia was crucial to establishing a meaningful and inclusive peace process, but they had not prioritized this issue. Such accountability efforts should include documenting abuses since the end of the Siad Barre regime in 1991 and, ultimately, a UN commission of inquiry into war crimes committed since then.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 163–164.]

See also Uganda.

SOUTH AFRICA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 12 September 2011, the High Court in Johannesburg convicted the Youth League President of the African National Congress (ANC), Julius Malema. The lobby group AfriForum had sued him claiming his singing of the revolutionary song “Dubula iBhunu” (Zulu for “Shoot the Boer”) at political rallies constituted hate speech against the Afrikaners. Malema filed an appeal at the Supreme Court of Appeal. Meanwhile, he was expelled from the ANC in February 2012. Boer, an Afrikaans word for farmer, denoted the group of descendants of the Dutch-speaking settlers in South Africa.

[Sources: Ifex Alert (13 April 2010); Keesings historisch archief (2012), 189–190.]

See also Sudan.

SPAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 13 April 2010, relatives of two victims of enforced disappearance under the Franco regime launched a complaint in Argentina based on universal jurisdiction. A federal judge in Argentina asked the Spanish government whether the authorities were actively investigating the allegations of “physical elimination and the ‘legalized’ disappearance of children with loss of identity,” conducted between 1936 and 1977. In June 2011, the government replied to the Argentine judiciary that such investigations were indeed being conducted in Spain. The case was pending at the end of 2011.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 313.]

Investigations into 13 cases of alleged crimes under international law committed outside Spain against Spanish citizens, or based on the principle of universal jurisdiction, were pending before the National High Court. However, progress in the investigation was very slow and faced major challenges such as lack of cooperation by other states. In July 2011, Central Investigating Court No. 1 included charges of gender-based crimes in the investigations into the crimes of genocide, terrorism and torture which were perpetrated in Guatemala during the internal conflict (1960–1996).

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 313.]

On 20 September 2011, a judge of the First Recourse Tribunal in Madrid rejected a lawsuit brought forward by Juan Cotarelo García for allegedly defamatory statements expressed by deceased journalist Pablo Lizcano (1951–2009). In La generación del 56: La Universidad contra Franco (The 1956 Generation: the University against Franco; Leer/Documentos publishing house; first edition 1981; second edition 2006), a book about the student riots against Franco’s regime in Madrid in February 1956, Lizcano had quoted press reports from the 1950s stating that Cotarelo’s mother (–2002) had an affair with a police chief during the Franco dictatorship. Cotarelo filed the lawsuit in February 2008, two years after Leer Magazine published a second edition identical to the original one. Invoking the 1966 Press Law still in force, Cotarelo demanded that the book be recalled and the sentence be published in four newspapers. In addition, he asked damages from Lizcano’s widow, Rosa Montero, and from the publishing house Leer/Documentos (the publishing arm of Leer Magazine). In his decision, Judge Fontán Silva rejected the lawsuit because the statute of limitations had expired 27 years after the first original edition was published. In addition, Cotarelo had not taken advantage of Lizcano's offer to correct any possible mistakes before the second edition was released. Cotarelo would appeal the decision.

[Sources: Wikipedia (11 October 2011); World Press Freedom Committee, Ifex Alert (30 September 2011).]

Beginning in January 2012, judge Baltasar Garzón (1955–) went to trial at the Supreme Court in three distinct cases, including one in which two pro-Franco organizations accused him of criminal malfeasance (prevaricación) when ordering the investigation into the crimes of the Franco era. On 27 February 2012, the Supreme Court ruled (six to one) that, although Garzón had no authority to open the Franco era case, he had not abused his power. It recognized the legitimacy of the demands by relatives of the victims but argued that they should be addressed to historians, not judges. It also said that the 1977 Amnesty Law was still valid. In one of the other cases, Garzón was dismissed from office for eleven years for abuse of power; the third case was annulled.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 313; BBC News (17 January 2012); Human Rights Watch, "Spain: Garzón Trial Threatens Human Rights" (13 January 2012); International Center for Transitional Justice, "Spain Declares Itself Powerless" (9 March 2012); Keesings historisch archief (2012), 116–117; NRC Handelsblad (27 February 2012) 4.]

See also El Salvador.

SRI LANKA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The aftermath of the quarter century-long civil war (1983–2009), which ended in May 2009 with the defeat of the separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), continued to dominate events in 2011. No progress was made toward justice for the extensive violations of the laws of war committed by both sides, including the government's indiscriminate shelling of civilians and the LTTE's use of thousands of civilians as "human shields" in the final months of the conflict. In April 2011, United Nations (UN) Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon released a report by the Panel of Experts on Accountability in Sri Lanka. It concluded that both government forces and the LTTE had conducted military operations "with flagrant disregard for the protection, rights, welfare and lives of civilians and failed to respect the norms of international law." The panel recommended the establishment of an international investigative mechanism. The European Parliament adopted a resolution in May 2011 urging Sri Lanka to immediately investigate the allegations. Even India, which had largely stayed silent on alleged abuses in Sri Lanka, added to the pressure when it called for investigations. Also in May 2011, the UN Special Rapporteur on Extrajudicial, Summary, or Arbitrary Executions called on the government to investigate “textbook examples of extrajudicial executions,” following a review of evidence related to government execution of prisoners. In September 2011, Ban Ki-moon submitted the panel report to the Human Rights Council (HRC) and, acting on one of the report’s recommendations, announced that the UN would undertake a separate inquiry into its own actions in Sri Lanka during the final months of the war. The HRC failed to act and did not yet take steps toward establishing an international accountability mechanism, the main recommendation in the report. Sri Lankan officials responded by vilifying the report and the panel members. The government failed to conduct credible investigations into alleged war crimes by security forces, dismissing the overwhelming body of evidence as LTTE propaganda. The government’s Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission (LLRC), characterized as a national accountability mechanism, was deeply flawed, did not meet international standards for such commissions and failed to systematically inquire into alleged abuses. The government repeatedly extended the deadline for the LLRC. The LLRC mandate focused on the breakdown of the 2002 ceasefire between the government and the LTTE, and did not explicitly require it to investigate alleged war crimes during the conflict. It heard testimony but undertook no investigations into such allegations. The LLRC’s final report, made public on 16 December 2011, acknowledged serious human rights problems in Sri Lanka, but fell short of fully addressing allegations of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed during the final phases of the conflict. The report failed to properly investigate the role of government forces in the attacks on thousands of civilians during the final stages of the conflict. The government stated that the report would be made public but did not indicate when it would do so. The government did not act on the LLRC’s preliminary recommendations. In August 2011, the defense ministry issued a report, conceding for the first time that government forces caused civilian deaths in the final months of the conflict, but taking no responsibility for laws of war violations and concluding peremptorily without further investigation that the deaths were the unfortunate collateral damage of war.

In November 2011, former Army Commander Sarath Fonseka was sentenced to three years’ imprisonment for “inciting communal hatred.” He had alleged that the defense minister had ordered the killing of surrendering LTTE cadres at the end of the war.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 26–27, 315–316; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 388–389, 392–393.]

Enforced disappearances continued to be reported, and thousands of cases from earlier years remained unresolved. The government failed to ratify the 2006 International Convention against Enforced

Disappearance. In January 2011, witnesses appeared before the Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission (LLRC) in Mannar and Madhu, trying to find loved ones seen surrendering to the army in May 2009. On 30 June 2011, hundreds of demonstrators in the capital Colombo demanded to know the fate and whereabouts of missing family members they believed were abducted by government squads. Similarly, over 1,300 people approached newly opened Terrorist Investigation Department information centers in June, seeking information on missing relatives believed to be in government custody; few found answers. The Sri Lankan Police Department reported in July that 1,700 people had been abducted since 2009, most of them for ransom.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 314–315.]

SUDAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The government remained uncooperative with the International Criminal Court (ICC) regarding arrest warrants issued against President Omar al-Bashir in 2009 and 2010, as well as against Ahmed Haroun, governor of Southern Kordofan, and Ali Mohammed Ali Abdelrahman (known as Ali Kushayb), a former Janjaweed militia leader, in 2007. A further arrest warrant was requested on 2 December 2011 by the ICC chief prosecutor for Minister of Defense Abdelrahim Mohamed Hussein. In January 2011, the African Union (AU) reaffirmed its decision not to cooperate with the ICC in the arrest of al-Bashir, but it did not obtain sufficient support for its call that the United Nations (UN) Security Council defer the case for 12 months by invoking Article 16 of the Rome Statute. In July 2011, the AU reiterated its support for countries that had not arrested al-Bashir. In December, the ICC pretrial chamber referred the fact that Malawi and Chad did not arrest President al-Bashir to the UN Security Council and the Assembly of States Parties to the Rome Statute. Despite the appointment of several special prosecutors for Darfur, Sudan did little to promote accountability and made none of the justice reforms recommended by the AU High-level Panel on Darfur, headed by former South Africa President Thabo Mbeki, in its 2009 report.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 4, 317; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 184.]

See also Malawi.

SURINAME

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 25 February 2011, the twenty-first anniversary of the so-called sergeant's coup of 25 February 1980, President Desi Bouterse (who was the coup leader in 1980) announced that 25 February would become a "day of liberation and renovation" in order to prevent historical falsification. Those involved in the coup received a decoration. The opposition said that the military committed several crimes and that a "day of national mourning and reflection" would be preferable.

[Sources: Keesings historisch archief (2011), 220.]

On 28 July 2011, President Desi Bouterse was infuriated because the education ministry had published a new history textbook Wij en ons verleden (We and our past) for the sixth grade of primary school which contained a photograph taken shortly after the 1982 December Murders, in which a Dutch demonstrator during a protest rally held up a sign calling Bouterse a murderer. Bouterse was also enraged for the negative way in which his 1980 coup was portrayed; he called it a falsification of history. Historian Maurits Hassankhan commented on the affair that there was no conclusive evidence yet that Bouterse had given the order to arrest and kill the fifteen victims of the December Murders, as the textbook seemed to suggest. The previous government, led by Ronald Venetiaan of the New Front, had commissioned a new version of the textbook series that had been used for years. After it lost the elections in 2010, the successor government, led by Bouterse of the National Democratic Party (NDP), accused it of deliberate falsification of history. Minister of education officials said that the photo slipped through the control by the ministry and the permanent parliamentary committee on education (on which two NDP members sat). Minister of Education Raymond Sapoen ordered the confiscation of the 20,000 copies of the textbook which were already printed and promised to publish the textbook with the contentious passages revised before the start of the new school year. Bouterse, however, demanded the dismissal of ministry of education director Robert Soentik, held responsible for printing the textbook. Soentik took absent leave from the ministry.

[Sources: "Politiek bemoeide zich al eerder met geschiedschrijving" (Radio Nederland Wereldomroep Suriname; 3 August 2011); "Bouterse boos over foto schoolboek" (<http://nos.nl>; 28 July 2011); "Bouterse eist ontslag om geschiedenisboek," Het Parool (28 July 2011); S. Hira, "Wij en ons verleden," StarNieuws (<http://www.starnieuws.com/index.php/welcome/index/nieuwsitem/6794>; 15 August 2011); Keesings historisch archief (2012), 123.]

SWAZILAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

SWEDEN

Last Annual Report entry: 1998.

SWITZERLAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

SYRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 2 October 2011, late in the evening, Mohammad al-Omar, a history professor at Aleppo University, was shot on his way to the university along with Saria Hassoun, the son of Grand Mufti Ahmed Hassoun, in an ambush by what was variously called “an armed terrorist group” and “unknown assailants” while driving to the university on the highway between Aleppo and Idlib (near Ebla University). The deaths came amid signs of growing violence during the uprising which had started in March 2011.

[Sources: BBC News (3 October 2011); Day Press (3 October 2011); Global Times (3 October 2011); Syrian Arab News Agency (3 October 2011).]

The authorities did not take any steps to investigate and hold accountable those responsible for gross violations committed in previous years, including thousands of enforced disappearances and killings of prisoners at Saydnaya Military Prison in July 2008.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 328.]

See also Lebanon.

TAIWAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In a letter published in the Chinese-language United Daily News on 21 February 2012, former Premier Hau Pei-tsun questioned whether the number of those killed during the 228 Incident (the rebellion of 28 February 1947 against the rule of Nationalist Chinese Governor-General Chen Yi, which was crushed by Nationalist forces; between 18,000 and 28,000 people were estimated to have been killed in the incident) reached over 10,000,” a figure given in a local textbook. This sparked outrage among the descendants of the victims. On 28 February 2012, over 1,000 citizens, civic group members and families of 228 Incident victims demonstrated to call greater attention to the government crackdown that occurred 65 years ago. The protesters also called on the Kuomintang to provide documents about the 228 Incident in the Party History Institute of the Academia Historica to further research into the issue. Since the 1990s, the various Kuomintang administrations had initiated measures to compensate the victims and their families and set up monuments to commemorate the incident.

[Source: “Civic Groups, 228 Victim Families Take to Streets” (Focus Taiwan News Channel; <http://focustaiwan.tw>; 28 February 2012).]

See also China.

TANZANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

See Canada, Finland.

THAILAND

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Although Thailand and Cambodia normalized their relations in August 2010, in February and April 2011, new skirmishes took place in the temple of Preah Vihear area, and also near the ancient temples Ta Krabey and Ta Moan. The temple of Preah Vihear site, constructed between the ninth and eleventh centuries and dedicated to Hindu deity Shiva, had been a royal Khmer site linked to Angkor Vat. On 18 July 2011, the International Court of Justice ordered both countries to withdraw their military personnel from the temple zone, but this was only partially adhered to.

[Sources: International Court of Justice, Case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear (Merits; Cambodia versus Thailand—Judgment of 15 June 1952 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/193.pdf>; 1962); International Court of Justice, Request for Interpretation of 1962 Judgment / Request for the Indication of Provisional Measures (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/240.pdf>; 2011); Keesings historisch archief (2009) 651–652; (2011) 36, 321–322; NRC Handelsblad (7 February 2011) 7.]

At least 90 people died and more than 2,000 were injured during violent political confrontations from March to May 2010. The loss of life resulted from the unnecessary use of lethal force by Thai security forces, attacks by armed elements operating in tandem with the supporters of the United Front for Democracy against Dictatorship (UDD), known as the “Red Shirts,” and incitement to violence by some UDD leaders. In January 2011, the Justice Ministry’s Department of Special Investigation (DSI) announced the results of preliminary investigations into the violence. The DSI implicated soldiers in 13 deaths, and armed UUD elements in another 12 deaths. But lack of police cooperation stalled efforts to initiate postmortem inquests and prosecutions. Prime Minister Yingluck Shinawatra (younger sister of exiled former Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra) vowed to end these delays after appointing General Prieupan Damapong, Thaksin’s brother-in-law, as national police chief in September 2011. The status of investigations into alleged crimes by UDD armed “Black Shirt” militants remained unclear, with the Yingluck government denying the group’s existence. A number of those accused of deadly attacks against soldiers, police officers, and anti-UDD groups were released on bail. The election of 12 senior UDD leaders as ruling Pheu Thai Party members of parliament raised serious concerns that they would be able to use their political influence and parliamentary immunity to evade accountability for their role in the 2010 violence.

Yingluck promised full support for the work of the Truth for Reconciliation Commission of Thailand (TRCT), established by the government of Abhisit Vejjajiva, to look into the political violence, but had yet to grant the TRCT subpoena power, rendering it unable to obtain complete information about security force deployment plans and operations, autopsy reports, witness testimony, photos, and military and police video footage. Nevertheless, the TRCT released its first two reports with recommendations. It found that the Abhisit government had pressured law enforcement officials to charge hundreds of ordinary UDD protesters with serious criminal offenses and hold them in pretrial detention for months without the possibility of bail. In September 2011, the government announced that it would review the charges against those protesters and ensure that they were treated in accordance with due process and human rights guarantees. The TRCT also recommended that a special mechanism be established to provide fair compensation and other remedies to all victims of abuse and political violence.

Progress in investigating criminal offenses committed by members of the People's Alliance for Democracy (PAD), known as the "Yellow Shirts," during protests in 2008 had also been slow. Additionally, the police officers and politicians believed responsible for the excessive use of force against PAD protesters rallying in front of the parliament on 7 October 2008, continued to enjoy impunity.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 332; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 394–396.]

On 26 May 2011, Joe Gordon (Thai name: Lerpong Wichaikhammat or Wichaikhampart) ([1956–]), of dual Thai and American nationality, was arrested by the Department of Special Investigation and accused of translating parts of Paul Handley's The King Never Smiles (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006; an unauthorized biography of King Bhumibol Adulyadej), posting a link on a blog to them and writing articles that defamed the royal family. He committed the alleged offense while in the United States. He was denied bail eight times. On 18 August 2011, he was charged with lèse majesté, inciting unrest and disobedience of the law in public, and disseminating computer data which threatened national security. Initially denying all charges, on 10 October 2011, he pleaded guilty. On 8 December 2011, Gordon was sentenced to five (later reduced by half) years' imprisonment.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 333; Bangkok Post (20 August & 2 September 2011); BBC News (1 June & 10 October 2011); BBC News (8 December 2011); "Joe Gordon Denied Bail in Lèse Majesté Case" (Political Prisoners in Thailand; 14 June 2011); "Update: Joe Gordon Charged with Lèse Majesté and U.S. Expresses Concern" (Political Prisoners in Thailand; 19 August 2011); N. Purnell, "Charge Against Professor Raises Questions About Academic Freedom in Thailand," Chronicle of Higher Education (1 June 2011).]

TIMOR-LESTE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In February 2011, the United Nations (UN) Security Council extended the mandate of the UN Integrated Mission in Timor-Leste by another year. That same month, the UN Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances visited Timor-Leste. Timor-Leste agreed to consider calls from five states to implement recommendations made by the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR). Impunity for human rights violations persisted despite ongoing investigations by the Serious Crimes Investigation Team. Victims, their families and Timorese NGOs continued to call for justice for human rights violations committed by Indonesian security forces between 1975 and 1999. Nevertheless, the government continued to promote reconciliation with Indonesia at the expense of justice. The majority of those accused of human rights violations were believed to be at large in Indonesia.

A debate on two draft laws establishing a National Reparations Program and an “Institute for Memory,” mandated to implement recommendations of the CAVR and the joint Indonesia-Timor-Leste Commission of Truth and Friendship (CTF), had yet to take place by the end of 2011 after parliament postponed it in February 2011.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 335.]

See also Indonesia.

TOGO

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

The Truth, Justice and Reconciliation Commission (TJRC), set up to shed light on human rights violations committed between 1958 and 2005, held hearings from September to November 2011. A total of 508 people were heard, selected from some 20,000 statements received. The initial hearings, in the capital Lomé and other towns, dealt primarily with the 1991 attack on the Primature (Prime Minister’s office) and some of the human rights violations committed during the 2005 presidential elections. One of the sessions in September 2011 was disrupted by the security forces in a clear attempt to intimidate TJRC members and witnesses.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 336–337.]

TUNISIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 29 June 2011, historian and human-rights activist Mohamed Talbi (1921–) was declared an apostate and threatened with death by Salafists extremists who accused him of having insulted Aisha, the second wife of the Prophet Mohammed, during a debate on private radio FM Shems. Talbi challenged the interpretation of his words by the Islamists. In June, Talbi had been appointed Chairman of the Academic Council of the Academy of Sciences, Humanities and Arts (Beyt al-Hikma) for the academic year 2011.

[Sources: NRC Handelsblad (17 October 2011), 11; R. Raza, “Tunisian Scholar Calls for Cancellation of Sharia Law” (AFP; 5 July 2011).]

The first interim government established a national commission to investigate abuses committed during the protests, which made public its preliminary conclusions on the abuses committed between 17 December 2010 and the end of January 2011. The commission identified 240 civilians killed during the uprising in towns and cities around Tunisia, most of them by police gunfire. In addition, it found that 1,464 were injured in the month-long protests, and scores of inmates perished in prison mutinies and fires between 13 and 16 January 2011. On 24 October 2011, the government promulgated a decree-law on the reparation for the victims of the uprising that provided for a monthly allocation and free access to public medical care and free public transport for them and their families.

On 14 September 2011, the office of the military prosecutor announced the filing of charges against former President Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali, the two ministers of interior who held office at the time of the uprising, and 40 other high officers within the state security apparatus for committing intentional homicide during the uprising. In the first of several trials initiated, the former president, his wife Leila Trabelsi, members of their families, and close allies of the couple were convicted of embezzlement and sentenced in absentia to 35 years’ imprisonment. While the interim authorities improved the military justice system, most importantly by adding the possibility of appellate review, they were slow to put in place long-needed reforms of the judiciary, which played a repressive role under Ben Ali.

The interior ministry set out a “road map” for reform of the police, but this included no provision for investigating and ensuring accountability for past violations of human rights by the police and the disbanded Department of State Security (DSS). It was unclear whether any vetting system was established to prevent former DSS or other security or police officials responsible for past human rights violations being appointed to or remaining in positions in which they could commit further abuses. No steps were taken to ensure accountability for the gross human rights violations committed during President Ben Ali’s 23 years in power. Families of victims complained that they were denied justice and that police, DSS and other officials responsible for previous human rights violations remained in their positions or had been transferred to new ones and even promoted. From May 2011, all cases relating to human rights violations committed during the uprising were referred to military courts.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 339, 340; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 633–634.]

The uprising of December 2010–January 2011 was accompanied by the destruction or theft of administrative documents thought to contain evidence of the corruption of the formerly presidential families Ben Ali and Trabelsi.

[Source: “Tunisie: Vol et destruction des documents administratifs” (24 January 2011; <http://www.webmanagercenter.com/management/imprim.php?id=100948&pg=1>).]

See also Morocco / Western Sahara

TURKEY

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In March 2009, Çiğdem Atakuman, editor of the popular science magazine Bilim ve Teknik (Science and Technology), was dismissed after he had planned to publish a cover story, which celebrated the 200th anniversary of Charles Darwin’s birth. The story was replaced by a feature on global warming. The cancelation was part of a series of conflicts between scientists and Islamic creationists in Turkey. Many of these conflicts were initiated by Adnan Oktar, who argued that evolution discredited Islam. Scientists also claimed that the creationist organization BAV intimidated critics of creationism.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2011, no. 4), 178.]

In January 2011, on the evening of the opening reception of the film Hur Adam: Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (The Free Man: Bediuzzaman Said Nursi), a group of twenty people, supporters of the ultra-Ataturkist National Party (Ulusal Parti), protested in front of the theater. They denounced the film, about the Muslim Kurdish scholar and political leader Said Nursi (1868–1960), who openly criticized the abolition of the caliphate and the exclusively Turkish character of the state, as “slander” of Atatürk. They also accused the director of producing propaganda for the Nurcu movement, the religious order which was inspired by Nursi’s publication the Risale-i Nur (Path of divine light) and led by Fethullah Gulen. Even before the launching of the film, in late December 2010, the chief state prosecutor in Ankara had filed a lawsuit against the production team “for insulting the spiritual personality of Atatürk and for inciting hatred and crime; for slander, terrorist propaganda and activities aiming at destroying the Turkish Republic.”

[Sources: Vangelis Kechriotis, “From Oblivion to Obsession: The Uses of History in Recent Public Debates in Turkey,” Historein, no. 11 (2011), 99–101; Delphine Strauss, “Sultan’s Love Life Opens Moral Rift,” Financial Times (15–16 January 2011), 2.]

In March 2011, former police officer Ayhan Çarkın spoke publicly for the first time and later testified before a prosecutor about his involvement in a special operations unit committing political assassinations of named Kurds and leftists in the 1990s. Çarkın alleged that the unit acted under government orders and with its collusion. In June 2011, he was remanded to prison pending trial after claiming involvement in four killings; the prosecutor's investigation continued as of late 2011. In September Mehmet Ağar—a former police chief, interior minister, and parliamentarian implicated in Çarkın's testimony—received a five-year prison sentence for forming an armed criminal gang involving state actors and mafia. Proceedings against Ağar began with the evidence of state-mafia activities, which were revealed after a 1996 traffic accident near Susurluk, western Turkey. Until 2007 Ağar was protected from prosecution by parliamentary immunity. He appealed the conviction and remained at liberty. Trials continued of alleged anti-AKP [the ruling Justice and Development Party] coup plotters, made up of senior retired military, police, mafia, journalists, and academics, and known as the “Ergenekon” gang. One of the most important advances in 2011 was circumstantial evidence pointing to Ergenekon gang involvement in the 2007 murder of three Christians in Malatya.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 506–508.]

In June 2011, Colonel Ali Öz and seven other military personnel were convicted of negligence for their failure to relay information regarding the plot to kill journalist and human rights defender Hrant Dink, which could have prevented his murder in 2007. On 25 July 2011, a juvenile court in Istanbul convicted Ogün Samast (1990–) and sentenced him to 22 years and 10 months' imprisonment for the “premeditated murder” of Dink. On 17 January 2012, a court sentenced Yasin Hayal to life imprisonment but acquitted 19 others (including ultranationalist militants and police and military officers) of a charge of being part of a terrorist group that instigated the murder.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 343; BBC News (17 January 2012); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 508; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 508; Index on Censorship (2012, no. 1), 129, 138; PEN, Half-Yearly Caselist to 30 June 2011 (London 2011), 69; International PEN Writers in Prison Committee, Rapid Action Network 41/11 (1 August 2011).]

On 23 November 2011, Prime Minister, Tayyip Erdogan apologized on behalf of the state for the first time for the killing of nearly 14,000 people in a campaign to crush a Kurdish rebellion in the southeastern region of Dersim (now Tunceli). The Dersim uprising, which took place between 1936 and 1938, was among the bloodiest domestic struggles of the early Turkish Republic.

[Sources: BBC News (23 November 2011); Institute for Historical Justice and Reconciliation, Bulletin (May 2012), 12; NRC Handelsblad (24 November 2011), 11, (25 November 2011), 11;]

On 25 October 2011, the European Court of Human Rights confirmed in the Taner Akçam case [see NCH Annual Report 2008 and NCH Annual Report 2011] that there was a considerable risk of prosecution faced by persons who expressed “unfavorable” opinions on the Armenian genocide and indicated that the threat hanging over Akçam was real. It reiterated what it had said in the Hrant Dink case: that the Turkish Court of Cassation sanctioned any opinion criticizing the official thesis on the Armenian issue. In particular, criticism of denial by State institutions of genocide claims in relation to the events of 1915 was interpreted as denigration or insulting “Turkishness” or the “Turkish nation.” Affirming the Armenian issue as “genocide” was considered by some (especially extremist or ultranationalist groups) as a denigration of “Turkishness.” The measures adopted to provide safeguards against arbitrary or unjustified prosecutions under Article 301 had not been sufficient. Article 301 did not meet the “quality of law” required by the court’s settled case-law, since its unacceptably broad terms resulted in a lack of foreseeability as to its effects. In view of that lack of foreseeability, the court concluded that the interference with Akçam’s freedom of expression had not been “prescribed by law,” in violation of Article 10 of the Convention.

[Sources: European Court of Human Rights, Taner Akçam versus Turkey: Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/231.pdf>; Strasbourg 2011); European Court of Human Rights, Dink versus Turkey: Judgment (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/171.pdf>; Strasbourg 2010).]

On 12 March 2012, reporter Nedim Şener [see NCH Annual Report 2011] was released pending his trial. On 16 March 2012, a message was posted on the social networking site Twitter about an alleged plot by the ultranationalist network Ergenekon to murder Şener and another investigative journalist, Ahmet Sik (1970–).

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 342; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 504; International PEN, “Day of the Imprisoned Writer (15 November 2011); Reporters without Borders, “Two Investigative Journalists Threatened on Twitter” (19 March 2012).]

On 28 October 2011, Büşra Ersanlı, a constitutional law expert, political scientist and historian at the political science department of Marmara University, Istanbul, publisher Ragip Zarakolu and dozens of others were arrested. The police spent hours searching her home. She was to attend a conference on “Controversial Issues in the History of the Turkish Republic” at Istanbul Bilgi University on 29 October 2011. The arrest was part of a larger crackdown initiated in 2009 against Kurdish political parties and called “Operation against the Union of Kurdistan Communities” (Koma Civaken Kurdistan; KCK). The KCK was seen as the (illegal) political wing of the outlawed armed Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), which was listed as a terrorist organization by Turkey. Among the organizations the authorities alleged to be linked to the KCK was the pro-Kurdish legal Peace and

Democracy Party (Barış ve Demokrasi Partisi; BDP), although the BDP itself denied any such links (and thirty BDP representatives took their seats in the Turkish parliament on 1 October 2011). At the time of her arrest, Ersanlı worked with the BDP's Constitutional Commission and she lectured to activists and officials of the BDP's Politics Academy. On 1 November 2011, Ersanlı was formally charged under the Anti-terror Law (a law criticized for its overbroad definition of terrorism). The author of the books "Peace and History" and "Political Power and History," Ersanlı wrote extensively on the history of Turkish historical writing since the foundation of the Turkish Republic. While she and Zarakolu were interrogated in the courthouse, hundreds of people, including many of Ersanlı's students, protested the wave of police custody. She was the victim of a slander campaign in some media circles. On 19 March 2012, the prosecutor charged Ersanlı with "leading an illegal organization" and demanded between 15 and 22.5 years for Ersanlı. According to the indictment, Ersanlı was in charge of all BDP-affiliated political academies across Turkey. In 1972, Ersanlı, then a student member in a nonviolent Maoist organization, had already been imprisoned by the junta for distributing leaflets opposing the military coup. After two and a half years, she had been released in 1974 after a general amnesty. Her old trials were reportedly used as a justification for her new trials. [Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 342; Bianet, "Prosecutor Demanded Arrest of Ersanlı and Zarakolu" (1 November 2011); Groupe international de travail 'Liberté de recherche et d'enseignement en Turquie,' "Une Situation critique pour la liberté de recherche et d'enseignement" (21 November 2011); Human Rights Watch, "Turkey: Arrests Expose Flawed Justice System: Academic, Publisher Held in Crackdown on Pro-Kurdish Party" (1 November 2011); Ifex Communiqué (2 November 2011); Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 504; Antonis Liakos, Personal communication (29 October 2011); International PEN, Rapid Action Network 56/11 (31 October & 1 & 9 November 2011, 23 March 2012); International PEN, "For the Sake of Freedom of Expression in Turkey, IPA and PEN International Demand Immediate Release of Publisher Ragıp Zarakolu" (Geneva / London, 15 November 2011); International PEN, "Letter from Turkish author Ipek Çalışlar" (5 April 2012); "Publisher Zarakolu among 15 Released Pending Trial in KCK Case," Today's Zaman (10 April 2012); "Urgent Appeal: Stop Arbitrary Detentions in Turkey!" (<http://www.ipetitions.com/petition/detentionsinturkey>); Vercihan Ziflioğlu, "Turkish Intellectuals Protest Arrest of Publisher," Hürriyet: Daily News & Economic Review (3 November 2011).]

See also France, Israel.

TURKMENISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Five years after the death of dictator Saparmurad Niyazov (1940–2006), President Gurbanguly Berdymukhamedov, his relatives and associates enjoyed unlimited power and total control over all aspects of public life in Turkmenistan. In 2010 and 2011 newspapers and other publications began to bestow on Berdymukhamedov the honorific title arkadag (patron), symbolizing the strengthening of his cult of personality. The only political party in Turkmenistan was the Democratic Party of Turkmenistan, led by Berdymukhamedov. The president did not fulfill his pledge to ensure adoption of a new law on political parties. In June 2011 Berdymukhamedov invited exiled political opposition leaders to return to Turkmenistan to run in the presidential election and promised to guarantee their safety. It was not clear whether this pledge would be honored, since key exiled leaders were convicted in absentia in closed trials years ago on embezzlement and treason charges.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 510.]

The authorities continued to withhold information about the whereabouts of dozens of people arrested and convicted in connection with the alleged 2002 assassination attempt on former President Saparmurad Niyazov.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 346.]

UGANDA

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

International Criminal Court arrest warrants issued in 2005 remained in force for Joseph Kony, the leader of the insurgent Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), and three LRA commanders. The men were still at large. The new International Crimes Division of the High Court (ICD), created following failed peace talks with the LRA in 2008, brought Uganda's first domestic war crimes prosecution. In July 2011, former LRA commander Thomas Kwoyelo faced 12 counts of grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and 53 counts of penal code violations—including murder, kidnapping, and aggravated robbery, destruction of property and other offenses committed as part of attacks that he had allegedly commanded during the conflict in northern Uganda. He denied the charges and applied to the Constitutional Court for an amnesty under the Amnesty Act of 2000. In September 2011, the court ruled that the Amnesty Act was constitutional and that Kwoyelo was entitled to an amnesty, consistent with those granted to thousands of other fighters who had later renounced conflict. The government appealed against the decision to the Supreme Court. The appeal hearing was pending at the end of 2011. However, the government did not repeal legal provisions which provided for amnesties for crimes under international law.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 347–348; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 194.]

UKRAINE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

UNITED KINGDOM

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In January 2011, the government was forced to admit that thousands of files (covering the period between the 1930s and the 1970s) had been massively and systematically selected and destroyed or secretly sent to the United Kingdom from many of its colonies (Aden, Anguilla, Bahamas, Basutoland [Lesotho], Bechuanaland [Botswana], British Indian Ocean Territories, Brunei, Cyprus, Kenya, Malaya, Sarawak and the Seychelles), prior to their independence. British colonial officials selected the “migrated files” (files sent for secret “migration” back to the United Kingdom), eventually using criteria set out in a 1961 memo by Secretary of State for the Colonies Iain Macleod (containing instructions to classify papers embarrassing for the British authorities according to unofficial classification categories, including removal, destruction and transfer to the United Kingdom). The aim was to deliberately remove incriminating evidence. In April 2011, a vast cache of documents was discovered (2000 boxes of more than 10,300 files containing official records from 37 former colonies, of which approximately 300 boxes containing more than 1500 files and filling 110 feet of shelving were related to Kenya) about efforts to put down the Mau Mau rebellion (1952–1956). Former Mau Mau detainees and their families had been told that the official and legal records had been lost or destroyed; historians were never granted access to them. On 18 April 2012, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) began releasing the first (1,200 records) of six tranches of the “migrated” files, coming from 12 former colonial territories; they covered such controversial episodes as the Mau Mau uprising in Kenya (1952–1956), the evacuation of the Chagos Islands and the Malayan Emergency (the 1948–1960 conflict with communist insurgents). However, many important files (particularly related to periods of emergency) were still missing. The migrated files contained nothing from some colonies, like British Guiana (although in the latter there had been intense British and American military and security intervention from 1953 to 1964).

[Sources: BBC News (21 July 2011; 18 April 2012); Caroline Elkins, “The Colonial Papers: FCO Transparency Is a Carefully Cultivated Myth,” Guardian (18 April 2012); Ben McIntyre, “50 Years Later: Britain’s Kenya Cover-Up Revealed,” Times (5 April 2011).]

On 22 November 2011, the court of appeal ruled that the Iraq Historical Allegations Team, established to investigate allegations of torture and other ill-treatment of Iraqi citizens by United Kingdom armed forces in Iraq, was not sufficiently independent to satisfy its investigatory obligation under the European Convention on Human Rights.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 354.]

Northern Ireland

In early June 2011, attorneys for Boston College submitted a motion to a federal judge in the United States to quash subpoenas made in early May 2011 by the British government (on behalf of the Police Service of Northern Ireland, PSNI, after a Historical Enquiries Team [HET] had reviewed cases). The British government investigated violent crimes, including murder charges, committed during the decades-long Troubles (1969–1998) in Northern Ireland, in particular the disappearance of at least nine people during the early 1970s who were thought to have informed for British authorities about the activities of republicans who were working to end British rule. Among them was Jean McConville, a widowed mother of ten suspected to be an informer who disappeared in Belfast in 1972 and whose remains were found in 2003. The British authorities sought access to parts of an oral history archive—known as the Belfast Project, stored by the Centre for Irish Programs at Boston College, and believed to contain some 30 oral histories from terrorists on both sides of the conflict—containing interviews with republican and loyalist paramilitaries in Northern Ireland about their experiences during the Troubles. The interviews were held on condition of confidentiality until after the interviewees' deaths. In particular, they sought information collected from two former Provisional Irish Republican Army members, Brendan Hughes (died 2008) and Dolours Price, both of whom had admitted carrying out bombings in England and Northern Ireland. In the interviews, they had accused Gerry Adams, the president of republican political party Sinn Fein, of running a secret cell within the Irish Republican Army (IRA) that carried out the kidnappings and disappearances; this was denied by Adams. The college turned over the Hughes interviews but not those with Price. It was feared that Price and one interviewer, Anthony McIntyre (a former IRA member who had been imprisoned in the North and who had a doctorate in history), were at particular risk for having violated the IRA's rule against talking about IRA activities. Previously, McIntyre had received death threats after a book based on the Hughes interview—Voices from the Grave by Ed Moloney, director of the project—was published in 2010. The attorneys said that by breaching the confidence pledge, potential interviewees in future oral history projects might decline to participate in such projects. However, on 2 July 2011, the United States Justice Department declared that researchers conducting oral history had no right to expect courts to respect confidentiality pledges made to interview subjects and that academic freedom was not a defense to protect the confidentiality of such documents. On 27 December 2011, district court judge William Young ordered that Boston College gave the interviews with Price (consisting of tapes, transcripts and DVDs) to United States prosecutors. The college complied under protest from Moloney and McIntyre. On 29 December 2011, lawyers representing Moloney and McIntyre filed an appeal in the United States district court saying Young's order violated academic freedom and endangered their lives. They also called to return or wipe the remaining tapes and close down the archive. They received a temporary postponement of the order.

[Sources: Liam Clarke, "Wipe Terror Tapes and Close Boston College Archive, Its Authors Urge," Belfast Telegraph (4 January 2012); Kevin Cullen, "US College Requests Quashing of Oral History Subpoenas," Irish Times (11 June 2011); Kevin Cullen, "US College Agrees to Give Interviews with Dolours Price to Prosecutors," Irish Times (30 December 2011); Scott Jaschik, "Oral History, Unprotected," Inside HigherEd (5 July 2011); Aaron Mackey, "College: Academics also Deserve Protection from Subpoenas," (The Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 10 June 2011); John Neuenschwander, A Guide to Oral History and the Law (Oxford 2009), 19–29, 105–111; New York Times (13 May 2011).]

The Police Ombudsman was severely criticized over his lack of independence during investigations into historical cases of police misconduct in unlawful killings. He announced that he would step down from his post in early 2012.

In September 2012, the Northern Ireland Executive announced proposals for the establishment of an inquiry to investigate historical institutional child abuse. There could, however, be a delay in providing the inquiry with a statutory basis, which might initially leave it without the necessary powers to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 355.]

See also Argentina, Libya.

UNITED STATES

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 14 April 2011, the National Security Archive (NSA) filed a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit to compel the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) to release its internal 1200-page five-volume Top Secret Official History of the Bay of Pigs Invasion. Based on a review of hundreds of CIA documents and on dozens of interviews with key operatives and officials involved in this 1961 operation, it was written by CIA Chief Historian Jack Pfeiffer (–1997) between 1974 and 1984. In 1987, then retired, Pfeiffer himself filed an unsuccessful FOIA lawsuit seeking the release of volume 5 (“CIA’s Internal Investigations of the Bay of Pigs Operations”); this was a rebuttal to the CIA’s Inspector General’s report (declassified itself in 1998), done in the immediate aftermath of the invasion, which held CIA officials accountable for many of the mistakes made during the failed invasion. Volume 3 (“Evolution of CIA’s Anti-Castro Policies, 1951–January 1961”) was released under the Kennedy Assassination Record Act in 1998. In 2005, the NSA had already unsuccessfully requested the disclosure of the study. In July 2011, the CIA released four volumes of its Official History. However, it still refused to release volume 5, which it called a “predecisional” document, for national security considerations. According to the CIA, disclosure would “have a chilling effect on internal agency deliberations and confuse the public with inaccurate historical information.” Revelations from the reports included new information on the CIA’s collaboration with the Mafia to assassinate Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro as part of the invasion plan, American politician Richard Nixon’s role in the preparations of the invasion, Nicaraguan President Anastasio Somoza’s cooperation, and the use of American pilots in the attack on Cuba. On 10 May 2012, a District Court judge accepted that Volume 5 was a “draft” that never was officially approved for inclusion in the official history, and therefore that it was exempt from declassification under the “deliberative process privilege.”

[Source: National Security Archive, Update (14 April & 1 August & 15 August 2011, 17 April & 10 May 2012).]

On 29 April 2011, a bookstore at the Mormon-affiliated Brigham Young University removed a painting by conservative Christian artist Jon McNaughton. The piece, “One nation under God,” depicted Jesus holding the United States constitution, surrounded by American historical figures. A university spokeswoman said the decision was business-related. McNaughton then decided to remove all of his artwork from the bookstore.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2011, no. 3), 177.]

In early May 2011, Maine’s Republican Governor Paul LePage ordered the removal of a large mural hanging in the state’s labor department after complaints that it was “propaganda” and “one-sided.” The mural, by artist Judy Taylor, depicted scenes from the history of labor, including figures of “Rosie the Riveter” (an American icon for women’s work in factories during World War II), child laborers, and a 1937 shoe mill strike. In June 2011, preparations for a trial over the mural’s confiscation started.

[Source: Index on Censorship (2011, no. 3), 177.]

On 29 July 2011, federal judge Royce Lamberth granted a request by Stanley Kutler, professor emeritus of history and law, University of Wisconsin, to release the 297-page transcript of the secret grand jury testimony given by former President Richard Nixon (1913–1994) over the Watergate scandal in June 1975. The transcript would not be unsealed until the government had had a chance to appeal. The judge ruled that the historical interest in the transcript far outweighed the need to keep the records secret. Nixon resigned in August 1974 amid the fallout after a break-in at the Democratic National Committee headquarters at the Watergate complex in Washington. Kutler, who wrote several books about Nixon and Watergate, had previously successfully sued to force the release of audio recordings that Nixon had secretly made in the Oval Office.

[Source: BBC News (29 July 2011).]

In August 2011, a commission established by President Barack Obama to investigate American involvement in the deliberate infection of Guatemalans with sexually transmitted diseases reported its interim findings. The case concerned 5,500 Guatemalans who were the subject of “medical research” that took place with United States collaboration between 1946 and 1948: 1,300 were deliberately exposed to sexually transmitted diseases such as syphilis, gonorrhoea or chancroid.

[Source: Guardian (31 August 2011).]

In September 2011, the new history textbooks were introduced in the schools of Texas [see NCH Annual Report 2011 and NCH Annual Report 2010]. They reportedly contained the following omissions: the founding father Thomas Jefferson; the government's use of propaganda during World War I; the twentieth-century labor movement and socialist presidential candidate Eugene Debs; Japanese internment camps during World War II; and the impact of McCarthyism. The new curriculum also replaced the term "American imperialism" with "American expansionism" and "democratic society" with "constitutional republic"; and included inaccurately that the findings of the House Un-American Activities Committee during the "Red Scare" of the 1950s were validated. It also emphasized the contributions made by the Moral Majority.

[Sources: M. Tuma, "Controversial SBOE History Standards Hit Texas Classrooms" American Independent (6 September 2011).]

In October 2011, Julio Pino, an associate professor of history at Kent State University, posed a question to Ishmael Khaldi, formerly the deputy consul general at the Israeli consulate in San Francisco, during the question period after a lecture by the latter. Pino then shouted "death to Israel" and left the auditorium. A controversy erupted about how appropriate the expression of this view was, with Kent State University condemning Pino, and Cary Nelson, national president of the American Association of University Professors, defending him.

[Source: Scott Jaschik, "Debate over a Professor Who Shouted Anti-Israel statement," Inside HigherEd (31 October 2011).]

On 10 January 2012, the school board of the Tucson Unified School District, Arizona, by a 4 to 1 vote, ordered to suspend the Mexican American Studies program (started in 1997) and to remove some books used in it, including 500 Years of Chicano History in Pictures, edited by Elizabeth Martinez, Chicano! The History of the Mexican Civil Rights Movement, by Arturo Rosales, Rethinking Columbus: The Next 500 Years, edited by Bill Bigelow and Bob Peterson, and Occupied America: A History of Chicanos (first edition 1972; seventh edition, 2011), by Rodolfo Acuña. John Huppenthal, Arizona State Superintendent of Public Instruction, said the books were banned and the program suspended because they "contained content promoting resentment toward a race or class of people" and because the "materials repeatedly referenced white people as being 'oppressors'" in violation of a controversial Arizona law from 2010 (popularly referred to as the Ethnic Studies Law) and that therefore he had asked the board to take measures. School districts that did not comply with the law could have ten percent of their state funds withheld each month. The move was widely protested, including through means of a petition gathering over 15,000 signatures. On 4 April 2012, the contract of Sean Arce, the program's director, was not renewed. Acuña, an immigrant-rights activist and often called "the father of Chicano studies," reportedly received several death threats. The campaign against the Mexican American Studies program had been launched in 2007 by Huppenthal's predecessor Tom Horne in an open letter attacking some of the books. In 2010, Horne became attorney general of Arizona. In an interview in late March 2012, Huppenthal announced that he would also attempt to suspend Mexican American studies in Arizona universities.

[Sources: Jan Blaauw, personal communications (March & April 2012); "Censorship Battle Flares Up in Tucson School District," Publishers' Weekly (30 January 2012); Tom Horne (Superintendent of Public Instruction, Department of Education, State of Arizona), "Open Letter to the Citizens of Tucson" (11 June 2007); "Joint Statement in Opposition To Book Censorship in the Tucson Unified School District" (30 January 2012); Alyssa Lee, "Arizona Official Considers Extending Ethnic Studies Law to Universities," Arizona State University (5 April 2012); National Coalition Against Censorship, "Censorship, Arizona Style" (17 January 2012, updated 10 February 2012); <http://vimeo.com/26961450> (interview with Rodolfo Acuña).]

There was no accountability for human rights violations committed under the administration of President George W. Bush as part of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)'s program of secret detention and rendition (transfer of individuals from the custody of one state to another by means that bypass judicial and administrative due process). On 16 May 2011, the United States (US) Supreme Court refused to hear the Mohamed versus Jeppesen rendition case, leaving in place a 2010 lower court ruling dismissing a lawsuit brought by five men who claimed they were subjected to enforced disappearance and torture at the hands of US personnel and agents of other governments as part of the US secret detention and rendition program. In November 2011, the men took their case to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. On 30 June 2011, the US attorney general announced that the "preliminary review" conducted into interrogations in the CIA program was at an end. He said that he had accepted the prosecutor's recommendation that there should be a "full criminal investigation" in relation to two deaths in custody, but further investigation in other cases was not warranted. In an opinion issued in October 2011, a federal judge refused to hold the CIA in contempt of court for destroying videotapes of interrogations of detainees held in the secret detention program. The tapes—which included recordings of the use of "enhanced interrogation techniques," including "waterboarding"—had been destroyed in 2005, more than a year after the court had ordered the government to produce or identify materials relating to the treatment of detainees.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 357–358.]

On 5 June 2012, the court of appeals of New York ruled that the names of informants who were promised confidentiality by the government in exchange for the names of other members of the Communist Party during the New York City Board of Education's "Anticommunist Investigations" more than half a century ago would remain secret. The court also held, however, that historian Lisa

Harbatkin, who filed suit against the New York Department of Records and Information Services, was entitled to everything in interview transcripts except material that would identify these informants. According to the court, the records generated by the investigation included about 1,100 interviews with teachers and other employees, all of whom were promised confidentiality. Harbatkin's parents had been targets of the Anticommunist Investigations and her mother was among those interviewed by the city officials. Initially, Harbatkin was granted access to unredacted files as long as she agreed not to publish names but she rejected the offer and filed a lawsuit against the department. Harbatkin eventually brought the case to the New York court of appeals, which limited redaction to only informants who were promised confidentiality. The court found that "a right of privacy exists in the affairs of the dead" and "We do not say that disclosure will be completely harmless to those named in the documents, if they are still alive, or to members of their families who care about their memories. But the diminished claims of privacy must be weighed against the claims of history."

[Sources: Court of Appeals of New York, Harbatkin versus New York City Department of Records and Information Services (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/257.pdf>; 2012); Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press (Emily Miller), "New York High Court Issues Mixed Ruling Over Access to Names of Informants in Decades-Old Communist Probe" (6 June 2012).]

See also Canada, Cuba, Libya, Panama, Thailand, United Kingdom.

URUGUAY

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In February 2011, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights ordered Uruguay to remove the obstacles blocking investigations and prosecutions for human rights violations committed during the years of civilian and military rule (1973–1985). The court held Uruguay responsible for the enforced disappearance in 1976 of Maria Claudia García Iruetagoiena de Gelman, and for abducting her baby daughter Maria Macarena Gelman García. It ordered the state to pursue investigations to clarify Maria Claudia García's whereabouts and bring those responsible to justice. In October 2011, a court ruled that five former military officers, already serving prison sentences, had to be prosecuted for the aggravated murder of Maria Claudia García. In May 2011, the Supreme Court concluded that two former military officers could not be charged with enforced disappearance because the crime was not incorporated into domestic law until 2006 and could not be applied retroactively. Instead, they were convicted of aggravated murder in connection with the deaths of 28 people and sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment. There were concerns that this ruling could mean that grave human rights violations would be subject to a statute of limitations. This led Congress to pass a landmark law in October 2011 that in practice annulled the effects of the 1986 Law on the Expiration of Punitive Claims of the State (Expiry Law) and repealed statutes of limitations that would have prevented victims from filing criminal complaints. In June 2011, President José Alberto Mujica Cordano issued a decree revoking the decisions of former presidents about which cases of alleged human rights violations could be investigated. These decisions had been made using powers granted under the Expiry Law which protected police and military personnel from prosecution for human rights violations. The June 2011 decree raised hopes that some 80 cases could be reopened. In October 2011, legal complaints were presented on behalf of more than 150 torture survivors.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 360–361.]

See also Argentina.

UZBEKISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

In 2011, the government continued to refuse an independent investigation into the 2005 massacre of hundreds of citizens in Andijan [Andizhan], denying justice to victims and failing to bring to account those responsible. Authorities continued to persecute anyone suspected of having participated in, or witnessed, the atrocities. The Uzbek government also continued to intimidate families of Andijan survivors who had sought refuge abroad. Police subjected them to constant surveillance, called them for questioning, and threatened them with criminal charges or home confiscation.

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2012 (Washington 2012), 524.]

See also Kyrgyzstan.

VATICAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

VENEZUELA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In 2008, President Hugo Chávez declared that Simón Bolívar (1783–1830), the leader who liberated Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia from Spanish rule in the 1810s and 1820s, was assassinated (by arsenic poisoning) by foreign enemies instead of having died of tuberculosis. He established a commission that would investigate Bolívar's death. Venezuelan historians had rejected the president's hypothesis as fantasy [see NCH Annual Report 2009]. On 16 July 2010, Bolívar's remains were exhumed. On 25 July 2011, the government declared that the commission could not confirm the murder thesis.

[Sources: AP, "Venezuela: Bolívar Death Mystery" (25 July 2011); Maite Rico, "La reinención de la agonía y muerte de Bolívar," El País (21 December 2008); Simon Romero, "Building a New History by Exhuming Bolívar," New York Times (3 August 2010).]

VIETNAM

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

Among the four taboo subjects in the "conduct of publishing activities" listed in Article 10 of the 2004 Publishing Law was the following: "Distortion of historical facts; opposing the achievements of the revolution; offending citizens, great persons and heroes; slandering or harming the reputation of bodies and organizations or offending the honour and dignity of individuals." In 2011, the International Publishers Association also included among the taboo subjects: history, Hồ Chí Minh, and traditional habits and customs.

[Source: International Publishers Association, Freedom to Publish in Vietnam: Between Kafka and the Thang Bom Logic (Geneva 2012), 11.]

WESTERN SAHARA

See Morocco/Western Sahara.

YEMEN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

ZAMBIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

ZIMBABWE

Last Annual Report entry: 2011.

On 14 April 2011, Moses Mzila, Minister of National Healing and Reconciliation and a member of the Movement for Democratic Change (MDC), was arrested for allegedly failing to notify the police about a meeting held the day before in Lupane, Matabeleland North. On the same day, a Roman Catholic priest, Father Marko Mabutho Mnkandla, was arrested for holding mass in memory of the victims and survivors of the Gukurahundi, the atrocities committed by state security forces in Matabeleland in the 1980s.

[Source: Amnesty International, Report 2012 (London 2012), 372.]

INTRODUCTION

The seventeenth Annual Report of the Network of Concerned Historians (NCH) contains news about the domain where history and human rights intersect, especially about the censorship of history and the persecution of historians, archivists, and archaeologists around the globe, as reported by various human rights organizations and other sources. It covers events and developments of 2010 and 2011. The fact that NCH presents this news does not imply that it shares the views and beliefs of the historians and others mentioned in it.

The complete set of Annual Reports (1995–2011) was compiled by Antoon De Baets. Please send any comments to: <antoondebaets@concernedhistorians.org>.

Please cite as:

Network of Concerned Historians, Annual Report 2011 (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org>).

AFGHANISTAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In early 2010, the National Stability and Reconciliation bill was officially promulgated, granting immunity from criminal prosecution to people who committed serious human rights violations and war crimes over the past thirty years. In March 2007, a coalition of powerful warlords in parliament pushed through the amnesty law to prevent prosecution of individuals responsible for large-scale human rights abuses in the preceding decades. It was not publicized and promulgated until early 2010. It was revived in 2010 to facilitate amnesties for reconciliation and reintegration of the Taliban and the Islamist political party Hezb-i Islami Gulbuddin. In the absence of a practical justice system to address the lack of accountability by the warring parties, the government was urged to ask the International Criminal Court to investigate allegations of war crimes and crimes against humanity committed by all parties to the conflict.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 55, 57; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 280.]

See also United States.

ALBANIA

Last Annual Report entry: 1996.

See Macedonia, Serbia / Kosovo.

ALGERIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

The government maintained the state of emergency in force since 1992. No steps were taken to investigate the thousands of enforced disappearances and other serious abuses that took place during the internal conflict of 1992–2000, in which over 100,000 Algerians died. The authorities continued to implement the Charter for Peace and National Reconciliation (Law 06–01), which gave impunity to the security forces, criminalized public criticism of their conduct and amnestied members of armed groups responsible for gross human rights abuses. In October 2010, a senior official claimed that 7,500 “repented terrorists” had been granted amnesties since 2005. He also said that 6,240 families of people who had disappeared had accepted financial compensation, and that only twelve families “manipulated by NGOs and foreign bodies” were refusing compensation. Under Law 06–01, relatives can seek compensation if they obtain a death certificate from the authorities for the person who disappeared. A 2000 decree banning demonstrations in Algiers remained in effect in 2010. Despite the ban, families of the disappeared continued to hold protests in several cities, including Algiers, Constantine and Jijel. SOS Disparu(e)s—an organization comprised of relatives of persons forcibly disappeared—held small vigils in front of the Algiers headquarters of the state human rights commission for most Wednesdays since 1998, in spite of occasional police harassment. In August 2010, police dispersed the gathering and briefly arrested the protesters. During the same month, the head of the National Advisory Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (CNCPPDH) declared that demands by families for truth and justice were unrealistic due to the absence of testimonies and the impossibility of identifying perpetrators. In July 2010, the United Nations Human Rights Committee said that the authorities should investigate the disappearance of Douia Benaziza, who was arrested by security forces in June 1996, and provide her family with an adequate remedy. The Committee found that the authorities had breached her right to liberty and security of person, and her right not to be tortured or ill-treated.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 60, 61; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 506–509.]

ANGOLA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Congo (Democratic Republic).

ARGENTINA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

According to official data, by the end of 2010, 110 people had been convicted for their role in human rights violations committed under the military regimes of 1976–1983; 820 more were facing criminal charges; and 13 trials were continuing. On 20 April 2010, Reynaldo Bignone, a former military general and former de facto President, was found guilty of torture, murder and several kidnappings that occurred while he was commander of the Campo de Mayo detention center (1976–1978) on the outskirts of Buenos Aires. He received a 25 year prison sentence. In December 2010, Jorge Videla, de facto President of Argentina in 1976–1981, was found criminally responsible for the torture and deaths of over thirty prisoners in Córdoba in 1976. The court found a further 22 military and police officers guilty of these crimes. Delays in judicial proceedings, however, continued to undermine accountability. According to the Center for Legal and Social Studies (CELS), by October 2010, 253 people implicated in crimes committed during the dictatorship had died before being brought to justice. One of the main causes of delay was the failure to allocate sufficient courtrooms in Buenos Aires. There were also long delays at the appellate level: as of March 2010 the Supreme Court had confirmed final sentences in only two of the cases reactivated after the annulment of the amnesty laws.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 14, 66; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 204–205.]

In 2010 no one was convicted for the 1994 bombing of the Jewish Argentine Mutual Association in Buenos Aires (AMIA), in which 85 people died and over 300 were injured. Criminal investigations and prosecutions were hindered by judicial corruption and political cover-ups in Argentina, and by the failure of Iran, which is suspected of ordering the attack, to cooperate with the Argentine justice system. An Argentine federal court issued an international warrant for the arrest of former Iranian president Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani and six Iranian officials in 2006, but demands for their extradition fell on deaf ears. In a speech at the United Nations (UN) in September 2010, President Cristina Fernández de Kirchner offered Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad the possibility of holding the trials in a neutral third country. In a letter to the UN in October 2010, Iran rejected the proposal as “unsustainable.”

[Source: Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 206–207.]

See also Germany, Vietnam.

ARMENIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

See Turkey, United States.

AUSTRALIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

See Myanmar.

AUSTRIA

Last Annual Report entry: 2009.

AZERBAIJAN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

On 6 July 2010, a Baku court convicted Eynulla Fatullayev (see NCH Annual Report 2010) of drug possession and sentenced him to 30 months' imprisonment. On 26 July 2010, an appeal was filed against the decision. In late July and August 2010, two newspapers and a television channel conducted a smear campaign against Fatullayev, calling him, inter alia, a "traitor." On 4 October 2010, an appeal to the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) filed by the government in July was rejected. In November 2010, the Supreme Court ruled that the country would uphold the ECHR decision of April 2010 (it had ruled that Fatullayev's rights to free expression and to a fair trial had been violated and that he should be given compensation); it lifted the charges of defamation and instigating terrorism, but not the drug possession charges. On 22 November 2010, the appeals court upheld the drug possession conviction. In January 2011, Fatullayev announced that he had appealed to the ECHR against the drugs charge. In February 2011, Fatullayev expressed fears for his safety in prison (he was kept in the same prison as some of the criminals he had written about critically while an active journalist) and announced a hunger strike if he would not be transferred to another prison. He was put in solitary confinement. In March 2011, his life was reported in danger. In early May 2011, Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Representative on Freedom of the Media Dunja Mijatovic met with Fatullayev in prison. On 26 May 2011, he was released due to a general amnesty for political prisoners to mark 28 May Republic Day.

[Sources: Article 19, “Azerbaijan: Eynulla Fatullayev Sentenced to 2.5 Years’ Imprisonment on New Political Charge” (7 July 2010); Article 19, “Fatullayev’s Fate Lies with the Council of Europe Committee of Ministers” (6 December 2010); European Court of Human Rights, Eynulla Fatullayev versus Azerbaijan: Judgement (<http://www.concernedhistorians.org/le/150.pdf>; 22 April 2010); Human Rights Watch, Azerbaijan: Beaten, Blacklisted, and Behind Bars—The Vanishing Space for Freedom of Expression in Azerbaijan (Washington, October 2010), 21–23, 34–35; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 398; Ifex Communiqué (1 June 2011); Institute for Reporters Freedom and Safety, Press releases (7 July & 27 July & 9 August & 21 October 2010; 10 & 25 January & 11 February & 27 April & 29 April 2011); Index on Censorship, 4/10: 213–214; Keesings historisch archief (2010), 657; PEN, RAN 27/07 Updates (5 October 2010; 10 & 22 November 2010; 27 May 2011); Reporters Without Borders, Ifex Alert (22 July 2010).]

BAHRAIN

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In June 2010, the authorities blocked a popular blog called Sanawat al-Jareesh, which provided an unofficial account of Bahrain's history.

[Source: S. Kelly & S. Cook, eds., Freedom on the Net: A Global Assessment of Internet and Digital Media (Washington: Freedom House, 2011), 51.]

In September 2010, the Department of Publications of the Ministry of Culture and Information banned a book entitled "Unbridled Hatreds: Read in the Fate of Ancient Hatreds" written by Nader Kadim. On 26 September 2010, a discussion seminar supposed to take place at the same time as the book launch was canceled. The book provided an overview of hatred in different historical contexts, especially focussing on defamation laws and laws criminalizing hate speech. Kadim had previously published sections of the book as newspaper articles without any objections. In 2008, his book "Using Memory in a Society Plagued by its History" was banned because the authorities considered it "dangerous to the principles of modern-day society."

[Source: Bahrain Center for Human Rights, Ifex Alert (27 October 2010).]

BANGLADESH

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

In March 2010, the government set up the International Crimes Tribunal to try "those who committed crimes, assisted criminals and took part in the genocide during the Liberation War [1971]." Between August and November 2010, the Tribunal ordered the arrest of five leaders of the Jamaat-e-Islami (a religious right-wing political group alleged to have collaborated with Pakistani forces) for war crimes, including genocide. They were Motiur Rahman Nizami, Ali Ahsan Muhammad Mojahid, Muhammad Kamaruzzaman, Abdul Quader Molla and Delwar Hossain Sayeedi. Salauddin Quader Chowdhury, a leader of the opposition Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP) detained since mid-December 2010, was later declared a war crimes suspect. They all had been arrested initially on unrelated charges. The International Crimes (Tribunal) Act 1973 and its 2009 amendment, under which the trials were being held, lacked adequate fair trial safeguards. It denied, among other things, the right to challenge the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the right to the possibility of bail and the right to challenge the impartiality of the judges.

[Sources: Amnesty International, Report 2011 (London 2011), 74–75; Human Rights Watch, World Report 2011 (Washington 2011), 284.]

BELARUS

Last Annual Report entry: 2010.

